Responsible in this capacity for the administration of the four components of the programme: advisory services of experts; fellowships and scholarships; international and regional seminars; and regional or national training courses. Participants in the seminars include ministers, attorneys-general, judges of special courts, senior officials, etc. A variety of subjects were dealt with at the seminars including questions concerning racial discrimination; religious intolerance and prejudice; minorities and migrant workers. Several training courses were organized by the Unit in implementation of that component of the programme. The object of the courses was to familiarize the participants with the relevant legislation and administrative practices and procedures of other countries in the human rights field, as well as the United Nations standards on human rights in the administration of criminal justice. Special attention was given in the programmes of the courses as appropriate to the provisions of the International Bill of Rights and the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination.

Secretary of the Second World Conference on Racism. In charge of preparing the studies and documentation on all aspects of racial discrimination considered by the Conference, and also of the pertinent reports that were subsequently put before the Commission on Human Rights, the Economic and Social Council or the General Assembly as required.

Appointed Chief of the Racial Discrimination Task Force, responsible for the implementation of the programme adopted by the Second World Conference.

A number of studies and reports were researched and drafted by the Unit on the list of special assignments assigned to it.

In the course of my work, I have always sought to convey my view that where the existing international standards or instruments fail fully to cover any particular concern, one can summon the body especially responsible to study the need for any further elaboration of a new specific instrument to address the point or subject in question. One must also examine the broad provisions of existing instruments very carefully to see whether its implementational provisions and other recourse procedures do or do not provide an indirect remedy for the matter.
