38. Mr. GOKCE (Observer for Turkey) drew the Sub-Commission's attention to the situation of the Muslim minority of Turkish origin which, since 1984, had been subjected to a policy of forced assimilation and repression by the Bulgarian Government. The Bulgarian Government had launched in late 1984 a massive campaign designed to assimilate forcibly the 1.5 million strong Turkish minority by suddenly adopting the position of outright and total denial of the very existence of such a minority in Bulgaria, in violation of the provisions of international instruments and bilateral agreements. The Bulgarian authorities were systematically depriving the Turkish minority of its ethnic, cultural and religious identity, and to that end were engaging in brutal methods of repression, even endangering the right to life of members of the minority. All Bulgarian citizens of Turkish origin had been forced to change their names, all local publications and broadcasts in Turkish ended, the teaching of Turkish in minority schools stopped, and even conversing in Turkish had been made a punishable offence; their freedom of worship had been drastically curtailed and, as a religious custom, circumcision had been forbidden. Those protesting these measures had met with acts of brutal repression and many had been forced into internal exile. The number of people killed or wounded during that period was not known exactly, but several human rights organizations had documented the violent acts perpetrated at that time. The reports of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination were particularly eloquent in that respect, giving testimony to the fact that Bulgaria was not fulfilling its international human rights obligations regarding the Muslim Turkish minority in that country.

39. On many occasions, Turkey had officially invited the Bulgarian authorities to restore the Turkish minority's status and rights and to sign with Turkey a voluntary emigration agreement. Faced with the increasingly strong reaction of the international community and Turkey's determined attitude, the Bulgarian Government had finally agreed to conclude the Belgrade Protocol of 23 February 1988. That had given rise to hopes that the ordeal of the Turkish minority in Bulgaria would come to an end through that process, but the subsequent negotiations had soon shown that Bulgaria had had no intention of altering its stance and had merely sought to exploit the dialogue in order to avoid attracting the attention of the international community, while maintaining its position of denying the very existence of the Muslim Turkish minority in Bulgaria.

At the end of the paragraph insert

That explanation, which was no less than an affront to human intelligence, was certainly not less serious than the abhorrent event of forced exodus itself. There had been more than a quarter of a million "tourists" in three months, 5,000 a day, and they were all of Turkish origin. They were all going in one direction, the Turkish border. He wondered if the time had come to send the Bulgarian Government a note thanking it for its contribution to the Turkish tourism industry.

Paragraph 43, last sentence

The Council of Europe, the North Atlantic Assembly, various political parties, and inter-party and non-governmental organizations dealing with human rights issues had denounced the policies of oppression pursued by Bulgaria. A contact group of the Organization of the Islamic Conference was engaged in a continuous investigation of the tragedy of the Muslim Turkish minority. At the Humanitarian Dimension meeting of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe held in Paris in May 1989, the Bulgarian Government had been accused of being in violation of human rights and the pertinent articles of the Vienna Concluding Document of the Conference, of which Bulgaria was a signatory, and had been sharply criticized. The point he wanted to make was that Bulgaria was in gross and flagrant violation of human rights and the international community was reacting to that violation. Needless to say, a less than adequate reaction against such methods of doing away with minorities would not only raise the question of the credibility of professed principles and beliefs but also would constitute an encouragement for those who might be in search of solutions to similar problems to resort to the same methods. His delegation was, therefore, confident that the Sub-Commission, which had always displayed keen sensitivity to human rights violations, would address this very serious violation in a manner commensurate with its gravity.
