Colombia withdrew a draft resolution on local planning of energy policy, also sponsored by Kenya, which would have had the Conference request United Nations bodies to promote energy planning policies at municipal and local community levels.

CONSIDERATION BY THE COMMITTEE ON NATURAL RESOURCES AND THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL. Energy policy and its relationship to money and finance were among the topics discussed in a report on the world economic situation and prospects,<sup>(3)</sup> adopted in March 1981 by the Task Force on Long-Term Development Objectives, a subsidiary body of the inter-agency Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (p. 388). The Task Force stressed the need for regional action, particularly by smaller countries collaborating in medium- to large-scale energy developments, mutual help in the establishment of national energy institutions, joint training of personnel, policy co-ordination, regular consultation and co-operative arrangements, emergency energy sharing schemes among developing countries and maintenance of a world balance sheet on energy. Oil-importing developing countries, it said, required help in financing investment in all energy sources, balance-of-payments finance, technical assistance and the pooling of research.

The Secretary-General issued in May for the Committee on Natural Resources a report on energy trends and issues,<sup>(8)</sup> illustrating how the demand and supply situation might differ in the year 2000 depending on the extent to which policy measures were introduced to enhance energy efficiency and promote expanded production. For the developing countries, such action could mean the difference between an annual growth rate of 5 per cent and one of 6.5 per cent. Achievement of a 7 per cent growth rate was feasible but would require a "crash" programme for the exploration and development of conventional and unconventional energy sources.

In the Committee,<sup>(4)</sup> Kenya and Uganda proposed that the Secretary-General be requested to prepare a comprehensive report in 1983 on the energy investment needs of developing countries and on international co-operation in relation to energy. However, the Committee adjourned debate on the question without acting on the proposal.

On 21 July, the Economic and Social Council's First (Economic) Committee decided not to consider, but to annex to its report to the Council,<sup>(6)</sup> a draft resolution by Kenya<sup>(2)</sup> similar to the text submitted in the Committee on Natural Resources. Kenya told the Council that the Group of 77 had decided that the Council should not take a decision on the proposal at its current session but that the Group would reconsider it during the 1981 Assembly session.

The proposal by Kenya would have had the Council recommend that the energy pricing level be included as a topic in the energy programme of the United Nations medium-term plan for 1984-1989; declare the need to identify constraints in the development of energy sources and to establish national, regional and global mechanisms to co-ordinate activities and implement and review policy measures; request the Secretary-General to co-ordinate and strengthen research and information dissemination on the world energy supply, demand and consumption situation, trends and outlook; and request him to prepare a comprehensive report for the 1983 session of the Committee on Natural Resources giving an analysis of the connection between energy availability and economic and social development, an overview of the world energy situation, an assessment of prospective supply and demand, and a review of the energy requirements of developing countries and the means to finance energy-related investments.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY CONSIDERATION. In December the Chairman of the General Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee circulated a draft resolution on energy<sup>(1)</sup> but then announced that, as it did not command consensus, it had been withdrawn.<sup>(7)</sup>

The draft would have had the Assembly request a comprehensive report from the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation, containing: an overview of the world energy situation and an assessment of the evolution of energy prospects and projections of the developing countries; an identification of the constraints to the development of energy sources in the developing countries, including constraints of financing, exploration, energy planning, information flows, education and training, research and development, and technology transfer; a review of energy investment requirements of developing countries and the possible and available mechanisms to finance such investment, and of existing gaps and prospective means of filling them, particularly in the field of exploration; and a review of the situation with regard to international co-operation on energy. The report would have been submitted to the Committee on Natural Resources in 1983.

The United Kingdom, speaking for members of the European Community, regretted that the Assembly had been unable to adopt a resolution on energy and said the energy problem should be studied in a global context rather than in North-South terms.

Earlier, during the Committee's debate on development and international economic co-operation, 'Austria said a rapid increase of energy consumption in developing countries was inevitable in the short term, in view of their need to increase production; if the energy-importing developing countries were to reach their development objectives, the energy supply would have to be adjusted to their needs, requiring huge investments in oil and gas as well as alternative sources. Kenya said it was essential to help developing countries identify their energy needs so that they might reflect them in their development plans, and to identify obstacles to the development and utilization of coal and other energy sources; also, a mechanism should be established to co-ordinate and implement energy activities.

Assessment and planning

The Nairobi Programme of Action for the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy<sup>(1)</sup> stated that the role of each energy source in meeting a country's needs could best be determined through national energy planning, an essential element of which was energy assessment. The Programme identified areas in which action was needed, including mapping and surveys to ascertain the physical resource endowment, determination of energy supply and demand and energy balances, identification and continuing review of promising technologies, and strengthening or establishment of information gathering and dissemination machinery.

Countries were urged to designate focal points for national assessment and planning, to prepare inventories of resources, needs and technologies, as well as estimates of supply and demand in order to identify areas for short- or long-term action, including international co-operation. The Programme suggested that international support and assistance be given for strengthening national capacities for data gathering, planning, identification and assessment of new and renewable sources, and evaluation of existing technologies; and local capacities for developing and utilizing different sources of energy.

The Ad Hoc Expert Group on Research and Development and Transfer of Technology, one of the six expert groups established in preparation for the Nairobi Conference (p. 6941), recommended in a February 1981 report<sup>(2)</sup> that a United Nations task force be set up to report on ongoing or anticipated global, regional and national energy assessments and the adequacy of such efforts, as well as on further work needed. The Group recommended that analysis of the role and potential of new and renewable energy sources be given high priority in energy assessment programmes and be fully integrated into the resulting national energy plans.

The Synthesis Group (p. 695) asserted in February<sup>(3)</sup> that the role of alternative energy sources should be defined within coherent energy policies and plans that were integral parts of broader development strategies. It pointed to the need to establish a reliable data base for effective evaluation of such energy sources, followed by pre-investment studies.

Research and development

The Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy observed that, while research into new and renewable energy sources was expanding rapidly world-wide, co-ordination and information-sharing were poor, duplication was widespread, and important aspects were neglected and received few resources. In its Programme of Action,<sup>(1)</sup> it pointed out that the bulk of research was being carried out in developed countries and much of it would have to be extensively adapted for use in developing countries. To enhance the scientific and technological capabilities of developing countries, it would be necessary to: select promising technologies with a view to launching concerted efforts to accelerate their development; identify the research needed on the economic, social and environmental implications of emerging technologies; establish or strengthen institutions and capacities for research and development, including testing and links to production; establish criteria for evaluating new and renewable energy sources; and identify and implement demonstration projects.

The Conference recommended that international co-operation be directed to support primarily national efforts, particularly of developing countries, to initiate or enhance research, development and demonstration activities, including self-sustained indigenous research and technological capabilities. Priority programmes were identified for urban and industrial energy (p. 705) and rural energy (p. 706).

Prior to the Conference, the Ad Hoc Expert Group on Research and Development and Transfer of Technology recommended in a February 1981 report<sup>(2)</sup> that an international group of experts be formed to establish a programme for long-term testing of systems for utilization of alternative energy sources. It also proposed that two task forces be established to determine ways of ensuring the development, within five years, of technologies using new and renewable energy sources to meet the needs for small stand-alone power sources and for domestic cookers.

The Synthesis Group<sup>(3)</sup> stated in February that the development of a strong research and development capacity in developing countries would be an important step in facilitating the evaluation, adaptation and innovation of energy technologies. The presence of effective national industrial property systems would facilitate new developments in developing countries. Developing countries should be assisted in strengthening their capacity to develop equipment having maximum economic and social impact. There was also a need to improve the productivity and use of existing national energy resources.

Information transfer

The Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy recognized the availability of adequate information as a prerequisite for sound policy-making, planning and research. In the Nairobi Programme of Action,<sup>(1)</sup> it asserted that the need for improved information flow on energy must be viewed in the broader context of global information exchange in all sectors. In view of the newness of much of the subject-matter and the rapid pace of developments, the Conference considered it necessary to: assess the capability of existing information systems and services to provide information suitable for different types of users; establish or strengthen national, subregional and regional energy information centres; develop and utilize standardized data collection and classification systems, and maximize the availability of technological information contained in patent documents.

The Conference stressed the need to support education and training programmes and to promote information exchange among countries, as well as programmes to enhance public awareness of the energy situation. New or strengthened national and regional centres could serve as focal points for such activities and for technology transfer, evaluation and demonstration. Courses were needed to train decision makers, scientists and engineers in energy assessment, planning and use. National, regional and international information systems should be closely linked.

The Ad Hoc Expert Group on Information Flows (Geneva, 8-12 December 1980)<sup>(2)</sup> recommended a series of national, regional and global measures to improve access to information. Among its suggestions was that task forces be convened, one for each energy source, to develop proposals for the better articulation of information services. The central aim would be to ensure availability of resources to specialized research, development and training centres for specific energy sources, linked to a network of regional and national institutions.

The Synthesis Group (p. 695) suggested in February 1981<sup>(3)</sup> that extension services were necessary to encourage and promote acceptance and use of new and renewable energy sources, and that a national agency be designated as a focal point for a broad range of information responsibilities so as to meet the needs of users. In order to provide practical and relevant information, sustained information analysis and evaluation activities should be established, data banks on energy could be expanded to collate information from national and regional surveys, and mechanisms could be developed to link those services into an effective international information system.

Bibliography. A compendium of existing studies on new and renewable sources of energy<sup>(1)</sup>—a bibliography prepared by the Secretary-General of the Nairobi Conference at the request of its Preparatory Committee and issued in April 1981—contained some 400 references, out of a total body of some 750,000 studies, as representative and important in the fields of biomass, fuelwood and charcoal, draught animal power, geothermal, hydropower, ocean, oil shale and tar sands, peat, solar and wind energy. Acting on a suggestion of the Conference Secretary-General, the Preparatory Committee, on 16 April, requested him to pursue the idea of establishing a computerized retrieval system for the studies, to be provided for the Conference if resources could be secured from outside the United Nations budget.<sup>(2)</sup>

Technology transfer

The Nairobi Programme of Action for the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy<sup>(1)</sup> recognized the need to establish and support channels for the widespread transfer of technology under conditions mutually beneficial to all, taking into account agreements to be reached within the framework of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) regarding the proposed international code of conduct on the transfer of technology (p. 755). Further, it said that decision makers should take into account issues relating to climatic, cultural and institutional settings where the technology was to be applied, managerial aspects associated with its introduction and operation, economic and social costs and benefits, and environmental effects.

Among the measures suggested in the Programme was the strengthening of the developing countries' ability to evaluate technologies, the better to assess, select, negotiate, acquire and adapt them for new and renewable energy sources. National capabilities to manufacture and maintain the equipment to make such assessments should be developed, and joint industrial programmes should be established to manufacture the items needed to utilize new energy sources. The Programme also suggested the establishment and strengthening of national, subregional and regional centres for the transfer and adaptation of technologies, including field testing, demonstration and evaluation of complete systems.

In a separate decision,<sup>(5)</sup> the Conference acknowledged that it was the sovereign right of all countries, particularly developing countries, to explore and acquire technology relating to all kinds of new and renewable energy sources, and to use or control it without political constraints or fear of aggression from any other State.

This proposal, sponsored by Pakistan, was adopted on 21 August by 60 votes to none, with 36 abstentions. Explaining their abstentions, Australia and Canada considered it improper for the Conference to deal with a question under negotiation in other United Nations bodies.

In its contribution to the Conference preparatory process, the Ad Hoc Expert Group on Research and Development and Transfer of Technology recommended in February<sup>(2)</sup> that United Nations regional commissions continue to play an important role in establishing regional centres for technology transfer and in obtaining support from international organizations and developed countries. It also suggested that a United Nations task force be established to report on financial, physical and human resources needed for new or existing regional centres and to propose a financing scheme.

The UNCTAD Trade and Development Board, after deciding on 20 March<sup>(3)</sup> question later in the year, requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General on 9 October<sup>(4)</sup> to convene a meeting of governmental experts on energy. The meeting, open to all UNCTAD members, was to examine problems concerning the transfer, application and development of energy technology, and make recommendations in 1982 to the UNCTAD Committee on Transfer of Technology. This was one of three sectoral meetings on technology transfer scheduled by UNCTAD (p. 754).

Training of personnel

Noting that the establishment, development, operation, maintenance and dissemination of new energy systems required skilled scientific and technical manpower and increased public awareness and support, the Nairobi Programme of Action for the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy<sup>(1)</sup> pointed to the need for educational and training programmes for students, decision makers, planners, managers, extension workers and the general public, as well as facilities for the training of specialized personnel. To that end, efforts were needed to estimate the requirements for various categories of trained personnel, co-ordinate information exchange on educational systems and teaching materials, encourage the establishment or strengthening of training and educational centres, and use the educational system and mass media to inform the public of opportunities for using new and renewable energy sources.

The Ad Hoc Expert Group on Education and Training (New York, 19-22 January 1981), which submitted 19 recommendations as part of the preparatory work for the Conference,<sup>(2)</sup> suggested that, if a centre on new and renewable energy sources was established in the United Nations system, it should include a unit for the initiation, funding and organizing of education and training in developing countries. Further, such a body could facilitate implementation of several of the Group's recommendations, including those calling for a survey of the attention given to new and renewable energy sources in educational systems, development and introduction of curricula, exchange of technical information and experience, a fellowship programme, and regional courses for government policy makers, energy planners, professionals and scientists.

The Synthesis Group (p. 695) suggested in February<sup>(3)</sup> that education and training on new and renewable energy sources should be incorporated in formal programmes at all levels and that the general public should be encouraged to contribute to the widespread use of those sources. Observing that there were few courses or training programmes on the subject anywhere in the world and that there was a significant shortage of qualified manpower, it advocated the expansion or creation of educational and training centres and the introduction of courses aimed at specific groups such as scientists, energy planners, technicians and public users of energy technologies.

Institutional arrangements

The Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, in its Nairobi Programme of Action (p. 689) adopted on 21 August 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> recommended to the General Assembly that there should be an intergovernmental body in the United Nations specifically concerned with new and renewable sources of energy, to guide and monitor implementation of the Programme. Such a body would be open to all States and would report to the Assembly through the Economic and Social Council. Among its functions would be to recommend policy guidelines for other bodies in the United Nations system, formulate plans and programmes, review and modify the priorities set in the Nairobi Programme, assess trends and policy measures with a view to increasing the contribution of new and renewable energy sources, promote mobilization of resources, recommend guidelines to United Nations financial bodies, contribute to the work of governmental and intergovernmental institutions, review activities of the United Nations system and help ensure their co-ordination.

The Conference recommended, without prejudice to a final Assembly decision in 1982 on institutional arrangements, that a body patterned on the Conference Preparatory Committee be entrusted with launching the Programme in 1982. Such a body might recommend the establishment of task forces for implementing specific programmes and projects. The United Nations Secretary-General was requested to make recommendations to the Assembly in 1981 on arrangements for servicing the proposed body, including the possibility of a small Secretariat unit for new and renewable energy sources, making full use of available United Nations resources.

The Conference also made recommendations on co-ordination mechanisms in the United Nations system (p. 701), regional and subregional action (p. 702) and co-operation among developing countries (p. 703).

Reporting to the General Assembly in November,<sup>(2)</sup> the Secretary-General recommended that the secretariat support services required for the 1982 session of the interim committee be organized on the basis of a standing interdepartmental working group, which would provide guidance for the organization and synthesis of input from bodies in the United Nations system, ensure system-wide co-operative action and co-ordination, and serve as a focal point for outside inquiries in regard to United Nations activities on new and renewable energy sources. The working group would be chaired by the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation. Pending a 1982 review, staff would be supplied for the time being from within existing resources.

Establishment of the Interim Committee

In its resolution of 17 December 1981 on the Nairobi Conference,<sup>(2)</sup> the General Assembly established an Interim Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and entrusted it with the launching of the Nairobi Programme and with guiding and monitoring its implementation. The Committee was to concentrate on recommending policy guidelines for bodies of the United Nations system, formulating plans and programmes, promoting the mobilization of resources, and recommending guidelines to financial bodies of the system with a view to implementation of the financing provisions of the Nairobi Programme. Meeting for a single two-week session at Rome, Italy, it was to submit recommendations for Assembly action in 1982 on areas for priority action and ways of mobilizing resources. The Secretary-General was requested to put into effect the interim secretariat arrangements he had recommended in his report (p. 700). The Assembly decided to adopt in 1982 final arrangements with regard to the intergovernmental body and to review secretariat arrangements.

The original draft resolution submitted by Algeria on behalf of the Group of 77<sup>(1)</sup> would have authorized the Committee to develop and formulate (rather than recommend) policy guidelines for the United Nations system, provide guidelines for (rather than promote) resource mobilization, and provide (rather than recommend) guidelines on financing of implementation measures. The final text added the phrase "without prejudice to the final institutional arrangements" in the paragraph on establishment of the Interim Committee. Also added was a paragraph by which the Assembly called on bodies of the United Nations system to inform the Committee of their ongoing activities. Finally, the Assembly took note of, rather than approving as proposed in the Algerian draft, the Secretary-General's recommendations on secretariat services.

During the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee's debate on development and international economic co-operation, and in explanations of position after approval of the draft resolution, several countries commented on the arrangements, especially with regard to the secretariat. Japan expressed the view that sufficient Secretariat support was essential, utilizing personnel and facilities already available; as the proposed Interim Committee would have no permanent secretariat, Japan was concerned about the preparations to be made for its session. Kenya urged the establishment of an intergovernmental body and of an adequately staffed Secretariat unit, financed as far as possible within existing resources and, if necessary, from supplementary resources.

Norway, speaking for the Nordic States, believed there should be strong and efficient secretariat follow-up to the Nairobi Programme of Action. Romania favoured the establishment of an intergovernmental body and appropriate Secretariat arrangements, stating that the United Nations system should have an important role in developing and strengthening international co-operation on energy. Sri Lanka said a Secretariat unit should be set up to provide the intergovernmental committee with information on such matters as current plans and programmes in each priority area identified in the Nairobi Programme, the scope for technical and economic co-operation among developing countries, the plans of bilateral aid agencies and multilateral aid arrangements outside the United Nations system, and the involvement of the private sector.

Canada believed that the permanent institutional arrangements should differ from those provided for in the resolution. Senegal favoured a committee open to all United Nations Members.

The USSR considered that it would be a mistake to create a new intergovernmental organ and a Secretariat division for energy; the Committee on Natural Resources and its secretariat could be used to implement the Nairobi Conference's decisions at considerable savings of expenditure. Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Hungary and the Ukrainian SSR also believed the Committee on Natural Resources and its secretariat could carry out the Nairobi Programme, while the German Democratic Republic urged full utilization of that Committee and the United Nations Department of Technical Co-operation for Development.

Co-ordination in the UN system

In the Nairobi Programme of Action,<sup>(2)</sup> the Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy called for full participation by the United Nations system in implementation of the Programme, with due consideration to national plans and priorities. It recommended that the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation co-ordinate contributions from within the system. Specialized intergovernmental organizations and institutions were invited to co-operate, while United Nations resident co-ordinators for development assistance would provide a focal point for national activities in consultation with the country representatives of the organizations concerned.

In a November 1981 report to the General Assembly on institutional arrangements arising from the Conference's recommendations,<sup>(3)</sup> the Secretary-General stated that the Director-General, in carrying out his responsibilities under the Programme, would make full use of the facilities of the inter-agency Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC). It was anticipated that ACC would strengthen consultative mechanisms, promoting the concerted execution of the Programme's components and, where warranted, joint execution of projects. ACC had constituted an ad hoc working group to prepare proposals for inter-agency follow-up.

In its 17 December resolution on the Nairobi Conference,<sup>(4)</sup> the General Assembly entrusted the Director-General with the task of coordinating contributions from within the United Nations system, and decided that a co-ordinating capacity for new and renewable energy sources would be located in his Office, subject to Assembly review in 1982. Noting with approval the 30 October decision of ACC<sup>(5)</sup> to constitute an ad hoc working group to prepare proposals for the Interim Committee on inter-agency follow-up to the Nairobi Programme, the Assembly suggested that the Group review current and planned activities of the United Nations system with a view to facilitating their adaptation and reformulation, and establish task forces as necessary.

The original draft by the Group of 77 did not contain the provision on the Director-General's co-ordinating capacity. Further, its clause on ACC task forces specified that they should be tailored to the requirements of specific time-limited tasks related to research, development, demonstration, application and utilization of new and renewable energy sources on a sectoral or cross-sectoral basis; it made no mention of task forces to be established by the intergovernmental body.

During debate in the Second Committee on development and international economic co-operation, several speakers stressed the importance of effective co-ordination in implementing the Nairobi Programme. Egypt called for the deployment of a team in the Director-General's Office to carry out field studies and consultation on the priority areas identified in the Programme and to report the results to the intergovernmental committee. Japan urged ACC, the Director-General and the Conference Secretary-General to improve inter-agency co-ordination.

The ACC Ad Hoc Working Group on Inter-agency Follow-up to the Nairobi Programme of Action for the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy held its first meeting in New York on 17 and 18 December.<sup>(*)</sup> Members agreed that each participating agency would choose a limited number of areas for intensified future action, as a basis for identifying activities for joint or co-ordinated action.

Also under ACC auspices, an ad hoc inter-agency meeting of energy programme managers (New York, 16 December) reviewed the proposed United Nations energy programme, to be included for the first time as a separate major programme in the proposed United Nations medium-term plan for 1984-1989, and agreed that it should contain cross-references to objectives of the specialized agencies and of other United Nations programmes.

Regional and subregional action

The Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, in the Nairobi Programme of Action adopted on 21 August 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> stated that, whenever appropriate and necessary to facilitate implementation of the Programme, regional commissions and regional development banks should be strengthened, regional programmes supported and intergovernmental bodies established. It proposed that priority attention be given to support of resource evaluation, research, development and demonstration, training, energy planning and identification of regional or subregional projects, and that those activities be carried out through the establishment or strengthening of specialized institutions. Other priority areas included strengthening or establishment of regional information networks on technologies and their application, organization of joint research and development and information exchange activities, support of regional efforts for technology transfer, and undertaking of joint industrial activities for the production of energy-related capital goods.

The importance of strengthening regional centres was stressed in February<sup>(3)</sup> by the Synthesis Group (p. 695), which pointed to the need to develop regional co-operative network programmes based on regional needs and linking national and regional centres for new and renewable energy sources.

In its 17 December resolution on the Nairobi Conference,<sup>(4)</sup> the General Assembly requested the United Nations regional commissions to undertake immediately, as necessary, the development of regional plans and programmes, and to report thereon to the Interim Committee in 1982. In the draft resolution submitted by a Vice-Chairman of the Second Committee, on which the final text was based, the words "as necessary" were added to the original draft<sup>(1)</sup> submitted on behalf of the Group of 77.

Co-operation among developing countries

When the Committee for Development Planning discussed economic and technical co-operation among developing countries (p. 383), it stated, in the report on its March/April 1981 session, <sup>(2)</sup> that the most effective form of regional and subregional co-operation would be for oil-exporting countries to make soft loans to oil-importing developing countries to cover the incremental cost of oil imports. Alternatively, there could be a rebate in the form of a grant from the exporter to the importer, on condition that the benefiting country would fix its domestic oil prices at world parities so as to discourage waste. Other arrangements might include a supply guarantee by oil exporters to importers, joint development of hydroelectric and other renewable energy sources, interconnection of electric power grids, and establishment of regional and subregional energy bodies. It also urged regional and subregional research and development on alternative energy systems.

The Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, in its Nairobi Programme of Action adopted on 21 August,<sup>(3)</sup> stated that the international community would provide support and assistance to efforts by developing countries to accelerate mutual co-operation in new and renewable energy sources. Among such efforts mentioned were information exchange; joint ventures in project development; joint efforts in research, development, demonstration and adaptation of technologies; and technical assistance.

The General Assembly, in its 17 December resolution on the Conference,<sup>(4)</sup> recognized that developing countries sought to enhance their collective self-reliance in various areas of mutual interest, and called on the international community to provide support and assistance to their efforts to accelerate mutual co-operation on new and renewable energy sources. The resolution mentioned the kinds of co-operation listed in the Nairobi Programme and said they should supplement action by the international community.

The original draft by the Group of 77<sup>(1)</sup> did not contain the paragraph listing co-operative activities among developing countries, and would have had the Assembly call on both the international community and the United Nations system to extend assistance.

Financing

Noting that financial requirements for energy investment would continue to grow at a fast rate, the Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, in its Nairobi Programme of Action adopted on 21 August 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> stated that implementation of the Programme would require additional and adequate resources. It cited a World Bank expert group study to the effect that the annual energy needs of developing countries would total about $54 billion during the period 1981-1985. Each country would continue to bear the main responsibility for developing its own resources, the Programme declared, but efforts should also be made to increase concessional flows for financing projects and programmes in developing countries. The financial requirements were of a very significant magnitude and were expected to grow as exploitation of new and renewable energy sources became more feasible economically and technically.

The Conference also stated that additional and adequate funds should be provided to the financial mechanisms and institutions of the United Nations system, and suggested that the World Bank and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) be invited to submit a joint estimate of the supporting actions and pre-investment requirements for new and renewable energy sources in the developing countries during the 1980s.

In order to generate additional funding and to encourage co-financing, the Conference further recommended that multilateral and bilateral donors and interested recipient countries consider convening consultative meetings to review and facilitate concerted action. Such meetings should deal particularly with financing the promotion of research, demonstration and development activities. Finally, the Conference urged interested parties to accelerate consideration of other avenues, including mechanisms under examination in the World Bank, such as an energy affiliate.

In its contribution to Conference preparations, the Ad Hoc Expert Group on Financing of New and Renewable Sources of Energy,<sup>(3)</sup> which met in December 1980, recommended that the task of developing the technologies for new and renewable energy sources be undertaken by the entire range of United Nations institutions, particularly the World Bank, UNDP and the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, as well as regional development banks and the proposed energy affiliate of the World Bank. It believed that the energy affiliate could make a major contribution through information dissemination, development of a cadre of trained personnel, delineation of projects and provision of project loans. Expansion of the United Nations Revolving Fund for Natural Resources Exploration to cover new and renewable energy resources might also be considered.

In February 1981,<sup>(4)</sup> the Synthesis Group (p. 695) cited an estimate by the World Bank that developing countries might need as much as $12 billion for investment in new and renewable energy sources other than large hydropower projects during the period 1981-1985. At the national level, financial incentives such as subsidies and tax rebates might help stimulate user and producer interest in new and renewable energy sources. Countries should endeavour to mobilize domestic investment resources and pursue innovative policies to finance small-scale schemes. At the international level, the Group suggested that: developed countries should increase their official development assistance and non-concessional flows for new and renewable energy sources; developing countries in balance-of-payments surplus should recognize this area as an important focus in their assistance efforts; socialist countries should pay more attention to needs of developing countries in this regard; and multilateral institutions should increase their support for these energy sources, in particular for rural energy needs.

Emphasizing the primary responsibility borne by each country for the development of its new and renewable energy sources, the General Assembly, in its 17 December resolution on the Conference,<sup>(5)</sup> requested that financial mechanisms of the United Nations system be provided with adequate funds to meet the growing requirements, and reaffirmed that additional resources should be directed through such channels as UNDP, the Fund for Natural Resources Exploration, the financial arrangements for science and technology, and the UNDP Energy Account. It urged financial institutions, particularly the World Bank, to provide additional and adequate resources, and also urged interested parties to accelerate consideration of other possible avenues to increase energy financing, such as a World Bank energy affiliate. It requested that the World Bank/UNDP study of supporting actions and pre-investment requirements for new and renewable energy sources in developing countries be submitted to the Interim Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy.

This text included three provisions not in the original draft resolution by the Group of 77:<sup>(1)</sup> a paragraph stating that each country continued to bear the main responsibility for developing its new and renewable energy resources; a phrase stating that developing countries in a position to do so should continue to assist other developing countries; and a paragraph calling for more effective response by financial institutions to requests from countries and international organizations. Further, a paragraph in the Group of 77 draft that would have had the Assembly request the executive heads of financial institutions of the United Nations system to mobilize additional and adequate funds was replaced by one requesting that those institutions should be provided with additional and adequate funds.

velopment and international economic cooperation, Afghanistan said it welcomed, despite their inadequacy, the initiatives undertaken by multilateral financial institutions to promote the development of energy resources in the developing countries. The German Democratic Republic believed new activities should be financed through existing United Nations funds, including voluntary assistance programmes, with transnational corporations and other capitalist firms drawing maximum profits from exploiting the natural resources of developing countries to be obliged to contribute additional funds. The Byelorussian SSR, Hungary and the Ukrainian SSR favoured the principle of voluntary contributions in respect of financial support for the Nairobi Programme of Action.

Austria, Canada, New Zealand, Norway (speaking for the Nordic States), the Philippines and Senegal supported the establishment of a World Bank energy affiliate. Austria remarked that it was not enough to offer incentives to private enterprise for the development of energy resources in developing countries; large amounts of capital and expertise would also have to be supplied. Canada added that it was prepared to provide funds for energy purposes, and Norway said the Nordic countries were ready to increase their support. Japan favoured the convening of regional consultative meetings to secure funding, and said it was ready to co-operate towards increasing self-help efforts for energy surveys and policy planning. The United States said it could not support the establishment of a World Bank energy affiliate or participate in it.

Guyana regretted that the Nairobi Conference had been unable to reach agreement on the establishment of an energy affiliate. Strongly urging the creation of such an affiliate, Zimbabwe considered it unfortunate that the World Bank's finding that developing countries would need at least $54 billion to develop new energy sources was not taken seriously by a country that had always regarded the Bank as a credible institution.

Kenya suggested that funds be mobilized through voluntary contributions by all United Nations Members, additional contributions representing a certain percentage of gross national product, release of some money earmarked for armaments, reallocation of funds within existing budgets of the United Nations system, increased contributions to financing bodies and granting of soft loans to energy-deficient developing countries. The Philippines, observing that substantial public and private resources would be required, said it would like to participate in consultations between donor and recipient countries.

The World Bank informed the Second Committee of its intention to increase its energy loans from slightly over $2 billion in fiscal year 1981 (through 30 June) to up to $3 billion in fiscal year 1982, giving more emphasis to new and renewable energy sources while continuing to pursue oil and gas exploration and development.

Sectoral uses of energy

Industrial and transport uses

CONFERENCE ACTION. The Nairobi Programme of Action (p. 689), adopted on 21 August 1981 by the Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy,<sup>(2)</sup> identified four priority areas for research and development in regard to urban and industrial energy: solar technologies for domestic and industrial use, including heat and power generation, solar passive architecture, solar refrigeration, air conditioning and water desalination; fuel production from biomass, and processing and use of urban and agro-industrial wastes for energy and other purposes; multipurpose development of hydro and geothermal energy, including drilling technologies; and energy efficiency, conservation and storage systems.

The Conference stated that, in order to help meet the growing industrial and urban energy demand and to diversify the energy supply base, efforts were needed to increase significantly the contribution of new and renewable energy sources. To that end, it was necessary to: expand the use of hydro and geothermal resources and transmission systems; initiate and encourage wider application of active and passive solar heating and cooling systems; promote the use of urban and industrial wastes for energy and other purposes; and accelerate the incorporation of cogeneration and total energy systems in the industrial sectors and implement other energy efficiency and conservation programmes.

Expressing the view that the potential of new and renewable energy resources in developing countries was greater than popularly believed, the Ad Hoc Expert Group on Industrial Issues including Utilization of Energy in Transportation and Allied Sectors (Vienna, Austria, 12-16 January) recommended<sup>(3)</sup> that international financial institutions provide highly concessional financial assistance and risk capital to developing countries for pioneer experimentation and commercialization of specific energy sources. It also suggested that an international task force be set up to examine the development and production of usable fuels and other industrial products using biotechnology, and that the United Nations system expand industrial information and technology services to small and medium-size enterprises in the field of new and renewable energy sources.

The Synthesis Group (p. 695), in February,<sup>(5)</sup> considered that in order to ease the pressure on conventional energy sources it might be necessary to review national industrialization strategies in terms of available energy supplies, including the potential contribution of new and renewable energy sources to industrial development. The Group also observed that, in addition to the development of new energy resources, conservation was an essential element in short- and long-term planning in all countries.

UNIDO ACTIVITIES. In 1981, energy-related activities of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) focused on the production of biofuels and synthetic fuels from petroleum, coal, natural gas and biomass; conservation; hydroelectric power plants; and industrial energy conservation, management and planning.

The number of energy-related technology projects assisted by UNIDO increased to over 50 during the year. In one of them, 84 policy makers in government and industry participated in a training programme in industrial energy management and planning. A symposium on project design and installation of small hydropower plants (Vienna, Austria, 29 June-3 July) provided an opportunity for the exchange of technical knowledge. A training workshop on energy conservation in the silicate industries, held in Czechoslovakia in October, offered training to specialists from least developed countries in the high-energy-consumption cement, ceramics and glass industries.

UNIDO initiated an energy-conservation project for the establishment of a pilot plant for ethanol production in Guatemala, and helped to develop mini hydroelectric generating plants in Costa Rica, Cuba and Uruguay. The first phase of a large-scale project for the development of biogas technology in China came to an end, as did a project which assisted India to establish a testing laboratory for the refinery industry. Assistance in regard to alternative energy sources and conservation was provided to the Comoros, Mali, the Niger, Seychelles and Turkey.

The UNIDO Executive Director reported to the Industrial Development Board in March<sup>(6)</sup> that the Special Advisory Group on Energy, located in his Office, had been strengthened, and that an Industrial Energy Engineering Unit had been established. Recognizing that energy-related industrial technology constituted a priority area for UNIDO, the Board, on 20 May, urged him to keep under continuing review the secretariat's organizational framework for handling energy-related matters and to take account of the results of the Nairobi Conference in planning future activities.<sup>(4)</sup>

In a 24 July resolution on industrial development co-operation,<sup>(7)</sup> the Economic and Social Council requested the Executive Director to submit specific action proposals in planning future activities in the energy-related technology sector, on the basis of agreements reached at the Nairobi Conference. The original draft, submitted by Venezuela on behalf of the Group of 77, would have had the Council ask for such proposals "to take account" of the Conference's results. The Federal Republic of Germany stated its understanding that any action under this paragraph would be financed exclusively from extrabudgetary resources.

When the General Assembly acted on the subject on 17 December,<sup>(8)</sup> it asked the Executive Director, at the request of developing countries, to increase technical co-operation and programmes and projects in energy-related industrial technology on the basis, inter alia, of agreements reached at the Conference. The text originally presented by Algeria on behalf of the Group of 77<sup>(1)</sup>—later withdrawn in favour of a draft based on informal consultations—contained no reference to requests from developing countries and did not include the word "industrial".

Energy use in rural areas and agriculture

The Nairobi Programme of Action for the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy<sup>(1)</sup> identified six priority areas for research and development in regard to rural energy: identification of fast-growing species for fuelwood production, reforestation and afforestation (p. 707); development of more efficient low-cost stoves and charcoal production processes; development of economical, ecologically sound and socially acceptable technologies for cooking, crop drying, pumping and agro-industries; improvement of equipment used in conjunction with draught animals (p. 710); evaluation and development of energy-generating processes based on manure and other organic materials; and development of technologies for harvesting, preserving and processing food, and using agricultural and forest residues for energy.

The Conference also suggested: widespread application of improved practices and technologies for conservation and more effective use of forest resources; establishment and acceleration of programmes for large-scale reforestation and afforestation, as well as for smaller-scale woodlots and plantations of energy crops; generalized rural application of locally available new and renewable energy sources; and expanded application of improved techniques for utilizing draught animal power.

In a separate action on 21 August 1981,<sup>(4)</sup> the Conference urged acceleration of afforestation and reforestation programmes for fuelwood, as well as programmes to develop and use such sources as biogas, wind, solar, hydro and geothermal energy and peat where they were economically viable, so as to reduce pressure on fuelwood supplies and improve the rural standard of living. This resolution was sponsored by Angola, China, Colombia, India, Kenya, Nepal, the Philippines, Rwanda, Sweden, Tunisia and Zimbabwe.

The principal recommendation of the Ad Hoc Expert Group on Rural Energy including Utilization of Energy in Agriculture (Nairobi, Kenya, 26-30 January)<sup>(2)</sup> was that Governments, the United Nations system, and other regional and international agencies should commit themselves to strengthening the position of rural people in their access to sufficient energy supplies, given the current competition for scarce supplies of useful energy. The Group recommended specific actions to: develop and sustain policies and programmes for the provision of adequate energy supplies for rural development; create or strengthen institutions for identification of rural energy development needs and design and execution of programmes; commit greater financial resources commensurate with the urgency and scale of the rural energy problem; expand research on rural energy needs, the local potential of energy sources, and technologies for converting and using them; intensify or organize the training of technical staff; strengthen the extension capability of rural energy systems and technologies; and raise rural people's awareness and stimulate their capability to utilize renewable energy sources.

The Synthesis Group (p. 695), meeting in February,<sup>(3)</sup> considered that agricultural development could take advantage of new energy sources for additional irrigation, crop-drying, fertilizer and other purposes, in conjunction with more effective use of such conventional renewables as draught animal power, fuelwood and biomass. The problem of inefficient production, conversion and use of fuelwood and biomass required immediate attention, including production of more efficient equipment.

Energy requirements for human settlements

On 24 July 1981, the Economic and Social Council requested the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements to initiate research and development, technical co-operation and information dissemination activities on energy for human settlements.<sup>(1)</sup> On 4 December, the General Assembly requested the Centre to implement those recommendations of the Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy that were within the Centre's mandate.<sup>(2)</sup>

Energy resources

Fuels

Fuelwood and charcoal

The Nairobi Programme of Action (p. 689), adopted on 21 August 1981 by the Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy,<sup>(1)</sup> noted that fuelwood, including charcoal, was an important energy source for large populations, especially in the rural areas of developing countries. It pointed to the importance of: assessment and evaluation of forest resources to estimate yields and identify deficit areas and reforestation needs; research and development on productive species, efficient stoves and cooking utensils, pre-processing of twigs and dry leaves for direct combustion, and fuelwood and charcoal substitutes using other new and renewable energy sources; and transfer, adaptation and application of technologies for forest management, reforestation and afforestation, large plantations, distribution and pricing policies, charcoal production and gasification, kilns and ovens.

In a resolution of 21 August on new and renewable energy sources for rural development (p. 706), the Conference urged the immediate acceleration of reforestation and afforestation programmes so as significantly to enhance the production and availability of fuelwood, and in seriously affected areas, as part of efforts to increase tree-planting fivefold by the year 2000.<sup>(4)</sup>

In its contribution to Conference preparations, the Technical Panel on Fuelwood and Charcoal, in a February report,<sup>(3)</sup> cited a study by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations showing that 100 million people were unable to obtain sufficient fuelwood for their minimum energy needs, that 1 billion others were affected by shortages, and that, by the year 2000, over 2.5 billion rural people would need other cooking fuels to replace charcoal. Urging prompt action by Governments and international organizations, the Panel said fuelwood production should be given a priority in national forest policies equal in importance to water and soil conservation or timber production.

The Synthesis Group (p. 695), in February,<sup>(2)</sup> concluded that it was essential to promote a more efficient production and use of fuelwood by intensifying the productivity of existing resources, creating new forest resources, pre-processing residues from logging operations for fuel use, organizing fuelwood distribution, and developing and introducing improved stoves. As a general rule in fuel-deficient areas, charcoal-making should be discouraged because it wasted wood; where fuel had to be transported over long distances, more efficient charcoal production methods such as the use of brick or portable steel kilns should be promoted.

Oil shales and sands

Bearing in mind the vast proven and prospective reserves of oil shale and tar sands and the technology available for exploiting them as energy sources, the Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, in its Nairobi Programme of Action,<sup>(1)</sup> recommended improved assessment by reviewing possible occurrences and standardizing evaluation and measurement procedures; expanded research and development on shale retorting, environmental consequences, and extraction and recovery methods; and initiation or support of national programmes for widespread use of existing technologies.

The Technical Panel on Oil Shale and Tar Sands, in a January 1981 report,<sup>(2)</sup> foresaw a possibility for these energy resources to play a significant role in four areas: large-scale synthetic crude oil production from oil shale; direct combustion of oil shale for electrical-power generators; small-scale liquid fuel production from oil shale for local consumption; and large-scale synthetic crude-oil production from tar sands. However, it identified limited knowledge of resources as a most serious constraint, particularly for developing countries, adding that, to reach production capability, processing technologies required substantial development time and field experimentation.

Establishment of the UNITAR/UNDP Information Centre on Heavy Crude and Tar Sands. In May 1981 the United Nations Institute for Training and Research (UNITAR) and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) established an Information Centre on Heavy Crude and Tar Sands. Based in New York, the Centre's aim was to promote the development of these resources by the systematic collection of information on exploration, production, upgrading, refining, transportation and other aspects. It was to be financed from subscription fees from participating Governments and organizations, including national and international petroleum companies, as well as other income from publications and seminars. An initial grant of $20,000 was earmarked from the UNDP Energy Account (p. 711). The Centre's Advisory Board met for the first time in August.

Peat

The Nairobi Conference, noting that small- and large-scale peat technology was well established, site-specific and offered a viable alternative to fuelwood for heat or power generation, suggested in its Programme of Action<sup>(2)</sup> that countries improve the data base on availability, support the selection of production areas, develop and improve technologies for production and processing, study alternative uses, promote research in the use of cutaway peat-lands for fuelwood and timber production, and promote measures to encourage industrial and domestic use, particularly to replace fuelwood and charcoal.

A report on the use of peat for energy,<sup>(1)</sup> prepared for the Conference by Finland and issued in March 1981, stated that at least 40 to 50 countries were known to have peat and that the total amount of fuel-peat resources world-wide was estimated at 100 billion tons of oil equivalent, close to half the known global natural gas resources. It was recommended that developing countries with unexploited peat resources seriously consider peat as an energy alternative and that the United Nations system include peat energy in its development and lending programmes.

A United Nations Workshop and Study Tour on the Energy Use of Peat (Helsinki, Finland, 8-12 June),<sup>(3)</sup> organized in co-operation with Finland as a contribution to the Nairobi Conference, concluded that peat technology was well established, mature, commercialized and readily available but needed to be adapted to local conditions, and that bilateral and multilateral technical and financial co-operation would have to be intensified to effect the energy use of peat in developing countries.

Non-conventional energy sources

Biomass energy

The crucial role that could be played by recycling organic matter was cited by the Nairobi Programme of Action for the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy<sup>(1)</sup> in its recommendations on biomass energy-produced by the conversion of agricultural and forest residues, standing vegetation, energy crops, municipal and industrial solid wastes, and sewage sludge.

In its Programme, the Nairobi Conference suggested that biomass resources be assessed and evaluated, with special attention to the identification and development of plants for energy conversion, and that basic and applied research and development be carried out on biotechnology and bio/thermochemical conversion systems and on the use of by-products as fertilizers and animal feed. Demonstration schemes should be devised for such processes as biomethanation of manures, agricultural residues and other organic materials; integration of biomethanation and ethanol production; small-scale gasifiers and stationary engines; electricity production; and gasification and indirect liquefaction to produce synthetic liquid fuels. Existing technologies should be employed to promote direct combustion, gasification, biomethanation of manure and municipal and industrial waste, alcohol production from sugars and starches, anaerobic microbiological processes and fuel production from vegetable oils.

The Technical Panel on Biomass Energy, in a January 1981 report,<sup>(3)</sup> observed that biomass provided between 6 and 13 per cent of the world's total energy needs, equivalent to about 8.5 million barrels of oil per day. As the major source of energy in rural areas of developing countries, it was easily adaptable with minimum social constraints and also environmentally acceptable. Its wider use could result in a cleaner environment, with only minimal ecological imbalance, and provide means to recycle nutrients and atmospheric carbon dioxide.

The Ad Hoc Expert Group on Research and Development and Transfer of Technology recommended in a February report<sup>(2)</sup> that an internationally funded and co-ordinated research programme on biomass energy be established and a task force assembled to assess scientific and technological capabilities and diagnose requirements, and draw up regional priority programmes.

Geothermal energy

In the Nairobi Programme of Action,<sup>(2)</sup> the Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy recognized that substantial effort was needed to develop the energy potential of unevaluated geothermal resources. It recommended that resources be identified and evaluated through the use of geological, geochemical and geophysical techniques, using oil and gas exploration data where appropriate. It suggested that research and development be carried out on drilling technology, stimulation techniques, geopressurized systems, chemical recovery and effluent disposal, and environmental impacts. To promote geothermal applications, it recommended support and encouragement for initial stages of exploration, integrated heat and power projects, and small-scale uses, especially for small or remote resource sites.

The Technical Panel on Geothermal Energy, reporting in December 1980,<sup>(3)</sup> noted that bathing was one of the major uses of this energy source, but that it could also be used in agriculture for drying and in industry for heating purposes. It recommended establishment of training centres in major regions where there were none, and of an international documentation centre on geothermal energy linked to national and other data banks. In addition, energy-importing countries should accord special status to geothermal energy, offering incentives to outside investors in the form of loans at preferential rates, exploration insurance, equipment priorities or special tax treatment.

On 23 June, the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), following its examination of the work of the United Nations Revolving Fund for Natural Resources Exploration (p. 674), decided to review in 1982 the possible expansion of the Fund's activities to include geothermal energy, and requested the UNDP Administrator to report at that time on the nature and scope of requests for assistance in that field and the Fund's capacity to respond.<sup>(1)</sup>

Marine energy resources

Addressing the use of ocean energy resources such as thermal sea power and tidal energy for the generation of electric power, the Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, in its Nairobi Programme of Action,<sup>(1)</sup> recommended that likely sites be identified and that research and development be carried out in such areas as aquaculture for the production of electricity, fresh water and energy-intensive products, and ocean wave systems including technical solutions suited for the trade wind belts.

The Technical Panel on Ocean Energy, in a January 1981 report,<sup>(2)</sup> focused on ocean thermal energy conversion as the most significant aspect of this subject. It noted that cost estimates showed early promise for this source as an economical replacement for oil in electricity generation. The technology was not dependent on any new scientific advance; it could be designed in a wide range of sizes appropriate to multiple applications, and large accessible resources were available in the equatorial belt. The Panel placed secondary emphasis on tidal energy, which it found to be a proven system but usable at only a limited number of sites. It considered wave energy not of immediate applicability. The Panel suggested that a thermal energy demonstration project be initiated in a developing country and that a development fund be established to support increased international awareness of this energy source, along with an information, education and training programme.

Solar energy

Bearing in mind that solar energy technologies were rapidly evolving and that some were on the threshold of large-scale and extensive application, the Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, in its Nairobi Programme of Action,<sup>(1)</sup> recommended: that the resource be evaluated through the use of existing data, supplemented by support for meteorological surveys, radiation and other data collection; development and application of methodologies to estimate radiation data; preparation of guidelines for assessment in various climatic zones; and preparation of national solar resources maps and data to be incorporated in a world solar atlas. The Conference also recommended research, development and demonstration of promising applications, such as solar cooking, electricity production, industrial process heat, synthetic fuel production and crop drying. Finally, it suggested study of such problems as right of access to sunlight, transfer of development rights, building codes and warranties, and insurance of solar devices.

The Technical Panel on Solar Energy, in a report of February 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> concluded that this resource was so plentiful that, when used with existing technologies, it could make a significant contribution towards meeting global energy requirements and held the promise of being one of the few clean and reliable energy sources available. Because of daily and seasonal variations in atmospheric conditions, some applications might require energy storage and stand-by systems, though others, such as water-pumping, might not.

Wind power

In the Nairobi Programme of Action,<sup>(1)</sup> the Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy noted that wind energy had been one of the few forms of renewable energy which had traditionally been practical and cost effective, and that its wider use, based on technological advance and changes in energy structures, could make an important contribution to meeting future energy needs. The Conference suggested increased collection, by standardized procedures, of wind data for all climatic conditions, and encouraged preparation of national wind power resource maps and data to be incorporated in a world wind atlas, including data on the occurrence of extreme wind speeds. It also recommended research, development and demonstration on wind machines for water pumps and large wind turbines and arrays, wind characteristics for siting, windmill design and operation, rotor design, materials, storage systems, environmental impact, safety standards and social acceptability.

The Technical Panel on Wind Energy, reporting in December 1980,<sup>(2)</sup> said that small- and medium-sized wind-powered electric generation systems were expected to be economically viable on a significant scale within five years, and that supplying electric power from land-based wind turbines into power networks could become commercially viable in 5 to 10 years' time. It recommended that countries having wind-energy prospects undertake a preliminary wind-resource inventory, establish a national focal point within a government department, create national centres for wind-energy technology and include wind-powered pumps in rural development programmes as appropriate.

Other energy sources

Hydroelectric power

Mindful of the immense and unused hydro potential, and the availability and widespread use of hydrotechnology for multipurpose water resources exploitation, the Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, in its Nairobi Programme of Action,<sup>(1)</sup> called for the evaluation of river hydro potential and the establishment of criteria for the evaluation and integration of hydro resources within overall energy development. Also recommended was support for government research and development capacities, and intensified research into ecological consequences. Further, the Conference suggested standardizing design and performance specifications for equipment and facilities, accelerating the widespread utilization of small hydropower systems, identifying projects in developing countries for the production of equipment, supporting the design and production of equipment and civil engineering survey and design procedures, and supporting the collaborative efforts of developing countries in large-scale joint projects.

The Technical Panel on Hydropower, in a January 1981 report,<sup>(2)</sup> pointed out that only a small portion of the economic potential of hydropower resources was being utilized. The technology was well developed, considerable experience had been gained in its use and much of the equipment was highly efficient. Among the restraints on its use in developing countries were lack of physical and economic data, skilled personnel, financing, and legal standards to govern the joint construction and operation of hydropower installations on international rivers.

Draught animals

In view of the fact that draught animal power remained a major source of energy, particularly in rural areas of some developing countries, the Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, in its Nairobi Programme of Action,<sup>(1)</sup> recommended that basic data be collected on distribution of species, breeds, draught capabilities, agricultural implements, harnessing devices and existing technologies. It suggested research and development aimed at enhancing the productivity of draught animals and improving animal management and support of draught animal programmes in developing countries.

The Ad Hoc Working Group on Draught Animal Power, which met in February 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> observed that many countries would continue to depend on draught animal power for a long time. Four hundred million draught animals in the developing countries, valued at $100 billion, made available 150 million horsepower, which might cost $250 billion to replace. The Group proposed that the United Nations arrange for the initiation and co-ordination of projects, and recommended the establishment of five regional centres, two each in Asia and Africa and one in Latin America, to serve those regions through research, technology transfer, information dissemination, and education and training.

Energy reserves, supply and demand

An Ad Hoc Group of Energy and Petroleum Experts, convened in New York from 14 to 18 December 1981 by the United Nations Secretariat, examined the implications of prospective energy supply/demand balances during the 1980s.

According to the Group's report,<sup>(1)</sup> it was emphasized in the discussion that energy was not scarce in physical terms, that heavy dependence on petroleum would persist, and that there were serious doubts about the capacity of alternative energy sources and conservation substantially to replace conventional energy sources within the next generation. Efforts should be made to assist oil-deficient developing countries towards greater self-sufficiency in meeting their oil and energy requirements. Among other suggestions emerging from the meeting were the launching of a programme of international co-operation for energy conservation, the establishment of an energy information centre, and the undertaking of an analysis of the comparative economics of nuclear energy.

UNDP Energy Account

During 1981, the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) helped underwrite some 386 energy projects at a cost of over $127 million, together with nearly $180 million worth of related forestry activities. Thirteen projects were approved during the year under the UNDP Energy Account, established in accordance with a decision by the UNDP Governing Council in June 1980.<sup>(4)</sup> The largest of these involved a series of energy assessment missions to developing countries, in co-operation with the World Bank. Another was a grant to the Information Centre on Heavy Crude and Tar Sands, a joint project of UNDP and the United Nations Institute for Training and Research (p. 708).<sup>(3)</sup>

The Energy Account received contributions in 1981 totalling $2,843,887, from the Netherlands ($1,923,077) and Sweden ($920,810). Finland made a $465,116 pledge for 1982. Expenditures from the Account in 1981 amounted to $927,702, all spent on project costs.

After receiving a progress report from the UNDP Administrator issued in March 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> the Governing Council, on 23 June,<sup>(1)</sup> expressed satisfaction with the progress made in assisting Governments in priority energy projects. It authorized him in principle to accept the administration and management of any new funding mechanism for energy-related activities, if so requested by the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and endorsed by the General Assembly.

Nuclear energy

Annual report of IAEA

The report of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) covering its activities in 1980<sup>(1)</sup> was presented to the General Assembly on 10 November 1981 by its Director-General, Sigvard Eklund.

Describing the work of IAEA in 1980<sup>(4)</sup> and the first part of 1981, the Director-General stated that the Agency's technical co-operation activities were anticipated nearly to double in scope from 1980 ($10.5 million) to 1983 ($19 million). More than 95 per cent of all nuclear material outside the nuclear-weapon States was under IAEA safeguards, and the Agency had concluded, on the basis of a detailed statistical analysis and evaluation of the past five years that the safeguarded material remained in peaceful nuclear activities or had been otherwise adequately accounted for. Nevertheless, it encountered verification difficulties in a few cases of on-load nuclear power reactors, and discussions were under way with the States involved.

He expressed concern over those significant nuclear activities not subject to IAEA safeguards that were conducted by States not party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (NPT).<sup>(2)</sup> International efforts to limit nuclear proliferation beyond the five nuclear-weapon Powers had been successful to date, but co-operation on all sides remained indispensable for overcoming any proliferation problems that might arise and for the efficient conduct of the IAEA task of ensuring that nuclear materials were not diverted from peaceful purposes.

Stressing the dangerous consequences of attacks on civilian nuclear research reactors, the Director-General suggested that one preventive measure might be to enlarge the scope of the 1977 Additional Protocol to the 1949 Geneva Convention, which prohibited military attacks against nuclear power plants but did not cover research reactors.

On 11 November; the General Assembly, in a resolution on the IAEA report,<sup>(3)</sup> commended the Agency for its continuing efforts to ensure safe and secure use of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes, urged States to support those efforts and noted with satisfaction the steady improvement of the IAEA safeguards system (p. 69). The Assembly also noted with satisfaction various IAEA activities on technical assistance, nuclear power and nuclear science and technology, supply of nuclear materials, and plutonium storage and spent fuel management, as well as the Agency's readiness to contribute to the 1983 United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy (p. 714). The Assembly also called on States to refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, including an armed attack on nuclear installations. It paid tribute to the departing Director-General and extended good wishes to his successor, Hans Blix.

The original text was sponsored by Czechoslovakia, Indonesia and Japan. It was adopted with two amendments by Iraq. The first, adding a preambular paragraph characterizing the June Israeli air attack on Iraqi nuclear installations (p. 279) as a serious threat to IAEA safeguards and to the development of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes, was adopted by 119 votes to 2, with 10 abstentions. The second amendment, adding an operative paragraph calling on States to refrain from the use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, including an armed attack on its nuclear installations, was adopted by 129 votes to none, with 2 abstentions. The Assembly then adopted the amended text by a vote, requested by the United States, of 128 to 1, with 4 abstentions. At the request of Iraq, all three votes were recorded.

Introducing its amendments, Iraq said that a resolution aspiring to strengthen the effectiveness of IAEA could not ignore a serious act that undermined the objectives of the resolution.

Voting against the text as a whole, Israel described the Iraqi amendments as discriminatory, arbitrary and totally incompatible with the resolution.

Explaining their favourable votes for the amendments as well as the final text, Argentina, Australia, Bolivia, Canada, Finland and the United Kingdom, the last speaking on behalf of European Community (EC) members, expressed regret that the consensus which the resolution on IAEA traditionally enjoyed had been broken by the introduction of a politicizing element, superfluous in an essentially technical resolution. Sharing that view, the United States abstained on the text as a whole while opposing the preambular paragraph referring to the attack and voting for the other amendment, which it described as superfluous but unobjectionable. Argentina also objected to the text's specific reference to a United Nations Member State, as well as its mention of NPT and what Argentina regarded as an incorrect proportion between IAEA technical assistance and safeguards activities.

India, which voted affirmatively in all votes, recalled its condemnation of the Israeli attack.

Brazil, voting in favour, expressed reservations on the preambular paragraph mentioning NPT, which it understood as applicable only to the parties to that Treaty; it also stated its understanding that operative paragraph 2 (a) on IAEA technical assistance, endorsed a September resolution of the IAEA General Conference urging financial support for such assistance to developing countries.

In the Assembly debate, many speakers stressed the parallel importance of the peaceful uses of nuclear energy and the maintenance of the regime of non-proliferation of nuclear weapons, and several expressed strong support for the Agency's safeguards operation and its improvement. Bulgaria and Canada were among those which endorsed efforts by IAEA to improve the effectiveness of its control machinery. Finland and Hungary expressed concern over the continued existence of unsafeguarded facilities in a number of countries. Yugoslavia, supporting the Agency's effort, asserted that the safeguards system would be widely accepted only if it was non-discriminatory and internationally agreed upon.

Australia said it was entering the international uranium market as a major supplier but sales to non-nuclear-weapon States would be limited to parties to NPT which complied with IAEA requirements. Czechoslovakia and the USSR, among others, stressed the need to strengthen non-proliferation by increasing the number of parties to NPT. Egypt noted that it had ratified the Treaty in February and had concluded a safeguards agreement with IAEA in June. The United Kingdom, speaking for EC members, hoped the non-nuclear States that had not signed safeguards agreements with IAEA would do so, as it would be of paramount importance to the continued expansion of nuclear trade and development of nuclear power that the Agency continue to be able to affirm that no diversion had taken place from a safeguarded facility.

The inalienable right of every State to peaceful uses of nuclear energy under effective and non-discriminatory non-proliferation arrangements was upheld by the German Democratic Republic, Pakistan, Romania, the United Kingdom (on behalf of EC members) and Yugoslavia. Some of these added that the concern for non-proliferation should not militate against that right.

Some speakers were dissatisfied with the current balance between the regulatory and promotional activities of IAEA. India stated that there was an imbalance in expenditures, that the guidelines for promotional activities were discriminatory and that the Agency must not be used to further the nuclear objectives of a group of countries. Mexico said IAEA had been politicized by attempts to limit its role to the application of increasing restraints under the banner of nuclear non-proliferation, whereas the developing countries wanted to see it carry out fully its function of fostering the contribution of nuclear energy to peace and prosperity. Yugoslavia also saw an imbalance in this regard. Turkey viewed the two activities as equally important, observing that energy scarcities and the needs of a growing world population would have a disruptive effect on the international order and create serious dangers for every State.

Egypt and Yugoslavia hoped to see the technical assistance programme included in the Agency's regular budget, while the EC members, the German Democratic Republic and Poland regarded voluntary contributions as the appropriate means for this purpose.

Some developing countries, including the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Yugoslavia, called for a geographical representation on the Board of Governors and in the IAEA secretariat that more equitably represented the developing countries.

Japan, introducing the resolution adopted by the Assembly, noted that the reference to the Committee on Assurances of Supply established by the Board of Governors in June 1980 to advise on ways in which the provision of nuclear material, equipment and technology could be assured on a more predictable basis<sup>(4)</sup>—was a new element. The Committee's work was welcomed by Australia, the EC members, Pakistan, Sweden, the USSR and the United States. In the view of the German Democratic Republic, any recommendation by the Committee must be seen in the light of the non-proliferation régime. India said any multilateral solution for supply assurances should take into account existing bilateral rights and obligations. Romania asserted that the Committee's activities should be based on the principle of non-discriminatory access to all peaceful applications of nuclear science and technology. The United States said it was committed to the re-establishment of its role as a dependable supplier of nuclear items under non-proliferation safeguards.

Austria mentioned its suggestion that IAEA set up a technical working group to discuss safety criteria for nuclear power stations near international frontiers and to elaborate minimum standards which could be applied in negotiations between neighbouring States. Sweden considered that an IAEA research centre could contribute to the development of new alternative energy technology.

Pakistan objected to what it called an orchestrated propaganda campaign against its peaceful nuclear programme and declared that it was discussing with IAEA the Agency's proposals to augment surveillance equipment at the Karachi nuclear power plant.

Report of the International Atomic Energy Agency

The General Assembly,

Having received the report of the International Atomic Energy Agency to the General Assembly for the year 1980,

Taking note of the statement by the Director-General of the International Atomic Energy Agency of 10 November 1981, which provides additional information on developments in the Agency's activities during 1981,

Conscious of the urgent need to develop all sources of energy, with a view to helping both developing and industrialized countries to mitigate the effects of the energy crisis, and bearing in mind the fact that nuclear energy remains the main readily available alternative to fossil fuel for the generation of large amounts of electric power,

Recognizing the importance of enhancing the role of the International Atomic Energy Agency in the promotion of the application of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes,

Considering that the International Atomic Energy Agency will be called upon to play an increasingly important role in making the benefits of nuclear energy available to all nations, in particular the developing countries,

Conscious of the continuing need to protect mankind from the perils resulting from the misuse of nuclear energy and noting with appreciation in this connection the work of the International Atomic Energy Agency in the implementation of the relevant provisions of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and other international treaties, conventions and agreements designed to achieve similar objectives.

Noting the excellent safety record of nuclear power generation, but aware of the need to pay continuing attention to the questions of nuclear safety and waste management,

Bearing in mind the special needs of developing countries for technical assistance by the International Atomic Energy Agency in order to benefit effectively from the application of nuclear technology for peaceful purposes as well as from the contribution of nuclear energy to their economic development, and the need to assure a satisfactory and effective source of financing to implement adequate and effective technical assistance programmes,

Considering that the premeditated Israeli air attack on Iraqi nuclear installations on 7 June 1981 constitutes a serious threat to the entire International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards and to the development of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes,

Conscious of the importance of developing ways and means in which supplies of nuclear material, equipment and technology and fuel cycle services could be assured on a more predictable and long-term basis, in accordance with mutually acceptable considerations of non-proliferation, and of the importance of the role and responsibilities of the International Atomic Energy Agency in that regard,

Noting that the present Director-General of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Dr. Sigvard Eklund, will retire on 30 November 1981 after twenty years of service as Director-General and that the General Conference of the Agency has decided to confer upon him the title of Director-General Emeritus of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Noting further that the General Conference of the International Atomic Energy Agency approved the appointment by the Board of Governors of the Agency of Dr. Hans Blix as Dr. Eklund's successor,

1. Takes note of the report of the International Atomic Energy Agency;

2. Notes with satisfaction that:

(a) The International Atomic Energy Agency is continuously making efforts to strengthen its activities in the field of technical assistance to the developing countries;

(b) Assistance provided by the International Atomic Energy Agency is playing a significant role in the introduction of nuclear power for peaceful purposes as well as in the application of nuclear science and technology, particularly in the fields of agriculture, medicine and industry in the developing countries;

(c) The International Atomic Energy Agency is considering appropriate measures for funding technical assistance through predictable and assured resources and for enabling progress in technical assistance to keep pace with progress in other main activities of the Agency;

3. Commends the International Atomic Energy Agency for its continuing efforts to ensure the safe and secure use of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes throughout the world, notes with satisfaction the steady improvement of the Agency's safeguards system and welcomes the conclusion that in 1980, as in previous years, nuclear material under Agency safeguards remained in peaceful nuclear activities or was otherwise adequately accounted for;

4. Notes with appreciation the steps taken by the International Atomic Energy Agency to expand and strengthen its programmes in nuclear safety and enhance its ability to deal with emergencies;

5. Urges all States to continue to support the endeavours of the International Atomic Energy Agency, pursuant to its statute, in furthering the peaceful uses of nuclear power, improving the effectiveness of safeguards and promoting nuclear safety;

6. Urges all States that have not already done so to ratify the Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material, which was opened for signature on 3 March 1980;

7. Calls upon all States to respect fully their obligations under the Charter of the United Nations and to refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, including in particular any armed attack on its nuclear installations;

8. Notes with satisfaction that:

(a) Substantive work has commenced in the Committee on Assurances of Supply, established by the Board of Governors of the International Atomic Energy Agency in June 1980, and expresses the hope that progress in the work of the Committee will greatly contribute to the success of the United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Cooperation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy, to be held in 1983;

(b) The International Atomic Energy Agency will convene a conference on nuclear power experience at Vienna in September 1982, which could also provide a useful technical input to the United Nations Conference;

(c) The International Atomic Energy Agency is prepared, in response to paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 35/112 of 5 December 1980, to fulfil its appropriate role within the scope of its responsibilities at all stages of preparation of the United Nations Conference, and during the Conference itself, by contributing to the discussion of relevant issues, by providing technical data and documentation as needed, particularly in relation to the progress of the work of the Committee on Assurances of Supply, and by participating in the secretariat of the Conference;

(d) There is continuing progress in the studies by the International Atomic Energy Agency aimed at establishing a system of international storage of plutonium and the international management of spent fuel;

9. Notes that the matter referred to in paragraph 8 of General Assembly resolution 35/17 of 6 November 1980 was considered by the General Conference of the International Atomic Energy Agency at its twenty-fifth regular session and expresses the hope that it will be brought to an early conclusion;

10. Pays tribute to Dr. Sigvard Eklund for his distinguished service in guiding and directing the successful evaluation of the International Atomic Energy Agency during the past twenty years and for the outstanding contribution he has made to the promotion of the peaceful uses of nuclear energy and the cause of peace;

11. Extends its congratulations and good wishes to Dr. Hans Blix who has been appointed to succeed Dr. Sigvard Eklund;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit to the Director-General of the International Atomic Energy Agency the records of the thirty-sixth session of the General Assembly relating to the Agency's activities.

Preparations for the Conference on nuclear energy

On 9 December 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> the General Assembly, without vote, endorsed recommendations made by the Preparatory Committee for the United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy,<sup>(1)</sup> including the recommendation that the Conference take place at Geneva from 29 August to 9 September 1983.

Meeting at Vienna, Austria, from 3 to 7 August 1981, the Preparatory Committee also recommended that a small Conference secretariat be established, that IAEA play an active role in all phases of preparation, and that the Secretariat prepare draft rules of procedure of the Conference for the Committee's consideration. It also decided to hold one or two sessions in 1982 and a final one in 1983.

In addition to endorsing these recommendations, the Assembly stated that the outcome of the Conference should be embodied in appropriate documents on ways of promoting international co-operation in the peaceful uses of nuclear energy, and that the Committee might have to extend its next session and hold a further one in 1982 in order to advance its work, including preparation of those documents. The Assembly urged Governments to provide information on their achievements and experiences in this field, invited IAEA to provide technical data and documents and to participate in the Conference secretariat, and invited other United Nations organizations to make documents available. It requested the Assembly President to finalize the appointment of Committee members.

The resolution was sponsored by 26 States and was adopted as revised by them following consultations. Introducing the original draft, Yugoslavia suggested that the Conference agenda should cover the development and use of nuclear energy for economic and social advancement, particularly in developing countries, and that the Committee should prepare a declaration and a programme of action for adoption at the Conference.

Explaining the position of the EC members, the United Kingdom said the final text of the resolution, unlike the original version, made it clear that the Preparatory Committee was to take all decisions on Conference preparations. Those countries and Finland added that maintenance of the consensus principle was fundamental to the success of the Conference.

The EC countries, Finland and the United States welcomed the references in the resolution to the IAEA Committee on Assurances of Supply (p. 713), to whose work they attached particular importance. Canada interpreted references in the preamble to nuclear energy needs as pertaining only to peaceful and non-explosive uses of nuclear energy. Referring to the mention in the text of a 1977 Assembly resolution on the peaceful use of nuclear energy for economic and social development,<sup>(2)</sup> the United States recalled its view at the time that it would have preferred a resolution which acknowledged more fully the dangers of nuclear proliferation accompanying the spread of nuclear technology.

In the debate, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Pakistan and the USSR believed the Conference should contribute to a wider use of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes on the basis of strengthening the non-proliferation regime and effective safeguards. India opposed attempts to list divergent suggestions and topics with varying emphasis on individual subjects. Romania believed the central goal of the Conference should be to mobilize the will of States to use nuclear energy as a basic constituent of programmes for economic and social progress. Australia and Canada expressed the view that the work of the Committee on Assurances of Supply could make an important contribution to the Conference.

In regard to the membership of the Preparatory Committee, Yugoslavia, Chairman of the 70-member body, noted that only 54 States had been nominated and expressed hope that the full membership would be appointed by its next session.

United Nations Conference for the Promotion of international Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 33/4 of 2 November 1978, 34/63 of 29 November 1979 and 35/112 of 5 December 1980, in which it decided to convene in 1983 the United Nations Conference for the Promotion of international Co-operation In the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy.

Reaffirming the principles and provisions of its resolution 32/50 of 8 December 1977 on the peaceful use of nuclear energy for economic and social development,

Stressing, in particular, the relevance of the principles set forth in paragraph 1 of resolution 32/50 for the preparation of the Conference and for the Conference itself,

Recalling a/s/o the relevant paragraphs of the Final Document of the Tenth Special Session of the General Assembly, the first special session devoted to disarmament,

Recalling further the role of the international Atomic Energy Agency set out in General Assembly resolution 34/63, Recognizing the increasing significance of the peaceful uses of nuclear energy for economic and social development.

In particular its important role in accelerating the development of the developing countries.

Reaffirming the responsibility of States that are advanced in the nuclear field to promote the legitimate nuclear energy needs of the developing countries by participating in the fullest possible transfer of nuclear equipment, materials and technology under agreed and appropriate international safeguards applied through the International Atomic Energy Agency on a non-discriminatory basis in order to prevent effectively the proliferation of nuclear weapons.

Expressing its conviction that the Conference, through the promotion of international co-operation in the peaceful uses of nuclear energy, should contribute greatly to meeting the increasing energy and other requirements of many countries, particularly developing ones.

Further expressing its conviction that progress in the work of the Committee on Assurances of Supply, established by the Board of Governors of the International Atomic Energy Agency in June 1980, will greatly contribute to the success of the Conference,

Stressing the need for timely and adequate preparations for the Conference,

Having considered the report of the Preparatory Committee for the Conference,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the report of the Preparatory Committee for the United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy;

2. Endorses the recommendations of the Preparatory Committee contained in the annex to its report;

3. Decides that the Conference shall be held at Geneva from 29 August to 9 September 1983;

4. Considers that the outcome of the Conference should be embodied in appropriate documents, in a suitable format, pertaining, inter alia, to ways and means of promoting international co-operation in the peaceful uses of nuclear energy;

5. Recognizes that the Preparatory Committee, in order to advance its work, including as appropriate the preparation of the documents referred to in paragraph 4 above for submission to and approval by the Conference, may need to extend the duration of its second session, to be held at Vienna in 1982, and also to hold a further session of appropriate duration in 1982;

6. Reaffirms its decision, as embodied in paragraph 2 of General Assembly resolution 35/112, to take account of the results of the work of the Committee on Assurances of Supply;

7. Requests the President of the General Assembly to finalize the appointment of the members of the Preparatory Committee, in accordance with the principle of equitable geographical representation, not later than 30 April 1982;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to make the necessary arrangements for the establishment, at the appropriate time, of a small secretariat for the Conference, to be headed by a Secretary-General of the Conference;

9. Urges all States to contribute to the successful preparation of the Conference by, inter alia, making available, in conformity with international obligations, information on their scientific and technological achievements and practical experiences in the field of peaceful uses of nuclear energy;

10. Calls upon all States which have not yet done so to communicate to the Secretary-General, not later than 30 April 1982, their views on the matters relevant to the preparation and organization of the Conference;

11. Invites the International Atomic Energy Agency to fulfil its appropriate role within the scope of its responsibilities at all stages of preparation of the Conference, and during the Conference itself, by contributing to the discussion of relevant issues, by providing technical data and documentation as needed, particularly in relation to the progress of the work of the Committee on Assurances of Supply, and by participating in the secretariat of the Conference;

12. Further invites specialized agencies and other relevant organizations of the United Nations system to contribute effectively to the preparations for the Conference by, inter alia, making available studies, reports and other appropriate documents concerning the applications of the peaceful uses of nuclear energy, as well as the results and future prospects of such applications;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Preparatory Committee all the communications received from Member States and to assist the Committee by providing it with all necessary facilities for its work;

14. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-seventh session an item entitled "Preparation of the United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy: report of the Preparatory Committee for the United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy".

Chapter XI

Food

The deteriorating world food situation, particularly in low-income developing countries where increasing numbers of people continued to suffer from chronic hunger and malnutrition, was scrutinized by several organs of the United Nations system throughout 1981, with both the World Food Council (WFC) and the World Food Programme (WFP) taking steps to try to resolve food problems.

Disturbed about growing hunger, unsatisfactory progress in food and agriculture, inadequate investment and aid levels, and an increasingly difficult economic climate, WFC proposed national and international measures encompassing financial and technical support for action to expand agricultural production and food storage and distribution facilities in food-deficit countries, reduction of trade barriers for agricultural products, co-operation among developing countries and increased food aid. WFC took these actions at its seventh ministerial session, held at Novi Sad, Yugoslavia, from 25 to 29 May.<sup>(2)</sup>

Resolutions in support of the measures proposed by WFC, calling for urgent action on the world food situation by the international community, were adopted by the Economic and Social Council in July<sup>(4)</sup> and the General Assembly in December.<sup>(6)</sup>

assistance and emergency operations reaching $579 million and some 1.5 million metric tons of food being shipped for the world's needy.<sup>(1)</sup>

On the recommendation of the Committee on Food Aid Policies and Programmes (CFA), the governing body of WFP, the General Assembly, in December, set a target of $1.2 billion for pledges to the Programme for the 1983-1984 biennium.<sup>(7)</sup> The Economic and Social Council, in November, adopted a CFA proposal urging that preparations be made to announce pledges.<sup>(5)</sup>

Pledges towards the $1 billion target for 1981-1982 amounted to $771 million by the end of 1981. CFA pointed out that, unless new donors contributed, the minimum aid target might not be met.

World Food Day, 16 October, was observed for the first time in 1981 to call public attention to global food and agricultural problems. The observance, initiated by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), was endorsed in July by the Economic and Social Council.<sup>(3)</sup>

During the year, the United Nations mounted special efforts to aid African countries where over the past two decades the food and agriculture situation had worsened drastically (p. 624). Assistance to meet the nutritional needs of children and mothers was provided by the United Nations Children's Fund, with expenditures reaching $14 million (p. 1005).

Food problems

WFC ACTION. The seventh ministerial session of the World Food Council was held at Novi Sad, Yugoslavia, from 25 to 29 May 1981, preceded by a preparatory meeting at Rome, Italy, from 21 to 24 April. It reviewed world food prospects and adopted conclusions and recommendations on specific priorities and comprehensive measures to improve the world food situation.<sup>(5)</sup>

Despite increased production and improved distribution in some countries, WFC noted, millions in developing countries faced an extremely precarious food situation. Although advances had been made, such as the inclusion of cereal import financing in the facilities of the International Monetary Fund (p. 1447), fully adequate world food security measures were still to be adopted. Global cereal production had fallen since 1978/1979 and world grain stocks, as a proportion of consumption, were at their lowest level since 1975/1976. Moreover, the economic environment had become increasingly difficult, with mounting costs for energy, fertilizer and other essential agricultural inputs, accompanied by high interest rates, seriously hampering efforts to accelerate food production. In low-income countries, the number of chronically hungry and malnourished was steadily increasing, and in most of Africa, as nutritional standards continued to deteriorate, the situation had assumed major crisis proportions.

Calling for redoubled efforts to eliminate hunger, WFC saw hope in the widespread awareness of the magnitude of the problem and the growing determination of Governments to address it effectively. It welcomed the increased recognition of the need for food strategies and urged that efforts in that direction be stepped up and receive sustained international support.

Observing that within national food strategies there were areas in which relatively low investment could yield large and often short-term returns, WFC called on development assistance agencies to increase their support to developing country research and extension services, and to renew their efforts in such areas as incentives to producers, improvements in transport and storage infrastructure, provision of technological packages, and rational energy use and alternative sources which avoided negative environmental effects. Pointing out that the lack of adequately trained local personnel could impede implementation of food strategies, it urged increased training of national staff and encouragement to agricultural specialists to remain in or return to developing countries.

Substantial new investment in infrastructure - particularly land and water resources - was essential to meet food targets, WFC said. It therefore urged that major projects be completed by the decade's end. It also pointed to the need to link production and consumption, stating that national food plans should take mainly into account peasants and small farmers, particularly the needs of women producers, and be geared to creating employment, possibly by co-operative production and direct consumption intervention.

It noted the increasing importance of economic and technical co-operation among developing countries, and urged international support for such efforts in food and agriculture.

Noting that those countries needed increased export earnings to finance economic development, food and agricultural inputs, WFC called for reduced trade barriers, especially those affecting agricultural trade. It urged industrialized countries to adopt or extend the generalized system of preferences (GSP) to cover a wide range of agricultural commodities, particularly semi-processed and processed ones.

There was wide acceptance, WFC said, of the need for measures which, taken together, would comprise a world food security net to ensure international market stability and continuity of world food supplies, especially for developing countries, at reasonable prices and on affordable terms. Concerned by lack of progress on a new Wheat Trade Convention (p. 729), WFC urged its speedy conclusion and the inclusion of substantial economic provisions to safeguard both exporters and importers and to recognize developing countries' needs. It also urged avoidance of policies affecting their capacity to meet essential grain needs during production shortfalls.

Greater efforts were required to raise the level of the 1980 Food Aid Convention, <sup>(10)</sup> extended until June 1983 (p. 729), from the current 7.6-million-ton level to a 10-million-ton minimum; to attain the pledging target of WFP (p. 728); and to replenish the International Emergency Food Reserve (IEFR) annually at 500,000 tons (p. 729). WFC also urged additional aid to help developing countries improve their distribution, transport and storage infrastructure and their reserve stock management.

WFC expressed concern that, after encouraging increases in 1977 and 1978, official external assistance commitments to food and agriculture had declined in 1979 while military expenditure had grown apace. Although primary responsibility for solving their food problems rested with developing countries, WFC noted that massive increases in external commitments would be required—more than $12.5 billion (in 1975 prices) by 1990, according to an FAO estimate. Therefore, it welcomed the planned increase in commitments by multilateral agencies.

It suggested that each country able to contribute should strengthen its own national support strategy embracing all facets of world food problems, including development assistance, trade policies and world food security. Within the total assistance effort, special attention should be devoted to low-income, food-deficit countries, particularly the least developed. It also called for maximum efforts to replenish the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD) and the International Development Association (IDA).

Commenting on the conclusions and recommendations after their adoption, Canada believed the efforts of developing countries must be stepped up and receive sustained international support, even if that meant reordering priorities and reallocating resources; it also commented on a decision by WFC to gather information on food and agricultural assistance to Africa

(p. 624). The United States reserved its position on the recommendation for a world food security net, believing that concentrating measures into a package would detract attention from the fundamental problem of production; it also urged countries to establish their own food reserves instead of waiting for a new Wheat Trade Convention or other international action, and it said the concept of national support strategies needed to be clearly defined.

Although accepting the text, the USSR reaffirmed that it would continue to render economic and technical assistance to interested developing countries, including aid for agriculture and food production, in forms corresponding to its own social and economic structures and which had demonstrated their practical effectiveness.

ACC TASK FORCE CONSIDERATION. Food problems were among the topics addressed in a March 1981 report <sup>(4)</sup> by the Task Force on Long-Term Development Objectives, a subsidiary body of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (p. 388). The Task Force pointed to a need for action in five main areas: provision of a world food security net, to help developing countries resolve food problems; establishment of national food plans or strategies; improvement of the contribution of international trade to the solution of food problems; substantive increases in development assistance and investment in developing countries; and realization of the large potential for economic co-operation among those countries.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. On 24 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted a resolution on food and agriculture, expressing grave concern at the precarious food situation in low-income developing countries with food deficits, and recognizing that elimination of hunger and malnutrition was an international responsibility. It urged increased external aid to the food sector, replenishment of IFAD and IDA, and support for developing countries' efforts to strengthen mutual co-operation in food and agriculture. It called on donor countries to facilitate the increased transfer of resources to enable developing countries to accelerate food and agricultural production and achieve greater self-reliance in grain production. The Council also urged reduction and, where appropriate, elimination of trade barriers, especially those affecting developing countries' agricultural exports; adoption or extension of GSP to cover agricultural commodities; and the speedy conclusion of a new Wheat Trade Convention.

The Council called on donor countries to achieve without delay the minimum targets of the Food Aid Convention and IEFR (p. 729), emphasized the need to assist African agriculture and food development (p. 624), and called on Governments to implement agrarian reform and rural development (p. 400).

The resolution was adopted without vote. It had been similarly approved on 22 July by the Council's First (Economic) Committee, where the draft had been submitted by the Chairman after informal consultations on a text put forward by Venezuela on behalf of the Group of 77.<sup>(1)</sup> Venezuela also made further oral drafting changes to the text before its approval.

In the Committee, Australia said it attached particular importance to the call for reduction of trade barriers, especially those affecting developing countries. The USSR, speaking also for Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, the German Democratic Republic and Poland, reiterated their position as described to WFC (p. 718). The United Kingdom, speaking for the members of the European Economic Community (EEC), said they were the most important and accessible market for developing countries' agricultural exports and would continue their efforts within their Common Agricultural Policy. The United States reaffirmed its position on national reserves and a Wheat Trade Convention.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 17 December,<sup>(7)</sup> the General Assembly, welcoming the WFC recommendations, repeated points in the Economic and Social Council resolution regarding external aid to the food sector, replenishment of IFAD and IDA, an international wheat agreement and co-operation among developing countries. In addition, the Assembly, characterizing food as a human right and not an instrument of political pressure, reaffirmed the international commitment to overcoming hunger and malnutrition and the need to support agricultural development and food production and distribution in developing countries. It reaffirmed also that they should accelerate production to improve self-sufficiency, and called for increased technical and capital assistance. It called for urgent action against agricultural trade barriers, recommended expansion of GSP (p. 546) and urged developed countries to facilitate access to their markets by exports from developing countries. It requested WFC to consider measures for a world food security net to ensure international market stability and continuity of food supplies.

Other provisions of the resolution concerned food aid (p. 725), including the work of CFA (p. 727) and contributions under the Food Aid Convention and IEFR, as well as agrarian reform and rural development.

The resolution was adopted, without vote, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee. On 10 December, the Committee had approved the draft in like manner, on the basis of a text submitted by a Vice-Chairman after informal discussions on a draft put forward by Algeria on behalf of the Group of 77.<sup>(1)</sup> Oral drafting changes by Canada and the United States were accepted. The Group's text was then withdrawn.

Also on 17 December, the Assembly decided without vote<sup>(8)</sup> to transmit to its 1982 regular session a draft resolution by the Philippines,<sup>(2)</sup> which would have had the Assembly invite the Secretary-General, in consultation with FAO, WFC, IFAD and other organizations, to develop short-, medium- and long-term strategies for solving global food problems. The Assembly acted on the recommendation of the Second Committee, made without vote on 7 December as orally proposed by its Chairman at the suggestion of the Philippines.

The final text of the Assembly's resolution on the WFC report had several paragraphs not in the Group of 77 version, in addition to other differences.

The added paragraphs were those by which the Assembly: called for agrarian reform and rural development (paragraph 5); noted with deep concern the limited progress in resolving agricultural trade problems (paragraph 6); called for urgent action against agricultural trade barriers (paragraph 7); reaffirmed that developing countries should accelerate food and agricultural production in order to improve self-sufficiency (paragraph 11); reiterated its belief that food aid for the least developed countries should be provided as far as possible in the form of grants or on highly concessional terms (paragraph 13); reaffirmed that policies and incentives to accelerate food and agricultural development should continue to be pursued (paragraph 15); and requested WFC to consider measures for a world food security net (paragraph 20).

Changes in other paragraphs included the following: In paragraph 2, instead of expressing concern at unsatisfactory progress in international efforts to improve food production and consumption, the Assembly affirmed that those efforts should be intensified. In paragraph 3, a clause was added recognizing that the long-term solution depended on increased self-sufficiency in food. A paragraph of the Group of 77 text reaffirming that, since access to food was a fundamental necessity and a human right, it should not be used as an instrument of political pressure was rephrased in paragraph 10 to state that food was a human right which Governments endeavoured to guarantee and that the Assembly stressed its belief in the general principle that food should not be used as a political instrument.

In paragraph 12, with regard to food-sector strategies adopted by developing countries, the phrase "within the framework of respect for national sovereignty" was changed to "within the context of national plans and policies". A phrase calling for the early establishment of a world food security net was dropped from paragraph 19, on assistance by developed countries. The request in paragraph 25 that WFC continue to support meetings by interested Governments to facilitate exchange of experience in the food sector was supplemented with the phrase "in accordance with its programme of work and within available resources".

Another change was the omission of a proviso urging developed countries promptly to eliminate protectionism affecting developing countries through the phasing out of tariff and non-tariff barriers, so as to remove distortive production patterns maintained by subsidies and protectionism. This was replaced by clauses urging developed countries to make their best efforts to adjust economic sectors which required protection against exports from developing countries, thus facilitating market access for their food and agricultural products, and recommending expansion of information on the use of GSP. There were also changes in the paragraphs on CFA and IEFR.

Among changes in the preamble, paragraphs were added: expressing deep concern that substantial resources continued to be diverted to armaments and calling for disarmament measures that would increase the possibilities of reallocating resources to economic and social development and upgrading food Conditions in developing countries; noting with great concern the precarious food situation in many developing countries; and noting the need for policies to avoid disruption of international trade and to facilitate market access for agricultural exports, particularly from developing countries.

Omitted was a preambular paragraph noting with deep concern the increasing domestic subsidies to agricultural production in developed countries and lack of progress towards resolving agricultural trade problems which seriously affected production in and exports from developing countries, and disrupted international trade.

Several delegations explained their positions on the text in the Committee or in the Assembly.

Canada joined the consensus on the understanding that the world food security net concept would not detract from the integrity of existing bodies and would emphasize the need to strengthen national production and distribution systems. The United States reserved its position on such a net and on the conclusion of a new international wheat agreement, pointing out that it was the largest donor of food aid and the largest bilateral donor of agricultural development assistance; it also believed strongly in an open market system, held that it was in the interest of all to establish grain reserve policies and said world food security depended on increased food production in developing countries.

New Zealand was disappointed at the lack of more explicit reference to world trade problems in agricultural products since, it said, there was abundant proof that certain national policies, particularly on subsidies, had a prejudicial effect on international markets. Australia, expressing the same view, added that subsidy systems not only increased world price instability and generally depressed prices received by exporters but also caused efficient producers to leave the market. Japan said its position expressed in 1979 with regard to trade in agricultural products had not changed.<sup>(9)</sup>

The USSR maintained its position as stated in WFC (p. 718).

During the discussion in the Second Committee, deep concern was expressed by many delegations that, despite increases in world agricultural production and food aid, millions continued to suffer from hunger and malnutrition. The developing countries generally shared the concern of WFC that the goal of eradicating hunger within a decade had had to be postponed. Many stressed the critical food situation in Africa (p. 625) and also voiced concern that, despite the international community's efforts, agreed food-aid targets had not been met.

A number of developed market-economy countries felt that it was of primary importance for each developing country to adopt concrete self-help plans in agriculture to increase food production, and agreed that more bilateral aid should be directed to this end. Japan observed that emphasis should also be laid on developing human resources by organizing farmers and experts in the diffusion of agricultural technologies and by training local agrarian leaders. Austria added that, although the primary goal must be to increase developing countries' food production, it was essential to step up food aid to the world's poorest sectors. Israel stressed the need to increase agricultural yields by radically improving production methods and generating employment opportunities through more intensive and efficient use of land and water, obtaining several harvests a year and developing arid lands.

Bulgaria said the first necessity was for developing countries to mobilize internal resources and draw up national programmes for intensification of agriculture to bridge the gap between needs and production. Romania spoke in like manner, adding that solutions also depended on international measures. Hungary suggested that the example of the socialist countries had demonstrated that large-scale farming was the best way of introducing modern agricultural methods and lessening the impact of adverse weather conditions.

Guyana, pointing out that it had become a net exporter of food in 1980, was joined by Mauritania, the Sudan, Turkey and Viet Nam in calling for international efforts to complement national ones. Suriname was among many developing countries which urged that priority attention be given to food and agriculture. Nigeria mentioned problems caused by pre-harvest and post-harvest losses and the lack of crop protection and storage facilities. Togo asked for help to solve food storage and preservation problems.

Tunisia stated that building food stocks sufficient to establish an infrastructure should be everyone's concern; together with EEC, it was trying to solve that problem by long-term contracts for the supply of staple foods. The United Republic of Cameroon said it welcomed a Philippine proposal to have an expert group draw up a plan for the purchase of world food reserves.

Indonesia noted that in developing countries record food imports and rising costs of agricultural inputs were aggravating external food dependency and eroding scarce foreign exchange reserves. The Philippines noted that high interest rates had made the crisis worse.

Guinea, the Philippines, Poland and Uruguay saw the world food situation as an important item for the proposed global negotiations on development and international economic co-operation.

Most developing countries supported the WFC appeal for removal of trade barriers and protectionism, which they saw as an obstacle to agricultural exports.

Poland, Spain and Yugoslavia also agreed that it was necessary to reduce barriers hampering such trade. Uruguay stated that it had considerable resources which could be used to feed the world's population but was faced with marketing problems because of subsidized exports from industrialized countries. Costa Rica and the United Arab Emirates expressed concern that, while hunger haunted the developing countries, enormous quantities of surplus agricultural produce were destroyed on the pretext of obeying the laws of the market-place. Hungary remarked that socialist countries were also affected by the protectionist agricultural policies of EEC.

Nepal said that even though informal agreement had been reached on replenishment of IFAD, multilateral agencies must ensure continuing and adequate replenishment; the $1 billion WFP pledged target should be met and the resources of FAO expanded. Sierra Leone, also urging support for those institutions, remarked that countries in a position to help were haggling over percentages of contributions or budget growth while wasting resources on weapons. Australia commented that, instead of continually haggling over percentages with regard to IFAD, efforts should focus on securing its future.

China and Viet Nam were among those which urged the setting up of a world food security network. Cyprus spoke similarly. Kenya thought this should be coupled with a global alert system and large-scale investment in food and agriculture with no strings attached. Zimbabwe believed that a world food security system should be legally enforceable. Zambia offered to join in the formulation of a global plan of action on food and agriculture up to the year 2000—an approach also suggested by the Philippines. Bangladesh favoured an international agreement to avoid measures which might hinder developing countries from covering their essential grain needs at times of international shortage.

Afghanistan was alarmed by intentions expressed by some countries to use food as an international weapon. Cuba said it condemned the United States practice in that respect, particularly against countries introducing structural changes designed to benefit the society as a whole. The German Democratic Republic said the United States, backed by some Western States, had recently blocked a $5-million, rice-irrigation project for Viet Nam proposed by WFP. Bangladesh and Malaysia were also against the use of aid for political leverage.

Many comments in the debate were addressed to ways of improving the provision of food aid (p. 725).

Food and agriculture

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order, contained in General Assembly resolutions 3201 (S-VI) and 3202 (S-VI) of 1 May 1974, the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, contained in Assembly resolution 3281 (XXIX) of 12 December 1974, Assembly resolution 3362 (S-VII) of 16 September 1975 on development and international economic co-operation, and the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, contained in Assembly resolution 35/56 of 5 December 1980, which laid the foundations for the new international economic order, Reaffirming General Assembly resolutions 35/68 on the report of the World Food Council and 35/69 on the situation of food and agriculture in Africa, adopted on 5 December 1980.

Welcoming the report of the World Food Council on its seventh ministerial session, held at Novi Sad, Yugoslavia, from 25 to 29 May 1981.

Expressing its appreciation to the Government and people of Yugoslavia for acting as hosts to the Council at that session and for the generous hospitality accorded to the participants,

Emphasizing the need for the implementation of effective measures at the national and international levels for accelerating the rate of growth in food and agricultural production in developing countries, with a view to achieving the 4 per cent growth rate in food production, as envisaged in the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Recognizing that the long-term solution to the problems of food and agriculture in the developing countries involves the over all development of those countries within the framework of the reordering of economic conditions on a world-wide basis,

Noting with concern the lack of progress in the negotiations for a new Wheat Trade Convention and recognizing the implications of such a convention for world food security,

Noting also the sixth annual report of the Committee on Food Aid Policies and Programmes,

Considering that food is a requisite for human survival and well-being and a fundamental human necessity,

Recognizing that the long-term solution in respect of food security rests upon increased food production and the accelerated development of the developing countries,

Recognizing also that a substantial increase in the export earnings of developing countries is essential if they are to finance adequately their overall economic development and their imports of food and of agricultural inputs, and that trade barriers constitute a serious handicap to the international community in its efforts to overcome recession and inflation and to expand overall productivity, and in particular to the developing countries in their efforts to realize their economic potential,

Taking note with satisfaction of the efforts made by food-exporting developing and developed countries in contributing to the Food Aid Convention,

Bearing in mind paragraph 5 of the report of the World Food Council on its seventh ministerial session,

1. Expresses its grave concern at the continuing precarious nature of the food situation in low-income developing countries with food deficits, particularly the least developed countries;

2. Emphasizes that the various measures of international assistance in favour of African agriculture and food development, specified by the General Assembly in resolution 35/69, demand the continued and increased efforts of the international community and, in particular, of the appropriate organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system;

3. Notes that the World Food Council, at its seventh ministerial session, emphasized the need to adopt, according to priorities identified in the field of food, comprehensive national and international measures, with a view to attaining the aims and objectives of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade concerning the promotion of food and agricultural development in the developing countries;

4. Recognizes that the elimination of hunger and malnutrition is the common responsibility of the international community and that immediate action should concentrate on the food problems of those developing countries with inadequate food production, and also that the solution of food problems requires, in the first instance, determined action by the developing countries and that in this context they need the increased support of the international community;

5. Welcomes the decision of the International Monetary Fund to integrate compensation for excesses in the costs of cereal imports with that for shortfalls in receipts from exports under its compensatory financing facility;

6. Calls upon existing and new donor countries to achieve without delay the minimum target of the Food Aid Convention of 10 million tons of cereal aid annually, as well as the minimum target of 500,000 tons of grains for the international Emergency Food Reserve, as agreed upon in the relevant decisions of the General Assembly;

7. Urges developed countries, international institutions, and others able to provide development assistance, to increase external assistance to the food sector, for which an estimated necessary element of external assistance is $8.3 billion, increasing to $12.5 billion by 1990 (both amounts in 1975 prices), to take urgent steps for the adequate and equitable replenishment of the resources of the International Fund for Agricultural Development and to conclude the replenishment of those of the International Development Association;

8. Calls upon all countries to consider, within the framework of their national priorities, strengthening national food security;

9. Calls upon all donor countries to facilitate the increased transfer of resources in support of the efforts of developing countries to increase their food and agricultural production, so as to enable them to achieve self-reliance in the production of grain and to set up the corresponding infrastructure;

10. Urges, in the context of the present resolution on food and agriculture, effective measures to move towards the reduction, and the elimination, where appropriate, of barriers to trade, especially those affecting agricultural products of export interest to developing countries, and that in this connection all industrialized countries should consider the adoption or extension of the generalized system of preferences or of other preferences to cover, as appropriate, a wide range of agricultural commodities, particularly semi-processed and processed ones;

11. Urges the international community, in adopting multi-lateral measures in the food sector, to take into account, in particular, the problems and interests of food-producing and food-exporting developing countries;

12. Urges the conclusion as soon as possible of a new Wheat Trade Convention, which will include substantial economic provisions to safeguard the interests of both exporters and importers and will recognize the need for the application of special provisions to developing countries;

13. Urges the World Food Council, within the context of its mandate from the General Assembly and in an effort to mobilize and sustain greater efforts in the struggle to overcome hunger, to continue to review major problems and policy issues and the steps being taken to resolve them, and to continue to serve as a mechanism to provide overall, integrated and continuing attention to the successful co-ordination and follow-up of policies concerning food production, nutrition, food security, food trade and food aid, as well as other related matters, by all the agencies of the United Nations system;

14. Reaffirms that food objectives are intimately related to global development and that positive progress in this area could strongly influence the prospects for progress in other areas of the International Development Strategy;

15. Expresses satisfaction at the growing number of countries adopting a more integrated approach to food policy as one of the means for interested developing countries to transfer their own priorities into effective action, to mobilize, within the context of their national development plans and priorities, increased technical and financial resources and to secure co-operation from international development assistance agencies;

16. Reaffirms that food strategies and policies, in accordance with the principle of respect for national sovereignty, remain the concern of the countries adopting them;

17. Calls upon the international community to encourage and accord high priority to support for the efforts of developing countries to strengthen and supplement their programmes of mutual co-operation in the field of food and agriculture;

18. Calls upon Governments concerned to implement agrarian reform and rural development within the framework of their national plans and objectives, in accordance with the recommendations as adopted at the World Conference on Agrarian Reform and Rural Development;

19. Notes the suggestion made by the World Food Council at its seventh ministerial session that national and international efforts should be stepped up for the training of skilled national staff, that the maximum encouragement should be given to highly qualified agricultural specialists from developing countries to continue working in or to return to those countries, and that measures to avoid the drain of such personnel to developed countries should be considered.

General Assembly resolution 36/185

Adopted without vote Meeting 103 17 December 1981

Approved by Second Committee (A/36/694/Add.6) without vote. 10 December (meeting 47); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/36/L.148), based on informal consultations on draft by Algeria, for Group of 77 (A/C.2/36/L.14), orally revised, and orally amended by Canada and by United States; agenda item 69 (g).

Report of the World Food Council

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 3201(S-VI) and 3202(S-VI) of 1 May 1974, containing the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New international Economic Order, 3281(XXIX) of 12 December 1974, containing the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, and 3362(S-VII) of 16 September 1975 on development and international economic co-operation.

Recalling also its resolution 35/56 of 5 December 1980, the annex to which contains the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Recalling further its resolutions 34/110 of 14 December 1979 and 35/68 of 5 December 1980 on the report of the World Food Council and 35/69 of 5 December 1980 on the situation of food and agriculture in Africa,

Recalling also the Declaration of Principles and the Programme of Action, as adopted by the World Conference on Agrarian Reform and Rural Development, Bearing in mind Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/71 of 24 July 1981 on food and agriculture,

Expressing its appreciation to the Government and people of Yugoslavia for the excellent facilities and generous hospitality provided to the World Food Council at its seventh ministerial session,

Noting that the World Food Council emphasized the need to adopt, according to priorities identified in the field of food, comprehensive national and international measures with a view to realizing the aims and objectives of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade in the promotion of food and agricultural development in the developing countries.

Recognizing that a substantial increase in the export earnings of developing countries is essential for adequate financing of their overall economic development and their imports of food and agricultural inputs.

Expressing concern that trade barriers constitute a serious handicap to the efforts of developing countries. In particular, to realize their economic potential, and of the International community to overcome recession and inflation and expand overall productivity.

Noting, in that context, the need for adoption by all countries of policies designed to avoid disruption of international trade and to facilitate access to international markets of agricultural exports, particularly those from developing countries,

Noting with great concern that the food situation remains extremely precarious for many developing countries despite significant increases in production and improved distribution in some countries in the past year,

Noting also with great concern the growing hunger and malnutrition in many developing countries, especially in the least developed countries, particularly those in Africa,

Expressing its deep concern at the fact that a substantial part of world resources, material as well as human, continues to be diverted to armaments with a detrimental effect on international security and on efforts to achieve the new international economic order, including the solution of food problems, and calling upon Governments to take effective measures in the field of real disarmament that would increase the possibilities of allocation of the resources now being used for military purposes to economic and social development, especially development of developing countries, and to upgrading their food conditions,

1. Welcomes the conclusions and recommendations of the World Food Council as adopted at its seventh ministerial session, and calls upon all Governments and appropriate international organizations to give earnest attention to their implementation;

2. Expresses its concern at the critical deterioration of the food outlook for many developing countries in the 1980s, especially in the least developed countries and particularly those in Africa, and affirms that international efforts should be intensified to support improved production of food in developing countries;

3. Recognizes that the long-term solution to the problems of food and agriculture in the developing countries depends on increased self-sufficiency in food as part of the overall development of those countries within the framework of structural changes in international economic relations;

4. Reaffirms the strong commitment of the international community to overcoming hunger and malnutrition and, in that context, the need for more effective international action to support agricultural development and food production and distribution in developing countries, particularly in low-income countries with food deficits;

5. Calls upon the Governments concerned to implement agrarian reform and rural development within the framework of their national plans and objectives and in accordance with the recommendations as adopted by the World Conference on Agrarian Reform and Rural Development;

6. Notes with deep concern that only limited progress has been achieved towards the solution of the long-standing problems of international trade in agricultural products, including access to international markets of agricultural exports, which adversely affect production and exports, particularly of developing countries, and the solution of which could make an important contribution to improving overall food production in the world;

7. Calls for urgent action in the different negotiating forums to move towards the approval and implementation of proposals to bring about the reduction and elimination of barriers to trade in agricultural products, in particular in relation to those of export interest to developing countries, and thus to facilitate, inter alia, more efficient patterns of production;

8. Urges developed countries to make their best efforts to adjust those sectors of their agricultural and manufacturing economies which require protection against exports from developing countries, thus facilitating access to the markets of food and agricultural products;

9. Recommends that the generalized system of preferences should be expanded to cover a wider range of processed and semi-processed products and, whenever possible, agricultural commodities, and that the system of information on using the generalized system of preferences, by providing technical assistance-including assistance in the field of research, development and marketing-should be enlarged and improved to enable developing countries to take full advantage of such preferences;

10. Reaffirms that food is a universal human right which Governments endeavour to guarantee their people and, in that context, stresses its belief in the general principle that food should not be used as an instrument of political pressure;

11. Reaffirms that developing countries, in the context of their national development plans and priorities, firmly supported by the international community, should take all necessary measures to accelerate food and agricultural production in order to improve national and collective self-sufficiency as early as possible;

12. Calls upon the international community to support the national efforts of developing countries to increase their food and agricultural production by increased technical and capital assistance, in particular for the food-sector strategies that have already been adopted by interested developing countries, within the context of national plans and policies, and the recognition that food strategies and policies remain the concern of the countries adopting them;

13. Reiterates its belief that food aid for the least developed countries should be provided, in so far as possible, in the form of grants or on highly concessional terms and that donors should consider paying relevant transport costs;

14. Expresses its satisfaction at the growing number of countries that are adopting a more integrated approach to food policy, including food-sector strategies, as one of the means for interested developing countries to translate their own priorities into effective action and to mobilize, within the context of their national plans and priorities, increased technical and financial resources and co-operation from international development assistance agencies;

15. Reaffirms that, in the context of national development plans and priorities, effective policies and incentives should continue to be pursued and invigorated with a view to accelerating food and agricultural development;

16. Takes note of the renewal of the Food Aid Convention, and calls upon existing and new donor countries to achieve without delay the minimum target of the 1974 World Food Conference of 10 million tons of cereal aid, as agreed upon by the General Assembly in relevant decisions;

17. Takes note of the attainment of the minimum target of 500,000 tons of grain for the international Emergency Food Reserve in 1981 and expresses its appreciation to those countries whose contributions have made this possible;

16. Welcomes the decision of the Committee on Food Aid Policies and Programmes to carry out a review of food aid requirements in the 1980s, in the context of paragraph 88 of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, which calls for urgent consideration to be given to a revision of the target of the Food Aid Convention, taking into account the estimated requirements of 17 to 18.5 million tons of cereals, which provide a useful indicator of the overall requirement of food aid by 1985, as agreed in the Strategy;

19. Urges developed countries, international institutions and others able to provide development assistance to increase external assistance to the food sector, for which the estimated necessary element of external assistance is $8.3 billion, growing to $12.5 billion by 1990, both figures at 1975 prices, to take urgent steps for the adequate and equitable replenishment of the International Fund for Agricultural Development, to conclude the sixth replenishment of the International Development Association, and to grant increased development assistance to the developing countries in order to help them become self-sufficient at the national or regional level in food production;

20. Requests the World Food Council to give further consideration to a series of feasible measures which, taken together, comprise a world food security net to ensure international market stability and continuity of world food supplies, especially for developing countries, at reasonable prices and on the conditions they can afford, and to make recommendations thereon;

21. Calls upon all States to consider strengthening their national food security within the framework of their national priorities;

22. Urges the conclusion, as soon as possible, of a new international wheat agreement that includes substantial economic provisions for safeguarding the interests of both exporters and importers and that recognizes the need for special provisions for developing countries;

23. Welcomes the decision of the International Monetary Fund to integrate compensation for excesses in the costs of cereal imports with that for shortfalls in receipts from exports under the Fund's compensatory financing facility;

24. Calls upon the international community to encourage and accord high priority to support for the efforts of developing countries to strengthen and supplement their programmes of mutual co-operation in the field of food and agriculture;

25. Urges the World Food Council, in accordance with its programme of work and within available resources, to continue to support meetings requested by interested Governments at the national and regional levels in order to facilitate the exchange of experience in the food sector;

26. Urges the World Food Council, within the context of its mandate, to mobilize and sustain greater efforts in the struggle to overcome hunger, to continue to review and report on major problems and policy issues and the steps being taken or proposed to resolve them, and to continue to serve as a co-ordinating mechanism to provide overall integrated and continuing attention for the successful co-ordination and follow-up of policies concerning food production, nutrition, food security, food trade, food aid and other related matters, by all organizations and bodies of the United Nations system;

27. Urges the international community, in adopting multilateral measures in the food sector, to take particularly into account the problems and interests of food-producing and food-exporting developing countries.

World Food Day

The first annual observance of World Food Day was held on 16 October 1981, the anniversary of the founding of FAO in 1945.<sup>(3)</sup> The decision to mark the day each year was taken by FAO in 1979,<sup>(6)</sup> in order to increase public awareness of the nature of world food and agricultural problems.

The Day was marked by ceremonies at United Nations Headquarters and at FAO headquarters in Rome. Events also took place in some 150 countries, including addresses by heads of government and ministers on national priorities in food and agricultural development.

On 24 July 1981, the Economic and Social Council, as the General Assembly had done in December 1980,<sup>(2)</sup> urged Governments and national, regional and international organizations to contribute to the celebration of the Day. It acted by adopting, without vote, a resolution<sup>(1)</sup> recommended by its First Committee.

The text had been approved by the Committee on 21 July, also without vote, on a draft submitted by Venezuela on behalf of the Group of 77. After informal discussions, the draft was orally revised to delete two preambular paragraphs describing access to food as a basic and universal human right and reaffirming support for FAO in the execution of its mandate as evolved in resolutions of the 1974 World Food Conference<sup>(4)</sup> and the 1979 World Conference on Agrarian Reform and Rural Development.<sup>(5)</sup>

In the Assembly's Second Committee, Hungary said it was pleased to note that FAO had responded to a Hungarian proposal by proclaiming World Food Day.

World Food Day

The Economic and Social Council,

Considering that food is a requisite for human survival and well-being and a fundamental human necessity.

Recalling resolution 1/79 of 28 November 1979, adopted by the Conference of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations at its twentieth session, and General Assembly resolution 35/70 of 5 December 1980, calling for the annual observance of World Food Day on 16 October, the anniversary of the founding of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations in 1945.

Recalling also that the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations was established to take all necessary and appropriate action for "ensuring humanity's freedom from hunger", Urges Governments and national regional and international organizations to contribute to the greatest possible extent to the effective celebration of World Food Day on 16 October 1981.

Food aid

The General Assembly, in its resolution of 17 December 1981 on the activities of the World Food Council (WFC),<sup>(1)</sup> urged developed countries, international institutions and other donors to increase external aid to the food sector. It cited an estimate that $8.3 billion was needed in external assistance for food aid, and that the requirement would rise to $12.5 billion by 1990, both figures at 1975 prices. It reiterated that food aid for the least developed countries should be provided as grants or on highly concessional terms and that donors should consider paying transport costs.

WFC, in May 1981, also called for increased efforts to expand and strengthen food aid (p. 717), especially through three main multi-lateral channels: the World Food Programme (p. 726), the Food Aid Convention (p. 729) and the International Emergency Food Reserve (IEFR) (p. 729).

The world system for the provision of food aid to food-deficit countries was discussed in the Assembly during the Second Committee's debates on development and international economic co-operation and on the work of the Economic and Social Council.

Pakistan, stressing the need to launch developing countries on the path of self-reliance and self-sufficiency, said that what they sought was a strengthened resolve to meet the shortfalls that had plagued internationally agreed objectives. Cape Verde, urging an increase in the amount of food aid, pointed out that, although it had intensified its efforts towards agricultural self-sufficiency, it would have to rely on international aid for food security. Canada felt that food aid should be temporary to complement, not supplant, increased production efforts.

The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Malaysia were among those which urged countries with surpluses to grant food aid to the needy. Thailand favoured the use of triangular transactions, in which developed countries purchased food from low-income, food-surplus developing countries for shipment as food aid to food-deficit developing countries.

A number of States announced increases in their food aid to developing countries. Argentina said its contribution of cereals under the Food Aid Convention had risen to 35,000 tons. Australia had raised its aid by more than 20 per cent and was currently spending more than $120 million a year; it called for additional financing from the members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries and said it was time that Soviet bloc countries played a more realistic role. New Zealand said that, during 1980, 22 per cent of its bilateral aid had gone to the agricultural sector as compared with 17 per cent two years previously. Spain said it had provided 20,000 tons of cereals under the Food Aid Convention in 1980 and again in 1981, and for the least developed countries it would provide an additional 10,000 tons as well as experts for preparation of food strategies.

India indicated that it had almost achieved food self-sufficiency and would do all it could to assist poorer countries.

A number of countries called for increases in assistance provided under the Food Aid Convention (p. 729) and IEF (p. 730).

World Food Programme

During 1981, the World Food Programme (WFP), a joint venture of the United Nations and the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), continued providing food aid in support of development projects and to meet emergency needs.

Since commencing operations in 1963,<sup>(3)</sup> WFP had, by the end of 1981, provided support for some 1,106 development projects and 556 emergency operations at a total value of about $5.6 billion. Currently some 118 countries were being assisted.

The 30-member Committee on Food Aid Policies and Programmes (CFA), the governing body of WFP, provided general guidance on policy, administration and operations; it presented its annual reports to the Economic and Social Council and the FAO Council covering 1980<sup>(1)</sup> and 1981.<sup>(2)</sup>

The resources of WFP continued to come mainly from voluntary contributions in commodities, cash or services pledged by Governments at biennial pledging conferences. The next such conference, for which a target of $1.2 billion for 1983-1984 was established by the General Assembly in December 1981 (p. 728), was scheduled for 1982.

WFP activities

The seventh annual report of CFA<sup>(3)</sup> recorded the total expenditure of WFP in 1981 as $579 million, compared with $571 million in 1980. Of the 1981 total, $400 million was for development projects (including $30 million from WFP resources and $114 million from the International Emergency Food Reserve (IEFR)). Another $144 million was spent on emergency operations and $34 million was for administrative costs. Of its cash resources, $141.6 million was disbursed or obligated: transport accounted for $94.2 million, special measures to help the least developed countries meet internal costs related to WFP food aid amounted to $10.8 million, and commodity purchases from regular WFP resources came to $6.7 million.

Commitments for the purchase of commodities, made where possible and economical in developing countries, amounted to $91 million, compared with $117.5 million in 1980.

For the second consecutive year, some 1.5 million metric tons of food were shipped, with close to 1.3 million tons coming from WFP resources, including contributions to the 1980 Food Aid Convention and IEF channelled through WFP; the remaining 200,000 tons were shipped on behalf of bilateral donors and other United Nations agencies. Sixty-nine per cent went to development projects and 31 per cent to emergency operations.

In 1981, commitments for new development projects, including expanded assistance to previously approved projects and budget increases approved by CFA for operational projects, amounted to about $543 million, while an additional amount of some $178 million went to 53 emergency operations (p. 727).

CFA ACTIVITIES. The eleventh and twelfth sessions of CFA were held in 1981 at Rome, Italy, from 11 to 21 May<sup>(1)</sup> and from 19 to 29 October.<sup>(2)</sup>

In May, following its sixth annual review of food aid policies and programmes, CFA reported its conclusions and recommendations to the Economic and Social Council.<sup>(3)</sup> It concluded that food aid in both cereal and non-cereal products had declined during the previous two years in the face of developing countries' rising food import requirements. It urged enlistment of new aid donors, including non-governmental organizations, and an increase in current contributions to attain the minimum 10-million-ton target of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade.<sup>(4)</sup>

It encouraged further use of triangular transactions involving purchases from developing countries other than recipients. Such purchases by WFP and bilateral donors, CFA said, had greatly facilitated emergency operations. It added that Governments in recipient countries should develop programmes explicitly establishing an interrelationship between increased food production, food security and the use of food aid.

In October, the Committee reached substantial agreement on recommendations to improve emergency operations.

By its 17 December resolution on the activities of the World Food Council,<sup>(5)</sup> the General Assembly welcomed the CFA decision to review food aid requirements in connection with the target of the Food Aid Convention (p. 729).

In the Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, Finland, speaking for the Nordic States, believed that a larger share of food aid contributions should be channelled through WFP.

Resolutions: GA: <sup>(4)</sup>35/56, annex, para. 88, 5 Dec. 1980 (YUN 1980, p. 511); <sup>(5)</sup>36/185, para. 18, 17 Dec. 1981 (p. 724).

Development assistance

In 1981, CFA approved 39 new assistance projects for economic and social development at a total cost to WFP of $422 million. In addition, the Executive Director approved WFP assistance for a further 29 projects at a cost of $48 million, bringing the number of projects approved to 68 at a total value of over $470 million. (For list of development projects approved, see table on p. 730.) Expanded assistance for previously approved projects and increases approved by CFA for operational projects raised total commitments to $543 million.

In accordance with its 1979 guidelines for food aid,<sup>(1)</sup> CFA continued to give priority to low-income food-deficit countries, allocating to them some $452 million (83 per cent) of the total for new commitments. Assistance to countries identified by the United Nations as least developed (p. 401) reached $190 million, or 35 per cent of total commitments to development projects. During 1981, the regional distribution of new commitments was: Africa south of the Sahara, 44.5 per cent; Asia and the Pacific, 28.8 per cent; North Africa and the Near East, 20.1 per cent; and Latin America, 6.6 per cent.

About 80 per cent of new commitments was earmarked for agricultural and rural development, including refugee settlement projects, and 10 per cent went to pre-school and primary school children. The rest was divided among vulnerable groups such as pregnant women and nursing mothers, refugee assistance, hospital feeding, and secondary and higher education and training.

Emergency operations

On the recommendation of the WFP Executive Director, the Director-General of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations approved assistance for 53 emergency operations (one was subsequently cancelled in 30 countries, benefiting about 14 million people. These operations involved some 480,000 tons of food commodities valued at $178 million. About 74 per cent of the aid went to refugees and displaced persons following man-made disasters and civil disturbances, 22 per cent to people affected by drought and crop failure, and 4 per cent to victims of sudden natural disasters. Over half (56 per cent) of the assistance was for 19 operations in Asia and the Pacific, 35 per cent for 28 operations in Africa south of the Sahara, 6 per cent for 3 operations in North Africa and the Near East, and 2 per cent for 3 operations in Latin America. (For list of emergency operations approved, see table on p. 731).

Throughout 1981, WFP also maintained its world-wide humanitarian relief operations. In co-operation with other United Nations agencies and voluntary organizations, it continued to co-ordinate and distribute food shipments for the Kampuchean emergency operation (p. 494), involving 66,000 tons of rice and 2,000 tons of other food, 15,000 tons of seeds and 54,000 tons of fertilizers. Assistance was also provided in the Thai/Kampuchean border areas, with shipments amounting to 88,000 tons going to approximately 360,000 people.

In Pakistan, WFP again co-ordinated emergency food supplies to some 1.5 million Afghan refugees and its total commitment was raised to 352,041 tons estimated at $114.6 million. The commitment to the relief operation in Somalia from December 1979 to the end of 1981 amounted to some 41,000 tons valued at about $26.9 million. In the north-eastern province of Karamoja in Uganda an estimated 265,000 persons affected by war and famine had been helped by WFP since August 1979, with commitments at the end of 1981 of about 28,900 tons of food costing $15.9 million.

Contributions for 1979-1982

The report of the Committee on Food Aid Policies and Programmes (CFA)<sup>(1)</sup> pointed out that, by the end of 1981, total pledges to WFP for the biennium 1979-1980 had reached $824 million, representing 87 per cent of the $950 million target established by the General Assembly in 1977,<sup>(2)</sup> while pledges for 1981-1982 amounted to $771 million-77 per cent of the $1 billion target set by the Assembly in 1979.<sup>(3)</sup> Unless potential new donors contributed, CFA stated, the minimum target for 1981-1982 might not be reached. (See table on p. 732.)

The total resources of WFP increased by $1,067 million during 1981, compared with an increase of $990 million the previous year. Pledges to regular WFP resources accounted for 75 per cent of the increase; contributions to the International Emergency Food Reserve channelled through WFP, 17 per cent; contributions under the Food Aid Convention, 6 per cent; and other resources, 2 per cent.

Pledging target for contributions, 1983-1984

The General Assembly, in December 1981, established a $1.2 billion target for contributions to WFP in the 1983-1984 biennium. It acted on a CFA recommendation, submitted through the Economic and Social Council.

The figure had been proposed by the WFP Executive Director, supported by the Secretary-General and the Director-General of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO). It was discussed by CFA in May and approved after further discussion in October. The Committee reported<sup>(1)</sup> that, while different views were expressed on the target's feasibility and adequacy, all delegations had agreed not to stand in the way of consensus.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. On 2 November, the Economic and Social Council adopted without vote a resolution<sup>(2)</sup> proposed by CFA, by which it urged United Nations Members and FAO members and associate members to prepare to announce pledges at the 1982 Pledging Conference for WFP. The Council also submitted the draft resolution on the 1983-1984 pledging target proposed by CFA.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 17 December, the draft-annexed to the Economic and Social Council's resolution-was adopted by the General Assembly.<sup>(3)</sup>

By this resolution, the Assembly established for the 1983-1984 biennium a voluntary contribution target of $1.2 billion, of which not less than one third was to be in cash and/or services. It urged United Nations Members and FAO members and associate members to ensure the target's full attainment and requested that a pledging conference be convened in early 1982. The Assembly also decided that the pledging conference for 1985-1986 be convened early in 1984 at the latest.

The resolution was adopted without vote, having been approved in like manner by the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee on 27 November.

Target for World Food Programme pledges for the period 1983-1984

The Economic and Social Council,

Having considered the sixth annual report of the Committee on Food Aid Policies and Programmes,

Noting the comments of the Committee concerning the minimum target for voluntary contributions to the World Food Programme for the period 1983-1984,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 2462(XXIII) of 20 December 1968 and 2682(XXV) of 11 December 1970 on multilateral food aid, which recognized the experience gained by the Programme in that field,

1. Submits to the General Assembly for consideration and approval the draft resolution annexed to the present resolution;

2. Urges States Members of the United Nations and members and associate members of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations to undertake the necessary preparations for the announcement of pledges at the Tenth Pledging Conference for the World Food Programme.

ANNEX

Draft resolution recommended to the General Assembly on the target for World Food Programme pledges for the period 1983-1984

General Assembly resolution 36/202

Adopted without vote Meeting 103 17 December 1981

Approved by Second Committee (A/36/812) without vote, 27 November (meeting 44); draft by Economic and Social Council (resolution 1981/85, annex); agenda item 70 (i).

Target for World Food Programme pledges for the period 1983-1984

The General Assembly,

Recalling the provision of paragraph 1 of its resolution 2095(XX) of 20 December 1965 to the effect that the World Food Programme Ia to be reviewed before each pledging conference.

Recalling also the provision of paragraph 4 of Its resolution 34/108 of 14 December 1979 specifying that, subject to the review of the Programme provided for in resolution 2095(XX), the next pledging conference should be convened at the latest early in 1982, at which time Governments should be invited to pledge contributions for 1983 and 1984, with a view to reaching such a target as may then be recommended by the General Assembly and the Conference of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations.

Recalling further the recommendation contained in paragraph 90 of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade that the resources of the World Food Programme should be augmented and that every effort should be made to reach the target agreed upon for each biennium during the Decade for the regular resources of the Programme, Noting that the review of the Programme was undertaken by the Committee on Food Aid Policies and Programmes at Its eleventh session and by the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session of 1981.

Having considered Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/85 of 2 November 1981 and the recommendations of the Committee on Food Aid Policies and Programmes contained in its sixth annual report,

Recognizing the value of multilateral food aid as furnished by the World Food Programme since its inception and the necessity for continuing its action both as a form of capital investment in economic and social development projects and as a means of meeting emergency food needs,

1. Establishes for the two years 1983 and 1984 a target for voluntary contributions to the World Food Programme of $1.2 billion, of which not less than one third should be in cash and/or services in the aggregate;

2. Urges States Members of the United Nations and members and associate members of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations to make every effort to ensure the full attainment of the target;

3. Requests the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the Director-General of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, to convene a pledging conference for this purpose at United Nations Headquarters early in 1982;

4. Decides that, subject to the review provided for in its resolution 2095(XX), the subsequent pledging conference, at which Governments should be invited to pledge contributions for the biennium 1985-1986 with a view to reaching such a target as may then be recommended by the General Assembly and the Conference of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, should be convened at the latest early in 1984.

Contributions under the 1980 Food Aid Convention

The 1980 Food Aid Convention,<sup>(5)</sup> establishing minimum annual contributions by its parties of 7.6 million metric tons in wheat and other grains, was extended in 1981 at its current level for two years, until 30 June 1983. The Convention's objective was to reach the 1974 World Food Conference target of at least 10 million tons of food aid annually to developing countries.<sup>(4)</sup> Protocols for an extension of the Food Aid Convention and the 1971 Wheat Trade Convention were approved on 6 March 1981 by the parties to the International Wheat Agreement, made up of the two conventions.

For the crop year 1980/1981, contributions under the Convention channelled through WFP increased to 302,080 tons of grain, valued at over $50 million. Contributors also provided $16.9 million in cash grants for transportation and related costs. By the end of 1981, contributions announced for the 1981/1982 crop year totalled 151,863 tons valued at $27.8 million; an additional $9.1 million was provided for transportation.<sup>(1)</sup> (See table on p. 731.) All these figures excluded contributions for the International Emergency Food Reserve (see below).

In May 1981, the World Food Council urged greater efforts to raise the level of food-aid flows to 10 million tons by renewing the Food Aid Convention at that level for a longer period (p. 718).

The General Assembly, in its 17 December resolution on the work of the Council,<sup>(3)</sup> took note of the renewal of the Convention and called on donors to achieve the 10-million-ton target without delay. It also welcomed the decision of CFA to review food aid requirements in the context of the call for urgent revision of the Convention target in the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,<sup>(2)</sup> taking into account estimated requirements of 17 to 18.5 million tons of cereals as an indicator of 1985 requirements.

In the Second Committee, the Gambia expressed concern at the continued failure to supply the aid called for in the Convention. Nepal added that the 10-million-ton target was insufficient considering the population increase since 1974. Guinea, Mauritania and the Niger thought the target should be raised to 18 million tons by the mid- 1980s.

Appeals for the negotiation of a new wheat trade agreement were made by Australia, Canada, Malaysia and Pakistan. For the Nordic States, Finland regretted the breakdown of talks on a new agreement at a time when a consensus had been close on a solution involving internationally co-ordinated national stocks. The United States, stressing its belief in an open-market system, said it would support the search within the International Wheat Council for a universally acceptable approach to a new wheat trade convention which took into account the merits of national market-oriented reserves.

Contributions under IEFRR

The annual minimum target of 500,000 metric tons of grain under the International Emergency Food Reserve (IEFR) was surpassed in 1981 for the first time. Contributions of 603,067 tons were announced, consisting of 587,944 tons of cereals and 15,123 tons of other commodities such

The World Food Council urged in May that IEF be replenished to maintain the 500,000-ton level and that assured commitments be made to it, especially for increased multilateral aid for food emergencies (p. 718). The General Assembly, in its 17 December resolution on the Council's activities, took note of the attainment of the target and expressed appreciation to the countries which had made it possible.<sup>(2)</sup>

In the Second Committee, Mali and Nepal, among others, called for IEF to be replenished at the 500,000-ton level. Ethiopia believed the target was inadequate and asked WFC to examine the matter in 1982.

Chapter XII

Science and technology

The General Assembly, in December 1981, decided to establish long-term arrangements for the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development, and set up an intergovernmental group to work out details in 1982.<sup>(7)</sup> The System, designed to help developing countries strengthen their scientific and technological capacities, was to become operative on 1 January 1982, replacing the United Nations Interim Fund for Science and Technology for Development, established in 1979. The Financing System and its initial stage, the Interim Fund, were originally proposed in the Vienna Programme of Action on Science and Technology for Development, adopted in 1979 by the United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development.<sup>(9)</sup> Also in December 1981, the Assembly authorized increases in the staff and other resources of the Financing System.<sup>(8)</sup>

Resources pledged to the Interim Fund fell considerably short of the established 1980-1981 target of $250 million (p. 742). With $25 million in cash on hand at the end of 1981, the Fund approved 65 projects in developing countries, costing more than $35 million (p. 742).

An operational plan suggesting concrete actions to help make the advantages of science and technology more accessible to developing countries was drawn up in 1981 by the United Nations Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation (DIEC) and was approved in June by the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development,<sup>(1)</sup> as a framework for future action. Its purpose was to implement the Vienna Programme of Action (p. 734).

The assistance provided by the United Nations system in connection with the eight major programme areas of the operational plan was described by the Secretary-General in a report of May 1981 to the Intergovernmental Committee (p. 743).<sup>(3)</sup> The Task Force on Science and Technology for Development, set up in 1980 by the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC) as a primary instrument for inter-agency co-ordination in this field, held its first two sessions in 1981 (p. 749). One of its tasks was to discuss the draft of a study by the Secretary-General of the efficiency of the United Nations system in the field of science and technology, later submitted to the Assembly.<sup>(2)</sup> As proposed by the Intergovernmental Committee, the Assembly requested that recommendations and cost estimates based on the proposals in the study be submitted in 1982 (p. 750).

The Advisory Committee on Science and Technology for Development held its first session in New York from 23 to 27 February 1981 and made suggestions on the draft operational plan (p. 752). The Intergovernmental Committee met three times in New York-at a resumed second session on 29 January to appoint the Advisory Committee's 28 members, and at a two-part third session from 26 May to 5 June and from 25 to 31 August (p. 750). During 1981, its second year of operation, the United Nations Centre for Science and Technology for Development carried out activities in various areas, such as analysis and research, co-ordination and monitoring, and promotion of national and regional activities (p. 752).

Several United Nations organizations were active in the regulation and promotion of the flow of technology from industrialized to developing countries (p. 753). In the area of regulation, work continued at the fourth session of the United Nations Conference on an International Code of Conduct on the Transfer of Technology (Geneva, 23 March-10 April) but, when no agreement was reached on issues such as dispute settlement and restrictive practices, the General Assembly, to accelerate finalization of the code, decided in December to establish an Interim Committee of the Conference to seek solutions to the unresolved questions.<sup>(5)</sup>

Aspects of the reverse transfer of technology-the so-called brain drain of skilled personnel from developing to developed countries-were under study in 1981 (p. 757). The Trade and Development Board, in March, authorized the convening of an intergovernmental group of experts to examine the feasibility of measuring human resource flows, and the Assembly, in December, urged active participation in the group's meeting.<sup>(6)</sup>

In relation to the application of information science to development, the Economic and Social Council recommended in July that Member States collaborate in preparations for the Second Intergovernmental Conference on Strategies and Policies for Informatics, being organized by the Intergovernmental Bureau for Informatics and scheduled for 1983.<sup>(4)</sup> In the area of marine science and technology, an expert group meeting examined the links between reducers and users of marine technologies (p. 760).

Vienna Programme of Action

Implementation of the Programme

An operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action on Science and Technology for Development was approved on 5 June 1981 by the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development as a framework for further action by the Committee.<sup>(5)</sup> The plan had been submitted in May by the DIEC Director-General, assisted by the Executive Director of the Centre for Science and Technology for Development,<sup>(2)</sup> in accordance with a request made by the Committee in June 1980.<sup>(6)</sup> A draft was reviewed in February 1981 by the Advisory Committee on Science and Technology for Development, which made general comments as well as specific suggestions in connection with each programme area.<sup>(1)</sup>

The plan followed the structure of science and technology activities of the United Nations as defined in the Vienna Programme. It was divided into eight major programme areas identified by the Intergovernmental Committee in 1980: scientific and technological policies and plans for development (p. 743); the creation and strengthening of scientific and technological infrastructure (p. 745); the choice, acquisition and transfer of technology (p. 753); the development of human resources for science and technology (p. 746); financing (p. 737); scientific and technological information (p. 746); the strengthening of research and development in and for developing countries and their linkage to the production system (p. 747); and the strengthening of co-operation in science and technology among developing countries and between developing and developed countries (p. 748).

In addition to approving the plan, the Committee identified 31 areas of concentration covering all programme areas except for the one on financing. The plan included over 100 proposals for action to strengthen science and technology in developing countries.

According to the General Assembly's resolution of 17 December 1981 on the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development,<sup>(4)</sup> the plan was due to be completed by concrete and specific action proposals by the Intergovernmental Committee in 1982.

A draft outline of the plan had been submitted for comments and proposals to the executive heads of organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system. The draft plan was reviewed at the first session (Geneva, 10-13 March 1981) of the inter-agency Task Force on Science and Technology for Development, a body of ACC (p. 749).

In an introduction to the plan, the Director-General pointed out that it was primarily addressed to developing countries. The United Nations system should support their efforts by providing experts to assist in programme and project preparation, by consulting with Governments and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations on assistance for implementation, and by giving practical help in the implementation of projects. Consultations could also be planned with governmental and intergovernmental organizations in developed countries.

The introduction suggested activities to be carried out by national focal points for science and technology, including: information dissemination; keeping abreast of administrative, institutional and financial developments relevant to international implementation of the Vienna Programme; participation in the preparation and implementation of national scientific and technological activities; and promotion of international co-operation. It also suggested that intercountry consultations be held to assess scientific and technological resources in a region and to identify areas that could be handled regionally and subregionally.

To promote the Vienna Programme and the operational plan, the Director-General suggested that, as a first step, they be disseminated among States and organizations, and that informational meetings be held, possibly in subregions, to elaborate national and regional scientific and technological activities and to discuss United Nations assistance. The time-frame envisaged for the implementation was 1982-1990. Progress might be reviewed in 1983 by the regional commissions and globally in 1985.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION. In its general comments on the plan, contained in the report on its February session, the Advisory Committee on Science and Technology for Development stated that it should be more explicitly oriented towards the goals and objectives of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade.<sup>(3)</sup> Consideration should be given to assigning priorities among major programme areas and among proposals within each area, with particular attention to the needs of the least developed countries (LDCs). The use of universities in implementing operational activities should also be considered. The impact of the plan's proposals on such factors as employment, rural-urban migration, population growth and distribution patterns, utilization of the capacities of women and ecological conditions needed to be analysed. Also, a number of proposals contained in the plan required detailed case studies before they could be evaluated.

The Advisory Committee made specific suggestions in connection with each of the plan's programme areas.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL COMMITTEE ACTION. The Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development, by a resolution of 5 June, approved the operational plan as a framework for further actions to be decided by the Committee for implementation of the Vienna Programme. The Committee decided that the Director-General, assisted by the Executive Director of the Centre, should: define, with the assistance of the ACC Task Force, the roles of the organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, including lead-agency roles for joint activities, in respect of the operational activities in the plan; compile a summary of the plan's proposals, indicating the executive role of specific organs, organizations and bodies, and disseminate the information to all national focal points; invite those focal points to inform the Committee on action taken and progress achieved by their countries in executing the plan; and promote and co-ordinate activities of the United Nations system in connection with the plan.

The Committee decided that the United Nations Interim Fund for Science and Technology for Development (p. 742) should give particular emphasis to the areas of concentration identified in the plan. It invited the Director-General, with the assistance of the Centre's Executive Director, to prepare proposals for optimizing the activities of the United Nations system, stressing particularly the strengthening of the scientific and technological infrastructure of developing countries, and to present a biennial review and appraisal of progress. The special efforts needed to assist LDCs were to be borne in mind. The Advisory Committee was asked to provide additional suggestions on the proposals contained in the plan.

Governments, particularly those of developed countries, were urged to co-operate in providing facilities and resources, including funds. Countries were urged to take the plan into account in their national plans and programmes and in their bilateral and multilateral co-operation activities. Intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations were urged to contribute to the plan's implementation.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY CONSIDERATION. During the debate on development and international economic co-operation in the General Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, the operational plan was endorsed or welcomed by a number of countries, such as Egypt, the German Democratic Republic, Nigeria, Romania and the United Kingdom, the last speaking for the members of the European Community (EC).

The United Kingdom said the EC members felt that special attention should be given to the programme areas concerned with scientific and technological infrastructure, human resources development, research and development, and international co-operation; specific proposals must be prepared for the Intergovernmental Committee in 1982, and account must be taken of the activities of other bodies concerned with science and technology for development.

Emphasizing the importance of the operational plan, the Ukrainian SSR said it nevertheless accorded too much importance to the role of external economic factors such as private investment and did not deal with co-operation between countries with different economic systems. The USSR reaffirmed its position on those provisions of the Vienna Programme which it regarded as exaggerating the role of external economic factors, particularly foreign private investment. The German Democratic Republic said that some fundamental aspects of the Programme, such as disarmament and development, control of the activities of transnational corporations and technology transfer, were the target of obstructionist tactics by capitalist industrialized countries.

The Republic of Korea hoped that specific proposals for implementing the Programme would be submitted to the Intergovernmental Committee in 1982, giving special attention to human resources development, the linking of such resources to the production system and the strengthening of co-operation among developing countries through the establishment of on-the-job training systems. The Sudan said it was alarmed at the failure of the Intergovernmental Committee to adopt a detailed and comprehensive operational plan.

Proposed amendments to the Programme

The Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development continued in 1981 to consider several topics left unresolved in 1979 when the Vienna Programme of Action was approved. An in-session working group of the whole agreed on five minor provisions to be added to the Programme, but the Committee did not agree on how it should resume consideration of the matter in 1982.

The unresolved issues included aspects of technology transfer, scientific and technological information systems, financial arrangements, and scientific and technological co-operation. A May 1981 report to the Committee by the Secretary-General updated information on action taken by United Nations organizations and bodies in negotiations related to these issues.<sup>(3)</sup>

The five paragraphs on which agreement was reached by the working group provided that: the Financing System for Science and Technology for Development should provide financial resources to supplement national financing capacities; establishment of a Financing System was essential for the scientific and technological development of developing countries; regional financial mechanisms should be considered as important complements to the funding mechanism recommended under the Programme of Action; developed and developing countries should eliminate restrictions on the reproduction and translation of scientific and technical materials; and the implementation of international agreements should be conducted and/or supported by national institutional arrangements.

The Chairman proposed that the General Assembly be asked to add these provisions to the Vienna Programme. Following informal consultations, the Committee, on 5 June, decided to defer consideration of the matter until August.<sup>(1)</sup> In August, Venezuela, on behalf of the Group of 77 developing countries, proposed instead that the Committee's 1982 session be extended for one week to be devoted exclusively to the unresolved issues. After the United States objected to such an extension, the Committee, on 31 August, decided to annex the Group of 77 proposal to its report.<sup>(2)</sup> The General Assembly took no action on the matter.

Speaking during the debate on development and international economic co-operation in the Assembly's Second Committee, Japan expressed the view that a one-week extension of the Committee session for the sole purpose of discussing unresolved issues was unnecessary. Similarly, the Ukrainian SSR thought the Committee should settle the outstanding questions at its regular session and should not extend that session or hold special sessions. The United States said it would prefer to see unresolved issues discussed in other forums, without burdening the Intergovernmental Committee and the Centre for science and technology with additional functions.

Venezuela, on the other hand, expressed concern that several developed countries did not wish to reconsider unresolved issues, the solution of which could not continue to be deferred indefinitely; the Intergovernmental Committee should devote sufficient time to them in 1982.

Financing of science and technology

The two major funding organizations of the United Nations system, the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and the World Bank, continued in 1981 to finance technical co-operation activities in science and technology.

According to an April 1982 report of the Secretary-General to the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development,<sup>(3)</sup> UNDP spent slightly less on science and technology projects in 1981 than in 1980 ($140,681,000 as compared to $156,600,000), though the proportion of total expenditures rose from 41 to 51 per cent. Of this amount, expenditures for scientific and technological infrastructure accounted for $41,689,000, while $38,398,000 was spent on human resources development, $36,334,000 on research and development and $14,320,000 on technology transfer. Expenditures on other programme areas were $5,222,000 for scientific and technological policies, $2,566,000 for international co-operation, and $2,152,000 for scientific and technological information.

UNDP expenditures for scientific and technological projects in various regions were: $60,670,000 for Asia and the Pacific; $43,401,000 for Africa; $9,466,000 for Arab States; $8,715,000 for Latin America; and $901,000 for Europe. Global and interregional projects financed by UNDP accounted for $17,528,000.

Out of total World Bank expenditures of $979 million for technical co-operation in 1981, amounts spent on technological and human resources development and technology transfer included $83 million on energy, $17.7 million on water supply and sewerage, $14.7 million on industry and $14 million on transportation. Project lending for scientific and technological education totalled $490.2 million. Over 9 per cent of the $3,763 million in Bank lending for agriculture and rural development was allocated for research and extension.

In his proposed operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action,<sup>(2)</sup> the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation stated that, with respect to financing science and technology for development (programme area V), developing countries spent an average of 0.38 per cent of their gross national product on research and development, compared with about 2 per cent in developed market-economy countries and 2.8 per cent in centrally planned economies, excluding China.

Activities proposed to rectify this situation included: at the national level, setting targets for scientific and technological financing, reorienting national sources and methods of financing, introducing incentives and disincentives to technology users, involving national financing institutions more deeply in scientific and technological capacity-building, and encouraging transnational corporations (TNCs) to provide research and development financing; and at the regional and international levels, a review of sub-regional sources and mechanisms of financing, consultations with regional financing institutions, and strengthening regional, interregional and international financing mechanisms. Another suggestion was that the impact of external aid on scientific and technological capacity-building be strengthened.

Commenting on this part of the plan, the Advisory Committee on Science and Technology for Development<sup>(1)</sup> suggested that developing countries establish expenditure targets for science and technology efforts in particular fields such as industrialization or food, commensurate with their capacity to absorb new technology. It also suggested studies of the efficiency of external aid for science and technology, the mechanisms through which financial institutions dispersed their aid, and the ways in which TNCs could contribute.

UN Financing System for Science and Technology for Development

As the Interim Fund for Science and Technology for Development, set up by the General Assembly in 1979,<sup>(3)</sup> was to expire at the end of 1981, long-term arrangements were established by the Assembly in December for the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development. The main objective of the System, as defined by the Assembly in 1979, was the financing of a broad range of activities to strengthen the endogenous scientific and technological capacities of the developing countries, in particular to assist in implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action.

Recommendations on the structure and framework of the System were made by the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development, set up in June 1980 by the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development<sup>(7)</sup> in accordance with a 1979 Assembly decision.<sup>(4)</sup> They were discussed by the Committee in August 1981. In the view of the Group of Experts, the Financing System should be both a channel for the transfer of resources to developing countries and a framework for scientific and technological co-operation to the benefit of all countries.

REPORT OF THE GROUP OF EXPERTS. The 27-member Intergovernmental Group of Experts adopted its report on the Financing System<sup>(1)</sup> at its fourth and final session, held in New York from 8 to 19 June. The Group had held its third session at Geneva from 6 to 16 April.

The Group recommended a target of $1.2 billion for 1983-1985. Of that amount, $600 million would constitute the "core" resource component of the System, comprising contributions from Governments in freely convertible currencies, obtained through a mix of assessed contributions and negotiated "instruments of commitment", with three-year subtargets for different groups of countries participating in the System. The assessed portion-no more than 5 per cent of the total to meet administrative costs-would be obtained from all States that joined the System, and would be based on the scale of assessments for the United Nations budget. The remaining $600-million "non-core" component would be a basket of funds and sources made up of bilateral contributions, contributions in kind, contributions in not-so-freely convertible currencies, private funds, co-financing and complementary sources.

As to the mode of financing, the Group agreed that the System should be authorized to provide loans on concessionary terms as well as grants. The proportion of grants should be a fixed percentage of the annual budget and should be mainly for the least developed countries and a limited number of high-risk research and development projects. Loans with maturities up to 40 years would be the normal mode of financing.

With regard to the institutional structure of the System, the Group recommended that it should comprise three basic elements: the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development as the Governing Body, an Executive Board and a secretariat. The functions of the Governing Body would include decisions on fundamental policies and priorities, admission of members, election of members of the Executive Board, general review and assessment of activities, decisions on recommended levels of funds to be raised and decisions on the administrative budget. The Executive Board would focus on fund raising, project approval, financial management and monitoring. It would have between 12 and 16 members, reflecting an appropriate balance between developed and developing countries and between donor and recipient countries, and with size of contributions being taken into account in determining representation.

Detailed proposals were made concerning transitional arrangements for 1982 (p. 742), including the establishment of a transitional Executive Board and the setting of a $200-million target to be raised by voluntary contributions at a pledging conference early in the year. The Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation would oversee preparatory work. The projects and programmes financed by the Interim Fund would be transferred to the Financing System on 1 January 1982, and administrative expenses would be funded from the United Nations regular budget subject to later reimbursement.

The Group proposed that, during the transitional phase, consideration be given to finalizing details of the core and non-core components of the System, including contributions in kind, contributions in not-so-freely convertible currencies, and the precise terms and conditions of financing, including the terms of grants and loans.

Annexed to the Group's report were: an assessment of future funding requirements for some scientific and technological activities in developing countries; an inventory of multilateral and bilateral programmes for providing financial support for scientific and technological activities in developing countries; guidelines for the composition of the transitional Executive Board, prepared by the Group; an overview of the Group's membership and work; and letters exchanged between the expert from the USSR and the Group Chairman. In his letter, the USSR member said he could not support the Group's recommendations because they did not reflect the principle of voluntary participation.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION. In August, at a resumed third session of the Intergovernmental Committee convened mainly to consider the Financing System, the Group of 77 submitted a proposal on long-term arrangements for the System, outlining guiding principles, general economic provisions, forms of operation, structure and transitional arrangements.<sup>(2)</sup>

The Group of 77 proposed that all members should contribute to the System in a manner consistent with their capacities as well as the asymmetry of the technological capacity between developed and developing countries, and should participate collectively in the direction of the System and the administration of its resources. Agreeing with the $1.2-billion target suggested by the Group of Experts for 1983-1985, the proposal provided that the core resources of $600 million be composed of assessed contributions and grants in freely convertible currencies, obtained through "instruments of commitment", and that the target for the core component be established by the Intergovernmental Committee, as the Governing Body, at intervals of not less than three years. The instruments of commitment would constitute the collective agreement between developed and developing countries to contribute to the System, the details to be worked out during the transitional period. The assessed contributions, as well as the administrative expenses of the System, should not exceed 5 per cent of the core resources.

The concept and methods of obtaining the non-core resources, including the issue of contributions in kind and not-so-freely convertible currencies, would be studied in detail by the transitional Executive Board, with a target established by the Intergovernmental Committee at intervals of not less than three years.

Concerning the operation and structure of the System, as well as arrangements for the transitional period, the Group of 77 proposal contained recommendations similar to those by the Group of Experts.

The Intergovernmental Committee, on 31 August,<sup>(6)</sup> took note of the report of the Group of Experts and decided to transmit it to the General Assembly together with the comments made in the Committee. It annexed the Group of 77 proposal to its report and requested the Assembly to decide on the long-term arrangements.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution of 17 December,<sup>(5)</sup> the General Assembly decided to establish long-term arrangements for the Financing System, to become operative on 1 January 1982. Among the guiding principles for the System were that it would finance a broad range of activities to strengthen the endogenous capacities of developing countries, within the framework of the operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action (p. 734); all member States would contribute funds in a manner consistent with their capacities, and all would participate in the System's direction. The Assembly designated 1982 as the transitional year for the System and requested the Secretary-General to convene a Pledging Conference. It set up an Ad Hoc Intergovernmental Group on the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development, open to all States, to submit recommendations to the Intergovernmental Committee in 1982 on institutional, organizational and financial arrangements. The resources, organization and management of the Interim Fund were to be transferred to the System (p. 742).

The resolution was adopted without vote, following similar approval by the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee on 7 December. The draft was submitted by a Vice-Chairman as a result of informal consultations.

Explaining the position of the member States of the European Community (EC), the United Kingdom said they welcomed the consensus on the System, even if important aspects remained to be worked out the following year. Poland, speaking also on behalf of Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, voiced doubts about the usefulness of establishing an ad hoc group to consider a matter that could be dealt with by the Intergovernmental Committee, but said they had decided not to oppose it on the understanding that no significant additional expenditure would be involved. The United States expressed its understanding that secretariat expenses for the Ad Hoc Group should be met from available resources.

During debate in the Second Committee on development and international economic co-operation, several countries, including the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Madagascar, Mongolia, Nigeria, Romania, the Syrian Arab Republic and the Ukrainian SSR, expressed regret that no agreement had been reached earlier in 1981 on the establishment of a long-term financing system. Democratic Yemen believed that the policies of the capitalist countries preventing its establishment were slowing progress in the developing countries. The Sudan feared that lack of agreement would mean a break in the execution and follow-up of many projects, with serious consequences particularly for African countries.

Ecuador viewed the Financing System as indispensable for mobilizing international financial resources. Egypt said the commitment of States to the Vienna Programme of Action must become effective through the establishment of the System.

Mexico recalled that a group of countries headed by Tunisia had been pursuing efforts to establish a financing system by organizing a series of goodwill missions and consultations with both developing and developed countries; the result of the first phase of that process had been the Caracas Declaration of October 1981, by which 20 developing countries had reaffirmed their commitment to establishing a financing system with initial funding of $1 billion within three to five years. Supporting this initiative, Senegal said it had increased the awareness of States at the highest level with regard to the need for a long-term financing system.

Support for the views and recommendations of the Group of Experts on long-term arrangements for the System was expressed by a number of States, including Austria, Chile and Sri Lanka. New Zealand regarded the Group's report as innovative and constructive, and hoped the international community would agree to increase its efforts in science and technology for development. Others, such as Egypt, India, Kenya and Madagascar, favoured discussions on the basis of the Group of 77 proposal in the Intergovernmental Committee.

Several speakers, including China, the Congo, Romania, the Syrian Arab Republic and Tunisia, expressed the hope that the long-term Financing System would soon be established, preferably in 1982. Argentina thought the idea of transitional arrangements might facilitate agreement in principle that would make possible the immediate initiation of the System. The Philippines thought that, because of uncertainties, severe budget cutbacks and difficulties in obtaining contributions, the interim arrangement might have to be continued for some time.

Japan said that, in view of the complexity and diversity of the problems touched on by the Group of Experts, there was no time at the 1981 Assembly session to arrive at an arrangement acceptable to all parties; a temporary transitional arrangement should be considered, possibly in the shape of a one-year extension of the Interim Fund. The United States thought continuation of the Interim Fund into 1982 would be the best choice for the time being, pending consultations among Governments in 1982 on approaches other than that taken by the Group of Experts.

Concerning the organization of the System, Norway, speaking for the five Nordic States, expressed the opinion that existing organizations and institutions should be used as far as possible and co-operation with UNDP should be maintained; it would be premature to consider new arrangements before agreement was reached on financing. The EC members considered that the institutional arrangements should not prejudice the role of UNDP in relation to the operational activities of the United Nations system.

With regard to financial arrangements for the System, the EC members, the German Democratic Republic, Japan, the Ukrainian SSR, the United States and others emphasized that they must be based strictly on voluntary contributions. Japan stressed the importance of setting a realistic target figure and said it could not accept the idea of negotiated instruments of commitment as proposed by the Group of Experts. Austria, on the other hand, regarded that idea as a significant improvement over the Interim Fund's dependence on voluntary contributions. Speaking for the Nordic States, Norway expressed the view that any financing system should be based on predictability and burden-sharing; the experience of the Interim Fund had shown that voluntary contributions could not be relied upon unless they were co-ordinated.

The Republic of Korea urged both developed and capital-surplus developing countries to contribute willingly. In the view of the Ukrainian SSR, additional funds for scientific and technological development could be obtained only through the release of resources being expended on the arms race.

Recalling the urgent need to develop and strengthen the endogenous scientific and technological capacities of the developing countries in order to enable them to apply science and technology to their own development with a view to the elimination of the existing inequality between developed and developing countries in science and technology,

Reaffirming the need to strengthen further the role of the United Nations system in the field of science and technology through, inter alia, new and substantial resources in addition to those which already exist.

Recognizing the need to define specific and concrete proposals for action designed to strengthen the effectiveness of the United Nations system, with particular emphasis on the strengthening of the scientific and technological capacities of the developing countries.

Recalling its resolution 34/218 of 19 December 1979, in which it decided to establish a United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development, Recalling further its decision that the long-term arrangements for the Financing System should start in 1982 and that the establishment of interim arrangements should not prejudice the ultimate decision with regard to long-term arrangements.

Taking note of the report of the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development, concerning the report of the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development,

Considering that, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 34/218, the United Nations Interim Fund for Science and Technology for Development shall be terminated on 31 December 1981,

Reaffirming the role of the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development, as specified in General Assembly resolution 34/218,

1. Decides to establish, in accordance with the Vienna Programme of Action on Science and Technology for Development and General Assembly resolution 34/1218, long-term arrangements for the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development, which will become operative on 1 January 1982;

2. Decides that the guiding principles of the Financing System shall be as follows:

1. The Financing System shall, at the request of Governments, finance a broad range of activities intended to strengthen the endogenous scientific and technological capacities of developing countries. Adequate resources should be allocated to the various activities identified in the Vienna Programme of Action, including national, sub-regional, regional, interregional and international activities. Particular attention should be paid to the implementation of different types of projects and programmes of direct relevance to developing countries. Those activities should be complementary to bilateral and multilateral programmes for science and technology and supportive of the national efforts of developing countries. Due attention should be given to effective co-ordination of activities of the organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system in science and technology for development. The operational plan for the implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action, due to be completed by concrete and specific action proposals by the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development at its fourth session, including the areas of concentration as adopted by the Committee at its third session, will constitute the general framework for the activities of the Financing System.

2. In determining the nature and level of the resources of the Financing System, the following considerations should be taken into account:

(a) Asymmetry of the technological capacity between developed and developing countries;

(b) Need for predictability and continuous flow of financial resources;

(c) Need for substantial resources in addition to those that currently exist within the United Nations system;

(d) Need for untied external resources for the scientific and technological development of the developing countries.

3. The Financing System shall be a vehicle for the mobilization, co-ordination, channelling and disbursement of financial resources. The Financing System should be organized on a voluntary and universal basis, open to the participation of all States as full members. The resources of the Financing System will be constituted by contributions from States and through financial arrangements which the Financing System may enter into with International, regional and other public and private financial institutions. All member States should contribute to the Financing System in a manner consistent with their capacities. All member States should participate in the direction of the Financing System.

4. The Financing System should be endowed with an amount of resources to be agreed upon and contributed by participating countries in order to provide a stable base for its operations and should have the flexibility needed to attract resources from various sources.

5. In determining the forms of operation of the Financing System the experience gained in the operation of the United Nations Interim Fund for Science and Technology for Development should be taken into account.

3. Takes note with great interest of the recommendations of the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development and, in particular, notes that, in accordance with the criteria set forth in section VI, paragraph 3, of General Assembly resolution 34/218, the core resources of the Financing System should amount to $200 million per annum for the period 1983-1985;

4. Decides that the institutional arrangements should be determined, inter alia, in the light of the magnitude of the financial resources and the nature of operations of the Financing System;

5. Further decides that those institutional arrangements shall be agreed during the transitional year, 1982, in accordance with the relevant provisions of section II of the present resolution;

II

1. Decides that the year 1982 shall be considered the transitional period of the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to convene a Pledging Conference for the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development in the first quarter of 1982 to receive pledges for the transitional year and, in that context, urges all States to make generous contributions, bearing in mind the recommendations in that regard of the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development;

3. Decides that, without prejudice to the final agreement on the long-term institutional and financial arrangements for the Financing System, the general operational provisions of the United Nations Interim Fund for Science and Technology for Development, including its resources, organization and management, as well as the procedures set forth in the annex to General Assembly resolution 34/218, will apply and be transferred to the Financing System during the transitional period;

4. Decides that an Ad Hoc Intergovernmental Group on the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development, open to the participation of all States, should hold two sessions, the first, lasting one week, from 1 to 5 March 1982, the second, lasting two weeks, from 12 to 23 April 1982, and further decides that the time before and between those sessions should be fully utilized for consultations in order to ensure the successful conclusion of the work of the Group;

5. Urges Governments to ensure that representation at those two sessions shall be at a high level and include experts in the field of finance;

6. Requests the Ad Hoc Intergovernmental Group to prepare its recommendations on the institutional, organizational and financial arrangements for the Financing System and to submit them to the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development at its fourth session;

7. Requests the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development to submit its recommendations, through the Economic and Social Council, to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session for consideration and decision.

Secretariat of the Financing System

By a resolution of 17 December 1981, adopted without vote, the General Assembly authorized the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions to approve further increases in the staff and other resources of the Financing System up to levels proposed by the Administrator of UNDP.<sup>(1)</sup>

His proposal, submitted by the Secretary-General in December to the Assembly's Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee, was that administrative and support costs be raised from $1,145,140 for the Interim Fund in 1981 to $1,892,115 for the Financing System in 1982, to be increased to a maximum of $2,700,000 if the level of 1982 contributions warranted. This would allow for two additional posts at the start of the year, raising the complement to 23 posts, and for up to 19 more should circumstances warrant.

The Committee approved the resolution without vote on 14 December, as orally proposed by the Chairman.

Secretariat of the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development

The General Assembly,

Having noted the proposal of the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme for the 1982 administrative budget of the secretariat of the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development and the related oral report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, Authorizes the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions to approve further increases in the staff and other resources of the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development up to the levels indicated in paragraphs 5 and 6 of the proposal of the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme, after the Pledging Conference to be held in 1982, in the light of requests made by the Administrator and of information on the expected level of operations each time such a request is made.

UN Interim Fund for Science and Technology for Development

The United Nations Interim Fund for Science and Technology for Development, established by the General Assembly in 1979 to finance scientific and technological activities until the establishment of a long-term financing system,<sup>(1)</sup> became operational in May 1980<sup>(3)</sup> and ended its operations on 31 December 1981 with a transfer of resources to the Financing System as authorized by the Assembly on 17 December.<sup>(2)</sup>

Activities of the Fund

In its 19 months of operation through 31 December 1981, and despite financial constraints, the Interim Fund received and reviewed 800 proposals and project concepts, and approved 65 projects from developing countries, costing over $35 million.

The regional distribution of the projects approved was: Asia and the Pacific, 32 per cent; Africa, 31 per cent; Latin America and the Caribbean, 21 per cent; and Arab States, 12 per cent. In addition, there were three interregional projects (4 per cent). The Fund provided financing for national projects in 18 African countries, 13 Asian countries, 10 Latin American countries and 8 Arab States. Of the projects approved, 49 per cent were government executed; the rest were to be carried out by United Nations organizations.

Of the 65 projects approved, 25 were for research and development, 15 for science and technology policy, 9 for scientific and technological infrastructure, 7 for human resources development, 6 for technology transfer, and 3 fell in the area of scientific and technological information.

Expenditures of the Fund in 1981 totalled $5,711,364 against income of $17,924,915, mostly from Governments (see below).

A summary of the operations of the Interim Fund up to its termination on 31 December 1981 was given in a report of the UNDP Administrator in consultation with the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation, submitted to the Intergovernmental Committee in May 1982.<sup>(1)</sup>

During the debate on development and international economic co-operation in the Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, Egypt expressed the view that the Interim Fund had worked effectively and that, for reasons of continuity, projects already approved or appraised by the Fund should be carried out.

The Philippines said it had been impressed by the Fund's utilization of national expertise and government execution of projects.

Transitional arrangements

In order to ensure an orderly transition of the functions and responsibilities of the Interim Fund to the Financing System, the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), on 23 June 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> authorized the UNDP Administrator to arrange for: the transfer of assets, resources and commitments; the acceptance of additional pledges and payment of past pledges; if needed, continued administration and monitoring of approved projects and approval of new ones; and extension of contracts of Interim Fund staff beyond 31 December. The Administrator was authorized to assist the Financing System in the preparation of articles of agreement, a prospectus and other documents.

The General Assembly, in its resolution of 17 December on the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development, <sup>(1)</sup> decided that, without prejudice to the final agreement on long-term arrangements for the System, the general operational provisions of the Interim Fund, including its resources, organization, management and procedures, would be applied and transferred to the Financing System during the transitional period of 1982. The Assembly also decided that, in determining the forms of operation of the System, the experience gained in the operation of the Fund should be taken into account.

Contributions to the Fund

Cash on hand in the Interim Fund for 1980 and 1981 amounted to $25,168,569, of which Governments paid $23,215,172 out of the target of $250 million fixed by the General Assembly in 1979.<sup>(1)</sup> Of this amount, 33 countries paid $16,239,979 in 1981 (see table opposite).

On 5 June 1981, the Intergovernmental Committee noted with deep concern that the amounts pledged to the Fund were about one sixth of the target and that only a fraction of pledges had been paid, as a result of which it had not been possible to support a number of important proposals from many developing countries to strengthen their scientific and technological capabilities.<sup>(3)</sup>

As decided by the General Assembly in its resolution of 17 December on the Financing System,<sup>(2)</sup> the balance of resources remaining at the end of the interim period ($26,106,398 paid or pledged during 1980-1981 less expenditures) was transferred to the Financing System on 1 January 1982. The Assembly also decided that a Pledging Conference be convened in the first quarter of 1982 for the transitional year of the Financing System. By the end of 1981, 17 countries had pledged the equivalent of $2,011,784 for 1982.

Speaking during the debate on development and international economic co-operation in the Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, a number of countries, including China, the Congo, Indonesia, the Sudan, Venezuela and Yugoslavia, expressed regret that the target had not been reached. Guinea contrasted the amount pledged to the Fund with the fact that 500,000 scientists throughout the world were reportedly engaged in military research. Indonesia urged that financial commitments be met so that the technology gap would not be indefinitely perpetuated.

Activities of the UN system

The assistance provided by the United Nations system in connection with the eight major programme areas of the operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action on Science and Technology for Development (p. 734) was described by the Secretary-General in his first annual report on the topic, submitted in May 1981 to the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development.<sup>(4)</sup> A similar report presented in April 1982 covered 1981 activities.<sup>(5)</sup> The Secretary-General also presented to the General Assembly in May 1981 a study of the efficiency of the United Nations system in this field (p. 750).<sup>(3)</sup>

In addition, the report to the Committee by the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation, proposing the operational plan,<sup>(2)</sup> contained specific suggestions for new or expanded activities in each of the eight areas, including financing (p. 737) and technology transfer (p. 753). Comments on each area were made in February by the Advisory Committee on Science and Technology for Development.<sup>(1)</sup> After reviewing these reports, the Intergovernmental Committee, on 5 June, identified areas of concentration in each programme area except financing.

Science and technology policy

Activities of the United Nations system in regard to scientific and technological policies and plans for development (programme area I of the operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action), described in the Secretary-General's reports to the Intergovernmental Committee,<sup>(4)</sup> included studies on aspects of scientific and technological development, containing information on policy-making bodies and normative discussions on how to formulate policy; assistance in establishing such bodies; early identification and assessment of technological trends and breakthroughs; training of personnel for policy-making and -implementation; identification of methods for establishing policy priorities; and regional meetings of science and technology ministers and other officials.

In his study of the efficiency of the United Nations system in the field of science and technology,<sup>(3)</sup> submitted to the General Assembly in May 1981, the Secretary-General analysed the Programme in Science and Technology Policy conducted by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). The Programme encompassed expert missions, fellowships, studies, the compilation and publication of statistics, and the organization of regional meetings, especially a series of ministerial-level conferences on the application of science and technology to development. The study found that the Programme had met with only limited success in building the scientific and technological capacities of developing countries, that the results of technical co-operation had been disappointing, and that the ministerial conferences had been of doubtful benefit when compared with the cost and effort of preparing them. It favoured closer integration of UNESCO activities with projects of the World Bank and the United Nations Development Programme.

The operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme<sup>(2)</sup> contained suggestions for improving policy-making and planning, and institutional arrangements for policy formulation and policy implementation; the establishment of an "advance monitoring system" on scientific and technological developments; country studies on the relationship between science and technology and development; training of specialists for policy, planning and management; international co-operation in policy formulation and implementation; and support in methods and analytical techniques, including indicators and statistics of scientific and technological development, an information exchange and reference system on publications and documents, and the development and diffusion of methods and techniques for planning and programming.

The Advisory Committee, in its comments on the operational plan,<sup>(1)</sup> said that emphasis should be given to training of policy and planning officials through "learning-by-doing" programmes. Special attention should be paid to developing scientific capabilities which could provide the proper knowledge base on which to construct technology policies. Case studies were needed to analyse successful and unsuccessful attempts to develop and apply science and technology policies in developing countries.

The Intergovernmental Committee, on 5 June, specified three areas of concentration for activities of the United Nations system in connection with scientific and technological policies and plans for development: provision of advisory services to national science and technology agencies and institutions; early identification and assessment of new scientific and technological developments which might adversely affect development as well as those of specific and potential importance for development and for strengthening the scientific and technological capacity of developing countries; and support in methods and analytical techniques, by providing indicators and statistics to facilitate the definition of national targets.<sup>(5)</sup>

Assessment of levels of scientific and technological attainment

A report on levels of attainment of scientific and technological development among different countries, prepared by the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation with the assistance of the Executive Director of the United Nations Centre for Science and Technology for Development,<sup>(2)</sup> was transmitted by the Secretary-General in April 1981 to the Intergovernmental Committee. The report, prepared in accordance with a June 1980 request by the Committee,<sup>(4)</sup> concluded that, in view of the difficulties in precisely assessing levels of attainment in science and technology in relation to development, current efforts were limited mostly to compilation of statistics not sufficiently refined to provide a comparative basis for analysis. It recommended that measurement of levels of attainment, including development of criteria and indicators, should be undertaken by the Centre.

Commenting on this recommendation, the Advisory Committee stated that a study on the topic would be useful. However, as many developing countries were not in a position to provide reliable data, it recommended that, initially, information be collected which was readily available, easy to assemble and reliable. As a first step, the Secretariat might concentrate on methodological studies to facilitate assessment of the levels of attainment on a continuous basis, and the attention of Governments might be drawn to the usefulness of undertaking national and regional studies.<sup>(1)</sup>

The Intergovernmental Committee, on 5 June,<sup>(3)</sup> decided to consider the report further at its 1982 session. It requested the Director-General, assisted by the Centre's Executive Director, to submit a separate report on the activities of other United Nations bodies, in particular UNESCO and the regional commissions.

Future studies

The Intergovernmental Committee, on 5 June 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> referred to the Advisory Committee the question of science and technology and the future, including a 1979 report of the Working Group on Science and Technology and the Future presented to the United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development.<sup>(2)</sup>

Scientific and technological infrastructure

Various United Nations agencies were helping developing countries to establish national and regional centres for technology and had supported activities of existing centres, the Secretary-General noted in his reports to the Intergovernmental Committee on activities of the United Nations system in science and technology.<sup>(4)</sup> Describing activities in connection with the creation and strengthening of scientific and technological infrastructure (programme area II of the operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action), the reports also mentioned programmes to set up self-help organizations in rural areas; assistance to small and medium-scale industries, with emphasis on strengthening planning and managerial skills; and support to research and training centres, scientific and engineering organizations and professional associations.

In his study of the efficiency of the United Nations system in the field of science and technology,<sup>(3)</sup> the Secretary-General cited the initiation by the World Health Organization of research and development programmes in tropical diseases and human reproduction as an indication of effectiveness in responding to changing needs. With regard to nuclear science, he suggested an inter-agency review that would enable the International Atomic Energy Agency to focus its technical assistance on institution-building.

The operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme<sup>(2)</sup> proposed a set of activities to assist policy and planning machinery, educational and training institutions, research, design and development organizations, and scientific and technological services. These proposals included: assessment of complementary scientific and technological functions of educational and training institutions; support to centres for the development of educational and training materials; compilation of a directory of common training facilities and feasibility studies on sharing facilities; identification of subject areas for advanced regional and international research and development centres, and feasibility studies for networks of such centres; support for professional and popular societies; and assistance to standardization and quality control services and maintenance facilities.

The Advisory Committee recommended <sup>(1)</sup> that special attention be paid to the least developed countries, which lacked resources to develop even a minimum range of science and technology institutions. It also emphasized the role of extension services, and felt that the establishment of advanced research and development centres should be encouraged. In addition, incentives should be applied to encourage innovation and provide motivation to scientists and technologists of developing countries.

The Intergovernmental Committee, on 5 June 1981, identified seven areas of concentration in relation to infrastructure: pure research and basic scientific knowledge; upgrading of traditional technologies and promotion of their dissemination among developing countries; popularization; assessment of assistance received and needed by national agencies and institutions; identification of needs for advanced research and development facilities; support and guidelines for maintenance facilities; and interactive participation of national centres and scientific and technical units.<sup>(5)</sup>

Resolution: <sup>(5)</sup>Intergovernmental Committee (report, A/36/37), 2(III), para. 2 (d), programme area II, 5 June.

Human resources development

Education and training of personnel in science and technology were carried out by several United Nations organizations, the Secretary-General pointed out in his reports to the Intergovernmental Committee on activities of the United Nations system.<sup>(4)</sup> In relation to the development of human resources for science and technology (programme area IV of the operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action), various programmes dealt with manpower policy and planning, educational planning, vocational training and guidance, and continuing education and training. Specific activities included seminars and workshops, fellowship programmes, publication of training manuals, and studies on the brain drain (p. 757).

The Secretary-General's study of the efficiency of the United Nations system in science and technology<sup>(3)</sup> stated that the International Centre for Theoretical Physics, at Trieste, Italy, had had a valuable impact on the post-doctoral training and support of physicists in developing countries; 1,431 scientists had participated in 1980, of whom 792 had been from developing countries. The International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training, at Turin, Italy, had had 3,357 participants from 117 developing countries between 1 January 1978 and 31 July 1980. Some 175 meetings of interest to scientists from developing countries were held by the United Nations system each year, but the study found that greater efforts were needed to inform such scientists about those activities.

The operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme,<sup>(2)</sup> in its proposals on human resources development, included various activities to promote in-school and out-of-school education and training, including professional updating, post-graduate work and curricula development. It also suggested the expansion of education and training abroad. Other proposed activities covered manpower planning and policy-making, enhancing the role of women in scientific and technological development, reversing the brain drain, helping countries obtain foreign personnel through recruitment services, and building an awareness in developed countries of the role of developing countries in international scientific and technological development.

The Advisory Committee, in its comments on this programme area,<sup>(1)</sup> saw an urgent need for short- and medium-term activities, including programmes for learning-by-doing, in-service and pre-service training, and training of research and development managers. It suggested a study of the problems involved in planning a balanced distribution of persons educated in science and technology. It also urged special activities for first-generation learners whose parents had not had formal education, early recognition and continuous cultivation of special talents, the creation and strengthening of professional institutions, and measures to reverse the rural-urban migration of trained personnel.

The Intergovernmental Committee, on 5 June 1981,<sup>(5)</sup> identified two areas of concentration related to human resources development: scientific, technical and vocational education and training; and elimination of causes of the brain drain, utilization of the expertise of expatriate nationals, and provision of incentives for the return of scientists and skilled personnel.

During the debate on science and technology for development in the General Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, Kenya stated that real technology transfer was unattainable unless training was carried out in developing rather than developed countries.

Resolution: <sup>(5)</sup>Intergovernmental Committee (report, A/36/37), 2(III), para.2 (d), programme area IV, 5 June.

Scientific and technological information

Most United Nations agencies had established specialized information services or systems, some of international importance, the Secretary-General pointed out in his reports to the Intergovernmental Committee on activities of the United Nations system in science and technology.<sup>(4)</sup> Describing activities related to scientific and technological information (programme area VI of the operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action), the reports noted that United Nations organizations had also helped in the establishment and management of national information capabilities by issuing guidelines, organizing meetings, promoting the design and development of information systems and services, introducing new information technologies and developing training programmes for information specialists. Other activities included the publication of guidelines, manuals and directories to information sources, and the issuance of reports on information transfer.

The Secretary-General's study of the efficiency of the United Nations system in science and technology<sup>(3)</sup> assessed some of these activities, with emphasis on the General Information Programme of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, designed to provide a conceptual framework for the establishment of national and international scientific and technological information systems and services. The report noted that this and other systems, established on the understanding that most potential users were in industrialized countries, had shifted their priorities and budgets so as to concentrate on well-funded projects aimed at meeting the needs of developing countries.

The operational plan<sup>(2)</sup> suggested three areas in which Governments might act, with assistance from the United Nations system. First, to improve access to and availability of information sources, it proposed action to promote access to bibliographical sources, increase the availability and supply of documents, and provide access to know-how information. Second, it urged the establishment and management of national information capabilities, including national information systems and networks, extension services with links to the productive sector, and the creation and strengthening of problem-oriented information and advisory services. Third, to promote the use of information for national development, it suggested programmes to educate and train information users and to promote scientific and technological information among policy-makers, the scientific and engineering community and the public. Beyond the national level, it proposed support for regional systems and the

In the Advisory Committee's opinion,<sup>(1)</sup> national science and technology information systems should be established as an integral part of national development plans, permitting feedback from users to scientists and technologists and encouraging systematic subregional, regional and international co-operation. Caution must be taken to avoid information pollution caused by the flow of unnecessary or unusable information, thereby reducing the effectiveness of the system and diminishing a country's absorptive capacity.

The Intergovernmental Committee, on 5 June 1981, identified five areas of concentration related to scientific and technological information: problem-oriented information and advisory services; establishment of a global network of information systems based on the establishment and strengthening of national systems and the improvement of existing international systems and data banks; strengthening of subregional and regional information systems; access to and availability of information sources; and inclusion of information from developing countries in the global information system.<sup>(5)</sup>

Research and development

Activities by the United Nations system to strengthen research and development in and for developing countries and their linkage to the production system (programme area VII of the operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action) were described by the Secretary-General in reports to the Intergovernmental Committee on the activities of the system in science and technology.<sup>(4)</sup> The reports mentioned research in such areas as water, energy, food and agriculture, health services and disease control, and industrial development. Extension services, pilot plants and information dissemination were components of many United Nations programmes. Assistance was given in strengthening linkages between higher educational institutions, professional organizations and the production system. Programmes to develop managerial and technical capabilities included some designed to provide the expertise to transfer, adapt and develop technologies and products. Links between research institutes in developing and developed countries were being promoted.

The Secretary-General's study of the efficiency of the United Nations system in science and technology<sup>(3)</sup> cited estimates that the system committed about $45 million a year to the support of research institutes in developing countries, compared to the $3 billion which they were estimated to have spent on research and development in 1976. It found that, while the system had evolved extensive programmes in the agricultural sciences, results in industrial research had been disappointing. The limited funds and modest planning efforts had proved no match for the scale and complexity of the industrial technologies. The study also suggested that higher priority be accorded to strengthening consulting engineering design organizations in developing countries.

The operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme<sup>(2)</sup> proposed a number of activities in this area, under four headings.

First, to promote research and development and strengthen the ability to carry out research, it suggested the formulation and execution of national programmes and projects, the development of regional programmes in critical areas for development and the conduct of training programmes on advanced research techniques. Second, it suggested that closer links between research and development and production be promoted by improving the service orientation of research and development institutions, strengthening engineering and consulting services linked to applied research and development centres, establishing extension services, promoting linkages with the informal sector, setting up pilot plants and pioneer projects, strengthening linkages between universities and the production system, establishing mechanisms to commercialize technologies and technological services offered by developing countries, and promoting an exchange of experience among developing countries in linking research and development to the production system.

Third, the operational plan proposed that research and development activities and greater capability in the production system be promoted through fiscal and other incentives and through management training programmes. Fourth, to enable developed countries to contribute to the strengthening of research and development in developing countries, it suggested that twinning and other co-operative arrangements be established between institutions and programmes, that consortia of institutions on topics of concern to developing countries be established, and that developed countries increase their support for research and development on such topics.

The Advisory Committee, commenting on this area of the plan,<sup>(1)</sup> suggested that developing countries analyse their untapped industrial and agricultural potential and assess what could be done at current levels of science and technology capability. To strengthen the bridge between research and the production system, a system of incentives should be offered to researchers, and the roles of universities, industrial research associations and small groups of specialized entrepreneurs should be explored. Regional networks of research institutions should be encouraged and United Nations training activities should be linked with those of non-governmental scientific organizations. The creation and strengthening of engineering and consultancy services as well as extension services should be stressed. The Committee suggested that consortia of institutions from developed and developing countries be created to help establish research centres for specific programme areas in the least developed countries.

The Intergovernmental Committee, in establishing on 5 June 1981 the areas of concentration for the operational plan, selected two areas with regard to research and development: promotion of closer links between research and development and production, and promotion of research and development activities and greater technological capability in the productive system.<sup>(5)</sup>

International co-operation

United Nations organizations were directing considerable efforts to strengthening co-operation in science and technology among developing countries and between developing and developed countries (programme area VIII of the operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme), according to reports by the Secretary-General to the Intergovernmental Committee on the science and technology activities of the United Nations system.<sup>(4)</sup> Such activities at the regional level included the establishment of technology centres, the promotion of visits and meetings for exchanging and reviewing experience in technical fields, the organization of symposia and seminars, and the provision of scholarships and fellowships. Interregional links among technology centres were promoted. Several programmes encouraged co-operation between individual enterprises in developed and developing countries. Co-operative global activities included smallpox eradication, air navigation and safety programmes and the World Weather Watch, as well as international conferences.

In his study of the efficiency of the United Nations system in science and technology,<sup>(3)</sup> the Secretary-General concluded that many international scientific programmes and meetings were still oriented towards developed countries' science. Greater efforts were needed to assist the many developing countries having scientists but without effective organizations to participate in international scientific activity.

The operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action<sup>(2)</sup> proposed a number of measures to strengthen co-operation among developing countries and between them and developed countries. The first area encompassed: communication and information exchange, through strengthening policy and institutional support for intercountry co-operation, diversifying channels of communication, enhancing the scope and depth of information exchange, and holding seminars and other meetings; strengthening the capacity of institutions and enterprises to perform internationally, through co-operation between them, developing models of co-operative arrangements, legal and financial arrangements for co-operation in research and development, joint acquisition of technology, promotion of joint ventures, strengthening the multinational scope of national institutions, and co-operation between commodity groups; and co-operation in development projects with significant scientific and technological content.

With regard to co-operation between developing and developed countries, the plan proposed measures to increase the flow of information, to develop forms and institutional arrangements for co-operation (intergovernmental agreements, promotional measures to support co-operation among enterprises and institutions), and to orient and intensify co-operation through preferential treatment of the least developed countries and broadening the range of co-operating partners.

The Advisory Committee, commenting on this part of the operational plan,<sup>(1)</sup> suggested that, whenever possible, new co-operative activities be generated and maintained through existing regional and subregional mechanisms, both intergovernmental and non-governmental; and that mechanisms be devised capable of sustaining co-operation even during intervals of conflict among the partners.

In its resolution of 5 June 1981 on the operational plan, the Intergovernmental Committee established six areas of concentration in regard to international co-operation in science and technology: communication and exchange of information; strengthening the capacity of institutions and enterprises of developing countries to perform internationally; intergovernmental agreements for co-operation; strengthening cooperation between developed and developing countries in the application of science and technology to development; assessment and support of programmes of technical co-operation among developing countries (see below); and technology transfer among developing countries.<sup>(5)</sup>

Speaking in the General Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee during the debate on development and international economic co-operation, Egypt said co-operation among developing countries should not be enhanced at the expense of co-operation between them and developed countries. Mongolia thought it important to develop mutually profitable co-operation among countries with differing socio-economic systems. In Tunisia's view, while the establishment of technical and scientific capacity was primarily the duty of the countries concerned, international co-operation acted as a catalyst and had a multiplying effect on research and the transfer of technology. Romania noted that an international symposium on scientists and peace, held at Bucharest in September, had stressed the responsibility of scientists for the future of mankind and had set up an International Action Committee to prepare for a world congress of scientists in the service of peace (p. 141).

Resolution: <sup>(5)</sup>Intergovernmental Committee (report, A/36/37), 2(III), para. 2 (d), programme area VIII, 5 June.

Technical co-operation among developing countries

The High-level Committee on the Review of Technical Co-operation among Developing Countries (p. 463), on 7 June 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> recommended joint action and collaboration between developing countries to make maximum use of existing scientific and technological facilities, establish and strengthen regional training and research institutes and centres of excellence in important developmental areas, establish and promote councils of directors of research institutes, and encourage leaders of public and private industry to co-operate and exchange experience. The Committee invited developed countries and governing bodies in the United Nations development system to develop and strengthen training and research institutes, research and development infrastructure, and training in the management of co-operative research and development programmes. It reiterated its June 1980 decision urging support for national research and training centres of multinational scope,<sup>(3)</sup> and asked for a study on the co-operative exchange of skills.

The Committee for Development Planning, in its report to the Economic and Social Council on its March/April 1981 session,<sup>(2)</sup> suggested that developing countries give special attention to pooling their technical capabilities in order to accelerate the building of a stronger technological base for upgrading traditional domestic technologies, for developing more appropriate technologies to make fuller use of local resources, and for screening and adapting imported technologies. It also favoured greater use by developing countries of each other's professionals, consultancy firms, construction contractors and skilled workers.

Co-ordination in the UN system

WORK OF THE ACC TASK FORCE. The Task Force on Science and Technology for Development, set up in 1980 by the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC) as the mechanism of inter-agency co-operation in the implementation of tasks assigned to the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development,<sup>(4)</sup> held two sessions at Geneva in 1981.<sup>(2)</sup> At its first session, from 10 to 13 March, it reviewed draft proposals for the operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action (p. 734). At its second session, from 1 to 3 April, it discussed the draft study of the efficiency of the United Nations system in the field of science and technology (p. 750).

The Centre for Science and Technology for Development served as the secretariat of the Task Force for both sessions, and the Centre's Executive Director was appointed by ACC to be Chairman of the Task Force for one year.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL. In accordance with a June 1980 request of the Intergovernmental Committee, the Secretary-General submitted in May 1981 the first annual report on activities of the United Nations system in the field of science and technology for development, in the eight main programme areas outlined in the operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action.<sup>(1)</sup> The Intergovernmental Committee, on 5 June, noted this report with appreciation.<sup>(3)</sup>

Proposals for improved inter-agency co-ordination were included in the Secretary-General's report on efficiency of the United Nations system (p. 750).

Efficiency of the system

A study of the efficiency of the United Nations system in the field of science and technology for development was submitted by the Secretary-General to the General Assembly in May 1981, in accordance with a June 1980 decision of the Intergovernmental Committee, endorsed by the General Assembly in December 1980.<sup>(2)</sup>

The report<sup>(1)</sup> evaluated various programmes of the United Nations system in the eight programme areas of the operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action (p. 734) in terms of whether they contributed to the establishment of endogenous capacity for science and technology in developing countries and to the restructuring of international relations in science and technology. It concluded that, due in large part to the absence of a coherent strategy for the use of science and technology for development, United Nations organizations had developed activities in science and technology independently from each other, which resulted in a fragmented approach at the system level.

With the Vienna Programme providing a general strategy, the report saw a need for: a continuing commitment at the highest levels for launching the Programme as an integrated, system-wide effort; a frank acknowledgement of the inherently pragmatic nature of technical co-operation, including the need for progressive adjustment in focus and periodic redirection of efforts; and a continuing, well-supported, system-wide programme for review and assessment as a means of identifying successful approaches to the development of endogenous capacity and of reorienting those that encountered difficulties.

Based on these conclusions, the Secretary-General submitted six proposals. (I) Better methodologies were needed to ensure improved inter-agency co-ordination. (II) Efforts should be made to ascertain why the benefit drawn by Member States from the various United Nations programmes fell far short of what was desirable, to suggest steps for overcoming the difficulties and to find ways to encourage the participation of a much greater proportion of developing countries in international science and technology programmes, (III) Ways should be sought to expand and diversify the methods employed by the United Nations system, such as by making the scientific community in developing countries more active in planning and executing programmes, and examining the possibility of setting up an international institute for science policy, training and study. (IV) Evaluation and assessment of programmes must be continuous so that adjustments could be made taking account of experience and changing needs. (V) An integrated data base describing all approved programme activities in the United Nations system should be established. (VI) Despite the lack of comparable procedures for programme planning and budgeting, there was scope for undertaking interorganizational joint planning and formulation of global, intersectoral and sectoral programmes, with the ACC Task Force on Science and Technology for Development playing a useful role in promoting such activities.

Taking note with appreciation of the Secretary-General's report, the Intergovernmental Committee, on 5 June<sup>(3)</sup> welcomed his proposals and recommended that the General Assembly request the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation, with the assistance of the Executive Director of the Centre for Science and Technology for Development and the ACC Task Force, to study them and submit action-oriented recommendations with cost estimates to the Committee in 1982, taking into account the areas of concentration established by the Committee. The Assembly took the requested action on 17 December.<sup>(4)</sup>

UN machinery

Intergovernmental Committee

The Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development, established by the General Assembly in 1979 to identify priorities in the Vienna Programme of Action and to monitor science and technology activities and programmes in the United Nations system,<sup>(2)</sup> held its third session in 1981 in New York, the first part from 26 May to 5 June and the second part from 25 to 31 August.<sup>(1)</sup> This followed a resumed second session on 29 January, also in New York, solely to appoint the 28 members of the Advisory Committee on Science and Technology for Development (p. 752).

At the May/June meetings, the Committee approved the operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action (p. 735). The August meetings were mainly devoted to the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development (p. 738). At both parts of the session, the Committee considered issues left unresolved by the 1979 United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development (p. 735).

Relations with international organizations

The Intergovernmental Committee, on 26 May 1981, invited to participate as observers at its future sessions the intergovernmental, non-governmental and other organizations which had been invited to participate in the 1979 Conference on Science and Technology for Development and its Preparatory Committee.<sup>(3)</sup>

Recognizing that arrangements for consultation with non-governmental organizations (NGOs) were an important means to further United Nations purposes and principles, the Intergovernmental Committee, on 5 June, <sup>(2)</sup> adopted a procedure for their participation, specifying that approved organizations could designate representatives, submit written statements and, subject to the Committee's approval, make oral statements. The Secretary-General was requested to submit in 1982 a paper on criteria and arrangements for the participation of NGOs.

The important role of international, regional and national NGOs in applying science and technology to development was stressed by the Advisory Committee, which suggested that their commitment to development be harnessed in the implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action.<sup>(1)</sup>

Report of the Committee

The report of the Intergovernmental Committee on its 1981 meetings <sup>(3)</sup> was considered by the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly.

The Council, on 21 October, authorized the Secretary-General to transmit the report directly to the Assembly.<sup>(1)</sup> The Assembly, on 17 December, <sup>(2)</sup> took note of the report, endorsed the Committee's recommendations, requested follow-up work to the Secretary-General's study of the efficiency of the United Nations system in science and technology for development (p. 750), authorized the establishment of ad hoc panels by the Advisory Committee (p. 752) and requested updated proposals on the work programme of the Centre for Science and Technology for Development (p. 753).

The Assembly decision was taken, without vote, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, which approved the text in like manner on 10 December, on a draft by a Vice-Chairman.

In the Second Committee's debate on development and international economic co-operation, several speakers expressed support for the work and recommendations of the Intergovernmental Committee, while the USSR, recalling that it had not supported the creation of the Committee, said it had achieved practically nothing and had simply referred issues to the Second Committee. Senegal suggested that the Intergovernmental Committee's annual sessions be divided into a one-week phase in which experts would participate, followed by three days in which countries would be represented at a high level.

Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/36/694/Add.5) without vote, 10 December (meeting 47); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/36/L.155); agenda item 69 (e).

Science and technology for development

At its 103rd plenary meeting, on 17 December 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, decided:

(a) To take note of the report of the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development on its resumed second session, its third session and its resumed third session and to endorse the recommendations contained therein;

(b) To take note of the report of the Secretary-General on the basic study of the efficiency of the United Nations system in the field of science and technology for development and to request the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation, with the assistance of the Executive Director of the Centre for Science and Technology for Development and the Task Force on Science and Technology for Development of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination, to study the proposals contained in paragraphs 218 to 225 of the report and to submit action-oriented recommendations, with estimates of costs, to the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development at its fourth session, taking into consideration the areas of concentration established by resolution 2(III) of 5 June 1981 of the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development;

(c) To authorize the Advisory Committee on Science and Technology for Development, as recommended by the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development in its resolution 3(III) of 5 June 1981, to constitute a maximum of four ad hoc panels during the next two years, in accordance with the terms of reference of the Advisory Committee, on the understanding that no more than two ad hoc panel meetings should be held each year and that those meetings should be not more than one week in duration, and to request the Advisory Committee to provide the Intergovernmental Committee, at its fourth session, with specific information on the constitution and work of the ad hoc panels;

(d) To request that the updated proposed programme of work for 1982-1983 for the Centre for Science and Technology for Development, taking into account in particular the areas of concentration described in resolution 2(III) of the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development, be presented to the Intergovernmental Committee at its fourth session.

Advisory Committee

Appointment of members

On 29 January 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the Intergovernmental Committee appointed 28 members nominated by the Secretary-General to its advisory body on science and technology for development, established pursuant to a June 1980 resolution of the Committee,<sup>(2)</sup> and decided to call that body the Advisory Committee on Science and Technology for Development. It expressed its understanding that the Secretary-General, when submitting future nominations, would give priority to experts from countries whose candidates had not been appointed. (For list of members, see APPENDIX III.)

Activities of the Committee

The Advisory Committee held its first session in New York from 23 to 27 February 1981. <sup>(1)</sup> It concentrated on the draft operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action on Science and Technology for Development (p. 734), and also made suggestions for future work on assessment of levels of scientific and technological attainment (p. 744), on the role of non-governmental organizations (p. 751) and on its own work programme (see below).

Work programme

In February 1981, the Advisory Committee recommended that it hold three sessions during 1981-1982, each no longer than two weeks; that a meeting of its Bureau (officers) be convened between each session; that its meetings normally be held at United Nations Headquarters or the headquarters of one of the regional commissions; and that it constitute ad hoc panels (see below).<sup>(1)</sup>

The Intergovernmental Committee, on 5 June,<sup>(2)</sup> decided that the Advisory Committee should meet once early in 1982 before the Intergovernmental Committee, immediately preceded by a meeting of the Bureau, and that it should normally meet at United Nations Headquarters. The Advisory Committee was requested to submit recommendations in 1982 on ways of providing advice on specific scientific and technological problems confronting the various regions. The Intergovernmental Committee also decided to refer to the Advisory Committee the question of science and technology and the future (p. 745), invited it to consider women and science and technology (p. 993), and recommended that it be authorized to constitute panels.

Ad hoc panels. On the recommendation of the Advisory Committee in February 1981<sup>(1)</sup> and the Intergovernmental Committee on 5 June,<sup>(2)</sup> the General Assembly, on 17 December,<sup>(3)</sup> authorized the Advisory Committee to constitute up to four ad hoc panels during 1982-1983, with not more than two one-week panel meetings to be held each year. The Assembly requested the Advisory Committee to inform the Intergovernmental Committee in 1982 on the constitution and work of the panels.

In proposing this course, the Advisory Committee stated that the panels would enable up to seven specialists, including some Committee members, to give in-depth consideration to special activities and projects. They would normally be chaired by a Committee member.

Resolution and decision: Res.: <sup>(2)</sup>Intergovernmental Committee (report, A/36/37), 3(III), sect. IV, para. 4, 5 June. Dec.: <sup>(3)</sup>GA, 36/442, para. (c), 17 Dec. (p. 751).

UN Centre for Science and Technology for Development

During 1981, its second year of operation, the United Nations Centre for Science and Technology for Development, established by the General Assembly in 1979,<sup>(3)</sup> carried out analysis and research, engaged in co-ordination and monitoring of activities by the United Nations system, reviewed financial arrangements for science and technology, promoted national and regional activities, and provided services to the Intergovernmental Committee and the Advisory Committee.

After submitting proposals for the operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action, the Centre began work, at the Intergovernmental Committee's request, on specific proposals for activities in the areas of concentration selected by the Committee (p. 734). Other topics of study included levels of attainment of scientific and technological development among countries (p. 744), science and technology and the future (p. 745), the proposed establishment of an international labour compensatory facility in connection with the brain drain (p. 757), women and science and technology (p. 992), an early-warning system on the effects of technological developments, and advice on specific scientific and technological problems confronting the regions.

The Centre served as the secretariat for the inter-agency Task Force on Science and Technology for Development (p. 749), worked on follow-up to the study on the efficiency of the United Nations system in science and technology (p. 750), and provided comments to the United Nations Interim Fund for Science and Technology for Development (p. 742) on projects under its appraisal.

The national and regional activities of the Centre included reactivation and institutionalization of the network of national focal points on science and technology originally formed for the 1979 United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development, information exchange with the focal points, publication of a newsletter entitled UPDATE and other information dissemination activities, and liaison with the international community of scientists and technologists. The Centre also initiated steps to identify non-governmental organizations (NGOs) which could assist in implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action (p. 751).

Information on these activities was contained in reports of the Secretary-General to the Intergovernmental Committee covering the period from the establishment of the Centre through March 1981<sup>(1)</sup> and for the year beginning April 1981.<sup>(2)</sup>

On 5 June,<sup>(4)</sup> the Intergovernmental Committee noted with satisfaction that the Centre planned to establish a network for information exchange between the focal points and the Centre, and asked for an updated work programme for 1982- 1983 (see below).

Work programme for 1982-1983

The programme of work of the Centre for 1982-1983 included the substantive servicing of the first four ad hoc panels of specialists of the Advisory Committee on Science and Technology for Development, to be convened in 1982 and 1983 (p. 752). It also included first steps towards a global information network for science and technology for development, and envisaged regional meetings of national focal points and the publication of a survey of NGOs.

The Intergovernmental Committee, on 5 June 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> took note of the proposed programme, saying it should be updated in the light of the Committee's decisions and should take into account the areas of concentration of the operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action (p. 734). The Committee recommended that the updated work programme be presented to the General Assembly for endorsement and that the necessary resources be given to the Centre.

The Assembly, on 17 December, requested that the updated proposed programme be presented to the Committee in 1982.<sup>(2)</sup>

Speaking in the debate on development and international economic co-operation in the Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, Senegal expressed hope that the Centre's organization would be gradually improved so that it could take charge of implementation of the various aspects of the Vienna Programme of Action.

Technology transfer

The work of United Nations organizations on development and transfer of technology, in specific sectors and in global aspects, was described in reports by the Secretary-General to the Intergovernmental Committee on the activities of the United Nations system in science and technology (p. 743).<sup>(7)</sup>

The reports noted that several organizations were concerned with the regulation and streamlining of the flow of technology from industrialized to developing countries, with the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) playing a central role in the restructuring of the legal environment for technology transfer through negotiations on a code of conduct (p. 755). UNCTAD also rendered advice to Governments through its Advisory Service on Transfer of Technology (p. 755). Developing countries were being assisted in the formulation of national policies and plans, and the establishment of national, subregional and regional centres for the development and transfer of technology. The transfer of industrial technology was the particular concern of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) (p. 755).

The Secretary-General's study of the efficiency of the United Nations system in science and technology for development,<sup>(6)</sup> submitted to the General Assembly in May 1981 (p. 750), found that the enormous capacities of the United Nations system for technology transfer were being underutilized. It concluded that all United Nations activities in this area could readily be integrated with the objectives of the Vienna Programme of Action on Science and Technology for Development.

The operational plan for implementation of that Programme,<sup>(4)</sup> approved by the Intergovernmental Committee in June (p. 735), suggested a number of activities in regard to the choice, acquisition and transfer of technology (programme area III of the plan). With regard to choice of technology, it proposed national action, supported by assistance from the United Nations system, to relate such choices to development objectives and policies, to establish information bases and support decision-making, and to develop the technological capability of user institutions and producers. Concerning the acquisition of technology, it suggested action to strengthen national legislation and regulatory institutions, study the impact of corporate and contractual arrangements, strengthen technological project appraisal by financial institutions, make use of the purchasing power of the State for domestic technological development, develop skills, establish national centres, and carry out a variety of subregional and regional activities. With respect to patterns of international relations, the plan envisaged continuing negotiations on codes and conventions, action to apply international agreements, and the development of international forums to improve relations.

The Advisory Committee on Science and Technology for Development, commenting on this aspect of the operational plan,<sup>(3)</sup> stated that emphasis should be placed not only on choice, acquisition and transfer but also on the development of indigenous skills and capabilities for innovation and mastery of technologies, as well as on the development of the technologies themselves. The Committee held it necessary to analyse the technology options available to developing countries, internally and externally, with a view to making the most appropriate choices. It suggested that an analysis be undertaken to categorize countries according to their stages of development, so as to differentiate their technological needs. Regional technology centres should focus on programmes which permitted the participation of all countries in the region. Codes and conventions on technology transfer should anticipate the changing patterns of trade and transfer not only between countries but also between corporations.

The Intergovernmental Committee, in selecting on 5 June the areas of concentration for the operational plan, defined six areas in relation to the choice, acquisition and transfer of technology: strengthening the information base in order to help developing countries before choosing a particular technology; strengthening planning capacity in science and technology; support to national enterprises of developing countries in the choice, acquisition and transfer of technology; promotion and support of subregional, regional, interregional and international co-ordination among national centres; training in negotiation and management of science and technology agreements; and strengthening links between users and producers of technology.<sup>(12)</sup>

General Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, the Congo stressed the need for the developing countries to strengthen their technological and scientific capabilities through the transfer of technologies selected by them. In Egypt's view, two main objectives could be achieved if developing countries were able to use advanced technology: solutions to development problems could be brought within reach more quickly, and developing countries could make use of time that would otherwise have been spent on developing the technology.

Albania said that, in the face of efforts by developing countries to develop their scientific and technological capabilities, the imperialist Powers were doing their utmost to preserve their monopoly in that sphere, using it as a political weapon to achieve their expansionist aims. In the opinion of the United Arab Emirates, talk of technology transfer for development had not met with a positive response, since the industrialized countries had been unwilling to fulfil their obligations and upheld monopolistic activities and restrictive practices; redeployment of industry from developed to developing countries could facilitate technology transfer.

Speaking for the Nordic States, Norway considered that the Intergovernmental Committee should not deal with technology transfer, to avoid duplication and allow it to concentrate on other important questions.

UNCTAD ACTIVITIES. The Trade and Development Board of UNCTAD, on 20 March,<sup>(13)</sup> requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General, in co-operation with UNIDO and other United Nations bodies, to convene up to two meetings of governmental experts on food processing and on capital goods and industrial machinery, in order to identify and examine in depth the problems and issues concerning the transfer, application and development of technology in those sectors, taking into account the interrelationships between the technological needs and development objectives of the developing countries. The meetings, open to all UNCTAD members, were to make recommendations in 1982 to the Board's Committee on Transfer of Technology. The Board further requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General to continue to prepare studies on main issues relating to the transfer, application and development of technology in other sectors and areas of critical importance to developing countries.

On 9 October, the Board added a third meeting to this series, on energy technology

The Board's actions were welcomed by the General Assembly in its resolution of 16 December on UNCTAD.<sup>(11)</sup> The Assembly urged Governments and international organizations to participate in the meetings.

On 20 March 1981,<sup>(8)</sup> the Board took note of the report of the Committee on Transfer of Technology on its 1980 session and endorsed several of its resolutions and decisions.<sup>(15)</sup>

The UNCTAD Advisory Service on Transfer of Technology continued to assist regional and subregional technology centres in formulating and implementing technology policies and training technology policy-makers, with increasing emphasis on promoting interregional linkages. Technical assistance and advisory services were extended to over 30 developing countries in Africa, Asia and Latin America. Sectoral activities were a major feature of the Service's work, particularly in the pharmaceutical, food processing, capital goods and energy sectors. The Service co-operated with regional technology centres and networks in developing regions, as well as with other regional bodies. Three regional workshops on various aspects of technology transfer and development and three in-house training courses were held in 1981. Two on-the-job training courses were organized in Latin America and India.<sup>(9)</sup>

The UNCTAD training programmes were made possible by a combination of sources, including the Swedish International Development Authority, various country programmes of the United Nations Development Programme, direct financing from requesting Governments or specific institutions in developing countries, and fellowships sponsored by the United Nations Institute for Training and Research.

The UNCTAD secretariat issued a study on planning the technological transformation of developing countries, based on case studies of a number of countries, to serve as a guide for developing countries in formulating their own strategies.<sup>(2)</sup>

UNIDO ACTIVITIES. Among its activities in the development and transfer of industrial technology (p. 593), UNIDO surveyed and disseminated information on indigenous technologies and supported the development of appropriate technologies via reports, training and technical co-operation. It assisted developing countries in the establishment of national registries for technology transfer, and provided information, expertise and training on the negotiation of licensing agreements. Its Technology Advisory Services provided short-term advisory services to developing countries in the negotiation of contracts for the transfer of industrial technology, while its Industrial and Technological Information Bank provided information on selection of technology.

A UNIDO-sponsored National Seminar on Technology Transfer Management and Industrial Development (Georgetown, Guyana, 16-21 February) sought to create awareness of technology transfer problems and opportunities among decision-makers and the general public, to pave the way for setting up institutions which would facilitate technology policy formulation and implementation, and to serve as a model for wider use in other Caribbean countries.<sup>(1)</sup>

After receiving a progress report from the secretariat on UNIDO activities relating to the development and transfer of technology,<sup>(10)</sup> the Industrial Development Board, on 30 May,<sup>(5)</sup> commended the UNIDO Executive Director on progress in the development and transfer of technology and drew attention to the need to strengthen secretariat arrangements in order to increase the technological capabilities of developing countries. The Board urged the secretariat to co-operate closely with the United Nations agencies and other bodies dealing with the subject. It requested the General Assembly, in allocating resources to activities in this sphere, to take into account the consensus reached by the Board. In that consensus, the Board, on 20 May, included industrial technology as one of the priority areas of UNIDO (p. 576).

Draft code of conduct

The United Nations Conference on an International Code of Conduct on the Transfer of Technology, initially convened in 1978 under the auspices of UNCTAD,<sup>(5)</sup> was unable in 1981 to reach agreement on the remaining issues involved in a code to govern technology transfer transactions across national borders. The General Assembly, in December, established an Interim Committee of the Conference to seek agreement on those issues.

CONFERENCE ACTIVITIES. The fourth session of the Conference on a code of conduct was held at Geneva from 23 March to 10 April.

The Conference decided that outstanding issues should be examined by the President's Contact Group as the central body for negotiation. Discussions and negotiations were held by the Group on two chapters of the draft code.

Chapter 9, on applicable law and settlement of disputes, concerned the choice of the national law to govern contractual relations between parties to a technology transfer transaction and the nature of dispute settlement mechanisms, including arbitration and conciliation. Chapter 4, on restrictive practices, would prohibit a number of business practices defined as adversely affecting the international flow of technology. The President submitted informal proposals covering all the outstanding issues in the draft code. No agreement could be achieved on any of these issues, however.

At the close of the session, the Conference requested that the draft code of conduct<sup>(1)</sup> be transmitted to the General Assembly and requested the Assembly to take measures for further action on a code, including reconvening the Conference.<sup>(2)</sup>

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. Recognizing the importance of the unresolved issues and the need to reach agreement on them, the General Assembly, by a resolution of 16 December,<sup>(4)</sup> decided to establish, as a special measure to accelerate the finalization of the code, an Interim Committee of the Conference to consider and seek solutions to the outstanding issues and make proposals to the Conference. The Committee was to be open to all UNCTAD members and would follow the rules of procedure of the Conference. The Interim Committee was allocated four weeks of meetings and was to be convened by the UNCTAD Secretary-General in the first quarter of 1982. He was invited to follow the Committee's work, with a view to convening the Conference as soon as practicable, preferably not later than the last quarter of 1982 or the first quarter of 1983.

The Assembly adopted the resolution without vote, following similar approval by the Second Committee on 20 November of a text submitted by a Vice-Chairman, based on informal consultations on a draft by Algeria on behalf of the Group of 77.<sup>(3)</sup>

The adopted text differed in several respects from the Group's draft. A reference in paragraph 1 to agreement reached on specific chapters of the code was deleted in favour of a general reference to progress achieved. In paragraph 2, the Assembly recognized the need to reach agreement on the unresolved issues without specifying, as the initial draft stated, that agreement should be reached before the next Conference session. In paragraph 3 of the original, the Assembly would have decided to establish an Interim Committee to make proposals with a view to ensuring the final adoption of the code at the fifth Conference session; by the revised version, the Committee was established as a special measure to accelerate finalization of the code and to make proposals to the fifth session. In paragraph 6, the Assembly would have invited the UNCTAD Secretary-General to convene the fifth session in the last quarter of 1982, while the adopted text said it should be convened as soon as practicable and preferably not later than the last quarter of 1982 or the first quarter of 1983.

Stating its position in the Committee, Poland, also on behalf of Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Mongolia, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, said the socialist States supported the resolution because it was aimed at expediting the elaboration of an international code which had been delayed by the Western States; they hoped the Interim Committee would discharge its mandate within the prescribed time and would not entail an increase in expenditures.

Introducing the original draft in the Committee, Algeria said it had been formulated because of the concern of the developing countries at the inability of the Conference to conclude its work and the fact that several issues remained outstanding.

Regret or concern that the code of conduct had not been finalized was expressed by several others, such as Ecuador, India, Mongolia and Norway, the last speaking for the five Nordic States. Ecuador added that the developing countries regarded the code as essential if they were to secure freer and fairer access to the technology they needed. China said there should be no delay in the establishment of the code.

United Nations Conference on an International Code of Conduct on the Transfer of Technology

The General Assembly,
Recalling its resolutions 3201 (S-VI) and 3202 (S-VI) of 1 May 1974, containing the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order, 3281 (XXIX) of 12 December 1974, containing the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, and 3362 (S-VII) of 16 September 1975 on development and international economic co-operation.

Recalling also its resolution 35/56 of 5 December 1980, the annex to which contains the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Recalling further its resolutions 32/158 of 19 December 1977, 34/195 of 19 December 1979 and 35/60 of 5 December 1980 on an International code of conduct on the transfer of technology,

Noting with concern that the fourth session of the United Nations Conference on an international Code of Conduct on the Transfer of Technology did not conclude the work on the adoption of a code of conduct on the transfer of technology, and noting particularly the lack of progress in reaching agreement on several issues outstanding in the draft code of conduct,

1. Takes note of the progress achieved in the negotiations on the draft international code of conduct on the transfer of technology;

2. Recognises the importance of the unresolved issues and the need to reach agreement on them;

3. Decides, as a special measure to accelerate the finalization of the code, to establish an Interim Committee of the United Nations Conference on an International Code of Conduct on the Transfer of Technology to consider and seek solutions to the outstanding issues and make proposals thereon to the Conference at its fifth session;

4. Decides also that the Interim Committee of the United Nations Conference on an International Code of Conduct on the Transfer of Technology shall be open for the participation of all States members of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and shall meet as necessary within the four weeks allocated to it, and that its rules of procedure shall be those of the Conference itself;

5. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to convene the Interim Committee in the first quarter of 1982 and to submit to the Committee all appropriate documentation to assist it in its work;

6. Invites the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to follow closely the progress of work in the Interim Committee, with a view to convening the United Nations Conference on an International Code of Conduct on the Transfer of Technology as soon as practicable and preferably not later than the last quarter of 1982 or the first quarter of 1983.

Laws and regulations

Recognizing the importance of national regulations and policies dealing with the transfer and development of technology as a means of strengthening scientific and technological capability, particularly of the developing countries, the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board, on 9 October 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General to submit at the 1982 session of the Committee on Transfer of Technology a report with proposals on common approaches to legislation and regulations dealing with the transfer, application and development of technology in developing countries. The proposals were to take into account the special needs of developing countries, particularly the least developed.

Brain drain

Measures to deal with the negative effects of the reverse transfer of technology- the so-called brain drain of skilled personnel from developing to developed countries- were considered in 1981 by the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board and the General Assembly (see below).

In addition, in his proposals for the operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action on Science and Technology for Development, the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation recommended that action be taken to reduce and eliminate the migratory trends of scientists, engineers, managers and technicians. The Secretary-General, in a report to the General Assembly, provided guidelines for the establishment of an international labour compensatory facility, to help reduce the adverse effects of large-scale migrations of economically active persons (p. 759).

Group of Experts

The Trade and Development Board, on 20 March 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> authorized the UNCTAD Secretary-General to convene, no earlier than three months after a comprehensive study had been submitted to States for comments, an intergovernmental group of experts to examine the feasibility of measuring human resource flows. The Board decided that the group's report should be submitted in 1982 to the Committee on Transfer of Technology.

Noting the Board's resolution with satisfaction, the General Assembly, on 16 December,<sup>(2)</sup> urged Governments and intergovernmental organizations, particularly those of developing countries, to participate in the meeting of the group of experts, and asked that a progress report on the group's work be included in the Board's 1982 report. The UNCTAD Secretary-General and the Director-General of the International Labour Organisation (ILO) were requested to continue to keep the problem of the reverse transfer of technology under review.

The Assembly adopted the resolution without vote, following similar approval on 20 November, by the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, of a text submitted by a Vice-Chairman on the basis of informal consultations on a draft by Algeria for the Group of 77.<sup>(1)</sup>

According to the original text by the Group of 77, which was later withdrawn, the Assembly would have requested only the UNCTAD Secretary-General to keep under review the problem of reverse transfer of technology and would have requested him instead of inviting the Board to report on the group's work. This draft also included a request to the United Nations Secretary-General to assist the UNCTAD Secretary-General in implementing the Board's resolution.

Introducing the original text in the Committee, Algeria said it reflected the concern of the developing countries about a situation that was hampering their development by depriving them of badly needed skilled manpower; the Group of 77 believed that the damage suffered needed to be assessed before any arrangement for compensation was considered.

Poland, also on behalf of Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Mongolia, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, made the following points: they supported the claims of the developing countries concerning the flow of skilled manpower; United Nations measures should aim principally at obliging countries which attracted skilled manpower from the developing countries to compensate them; stopping the brain drain would help the developing countries to introduce progressive reforms and escape from the influence of transnational corporations; implementation of the resolution should be financed from within the existing budget, and the group of experts should be geographically balanced.

Speaking during the Committee's debate on development and international economic co-operation, the German Democratic Republic said that, between 1961 and 1972, the losses accruing to the developing countries from the brain drain had totalled $60 billion, whereas the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom had gained $46 billion, or more than they had given in official development assistance in the same period; the UNCTAD Secretary-General's study should cover possible international, regional and national action to regulate and contain the brain drain and the developing countries' right to compensation from those capitalist industrialized countries which profited from it. The Syrian Arab Republic called for effective action to offset the harmful effects of the brain drain on the economies of developing countries.

Reverse transfer of technology

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 3201 (S-VI) and 3202(S-VI) of 1 May 1974, containing the Declaration and the Programme of

Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order, 3281(XXIX) of 12 December 1974, containing the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, and 3362(S-VII) of 16 September 1975 on development and international economic co-operation,

Recalling also its resolution 35/56 of 5 December 1980, the annex to which contains the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Recalling further its resolutions 32/192 of 19 December 1977 and 33/151 of 20 December 1978, entitled "Reverse transfer of technology", as well as its resolutions 34/200 of 19 December 1979 and 35/82 of 5 December 1980 on development aspects of the reverse transfer of technology,

Recalling the Economic Declaration adopted by the Sixth Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at Havana from 3 to 9 September 1979,

Bearing in mind the report of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development on its fifth session, particularly resolution 102(V) of 30 May 1979, the Vienna Programme of Action on Science and Technology for Development and the resolutions and decisions of the Trade and Development Board on the reverse transfer of technology, in particular decision 193(XIX) of 20 October 1979 and resolutions 219(XXI) of 27 September 1980 and 227(XXII) of 20 March 1981,

Bearing in mind also the proposals contained in the Arusha Programme for Collective Self-Reliance and Framework for Negotiations, adopted by the Fourth Ministerial Meeting of the Group of Seventy-seven,

Expressing its concern regarding the adverse effects of the reverse transfer of technology on the capacity and potential of scientific and technological development in the developing countries and, thus, on their economic and social development,

Considering that the flow of skilled manpower from developing countries constitutes a reverse transfer of technology,

Aware that the search for solutions to the reverse transfer of technology, which has serious economic, political and social implications for developing countries, is an important concern of the international community in its efforts towards the establishment of the new international economic order,

Convinced that the United Nations system could play a role in the alleviation of the adverse effects of the reverse transfer of technology,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the establishment of an international labour compensatory facility, prepared in accordance with paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 34/200;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to keep under continued review the co-ordination of work on the question of reverse transfer of technology in the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the International Labour Organisation and other relevant United Nations organizations;

3. Notes with satisfaction Trade and Development Board resolution 227(XXII), by which the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development is authorized to convene, no earlier than three months after a comprehensive study of the feasibility of measuring human resource flows has been submitted to member States for comments, an intergovernmental group of experts to examine the feasibility of measuring human resource flows;

4. Urges all Governments and appropriate intergovernmental organizations, particularly those of developing countries, to participate actively in the meeting of the group of experts referred to in paragraph 3 above;

5. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the Director-General of the International Labour Organisation to continue to keep under review, as necessary, the problem of the reverse transfer of technology;

6. Invites the Trade and Development Board to include in the report on its twenty-fifth session a progress report on the work of the intergovernmental group of experts.

Other activities

In his proposals for the operational plan for implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action (p. 734),<sup>(1)</sup> the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation recommended that action be taken to foster measures to reduce and eliminate the migratory trends of scientists, engineers, managers and technicians, and provide incentives for the return of those who had already emigrated. The proposals also envisaged studies by Governments and others to identify the factors affecting such migration and the possibilities of controlling them, action by the United Nations system to promote the return of highly qualified persons to the developing country of origin, and assistance by the United Nations and other international sources to help developing countries secure the utilization of skilled personnel living abroad and to promote the establishment of an international labour compensatory facility.

In its resolution of 5 June 1981 on the operational plan,<sup>(5)</sup> the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development identified the elimination of causes for reverse transfer of technology, the utilization of the expertise of expatriate nationals and the provision of incentives for the return of scientists and skilled personnel as one area of concentration in connection with the development of human resources for science and technology (p. 746).

By a report submitted to the General Assembly in September 1981<sup>(2)</sup> in accordance with a December 1980 Assembly resolution,<sup>(3)</sup> the Secretary-General suggested guidelines for the establishment of an international labour compensatory facility, proposed by Crown Prince Hassan bin Talal of Jordan in a 1977 address to the International Labour Conference. The aim of the scheme would be to help reduce the adverse economic and social effects of large-scale migration of economically active persons to developed and developing countries, and to ensure an orderly process of regulating migratory labour. National policies, the report stated, appeared insufficient to deal with the complexities of the problem unless reinforced by collective international efforts.

Under this plan, countries receiving economically active emigrants-excluding developing countries whose gross national product or average per capita income was below certain levels-would contribute to the facility an amount determined by taking into account such factors as the proportion of immigrants in the total labour force as well as specific categories thereof, and their gross value to the economy. Portions of the contributions would be made available to the emigration country for its development programmes, in the form of grants, fellowships, equipment and reimbursable loans. The assistance would be related to the adverse impact on the emigration country caused by the emigration as well as the cost of rearing, educating and training the emigrant.

The General Assembly, by its resolution of 16 December on the reverse transfer of technology, took note of the Secretary-General's report and requested him to keep under continued review the co-ordination of work on the question in UNCTAD, ILO and other United Nations organizations.<sup>(4)</sup>

Explaining its position on the resolution in the Assembly's Second Committee, the United States said that, by joining in the consensus, it was not signifying its support of the Secretary-General's report, which dealt with the desirability, rather than the feasibility, of establishing an international labour compensatory facility.

Speaking during the Committee debate on development and international economic co-operation, the German Democratic Republic stated that the Secretary-General should present proposals to intensify co-ordination of activities by the United Nations system in regard to the brain drain. Sri Lanka stressed the need for international action and thought the guidelines in the Secretary-General's report appeared to provide a sound basis for formulating detailed proposals and arrangements.

Information science

Preparations for the Conference on informatics

In relation to the application of information science to development, the Economic and Social Council, by a resolution of 22 July 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> recommended that Member States collaborate in the preparatory activities and achievement of the objectives of the Second Intergovernmental Conference on Strategies and Policies for Informatics, scheduled for 1983. The Council invited the United Nations and its specialized agencies to collaborate actively with the Intergovernmental Bureau for Informatics in the preparations, and invited the Secretary-General to submit a progress report to the Council at a future session.

The Council adopted the eight-nation draft resolution without vote. The text was introduced by Ethiopia, also on behalf of Algeria, Burundi, Cuba, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mexico, Nicaragua and the United Republic of Tanzania.

Voicing reservations on the resolution, the Federal Republic of Germany said it lacked information on the activities of the Intergovernmental Bureau for Informatics and did not see how the Secretary-General could properly be invited to submit a progress report on preparations for a conference that was not a United Nations conference. Canada also had difficulties with the request for a report, which it assumed to be permissive rather than prescriptive.

Stating its approval of the draft, Mexico emphasized the major role played by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) in the First Intergovernmental Conference on Strategies and Policies for Informatics, held in 1978, and expressed the hope that UNESCO would participate in and help organize the Second Conference and would continue its support for the Intergovernmental Bureau. A UNESCO representative told the Council that UNESCO considered the proposed Second Conference premature since it was still implementing the decisions of the First Conference.

Second intergovernmental Conference on Strategies and Policies for Informatics

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolution 1978/43 of 1 August 1978 relating to the application of the techniques of informatics to development, which called for a report on the results of the First intergovernmental Conference on Strategies and Policies for informatics, held at Torremolinos, Spain, from 28 August to 6 September 1978,

Recalling further the recommendations of the First Conference,

Marine science and technology

CONFERENCE ON THE LAW OF THE SEA. On 28 August 1981, Pakistan submitted to the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea (p. 127) a revised draft resolution on behalf of the Group of 77, by which the Conference would: call on Member States to determine priorities in their development plans for the strengthening of their marine science, technology and ocean services; call on the developing countries to establish programmes for the promotion of technical co-operation among themselves in those fields; urge the industrialized countries to assist; recommend that multilateral funding agencies augment and co-ordinate their operations in those areas; and recommend that the United Nations system expand assistance to developing countries and co-ordinate their efforts in implementing marine science and technology programmes.<sup>(1)</sup>

On the same day, the Conference decided, on the suggestion of the President, to postpone action on the proposal until 1982.

EXPERT GROUP MEETING. An Expert Group Meeting on Links between Producers and Users of Marine Technologies, convened by the United Nations Department of International Economic and Social Affairs in New York from 14 to 17 December 1981, proposed measures to promote marine resources development by improving technology transfer.<sup>(2)</sup> Among them were: resource surveys; co-ordination and support by the United Nations through meetings, information dissemination and the compilation of directories of consultants and companies; promotional efforts by the United Nations, including the refining of aids for contracting and commissioning marine technology, visits to installations in other countries, and promoting training of personnel and public awareness of the potential of marine technology; creation of national or regional marine resources institutes in developing countries; and action by technology producers to train users' personnel, collaborate with marine resources institutes, and provide them with information on updated marine technologies and trends in marine development.

Chapter XIII

Social and cultural development

Efforts to extend to all people the benefits of development and a role in the development process occupied the attention in 1981 of United Nations bodies concerned with social development.

Social development and welfare topics included the social aspects of United Nations development activities, national experience with social change and with co-operative movements, social surveys, strengthening social welfare activities and the work of the United Nations Research Institute for Social Development (UNRISD). Crime prevention and criminal justice were examined in relation to development.

Most of these topics were dealt with by the Commission for Social Development, which held its twenty-seventh session at Vienna, Austria, from 9 to 19 February.<sup>(1)</sup> The Economic and Social Council acted on the Commission's recommendations in May.

The Council gave initial consideration to recommendations for strengthening the capacity of the United Nations to deal with social development issues, made in 1980 by its Ad Hoc Working Group on the Social Aspects of the Development Activities of the United Nations. It endorsed the Group's view on the need for the United Nations system to devise a better conceptual framework for an integrated approach to development problems, and decided to continue consideration of specific measures suggested by the Group.<sup>(6)</sup> The General Assembly, in December, invited the Council to consider implementation of the recommendations in 1982.<sup>(11)</sup>

In November, the Assembly called for further United Nations work on national experience in achieving far-reaching social and economic changes for social progress.<sup>(8)</sup> Regional commissions and specialized agencies were invited to promote the co-operative movement in order to improve popular well-being.<sup>(7)</sup>

The Economic and Social Council asked the Secretary-General to report on emerging social issues of international concern connected with changes in the world economic situation.<sup>(4)</sup> It also urged Governments to exploit social welfare structures fully so as to make the best use of available resources for serving the needs of all people.<sup>(5)</sup>

ducted research on food systems and society, improving development data, popular participation in development, and refugee settlement (p. 770).

The Assembly addressed the question of crime in November by urging the Department of Technical Co-operation for Development and the United Nations Development Programme to increase support to technical assistance programmes on crime prevention and criminal justice.<sup>(9)</sup>

With regard to cultural development, the Assembly called in November for several steps to promote the restitution of cultural property to the country of origin and prevent illicit trafficking in cultural property.<sup>(1b)</sup> The Council urged Governments and institutions to intensify efforts to expand people's access to culture and cultural amenities for promoting balanced social development.<sup>(3)</sup>

The Commission, the Council and the Assembly took action on a number of other social topics, including the social aspects of rural development (p. 399), disabled persons (p. 795), studies on migrant workers (p. 886), women in development (p. 985), a draft declaration on adoption and foster placement of children (p. 1012), youth (p. 1014) and aging persons (p. 1022).

Social development and welfare

General aspects

Social aspects of UN development activities

The Commission for Social Development and the Economic and Social Council began considering in 1981 the recommendations made in 1980 by the Ad Hoc Working Group on the Social Aspects of the Development Activities of the United Nations,<sup>(9)</sup> proposing ways of improving the Organization's capacity to deal with social development issues. In May 1981, the Council approved some of the general views expressed by the Group and in July it postponed further consideration to 1982. In December 1981, the General Assembly invited the Council to give due consideration to implementation of the Group's recommendations.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. On 6 May<sup>(5)</sup> the Economic and Social Council endorsed the Working Group's view that the United Nations system needed a better conceptual framework for an integrated approach to development problems, that economic and social development were different facets of a unified approach, and that the United Nations Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs should pay special attention to popular participation in development, local-level action and social welfare policies. The Council requested that the Centre and other Secretariat bodies be enabled to play an appropriate role in technical co-operation (p. 770), and asked the Secretary-General to take administrative measures to implement the approach described in the resolution so that the Centre could implement its mandates within existing resources. It decided to continue considering at its second regular session of 1981 the Group's suggestions to improve the Council's work in this area, together with a report it requested from the Secretary-General on implementation of the resolution.

The resolution originated in the Commission for Social Development, which approved it on 17 February.<sup>(3)</sup> The Council adopted it without vote with an oral amendment by France, approved by the Council's Second (Social) Committee, which recommended the text on 29 April, also without vote. The amendment affected paragraph 4, by which the Council recommended that the General Assembly consider taking co-ordinated measures to ensure an integrated approach to development in its work. The amendment specified that such measures should be both interregional and intersectoral.

This amendment replaced an earlier amendment by France<sup>(2)</sup> which would have added a paragraph expressing hope that the United Nations Department of Technical Co-operation for Development could mobilize research and analysis resources to ensure intersectoral and interregional co-ordination and a permanent liaison with governmental and non-governmental organizations concerned with development. In addition, Australia proposed but later withdrew an amendment<sup>(1)</sup> asking the Secretary-General to bring the resolution and the Working Group's report to the attention of the Working Group of Governmental Experts on the Right to Development, established by the Commission on Human Rights (p. 922).

In July, the Secretary-General submitted a report<sup>(4)</sup> on implementation of the Council's May resolution. The report described action to strengthen inter-agency co-operation on social aspects of development, to evolve a better conceptual framework for an integrated approach to development, to promote activities relating to popular participation in development, to involve the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs in technical co-operation activities, and to enable it to implement its mandates within existing resources.

The Council took note of the report on 23 July<sup>(7)</sup>. Also on that date,<sup>(8)</sup> it decided to postpone until its first regular session of 1982 further consideration of the Working Group's suggestions to improve the Council's work, and to consider at the same time the Secretary-General's comments on the feasibility and resource implications of the Group's main recommendations.

Both decisions were adopted, without vote, on the recommendation of the Third (Programme and Co-ordination) Committee, which approved the first one without vote on 3 July on an oral proposal by the Chairman and the second without objection on 10 July as proposed and orally revised by Italy. The revision specified that consideration of the Working Group's proposals and the Secretary-General's comments would take place at the first session of 1982.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 16 December 1981, the General Assembly adopted without vote a resolution<sup>(6)</sup> noting that the Working Group's report would be discussed by the Economic and Social Council in 1982 and inviting the Council to consider the implementation of the recommendations in the report. The Assembly also requested a report by the Secretary-General in 1982 on implementation of the Council's decisions.

The resolution, introduced by Yugoslavia and also sponsored by Algeria, Bangladesh, India, Italy, the Netherlands, the Philippines and Romania, was approved without vote by the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee on 30 November, as revised by the sponsors.

In related action during 1981, the Council and the Assembly decided to continue regular consideration of a unified approach to analysis and planning for socio-economic development (p. 395).

ceptual framework for its activities related to social development;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to enable the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs and other relevant bodies of the Secretariat to play their appropriate role in providing substantive support in their areas of competence for technical co-operation activities undertaken on behalf of the United Nations at the request of the Member States by the Department of Technical Co-operation for Development;

Social aspects of the development activities of the United Nations

The General Assembly.

Taking note of Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/24 of 6 May 1981 on the social aspects of the development activities of the United Nations,

Mindful of the fact that the recommendations contained in the report of the Ad Hoc Working Group on the Social Aspects of the Development Activities of the United Nations will be further discussed at the first regular session of the Economic and Social Council in 1982, in accordance with Council decisions 1981/175 and 1981/176 of 23 July 1981, in which the Secretary-General was requested to prepare and submit comments on the feasibility, programme and co-ordination implications, as well as the resource implications, of the main recommendations submitted by the Ad Hoc Working Group,

1. Invites the Economic and Social Council, in the light of its above-mentioned decisions, to give at its first regular session in 1982 due consideration to the Implementation of the recommendations contained in the report of the Ad Hoc Working Group on the Social Aspects of the Development Activities of the United Nations;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session, under the agenda item entitled "Report of the Economic and Social Council", a report on the implementation of the relevant decisions of the Economic and Social Council pertaining to the recommendations contained in the above-mentioned report.

Medium-term plan for 1984-1989. The Commission for Social Development considered in February 1981 the sections of the proposed United Nations medium-term plan for 1984-1989 concerned with social development, including crime. The plan, prepared by the Secretary-General, emphasized the further elaboration of an integrated approach to development, as well as examination of the social impact of economic policies and of the economic impact of social policies, national and international. Methods for reconciling increased popular participation with demands for efficient economic management would be studied. Global synthesis and analysis of socio-economic trends and the development and application of tools for socio-economic policy formulation and analysis would continue. The programme would be designed to enhance the capacity of all members of society to participate effectively in development. Subprogrammes would focus on popular participation and on promoting the interests of youth, the aging and the disabled. Crime prevention and criminal justice would also be a concern.

On 17 February 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the Commission requested the Secretary-General to recast portions of the draft in the light of comments by Commission members and to submit them to members and observers for further comments.

Activities in 1979-1980. On 17 February 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the Commission for Social Development took note of the Secretary-General's progress report on 1979-1980 activities of two units of the United Nations Secretariat- the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs and the Office for Development Research and Policy Analysis.(2)

National experience with social change

On 9 November 1981, the General Assembly adopted, by a recorded vote of 126 to 1, with 1 abstention, a resolution<sup>(1)</sup> calling for further United Nations work on the national experience of developed and developing countries in achieving far-reaching social and economic changes for social progress. Reaffirming the right of every State to choose its economic and social system without outside interference, the Assembly invited Member States to give special attention to the social aspects of development so as to increase the well-being of the population based on its full participation in development and a fair distribution of benefits. The Secretary-General was asked to arrange regular interregional and regional seminars to study national experience and to prepare a report on that subject, to be submitted to the Assembly in 1983 through the Commission for Social Development and the Economic and Social Council.

The resolution was adopted on the recommendation of the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, which approved the 10-nation draft on 26 October, as orally revised, by a vote of 133 to 1, with 2 abstentions. Paragraph 4 of the resolution, which called for the holding of seminars on national experience, was adopted by 93 votes to 1, with 30 abstentions; the vote was requested by Australia, which expressed concern at the financial implications of holding seminars that were not certain to yield practical results.

The resolution incorporated oral amendments made in Committee by several countries. On a proposal by Pakistan, supported by Oman, the word "all" was added to a preambular paragraph which expressed the Assembly's desire to secure a speedy removal of obstacles to economic and social progress. In the list of obstacles which followed, the phrase "military, political and economic intervention and pressures, foreign aggression and occupation or alien domination" replaced "aggression, foreign occupation or domination". This rewording resulted from several separate proposals. First, Pakistan, supported by Oman, proposed the words "military intervention, foreign aggression and occupation or alien domination"; the words "political and economic" were added by Mongolia to qualify "intervention". Second, "pressures" was added by Mongolia, following suggestions by Morocco to add a reference to economic blockade or to political and economic pressures.

In the following preambular paragraph, the Assembly expressed conviction that peaceful co-existence and co-operation among States, as well as disarmament measures, created favourable international conditions for the socio-economic development of all countries, in particular developing ones. The mention of developing countries was added in an oral revision by the sponsors, and the word "all" was inserted before "countries" at the suggestion of Oman.

In paragraph 1, the reference to outside interference was supplemented by the phrase "in whatever form it takes", on a revision by Mongolia sub-amended by Morocco. This superseded a suggestion by Pakistan to add the words "in any form, including military intervention".

In paragraph 3, in an oral revision by the sponsors, Member States were invited rather than called upon to give attention to social aspects of development in their national development plans.

Australia proposed amending paragraph 5 so that the report requested of the Secretary-General would take into account "the consequences of military intervention". The sponsors saw the proposal as inconsistent with the intent of the paragraph; however, they added a reference to "safeguarding national independence".

Mongolia, which introduced the resolution, said it was especially important to choose the right form of development. Therefore, the United Nations could and should promote an exchange of experience in the implementation of profound social and economic change.

Explaining its vote against the resolution, the United States said it was opposed to proposals which meant additional expenditure. The United Kingdom, speaking for the European Community (EC) members, said they had voted in favour but with reservations about asking for additional reports and believed that discussing the issue of national experience as a separate item would further overload the Third Committee's agenda without leading to productive debate or resolutions.

Among those which voted in favour, the USSR believed that the resolution would facilitate United Nations work for social development and that its subject-matter was important to economic and social progress and to guaranteeing the economic independence of States.

In the Committee's debate on social items, Bulgaria said social progress was not feasible unless economic growth was combined with changes in the social structure and standards of living. For the Byelorussian SSR, the task of choosing the correct strategy for social development could be lightened by studying and adapting to local conditions the historical experience of other countries which had made or were making far-reaching social and economic changes ensuring rapid development and a steady rise in living standards. A country's national experience could serve as an inspiration for other countries, particularly those whose development had been hampered by imperialist, colonialist and neo-colonialist policies, said Czechoslovakia.

The Ukrainian SSR regarded the State as the principal instrument in achieving far-reaching social and economic changes. The USSR supported the work of the United Nations in encouraging an exchange but said the methodology employed by the Secretariat in compiling documents on economic and social development was tendentious and inaccurate, resulting in overlooking the experience of real socialism.

Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR and the USSR were disappointed that Assembly and Economic and Social Council decisions to hold regional seminars on national experience with social change had not been implemented.

National experience with co-operative movements

A report by the Secretary-General on national experience in promoting the co-operative movement<sup>(1)</sup> was the focus of General Assembly discussion on that topic in 1981. The report, circulated in March, showed that the establishment and growth of co-operatives was important for promoting development, and described the role co-operatives played in such areas as agriculture, rural savings and credit, small-scale enterprises, housing, consumer protection and social services. It contained suggestions for national and international policies to encourage economic, financial, technical and legislative aid for co-operatives. It suggested a strengthening of the Joint Committee for the Promotion of Aid to Co-operatives (COPAC), composed of several United Nations and non-governmental organizations. The report concluded that co-operatives provided a framework for people to articulate their needs and assume responsibility for management of society, and were especially appropriate for less-advantaged population groups.

On 6 May,<sup>(3)</sup> the Economic and Social Council noted the Secretary-General's report and transmitted it to the Assembly. This decision, adopted without vote, was recommended by the Council's Second (Social) Committee, which approved it in like manner on 1 May on an oral proposal of the Chairman.

On 9 November, the Assembly, reaffirming that co-operatives played an important role in the socio-economic development of developing countries, adopted a resolution<sup>(2)</sup> by a recorded vote of 123 to 1, with 4 abstentions, in which regional commissions and specialized agencies were invited to promote the co-operative movement in order to improve popular well-being. The Assembly asked the Secretary-General to prepare a comprehensive report on national experience in promoting the co-operative movement. This was to pay special attention to: the role of co-operatives in social and economic development, particularly in rural areas; participation of peasants, women and youth; the ability of co-operatives to increase their members' material welfare; the interrelationship between agrarian reform and agricultural co-operatives; and difficulties of countries in establishing and developing co-operatives.

The resolution was recommended by the Assembly's Third Committee, which approved it on 26 October by a vote of 129 to 1, with 6 abstentions. The 16-nation draft was introduced by Mongolia.

The text was orally revised by the sponsors to change a reference to one of the aspects to be considered by the Secretary-General's report from "participation of landless peasants" to “participation of peasants, including landless peasants”.

Explaining its vote against the resolution, the United States said it objected to promoting political objectives that went far beyond the exchange of national experience in the co-operative movement and it opposed proposals that meant the expenditure of additional funds. Canada did not think another report was needed so soon. The United Kingdom, speaking on behalf of the EC members, said that, though voting for the resolution, they felt the Committee should exercise restraint in asking for reports.

In the Committee's debate on social questions, Argentina and the Niger stressed the importance of co-operatives in achieving development of the least-favoured sectors. The German Democratic Republic said the co-operative system there had safeguarded fundamental rights, aligned the incomes of co-operative farmers with those in other parts of the economy and brought far-reaching changes in the position of women in villages. To contribute to co-operative development, said Guyana, the population had to understand the movement's ideology; education in co-operativism helped children to grasp opportunities for useful citizenship. India trusted that the co-operative movement would continue to receive support.

Uganda said it had formulated policies to re-activate the co-operative movement, which had disintegrated between 1971 and 1979 because State corporations had failed to provide due remuneration for the primary produce of co-operative societies. According to Yemen, one of the ambitions of its co-operative movement was to realize an international system based on joint co-operation among peoples.

The Congo believed that the Secretary-General's report did not devote enough attention to the poorer countries. Mongolia thought the report did not show the importance of co-operatives in carrying out internal changes to increase popular well-being and overcome colonial vestiges in agriculture. The Ukrainian SSR stated that United Nations documents should present separately the experiences of capitalist and socialist countries.

Finland thought that international and bilateral development co-operation agencies should increase technical, managerial and material assistance for co-operative development, particularly to less-advantaged groups, and that the role of COPAC should be strengthened. The work of COPAC was praised by Pakistan. France said it would be wrong to presume that the experience of one country could be transplanted to another and cautioned against hastily systematizing the lessons drawn in the Secretary-General's report.

National experience in promoting the co-operative movement

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 33/47 of 14 December 1978 on national experience in promoting the co-operative movement and other relevant resolutions referred to in that resolution,

Desiring to promote the implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Reaffirming that co-operatives play an important role in the socio-economic development of developing countries,

Convinced that the exchange among countries of national experience relating to the co-operative movement plays an essential role in strengthening the co-operatives for the benefit of their members and in overcoming difficulties in the development of various co-operatives,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on national experience in promoting the co-operative movement;

2. Invites the regional commissions and specialized agencies concerned to make further efforts with a view to promoting the co-operative movement as an effective instrument for the improvement of the well-being of the population;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare, in consultation with Member States and relevant organizations of the United Nations system, a comprehensive report on national experience in promoting the co-operative movement, paying special attention, inter alia, to the following aspects:

(a) Role of co-operatives in overall social and economic development, particularly in rural areas;

(b) Participation of peasants, including landless peasants, as well as of women and youth in co-operatives;

(c) Ability of co-operatives to increase the material welfare of their members;

(d) Interrelationship between agrarian reform and agricultural co-operatives;

(e) Difficulties faced by countries in the establishment and development of co-operatives and their experience in overcoming them;

4. Further requests the Secretary-General to submit, through the Commission for Social Development and the Economic and Social Council, the above-mentioned report to the General Assembly at its thirty-eighth session for discussion under the item entitled "National experience in achieving far-reaching social and economic changes for the purpose of social progress".

Social surveys

A note by the Secretary-General on aspects of social development in the 1980s,<sup>(1)</sup> submitted in January 1981 to the Commission for Social Development, identified recent trends and issues emerging as future concerns. The period was described as one of international economic and political uncertainty, characterized by a loss of confidence in the ability of societies to direct socio-economic change and the functioning of the world economy. There seemed to be a hiatus between the capacity of the State to penetrate all aspects of life through modern techniques of information and control, and its capacity to solve economic, social and political problems. One challenge of the decade was to gain a better understanding of the evolution of development problems and of how they became resistant to familiar policies.

In a resolution adopted without vote on 6 May,<sup>(3)</sup> based on the Commission's consideration of the Secretary-General's note,<sup>(2)</sup> the Economic and Social Council, concerned at the growing disparity in living conditions and income levels between people in developing and developed countries, asked him to report in 1983 on emerging social issues of international concern connected with changes in the world economic situation. The Council also requested him, in his periodic reports on the world social situation, to address emerging social issues of international concern in connection with changes in the world situation, giving special attention to the relationship between disarmament and development and bearing in mind that resources released by implementing disarmament measures should be channelled into the development of all countries and should contribute to bridging the economic gap between developed and developing countries.

The resolution was based on a draft approved by the Commission on 17 February. The Council adopted it with an amendment by the Byelorussian SSR as orally sub-amended by Canada. The Council's Second Committee approved the amendments and recommended the text without vote on 29 April.

The changes affected paragraph 2, by which the Council asked the Secretary-General to pay attention in his reports to emerging social issues of international concern in connection with changes in the world situation. The amendment by the Byelorussian SSR asked that special attention be given to the disarmament-development relationship, bearing in mind that the resources released through disarmament "help to narrow the economic gap" between developed and developing countries. The Byelorussian SSR accepted a Canadian sub-amendment stating that such release of resources "should contribute to the bridging of" the economic gap. Canada withdrew a sub-amendment which would have added the words "and the full enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms" between "disarmament" and "development".

Emerging social issues of International concern The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling the Declaration on Social Progress and Development contained in General Assembly resolution 2542(XXIV) of 11 December 1969, the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order contained in General Assembly resolutions 3201 (S-VI) and 3202(S-VI) of 1 May 1974, and the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States contained in General Assembly resolution 3281 (XXIX) of 12 December 1974, Recalling also the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade contained in the annex to General Assembly resolution 35/56 of 5 December 1980.

Concerned at the growing disparity in conditions of living and income levels between people in the developed and developing countries,

Concerned also at the adverse effects that unfavourable world economic trends may have on levels of living and social conditions of people, particularly in developing countries,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare a report on emerging social issues of international concern in connection with the changes in the world economic situation, and to submit that report for consideration by the Economic and Social Council at its first regular session of 1983 through the Commission for Social Development at its twenty-eighth session;

2. Also requests the Secretary-General to pay full attention in his reports on the world social situation to emerging social issues of international concern in connection with the changes in the world situation, giving special attention to the relationship between disarmament and development and bearing in mind also that the resources released as a result of the implementation of disarmament measures should be channelled into the economic and social development of all countries and should contribute to the bridging of the economic gap between developed and developing countries.

Strengthening social welfare activities

On 6 May 1981, the Economic and Social Council adopted without vote a resolution<sup>(3)</sup> urging Governments to exploit existing social welfare structures to make the best use of available resources for serving the needs of all segments of the population. Concerned at the slow progress in strengthening developmental social welfare policies and programmes, the Council urged the Secretary-General to reinforce, within existing resources, related Secretariat research and operational activities. He was also asked to submit every two years to the Commission for Social Development comparative interregional analyses of the deliberations and recommendations of regional conferences on social welfare, and to report to the Commission in 1983 on progress achieved.

The resolution was based on a draft recommended by the Commission on 17 February<sup>(1)</sup> and approved without vote by the Council's Second Committee on 29 April.

The Commission also examined a progress report by the Secretary-General on steps taken to strengthen United Nations developmental social welfare policies and programmes.<sup>(2)</sup> The report analysed activities undertaken in 1979-1980 by the United Nations Secretariat and the regional commissions, by three United Nations social welfare research and training institutes, and by the United Nations Research Institute for Social Development. The report concluded that there was a lack of agreement on what constituted social welfare and social development, making comparative analysis and the sharing of accomplishments difficult. The Secretary-General suggested synthesizing the recommendations of intergovernmental bodies as a common basis for global mandates for research, training and operational activities in developmental social welfare. The Commission took note of the report on 18 February.<sup>(4)</sup>

Strengthening developmental social welfare policies and programmes

The Economic and Social Council,

Concerned at the slow rate of progress of implementation of its resolution 1979/18 of 9 May 1979 on strengthening developmental social welfare policies and programmes,

Convinced of the value of developmental social welfare as an investment in the process of development

Mindful of the importance of the nine regional conferences of ministers responsible for social welfare held since the 1968 International Conference of Ministers Responsible for Social Welfare and their Contribution to the elaboration of strategies for social welfare in the context of overall development,

Convinced that the conclusions and recommendations of those conferences should constitute a valuable resource for Governments in all regions as well as for the deliberations of the Commission for Social Development,

1. Reaffirms its resolution 1979/18, in which it requested the Secretary-General to strengthen the Secretariat's activities relating to policy, planning, training and operational aspects of social welfare, including those of relevance to integrated rural development, having in mind the guidelines established by the General Assembly with regard to development;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Commission for Social Development at its biennial sessions comparative interregional analyses of the deliberations and recommendations of regional conferences on social welfare and related areas;

3. Urges Governments to exploit to the full extent existing social welfare structures so as to make best use of available resources for serving the needs of all segments of the population;

4. Urges the Secretary-General to reinforce Secretariat research and operational activities related to developmental social welfare policies and programmes within existing resources;

5. Requests the regional commissions to report to the Commission for Social Development at its biennial sessions on social welfare and social development activities;

6. Further requests the Secretary-General to report on the progress achieved to the Commission for Social Development at its twenty-eighth session.

Technical co-operation

Requests by Governments for funding by the United Nations Development Programme for projects dealing with social issues decreased in 1981. In connection with the International Year of Disabled Persons (1981) (p. 795), advisory missions were undertaken at the request of 30 developing countries and regional meetings were organized. Activities regarding youth (p. 1014) emphasized interregional advisory services to provide Governments with policy alternatives and institution-building techniques. In crime prevention and criminal justice, technical co-operation continued through regional institutes, seminars and training courses. The United Nations Department of Technical Co-operation for Development (DTCO) continued support for the Centre for Research and Training for Community Development in Saudi Arabia, which provided advisory services and training in neighbouring Gulf States.

The Economic and Social Council addressed technical co-operation in its resolution of 6 May on social aspects of United Nations development activities.<sup>(1)</sup> It requested the Secretary-General to enable the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs and other Secretariat units to provide substantive support to technical co-operation activities undertaken by DTCD.

Resolution: <sup>(1)</sup>ESC, 1981/24, para. 10,6 May (p. 763).

UN Research institute for Social Development

The United Nations Research Institute for Social Development (UNRISD) continued research in 1981 on food systems and society, improving development data, popular participation in development, and refugee settlement.

The food systems project, concerning policies to ensure food security, encompassed research in China, Nicaragua and Senegal. Work on improving development data continued with projects on measuring and analysing socio-economic development and on setting up a methodology for monitoring change in socio-economic conditions and for examining interrelationships in the development process at a local level.

Regarding popular participation, expert meetings were held at Bangkok, Thailand; Bogotá, Colombia; Bombay, India; and Managua, Nicaragua. The aim was to translate general questions on participation into precise, researchable issues relevant to development. Field work was conducted in Latin America and the Caribbean and in Asia.

Research on refugee settlement consisted of sociological field studies of refugee integration in East Africa. A joint project with the United Nations Environment Programme on perceptions and attitudes in relation to environmental and development measures was suspended in 1981.

Expenditures of UNRISD in 1981 totalled $1,353,125, while income for the period came to $706,643.

Contributions to UNRISD. During 1981, UNRISD received from 11 countries contributions totalling $423,731 (see table below).

On 6 May, the Economic and Social Council, acting without vote, invited Governments to contribute or consider increasing their contributions.<sup>(3)</sup> The resolution was approved without vote by the Council's Second (Social) Committee on 29 April. It was based on a draft recommended on 16 February by the Commission for Social Development,<sup>(1)</sup> which considered a report of the UNRISD Board on its activities from 1 November 1978 to 31 October 1980.<sup>(2)</sup>

United Nations Research Institute for Social Development
The Economic and Social Council,

Having considered the report of the Board of the United Nations Research Institute for Social Development on its activities during the period from 1 November 1978 to 31 October 1980.

Recognizing the importance of research on social issues for the formulation and implementation of integrated development plans and policies, promoting participation of all segments of society in the development process and an equitable distribution of the benefits therefrom,

Considering the functions of the United Nations Research Institute for Social Development and the important contribution made by the Institute in this area,

Recognizing that the Institute has complied with the recommendations of the Commission for Social Development in its resolution 10(XXV) of 3 February 1977, particularly with regard to its catalytic role and its support for research by national research bodies.

Stressing the need to provide the Institute with the necessary financial means to ensure the continuation of its work.

Considering the appeal made by the Secretary-General to the Commission for Social Development at its twenty-seventh session in the same respect,

1. Expresses its appreciation to Governments providing financial support to the United Nations Research Institute for Social Development;

2. Invites those Governments that have not yet done so to make financial contributions to the Institute according to their possibilities and, in the case of those Governments that actually support the Institute, to examine the possibility of increasing their contributions, in both cases preferably on a regular basis or a project basis.

Crime

As requested by the General Assembly, the Secretary-General submitted a report in August 1981<sup>(1)</sup> on implementation of the Assembly's December 1980 resolution<sup>(2)</sup> calling for measures to strengthen international co-operation in crime prevention and criminal justice. The report covered new perspectives for international co-operation, described steps to strengthen regional and subregional activities, discussed the United Nations Trust Fund for Social Defence (p. 774), summarized new administrative arrangements and mentioned activities by non-governmental organizations (NGOs).

The report said the Secretariat was doing research on crime prevention and criminal justice in relation to development, and especially on the emergence of new types of criminal activity in the context of changing socio-economic structures. Countries with the lowest and highest crime rates were being studied in a search for factors relating to crime and delinquency and strategies for prevention in the development context. United Nations institutes on crime in Asia and the Far East and in Latin America were engaged in related research, including a Latin American study of criminal victimization for a project to promote community participation in crime prevention. The Secretary-General was to convene an expert group meeting in October to examine ways to improve the data base on crime trends and crime prevention strategies.

Meetings during the year included an international seminar in crime prevention and sound national development (23 February-20 March), organized by the United Nations Asia and Far East Institute for the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, and a meeting on establishing an institute in Africa (Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, December). Information on United Nations activities had been disseminated by NGOs.

Human rights aspects of criminal justice were the subject of several actions during 1981. The General Assembly, on 9 November, condemned summary or arbitrary executions (p. 898). On 25 November, it invited comments on a proposal aimed at the ultimate abolition of capital punishment through the drafting of a second optional protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (p. 899), and requested further consideration of the protection of persons detained on grounds of mental ill-health (p. 906). The Assembly continued work on a body of principles for the treatment of prisoners and detainees (p. 900) and requested further comments on a draft Code of Medical Ethics for health personnel in prisons (p. 902). Work proceeded on a draft convention against torture and other cruel treatment (p. 901) and a study on discrimination in the administration of criminal justice (p. 889).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 9 November, the General Assembly adopted, by a recorded vote of 135 to none, with 1 abstention, a resolution<sup>(4)</sup> urging the United Nations Department of Technical Co-operation for Development (DTCD) and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) to increase support to technical assistance programmes in crime prevention and criminal justice. The Assembly asked the Secretary-General to implement the Caracas Declaration adopted in 1980 by the Sixth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders<sup>(3)</sup> and to prepare for the Seventh Congress (in 1985). The Committee on Crime Prevention and Control, in preparing the agenda for the Seventh Congress, was called on to give attention to current and emerging trends with a view to defining new guiding principles for crime prevention and criminal justice in the context of development needs. Members States were invited to make their criminal justice systems more responsive to changing socio-economic conditions.

The resolution was recommended by the Assembly's Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, which approved the 29-nation draft on 26 October, as orally amended and revised, by a vote of 136 to none, with 1 abstention.

The draft was introduced by Venezuela, which made some oral revisions. The fifth preambular paragraph was revised to describe the new international economic order as "one of the principal guarantees for the creation of better conditions so that all peoples may attain a decent life" rather than as "designed to achieve development and guarantee a decent life for all". In paragraph 2, concerning the context for considering crime prevention, the article "a" was replaced by "the" before "new international economic order".

The sponsors accepted an oral amendment by Somalia changing "the" to "their" in paragraph 3, by which Member States were invited to make their criminal justice systems responsive to socio-economic change. The sponsors also accepted Somalia's proposal to change paragraph 4, on technical assistance, so as to urge DTCD and UNDP to "encourage" technical co-operation among developing countries (TCDC) rather than simply support TCDC programmes. A drafting change by Cyprus and Oman was also incorporated.

Explaining its abstention in the vote, the United States said the resolution limited consideration of crime prevention and criminal justice to an economic development context and suggested that eliminating crime depended on restructuring the world economic system. Making a similar point, the United Kingdom, speaking for the European Community members, did not consider development needs to be the only criteria for defining guiding principles in this area. Turkey voted for the resolution with reservations regarding paragraph 2, stating that, though it believed in a relationship between crime and socio-economic development, the issue was too complex to be related in all cases to economic factors.

In the Committee's debate on various social questions, Austria said crime prevention and control were related to socio-economic issues and should be placed in the perspective of overall development planning. Zaire said fighting crime must be a part of each country's development strategy, requiring increased international co-operation.

Bulgaria stated that crimes relating to the abuse of economic and political power were alarming and typical of capitalist societies. Czechoslovakia said its criminal policy was oriented towards education and rehabilitation, and the involvement of all State and other organizations, as well as individuals, in preventing crime. To fight criminality, the educational role of the family, the school and society must be strengthened, Romania stated. The Ukrainian SSR said rising crime was not the inevitable consequence of development; in societies where there was no room for the exploitation of man by man or for the alienation of the individual from society, there was no reason for the emergence of crime.

Several countries commented on topics in connection with the United Nations work programme on crime. India said that the problem of crime victims should be studied, along with the impact of economic development on crime prevention and criminal justice. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya suggested that United Nations congresses on crime consider improving United Nations information services on the question, making technical expertise available to Member States, intensifying co-ordination and emphasizing the role of the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control. Nepal welcomed Secretariat studies on the 10 countries with the highest and the 10 with the lowest crime rates.

The United Kingdom urged a more realistic work programme for the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control, with agreed priorities. The United States said the United Nations should give attention to narcotic drug abuse, drug trafficking and crime, and to the relationship between youth unemployment and vulnerable aged victims as factors in crime growth. Venezuela was pleased that the United Nations would elaborate measures to assist States in developing crime prevention policies and programmes in the context of national planning, and stressed the need to improve information machinery on crime prevention and criminal justice.

Papua New Guinea remarked that social imbalance and economic disparity contributed to the increasing crime rate and that the root causes had to be detected to prevent it. Uganda voiced its commitment to restoring the rule of law and ensuring the security and property of all residents there; it expressed appreciation for plans to authorize United Nations assistance to Uganda in that connection (p. 939).

Crime prevention and criminal justice and development

The General Assembly,

Concerned at the escalation of crime and violence in many parts of the world,

Conscious of the forms and dimensions crime has assumed in the context of socio-economic development, and the increasing difficulties encountered,

Stressing the vital contribution that the United Nations Congresses on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders make to improving the quality of life,

Mindful that in the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, contained in the annex to General Assembly resolution 35/56 of 5 December 1980, the Assembly declared that the ultimate aim of development was the constant improvement of the well-being of the entire population on the basis of its full participation in the process of development and the fair distribution of the benefits therefrom,

6. Calls upon the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control, entrusted with the preparation of the United Nations Congresses on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, to give particular attention, in the formulation of the agenda of the Seventh Congress, to current and emerging trends in crime prevention and criminal justice, with a view to defining new guiding principles for the future course of crime prevention and criminal justice. In the context of development needs and the goals of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade and a new international economic order, taking into account the political, economic, social and cultural circumstances and traditions of each country and the need for crime prevention and criminal justice systems to be consonant with the principles of social justice;

Committee on Crime Prevention and Control

On 18 February 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> the Commission for Social Development noted the report of the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control on its sixth session (September 1980).<sup>(7)</sup> Regarding the Committee's recommendation that it hold its seventh session in 1981 instead of 1982, the Commission drew attention to an Economic and Social Council resolution of 1973<sup>(2)</sup> to the effect that its subsidiary bodies should meet biennially, and a 1979 decision<sup>(4)</sup> that there could be no departures from the biennial cycle following adoption of the meeting calendar.

On 6 May 1981, the Economic and Social Council noted the Committee's report and approved the provisional agenda for its seventh (1982) session, as recommended by the Committee.<sup>(5)</sup> By the same decision, adopted without vote, the Council requested the Secretary-General to submit to it in 1982 a statement on preparatory work for the Seventh Congress on crime. The decision was recommended without vote by the Council's Second (Social) Committee on 1 May, as orally proposed by the Chairman.

The Secretary-General, in a note to the Second Committee,<sup>(1)</sup> had proposed that the Council not take any decisions relating to preparatory work for the Seventh Congress until he submitted a statement on that work, including programme budget implications.

On 21 October 1981, the Council added an item on arbitrary or summary executions to the provisional agenda for the Committee's 1982 session.<sup>(6)</sup>

UN Trust Fund for Social Defence

In 1981, the United Nations Trust Fund for Social Defence supplied $378,217 to the United Nations Social Defence Research Institute (UNSDRI). The Trust Fund was established pursuant to a 1965 resolution of the Economic and Social Council<sup>(1)</sup> to strengthen United Nations work in social defence.

UNSDRI focused mainly on developing countries, including research on juvenile criminality and social maladjustment in selected countries, and preparation of reports and publications on specific themes. Its 1981 expenditures, financed from intergovernmental and government grants, totalled $532,000.

In his report to the General Assembly on United Nations activities concerning crime prevention and criminal justice (p. 771),<sup>(3)</sup> the Secretary-General said he would be in a better position to strengthen regional and subregional crime prevention activities if the level of contributions to the Trust Fund were to increase.

The Assembly, on 17 December,<sup>(1)</sup> took note of a note by the Secretariat stating its intention of adding the Trust Fund to the list of programmes and funds included within the scope of future United Nations pledging conferences for development activities.<sup>(2)</sup>

Cultural development

Cultural participation

On 6 May 1981, the Economic and Social Council adopted without vote a resolution<sup>(2)</sup> by which it urged Governments and private and public institutions to intensify efforts to expand people's access to culture and cultural amenities for promoting balanced social development. It called on States to protect and develop cultural values as social and spiritual energy for authentic national development and as mankind's common heritage. It appealed to nations to create cultural values which enhanced mutual friendship and to establish better social relations in the world, particularly in mass culture.

The resolution was recommended by the Commission for Social Development on 16 February<sup>(1)</sup> and was approved without vote by the Council's Second (Social) Committee on 29 April.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/17

Adopted without vote Meeting 14 6 May 1981

Approved by Second Committee (E/1981/57) without vote, 29 April (meeting 11); draft by Commission for Social Development (E/1981/26); agenda item 10.

Social aspects of the access to culture

The Economic and Social Council,

Mindful of mankind's lofty ideals enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations.

Recalling the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights of 16 December 1966.

Recalling also the Declaration on Social Progress and Development,

Convinced of the importance of the role culture has to play in meeting the common needs of all peoples, and in raising the quality of their lives,

Recognizing the relationship between the cultural progress of peoples, their co-operation, understanding and friendship, and world peace,

Recognizing also that cultural values represent a basic component of the identity of nations, which promotes understanding of their respective cultures and their values, and that full utilization of the cultural heritage is an indispensable condition of each nation's self-affirmation,

Convinced that every person, without distinction as to race, colour, sex, language, religion, nationality, ethnic origin, family or social status and political conviction, has the right of access to cultural values,

Aware that unless special Institutional forms of national assistance are established, it will soon not prove possible to overcome the legacy of long-standing backwardness and negligence,

1. Reaffirms that cultural development is one of the most important factors of social progress;

2. Calls upon States to pursue continuous efforts to protect and further develop cultural values as social and spiritual energy for authentic national development and as mankind's common heritage;

3. Appeals to all nations to create cultural values which enhance friendship among them and to establish better social relations in the world, in particular in mass culture;

4. Commends the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization for its record of achievement thus far in the field of access to culture, including, in particular, the reduction of illiteracy, raising the level of general education and the protection and further development of cultural values;

5. Urges all Governments and other public and private institutions, both national and international, to intensify their organizational, intellectual and financial efforts with a view to expanding as effectively as possible wide access of all people to culture and cultural amenities for promoting a balanced social development.

Restitution of cultural property to the country of origin

The Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) reported in November 1981 on the work of that organization's Intergovernmental Committee for Promoting the Return of Cultural Property to its Countries of Origin or its Restitution in Case of Illicit Appropriation, which held its first session in May 1980. At its second session (Paris, 13-18 September 1981), covered in an appendix to the report, the Committee accorded importance to the struggle against illicit traffic in cultural property and to the development of museums. It adopted recommendations to promote bilateral negotiations for return or restitution, international technical co-operation, national and international steps to curb illicit traffic, and public information for wider awareness of the issue. Its technical co-operation proposals covered preparation of inventories, training of specialized personnel, preparation and application of standards of protection, and development of infrastructure for the protection of movable cultural property.

The report also described other UNESCO activities, including the preparation of inventories by the International Council of Museums and the intensification of public information efforts. It noted that, as at 15 June, 50 States had ratified or accepted the 1970 UNESCO Convention on the Means of Prohibiting and Preventing the Illicit Import, Export and Transfer of Ownership of Cultural Property.

The Director-General's report annexed to a report by the Secretary-General,<sup>(1)</sup> was made in response to a 1979 request by the General Assembly.<sup>(2)</sup>

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 27 November 1981, the General Assembly, by a vote of 109 to none, with 13 abstentions, adopted a resolution<sup>(3)</sup> inviting Member States to take measures to prevent the illicit import, export and transfer of ownership of cultural property, and to end illicit trafficking in priceless objets d'art and museum pieces. By this text, sponsored by 36 nations, UNESCO was requested to intensify efforts to help countries solve problems relating to the return or restitution of cultural property. Member States were invited to draw up, in co-operation with UNESCO, systematic inventories of cultural property in their territories and abroad. Emphasizing that the cultural heritage of a people conditioned the present and future of its artistic values and overall development, the Assembly called on the United Nations Development Programme to help develop national capacity in respect of museum infrastructures. The Assembly appealed to Member States to encourage information media and institutions to arouse greater awareness of the problem.

A separate vote was taken on paragraph 7, by which the Assembly appealed to museums and public and private collectors to return or make available to the countries of origin items kept in museum storehouses and to help those countries, with the co-operation of UNESCO, to inventory such collections. This paragraph was adopted by 105 votes to 1, with 14 abstentions.

Introducing the resolution, Zaire said the cultural heritage of a people conditioned the flourishing of its artistic values and integral development and, in turn, increased peoples' aptitude for understanding the culture and civilization of others, with a fortunate effect on international co-operation. Massive transfers of art works carried out under foreign or colonial occupation, expropriation of art works, trade and illicit transfer of cultural property mutilated a people's capacity to understand and be inspired by its culture.

Voting against paragraph 7, the United States opposed any governmental obligation on restitution that went beyond the 1970 UNESCO Convention on cultural property, which did not require restitution of art works that had entered a country before the Convention's entry into force; though abstaining on the resolution as a whole, it supported the principle of restitution but rejected State direction of information media for a specific purpose. Japan voted for the resolution but explained that it understood "inventories of cultural property" in paragraph 6 to mean protective inventories of natural cultural property.

The United Kingdom, speaking on behalf of the European Community members, said they believed UNESCO should remain the forum for discussion on the topic and they supported the work of the Intergovernmental Committee it had set up in 1978 to facilitate bilateral negotiations for the return of cultural property.

The importance of cultural awareness as a catalyst to national and international development and solidarity was mentioned in the debate by Algeria, Egypt and Senegal. Algeria stressed the need to put an end to an abnormal situation which forced third world peoples to seek outside their countries the symbols of their cultures and the traces of their history.

Albania made the point that the return of works of art with historical value had to be carried out within the framework of efforts to end the injustices committed against countries and peoples subjected to colonial domination, war and occupation, plunder during archaeological excavations, illicit trade and other illegal means. Colonial plundering, the greed of collectors and the cultural black market had deprived many countries of the right to preserve their art, culture and religion, said Argentina. Senegal detected a general consensus on the need for owners to claim the return of their cultural property, for the protection of the cultural heritage of all peoples and on the importance of the restitution of that property.

Colombia urged UNESCO to consider establishing a group of experts to advise countries in identifying, codifying, protecting and exhibiting national treasures, with the eventual aim of building a world register. Ecuador said the establishment in developing countries of museums with modern techniques and the training of experts in research and restoration had changed the former belief that cultural works were safer in the museums of the world's large industrial centres. Colombia, Ecuador, Egypt and Iraq called on Governments to ratify the UNESCO Convention on cultural property.

Democratic Kampuchea linked restitution and return of cultural property to peace, international security and defence of the Charter of the United Nations. Iraq thought the time had come to agree at least on cultural matters even if there was no agreement on political and economic issues.

Cuba, Democratic Yemen, Ethiopia and India said they had voted for the resolution despite their objections to its co-sponsorship by Democratic Kampuchea. Poland and Viet Nam, the former also speaking on behalf of Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, said they could not participate in the discussion or decision for the same reason.

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 3026 A (XXVII) of 18 December 1972, 3148 (XXVIII) of 14 December 1973, 3187 (XXVIII) of 18 December 1973, 3391 (XXX) of 19 November 1975, 31/40 of 30 November 1976, 32/18 of 11 November 1977, 33/50 of 14 December 1978, 34/64 of 29 November 1979 and 35/127 and 35/128 of 11 December 1980,

Taking note with satisfaction of the report submitted by the Secretary-General in co-operation with the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization,

Aware of the importance attached by the countries of origin to the return of cultural property which is of fundamental spiritual and cultural value to them, so that they may constitute collections representative of their cultural heritage,

Noting with satisfaction that the countries of origin have already reinforced the steps they have taken for the organization and maintenance of their museums, in order to accommodate their cultural treasures, and for the classification, restoration and conservation of their objets d'art with national experts of international repute,

Noting also with satisfaction that some countries have taken positive steps for the return or restitution of museum pieces, archives and objets d'art to their countries of origin,

3. Commends the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization and the Intergovernmental Committee for Promoting the Return of Cultural Property to its Countries of Origin or its Restitution in Case of Illicit Appropriation on the work they have accomplished, particularly through the promotion of bilateral negotiations, for the return or restitution of cultural property, the preparation of inventories of movable cultural property, the development of infrastructures for the protection of movable cultural property, the reduction of illicit traffic in cultural property and the dissemination of information to the public;

6. Also invites Member States to draw up, in co-operation with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, systematic inventories of cultural property existing in their territories and of their cultural property abroad;

7. Appeals to museums and public and private collectors to return totally or partially, or make available to the countries of origin, particularly the items kept in the storehouses of such museums, and to help the countries of origin, with the co-operation of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, in their endeavours to prepare an inventory of those collections;

8. Reminds Member States of the need to strengthen museum infrastructures, in particular conservation techniques, museographic facilities and procedures adapted to local conditions and the training of qualified personnel;

10. Appeals to Member States to co-operate closely with the Intergovernmental Committee for Promoting the Return of Cultural Property to its Countries of Origin or its Restitution in Case of Illicit Appropriation and to conclude bilateral agreements for this purpose;

11. Also appeals to Member States to encourage the mass information media and educational and cultural institutions to strive to arouse a greater and more general awareness with regard to the return or restitution of cultural property to the countries of origin;

12. Urges all Governments to reproduce the reports and studies made by archaeologists and explorers from the developed countries, especially if those studies are out of print, and to make them available to the countries of origin;

13. Invites once again Member States to sign and ratify the Convention on the Means of Prohibiting and Preventing the illicit Import, Export and Transfer of Ownership of Cultural Property;

Chapter XIV

Population

United Nations activities in the population field in 1981 were highlighted by the decision to convene a population conference in 1981, creation of the United Nations Population Award, the start-up of the Population Information Network (POPIN) and the beginning of a review of the activities of the United Nations Fund for Population Activities (UNFPA).

In November, the Economic and Social Council decided to convene an International Conference on Population in 1984, making maximum use of extrabudgetary resources for its financing.<sup>(6)</sup> The Council acted after two postponements during the year, including a request in July for further information on extrabudgetary resources.<sup>(5)</sup>

In May 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> the Council urged continued support for the World Fertility Survey (p. 788) and other activities to implement the World Population Plan of Action; the product of the World Population Conference held in 1974.<sup>(8)</sup> It also laid down guidelines for future United Nations activities on population, including a call to facilitate the establishment of POPIN (p. 788).<sup>(4)</sup>

The Secretary-General reported that total world population had reached an estimated 4,437 million in 1980, and that there were likely to be almost 50 per cent more people in the developing countries by the year 2000.<sup>(2)</sup> Projections to the year 2025 anticipated a tripling of the population of Africa, a doubling of the population of South Asia, a 150 per cent increase in Latin America and a rise of a little below 50 per cent in China (see below).

Against this background, a decline in 1981 resources obliged UNFPA to undertake extensive reprogramming and rephasing (p. 781). The Fund spent $136.4 million in 1981, 7 per cent less than the previous year (p. 784). The Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme, which oversees UNFPA, asked in June for a report on the possibilities of substantially increasing family planning, education and communication activities at the expense of work on data collection and population dynamics.

The decision to institute a United Nations Population Award was taken in December by the General Assembly.<sup>(7)</sup> It was to be given annually, starting in 1983, to an individual, individuals or an institution for an outstanding contribution to awareness of population questions or their solutions.

The Assembly called in December for implementation of a new United Nations work programme to study the interrelationships between resources, environment, people and development (p. 390).

The Population Commission, which meets biennially, held its 1981 session at United Nations Headquarters from 26 January to 4 February.<sup>(1)</sup>

Population policy and trends

The report of the Secretary-General on the world population situation in 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> based on United Nations demographic estimates and projections as assessed in 1980, stated that substantial population increase, mainly in many of the developing countries, would continue to be a major factor influencing the present and future of humanity. Towards the end of the century, the annual addition to the population of the developing countries might well increase to 84 million, or 93 per cent of the projected total annual increase in world population. If that trend continued, the population of the developing regions would increase by almost 50 per cent between 1980 and the year 2000, despite the anticipated decline in the overall birth rate for those countries.

The report also indicated that mortality had regained world attention as a serious demographic problem: mortality in Africa south of the Sahara remained the highest in the world, infant mortality continued to be most critical in Africa and South Asia, and child mortality also remained high in many developing regions.

Urban population was increasingly becoming a concern to policy-makers, particularly in the developing countries, where that sector of the population had increased fourfold since the middle of the century to reach 1 billion. The high level of urbanization in developed countries, along with the rapid urban population growth in developing countries, would lead to a significant milestone in human demographic history by the year 2000, in that the world population, which had always been largely rural, would have become predominantly urban.

In addition to the continued movement of workers from poorer to richer countries, a new trend which had gained momentum in the last decade was the flow of migrants to the oil-exporting countries of Western Asia and elsewhere in the developing countries: 2 million migrant workers were estimated to be employed in the oil-exporting Arab countries in 1975. Outbreaks of repatriation flows and refugee movements had continued, and the report found Africa to be the continent with the largest number of refugees and displaced persons.

In the early 1980s, most Governments considered population-related problems as critical factors for the success of their national development plans, and recognized that those problems comprised not only the growth rate but also uneven population distribution and excessive mortality levels. Further, national recognition of the importance of population and its relationship to economic and social development (p. 390) had been accompanied by growing awareness of the possible international consequences of national population policies. The report indicated that, world-wide, 35 countries out of a total of 165 perceived an increased rate of growth as desirable and 75 other countries had expressed satisfaction with their rate of natural increase; however, 55 developing countries, which together comprised 59 per cent of the world's population and 79 per cent of the population of the developing countries, had indicated a desire to reduce their rate of population growth.

The Economic and Social Council, on 6 May 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> took note of the Secretary-General's report, and the General Assembly did likewise on 17 December.<sup>(2)</sup> Both actions were taken, without vote, on oral proposals by the Chairman of the Committee concerned: on the recommendation of the Council's First (Economic) Committee, a proved on 23 April, and the Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, approved on 7 December.

Commenting on population matters in the Second Committee, Bangladesh said that, in view of the alarming trends projected in the Secretary-General's report, Governments must make increased efforts to curb population growth. India stated that international assistance was of capital importance if the population situation was to improve. Nepal remarked that, although its population programmes had been limited to the provision of family planning services, emphasis was beginning to be placed on the systematic involvement of government ministries in population activities. The USSR said it was helping developing countries to train their personnel in the population field and was prepared to continue such co-operation.

World population situation

At its 103rd plenary meeting, on 17 December 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, took note of the report of the Secretary-General on the world population situation in 1981.

Implementation of the World Plan of Action

In a resolution of 6 May 1981, the Economic and Social Council<sup>(2)</sup> urged Member States and regional and international bodies to develop and strengthen activities to implement the World Population Plan of Action, adopted in 1974 by the United Nations World Population Conference.<sup>(3)</sup> It also urged government representatives to give full consideration to the interrelationships of population factors and social, economic, cultural and political development. Further, the Council called on United Nations organizations to include population matters in the deliberations of their conferences and to integrate population questions more fully into their work programmes; urged Governments and international organizations to give high priority to research on human reproduction and fertility regulation; and requested the Population Commission to continue the monitoring, review and appraisal of the Plan. It urged support for the World Fertility Survey (p. 788) and greater United Nations efforts to meet requests for assistance from developing countries.

The text was adopted without vote, having been approved in similar manner by the First Committee on 23 April on a draft recommended by the Population Commission on 4 February.<sup>(1)</sup> It incorporated an oral amendment by Norway, also on behalf of Denmark, Finland and Sweden, adding the provision on the World Fertility Survey.

Strengthening of actions concerned with the fulfilment of the World Population Plan of Action

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolution 1979/32 of 9 May 1979, in which it called upon the governmental representatives of States Members responsible for drafting and adopting the international development strategy for the third United Nations development decade, the action programme to be produced by the United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development, and other international instruments for economic, social and technological progress to include in such documents full recognition of the interrelationships of population factors and social, economic, cultural and political development, and the need for full and urgent action to deal with population problems; these interrelationships should also be borne in mind in all instruments developed for the implementation of a new International economic order,

Noting with satisfaction the role given to population factors in the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, which declares that population policies will be considered as an integral part of overall development policies and that all countries will continue to integrate their population measures and programmes into their social and economic goals and strategies,

Also noting with satisfaction resolution 1 of the World Conference of the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace, in which the Conference called upon Governments to take all appropriate measures to provide information, education and means to enable women and men to exercise freely the right to determine their family size and to set aside an appropriate proportion of their resources for population programmes,

Recalling that its resolution 1979/32 included fourteen priority areas for action identified in the first review and appraisal of the progress made towards the implementation of the World Population Plan of Action,

Emphasizing the important role of technical co-operation in implementing the World Population Plan of Action,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on monitoring of population trends, which shows that, although there has been some decline in the rate of growth of the world's population, there are indications that some developing countries are not succeeding in reducing infant and general mortality to the levels set out in the World Population Plan of Action and that, although there have been significant declines in fertility in some countries, there have been relatively slight or no such declines in some less developed countries and that others have increased their rate of population growth,

Conscious of the magnitude and urgency of the tasks remaining,

1. Urges all Member States and regional and International bodies, both governmental and non-governmental, to develop and strengthen further activities designed to implement the World Population Plan of Action, in particular to recognize that, together with social and economic factors, population is a central element in any strategy designed to improve the quality of life;

2. Urges governmental representatives of States Members responsible for formulating new development strategies, for the organization and conduct of relevant international conferences or for the drafting of international instruments for economic, social and technological progress to give full consideration to the interrelationships of population factors and social, economic, cultural and political development in dealing with population problems;

3. Calls upon the World Health Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation, the International Labour Organisation, the World Bank, the United Nations Children's Fund, the regional commissions and other organizations of the United Nations system which have not yet given due attention to population to take steps to include population matters in the deliberations of their periodic and special conferences and to integrate population questions more fully into their regular work programmes;

4. Urges international organizations, including the United Nations Fund for Population Activities and the World Health Organization, and Governments to give high priority to research on human reproduction and the development of more acceptable, safer, and more effective means of fertility regulation, to promote the establishment of projects in which research workers in developed and less developed countries would co-operate fully in such research and to emphasize to public and private donors the great importance of such research;

5. Requests the Population Commission to continue with the process of monitoring, review and appraisal of progress made towards the implementation of the World Population

Plan of Action and requests the regional commissions and specialized agencies to continue to contribute to that process;

6. Urges the Secretary-General, the United Nations Fund for Population Activities and other International bodies concerned to continue supporting the World Fertility Survey to ensure that fertility and family planning data are collected and analysed as required, Inter alia, for the monitoring of the implementation of the World Population Plan of Action;

7. Requests the Secretary-General, taking account of experience gained through technical co-operation projects in the field of population in implementing the World Population Plan of Action, to strengthen efforts to meet requests for assistance in the implementation of the Plan of Action from the developing countries.

UN Fund for Population Activities

Activities of UNFPA

The 1981 programme of the United Nations Fund for Population Activities (UNFPA) suffered from a general decline in resources caused, in part, by a lower rate of increase in contributions and by wide fluctuations in currency exchange rates (p. 784). The reduced resource level made extensive reprogramming and rephasing necessary, and the work plan for 1981-1984 had to be revised downward from a projected income of $159 million in 1981 to a more realistic income projection of $131 million, according to a report by the UNFPA Executive Director to the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP).<sup>(2)</sup>

Much of this rephasing and reprogramming affected family planning activities, as it was possible to rephrase a portion of such projects into a future year without disastrous results for the entire project. By the end of the year, some $60 million had been rephased to the 1982-1985 work plan period or beyond, and the belt-tightening was expected to continue into 1982.

In 1981, as in 1980, support for family planning accounted for over half of all UNFPA assistance to individual countries, and family planning projects also accounted for 80 per cent of its multi/bilateral programmes, carried out in co-operation with individual donor countries. As a proportion of the Fund's overall programme allocations, family planning activities received $41.8 million or 31.8 per cent. These activities continued to focus on expanding the accessibility of services and improving their quality.

The International Conference on Family Planning in the 1980s (Jakarta, Indonesia, 26-30 April), jointly sponsored by the International Planned Parenthood Federation, the Population Council and UNFPA, brought together 133 participants from 76 countries and from major international agencies. Conducting the first such global review of family planning trends since 1965, the Conference urged developing countries to increase substantially the proportion of public expenditures allocated to family planning to a level of approximately 5 per cent of domestic government spending.

The impact of financial constraints during the year was least felt in UNFPA assistance for basic data collection, primarily because it was impossible to halt and rephase census and other projects already under way. The Fund's assistance in this area totalled $30.7 million, or 23.4 per cent of total programme allocations for 1981, part of which was spent on the purchase of computer equipment for the China census programme.

Providing a vital link between data collection and programme implementation, policy formulation and development planning activities amounted to some 19 per cent of the total programme: $15.3 million or 11.7 per cent of total programme allocations went to population dynamics, $8 million or 6.1 per cent to policy and programme formulation and evaluation, and $1.4 million or 1.1 per cent to policy implementation.

A major problem concerning the implementation of population policies was the shortage of adequately trained personnel. UNFPA assistance in education and communication amounted to $16.4 million, or 12.5 per cent of total programme allocations. Activities included preparation and field testing of a handbook for teacher trainers.

Special programmes for women, youth and aging persons received $2.4 million, or 1.8 per cent of total programme allocations. UNFPA assistance to preparations for the 1982 World Assembly on Aging (p. 1024) totalled some $128,000 at the end of 1981. In addition, $15.2 million or 11.6 per cent of total programme allocations went to multisector activities, which included interdisciplinary and programme development work, support of UNFPA field staff, and overhead payments to the United Nations agencies and organizations executing UNFPA-funded projects.

Several regional meetings of parliamentarians were supported by UNFPA in 1981, including the African Conference of Parliamentarians on Population and Development (Nairobi, Kenya, 6-9 July); the Asian Conference of Parliamentarians on Population and Development (Beijing, China, 27-30 October); and the Colloquy on Trends and Prospects of Population Changes in Europe and Less Developed Countries (Strasbourg, France, 7-9 December), organized by the Council of Europe.

firmed that the Fund should Concentrate on the following areas, listed in order of priority: family planning, including training of personnel and research into contraceptive methods; population education and family planning information dissemination; basic data collection; population dynamics; and population policy formulation, implementation and evaluation. The UNFPA Executive Director was asked to report on the possibilities of substantially increasing family planning, education and communication activities at the expense of work on data collection and population dynamics, and on the UNFPA experience with its system of priority countries. He was asked to take several factors into account in making project allocations, such as magnitude of population problems in relation to per capita gross national product, and to undertake a comprehensive review of contraceptive research and development needs and opportunities.

The Council approved large-scale programmes and projects in 15 countries (see below), as well as assistance to intercountry programmes (p. 783) and to the World Fertility Survey (p. 788). The Executive Director was requested to report in 1982 on the UNFPA programme for 1982-1985 (p. 784). The Council expressed the view that UNFPA should not help finance the International Conference on Population (p. 791). On other financial matters, it approved administrative budgets for 1981 and 1982 (p. 784), gave the Executive Director approval authority for projects in 1982-1984 (p. 784) and decided on the level of the Operational Reserve (p. 785).

At the end of 1981, UNFPA was assisting 1,786 projects—1,303 country, 202 regional, 90 inter-regional and 191 global; 209 new projects were approved in 1981, amounting to $11.3 million, compared to 393 new projects in 1980 amounting to $39.1 million.

The tables on this page and opposite show UNFPA allocations by major function, by executing agency, and by country and region.

Country and regional projects

Of the total project allocations of $131.2 million for 1981 (see table on following page), those for regional and country activities amounted to more than $105 million.

An allocation of $19.7 million was made for Africa south of the Sahara, where some 36 countries received UNFPA assistance in data collection. In Asia and the Pacific, the greatest part of the $52.1 million in assistance went for family planning and maternal and child health, in 23 countries. The largest share of the $18.6-million allocation for Latin American and the Caribbean, and of the $15.1 million for the Middle East, the Mediterranean and Europe, also went to improvement of maternal and child health services and family planning.

In its 23 June decision on UNFPA (p. 781),<sup>(1)</sup> the UNDP Governing Council reaffirmed that efforts would be made to devote up to two thirds of country programme resources to priority countries, and approved large-scale programmes and projects in the following 15 countries:

Benin, $1,460,390; Bhutan, $2,070,000; Ecuador, $2,850,000; Egypt, $15,000,000; Ethiopia, $16,000,000; Gambia, $2,550,000; Guinea, $5,400,000; Haiti, $3,121,400; Morocco, $10,000,000; Nigeria, $17,300,000; Pakistan, $30,000,000; Sri Lanka, $5,400,000; Syrian Arab Republic, $9,000,000; Tunisia, $5,000,000; Yemen, $8,000,000.

Intercountry projects

Allocations for interregional and global activities by UNFPA amounted to $25.7 million in 1981.

The Fund continued to work closely with the United Nations and the specialized agencies to consolidate and reduce the number of intercountry activities within the level of approximately 25 per cent of total programme resources. Its support for a number of interregional and global projects, including United Nations monitoring of the World Fertility Survey (p. 788), was being phased out. Intercountry projects provided advisory services by the specialized agencies, when necessary to supplement regional or country services, and the agencies received funding for a few interregional training courses and seminars.

The UNDP Governing Council reaffirmed, in its 23 June decision on UNFPA (p. 781), that the Fund's support of intercountry activities should be within the level of approximately 25 per cent of total programme resources by 1982.<sup>(1)</sup> It requested, for its consideration in 1982, a report by the UNFPA Executive Director on intercountry activities that would identify types of programmes that were clearly technical assistance and backstopping for country activities, indicate the effects of other intercountry programmes at the country level, recommend activities to be phased out or to receive priority, and provide precise guidelines for all new projects. He was asked to exercise extreme caution in approving any new projects or programmes in order to ensure respect for the 25 per cent ceiling.

Work programme for 1982-1985

The UNFPA work plan for 1982-1985, prepared by the Executive Director,<sup>(3)</sup> was based on the assumption that income would increase by 12 per cent over 1981 and by 15 per cent annually thereafter. It was considered obvious that, at current inflation rates, a 15 per cent increase would not permit real growth in the programme.

As described in a report of the Executive Director on UNFPA in the 1980s,<sup>(2)</sup> the Fund expected to reduce the share of resources given to basic population data collection, while most other activities were anticipated to increase slightly over the current share, with family planning programmes continuing to receive the largest percentage of resources.

The UNDP Governing Council, in its 23 June 1981 decision on UNFPA (p. 781), requested the Executive Director to review and reassess the UNFPA programme for 1982-1985 in view of the resource situation, assuming a 10 per cent annual increase.<sup>(1)</sup>

Approval authority for projects in 1982-1984

The UNDP Governing Council, in its decision of 23 June 1981 on UNFPA (p. 781), gave the Executive Director additional authority to approve projects in each of the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, up to set limits.<sup>(1)</sup> Those limits were: $144 million for 1982 (a $33.75-million increase instead of the $36.75 million he had requested<sup>(2)</sup>); $108 million for 1983 ($34.5 million additional, as against $36.75 million requested); and $72 million for 1984 ($73.5 million requested). He was also authorized to make programme adjustments in the event of financial shortfalls.

Finances of UNFPA

Expenditures of UNFPA totalled $136,366,575 in 1981, a 7 per cent decrease from 1980. Of this total, $122,376,587 constituted programme expenditure, $9,514,584 was spent on UNFPA administrative and support costs, and $4,475,404 was reimbursed to executing agencies for their support costs. Of total project expenditure, 58 per cent was spent by the participating and executing agencies, 30 per cent by UNFPA itself in directly executed projects, and 12 per cent was expenditure on non-governmental organization projects and special grants.

Government contributions totalled $126.9 million in 1981 (p. 785).

Administrative budget for 1981

A supplementary appropriation of $1,249,500 for the UNFPA administrative and programme support budget for 1981 was approved on 23 June<sup>(2)</sup> by the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) (p. 782). This sum had been requested by the Executive Director to finance the transfer of UNFPA headquarters to the Daily News Building in New York City.<sup>(1)</sup> It raised the 1981 administrative budget by 15.1 per cent over the appropriation of $8,275,667 approved by the Council in June 1980, to a total of $9,525,167.

At 31 December 1981, total headquarters staff numbered 166, an increase of 9 over 1980. Field staff decreased by 6, to 34.

Decision: <sup>(2)</sup>UNDP Council (report, E/1981/61/Rev.1), 81/7, sect. III, para. 1, 23 June.

Administrative budget for 1982

As proposed by the Executive Director<sup>(1)</sup> and as recommended by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ),<sup>(3)</sup> the UNDP Governing Council, on 23 June 1981 (p. 782), approved appropriations of $9,345,579 for the 1982 administrative and programme support services budget of UNFPA.<sup>(2)</sup> Of this total, $5,540,478 was for programme planning, appraisal and monitoring; $2,593,736 for administrative and public information support services; and $1,211,365 for executive direction and management. The total amounted to 6.3 per cent of the Fund's resources, the same percentage as for 1981 prior to the one-time supplementary appropriation for moving (see above). The Executive Director attributed most of the rise over the initial 1981 level to inflation.

Accounts for 1980

The General Assembly, in a resolution of 30 November 1981 on the accounts of several United Nations funds and programmes for the year ended 31 December 1980,<sup>(3)</sup> accepted the financial reports and accounts of UNFPA, along with the audit opinions of the Board of Auditors.<sup>(2)</sup>

The Board called for intensified efforts to collect unpaid pledges by Governments, including some $8 million pledged and outstanding for 1980. It also recommended: that overhead costs to administer projects be charged at a uniform rate; that control over non-expendable property be strengthened; that measures be taken to ensure prompt submission by field offices of project delivery reports and audited accounts on completed projects; and that the Fund's administrative policies and procedures on travel be complied with.

ACABQ suggested<sup>(1)</sup> that the UNDP Governing Council consider extending the uniform support cost reimbursement arrangements to trust funds for projects executed directly by UNFPA. Further, immediate action should be taken by the Fund's administration to ensure compliance with its administrative policies and procedures covering travel advances.

In the discussion on these reports in the General Assembly's Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee, Bangladesh expressed the hope that weaknesses in project management would be corrected. India hoped that steps would be taken to reduce unspent balances in UNFPA accounts. Yugoslavia supported the Board's recommendation on uniform charging of support costs.

A UNFPA representative told the Committee that it was intended to strengthen project management at headquarters so as to ensure timely reviews; that UNFPA had taken steps to establish its own internal audit capacity; that new procedures would make possible closer monitoring of expenditures on government-executed projects; and that a senior adviser had been appointed to review arrangements for financial reporting on projects executed by specialized agencies.

Operational Reserve

In order to cover and compensate for downward fluctuations or shortfalls in resources, uneven cash flows, increases in actual costs as compared to planning estimates or fluctuations in delivery, and other contingencies resulting in a loss of resources for which commitments had been made, the UNDP Governing Council approved on 23 June 1981, in its decision on UNFPA (p. 781),<sup>(1)</sup> an Operational Reserve at a level of 25 per cent of the estimated contributions for a given year. The target level was to be achieved as soon as possible and preferably before the end of 1989.

Proposing this action in a report to the Governing Council,<sup>(2)</sup> the UNFPA Executive Director asserted that the Reserve should serve as a guaranty for the financial viability and integrity of the Fund, and requested donor Governments to increase their annual pledges so that the increase in the Reserve would be without detriment to the programme level.

Decision: <sup>(1)</sup>UNDP Council (report, E/1981/61/Rev.1), 81/7, sect. III, paras. 4-6, 23 June.

Contributions

Other UN population activities

Guidelines for the United Nations work programme in the population field were set out by the Economic and Social Council in a resolution adopted without vote on 6 May 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> on the recommendation of the Population Commission.<sup>(2)</sup> The Council specified 16 areas of activity, including trends and policies, structure, estimates and projections, interrelations with development (p. 391), indicators, publication of studies and projections, fertility levels and trends, analysis of World Fertility Survey data (p. 788), policy analysis, policy impact, the Population Information Network (p. 788), technical co-operation (p. 787), training of personnel, institutions, and a population inquiry among Governments. Member States were urged to ensure that methods of evaluation and analysis of data formed an integral part of national census programmes by establishing and strengthening national population organizations. The Council emphasized the need for co-ordination among United Nations organizations and with bodies outside the system.

The resolution incorporated an oral amendment by Brazil, accepted without vote by the First (Economic) Committee. It affected a provision in the Population Commission's text which would have had the Council request that a population inquiry be carried out among Governments at a time that would permit a report on the results to be submitted to the forthcoming Conference on Population (p. 788). As amended, the provision called for continuation of the inquiry without linking it to the Conference. The Committee approved the amended resolution without vote on 23 April.

A United Nations/World Health Organization Working Group on Data Bases for Measurement of Levels, Trends and Differentials in Mortality (Bangkok, Thailand, 20-23 October) recommended national and international action on civil registration, censuses and surveys, other data needs, research strategies and data management.<sup>(1)</sup> Addressing the role of international organizations and funding agencies, it expressed the view that donor agencies should expand sharply their support for programmes of mortality data collection and analysis and for implementation of the results of those programmes.

World Population Plan of Action was an instrument of the International community for the promotion of economic development, quality of life, human rights and fundamental freedoms within the broader context of the Internationally adopted strategies for national and International progress.

Taking due cognizance of the population policies and programmes adopted by international agencies, non-governmental organizations and many countries pursuant to the provisions of the World Population Plan of Action,

Taking note of the discussions of the Population Commission at its twenty-first session on the progress of work and the work programme in the field of population,

1. Takes note with satisfaction of the progress of work, the work programme for the biennium 1982-1983 and the medium-term plan for the period 1984-1989;

2. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) To continue vigorously the work on monitoring of population trends and policies and the work necessary for the review and appraisal of the World Population Plan of Action;

(b) To continue the work on population trends and structure, paying particular attention to studies of fertility, mortality and internal and international migration;

(c) To strengthen the work on demographic estimates and projections;

(d) To continue work on interrelations of population and development, paying due attention both to the implications of population trends for development and to the impact of social and economic change on demographic trends, with a view to promoting the integration of demographic factors in national and international development strategies and plans, and to expedite the preparation of manuals for the use of national planners on methods of incorporating demographic factors in development planning;

(e) To arrange for the timely publication and wide dissemination, in all working languages, of the manual for estimating basic demographic indicators from incomplete data;

(f) To effect the more timely publication of all population studies and projections;

(g) To continue work on the assessment of levels and trends of fertility, and studies designed to explain causes of fertility change, including those dealing with the impact of family planning programmes, and the condition of women, making full use of data from the World Fertility Survey, other relevant sample surveys, population censuses and data from vital registration systems;

(h) To continue to promote co-operation within the United Nations system in the international comparative analysis of World Fertility Survey data through the United Nations Working Group on Comparative Analysis of World Fertility Survey Data;

(i) To continue the analyses of population policies and their implications for national and international development planning;

(j) To pursue research on the impact of population policies, other than family planning programmes, on population policy with that in other subprogrammes;

(k) To continue work on the interrelations of population, resources, environment and development;

(l) To facilitate, in collaboration with the regional commissions and specialized agencies, the establishment of a Population Information Network (POPIN), in collaboration with national and international information programmes;

(m) To continue the United Nations programme of technical co-operation in the field of population for countries requesting such assistance, in co-operation particularly with the United Nations Fund for Population Activities, and, in the event of a forthcoming world population conference, to take full account of experience gained through technical co-operation projects in the field of population;

(n) To strengthen the United Nations programme of training in population, through the work of the regional and inter-regional demographic training and research centres sponsored by the United Nations, support for national training institutions and the continuation of the programme of fellowships for training in the population disciplines, particularly in relation to development planning;

(o) To assist Governments, on their request, in establishing or strengthening national institutions whose purpose is to co-ordinate population activities, particularly those relating to development planning, to study techniques of incorporating population factors in national development and to advise Governments in the formulation, implementation, follow-up and evaluation of population policies and programmes;

(p) To continue to carry out a population inquiry among Governments;

3. Urges Member States to ensure that methods of evaluation and analysis of population census and survey data and their use form an integral part of national census programmes by establishing and strengthening national population organizations and institutions;

4. Emphasizes the need for the organizations of the United Nations system to strengthen their collaboration and co-ordination in the planning and execution of their population programmes, as well as the need for those organizations to strengthen collaboration and co-ordination with national research organizations and other organizations outside the United Nations system in the planning and execution of their population programmes.

Technical co-operation

In 1981, the United Nations Department of Technical Co-operation for Development (DTCD) assisted 120 country projects financed by the United Nations Fund for Population Activities (UNFPA). Placing particular emphasis on institution-building and training, many projects provided assistance in demographic analysis as a follow-up to the 1980 round of censuses. Three international demographic training centres and programmes in Egypt, Romania and the USSR, backstopped by DTCD, trained fellows from developing countries. A total of 156 fellowships were awarded for study at these and other institutions.

Activities in Africa, Asia and the Pacific, and Western Asia dealt mainly with demographic analysis, whereas the emphasis in Latin America and the Caribbean was on population policies and development. The Department continued to provide technical support to Governments in conducting population censuses and processing results, within the limitation of funds provided by UNFPA, and 15 censuses were completed in 1981. During the year, 37 experts worked in Africa, 5 in Asia, 8 in Latin America, 7 in Western Asia and 7 in Europe, the last on inter-regional and global projects.

Of DTCD programme delivery totalling $137 million in the entire range of technical co-operation, $26 million was provided by UNFPA. The reduction in the level of UNFPA funding in 1981 (p. 784), together with direct execution of projects by that body, seriously affected the scope of DTCD activities at the country and inter-country levels.

On 6 May, the Economic and Social Council, in its resolution on the population work programme,<sup>(1)</sup> requested the Secretary-General to continue the United Nations technical co-operation programme, strengthen the training programme, assist Governments in establishing or strengthening national institutions for co-ordination of population activities, and advise Governments in the formulation, implementation and evaluation of population policies and programmes.

Resolution: <sup>(1)</sup>ESC, 1981/29, para. 2 (m)-(o). 6 May (p. 787).

Population Information Network

The Population Information Network (POPIN), envisaged in 1979 by the Economic and Social Council,<sup>(2)</sup> came into being in January 1981 under the aegis of the United Nations as a decentralized network for co-ordination of regional, national and non-governmental population information activities. Acting as the Network's secretariat was a Co-ordinating Unit, also established in January, in the Population Division of the Department of International Economic and Social Affairs, with financial support from UNFPA.

A Consultative Meeting,<sup>(1)</sup> held at Geneva from 27 to 30 April, set out the objectives and guidelines for the operation of POPIN, including its work programme for 1981-1982. The Meeting called for efforts to develop an infrastructure of governmental and non-governmental population information services, suggested that POPIN be guided by a 14-member Advisory Committee, and defined the functions of the Co-ordinating Unit, including publication of the POPIN Bulletin to keep members informed. As recommended by the Meeting, working groups consisting of population information experts from POPIN member institutions were formed during the year to deal with management of the Population Multilingual Thesaurus, development of a guide for the establishment and strengthening of population information services, and preparation of an inventory and evaluation of training materials.

On 6 May, the Economic and Social Council, in its resolution on the population work programme,<sup>(3)</sup> requested the Secretary-General to facilitate the establishment of POPIN, in collaboration with the regional commissions, specialized agencies, and national and international information programmes.

World Fertility Survey

In 1981, the first stage of a comparative analysis of World Fertility Survey (WFS) data was completed by the United Nations Population Division, and work was carried out on seven additional studies to be presented to a 1982 meeting of the United Nations Working Group on Comparative Analysis of World Fertility Survey Data. With funds from UNFPA, a technical adviser at United Nations Headquarters, assisted by regional advisers in Latin America and in Asia and the Pacific, helped countries analyse WFS data.

The Population Commission,<sup>(1)</sup> in January/February 1981, noted the wide use being made of WFS data, including their use by the Secretariat in preparing studies for the Commission on relationships between fertility and other demographic, social and economic phenomena. The Commission recommended that continued strong support be given to all phases of the Secretariat's work on comparative analysis of WFS data, and reiterated its call on all Governments involved in the Survey to release their data tapes to the United Nations for the purpose of international comparative analysis.

In its 6 May resolution on fulfilment of the 1974 World Population Plan of Action,<sup>(2)</sup> the Economic and Social Council urged the Secretary-General, UNFPA and others to continue supporting WFS so as to ensure that fertility and family planning data were collected and analysed. This call was included in the resolution on an oral proposal made in the Council's First (Economic) Committee by Norway, also on behalf of Denmark, Finland and Sweden.

In another resolution of 6 May, on the population work programme,<sup>(3)</sup> the Council requested the Secretary-General to continue promoting co-operation within the United Nations system in the international comparative analysis of WFS data through the United Nations Working Group.

Convening of an International Conference on Population

On 25 November 1981,<sup>(4)</sup> the Economic and Social Council decided without vote to convene in 1984, under United Nations auspices, an International Conference on Population. The Conference was to be conducted with the utmost economy in size, duration and other cost factors, and extrabudgetary resources were to be utilized to the maximum. It was to discuss selected issues of the highest priority, giving full recognition to the relationships between population and social and economic development with the aim of contributing to review and appraisal of the 1974 World Population Plan of Action.<sup>(6)</sup> The Population Commission, at sessions open to all States, would act as preparatory body. The UNFPA Executive Director would serve as the Conference Secretary-General and would seek financial support for the Conference from external sources. The Director of the United Nations Population Division would be Deputy Secretary-General. Up to four expert groups could be convened or up to 45 experts employed in preparations for the Conference.

In view of the concern expressed by many members on the escalating cost estimates for the Conference, the Council agreed to consider the financial implications at its first regular session of 1982 in the light of a report on the availability of extrabudgetary resources, to be submitted by the UNFPA Executive Director (p. 791).

The proposal for a conference was made on 4 February by the Population Commission.<sup>(2)</sup> The draft resolution it recommended would have had the Council recommend to the General Assembly the convening of a conference and request the UNFPA Executive Director to assume a significant role in organizing it. Participating States would have been urged to ensure representation by high-level policy-makers and experts in population and related fields. Taking the Commission's draft as a basis, the Council added provisions to the effect that any State could participate in preparatory sessions of the Commission, without receiving the reimbursement of travel expenses accorded to Commission members; that Secretariat officials to be utilized for preparations should be drawn mainly from the Department of International Economic and Social Affairs; and that the number of experts and expert groups should be limited while ensuring a full range of scientific disciplines and equitable geographical distribution.

In an appendix to its report to the Council, the Commission said there was broad consensus but no unanimity on recommending the convening of a conference. A few members saw no need for a conference and considered that the money could better be used for strengthening population action programmes, while a large majority, including all developing countries represented, believed that such an undertaking would help revitalize work which might have slackened since the commitments made at the 1974 World Population Conference.

The Council considered this matter on three occasions in 1981 before reaching a decision. When it took up the question at its first regular session of 1981, it decided without vote on 6 May<sup>(5)</sup> to postpone until its second regular session consideration of the text by the Population Commission as well as an amendment by the USSR proposing that the Conference be financed from extrabudgetary resources. It took this action on a proposal by the Chairman of the

First Committee, made after informal consultations and approved by the Committee without vote on 24 April. The Chairman orally revised his proposal before its approval by deleting a suggestion that the matter of financing be raised with the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP).

At its second regular session, the Council decided without vote on 24 July to postpone consideration until its resumed second regular session of 1981.<sup>(3)</sup> At the same time, it requested the Secretary-General to provide further information on financing from extrabudgetary resources as well as on preparatory and organizational arrangements, and to explore alternatives to a conference. The Council acted by adopting a resolution approved on 21 July by its First Committee on the basis of an oral proposal by a Vice-Chairman, made following consultations.

Responding to this request, the Secretary-General informed the Council in October<sup>(1)</sup> that he believed a conference could contribute more effectively to the implementation of the World Population Plan of Action, provide policy-makers and experts with an appropriate forum for thorough examination of priority issues, and prove less costly than most alternatives. The other possibilities considered were a special session of the General Assembly or of the Council devoted exclusively to population issues, a special session of the Population Commission and a purely scientific meeting.

The resolution adopted by the Council in November, when it decided to convene the Conference, was submitted by a Vice-President on the basis of informal consultations. It incorporated oral amendments by Brazil adding the words "in all" to the paragraph authorizing the use of up to 45 experts in preparatory work for the Conference and specifying that this number excluded experts from the United Nations regional commissions.

Convening of an International Conference on Population in 1984

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 3344(XXIX) of 17 December 1974 on the World Population Conference, Recalling also Council resolution 1979/32 of 9 May 1979 on the strengthening of actions concerned with the fulfilment of the World Population Plan of Action.

Taking note of the report of the Population Commission on its twenty-first session, in which it recommended the convening of a new population conference, Urging States participating in the conference to involve high-level policy-makers and experts in population and related fields,

Noting with appreciation the policies and programmes adopted by many States, United Nations bodies and non-governmental organizations pursuant to the provisions of the World Population Plan of Action,

Concerned at the magnitude and urgency of the tasks still remaining for the more effective implementation of the World Population Plan of Action at the national, regional and global levels,

Recalling further General Assembly resolution 35/56 of 5 December 1980, the annex to which contains the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, in which the Assembly stated, inter alia, that the implementation of the World Population Plan of Action should be strengthened during the 1980s and that the international community should increase the level of population assistance in support thereof,

Having regard to General Assembly resolutions 35/5 of 20 October 1980 and 35/10 C of 3 November 1980,

1. Decides to convene in 1984, under the auspices of the United Nations, an International Conference on Population open to all States as full members and to the specialized agencies, bearing in mind that it should be conducted with the utmost economy in size, duration and other cost factors and the need to utilize extrabudgetary resources for its financing to the maximum extent possible;

2. Decides that the Conference shall be devoted to the discussion of selected issues of the highest priority, giving full recognition to the relationships between population and social and economic development with the aim of contributing to the process of review and appraisal of the World Population Plan of Action and to its further implementation;

3. Decides further that the Conference shall work within the framework of the existing World Population Plan of Action, the principles and objectives of which continue to be fully valid;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure the substantive contribution to the Conference of the regional commissions, specialized agencies and other bodies of the United Nations system and other international organizations, as appropriate;

5. Decides to designate the Population Commission, meeting in open-ended session, with the participation of any other State, as the intergovernmental preparatory committee for the Conference, and for this purpose decides that rule 11 of the rules of procedure of the functional commissions of the Economic and Social Council and rule 1 (d) of the rules governing payment of travel expenses and subsistence allowances in respect of members of organs or subsidiary organs of the United Nations shall be waived;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to appoint the Executive Director of the United Nations Fund for Population Activities to serve as the Secretary-General of the Conference, and the Director of the Population Division of the Department of International Economic and Social Affairs to serve as the Deputy Secretary-General;

7. Recommends that the personnel to be utilized in the preparations for the Conference should be drawn mainly from the Department of International Economic and Social Affairs, which will be responsible for the co-ordination of the substantive aspects of the preparations, including the review and appraisal of the World Population Plan of Action;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure a significant contribution by the Department of Technical Co-operation for Development to the Conference and to take full account of experience gained through technical co-operation activities in assisting in the implementation of the World Population Plan of Action;

9. Requests the Executive Director of the United Nations Fund for Population Activities to seek financial support from external sources for the Conference and to report thereon on a regular basis to the Economic and Social Council;

10. Authorizes the Secretary-General to convene a maximum of four small expert groups, or to call upon individual experts in the preparatory work for the Conference, up to a maximum of forty-five experts in all, excluding experts from the secretariats of the regional commissions, taking fully into account the need to ensure a full range of scientific disciplines and the principle of equitable geographical distribution;

11. Requests the Conference to report to the General Assembly at its thirty-ninth session through the Economic and Social Council.

Financial aspects

In revised financial estimates on the convening of an International Conference on Population,<sup>(2)</sup> the Secretary-General informed the General Assembly in December 1981 that the Conference and its preparations might cost about $2,319,700, of which $1.5 million was anticipated from extrabudgetary resources. In the absence of definitive information on the availability of such resources, he was unable to present in 1981 a definitive request for additional appropriations but would do so in the context of his programme budget proposals for 1984-1985, in the expectation that extrabudgetary resources would be available to finance preparations in 1982-1983.

As recommended without vote on 15 December by the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee, the Assembly, on 18 December,<sup>(5)</sup> also without vote, took note of the Secretary-General's report and of an oral report by the Chairman of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ), who noted the Secretary-General's intention to report to the Assembly through ACABQ once the Economic and Social Council reviewed the forthcoming report by the UNFPA Executive Director (p. 789). The Fifth Committee's recommendation was made on an oral proposal by its Chairman based on a suggestion by the ACABQ Chairman.

The issue of financing the Conference figured prominently in the Economic and Social Council's consideration of whether to convene it. In its 6 May decision,<sup>(6)</sup> the Council requested the UNFPA Executive Director to explore the possibility of finding resources from sources external to the United Nations budget. A phrase in the original draft decision proposed in April by the Chairman of the First Committee, authorizing the UNFPA Executive Director to bring the matter of financing to the attention of the UNDP Governing Council, was orally deleted by the Chairman before the decision was approved. The Governing Council, in its decision of 23 June on UNFPA (p. 781), stated its view that, given the scarcity of resources, UNFPA should not contribute from its regular budget to the financing of the Conference.<sup>(7)</sup>

In its 24 July resolution postponing a decision, the Economic and Social Council requested the Secretary-General to provide further information on extrabudgetary financing.<sup>(3)</sup> Responding in October, the Secretary-General said in a note to the Council that the UNFPA Executive Director was confident, based on informal contacts with Governments, that $1.5 million could be raised for the Conference from external sources, covering a major part of the cost of preparing and organizing it.<sup>(1)</sup>

In deciding on 25 November to convene the Conference, the Council mentioned the need to utilize extrabudgetary resources to the maximum and requested the UNFPA Executive Director to seek financial support for the Conference from external sources.<sup>(4)</sup>

At the Council's discussion in November, concern about escalating cost estimates was expressed by Australia, Belgium, Brazil, France, India, the United Kingdom and the United States. China, the Federal Republic of Germany, the USSR, the United Kingdom and the United States reiterated that the bulk of the cost should be covered by extrabudgetary resources-which the USSR said might be supplemented, if necessary, by savings in the regular budget to be achieved by eliminating obsolete or marginal activities. A number of States, including Belgium, the German Democratic Republic, the Federal Republic of Germany and the United States, supported the USSR view that the matter should be reconsidered in 1982 in the light of the forthcoming report by the UNFPA Executive Director.

Participation in the Conference

On 25 November 1981, the Economic and Social Council decided without vote, on an oral proposal of its President, to request the Population Commission, as preparatory body for the International Conference on Population, to make detailed recommendations to the Council concerning participation in the Conference.

Convening of an International Conference on Population in 1984

At its 45th plenary meeting, on 25 November 1981, the Council decided to request the Population Commission as the preparatory body for the International Conference on Population to make the necessary detailed recommendations to the Council concerning participation in the Conference, taking into account the relevant decisions and resolutions of the General Assembly and established United Nations practice regarding participation in conferences convened by the United Nations.

Establishment of the UN Population Award

Recognizing the economic and social implications of population trends and the projected growth in world population to 6.1 billion by the year 2000, the General Assembly, on 17 December 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> established the United Nations Population Award, to be presented annually to an individual, individuals or an institution for the most outstanding contribution made to the awareness of population questions or to their solutions. The Assembly requested the Secretary-General to arrange for commencement of the Award in 1983, in consultation with the Executive Director of the United Nations Fund for Population Activities. A Trust Fund, which was to be established to receive voluntary contributions, would finance all costs related to the Award.

The Regulations annexed to the resolution dealt with the nomination and selection of Award recipients. They stipulated that the choice would be made each February by a Committee for the United Nations Population Award and that the Award, to be presented each June, would consist of a diploma, a gold medal and a monetary prize, in an amount to be determined each year by the Secretary-General.

The resolution, adopted by the Assembly without vote, was approved in similar fashion by the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee on 7 December. The text was submitted by a Vice-Chairman on the basis of informal consultations on a 14-nation draft.<sup>(1)</sup> The original text did not specify the contributions for the Award as voluntary, referred to a statute rather than to regulations, differed in regard to the composition of the Committee for the Award and would have entrusted that body, rather than the Economic and Social Council, with drawing up its rules of procedure.

Introducing the original draft resolution, Bangladesh stressed the importance of greater awareness and understanding of population problems.

Denmark, speaking also on behalf of the other Nordic States, announced that they would not contribute to the Trust Fund for the Award, since operational activities rather than awards best promoted understanding of population issues, and the establishment of a population award might create a false impression of United Nations activities.

Approved by Second Committee (A/36/812) without vote, 7 December (meeting 46); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/36/L.130), based on informal consultation on 14-nation draft (A/C.2/36/L.91); agenda item 70 (e).

Establishment of the United Nations Population Award
The General Assembly,

Recalling the World Population Plan of Action, adopted by the United Nations World Population Conference, held in 1974, and noting with satisfaction the significant contributions made by the United Nations to the implementation of that Plan,

Recognizing the economic and social implications of the population trends particularly related to development, as described in reports prepared by the United Nations and the United Nations Fund for Population Activities, which indicate that world population is projected to grow from 4.4 billion in 1980 to approximately 6.1 billion by the year 2000,

Recognizing the need to promote better awareness and understanding of population issues, especially at the individual and community levels of each country and in accordance with national plans and priorities,

Further recognizing the special significance of establishing an award in order to promote that objective,

1. Decides to establish an annual award, to be named the United Nations Population Award, for the most outstanding contribution to the awareness of population questions or to their solutions, by an individual or individuals, or by an institution, to be presented through the United Nations;

2. Adopts the Regulations Governing the United Nations Population Award, annexed to the present resolution;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to make the necessary arrangements, under the Regulations, for the commencement of the Award in 1983, in consultation with the Executive Director of the United Nations Fund for Population Activities;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to establish a Trust Fund for the United Nations Population Award to receive voluntary contributions for the Award;

5. Decides that all costs related to the Award should be borne out of the Trust Fund.

Chapter XV

Health and human resources

The International Year of Disabled Persons (IYDP), with the theme of full participation and equality for the disabled, was observed by the United Nations and its Member States in 1981. Programmes focused on rehabilitation and other assistance to disabled persons and disability prevention, with the aim of ensuring the integration of the disabled in society. The Secretary-General reported to the General Assembly on activities during the Year.<sup>(1)</sup>

The Economic and Social Council endorsed the objectives of IYDP in May,<sup>(4)</sup> calling on Governments and organizations to work for its success. In December, the Assembly called for follow-up action in future years,<sup>(9)</sup> including contributions to the United Nations Trust Fund for IYDP (p. 796). The Advisory Committee for IYDP prepared a draft World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons, to be refined in 1982 prior to its submission to the Assembly for adoption.

On the Council's recommendation,<sup>(5)</sup> the Assembly endorsed in November 1981<sup>(6)</sup> the Global Strategy for Health for All by the Year 2000, adopted in May 1981 by the World Health Assembly of the World Health Organization (WHO). The main thrust of the Strategy was to encourage development of each country's health system infrastructure, including measures for health promotion, disease prevention, diagnosis, therapy and rehabilitation.

In May, the Executive Board of the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) approved a strengthening, of support for primary health care of mothers and children (p. 803). As an aspect of this approach, the outline of a Joint Programme on Provision of Essential Drugs for Primary Health Care in Developing Countries was approved in February by the UNICEF/WHO Joint Committee on Health Policy (p. 804).

In other United Nations action on health issues, the General Assembly called for international action to deal with problems related to banned substances and unsafe pharmaceutical products (p. 824). UNICEF allocated its largest expenditures to child health (p. 1004) and one tenth of its expenditures to nutrition (p. 1005).

Human resources development was pursued through training and research programmes undertaken by the United Nations Institute for Training and Research (UNITAR) and the United Nations University (UNU). The United Nations Development Programme allocated funds for disseminating information on national experience in training qualified personnel and enhancing their role in social and economic development (p. 804).

While continuing its training and research programmes within total expenditures of $2.2 million in 1981, UNITAR concentrated on economy measures and efforts to make its programmes more effective (p. 804), according to its annual report to the General Assembly.<sup>(2)</sup> The Assembly, in December, welcomed those steps and called on UNITAR to adjust its programme and administrative costs to ensure that, from 1982, estimated expenditure did not exceed estimated revenue.<sup>(8)</sup> It also approved a $352,600 grant from the United Nations regular budget to cover the 1981 UNITAR deficit (p. 807).

UNU reported to the Assembly<sup>(3)</sup> that it had experienced a transition year in 1981 with the adoption by its Council of a medium-term perspective for 1982-1987 that took the University from its formative years to a period of planning for future growth (p. 809). In November, the Assembly noted with satisfaction the decision to move towards the medium-term perspective and called for contributions to the UNU Endowment Fund<sup>(7)</sup> A permanent site for UNU headquarters, in central Tokyo, was dedicated in November.

Training programmes were also carried out by the United Nations Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa (p. 1117) and the United Nations Institute for Namibia (p. 1176).

Aspects of human resources development were also addressed by the General Assembly in two December resolutions. By one, the Assembly invited States to consider adopting measures to ensure full implementation of the right to universal education (p. 924). By the second, the Assembly noted with satisfaction a decision by the Trade and Development Board of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to authorize the convening of a group of experts on the feasibility of measuring human resource flows—an aspect of the brain drain of skilled personnel from developing to developed countries (p. 757).

Programme and activities

The observance during 1981 of the International Year of Disabled Persons (IYDP) spurred a wide range of national, regional and international activities on behalf of physically handicapped and other disabled persons.

The Year had been proclaimed by the General Assembly in 1976 to help disabled persons in their physical and psychological adjustment to society, promote national and international assistance, encourage research to facilitate adjustment to daily life, inform the public of the rights of the disabled, and promote prevention and rehabilitation.<sup>(14)</sup> The theme of the Year, set in 1978, was "full participation and equality".<sup>(15)</sup> To co-ordinate activities for the Year, the Secretary-General, in February 1981, appointed the Assistant Secretary-General of the United Nations Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs as the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for IYDP.

Activities by national committees aimed at improving the social and economic conditions of disabled persons were decisive for the achievements of the Year, the Secretary-General stated in an October 1981 report to the Assembly covering the period from January to the end of July.<sup>(10)</sup> The work of those committees, set up in 141 countries and territories, was described by the Secretary-General in that report and in a September 1982 report<sup>(12)</sup> covering subsequent activities during the Year.

The national committees focused on the development and implementation of national plans of action, social issues, participation by disabled persons in policy- and decision-making, statistics and research, legislation, decentralization of activities and responsibilities from national to local levels, assistance to developing countries, and promotion of national weeks and days.

The General Assembly, in its resolution of 8 December on IYDP,<sup>(16)</sup> expressed satisfaction to all Member States that had elaborated national policies and programmes for implementing the Year's objectives. It also stressed the importance of strengthening support services for exchanging technical information and transferring technology, and noted with appreciation Yugoslavia's offer to contribute to that work. Yugoslavia presented its offer to establish a technical co-operation support service in a note verbale of 20 November to the Secretary-General.<sup>(7)</sup>

In regional action, the Economic Commission for Africa, in April, endorsed the report of a Regional Seminar on IYDP held at Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, in October 1980 (p. 629). A European regional seminar, organized by the United Nations in co-operation with the Finnish Ministry of Social Affairs and Health, was held at Siilinjärvi, Finland, from 27 May to 2 June. A plan of action for Western Asia was forwarded to the Assembly by the Economic Commission for Western Asia (p. 672). Meetings organized by the respective United Nations regional commissions had been held during 1980 in Asia and the Pacific and in Latin America.

At the international level, the World Symposium of Experts on Technical Co-operation among Developing Countries and Technical Assistance in Disability Prevention and Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons (Vienna, Austria, 12-23 October 1981) brought together 51 experts from all regions, 126 observers representing 41 States, and a number of international governmental and non-governmental organizations (NGOs).<sup>(11)</sup> The Symposium formulated a Vienna Affirmative Action Plan, setting out priority issues in technical co-operation concerning disability prevention, rehabilitation of disabled persons and the equalization of opportunities for them.

Tripoli, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, was the site of the International Symposium on Disabled Persons from 27 September to 4 October; its recommendations were transmitted to the General Assembly by a note verbale of 8 December from the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.<sup>(3)</sup> The World Conference on Actions and Strategies on Education, Disability Prevention and Integration of Disabled Persons, organized by Spain in co-operation with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, was held at Torremolinos, Spain, from 2 to 7 November; its Declaration was transmitted by a letter of 3 December from Spain.<sup>(4)</sup>

Within the United Nations system, design alterations were introduced at United Nations Headquarters and at United Nations offices at Geneva and Vienna to make facilities more accessible to disabled people. United Nations public information units prepared background and feature material, photo displays, and film, television and radio productions. The United Nations Industrial Development Organization provided technical assistance for the use of traditional medicine in combination with advanced technology, giving priority to diseases leading to disability. UNICEF expanded immunization programmes to save 5 million children a year from preventable disabilities (p. 1005). The Commission on Human Settlements, in May, urged Governments and the United Nations system to assist in diminishing or eliminating barriers in human settlements that prevented the full participation of the disabled in social development (p. 856). Technical co-operation advisory missions on disability were undertaken in 30 developing countries and regional meetings were organized.

The activities of the United Nations system related to the Year were examined at two inter-agency meetings on IYDP, in Paris (24 and 25 February)<sup>(8)</sup> and at Vienna (27 and 28 October),<sup>(9)</sup> organized by the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination. The meetings concentrated on follow-up activities to IYDP (p. 798).

International NGOs participated in the Year by conducting research, presenting film exhibitions, organizing sports and music competitions, and organizing seminars and training courses for and about disabled persons. The First Founding Congress of Disabled People's International was held in Singapore from 30 November to 6 December.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. On 6 May,<sup>(13)</sup> the Economic and Social Council, acting without vote, called on Governments,

United Nations organizations, other intergovernmental organizations and NGOs to work for the success of IYDP. The Secretary-General was urged to ensure that the rehabilitation and well-being of the disabled and the prevention of disability were given due consideration in United Nations programmes.

The resolution was recommended by the Commission for Social Development on 17 February and approved without vote by the Council's Second (Social) Committee on 29 April. An oral amendment by Canada in the Second Committee added the words "especially organizations of disabled persons" in reference to organizations called upon to work for the success of the Year.

international Year of Disabled Persons

The Economic and Social Council,

Taking note of the progress report of the Secretary-General on the prevention of disability.

Endorsing the conclusions and recommendations contained in that report,

Welcoming the nomination by the Secretary-General of his Special Representative for the International Year of Disabled Persons,

1. Calls upon Governments, the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system, as well as other intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, especially organizations of disabled persons, to work together to make the international Year of Disabled Persons a success;

2. Urges the Secretary-General to take all necessary steps to ensure that the rehabilitation and well-being of the disabled and the prevention of disability are, wherever appropriate, given due consideration within United Nations programmes.

Trust Fund for IYDP. Contributions from 14 countries collected during 1981 for the Trust Fund for IYDP totalled $513,951 (see table below). The Fund was established under a 1977 resolution by which the General Assembly appealed for voluntary contributions for the Year.<sup>(1)</sup> According to the Secretary-General's October 1981 report on IYDP (p. 795), six requests for assistance had been financed from the Trust Fund and more than 60 major requests, valued at over $9 million, were pending due to the lack of resources. Priority was to be given to requests for international promotional activities and for advisory services to Governments relating to activities of IYDP national committees.

As suggested by the Advisory Committee for IYDP, the Assembly, in its 8 December resolution on the Year,<sup>(2)</sup> appealed for further voluntary contributions, to be used in part for activities in developing countries, including the strengthening of organizations of disabled persons.

Follow-up to the Year

ADVISORY COMMITTEE ACTION. The Advisory Committee for IYDP, at its third session held at Vienna, Austria, from 3 to 12 August 1981, adopted on 10 August an initial draft for a World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons and made several recommendations for follow-up activities to the Year.<sup>(2)</sup> The Secretary-General submitted comments on the Committee's recommendations, for consideration by the General Assembly.<sup>(5)</sup>

The stated objectives of the draft Programme were to promote the full participation of disabled persons in society and their equality with other citizens in terms of living conditions. Noting that there were more than 500 million disabled persons, including 140 million children, the draft stressed the need for prevention (p. 802), described the services required for rehabilitation and suggested additional measures to equalize the opportunities of disabled persons by removing obstacles to their full participation in society. These measures touched on educational, economic, vocational and social questions.

The draft went on to propose national and international measures to implement the Programme through prevention, rehabilitation and equalization of opportunities. Equality was to be achieved through respect for human rights, education, employment, participation in decision-making, social security, access to the physical environment and community action. Also proposed were information and public education activities, technical and economic co-operation, research, monitoring and evaluation, and consultation with disabled persons and their organizations.

With a view to developing the draft Programme, the Committee requested that it be circulated for comments by Governments and organizations, after which the Secretary-General would prepare a revised text for the Committee's consideration at a proposed session in 1982.

On other aspects of follow-up to IYDP, the Committee recommended to the Assembly a draft resolution calling for participation by disabled persons in follow-up activities, higher priority for rehabilitation and training projects in developing countries, additional voluntary contributions for IYDP (see above), additional resources within existing budgets for follow-up activities by the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs, and improved employment opportunities for disabled persons in United Nations organizations as well as easier access to their buildings, facilities and information.

In his comments on these proposals, the Secretary-General reported that he had been making efforts to absorb the cost of follow-up measures through redeployment within the Centre. A study on access to United Nations buildings and facilities had been completed and a study on access to information was to be completed early in 1982. United Nations recruitment policy did not distinguish between the disabled and others.

In another action, the Committee recommended that, until the question of continuing the International Institute for the Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons in Developing Countries was settled, immediate action should be taken to secure support services for intensified technical co-operation, including the establishment of an inter-agency task force to support national and regional activities. The Institute was begun in 1976 as a project between Iran and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) to assist developing countries in establishing services for disability prevention and rehabilitation; it ceased operations in 1979. The Secretary-General commented that, if the Assembly approved the recommendation on technical cooperation, arrangements would be made, using the existing United Nations budget and the Trust Fund for IYDP, to support national committees, regional commissions and UNDP in their activities for the disabled.

Regarding Committee recommendations that the Secretary-General set up an interorganizational task force to support national and regional activities, and that he consider setting up machinery to promote co-operation between developed and developing countries on disability prevention and rehabilitation, the Secretary-General expressed the view that the existing inter-agency co-ordination mechanism should be utilized.

Follow-up activities were also addressed in a resolution by which the Committee recommended that the Assembly make available staff for such activities from within existing resources in the United Nations system. The Secretary-General reported that the United Nations Children's Fund and UNDP had provided staff to the secretariat for the Year and that he would explore continuing collaboration with those bodies.

The Committee recommended that the Assembly, in consultation with organizations of disabled persons, consider the possibility of proclaiming a world day of disabled persons. The Secretary-General suggested that the Assembly postpone a decision on this matter until 1982 when he would be able to present the views of those organizations as well as an analysis of the purpose of such a day.

To assist national and world organizations of disabled persons, the Committee suggested that part of the Trust Fund for IYDP be used to help strengthen such bodies, especially in developing countries.

At the first Inter-agency Meeting on IYDP, held in February 1981 (p. 796),<sup>(3)</sup> the method and timetable for preparing agency comments on the draft World Programme of Action were agreed upon. Discussion at the second Inter-agency Meeting<sup>(4)</sup> centred on the Advisory Committee's proposal for an inter-agency task force; it was felt that such a body should operate within the existing mechanism of inter-agency meetings. The Meeting recommended that United Nations organizations adopt firm policies and develop regulations on recruitment procedures, working conditions, travel and dependency questions affecting disabled persons.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 8 December 1981, the General Assembly adopted without vote a resolution<sup>(6)</sup> by which it urged Member States to build on the results of the Year and invited them to submit national reports and consider elaborating long-term programmes of action. Regional commissions, specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) were requested to implement programmes for the disabled. The Assembly requested the Advisory Committee for IYDP to consider the advisability of proclaiming the period 1983-1992 as the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons. The Committee was also requested to study the possibility of creating an optional international identity card for disabled persons to facilitate their international travel. The Assembly requested the Secretary-General to convene the Committee in 1982 to finalize the draft World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons and urged him to assure the successful follow-up of IYDP. The Assembly also appealed for further voluntary contributions for follow-up activities (p. 797).

The resolution was recommended by the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, based on a 43-nation draft approved without vote on 1 December. Introducing the text, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya orally revised two paragraphs. Paragraph 16, by which the Assembly called on the Secretary-General to strengthen and expand technical co-operation activities in developing countries relating to the disabled, was changed to address also the heads of specialized agencies. Paragraph 18, calling for the continuation of public information programmes, was changed to refer to information activities of the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs rather than of the IYDP secretariat. Argentina, also a sponsor, orally added a paragraph inviting Member States to promote co-operation between developed and developing countries through transfer of technology and research results and exchanges of information on disability prevention and rehabilitation.

Although the agenda item on IYDP was considered directly in plenary meeting, the Assembly decided, on 13 November, to permit the Third Committee to deal with some matters relating to the item, such as the preparation of draft resolutions. Such a role for the Committee had been proposed in a 12 November letter to the Assembly President by the Chairman of the Advisory Committee.<sup>(1)</sup>

Explaining its position before the Third Committee approved the resolution, the United States expressed concern about the financial implications and said it accepted the provision on technical co-operation on the understanding that it did not entail expanding activities financed from the United Nations budget. Japan felt that the objectives of a decade of disabled persons would duplicate those of the draft Programme of Action. Canada also had reservations about the idea of a decade, remarking that its proclamation might diffuse rather than enhance support for activities related to the disabled.

During two days of meetings devoted to the Year, the Assembly heard accounts of activities related to its observance by 56 States, the European Community (EC), the Palestine Liberation Organization, and United Nations and specialized agency officials.

States unanimously cautioned that efforts begun and attitudes fostered during IYDP should not end at its completion. The need for assistance from developed to developing States, technical co-operation and efforts by the United Nations system in technology transfer was emphasized by Australia, Belgium, Egypt, the Federal Republic of Germany, India, Indonesia, Jamaica, Japan, Liberia, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Maldives, Morocco, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, the Philippines, the Sudan, Viet Nam, Yugoslavia and Zaire.

Support for the adoption of a long-term world programme of action was voiced by Australia, Canada, Guinea, Ireland, Kenya, Kuwait, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malawi, New Zealand, the Philippines, Portugal, Romania, Somalia and the United Kingdom, the last speaking for EC. Indonesia suggested that the Programme of Action required a global strategy and should be more realistic if it was to be readily implemented. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Morocco, Oman and Somalia also called on the Assembly to approve a decade for the disabled.

The persistence of wars as a major cause of disability was mentioned by the Byelorussian SSR, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, the Dominican Republic, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Maldives, Spain, the USSR and Viet Nam. An unbalanced international economic system created conditions resulting in disability, observed the Dominican Republic, Guinea and Yugoslavia.

Support for the work of the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs was urged by a number of speakers, including Austria, Somalia and Yugoslavia, and continuation of the Trust Fund for IYDP was recommended by Liberia, the Philippines and Uganda. Canada expressed reservations about using the Trust Fund, believing that programmes for the disabled should be integrated into the regular United Nations programme and budget.

Integrating the disabled into society was stressed by many States, including Algeria, Austria, Canada, China and the EC members. Practical steps in a long-term programme to improve the situation of disabled persons should first be pursued at the national level, stated the Byelorussian SSR, Hungary and the USSR. Guinea, Malawi, Morocco and Somalia supported a project by the International Labour Organisation, UNDP and the Organization of African Unity to establish an African vocational rehabilitation institute.

A number of developing countries stressed the need for international co-operation. Thus, Algeria said disabled persons were entitled to expect a larger contribution to their needs from United Nations specialized agencies. Argentina and Zaire argued that priority in the allocation of international resources had to be given to the needs of the developing countries because they had the largest percentage of disabled. China welcomed information exchanges with organizations in friendly countries and with international bodies. Jamaica said the developing countries possessed the political will to integrate the disabled into society but lacked the resources and know-how. Morocco appealed to United Nations organizations and to philanthropic individuals and associations to increase assistance for disabled persons, particularly in Africa. Nigeria supported the setting up of regional rehabilitation institutes and an international co-ordinating mechanism for sharing information and experience. The Sudan endorsed the proposed establishment of an international institute for the disabled. Uganda stressed the need for funds, stating that most developing countries might not be able to embark on meaningful programmes unless enough international assistance was forthcoming.

Brazil stressed the need for public awareness of the problem. The Dominican Republic urged Governments to see to it that educators received information to enable them to accept disabled persons in regular education. Ecuador included among the disabled those with physical, nutritional, psychological and educational limitations indicative of the level of development, and said such a situation affected more than 10 per cent of the population of Latin America. Egypt and India mentioned the need to obtain data from developing countries on the numbers and needs of the disabled. Guinea and others made the point that special attention should be given to disabled children and Egypt added that all possible measures must be taken to avoid the birth of a disabled child. Without remedial action, said Kuwait, the consequences of disability would be a constant obstacle to development, especially in poor developing nations. The Programme of Action for disabled persons should not be isolated from other development objectives, the Philippines said.

Singapore observed that, since resources would always be limited, each society had to look first to its own means to help the disabled. The stigma faced by the disabled was their most serious handicap, said Somalia. Venezuela viewed the Year as the first time international attention had been drawn to a problem that was an everyday crisis, particularly in developing countries. Viet Nam stressed the need to prevent disabilities, noting that assistance for the disabled cost 5 to 10 times as much as that provided to others.

Among developed countries, Canada thought the United Nations could play an important role because, unlike national Governments, it was free from the need to obtain short-term results. Co-operation on disability and rehabilitation should take place not just between Governments but also between specialized NGOs, the United Kingdom said on behalf of EC. Japan announced its intention of initiating bilateral, regional and international technical assistance and leadership training programmes.

Austria observed that there had not been an organized effort to face the disability problem in a co-ordinated manner, taking into account the results of medical and technological research to offset the effects of disability. Belgium noted that expensive sophisticated technology could not be utilized everywhere; investment in simpler and less expensive items might benefit more people. France urged that, instead of specialized institutions for the disabled, there should be small living units which promoted meetings and exchanges. The Holy See opposed the suppression of fetuses having medical defects, stating that the time and means required to care for handicapped persons was the price a society should generously pay in order to remain truly human. To ignore disabled persons or consign them to the fringes of society would be to waste a vast reservoir of talent and skill, stated Malta. Norway, speaking for the Nordic States, listed five priority areas: altering public attitudes, making environmental changes, giving disabled persons the right to be heard, helping families with disabled children and aiding disabled persons in developing countries. The United Kingdom stressed the need to eliminate avoidable disabilities, in both industrialized and developing countries, caused by malnutrition, deprivation and environmental hazards.

Several States commented on the lasting consequences of IYDP. The disabled themselves had noted less indifference and more open-mindedness regarding their everyday problems as a result of the Year, said the Federal Republic of Germany. Ireland believed that a major effect of the Year would be to challenge ingrained attitudes which led people to underestimate the capacities of the disabled and the contribution they could make. The Netherlands said that during the Year a genuine awareness of what it was to be disabled had awakened the world's conscience. The United States remarked that, by focusing world attention on a human concern, the United Nations had opened an important area of transnational communication across political boundaries on a common problem affecting all peoples.

Concern about improving the situation of disabled persons was not merely a necessary act of humaneness but was of great social and economic importance, said the Byelorussian SSR. It was hard to imagine improvements in the position of the disabled without comprehensive amelioration of the economic situation of the developing countries, Czechoslovakia observed. Romania suggested that the General Assembly should at future sessions evaluate the results of current activities and formulate conclusions on further action. The USSR believed that international organizations should focus on devising recommendations and standard-setting instruments as well as on sharing national experience and information on methods of attacking the problem.

Stresses the importance of strengthening support services for the exchange of technical information and transfer of technology and know-how, as well as other activities for the development of technical co-operation in the fields of prevention, rehabilitation and equalization of opportunities in developing countries, and notes with appreciation the offer of the Government of Yugoslavia to contribute in this direction;

18. Invites, as a matter of priority, Member States, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, as well as the governmental and non-governmental organizations concerned and the mass media, to continue to undertake public information programmes, including the continuation of the present information activities of the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat for the national committees, with a view to making all sections of the population increasingly aware of issues relating to the disabled;

19. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-seventh session an item entitled "World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons" and requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at that session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Prevention of disability

In January 1981, the Secretary-General reported to the Commission for Social Development on progress achieved in the prevention of disability.<sup>(3)</sup> According to this report, work had been directed towards strengthening preventive measures at the national level. The situation in developing regions called for urgent measures. Initial responses to a questionnaire requesting information from States indicated that progress had been achieved but much remained to be done in preventing physical and mental disability and social discrimination or segregation affecting the disabled.

The Secretary-General also reported on recommendations for specific prevention measures discussed at a United Nations Expert Group Meeting on Different Policy Approaches to the Integration of Disabled Persons into Community Life (Vienna, 30 June-5 July 1980).<sup>(1)</sup> The Group emphasized detection through check-ups and registration for children, as well as more effective prevention of home and traffic accidents, drug addiction, alcoholism, and disability based on malnutrition and disease. Training of rehabilitation support teams in disability prevention was recognized as crucial.

Endorsing the conclusions and recommendations in this report, the Economic and Social Council, in its 6 May resolution on IYDP,<sup>(4)</sup> urged the Secretary-General to ensure that disability prevention was given due consideration in United Nations programmes.

Recommendations on disability prevention measures were included in the draft World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons,<sup>(2)</sup> approved in August by the Advisory Committee for IYDP (p. 797). The most important measures, the draft stated, were better nutritional practices, improved health services, early detection and diagnosis, pre-natal and post-natal care, proper health care instruction, family planning, adolescent health programmes, modification of life-styles, education regarding environmental hazards, avoidance of war, and the fostering of better informed and strengthened families and communities.

General aspects of health

Global Strategy

The adoption by the World Health Assembly on 22 May 1981 of a Global Strategy for Health for All by the Year 2000 was described in a progress report by the Director-General of the World

Health Organization (WHO) submitted to the Economic and Social Council in June.<sup>(2)</sup> The Strategy arose from a 1977 decision by the World Health Assembly that the main health target of WHO and of Governments should be attainment by the year 2000 of a level of health that would permit all people to lead a socially and economically productive life.<sup>(6)</sup>

The Strategy was based on the concept of country-wide health systems, starting with primary health care. Its main thrust was development of the health system infrastructure, including measures for health promotion, disease prevention, diagnosis, therapy and rehabilitation. Crucial to the Strategy was ensuring social control of the health infrastructure and technology through close community involvement. In adopting the Strategy, the World Health Assembly requested the WHO Executive Board to prepare a plan of action for its immediate implementation, monitoring and evaluation, for submission to the Assembly in 1982.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. On 23 July 1981, the Economic and Social Council adopted without vote a resolution<sup>(3)</sup> commending the Global Strategy to the General Assembly. The Council also recommended to the Assembly a draft resolution endorsing the Strategy and urging its implementation (see below).

The 12-nation draft resolution, introduced by the United Kingdom, was approved by the Council's Third (Programme and Co-ordination) Committee without vote on 14 July. It incorporated two oral amendments by the USSR to the preamble of the draft resolution submitted to the Assembly: a new paragraph stating that peace and security were important for the preservation and improvement of the health of all people and that co-operation among nations on health issues could contribute substantially to peace; and revision of another paragraph to mention, as the basis of the Strategy, the Declaration of Alma-Ata on primary health care, adopted in 1978 by the WHO International Conference on Primary Health Care, held at Alma-Ata, USSR.<sup>(7)</sup> These amendments were accepted by the sponsors after they sub-amended the latter to state that the Alma-Ata Declaration implied an integrated (rather than a complex) approach to the solution of health care problems.

Brazil, although joining in the consensus on the resolution, objected to any partial or incomplete implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade<sup>(4)</sup> and thought the resolution's criteria for basic needs did not meet the developing countries' real requirements.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. Adopting without vote the draft recommended by the Economic and Social Council, the General Assembly endorsed the Global Strategy by a resolution of 19 November,<sup>(5)</sup> similarly approved by the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee on 30 October. The Assembly urged Member States to ensure implementation of the Strategy as part of efforts to implement the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, and requested United Nations organizations to collaborate with WHO to that end.

A note to the Assembly submitted by the Secretary-General in September outlined the background and main points of the WHO report and the Council's action.

During discussion in the Second Committee, China said it was essential for developing countries to plan and gradually establish a health system based on primary health care in order to curb the spread of diseases and raise health levels. India urged the provision of adequate resources to make the Global Strategy a reality. Sierra Leone stressed the need for popular participation, especially involving the rural population, and the application of technology in harmony with the environment. The USSR said the Strategy could be implemented only if progressive socio-economic changes were carried out in developing countries, if national income was distributed equitably, if State social security systems were introduced and if effective measures were taken to achieve peace and disarmament.

Global Strategy for Health for All by the Year 2000

The Economic and Social Council.

Recalling General Assembly resolution 34/58 of 29 November 1979 entitled "Health as an integral part of development", Having considered the Global Strategy for Health for All by the Year 2000 and the progress report thereon submitted by the Director-General of the World Health Organization.

1. Commends to the attention of the General Assembly at its thirty-sixth session the full text of the Global Strategy for Health for All by the Year 2000;

2. Recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of the following draft resolution:

General Assembly resolution 36/43

Adopted without vote Meeting 64 19 November 1981

Approved by Second Committee (A/36/691) without vote, 30 October (meeting 28); draft by Economic and Social Council (resolution 1981/61); agenda item 12.

Global Strategy for Health for All by the Year 2000

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 34/58 of 29 November 1979 concerning health as an integral part of development,

Noting with approval World Health Assembly resolution WHA 34.36 of 22 May 1981 by which the thirty-fourth Assembly unanimously adopted the Global Strategy for Health for All by the Year 2000.

Considering that the Global Strategy fully reflects the spirit of General Assembly resolution 34/58.

Considering that peace and security are important conditions for the preservation and improvement of the health of all people and that co-operation among nations on vital health issues can contribute substantially to peace,

Noting further that the Global Strategy is based upon the principles of the Declaration of Alma-Ata on primary health care, which implies an integrated approach to the solution of health care problems and requires the fullest support and involvement of all economic and social development sectors,

Recognizing that the implementation of the Global Strategy will constitute a valuable contribution to the improvement of overall socio-economic conditions, and thus to the fulfilment of the international Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

1. Endorses the Global Strategy for Health for All by the Year 2000 as a major contribution of Member States to the attainment of the world-wide social goal of health for all by the year 2000 and to the fulfilment of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade;

2. Urges all Member States to ensure the implementation of the Global Strategy as part of their multisectoral efforts to implement the provisions contained in the international Development Strategy;

3. Also urges all Member States to co-operate with one another and with the World Health Organization to ensure that the necessary international action is taken to implement the Global Strategy as part of the fulfilment of the international Development Strategy;

4. Requests all appropriate organizations and bodies of the United Nations system—including the United Nations Children's Fund, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the International Labour Organisation, the United Nations Development Programme, the United Nations Environment Programme, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the United Nations Fund for Population Activities and the World Bank—to collaborate fully with the World Health Organization in carrying out the Global Strategy;

5. Requests the Director-General of the World Health Organization to ensure that measures to implement the Global Strategy are taken into account in the review and appraisal of the implementation of the international Development Strategy.

Primary health care

The United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) spent more than $47 million on maternal and child health programmes in 107 countries during 1981. It continued to promote primary health care services as a means of extending basic health services to whole populations, using health workers chosen by the community for front-line curative, preventive and promotional tasks.

In May, the UNICEF Executive Board<sup>(1)</sup> welcomed efforts by UNICEF and WHO to cooperate in comprehensive national approaches to primary health care. The Board also approved a strengthening of support for important components of this approach, such as immunization (p. 1005) control of diarrhoeal diseases (p. 1004) and the supply of essential drugs (see below), and endorsed recommendations on primary health care made by the UNICEF/WHO Joint Committee on Health Policy at its twenty-third session (Geneva, 2 and 3 February).<sup>(2)</sup>

The Committee recommended that UNICEF and WHO: reaffirm the principles of the primary health care approach; co-operate in mobilizing substantial assistance to countries committed to practising that approach; collaborate with countries to strengthen or establish a high-level political mechanism for decision-making on socio-economic development policies relevant to health promotion; support the mobilization of national institutions into a network to collaborate with the policy/planning mechanism responsible for health policies and programmes; strengthen their capacity to co-operate with countries in extending the primary health care approach to all people; help countries to increase their own capabilities in health economic analysis and health care legislation; support countries in developing innovative approaches to planning for health; and help countries to develop and disseminate material on primary health care for use in public campaigns and to develop training programmes for health workers.

Essential drugs

The outline of a UNICEF/WHO Joint Programme on Provision of Essential Drugs for Primary Health Care in Developing Countries was approved in February by the UNICEF/WHO Joint Committee on Health Policy.<sup>(1)</sup> Developed by the secretariats of the two organizations,<sup>(2)</sup> the Programme had as its long-term objective to ensure the regular supply of safe essential drugs to all people at reasonable cost. Immediate objectives called for UNICEF and WHO to assist in developing national lists of essential drugs, providing some drugs free of charge, establishing mechanisms for group bulk purchasing schemes for African countries, and developing and organizing programmes for drug management, local formulation, distribution and quality assurance.

Human resources development

On 27 June 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) authorized the UNDP Administrator to spend $80,000 to disseminate information on the national experience of countries in training qualified national personnel and enhancing their role in national social and economic development, as requested by the General Assembly in December 1980.<sup>(2)</sup>

Reporting to the Council in February 1981 on his plans for implementing the Assembly's request,<sup>(1)</sup> the Administrator said the first step would be to prepare an inventory of information being collected by the United Nations system on training of personnel. Based on that inventory, a determination should be made of how information systems could be improved to ensure periodic dissemination of information. A report would then be prepared for the Assembly in 1982.

UN Institute for Training and Research

Activities of UNITAR

The United Nations Institute for Training and Research (UNITAR), an autonomous organization within the United Nations system., added several new activities in 1981 despite economy measures adopted during the year. These programmes and other UNITAR activities, as well as information on its finances (p. 807), were described by the Executive Director in his annual reports to the General Assembly, detailing activities from 1 July 1980 to 30 June 1981<sup>(2)</sup> and from 1 July 1981 to 30 June 1982.<sup>(3)</sup>

One of the the major events of 1981 was the establishment in May of the UNITAR/UNDP Information Centre on Heavy Crude and Tar Sands (p. 708).

Among the training programmes organized by UNITAR, seminars for members of permanent missions of Member States to the United Nations covered the drafting of treaties and other international instruments (New York, 20-24 April) and information for new delegates to the General Assembly (New York, 16-18 September). Seminars on special aspects of United Nations work covered: international economics for diplomats (Geneva, March); law of the sea (New York, 6 March; Geneva, July); economic development and its international setting, co-sponsored by the Economic Development Institute of the World Bank

(Washington, D. C., March); regionalism and world order, in collaboration with the Georgetown University School of Foreign Service (Washington, D. C., 17-19 June); storage, retrieval and use of United Nations documentation (New York, February); United Nations finances (New York, 19-21 May); and the working of the United Nations system, for new diplomats in permanent missions New York, 27-30 January). A workshop on international negotiations was also held (New York, 12-15 May).

Training programmes other than for diplomats included: the UNITAR-administered fellowship programme in international law and a regional training and refresher course in international law for African countries (Cairo, Egypt, 28 February-13 March), both part of the United Nations Programme of Assistance in the Teaching, Study, Dissemination and Wider Appreciation of International Law (p. 1267); a seminar on multilateral diplomacy and the new international economic order (Vienna, Austria, 1-12 June); and an orientation course on the international civil service (Geneva, 16-20 February).

Two training programmes for government officials from Portuguese-speaking Africa were given at the request of Angola, Cape Verde, Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique, and Sao Tome and Principe. A training course on multilateral diplomacy and international co-operation for young diplomats from Yemen, begun in September 1980, ended on 3 July 1981. Briefing seminars on problems facing the United Nations were held in July for graduate students of the Universidad Central de Venezuela and in August for junior Saudi Arabian diplomats. UNITAR continued to advise the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Saudi Arabia on developing institutes of diplomatic studies. Improving the curriculum of the Diplomatic Institute in Pakistan was the purpose of an April visit to that country by two UNITAR experts.

Special training activities included a UNITAR/Libyan Institute of Diplomatic Studies symposium on the material remnants of the Second World War (Geneva, 28 April-1 May) and a seminar organized with Uppsala University on law and the new international economic order (Uppsala, Sweden, June).

Research activities begun in 1981 included preparation of an analytical guide to applying the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.<sup>(4)</sup> Another new project examined the organization and efficacy of the Economic and Social Council as the principal United Nations organ for formulating international economic policy and co-ordinating United Nations economic and social activities. Analyses of voting behaviour in the General Assembly and of diplomats' views on the United Nations system were published. A programme on regional and interregional co-operation in the 1980s was placed under the jurisdiction of the Department of Research. A set of uniform rules applicable to disaster relief operations was prepared and published.

The UNITAR Project on the Future, concentrating on long-term problems of socio-economic and technological transformation, continued work on two broad themes: policy choices related to implementing a new international economic order, and the meaning of physical limits and supply constraints to energy and natural resources. A UNITAR conference examined small-scale energy resources (Los Angeles, California, United States, 9-19 September). A symposium on new and renewable energy sources was held in Moscow (20-24 April), co-sponsored by UNITAR and the secretariat of the 1981 United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy (p. 689).

The Project on the Future remained a separate unit within UNITAR despite a 1980 recommendation by the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) that the Project be merged into a reconstituted Department of Research.<sup>(6)</sup> In a November 1981 report to the General Assembly's Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee on implementation of JIU recommendations,<sup>(7)</sup> the Secretary-General noted that the UNITAR Board of Trustees considered the Project on the Future too distinct in scope, purpose and character to be usefully merged into the Research Department.

In partial response to a JIU recommendation that the UNITAR Geneva office be phased out, the office was reduced to a small liaison unit. A JIU recommendation that UNITAR become an executing agency for projects financed by UNDP was accepted by UNITAR.

Fourteen publications and two periodicals were published by UNITAR in 1981 (see list on next page).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 4 December, the General Assembly adopted without vote a resolution<sup>(5)</sup> welcoming steps taken by UNITAR to enhance its effectiveness, reduce its costs and increase its resources, and calling on it to organize its work programme and ensure that estimated expenditure did not exceed estimated revenue. Also welcomed was its concentration on economic and social training and research, including projects in areas previously identified by the Assembly. The Executive Director was called upon to continue to rationalize UNITAR activities and to seek further co-ordination of its research programme with similar activities of other institutions. Countries were called on to increase their contributions (p. 809).

The 35-nation draft resolution was recommended without vote on 20 November by the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, as revised by its sponsors in writing and orally. The oral changes related to provisions on finances (p. 807) and contributions.

Speaking after the Committee's action, the USSR said it had not opposed consensus approval of the resolution because it believed UNITAR activities were constructive, but it thought UNITAR could go even further than the laudable efforts it had made to reduce its deficit. Comments on UNITAR financing were also made by Brazil, Canada, the Federal Republic of Germany and the United States.

During the Committee's discussion of research and training, Austria, Bangladesh, Egypt, Jamaica, Japan, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malaysia, Pakistan, Poland, Sierra Leone, Sri Lanka and Uganda voiced appreciation for the emphasis UNITAR placed on research related to such topics as regional co-operation and the new international economic order, new and renewable energy sources, international economic co-operation and the Project on the Future. Ghana particularly welcomed the UNITAR publications programme.

Austria felt that UNITAR should set priorities among projects and avoid expansion in areas of lesser importance. Bangladesh suggested that the Institute study the situation of the least developed countries. India urged that UNITAR avoid too much theory in the matter of economic development, which might jeopardize practical goals. Similarly, Pakistan thought greater emphasis might be given to applied research, the results of which could directly benefit the development of developing countries. The view of the Philippines was that support should be given so that UNITAR could complete its project of consolidating the norms and principles of international law relating to a new international economic order (p. 1260).

The Byelorussian SSR remarked that some UNITAR seminars were unobjective and were used to spread ideas at variance with United Nations principles; to prevent such situations, UNITAR should arrange for participants from socialist and developing countries to attend its seminars. Poland welcomed UNITAR work related to the establishment of a new international economic order but felt that its studies should be of more practical use for delegations involved in negotiations on a new mechanism to govern international economic relations. The USSR stressed the usefulness of UNITAR work, including seminars in which Soviet organizations had participated, but expressed dissatisfaction that it did not have major research or training programmes on international security and thought it should also concentrate on restructuring international economic relations and on developing non-discriminatory economic, scientific and technical co-operation among countries having different socio-economic systems and at different levels of development.

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 3201 (S-VI) and 3202 (S-VI) of 1 May 1974, containing the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order,

Recalling its resolution 3281 (XXIX) of 12 December 1974, containing the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States,

Recalling further its resolutions 35/53 A and B of 5 December 1980 on the United Nations Institute for Training and Research,

Acknowledging the value of the research and the studies on the future undertaken by the United Nations Institute for Training and Research,

Recognizing the role of the United Nations Institute for Training and Research in assisting, through training and other services within its mandate, members of permanent missions to the United Nations and other national officials concerned with the work of the United Nations,

1. Takes note of the report of the Executive Director of the United Nations Institute for Training and Research and of his introductory statement on 2 October 1981;

2. Welcomes the emphasis on, and urges the continuation of, the concentration of the work of the United Nations Institute for Training and Research in the sphere of economic and social training and research and the inclusion of specific projects on the problems that exist in the areas identified by the General Assembly at its sixth and seventh special sessions and in the relevant decisions adopted by the Assembly at its twenty-ninth and subsequent sessions, taking into consideration the statements on the programme of work of the Institute made at the present session;

3. Calls upon the Executive Director of the United Nations Institute for Training and Research to continue to rationalize the activities of the Institute and, in this context, to seek further co-ordination of its research programme with similar activities of other institutions, within and outside the United Nations system, and to continue to present research results, as far as possible, in a manner relevant to policy-making;

4. Welcomes also, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 35/53 B, the steps taken so far by the United Nations Institute for Training and Research to enhance its effectiveness, to reduce its costs and to increase its resources, and calls upon the Institute to organize its programme of work and activities and to adjust its administrative costs so as to ensure that, as from 1982, estimated expenditure does not exceed estimated revenue;

5. Urges all States that have not yet contributed to the United Nations Institute for Training and Research to do so, and calls upon all donor countries, especially those that are not contributing at a level commensurate with their capacity, to increase their voluntary contributions in order to meet the needs of the Institute.

Finances of UNITAR

Despite economy measures adopted by the UNITAR Executive Director, a grant-in-aid from the United Nations budget and new contributions from a few States, the UNITAR General Fund recorded a budget deficit of $49,421 in 1981. This shortfall was ascribed by the Executive Director to reduced contributions from some States, exchange-rate fluctuations, United Nations salary increases, higher heating and communications costs, increased New York City taxes and pledges of contributions which failed to materialize.<sup>(6)</sup> Without the $352,600 grant, expenditure would have exceeded income by $281,427, compared to $504,482 in 1980.

Income from special purpose grants amounted to $3,153,909 against expenditures of $2,192,631, leaving a surplus of $961,278 and raising the available balance to $3,452,159 as at 31 December, including $2,455,396 in convertible currencies and $996,763 in non-convertible currencies.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 9 December, the General Assembly's Fifth Committee approved an amount of $352,600 as a grant-in-aid to UNITAR.<sup>(4)</sup> The sum was approved by a recorded vote—requested by Singapore—of 68 to 13, with 6 abstentions. The appropriation was subsequently included in the United Nations regular budget for 1980-1981, adopted on 18 December.<sup>(8)</sup> The grant was intended to cover the remaining UNITAR deficit for 1980-1981, after taking account of the $305,700 appropriated by the Assembly for that purpose in 1980.<sup>(9)</sup> The appropriation was recommended by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions<sup>(3)</sup> after the matter was referred to the Fifth Committee by the Second Committee Chairman in a communication of 17 November.<sup>(1)</sup>

The forecast amount of the deficit was reported to the Assembly in the Executive Director's annual report for 1980/1981<sup>(5)</sup> and in a November 1981 note by the Secretary-General.<sup>(2)</sup> The Executive Director said that, as a result of some increases in appropriations and major reductions in expenditure, the deficit had been reduced from the initial estimate of $646,060.

In its 4 December resolution on UNITAR, the Assembly welcomed steps taken to reduce its costs and called on it to organize its work programme and activities and to adjust its administrative costs so as to ensure that, from 1982, estimated expenditure did not exceed estimated revenue.<sup>(7)</sup> Singapore, introducing the revised draft resolution on behalf of its 35 sponsors, deleted a phrase in paragraph 1 noting the reference in the Executive Director's report to the Institute's financial situation in 1981 and 1982.

Among those opposing the grant approved by the Fifth Committee, the Federal Republic of Germany and Italy said they had voted against for budgetary reasons only; the former added that UNITAR was making a valuable contribution. Japan hoped that from 1982 UNITAR would reduce expenditures to ensure a balanced budget. The United Kingdom expressed the view that operational activities should not be financed through the United Nations budget and that grants should not be provided to United Nations organizations funded by voluntary contributions and thus free from external control over their spending. The United States opposed transferring items from voluntary financing to the regular budget.

Algeria, Barbados, Benin, Canada, Egypt, Ghana, Guinea, Jamaica, Kenya, Pakistan, Peru, the Philippines, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Sweden and Yugoslavia supported the recommendation for a grant from the United Nations budget; several of them cited the efforts by UNITAR to reduce its budget deficit. Austria also voted in favour while hoping that UNITAR would set priorities and avoid expansion in programmes of lesser importance. Barbados stressed the need for UNITAR to achieve a balanced budget in 1982.

In the Second Committee, support for the UNITAR request for financial assistance from the United Nations budget was expressed by China, Ghana, India, Jamaica, Norway, Sri Lanka, Sweden and the Syrian Arab Republic, Bangladesh, France and the Federal Republic of Germany supported the funding request in 1981 in the light of the budget deficit but said the budget should be balanced in 1982.

Brazil, Japan, the USSR, the United States and Uruguay opposed a grant of funds from the United Nations budget. Japan thought this incompatible with the independence of UNITAR, while the United States urged that it turn to non-governmental organizations for funds. Uruguay said that, if the manner in which UNITAR was financed was changed, its function should also be changed to respond more directly to the interests of Member States. India, on the other hand, felt that independence might be threatened by dependence on voluntary funding or special purpose grants. Norway stated that grant funding for UNITAR did not mean a new element was being introduced into the United Nations budget, since it was an ad hoc measure. Referring to such grants as a stop-gap, the Philippines said it was time to find innovative and long-term solutions. Contributions from States were called for by Austria, Egypt, France, Ghana, Jamaica, Norway, Peru, the Philippines, Sierra Leone, Sri Lanka, Sweden, the Syrian Arab Republic, and Trinidad and Tobago.

Some States, including Canada, Egypt, India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka and Uganda, thought consideration should be given to the idea of providing UNITAR with a core budget financed from the United Nations regular budget, to guarantee financial stability. In Sweden's view, such a step would become necessary if voluntary contributions were not forthcoming.

Efforts by UNITAR to balance its budget were welcomed by Austria, France, the Federal Republic of Germany and Jamaica. The Federal Republic of Germany recommended further cost reductions by redeploying resources from less important programmes and not starting new projects. France thought the future of UNITAR was far from assured and that it would be necessary to plan on reducing its activities and personnel costs. Spain suggested that UNITAR confine its activities within the limits determined by the level of voluntary contributions from States. On the other hand, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya saw a need to build up UNITAR economically rather than restrict its activities.

Accounts for 1980

By a resolution of 30 November 1981<sup>(2)</sup> on the 1980 accounts of various United Nations programmes and funds, the General Assembly accepted the UNITAR accounts for the year ended 31 December 1980 and requested remedial action where required by the Board of Auditors in its comments on the accounts.<sup>(1)</sup>

The Board, in its examination of the UNITAR accounts, found internal controls and accounting procedures to be generally satisfactory, but recommended improvements in the area of budgetary and inventory control to ensure that no expenditure was incurred before allotments were issued and that annual inventory reports were prepared regularly.

Commenting on the UNITAR accounts in the Assembly's Fifth Committee, Japan agreed with the Board's comment that no expenditure should be incurred before allotments were issued and added that organizations should aim at attaining objectives within approved appropriations. Morocco observed that the UNITAR action in this regard was contrary to the United Nations Financial Regulations and Rules. The Philippines thought the Board might consider undertaking a comprehensive audit in view of the weaknesses in controls it had identified. The USSR reiterated its objections to a grant to UNITAR from the United Nations budget (p. 807), stating that it would withhold its share of the funds appropriated for that purpose. Also objecting, the United States said that good financial management could prevent deficits; increases in UNITAR expenditures on travel and hospitality at a time of financial difficulty defied understanding:

Contributions

Forty-two countries paid contributions to the UNITAR General Fund totalling $2,134,619 for 1981 as at 31 December (see table opposite). In addition, contributions for future years were pledged by Sweden ($127,446) and the United Republic of Tanzania ($7,273).

The Executive Director, in his annual report for 1980/1981,<sup>(1)</sup> stated that the response of non-contributing States to the 1980 General Assembly appeal for funds<sup>(2)</sup> and to fund-raising efforts had not been encouraging. Only a few States had announced new contributions. Some had increased their contributions but one major donor had significantly reduced its 1981 contribution because of budget constraints, supplying instead a Professional officer without cost to UNITAR. The Executive Director reported that he had had difficulty persuading major contributors with similar problems to maintain their level of support.

States that had not contributed were urged to do so in the resolution on UNITAR adopted by the Assembly on 4 December.<sup>(3)</sup> In addition, all donor countries, especially those not contributing at a level commensurate with their capacity, were called upon to increase their contributions.

Before this resolution was approved by the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, the sponsors orally deleted the word "substantial" from the call for increased contributions.

UN University

Activities of UNU

The dedication of a site for the permanent headquarters of the United Nations University (UNU) and the adoption by its Council of a medium-term perspective for 1982-1987 (p. 811) highlighted UNU activities during 1981. This autonomous United Nations institution, operating since 1975 through world-wide networks of academic and research institutions and individual scholars, also continued its work of research, advanced training and dissemination of knowledge in its three broad programmes—on world hunger, human and social development, and the use and management of natural resources.

The 2 November dedication ceremony for the site of UNU headquarters in central Tokyo followed a decision by the Japanese Ministry of Education on the selection of an 18,600-square-metre plot of land in the Aoyama area of Shibuya Ward, made available by the city of Tokyo. The value of the land, offered free of charge, was estimated at $150 million.

In mid-1981, there were 28 associated institutions and 112 research and training units carrying out UNU work in more than 60 countries. By 31 December, 233 UNU fellows had completed training. UNU published more than 100 titles, including issues of the quarterly Food and Nutrition Bulletin and the monthly ASSET (Abstracts of Selected Solar Energy Technology), and began co-publishing a new journal, Mountain Research and Development, in co-operation with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and the International Mountain Society.

Under the world hunger programme, research and training continued in regard to three subprogrammes—hunger and society, hunger and health, and hunger and technology. A total of 152 persons had completed advanced training by the end of December, while 72 were to continue training. Special supplements of the Food and Nutrition Bulletin were issued: Food Price Policies and Nutrition in Latin America; Nutritional Evaluation of Protein Foods; Protein-Energy Requirements of Developing Countries; Evaluation of New Data; and Interdisciplinary Dialogue on World Hunger. Meetings, workshops and symposia were held on such topics as iron deficiency and work output (United States, April/May); evaluation methodologies for nutritional effects of development programmes (United States, September); food as a human right (Norway, October); and agriculture, food science and nutrition (India, November).

The human and social development programme concentrated on two subprogrammes—problems of development and technology for development. Work on development problems focused on three continuing projects: goals, processes and indicators of development; socio-cultural development alternatives in a changing world; and Arab alternative futures, the first of a planned series of regional projects. Three aspects of technology were being examined: sharing of traditional technology; research and development in rural settings; and the Japanese experience in technology transfer, transformation and development. Ninety-eight universities and research centres were associated with the programme. Among meetings, workshops and symposia was a joint meeting with UNESCO on the application of indicators of socio-economic change to social planning (Seoul, Republic of Korea, September).

Under the programme on the use and management of natural resources, a new subprogramme on coastal resources management was developed. Other activities concerned agro-forestry systems, highland-lowland interactive systems, water-level interactive systems, and energy systems, with special reference to rural energy systems. Seven institutions were associated with the programme, and 13 research and training units were in operation.

The Council's Ad Hoc Committee on Planning, appointed in December 1980,<sup>(6)</sup> held its first session in Tokyo from 27 April to 1 May 1981, to advise on the medium-term plan and other programme development matters. The first meeting of the Rector's newly formed advisory committee was held in Tokyo from 16 to 20 March, when the current state of the programmes and the future direction and development of UNU were discussed.

The work of UNU was described in the annual reports of its Council to the General Assembly, covering activities from 1 July 1980 to 30 June 1981<sup>(2)</sup> and from 1 July 1981 to 30 June 1982.<sup>(3)</sup>

UNU COUNCIL ACTION. The progress of UNU and its Rector's views on new developments were discussed at the seventeenth session of the UNU Council, held at Geneva from 22 to 26 June. At that session, the Council considered a paper on the medium-term perspective for 1982-1987, submitted by the Rector, and expressed its general agreement with his proposals. It adopted the perspective at its eighteenth session, held at Abu Dhabi, United Arab Emirates, from 21 to 25 November.

At the latter session, the Council also approved the UNU programme and budget for 1982, and appointed an ad hoc committee to review the rules of procedure, prepare guidelines for the conduct of Council business and consider ways of ensuring substantive discussions of the UNU programme at Council sessions. It agreed that high priority should be given to collaboration with international educational and scientific organizations. The Council also approved the establishment in 1982 of a Planning and Evaluation Unit and of a mechanism for external evaluation of the University's development, to cover entire programmes as well as individual projects.

The Economic and Social Council decided without vote on 21 October 1981 to authorize the transmittal of the Council's 1980/1981 report directly to the General Assembly.<sup>(5)</sup>

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 19 November, by a resolution<sup>(4)</sup> adopted without vote, the General Assembly welcomed the development of UNU activities under the five themes of its medium-term perspective (p. 811). Also welcoming the opportunities for greater collaboration between UNU, the United Nations system and academic communities and institutions, the Assembly decided to encourage efforts to promote understanding of the University's enlarged scope of work, so as to help generate increased financial support from various sources, including non-governmental organizations. Member States were called upon to contribute generously (p. 812).

The resolution was recommended by the Second Committee without vote on 30 October after informal consultations resulted in the withdrawal of an initial draft<sup>(1)</sup> sponsored by 16 nations and introduced by Japan. The second draft, introduced by a Vice-Chairman, added to paragraph 4 the phrase by which the Assembly decided to encourage understanding of the University's enlarged scope of work so as to generate increased financial support.

Austria, Japan, Peru, the Philippines, Poland, Trinidad and Tobago, and the United Kingdom cautioned against duplication by UNU of the work of other United Nations agencies as it broadened its scope, and said studies and research should be co-ordinated with other institutions and United Nations agencies. Poland added that UNU should promote and co-ordinate research in selected programmes and develop and strengthen relations with universities and research centres world-wide. Egypt and others favoured closer co-operation between UNU and UNITAR. Japan and Sweden were among those which commended efforts to co-ordinate UNU activities with those of other United Nations agencies.

China, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malaysia and Uruguay said UNU should continue to place emphasis on the problems of developing countries; China felt the topics of UNU studies should be more specific, while Malaysia believed it had a role to play in the search for solutions to economic problems so as to bring about more balanced relations among nations. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya hoped UNU would pay more attention to the training of educators and to the issuance of publications in Arabic. Pakistan urged priority for UNU assistance in the establishment of scientific institutions in developing countries. The Syrian Arab Republic considered as constructive the work of UNU in preparing specialized studies on science and technology for development. Uruguay felt that UNU programmes should have broader geographical coverage and should deal with environmental problems. China, Ghana, India, Pakistan and Uruguay welcomed continued emphasis on implementing the three programmes originally formulated by UNU.

Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago welcomed the establishment by UNU of a wide network of associated institutes, including the University of the West Indies. Uganda called for greater efforts to promote awareness of the objectives of UNU among Governments, the international academic community and other national and international institutions. The United Kingdom believed that an evaluation of past work could help determine whether the proposed extension of UNU activities was justified and whether the global studies envisaged would contribute to decision-making in the United Nations system and by Governments.

United Nations University

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 2951(XXVII) of 11 December 1972, 3061(XXVIII) of 6 December 1973, 3313(XXIX) of 14 December 1974, 3439(XXX) of 9 December 1975, 31/117 and 31/118 of 16 December 1976, 32/54 of 8 December 1977, 33/108 of 18 December 1978, 34/112 of 14 December 1979 and 35/54 of 5 December 1980,

Having considered the report of the Council of the United Nations University on the work of the University, Noting decision 5.2.1 of 2 October 1981, adopted by the Executive Board of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization at its one hundred and thirteenth session.

1. Welcomes the development of the activities of the United Nations University under five themes with which the Council of the University expressed its general agreement at its seventeenth session;

2. Notes with satisfaction the decision to move towards a six-year medium-term perspective;

3. Welcomes the opportunities under the medium-term perspective for greater collaboration at various levels between the United Nations University and the United Nations system and academic communities and Institutions;

4. Notes that the enlarged scope of the programmes and activities of the United Nations University in promoting advanced research and training on global problems affecting mankind and in ensuring a more effective global dissemination of knowledge calls for greater resources for their implementation, and decides to encourage efforts to promote understanding of this enlarged scope of the work of the University, thereby helping to generate increased financial support from various sources, including non-governmental organizations;

5. Earnestly appeals to all Member States to give special attention to those encouraging developments and to contribute generously and urgently to the Endowment Fund of the United Nations University and, additionally or alternatively, to make operating contributions to the University in order to enable it to fulfil effectively its global mandate.

Work programme for 1982-1987

The medium-term perspective, 1982-1987, adopted by the UNU Council in November 1981 stemmed from the Council's 1979 decision<sup>(2)</sup> that the University could not continue operating on a year-to-year basis as it had in its formative years since 1975. The six-year perspective, described in the Council's 1981/1982 report to the General Assembly,<sup>(1)</sup> had four aims: broadening the scope of the UNU programme and making it more coherent, responsive and multidimensional; strengthening the intellectual and administrative capacity of the UNU centre in Tokyo; making UNU a more decentralized and multi-centred global institution through development of institutional networks; and increasing financial resources.

Research, post-graduate training and knowledge dissemination were to be organized under five themes, two of them having multiple sub-programmes: peace, security, conflict resolution and global transformation; global economy; hunger, poverty, resources and the environment, with subprogrammes on resource policy and management, energy systems and policy, food, nutrition and poverty, and food-energy nexus; human and social development and coexistence of peoples, cultures and social systems, with subprogrammes on development problematique, cultures and world development, and socio-cultural implications of demographic change; and science and technology and their social and ethical implications. Each theme would also have a subprogramme on problems and methods of global learning.

The activities of UNU were to be developed and implemented through three modes of operation, organized in the divisions of development studies, regional and global studies, and global learning. The Development Studies Division would seek to improve understanding of global problems as manifested in particular locales by linking local problems to their national and international dimensions. The Regional and Global Studies Division would study problems in their broadest international dimensions to ensure that empirical and policy-oriented research results contributed to the broader debate among regional and international scientific and academic communities. The Global Learning Division would promote more equitable access to knowledge, encourage an understanding of local and national problems in their global dimensions and vice versa, study problems and opportunities created by the rapid growth of communications and information technology, and strengthen the outreach of UNU through co-operation with other bodies.

The perspective integrated and extended the work carried out under the three original programmes of world hunger, human and social development, and the use and management of natural resources, which ceased to exist as programmes at the end of 1981.

In the Second Committee's debate on training and research, Austria, Ghana, Japan, Poland, Sierra Leone and Sri Lanka expressed support for the new approach taken by the UNU Council in adopting a longer planning perspective and broadening its initial three programmes with the five themes. Austria said the proposed reorientation of activities could make them more relevant and responsive to the UNU mandate. Ghana welcomed the proposal to study science and technology with particular reference to social and ethical implications, thereby contributing to efforts by developing countries to cross new technological frontiers without disrupting their traditional values and cultural heritage. Sweden considered that, of the five themes, those concerned with the global economy and with hunger, poverty, resources and the environment were particularly important.

Japan considered the five themes to be basically philosophical and said that a detailed work programme should be drawn up and priorities assigned. The United Kingdom sought clarification as to what the new perspective meant in practical terms and what proportion of work would focus on practical solutions rather than theoretical studies.

UNU finances

By the end of 1981, a total of $140 million had been pledged to the UNU Endowment Fund, of which $110 million had been received. ## Chapter XVI

Environment

Throughout 1981, the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) continued its work of promoting international action to protect the environment, with the Governing Council, at its ninth session, held at Nairobi, Kenya, from 13 to 26 May, adopting 40 decisions on various aspects of the environment programme. Resolutions on topics dealt with in the Governing Council's report<sup>(1)</sup> were adopted by the Economic and Social Council in July and by the General Assembly in December.

Preparing for the 1982 Governing Council session of a special character to commemorate the tenth anniversary of the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment,<sup>(12)</sup> the Assembly adopted a resolution,<sup>(8)</sup> based largely on a Council draft, by which it decided to hold the session at Nairobi from 10 to 18 May 1982.

Several decisions were taken during the year to follow up the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification, adopted by the 1977 United Nations Conference on Desertification.<sup>(13)</sup>

The United Nations Sudano-Sahelian Office (UNSO) continued to assist the countries of that central and west African region to implement the Plan by combating deforestation, managing rangeland and water resources, and stabilizing sand dunes, as well as other planning and co-ordination efforts. The Economic and Social Council expressed satisfaction at progress made by UNSO and urged intensified aid for those countries.<sup>(2)</sup> The General Assembly invited UNEP and the United Nations Development Programme to continue their support for UNSO.<sup>(9)</sup>

In further action on the Plan, the Assembly adopted a resolution on its financing.<sup>(10)</sup> Noting with concern that insufficient funds and increasing demands on scarce resources of countries suffering from desertification were constraining the Plan's implementation, it sought Member States' views on financing measures, including the possibility of establishing and funding an independent corporation for financing desertification-control projects.

The Assembly moved closer to approving a World Charter for Nature when it requested revision of a UNEP draft in order that the Assembly might consider adopting it in 1982.<sup>(4)</sup> Also, noting that the arms race was adversely affecting the environment and damaging the vegetable and animal world, the Assembly requested completion of recommendations for the adoption by States of specific obligations relating to the protection of nature from the effects of the arms race, for submission to the Assembly's 1982 special session on disarmament.<sup>(5)</sup> Both these actions were taken in October 1981.

Growing concern over toxic substances was reflected in an Assembly resolution on information exchange on banned hazardous chemicals and unsafe pharmaceuticals.<sup>(6)</sup> Reiterating the need for intensified international co-operation on problems arising from the production and export of such substances, the Assembly urged more co-operation in providing data on them and requested that developing countries be given technical assistance to help them monitor imports.

The Assembly reiterated its support for compensation demands by States affected by landmines and other remnants of war, and appealed to all States, particularly those responsible for war remnants, to co-operate in order to solve the problem.<sup>(7)</sup>

The Economic and Social Council<sup>(3)</sup> and the General Assembly<sup>(11)</sup> adopted resolutions on international environmental co-operation covering a broad range of topics being dealt with by UNEP.

They endorsed proposals, originating in a UNEP expert group, for work on interrelationships between resources, environment, people and development (p. 390). They appealed for increased contributions to the UNEP Fund—the main source of extrabudgetary funding for projects related to the environment—which disbursed some $30.6 million for such work in 1981 (p. 817). The Council agreed to consider in 1982 a report on proposals to provide additional resources for serious environmental problems in developing countries; the Assembly welcomed ongoing consultations on the means of providing such funds and recognized the desirability of voluntary resources (p. 819).

The Assembly stressed the importance of developing a policy document outlining the Environmental Perspective to the year 2000 and beyond (p. 822). Both bodies noted work to combat marine pollution (p. 832). They stressed the need for Governments to take environmental considerations into account when participating in conferences on other subjects (p. 838). The Assembly called for UNEP action on the environmental aspects of new and renewable energy sources (p. 839). Both the Council and the Assembly expressed appreciation for efforts to develop a system-wide, medium-term environment programme, aimed at defining and co-ordinating the responsibilities of various United Nations organizations in regard to the environment during a six-year period, 1984-1989 (p. 841). The Assembly welcomed co-operation between UNEP and the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (UNCHS) (p. 842).

On other topics dealt with at its May session, the UNEP Governing Council: moved to strengthen its regional programmes (p. 817); approved the establishment or continuation of several trust funds (p. 820); included Arabic as one of its official and working languages (p. 822); called for speedy implementation of the World Climate Impact Studies Programme (p. 823); initiated work on a global framework convention for protection of the stratospheric ozone layer (p. 823); endorsed plans for the phased expansion of the world-wide environmental-information exchange network of UNEP, known as the International Referral System (INFOTERRA) (p. 826); invited countries affected by soil erosion to formulate national soils policies (p. 831); requested continued preparation of a global plan of action for conservation, management and utilization of marine mammals (p. 834); called on Governments to oppose apartheid because of the serious environmental consequences for its victims (p. 838); requested a further report on natural resources shared by two or more States (p. 839); made arrangements and determined the mandate for an October/November meeting of environmental law experts (p. 839); transmitted to the General Assembly an updated list of international environmental instruments (p. 840); acted to strengthen environmental education and training (p. 840); and recommended improved co-operation with the Economic Commission for Africa (p. 842).

States in the Caribbean, west and central Africa, east Asia and the south-east Pacific adopted action plans to protect the marine environment in those regions, as part of the UNEP regional seas programme (p. 833).

Programme policy decisions

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. On 24 July 1981, in a resolution on UNEP and international environmental co-operation,<sup>(3)</sup> the Economic and Social Council noted the UNEP Governing Council's report on its ninth session (13-26 May),<sup>(2)</sup> as well as reports on marine pollution (p. 832) and the UNEP contribution to the August United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy (p. 839). It called on UNEP to play its role in implementing the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade (p., 838),<sup>(4)</sup> endorsed proposals for a work programme on resources, environment, people and development (p. 391), and expressed appreciation for efforts to develop the 1984-1989 system-wide medium-term environment programme (p. 841). It agreed to consider in 1982 a report on additional resources for serious environmental problems in developing countries (p. 819) and appealed for increased contributions to the UNEP Fund (p. 818). The General Assembly was invited to consider a proposal on arrangements for the Governing Council's 1982 special session (p. 821).

The resolution was adopted without vote. On 21 July, the draft, sponsored by Argentina, Denmark, India, Kenya, the Sudan and Sweden, had been similarly approved by the Council's First (Economic) Committee after oral amendments and revision in informal consultations.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 17 December, in a resolution on UNEP and international environmental co-operation,<sup>(5)</sup> the General Assembly noted the Governing Council's report<sup>(2)</sup> and the report on marine pollution. It called for UNEP action on new and renewable energy sources and on implementation of the International Development Strategy,<sup>(4)</sup> and requested implementation of the work programme on resources, environment, people and development. The Assembly recognized the desirability of voluntary resources for meeting the most serious environmental problems of developing countries and appealed for substantially increased contributions to the UNEP Fund. It expressed appreciation for efforts to develop the medium-term environment programme, and welcomed co-operation between UNEP and UNCHS (p. 842). After stressing the importance of developing the Environmental Perspective to the year 2000 and beyond, the Assembly invited the Governing Council to make recommendations on the topic (p. 823).

The resolution was adopted without vote after the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee had approved the draft in like manner on 7 December. The orally revised text was proposed by a Vice-Chairman on the basis of informal consultations on a draft submitted by 13 nations, subsequently withdrawn.<sup>(1)</sup> The revision concerned the provisions on contributions to the UNEP Fund, additional resources for developing countries and the Environmental Perspective document.

The USSR said it had not opposed the resolution because it generally endorsed the activities of UNEP, which should continue to be oriented towards global, regional and interregional problems whose solution concerned all or nearly all States. Reservations were also expressed on the type of contributions to the UNEP Fund, additional resources for developing countries (USSR), and the work programme on resources, environment, people and development (Federal Republic of Germany).

Comments on the UNEP programme were made during the Second Committee's debate on development and international economic co-operation. Belgium thought UNEP should continue to stimulate and co-ordinate environmental research and action, without itself undertaking operational activities. The Byelorussian SSR said UNEP should continue to finance posts and projects within the framework of the Economic Commission for Europe, and Poland hoped UNEP would pay greater attention to environmental hazards in Europe. India suggested that UNEP make prominent use of technical co-operation among developing countries, since some of those countries possessed labour-intensive technologies particularly suited to the needs of others. New Zealand stated that UNEP activities should be principally directed towards activities of global benefit rather than to national projects. Other comments on the UNEP programme were made in the context of the system-wide medium-term environment programme (p. 842).

International co-operation on the environment

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 35/56 of 5 December 1980 on the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Reaffirming the need for further International co-operation in the field of the environment and reiterating that environmental considerations should be viewed in the context of the national plans and priorities and development objectives of all countries, in particular the developing countries,

Having regard to General Assembly resolution 35/74 of 5 December 1980. In which the Assembly decided, inter alia, to convene, in 1982, a session of a special character of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme,

Having considered the report of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme on the work of its ninth session, the note by the Executive Director of the United Nations Environment Programme on the work on the Interrelationships between resources, environment, people and development, prepared on the basis of the recommendations of a high-level group of experts, as well as the reports of the Governing Council concerning the contribution of the United Nations Environment Programme to the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and on marine pollution,

1. Takes note of the report of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme on the work of its ninth session;

2. Also takes note of the report of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme concerning the contribution of the Programme to the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, submitted in pursuance of Economic and Social Council resolution 1980/49 of 23 July 1980; supports the appeal of the Governing Council to the Preparatory Committee for the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy that the Conference should give sufficient emphasis and attach high priority to uses of new and renewable energy sources which would make it possible to tackle the major problem of fuel wood; invites the Conference to give serious consideration to the environmental effects of the production and use of various renewable sources of energy; and considers that the Programme should have an active role in the follow-up to the Conference, as regards the relationship between new and renewable sources of energy and the environment;

3. Notes with appreciation the report of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme on marine pollution and the report of the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization on the same subject, submitted in pursuance of paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 34/183 of 18 December 1979, and transmits them to the General Assembly for consideration;

4. Calls upon the United Nations Environment Programme to play its role fully in the implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, and stresses the need for all Governments and United Nations agencies to take environmental considerations fully into account when participating in negotiations and conferences organized by the United Nations on subjects other than environmental ones, such as the United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries;

5. Endorses in principle, as recommended by the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme, the proposals made by the high-level group of experts with regard to the programme of work on the interrelationships between resources, environment, people and development and the important role that the Programme should assume in this regard consistent with its mandate, invites the General Assembly to request the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation to provide for the implementation of those proposals within the context of the programme of work to be established pursuant to General Assembly resolution 35/74, taking into account Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/51, and takes note of the views expressed by the Governing Council on the report of the Secretary-General on the interrelationships between resources, environment, people and development;

6. Requests organs and organizations of the United Nations system to take fully into account the view of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination that the system-wide medium-term environment programme should be seen not only as a document of use to the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme, but also, to the extent relevant to their particular mandates, as a document of basic interest to the governing bodies of other United Nations organizations, and expresses its appreciation of the continued efforts made by the United Nations Environment Programme, in co-operation with the entire United Nations system, in the development of the system-wide medium-term environment programme;

7. Invites the General Assembly to give favourable consideration to the draft resolution on a session of a special character of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme in 1982, proposed in decision 9/2 of 26 May 1981 of the Governing Council;

8. Agrees to consider the report of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme on additional resources for serious environmental problems in developing countries at its second regular session of 1982;

9. Expresses its appreciation to Governments that continue to contribute generously to the Fund of the United Nations Environment Programme;

10. Appeals to all Governments to increase substantially their contributions to the Fund and to make, before the end of 1981, firm pledges of contributions to the Fund for the period 1982-1983, taking into account decision 9/23 of 26 May 1981 of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme, as adopted;

11. Reiterates its appeal to Governments that have not yet contributed to the Fund to do so before the end of 1981 and to those Governments still contributing amounts below their means to increase their contributions for the period 1982-1983.

By its decision 9/24, the Governing Council decided to postpone its response to paragraph 9 of Economic and Social Council resolution 1980/49 and to paragraph 12 of General Assembly resolution 35/74 relating to additional resources for environmental problems in developing countries.

General Assembly resolution 36/192

Adopted without vote Meeting 103 17 December 1981

Approved by Second Committee (A/36/694/Add.9) without vote. 7 December (meeting 46): draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/36/L.132), orally revised, based on informal consultations on 13-nation draft (A/C.2/36/L.45): agenda item 69 (j).

International co-operation in the field of the environment
The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme on the work of its ninth session, in particular annex II thereto,

Taking note of Economic and Social Council resolutions 1981/51 of 22 July 1981 and 1981/73 of 24 July 1981 concerning, respectively, the interrelationships between resources, environment, people and development, and international co-operation in the field of the environment,

Taking into account the note by the Secretary-General on international conventions and protocols in the field of the environment,

Bearing in mind the importance which the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade attaches to an ecologically sustainable development process and the need for further international co-operation in the field of the environment, and taking into account the fact that environmental considerations should be viewed in the context of national plans and priorities and development objectives of all countries, in particular the developing countries,

Welcoming the convening of an Ad Hoc Meeting of Senior Government Officials Expert in Environmental Law at Montevideo from 28 October to 6 November 1981,

Stressing the need for additional resources to be made available to the Fund of the United Nations Environment Programme for the developing countries to deal with their most serious environmental problems, such as soil degradation and deforestation, which are examples of very severe deterioration of natural resources calling for particular attention,

Recognizing that environmental deficiencies generated by the conditions of underdevelopment pose grave problems and can best be remedied by accelerated development through the transfer of substantial quantities of financial and technical assistance as a supplement to the domestic effort of the developing countries and such timely assistance as may be required,

1. Takes note of the report of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme, as adopted, on the work of its ninth session and the decisions adopted by the Governing Council at that session;

2. Takes note also of the efforts of the United Nations Environment Programme with regard to the implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, as reflected in its medium-term plan for 1982-1983 and in the objectives of the system-wide medium-term environment programme for 1984-1989, as endorsed by the Governing Council;

3. Requests organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to take into account the view of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination that the document on the system-wide medium-term environment programme should be seen not only as of use to the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme but also as of basic interest to their governing bodies, to the extent that they deem appropriate and to the extent relevant to their particular mandates, and expresses its appreciation for the continued efforts made by the United Nations Environment Programme, in co-operation with the entire United Nations system, in the development of the system-wide medium-term environment programme;

4. Calls upon the United Nations Environment Programme to continue to play its role fully in the implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade and stresses the need for all Governments and bodies of the United Nations system to take environmental considerations fully into account when participating in negotiations and conferences organized by the United Nations on subjects other than the environment;

5. Welcomes the recommendations of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme, as contained in section II of its decision 9/1 of 26 May 1981, as well as those made by the Economic and Social Council, in its resolutions 1981/51 and 1981/73 concerning the system-wide programme of work on the interrelationships between resources, environment, people and development and the important role which the United Nations Environment Programme should assume in this regard consistent with its mandate, and requests the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation to take the requisite steps for their implementation;

6. Stresses the importance it attaches to the development of the Environmental Perspective to the year 2000 and beyond and invites the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme, at its session of a special character and at its tenth session, to make such recommendations as may be appropriate;

7. Reaffirms the catalytic mandate and role of the United Nations Environment Programme, recognizes the desirability of mobilizing voluntary resources for meeting the most serious environmental problems of developing countries, welcomes the consultations being undertaken by the Executive Director of the United Nations Environment Programme on possible means of providing additional resources for developing countries, and notes that the Economic and Social Council has agreed to consider at its second regular session of 1982 the report of the Governing Council on this subject, as requested in paragraph 12 of General Assembly resolution 35/74 of 5 December 1980;

8. Welcomes the stress placed by the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy on the environmental effects of the production and use of various renewable sources of energy and calls upon the United Nations Environment Programme to play an active role in the implementation of the Nairobi Programme of Action for the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy, as regards the relationship between new and renewable sources of energy and the environment;

9. Also welcomes the growing co-operation between the United Nations Environment Programme and the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat);

10. Takes note of the report of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme on marine pollution;

11. Takes note also of the report of the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization on marine pollution;

12. Expresses its appreciation to the Governments that continue to contribute generously to the Fund of the United Nations Environment Programme;

13. Appeals to all Governments to increase substantially their contributions to the Fund of the United Nations Environment Programme and to make, before the end of 1981, firm pledges of contributions to the Fund for the period 1982-1983, taking into account decision 9/23 of 26 May 1981 of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme, as adopted;

14. Reiterates its appeal to the Governments that have not yet contributed to the Fund of the United Nations Environment Programme to do so before the end of 1981 and to those Governments still contributing amounts below their means to increase their contributions for the period 1982-1983.

Regional activities

On 26 May 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the UNEP Governing Council requested the UNEP Executive Director to support initiatives under subregional environment programmes to strengthen the capacity of the UNEP regional offices for programme formulation and implementation. It called on donors and multilateral funding institutions to support such programmes, and on developing countries to share responsibilities by contributing to their common programmes and activities.

The principal regional activities of UNEP related to the regional seas programme, which carried out a variety of tasks including co-operation with Governments in the preparation or implementation of action plans for the protection of marine and coastal environments in most regions of the world (p. 833).

Medium-term plan for 1982-1983

In a decision of 26 May 1981 on programme matters,<sup>(1)</sup> the UNEP Governing Council approved activities proposed in a medium-term plan for 1982-1983 submitted by the Executive Director<sup>(2)</sup> and invited him to submit more precise budgetary indications for each element. Unlike the proposed system-wide medium-term environment programme (p. 841), the 1982-1983 plan was confined to UNEP activities.

Decision: <sup>(1)</sup>UNEP Council (report, A/36/25), 9/10 A, paras. 9 & 10, 26 May.

UNEP Fund and trust funds

UNEP Fund

Of total UNEP income in 1980-1981, 69 per cent came from the voluntarily financed Fund of UNEP, which supported a variety of environmental activities. During 1981, the Fund disbursed $21,377,190 for programme activities and $9,199,383 for programme and programme support costs, or a total of $30,576,573. Disbursements for programme activities-apart from $186,244 under the programme reserve-were in the following fields: human settlements and human health, $2,168,853; support, $4,939,524; environment and development, $1,483,512; oceans, $2,576,447; energy, $89,785; environmental management and environmental law, $295,084; terrestrial ecosystems, $2,617,541; natural disasters, $26,947; Earthwatch, $4,421,642; environmental data, $602,278; and arid and semi-arid lands, including desertification, $1,969,333. Staff costs accounted for over two thirds of programme and programme support costs.

On 26 May, the UNEP Governing Council adopted four decisions pertaining to the Fund.

With regard to the Fund's management,<sup>(1)</sup> the Council, after appealing for additional contributions (p. 818), accepted the desirability of a $120-million target for 1982-1983, of which $93 million would be for programme activities, but it considered that no more than $77 million might be available. Accordingly, it apportioned appropriations for each of 11 programme areas in 1982-1983 in terms of the following percentages:

ACTIVITY	AMOUNT (In millions of US dollars)			Percent- age
	1982	1983	Total
Human settlements and human health	4.5	5.5	10.0	11
support	7.9	9.2	17.1	18
Environment and development	2.7	3.3	6.0	6
Oceans	4.7	5.8	10.5	11
Energy	1.0	1.1	2.1	2
Environmental management and environmental law	1.1	1.4	2.5	3
Ecosystems	7.5	9.3	16.8	18
Natural disasters	0.3	0.3	0.6	1
Earthwatch	7.5	9.4	16.9	18
Data	0.8	0.7	1.5	2
Arid and semi-arid lands, including desertification	4.0	5.0	9.0	10
Total	42.0	51.0	93.0	100

Concerning programme and support costs, the Council approved for the 1980-1981 biennium a revised appropriation level of $19,800,000 - including $815,200 for 12 additional posts and an expert group meeting on desertification.<sup>(2)</sup> It further approved an appropriation of $25,500,000 for 1982-1983, including the establishment of eight additional posts, and requested the Executive Director to aim at keeping this budget within 33 per cent of contributions received for the UNEP Fund during each year of the biennium.<sup>(3)</sup> The Council also requested the General Assembly to instruct the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions to review in depth the Fund's programme and support costs and to report at the Council's 1982 regular session.<sup>(4)</sup>

Contributions

As at 31 December 1981, contributions for 1981 paid by 71 countries to the UNEP Fund totalled $35,553,749, while pledges for 1982 from 42 countries reached $18,521,949 (see table below).

Appeals for contributions were made during 1981 by the UNEP Governing Council, the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly.

The Governing Council, in its 26 May decision on management of the Fund<sup>(4)</sup> (p. 817), appealed to all Governments to maintain the real value of contributions in terms of the 1978 United States dollar and to make firm pledges for 1982-1983. It further appealed to those not contributing to pledge for that period and to those contributing below their means to make increases. It renewed its appeal to those unable to contribute in fully convertible currencies to pay a part in convertible currency in 1981 and an increasing proportion each year thereafter. After taking note of the Executive Director's report on non-convertible currency balances,<sup>(1)</sup> it requested him to make the most effective use of such contributions, taking account of the need for balanced project selection.

In its July resolution on UNEP,<sup>(2)</sup> the Economic and Social Council appealed for substantial increases in contributions and for firm pledges for 1982-1983 before the end of 1981. It reiterated its appeal to those not contributing to do so before that date, and to those contributing below their means to make increases for 1982-1983.

As a result of informal consultations in the Council's First (Economic) Committee, the text of this part of the resolution was orally amended and revised. Whereas the original draft would have had the Council strongly appeal to all Governments to maintain the real value of their contributions in terms of the United States dollar, the final text had the Council appeal to them to increase their contributions substantially and to make firm pledges for 1982-1983, taking into account the Governing Council decision.

In its December resolution on UNEP,<sup>(3)</sup> the General Assembly restated the provisions set out in the Economic and Social Council resolution. Introducing this text, India said the sponsors had wished to see a higher contributions target but had accepted the Governing Council's consensus and the wording of this paragraph in a spirit of accommodation.

Referring to this provision, the Federal Republic of Germany stated that its legislation did not permit multiyear pledges. The USSR said attempts to dictate the size or currency of a State's contribution violated the principle of voluntary contributions on which the Fund was based.

During debate in the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee on development and international economic co-operation, Belgium thought it unrealistic to approve a $120-million programme when it was clear that contributions would not exceed $80 million. Canada expressed concern that the $120-million target would not be met and said that, to respect the Governing Council's priorities, activities should be planned so that expenditures were in line with percentages set by the Council (p. 817). Finland, on behalf of the Nordic States, observed that the Fund's financial situation was unsatisfactory and urged all Governments to reconsider their position on contributions. Hungary pointed out that it had benefited from UNEP projects financed by contributions in non-convertible currencies.

Additional resources for developing countries

In February 1981, the UNEP Executive Director submitted a report to the Governing Council<sup>(1)</sup> proposing ways of securing additional resources to deal with serious environmental problems in developing countries. The report suggested new funding by levying fees for the use of such international commons as oceans, airspace and telecommunication frequencies. It also envisaged additional money from established multilateral sources, including concessional loans from financial institutions, as well as private contributions and taxes on commodities of little or no social value. The report further discussed a proposal by Sweden, made to the Council in 1980 and supported by Denmark and the Netherlands, for a "special window" in the UNEP Fund, to be financed from additional contributions which would not affect the Fund's regular target. The Executive Director said he had approached 10 major donor Governments to ascertain their willingness to support the proposal.

On 26 May,<sup>(7)</sup> the UNEP Governing Council decided to postpone its response to 1980 requests by the Economic and Social Council<sup>(2)</sup> and the General Assembly<sup>(4)</sup> for a report on additional resources for serious environmental problems in developing countries. The Governing Council also requested the Executive Director to continue consultations with Governments and to reintroduce the issue in 1982, particularly with regard to the "special window".

In another decision of the same date, on priorities for serious environmental problems in the developing countries,<sup>(6)</sup> the Council identified the priorities as: environment and development; terrestrial ecosystems; supporting measures, particularly environmental education and training and technical assistance; human settlements and human health; arid and semi-arid lands; natural disasters; energy; and oceans.

In its July 1981 resolution on UNEP,<sup>(3)</sup> the Economic and Social Council agreed to consider the Governing Council's report on additional resources at its second regular session of 1982.

This action was noted by the General Assembly in its December resolution on UNEP.<sup>(5)</sup> The Assembly also reaffirmed the catalytic mandate and role of UNEP, recognized the desirability of mobilizing voluntary resources for the most serious environmental problems of developing countries and welcomed the Executive Director's consultations.

During informal consultations in the Second Committee, a phrase in the original 13-nation draft resolution, which would have had the Assembly stress the need for additional resources in the UNEP Fund for developing countries to deal with their most serious environmental problems such as soil degradation and deforestation, was dropped in favour of the clause recognizing the desirability of mobilizing voluntary resources.

Explaining its position on this provision, the Federal Republic of Germany voiced its understanding that any additional resources would be made available through existing channels. The USSR said the serious environmental problems of developing countries should be dealt with without prejudice to other UNEP programmes and on the basis of voluntary contributions.

In the Committee's debate on development and international economic co-operation, Kenya supported the Swedish proposal for a "special window" in the UNEP Fund. Belgium felt that establishing a new fund or "window" would not increase resources available for environmental purposes.

Trust funds

During 1981, five main trust funds of UNEP were in operation. Two of them were part of the regional seas programme (p. 833): for protection of the Mediterranean Sea against pollution, and for protection and development of the marine environment and the coastal areas of Bahrain, Iran, Iraq, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates. The others were for implementation of the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora and of the 1977 Plan of Action to Combat Desertification (p. 827), and for regional training workshops on environmental management. The trust fund for training workshops, particularly for the pulp and paper industry, was established in 1981, with income entirely from the Swedish International Development Authority; an initial $160,356 contribution was received in October.

The UNEP Governing Council, on 26 May 1981, <sup>(2)</sup> approved the continuation of these funds. It also agreed with the Executive Director's intention, subject to the Secretary-General's consent, to accept responsibility for administering them for as long as he was requested and urged States to pay their contributions promptly. The Council also approved the establishment of three trust funds for initial two-year periods, until 31 December 1983, for: protection and development of the marine environment and the coastal areas of the west and central African region; the Action Plan for the Caribbean Environment Programme; and the Action Plan for the East Asian Seas (p. 833).

By another decision of 26 May, on financing plans of action, <sup>(1)</sup> the Council decided that the Executive Director, in respect of plans being drawn up, was to consult Governments on the approach to use in developing financing plans and then draw up detailed plans specifying Government and UNEP commitments. Once an action plan had been adopted, UNEP would maintain support until the Council decided otherwise.

Income and expenditure of UNEP trust funds in 1981-1982 (24 months) were as follows:

TRUST FUND	AMOUNT (in US dollars)
	Income	Expenditure
Protection of the Mediterranean Sea against Pollution	4,657,723	3,220,093
Protection and Development of the Marine Environment and the Coastal Areas of Bahrain, Iran, Iraq, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates	4,665,414	1,293,721
Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora-	832,466	513,678
Regional Training Workshops on Environmental Management	162,109	80,528
Special account for financing the implementation of the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification	39,996	-
Total	10,357,708	5,108,020

Decisions: UNEP Council (report, A/36/25), 26 May: <sup>(1)</sup>9/25, <sup>(2)</sup>9/26.

Governing Council

Convening of a special session in 1982

Arrangements for a 1982 session of a special character of the UNEP Governing Council, including dates, place, agenda and rules of procedure, were approved by the General Assembly on 17 December 1981. The decision to convene the session, open to all States, had been taken by the Assembly in December 1980 <sup>(2)</sup> to commemorate the tenth anniversary of the 1972 United Nations Conference on the Human Environment. <sup>(5)</sup> At the session, the Council was to review achievements of the previous decade and make programme recommendations for the following 10 years.

Plans for the session were approved by the Governing Council on 26 May 1981 in a draft resolution recommended for adoption by the Assembly. <sup>(4)</sup> This would have had the Assembly decide that the session be held at Nairobi, Kenya, from 10 to 18 May 1982, recommend a 15-minute limit on statements by delegation heads and decide that, with certain modifications, the Council's rules of procedure would apply. The Assembly would reiterate its invitation to Governments to participate at the highest political level and specifically invite ministers dealing with the environment, and also encourage participation by non-governmental organizations. It would agree to a special public information programme and would express hope that a new international prize and a number of UNEP medals would be announced in 1982 as an incentive to better environmental management and protection. Annexed to the draft resolution were a draft provisional agenda and proposed amendments to the rules of procedure for the session.

The Economic and Social Council, in its July 1981 resolution on UNEP, invited the Assembly to consider the draft resolution favourably.<sup>(1)</sup> During informal consultations in the Council's First (Economic) Committee, this paragraph of the resolution had been orally revised to delete a phrase inviting the Assembly to consider favourably the budget implications of the session.

The Assembly accepted the principal provisions of the Governing Council's draft in adopting a resolution on the special session on 17 December.<sup>(3)</sup> It also reiterated an invitation to Governments to prepare thoroughly for the session and decided that the Council should report on it to the Assembly in 1982. The Assembly added that the public information programme should be financed largely from existing resources and that the resolution should be implemented with due regard to economy.

The resolution omitted the reference to an international prize and medals. Also, in addition to drafting changes to the provisional agenda, the Assembly expanded an item on major trends to be addressed by UNEP over the following 10 years by adding a phrase on future perspectives, action and international co-operation on the environment (p. 823). The Assembly accepted the amendments to the Council's rules of procedure substantially as proposed.

The resolution was adopted without vote after the revised 11-nation draft, introduced by Sweden, had been similarly approved by the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee on 27 November.

The USSR and the United States felt that the session should have been organized within available financial resources. The USSR added that this also applied to the public information programme.

During the Committee's debate on development and international economic co-operation, a number of speakers expressed support for the holding of the session. Among them, Belgium hoped the session would thoroughly review past and future UNEP activities, while Canada hoped it would stimulate efforts to manage resources in an environmentally sound fashion. Finland, speaking for the Nordic States, said the session would give Governments an opportunity to address problems that had been inconceivable in 1972. Hungary saw it as a chance to review results, define targets and mobilize public opinion. The hope of India was that the session would lay greater emphasis on the problems of the developing countries and mobilize the resources to overcome them. Mongolia hoped the session would give new emphasis to international environmental co-operation.

Session of a special character of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme

The General Assembly,

Recalling paragraphs 13 to 15 of its resolution 35/74 of 5 December 1980 on international co-operation in the field of the environment,

Concerned that there is need to revive the sense of urgency and commitment by Governments for national and international co-operative action to protect and enhance the environment, which found expression at the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment, held at Stockholm from 5 to 16 June 1972.

Recognizing that important changes in the perception of the environment and of environmental problems have occurred since that Conference and recognizing also the importance of the interrelationships between people, resources, environment and development,

Convinced that the session of a special character represents a unique opportunity for Governments to re-emphasize their continued commitment to and support of the cause of the environment and the United Nations Environment Programme,

1. Decides that the session of a special character of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme should be held at Nairobi from 10 to 18 May 1982 and that the Governing Council should report thereon to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session;

2. Approves the draft provisional agenda for the session as set forth in section I of the annex to the present resolution;

3. Further decides that the rules of procedure of the Governing Council will apply to the session of a special character, with modifications to rules 17, 18, 19, 31 and 67 as recommended by the Governing Council and set forth in section II of the annex to the present resolution;

4. Reiterates its invitation to Governments to prepare thoroughly for the session of a special character and to participate therein at the highest political level, and specifically invites ministers dealing with the environment to participate in the session;

5. Agrees that there should be a special public information programme, along the lines indicated by the Executive Director of the United Nations Environment Programme, which should to a large extent be financed from existing resources;

6. Decides that the present resolution should be implemented with due regard for the need for economy in respect of the preparations and arrangements for the session of a special character;

7. Encourages the participation of non-governmental organizations in the session of a special character, in accordance with the practices normally followed by the Governing Council.

Arabic language services

On 26 May 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> the UNEP Governing Council amended its rules of procedure in order to include Arabic as one of its official and working languages. In taking this decision, the Council recalled that, in December 1980,<sup>(1)</sup> the General Assembly had decided to include Arabic among the working languages of its subsidiary organs no later than 1 January 1982.

Environmental activities

Environmental policy

On 26 May 1981, by a decision on long-term issues affecting the environment programme, the UNEP Governing Council emphasized the importance of redoubled efforts by the United Nations system in four areas: environmental and economic development planning, including environmental and economic cost/benefit assessment; environmental management for long-term solutions to the energy problem; sound integration of environmental dimensions in the programming of country-level technical assistance; and popular education and dissemination of information on environment-development relationships by the media and non-governmental organizations. The Council called on the international community to meet major potential crises of the 1980s in dealing with environmental problems in developing countries.

Eight priorities for serious environmental problems in the developing countries were identified by the Council in another decision of the same date (p. 819).

With a view to developing a document on global long-term environmental perspectives, the Council, in a 26 May decision on co-ordination questions,<sup>(2)</sup> authorized the Executive Director to consult with Governments and international organizations on the desirability, feasibility and financing of possible approaches to its preparation, including: an independent commission to report on global environment perspectives to the year 2000 and beyond; an intergovernmental process involving all States, the United Nations system and the world scientific community; and other possible options. In the same decision, the Council endorsed the view of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC), formulated in 1980,<sup>(4)</sup> that the document should attempt to define shared perceptions of long-term environmental issues and of efforts needed to protect and enhance the environment, help define an agenda for action during the coming decades and set goals for the world community. The Council decided to consider these issues further in 1982.

In its October 1981 report to the Council (p. 842), ACC pledged to contribute fully to preparation of the perspective document.

The General Assembly, in December, stressed the importance of developing the Environmental Perspective to the year 2000 and beyond, and invited the Council to make recommendations in 1982. This action was incorporated in the Assembly's resolution on UNEP.<sup>(1)</sup> Also in December, in approving the draft provisional agenda for the 1982 special session of the Governing Council (p. 821), the Assembly revised the title of one of the items to add a reference to perspectives.

Consideration of the perspective document at the special session had been urged by Sweden, which expressed the view that the document should be drawn up by negotiation among Governments, organizations and the scientific community rather than by an independent commission.

Environmental policy issues, with special regard for the relationship between the environment and development, were discussed by the Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee during its debate on development and international economic co-operation (p. 838).

Environmental monitoring

On 26 May 1981, in dealing with the 1980-1983 environment programme,<sup>(1)</sup> the UNEP Governing Council approved revised objectives and strategies for assessment by UNEP of basic human needs in relation to the outer limits of stress placed on the environment by human activities.

The revised policies, proposed by the Executive Director, dealt with three main areas: environmental agents affecting man and other targets, climate-related activities in the physical environment, and renewable natural resources. The principal topics for monitoring were to be: long-range transport of pollutants and the effects of acid rain; assessment of toxic chemicals; ocean pollution; health-related pollution; impact of carbon dioxide-induced climate change; ozone depletion; assessment of climate-related monitoring; desertification; soil degradation; tropical rangelands; forest cover; shifting cultivation in the humid tropics; loss of cropland; and selected species and habitats.

Decision: <sup>(1)</sup>UNEP Council (report, A/36/25), 9/10 A, para. 4, 26 May.

Atmosphere and climate

World Climate Impact Studies Programme

Aimed at introducing climatic considerations into the formulation of rational policy alternatives, the major activities of the World Climate Impact Studies Programme (WCISP) included assessment of the impact of carbon dioxide-induced climate change; projects to improve climate assessment methodology; identification of climate-sensitive sectors of human activity; examination of the vulnerability of food systems in selected agro-climatic zones and nations; and assessment of depletion of the ozone layer. WCISP was a component of the World Meteorological Organization (WMO) (p. 1465).

In 1981, WCISP activities included a joint project with the United Nations Research Institute for Social Development to reduce the vulnerability of food systems to climate in north-eastern India, and a project with the Scientific Committee on Problems of the Environment to improve the science of climate impact studies through the preparation of papers on methodology and the identification of all such studies throughout the world. An ad hoc meeting of climate modellers and agro-climatologists (Stockholm, Sweden, 13 and 14 August) recommended establishing a committee on crop-climate interactions for information exchange between climate modellers and agricultural research specialists, and to guide development of a research programme.

On 26 May,<sup>(1)</sup> the UNEP Governing Council took note of recommendations by the first meeting of the Scientific Advisory Committee for WCISP (Nairobi, Kenya, 23-27 February) concerning the Programme's implementation. These recommendations included a proposal for an international study conference on the socio-economic impact of man-induced climatic changes. The Council called for a close relationship between UNEP and the World Climate Programme Office established by WMO, and requested the UNEP Executive Director to implement WCISP as quickly as possible, in collaboration with participating international organizations.

Decision: <sup>(1)</sup>UNEP Council (report, A/36/25), 9/13 A, 26 May.

Research on the ozone layer

At the fifth session of the UNEP Co-ordinating Committee on the Ozone Layer (Copenhagen, Denmark, 12-16 October 1981), major advances were reported in understanding the chemistry of the ozone layer and of those chemicals, principally chlorofluorocarbons 11 and 12, released by human activity and suspected of depleting the stratospheric ozone layer. It was calculated that an eventual ozone reduction of between 5 and 10 per cent would occur if releases of these chemicals continued at their current rate, thereby allowing more of certain damaging wave lengths of solar ultraviolet radiation to reach the earth. An environmental assessment of ozone layer depletion and its impacts, formulated at the Committee's November 1980 session, was published in April 1981 in the half-yearly Ozone Layer Bulletin.

On 26 May,<sup>(1)</sup> the UNEP Governing Council decided to initiate work aimed at a global framework convention to protect the ozone layer, by establishing an ad hoc legal and technical working group which was to submit its first progress report in 1982. The Executive Director was requested to assist the group and to invite the Co-ordinating Committee to compile information for it.

Decision: <sup>(1)</sup>UNEP Council (report, A/36/25), 9/13 B, 26 May.

Toxic substances

Information exchange on chemicals and pharmaceuticals

Conforming to requests by the General Assembly in 1979<sup>(4)</sup> and 1980,<sup>(6)</sup> the Secretary-General submitted in May 1981 a report on the experience of Member States and international organizations in the exchange of information on banned hazardous chemicals and unsafe pharmaceutical products.<sup>(3)</sup> The report also contained a preliminary evaluation of the effectiveness of international facilities and the main issues deserving further consideration. It suggested that information systems be made more responsive to users and that, after two or three years, the need for more elaborate control systems might be assessed. It also called for co-ordination between the United Nations system and other bodies, such as the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, and greater aid to help developing countries establish adequate import control of drugs of dubious therapeutic value and hazardous chemicals and to train scientific staff.

On 23 July,<sup>(8)</sup> acting without vote, the Economic and Social Council took note of the Secretary-General's report and decided to transmit it to the Assembly. This decision was recommended by the Council's Third (Programme and Co-ordination) Committee on 15 July, also without vote, on an oral proposal by its Chairman, with an oral amendment by the USSR to have the Council take into account the views expressed in the Committee.

ACTION BY THE COMMISSION ON TNCs. Requested by the General Assembly in December 1980<sup>(5)</sup> to study ways of improving information exchange on this topic within the United Nations information system on transnational corporations (TNCs) (p. 602), the Commission on TNCs examined a July 1981 report by the Secretariat<sup>(2)</sup> highlighting the growing awareness of problems caused by banned hazardous chemicals and unsafe pharmaceuticals and the need for information exchange. The report discussed the production and marketing of such products and described the activities of United Nations agencies and other international institutions. It concluded that the information system operated by the United Nations Centre on TNCs could only supplement the activities of specialized agencies in improving information exchange, initially by identifying TNCs involved in the production and marketing of products determined by those agencies to be toxic and hazardous.

Taking note of this report with appreciation, the Commission, in September, requested the Centre to co-operate with other United Nations bodies such as the International Labour Organisation, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the World Health Organization (WHO) and UNEP, in exchanging information on banned hazardous chemicals and unsafe pharmaceuticals, and to inform the Commission of those activities in 1982.<sup>(1)</sup>

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 16 December 1981, the General Assembly adopted a resolution<sup>(7)</sup> reiterating the need to intensify international co-operation on problems arising from the production and export of banned or severely restricted substances, and urging States and others, including TNCs, to co-operate more fully in providing data to United Nations bodies. Those bodies and others involved in disseminating information on the subject were called on to ensure that their documentation was adequate to the needs of and clearly understood by all those handling or using such products. The Assembly also requested those bodies and the Secretary-General to provide, within available resources, technical assistance to help developing countries monitor the import of unsafe pharmaceutical products of doubtful therapeutic value and banned hazardous chemicals, and to train scientific personnel. States were invited to employ appropriate means including legislation, and the Secretary-General was requested to consult them again on existing information systems and to report in 1983.

The resolution was adopted without vote. On 30 November, the draft, sponsored by 16 nations, had been approved in like manner by the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee after being orally revised by the sponsors. The main change affected paragraph 7, which would originally have had the Assembly invite States to consider the need to deal with the subject through national legislation and at the international level; in the final text, States were invited to deal with the subject through appropriate means, including possible national legislation, where they did not exist.

The problem of preventing the introduction of low-quality or falsely labelled narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances into developing countries was addressed in February by the Commission on Narcotic Drugs (p. 1062).

Exchange of information on banned hazardous chemicals and unsafe pharmaceutical products

At Its 40th plenary meeting, on 23 July 1981, the Council:

(a) Took note of the report of the Secretary-General on the exchange of Information on banned hazardous chemicals and unsafe pharmaceutical products;

(b) Decided to transmit that report to the General Assembly at its thirty-sixth session, taking into account the views expressed by delegations in the Third (Programme and Co-ordination) Committee at the second regular session of 1981 of the Council.

General Assembly resolution 36/166

Adopted without vote Meeting 101 16 December 1981

Approved by Third Committee (A/36/792) without vote, 30 November (meeting 66): 16-nation draft (A/C.3/36/L.74). orally revised; agenda item 12.

Exchange of information on banned hazardous chemicals and unsafe pharmaceutical products

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 34/173 of 17 December 1979, in which it recognized the urgent need to take concrete measures to prevent adverse effects on health on a world-wide basis.

Recalling also its resolution 35/186 of 15 December 1980, in which It Invited Member States to provide information on measures they had taken on the exchange of information on hazardous chemicals and unsafe pharmaceutical products that have been banned in their territories and requested the Secretary-General, In co-operation with the United Nations organs, organizations and bodies concerned, to submit a report to the General Assembly at its thirty-sixth session on the experience of Member States and the United Nations organs, organizations and bodies concerned,

Conscious of the Importance of the Information system on transnational corporations for the analysis of the activities of these corporations in certain sectors of special social and humanitarian interest to the countries in which operations take place, particularly developing countries.

Taking into account that in resolution 35/186 it requested the Commission on Transnational Corporations to study, during its seventh session, ways and means within the information system on transnational corporations to improve the exchange of information on those products with a view to formulating appropriate recommendations, Bearing in mind the importance of objective information on banned hazardous chemicals and unsafe pharmaceutical products.

Aware that the production and export of banned or severely restricted hazardous substances-including pharmaceuticals, pesticides and industrial chemicals-endanger public health and the environment.

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the exchange of information on banned hazardous chemicals and unsafe pharmaceutical products;

2. Takes note also of the conclusions and recommendations in the report of the United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations which was submitted to the Commission on Transnational Corporations at its seventh session;

3. Reiterates the need to intensify international co-operation in the search for the solution to problems arising from the production and export of banned or severely restricted substances;

4. Urges Member States and other interested parties, including transnational corporations, to co-operate more fully in providing data on banned or severely restricted substances to the appropriate organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system with responsibility for Information exchange in regard to such substances;

5. Calls upon the organs, organizations and other competent United Nations bodies involved in disseminating information on this subject to ensure that the documentation they prepare is adequately suited to the needs of and clearly understood by all those engaged in processing, handling, dispensing or using all banned hazardous chemicals and unsafe pharmaceutical products;

6. Requests the Secretary-General and the organs, organizations and other competent United Nations bodies to provide, within the available resources, the necessary technical assistance to the developing countries, at their request, to help them establish an adequate system for monitoring the import of unsafe pharmaceutical products of doubtful therapeutic value and banned hazardous chemicals, on the one hand, and to train scientific personnel to handle these problems, on the other;

7. Invites Member States to deal with this subject through appropriate means, including possible legislation at the national level, where they do not yet exist;

8. Once again requests the Secretary-General to consult Member States on the existing information systems on banned hazardous chemicals and unsafe pharmaceutical products and to report to the General Assembly at its thirty-eighth session through the Economic and Social Council.

Preparation of a list of toxic substances

On 25 May 1981, the UNEP Governing Council called for continued work on the preparation of a list of environmentally dangerous chemical substances.<sup>(1)</sup> After considering a preliminary report of the Executive Director on the topic,<sup>(3)</sup> the Council requested him to continue preparing a short list of such substances, harmful at the global level, to which environmental policies should pay special attention. The list requested by the Council was subsequently published.<sup>(2)</sup>

During 1981, the International Register of Potentially Toxic Chemicals (IRPTC) continued to publish the IRPTC Bulletin, a quarterly supplying information on such chemicals and providing base data for evaluating associated hazards. By the end of the year, 90 countries had appointed national correspondents for IRPTC, 250 data profiles for selected chemicals had been prepared, and information on the toxicity, use and regulation of chemicals was provided in response to 40 requests.

Among other activities, the Technical Committee of the International Programme on Chemical Safety (second meeting, Geneva, 2-4 February) reviewed its 1981-1982 work plan and progress reports from lead institutions; a working group on contingency planning for, and response to, emergencies and accidents involving potentially toxic chemicals (Bilthoven, Netherlands, 9-13 February) recommended the development of guidelines; the IRPTC Scientific Advisory Committee (fifth meeting, Geneva, 16-20 February) reviewed progress in data profile developments, the query-response service, contacts with national correspondents and assistance in establishing national registers; a UNEP/WHO expert working group (Federal Republic of Germany, 17-20 March) discussed guidelines for control of toxic and other hazardous chemical waste; and an expert meeting on toxicological and safety data for chemicals in international trade (Leningrad, USSR, 22-27 June) agreed on the type of data which should accompany a chemical entering an importing country.

Strengthening the network of environmental information systems

Throughout 1981, the International Referral System (INFOTERRA), the world-wide environmental-information exchange network of UNEP, continued to operate as a decentralized system with a grid of national, regional and sectoral focal points in 116 countries, based on more than 9,200 sources of environmental information.

In addition to visits by INFOTERRA staff to co-operating countries and provision of consultancy services to national focal points, activities included: a workshop for Caribbean national focal points (Kingston, Jamaica, 31 August-4 September), which resulted in the launching of a pilot programme to improve national operations; a terminology task force meeting (Nairobi, Kenya, 16-20 November) which agreed on criteria for use in revising terminology; a regional co-operation meeting (Nairobi, 25-27 November), attended by representatives of 36 African national focal points, to discuss expansion of INFOTERRA services beyond referral; an INFOTERRA seminar for government officials from 15 developing countries (Dresden, German Democratic Republic); and training courses for national focal point staff on INFOTERRA operations (Dakar, Senegal, 31 August-4 September; Nairobi, 14-18 September).

On 26 May,<sup>(1)</sup> the UNEP Governing Council noted with satisfaction that UNEP and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, in an evaluation report, had concluded that INFOTERRA had fulfilled its mandate. The Council endorsed the recommendations of that report calling on national focal points to provide services beyond referral, to speed up the query-response process and to continue to promote the system's use. After requesting Governments to make resources available so that the focal points could extend their activities, the Council requested the Executive Director to implement recommendations facilitating the phased expansion of INFOTERRA.

Also during the year, UNEP provided financial assistance and co-operation to the United Nations Statistical Office with regard to environmental statistics (p. 1071).

Ecosystems

Preservation of endangered ecosystems-- the interdependent complex of plant and animal populations within particular geographic contexts, terrestrial (see below) and marine (p. 831)-- continued to be a concern of UNEP and other United Nations bodies. Action was also taken to advance a draft charter for nature conservation (p. 834).

Terrestrial ecosystems

Terrestrial ecosystems, such as arid zones (see below), tropical rain forests and soils (p. 831), were identified by the UNEP Governing Council on 26 May 1981 as among the priority environmental problems in developing countries (p. 819).<sup>(1)</sup>

Decision: <sup>(1)</sup>UNEP Council (report, A/36/25), 9/12, paras. 1 (b) & (e), 26 May.

Arid zones

In 1981, UNEP continued to focus on control of desertification as one of the most acute examples of environmental degradation (p. 827). It also continued to support broader environmental management activities in arid and semi-arid lands, especially integrated projects on arid lands in Kenya and Tunisia under the Man and the Biosphere Programme of the United Nations

Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) (p. 1412). On 26 May, the UNEP Governing Council requested the Executive Director, in consultation with United Nations agencies, notably UNESCO, to consider further development and support in 1982 and 1983 of integrated pilot projects on arid lands in the Sahelian and north African regions, including the continuation of current projects.<sup>(2)</sup>

In identifying priorities for serious environmental problems in developing countries (p. 819), the Council, also on 26 May, set as one of the priorities arid and semi-arid lands, particularly desertification and rangeland management.<sup>(1)</sup>

Decisions: UNEP Council (report, A/36/25), 26 May: <sup>(1)</sup>9/12, para. 1 (e); <sup>(2)</sup>9/15 A.

Desertification control. UNEP continued to support, catalyse and co-ordinate bilateral and multilateral activities to further the purposes of the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification,<sup>(4)</sup> adopted in 1977 by the United Nations Conference on Desertification.

During 1981, in addition to assistance to the Sudano-Sahelian region (p. 828), programming and project formulation missions were sent to Bangladesh, Burundi, Democratic Yemen, Nepal, the United Republic of Tanzania, and Yemen to assist Governments in preparing national plans to combat desertification and in formulating high-priority anti-desertification projects. An international symposium (Tashkent, USSR, 6-14 October) exchanged views and experience in combating desertification and approved guidelines for the establishment of regional integrated development schemes. Three training courses on desertification control were held, on rangeland ecology and pasture productivity, reclamation of saline irrigated soils, and sand-dune stabilization. A desert control training seminar was held in China.

In a February report to the UNEP Governing Council,<sup>(3)</sup> the Executive Director concluded that progress in implementing the Plan of Action had been slow and that Governments and regional and international organizations needed to intensify their efforts. On 26 May,<sup>(1)</sup> the Council urged Governments, United Nations bodies and other international organizations to augment their efforts to combat desertification. It requested the Executive Director to assist countries in humid zones affected by desertification problems and endorsed his intention to submit a comprehensive report in 1985.

An Inter-agency Meeting on Desertification and Protection of the Environment in Africa (Nairobi, Kenya, March) discussed proposals for assistance by the United Nations Development Programme and measures for increased aid to drought-stricken African countries. The Inter-

Working Group on Desertification (fourth and fifth sessions, 7 and 8 April and 15 September) discussed the progress of UNEP efforts to institute research and training programmes. Governments and organizations participating in the Consultative Group for Desertification Control (third session, Geneva, 26-28 August) expressed support for or interest in 10 project proposals submitted for their consideration; the Group recommended specific actions to ensure the better preparation and implementation of projects.

In its annual overview report for 1980/1981, published in May 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination listed five priority areas for system-wide co-operation against desertification: information collection; application of science and technology; research, training and education; participation; and institution-building. It considered it highly important that additional external resources be made available and expressed satisfaction at the emphasis placed on desertification as a development problem as well as a major form of environmental degradation.

Financing the Plan of Action. In response to a 1980 General Assembly request,<sup>(3)</sup> the Secretary-General submitted in October 1981 a report<sup>(2)</sup> containing recommendations for additional means of financing the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification.<sup>(5)</sup> The report was based on an annexed study by a group of high-level specialists in international financing, convened by the UNEP Executive Director at Geneva from 20 to 24 July.

Among the financing sources identified by the consultants and deemed practicable by the Secretary-General were international taxation of trade flows, International Monetary Fund (IMF) gold sales and trust fund reflows, a link between IMF special drawing rights and development finance, taxes or "parking fees" from geostationary satellites, international revenues from sea-bed mining and the Common Fund for Commodities. The study concluded that the most practicable way of obtaining resources on a concessionary basis was to tap private capital markets on a commercial basis and then provide borrowers with interest subsidies. Under this scheme, these commercial borrowings would be backed by government guarantees and/or collateral sufficient to carry enough credibility in the market-place to enable loans to be raised. Also proposed was the setting up of an independent operational financial corporation for financing desertification projects.

The report concluded that there was a consensus on the importance of anti-desertification projects to development and that there was a need to increase substantially the level of financial aid to developing countries, many of them least developed, suffering from desertification.

Taking note of this report, the General Assembly, on 17 December, adopted a resolution<sup>(4)</sup> noting with concern that insufficient financing and increasing demands on scarce resources of countries suffering from desertification were constraining the Plan's implementation. It requested the Secretary-General to obtain Member States' views on the additional financing measures and on the modalities described in his report for obtaining financial resources. He was also requested, in co-operation with the UNEP Executive Director, to obtain Member States' views on establishing the independent corporation and on their financial participation, and to report to the Assembly in 1982.

The resolution was adopted without vote. On 27 November, the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee had likewise approved the draft, submitted by a Vice-Chairman after informal consultations had taken place on a text subsequently withdrawn-proposed by the Central African Republic, Ethiopia, Guinea, Jamaica, Pakistan and the Sudan.

In addition to drafting differences affecting the preamble, the final text omitted a provision in the original draft that would have had the Assembly request the Secretary-General and the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation to consider how the recommendations on additional means of financing might be implemented in the context of efforts to strengthen international economic co-operation, and to determine the most appropriate ways by which the United Nations system, States, regional development banks and other financing sources could initiate measures to obtain concessionary funds.

Introducing the original draft, Jamaica spoke of the urgency of establishing an organization exclusively concerned with desertification on a scale that could not be financed by existing institutions. The Sudan also urged support for the organization's establishment.

The United Kingdom, speaking for the European Community members, said they would submit comments on the proposals and continue to contribute voluntarily through existing channels to anti-desertification programmes. Poland, on behalf also of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Mongolia, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, said that establishment of a fund financed from taxes on international trade and by other fiscal measures was unacceptable, as was automatic funding.

Study on financing the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 32/172 of 19 December 1977, in which it approved the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification, and its resolutions 33/88 and 33/89 of 15 December 1978, 34/184, 34/185 and 34/187 of 18 December 1979 and 35/72 and 35/73 of 5 December 1980, dealing with various aspects of the implementation of the Plan of Action,

Taking note of the relevant sections of the report of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme on its ninth session and Governing Council decisions 9/22 A and B of 26 May 1981 on the implementation of the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification.

1. Notes with concern that the problem of insufficient financing and the increasing demands on the scarce resources of countries suffering from desertification are constraining the implementation of the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification;

2. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General and the annex thereto which contains feasibility studies on and detailed modalities for financing the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification, prepared by a group of high-level specialists in international financing;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to obtain the views of Member States on the feasibility studies and concrete recommendations for the implementation of the additional measures of financing deemed practicable by the Secretary-General, and also on the modalities for obtaining financial resources, as described in paragraphs 13 to 17 of the report of the Secretary-General;

4. Also requests the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the Executive Director of the United Nations Environment Programme, to obtain the views of Member States on the establishment of an independent corporation for the financing of desertification-control projects on the basis of the plan presented in the annex to the report of the Secretary-General and also to ascertain the views of Governments as to their interest in participating financially therein;

5. Further requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Assistance to the Sudano-Sahelian region. In 1981, several reports to various United Nations bodies described the ongoing efforts of the United Nations Sudano-Sahelian Office (UNSO) to implement in the Sudano-Sahelian region of central and west Africa the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification.<sup>(12)</sup> The bodies concerned adopted several decisions in support of this joint venture of UNEP and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). Meanwhile, drought-stricken countries in the Sahel continued to be helped by United Nations agencies through a medium- and long-term recovery programme (p. 485).

principal UNSO desertification control operations during 1981 were in combating deforestation, range and water resources management, sand-dune stabilization, and planning and co-ordination. Nineteen countries benefited from this work, including Benin, whose inclusion was authorized in May (see below). The number of anti-desertification projects jointly identified by UNSO and the assisted countries was 231. These required investments of $693 million, of which $350 million had been committed from bilateral and multilateral sources. Thirty-five new activities were funded during 1981 from the United Nations Trust Fund for Sudano-Sahelian Activities (p. 489), which earmarked $7.6 million for desertification control.

UNSO supported projects involving the evaluation, testing and pilot production of different kinds of fuel-efficient cooking stoves; a post-graduate training programme in pastoral management; and restoration and integrated biological development of the Fouta-Djallon massif in Guinea, the watershed for all the main rivers of west Africa. Other projects under execution included: in the Sudan and the Upper Volta, replanting of Acacia Senegal, producing gum arabic for industrial, pharmaceutical and confectionery uses as well as arresting desertification; in the Gambia, preparation of an energy master plan to prevent the indiscriminate cutting of trees and shrubs for use as fuel wood; and in Mauritania, applied research on sand dunes and their stabilization, a project which was completed.

During 1981, planning and programming missions to Benin, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau and Uganda identified and formulated 43 priority projects requiring $44.2 million in external aid. In development of project proposals, particular emphasis was placed on national involvement, popular participation and training.

Information on desertification control activities in the region was contained in reports by the UNDP Administrator to the UNDP Governing Council, submitted in March 1981<sup>(2)</sup> and April 1982,<sup>(3)</sup> and by the UNEP Governing Council to the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly, transmitted to the Assembly by notes of the Secretary-General in September 1981<sup>(4)</sup> and September 1982;<sup>(5)</sup> the 1982 reports covered 1981 activities. The earlier UNEP report gave the costs of UNSO for desertification control in 1978-1980 as $1,369,059 obligated out of an operational budget of $1.4 million.

On 26 May 1981,<sup>(11)</sup> the UNEP Governing Council included Benin among the countries receiving assistance through UNSO—an action suggested by the Assembly in December 1980. The Council also authorized continued contribution to UNSO of the UNEP share of administrative and operational costs of the joint venture for 1982 and 1983.

On 19 June,<sup>(10)</sup> the UNDP Governing Council endorsed the UNEP decision on Benin and urged Governments and United Nations and other organizations to intensify aid in response to the priority requirements of the Sudano-Sahelian countries, through UNSO or any other intermediary. It authorized continued UNDP payment towards support costs of the joint venture.

By a 24 July resolution,<sup>(6)</sup> the Economic and Social Council expressed satisfaction at the progress made by UNSO and welcomed the UNEP and UNDP decisions to continue the joint venture. In terms similar to those used by the UNDP Council, it urged intensified assistance to the region.

The resolution was adopted without vote. On 21 July, the draft, sponsored by 12 nations, had been approved in like manner by the Council's First (Economic) Committee, after the text had been orally revised by the sponsors and further orally amended in informal consultations. The latter change, affecting the clause urging intensified assistance, replaced a reference to "private" organizations by "other" organizations.

By a 17 December resolution,<sup>(9)</sup> the General Assembly largely restated the provisions of the Economic and Social Council resolution. It expressed satisfaction with progress in assisting Governments of the region; urged continued response, bilaterally or through UNSO or any other intermediary, to requests for anti-desertification aid from the Sudano-Sahelian countries; invited UNEP and UNDP to continue intensifying support for UNSO so that it could carry out increased responsibilities; and requested the UNEP Governing Council to continue annual reporting. In addition, the Assembly commended the UNEP Executive Director and the UNDP Administrator for the venture's effective development and noted with satisfaction Benin's addition to the list of those to be aided by UNSO.

The resolution was adopted without vote. On 11 November, the Second Committee had similarly approved the draft proposed by a Vice-Chairman after informal consultations had taken place on a 27-nation text which was subsequently withdrawn.<sup>(1)</sup> The Vice-Chairman's draft was essentially the same as the original text, except that, in the paragraph urging a favourable response to aid requests, a reference to "private organizations and individuals" was replaced by "other organizations". Introducing the original draft, the Gambia noted that it was based on the resolution which the Assembly had adopted in 1980.<sup>(7)</sup>

Poland, on behalf of the Eastern European States and Mongolia, reiterated a statement made on their behalf when the 1980 resolution was approved<sup>(13)</sup> (that further measures to implement the Plan should be voluntary and that the sovereign right of States to provide aid from their own resources should not be affected).

Noting decision 9/22 B of 26 May 1981 of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme and decision 81/4 of 19 June 1981 of the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme,

Having considered the report of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme on the implementation in the Sudano-Sahelian region of the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification,

Reiterating its concern over the severe effects of desertification, a major form of environmental degradation and an obstacle to development in fragile ecosystems, on the socio-economic development and the way of life of the people of the Sudano-Sahelian region, and emphasizing again the need to hasten the implementation in the region of the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification.

1. Takes note of the report of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme on the implementation in the Sudano-Sahelian region of the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification;

2. Expresses its satisfaction with the progress made by the United Nations Sudano-Sahelian Office in assisting the Governments of the region, on behalf of the United Nations Environment Programme and under a joint venture of the Environment Programme and the United Nations Development Programme, in Implementing the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification;

8. Requests the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme to continue to report annually, through the Economic and Social Council, to the General Assembly on the implementation in the Sudano-Sahelian region of the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification.

Tropical forests

In 1981, a world-wide assessment of tropical forest resources, covering 1,935 million hectares and indicating an annual deforestation rate of 0.58 per cent, was completed by UNEP and the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) within the framework of the Global Environmental Monitoring System (GEMS). The assessment included information on growth of stock, logging, ownership, deforestation rates and tree plantation. Other activities during the year included projects on cover monitoring, ecological training and management as a basis for environmentally sound development, and preparation of an internationally co-ordinated programme for wide exploitation of tropical forests and woodlands.

Work towards an international arrangement on tropical timber went ahead in a preparatory meeting and two expert groups convened by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (p. 554).

Soil management

The second High-level Meeting of Experts on a World Soils Policy (Rome, Italy, 23-27 February 1981), convened by UNEP in co-operation with FAO and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), adopted a statement of guidelines to be followed in finalizing a world soils policy and a framework of a plan of action for its implementation.<sup>(1)</sup> The policy sought to increase knowledge, encourage productivity and management improvements, promote better agricultural systems, stimulate conservation, enlarge the supply of arable land, slow the loss of such land, and monitor quantitative and qualitative changes. On 26 May,<sup>(3)</sup> the UNEP Governing Council requested an appraisal of the experts' recommendations by several organizations and invited countries affected by soil erosion and degradation to formulate national soils policies, with technical assistance from UNEP and other United Nations organizations.

Other UNEP activities in 1981 included: preparation of draft guidelines to control soil degradation and land rehabilitation after mining; a meeting (Sofia, Bulgaria, 16-22 June), in co-operation with FAO, UNESCO and the International Society of Soil Sciences, to define measurements for use in an international referential base for soil classification and correlation; preparation of draft criteria for a global land and soil monitoring system as a part of GEMS; and the start of the second phase of the Save our Soils project, aimed at identifying socio-economic constraints to the adoption of sound soil conservation policies in arid, semi-arid and tropical zones.

The United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, in a resolution of 21 August on the relationship between energy policy and environmental policies (p. 839), invited Governments to consider co-operating with the world soils policy.<sup>(2)</sup>

Marine environment

In its list of priorities for serious environmental problems in the developing countries (p. 819), adopted on 26 May 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the UNEP Governing Council identified, as one such priority, oceans, particularly conservation of marine living resources and their ecosystems, through support for regional seas programmes (p. 833).

Decision: <sup>(1)</sup>UNEP Council (report, A/36/25), 9/12, para. 1 (h), 26 May.

Marine pollution

Three studies were completed in 1981 under the auspices of the Joint Group of Experts on the Scientific Aspects of Marine Pollution. One of them, an inter-agency review of the health of the oceans, was the first integrated global assessment of marine pollution. It stressed the need to control pollution in coastal waters, closed and semi-enclosed seas, but found that the open seas had not been significantly affected by the contaminants measured and appeared to be in good health. The other studies were an evaluation of hazards of harmful substances carried by ships and a report on the choice of sites for sea disposal of wastes.

Responding to a 1979 General Assembly request,<sup>(6)</sup> the UNEP Governing Council, on 26 May 1981,<sup>(8)</sup> authorized the submission to the Assembly, through the Economic and Social Council, of a UNEP report on marine pollution problems.<sup>(3)</sup>

The report examined sources of marine pollution and possible trends of changes in their occurrence; effects on living resources, ecosystems, human health and amenities; actions to alleviate problems; and the role of UNEP. It recommended: continued assessment by UNEP of the sources, amounts and effects of pollutants, as a component of Earthwatch (the UNEP-sponsored world-wide environmental assessment system); intensified work on regional action plans for the protection of enclosed and semi-enclosed seas, as well as of coastal waters of regions with defined common problems; constant review of pollution trends, through existing mechanisms and periodic reports on the state of the marine environment; and full support for marine environment protection activities defined by the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea.

The initial views of the UNEP secretariat on implementation of the Conference's work were communicated to the Conference in April.<sup>(1)</sup> UNEP pointed out that many of the environmental norms approved by the Conference would have to be elaborated and said it stood ready to assist Governments in that regard.

At its eighth session (Geneva, 2-13 February), the Working Group of Experts on Environmental Law completed a study on the legal aspects concerning the environment related to offshore mining and drilling within the limits of national jurisdiction. The Group adopted by consensus 42 conclusions on the study and agreed that they had the character of guidelines. They called for a government-operated authorization system to regulate the construction of installations, environmental assessment of the effects of operations, establishment of national environmental monitoring systems, consideration of transfrontier environmental impact when authorizing operations, establishment of information and consultation procedures between States, action by States to ensure compliance with safety measures, contingency planning and implementation measures to deal with accidents, and the adoption of measures to determine liability for damage and ensure payment of compensation.

On 26 May,<sup>(9)</sup> the Governing Council requested that these conclusions be circulated to Governments for comment and recommended that States consider the guidelines when formulating legislation or negotiating international agreements to prevent pollution caused by offshore mining and drilling within the limits of national jurisdiction.

Pursuant to a 1979 General Assembly request,<sup>(6)</sup> a report on marine pollution prepared by the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization (IMCO) was circulated to the Assembly in June.<sup>(2)</sup> The report described aspects of IMCO work, particularly measures for improving maritime safety through international standard-setting, training of seafarers and other personnel, promotion and organization of arrangements for combating marine pollution incidents, and establishment of schemes for determining liability and ensuring compensation for damage. The report also detailed the work of the Marine Environment Protection Committee since its inception in 1973 and gave an account of technical co-operation and technology transfer activities. (For 1981 IMCO activities concerning marine pollution, see p. 1470.)

Addressing the Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee on 2 October, the IMCO Secretary-General said that, in order to promote wider implementation of its rules and standards, IMCO was organizing seminars, symposia and workshops and providing advisory services to developing countries, particularly for the world-wide training of maritime personnel since most accidents at sea were caused by human error.

The Economic and Social Council, in its July resolution on the environment,<sup>(5)</sup> noted with appreciation the UNEP and IMCO reports and transmitted them to the Assembly for consideration. By its December resolution on UNEP, the Assembly also took note of the reports.<sup>(7)</sup>

Regional seas programme

UNEP continued in 1981, under its regional seas programme, to co-ordinate activities by States to protect the marine environment in eight regions. Action plans were adopted during the year for the Caribbean, west and central Africa, east Asia and the south-east Pacific. Highlights of activities included:

—Caribbean. An Action Plan for the Caribbean Environment Programme, recommended by an expert meeting (Managua, Nicaragua, 23-27 February), was adopted by an intergovernmental meeting (Montego Bay, Jamaica, 6-8 April), which also established a Caribbean trust fund with a target of $1.5 million for 1982-1983. In collaboration with the region's Governments and organizations, UNEP prepared detailed descriptions of the fund's priority projects. The first meeting of the Plan's Monitoring Committee (New York, 14-16 December) adopted an $806,133 implementation budget for 1982. A meeting of legal experts (New York, 7-11 December) revised 14 articles of a draft convention to protect and develop the marine and coastal environment of the Caribbean, and recommended a 1982 meeting to complete its work.

—West and central Africa. A Convention for Co-operation in the Protection and Development of the Marine and Coastal Environment of the West and Central African Region, and an action plan for the region, were adopted by a Conference of Plenipotentiaries (Abidjan, Ivory Coast, 16-23 March), which also approved a $3.9-million budget for 1981-1983. Twelve countries ratified a regional Protocol concerning Co-operation in Combating Pollution in Cases of Emergency, finalized by a meeting of legal experts (Abidjan, 13 and 14 March). The Steering Committee for the Marine Environment of West and Central Africa (Abidjan, 20-22 July) defined a 1982-1983 work programme and adopted terms of reference for a trust fund, subsequently established in November 1981.

—East Africa. An inter-agency mission visited eight States in October and November; its findings were used to prepare sectoral and summary overview reports on regional environmental problems.

—East Asia. An intergovernmental meeting (Manila, Philippines, 27-29 April) adopted an Action Plan for the Protection and Development of the Marine Environment of East Asia and requested UNEP to complete the preparatory phase by year's end. The Second Intergovernmental Meeting on the East Asian Seas Action Plan (Bangkok, Thailand, 9-11 December) established a trust fund and identified five priority projects for 1982-1983.

—Kuwait Action Plan. The first review meeting of government experts on co-operative projects Kuwait, 11-15 April) reviewed implementation of the Action Plan and agreed on a budget. The first meeting of the Council of the Regional Organization for the Protection of the Marine Environment (Kuwait, 21-23 April) decided on the Plan's future development and adopted a budget for 1 July 1981-31 December 1982 based on an $8.8-million trust fund. A Government Experts Meeting on Environmental Public Awareness (Muscat, Oman, 15-17 December) approved the objectives, work plan and timetable for a 1982-1983 programme.

—Mediterranean. An expert meeting (Geneva, 12-16 January) evaluated the pilot phase of the Co-ordinated Mediterranean Pollution Monitoring and Research Programme and recommended a 10-year programme. Following review by an expert meeting (Geneva, 26-30 January), the Second Meeting of Contracting Parties to the Convention for the Protection of the Mediterranean Sea against Pollution (Cannes, France, 2-7 March) adopted a 1981-1982 work programme and a $7.3-million budget, and chose Athens, Greece, as the seat of the co-ordinating unit of the action plan. The first meeting of the Working Group for Scientific and Technical Co-operation (Athens, 28 September-2 October) approved criteria for implementing national monitoring programmes and developing research activities. The Bureau of the Contracting Parties (Athens, 23 September; Geneva, 17 and 18 December) noted that delays in government contributions were seriously affecting work under the action plan, but could not agree to a proposal for a $1-million loan against future contributions. A drafting committee (Geneva, 15 and 16 December) finalized a draft protocol on specially protected areas, for adoption and signature in 1982.

—South-east Pacific. Following an expert meeting (Lima, Peru, 21 September) which revised a draft action plan, a conference of plenipotentiaries (Lima, 9-12 November), convened by UNEP and the Permanent Commission for the South Pacific, adopted the Action Plan for the South-East Pacific Region, along with a convention to protect the marine environment, an agreement for regional Co-operation against oil pollution, and institutional and financial arrangements including a trust fund with a $310,000 target for 1983-1984. Other activities included an international workshop on combating oil spills (Santiago, Chile, 6-15 April) and a seminar on international legal conventions related to the environment (Bogotá, Colombia, 4-8 May).

—South-west Pacific. The co-ordinating group for the South-West Pacific Regional Environment Programme agreed in March 1981 to convene in 1982 a regional conference on the environment.

On 26 May 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the UNEP Governing Council decided that, in 1981-1983, UNEP should pay increased attention to the regional seas programmes and make funds available for approved activities. It requested the Executive Director to complete the draft action plans being prepared and urged Governments in the regions to co-operate with him.

In its 26 May decision on management of trust funds (p. 820),<sup>(2)</sup> the Council approved the establishment of three regional seas funds for initial two-year periods extending to 31 December 1983, for west and central Africa, the Caribbean and east Asian seas. It also approved continuation of the Kuwait Regional Trust Fund until 31 December 1981 and the Mediterranean Trust Fund until 31 December 1982.

Marine mammals

In co-operation with UNEP, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations completed in 1981 a draft global plan of action for the conservation, management and utilization of marine mammals.<sup>(2)</sup> The plan proposed urgent action to alleviate the most serious threats to species or populations known to be in a critical state, information-gathering to determine the extent and nature of threats to marine mammals, and action to improve conservation conditions by increasing scientific capability, legal and administrative machinery, and public understanding. On 26 May, the UNEP Governing Council requested the Executive Director to continue preparing the plan with a view to submitting it

Draft charter for nature conservation

A revised text of a draft World Charter for Nature, aimed at protecting the earth's animals and plants and their environment, was prepared in August 1981 by an ad hoc meeting convened by UNEP in response to a 1980 General Assembly request.<sup>(4)</sup> Taking note of this text, the Assembly, in October 1981, requested further work to complete the draft.

The revision took account of comments by 50 states—also invited by the Assembly in 1980<sup>(3)</sup>—on a 1979 draft drawn up by experts from Zaire and the International Union for Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources (IUCN). These views, transmitted to the Assembly in an October 1981 report of the Secretary-General,<sup>(2)</sup> also included Governments' accounts of their efforts to conserve and protect nature.

In its report, annexed to that of the Secretary-General, the Ad Hoc Group of Experts on the Draft World Charter for Nature (Nairobi, Kenya, 24-27 August) suggested that the replies could be interpreted as strong endorsement for proceeding with deliberations for the draft's timely adoption; that the United Nations system could administer and implement the Charter without need for a new organization; and that the information provided by some States regarding conservation activities should be used by UNEP and completed by data from the United Nations system and IUCN.

According to the Group, information from States and other sources indicated a wide array of conservation activities. Notable strides were being made in institutional development, legislation, policy and administration, treaties, national parks and other protected areas, and pollution control. Considerably less attention was being paid to desertification control and the conservation of marine resources and tropical rain forests.

The revised draft Charter, consisting of a preamble and sections on general principles, functions and implementation, incorporated the comments of the responding States to improve the original document's accuracy and clarity. It called for restraint in the use of natural resources, control of activities which might have an impact on nature and avoidance of discharges of pollutants into natural systems.

Zaire, on whose initiative the Assembly had taken up the topic in 1980, transmitted to the Assembly by letter of 8 September 1981<sup>(1)</sup> a resolution adopted at the thirty-seventh session of the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity (Nairobi, 15-26 June) recommending the draft's adoption.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 27 October, the General Assembly adopted without vote a resolution on the draft World Charter for Nature,<sup>(5)</sup> taking note of the Secretary-General's report and requesting him, in co-operation with UNEP and IUCN, to complete revision of the draft if necessary and to submit a supplementary report in 1982. He was also invited to transmit to Member States the Ad Hoc Group's report and any further observations by States.

The resolution was sponsored by 32 nations. Introducing the draft, Zaire said it was not intended to halt progress or prohibit development, nor was it directed against any particular activity; it was intended to stress protection of the ecosystem in order to safeguard the quality of life. Pakistan, another sponsor, remarked that, although much time and energy was devoted to problems of war and peace and economic and social issues, Governments had the responsibility to keep essential life-support systems in view. The United Kingdom, speaking for the European Community (EC) members, reiterated their support for preparation of the Charter and the continuing discussion which was needed to ensure its international support.

The USSR, while stressing that military activities had the most destructive effect on the environment (p. 836), mentioned the harm done by pollution, the destruction of tropical forests and desertification. Although it supported work on the draft Charter, Bulgaria felt that its purposes and principles, as well as fundamental principles for the protection of nature, should be defined more clearly. The Byelorussian SSR said it supported the elaboration of a charter because it felt the protection of nature should not be boiled down to measures to prevent the harmful effects of nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction. The Lao People's Democratic Republic remarked that only the socialist countries were able to pay the price for preserving nature, because they cared about the health of their populations.

Draft World Charter for Nature

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the draft World Charter for Nature.

Recalling its resolution 35/7 of 30 October 1980.

Aware of the crucial importance attached by the international community to the promotion and development of co-operation aimed at protecting and safeguarding the balance and quality of nature.

Also aware that life on earth is part of nature and depends on the uninterrupted functioning of natural systems, Noting resolution CM/Res.852(XXXVII) adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its thirty-seventh ordinary session, held at Nairobi from 15 to 26 June 1981.

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General, which contains a revised version of the draft World Charter for Nature prepared on the basis of views and observations communicated by Member States in accordance with General Assembly resolution 35/7;

2. Invites Member States which have not yet done so to communicate their views and observations to the Secretary-General;

3. Requests the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the United Nations Environment Programme and the International Union for Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources, to complete if necessary, on the basis of observations received from Member States, the revision of the draft World Charter for Nature and to submit a supplementary report to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session;

4. Invites the Secretary-General to transmit to Member States the text of the report of the Ad Hoc Group of Experts on the Draft World Charter for Nature, containing the revised version of the draft Charter, as well as any further observations by States, with a view to appropriate consideration at the thirty-seventh session of the General Assembly;

5. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-seventh session an item entitled "Consideration and adoption of the revised draft World Charter for Nature: report of the Secretary-General".

Environmental aspects of political, economic and other issues

Environment and the arms race

The need to protect nature from the pernicious effects of the arms race was the subject of action in 1981 by the UNEP Governing Council and the General Assembly.

On 25 May,<sup>(4)</sup> the Council requested the Executive Director to include in the 1984-1989 system-wide medium-term environment programme (p. 841) regular analysis of the impact of the arms race on nature. It invited the Preparatory Committee for the Second Special Session of the General Assembly Devoted to Disarmament (p. 28) to include in the draft agenda for the 1982 session an item on the impact of the arms race on nature and also invited the Secretary-General to submit to that session the report he was preparing on that topic (see below).

By a decision on global armaments spending adopted on 26 May,<sup>(5)</sup> the Council called on Governments to stop the arms race and, until disarmament was achieved, to allocate at least 0.001 per cent of armaments spending for development projects and environmental protection.

In response to a 1980 Assembly resolution,<sup>(2)</sup> the Secretary-General submitted in September 1981 an interim report to the Assembly<sup>(1)</sup> which focused on the impact of the arms race on nature. In view of the small number of substantive replies (22 of the 34 replies received), he considered it premature to put forward definitive proposals. Accordingly, he proposed to solicit additional government views and to convene an expert group meeting to advise on further implementation of the 1980 resolution.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 27 October, the General Assembly adopted a resolution on States' historical responsibility for the preservation of nature for present and future generations.<sup>(3)</sup> It requested the Secretary-General, with the co-operation of UNEP, to complete a report for the Assembly's special session on disarmament containing recommendations for the adoption by States of specific obligations and measures to protect nature from the effects of the arms race and to limit and prohibit the types of military activity presenting the greatest danger for nature.

The resolution, sponsored by 15 nations, was adopted by a recorded vote of 80 to none, with 55 abstentions.

A number of States explained their abstentions. Australia doubted the motives of some of the sponsors, since they were participating in the arms race being denounced. The United Kingdom, speaking for the EC members, said the resolution was simplistic and potentially counter-productive; UNEP was not the forum for issues directly related to disarmament. The United States and Venezuela stated that, since environmental matters were being adequately dealt with by UNEP, duplication should be avoided. Venezuela added that the report requested would distract attention from fundamental matters to be considered at the special session.

Among supporters of the resolution, the USSR stated that no other aspect of environmental preservation and protection was as urgent as eliminating the nuclear threat—a view shared by Mongolia. Unless that threat was eliminated, said the German Democratic Republic, there would be no progress towards solving environmental problems. Bulgaria observed that cessation of the arms race would release resources for economic development, including the solution of pressing ecological problems. The Byelorussian SSR said UNEP should devote attention to the link between the environment and the arms race, particularly through international scientific symposia and seminars. For Czechoslovakia, maintenance of peace and preservation of nature were indivisible. It was not only in time of war, Hungary observed, that military actions entailed harmful consequences for nature. The Ukrainian SSR said military production and activities contributed to pollution of the biosphere. The Lao People's Democratic Republic cited the use of defoliants in South-East Asia as an example of the environmental harm caused by military activities.

Zaire, also voting in favour, observed that the resolution had more to do with the arms race than with the preservation of nature.

Historical responsibility of States for the preservation of nature for present and future generations

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 35/8 of 30 October 1980.

Noting that the continuation and intensification of the arms race are adversely affecting the human environment and damaging the vegetable and animal world.

Attaching great importance to the development of planned and constructive international co-operation in solving the problems of preserving nature.

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the historical responsibility of States for the preservation of nature for present and future generations,

1. Requests the Secretary-General, with the co-operation of the United Nations Environment Programme and on the basis of the studies now in progress and the views expressed by States on this subject, to complete the preparation of a report containing recommendations for the adoption by States of specific obligations and measures relating to the protection of nature from the pernicious effects of the arms race, and to the limitation and prohibition of the types of military activity which present the greatest danger for nature;

2. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit the report referred to in paragraph 1 above to the General Assembly at its second special session devoted to disarmament.

Material remnants of war

Both the UNEP Governing Council and the General Assembly took action in 1981 on the problem of material remnants of war, especially land-mines, which created hazardous conditions for civilian populations and activities long after hostilities had ended.

On 25 May,<sup>(4)</sup> the Council appealed to countries responsible for planting mines to supply the affected countries with information on locating minefields and to arrange for compensation. It requested the Executive Director to continue co-operating with the Secretary-General in consulting countries on the possibility of holding a United Nations conference to solve the issue.

In September, the Secretary-General submitted to the Assembly a progress report,<sup>(1)</sup> prepared by the UNEP secretariat pursuant to a 1980 Assembly resolution,<sup>(2)</sup> analysing States' views on the basis of 35 replies received by 9 September. Of the 28 which were more than acknowledgements, 9 either stated that they had no problems relating to material remnants of war or otherwise refrained from substantive comment. The remaining 19 expressed varying views, including 7 which supported and 4 which opposed the idea of a conference. Most of those replying assigned to the United Nations a responsibility for seeking a solution.

The report concluded that the main divergences of opinion among those that had replied seemed to relate to United Nations involvement and steps for a solution. In view of the apparent lack of interest and/or reticence on the part of the majority, it was difficult to make concrete recommendations.

The report mentioned an International Symposium on Material Remnants of the Second World War on Libyan Soil, organized at Geneva from 28 April to 1 May by the United Nations Institute for Training and Research and the Libyan Institute of Diplomatic Studies.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 17 December, the General Assembly adopted a resolution on material remnants of war,<sup>(3)</sup> taking note of the report and regretting that no real action had been taken. It reiterated support of the demand of affected States for compensation and appealed to all States, particularly those responsible for war remnants, to co-operate with the Secretary-General so that he could make recommendations for a solution. He was requested to continue consulting Member States and to collate information in order to find ways of solving the problem, including the possibility of convening a United Nations conference, and to report again in 1982.

The resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 115 to none, with 29 abstentions. On 11 November, the revised draft, sponsored by 16 nations and introduced by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, had been approved by the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee by a vote of 97 to none, with 28 abstentions.

Explaining their abstentions, Italy and the United Kingdom said they could not accept any legal obligation to remove war remnants and felt that the problem should be dealt with bilaterally. This position was shared by the Federal Republic of Germany, which added that a United Nations conference was not the kind of action that could lead to a solution.

During the Second Committee's debate on development and international economic co-operation, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya said thousands of its nationals had been killed or maimed since the Second World War by land-mines which had not been removed despite commitments by certain Governments. Sweden favoured a United Nations study on the subject, on the basis of which it might be possible to negotiate an understanding on ways to co-operate in removing war remnants.

Malta, advocating an international conference, said its economic development had been hindered by unexploded devices left behind by the former colonial administration, yet negotiations with the United Kingdom on their removal had led nowhere. The United Kingdom replied that, although it had no legal obligation to clear abandoned war matériel from Maltese territorial waters, it would consider what assistance it could render if such matériel constituted an obstacle to Malta's port development plans.

Problem of remnants of war

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 2995(XXVII), 2996(XXVII) and 2997(XXVII) of 15 December 1972, pertaining to co-operation between States in the field of the environment, the international responsibility of States in protecting the environment and the establishment of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme, Recalling also its resolutions 3435(XXX) of 9 December 1975 and 35/71 of 5 December 1980.

Recalling further decisions 80(IV) of 9 April 1976, 101(V) of 25 May 1977 and 9/5 of 25 May 1981 of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme,

Convinced that the removal of remnants of war should be the responsibility of the countries that implanted them and should be carried out at their expense,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General:

2. Regrets that no real action has been taken to solve the problem of remnants of war despite the various resolutions and decisions thereon of the General Assembly and the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme;

3. Reiterates its support of the demand of the States affected by the implantation of mines and the presence of other remnants of war on their lands for compensation for the losses incurred from the States responsible for those remnants;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his contacts and consultations with Member States pursuant to General Assembly resolution 35/71 and to collate all relevant information received from States, in order to find ways and means, including the possibility of convening a conference under the auspices of the United Nations, of solving the problem of remnants of war, and to report to the Assembly at its thirty-seventh session.

Environmental impact of apartheid

On 26 May 1981, the UNEP Governing Council adopted a decision on solidarity with the victims of apartheid in southern Africa,<sup>(1)</sup> by which it reaffirmed support for cessation of all forms of co-operation between UNEP and South Africa and requested the Executive Director to use his good offices to sensitize the world community about the dangers of apartheid, particularly the bantustan policy, to the environment. The Council called on Governments to take resolute measures to oppose apartheid because it had serious environmental consequences for its victims.

Decision: <sup>(1)</sup>UNEP Council (report, A/36/25), 9/9, 26 May.

Environment and development

On 26 May 1981, the UNEP Governing Council took several decisions on environment and its relationship to development.

The Council requested the Executive Director to give more attention to the future environment and development budget line, called on him to initiate support for projects in that area in developing countries, urged him to consider assisting on a catalytic basis in implementing their findings and asked him to approach other international agencies for their support in such implementation.<sup>(7)</sup>

In a decision on programme policy and implementation,<sup>(4)</sup> the Council affirmed the importance of the UNEP role in implementing the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,<sup>(2)</sup> stressed the need for Governments and United Nations agencies participating in conferences or negotiations to take environmental considerations fully into account, and reiterated its call to the Executive Director to assist in preparations for global negotiations on international economic co-operation for development.

Environment and development, particularly development of methodologies for sound environmental management, was identified by the Council as one of the priorities for serious environmental problems in developing countries (p. 819).<sup>(6)</sup> Also, in its decision on long-term issues of the environment programme (p. 822), the Council emphasized the importance of redoubled efforts by the United Nations system in environmental and economic development planning, including integrated environmental and cost/benefit assessment.<sup>(5)</sup>

In its July resolution on the environment,<sup>(1)</sup> the Economic and Social Council called on UNEP to play its role fully in implementing the International Development Strategy and stressed the need for Governments and United Nations agencies to take environmental considerations fully into account in United Nations negotiations and conferences, such as the September United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries (p. 406). In its initial draft, this provision would have had the Council urge Governments and agencies to take environmental considerations into account (rather than stress the need for them to do so) at United Nations conferences and negotiations and in steps they took to give effect to the Strategy.

Brazil, explaining its position on this paragraph, said it did not favour partial implementation of the Strategy and did not regard the paragraph as limiting Governments' conduct or committing them to go beyond the strict meaning of taking environmental considerations into account.

The General Assembly, in its December resolution on the same subject,<sup>(3)</sup> took note of UNEP efforts to implement the Strategy and, in terms similar to those used by the Council, called on UNEP to continue playing its role fully in the Strategy's implementation and stressed the need to take account of environmental considerations.

When the Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee discussed development and international economic co-operation, Australia remarked that the concept of "limits of growth" had misleadingly spread the idea that environmental protection demanded consolidation and conservation of the fruits of development rather than expanding growth. China held that environmental protection must be concurrent with and based on economic development.

Also in 1981, acting on proposals which originated in a UNEP expert group, the Assembly called for implementation of a new work programme to study interrelationships between resources, environment, people and development (p. 390).

Environment and natural resources

Shared natural resources

On 26 May 1981,<sup>(4)</sup> the UNEP Governing Council determined that a report by the Executive Director on natural resources shared by two or more States<sup>(2)</sup> did not suffice as a basis for a Council report requested by the General Assembly in 1979.<sup>(3)</sup> Thus, it requested him, in consultation with Governments, to prepare for the Council in 1982 a report dealing exclusively with progress made in the application of the Assembly resolution, without recommendations on the identification or definition of shared natural resources.

In an October note to the Assembly,<sup>(1)</sup> the Secretary-General explained that, in view of the Council's decision, it was not in a position to report on the topic in 1981.

On a related topic, the Economic and Social Council, in July, requested the Secretary-General to undertake several tasks with regard to shared water resources (p. 685).

Energy resources

Responding to a call by the Economic and Social Council in 1980<sup>(3)</sup> to elaborate proposals on energy and the environment for the August 1981 United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy (p. 689), the UNEP Governing Council, on 26 May 1981,<sup>(7)</sup> authorized the Executive Director to submit on its behalf a report to the Economic and Social Council on UNEP and the Conference.

The report, issued in July,<sup>(1)</sup> pointed out that the objectives of UNEP energy programmes were to promote understanding of the environmental impacts of energy production and use, and to promote development of alternative environmentally sound energy sources. The report described UNEP activities in this sphere.

On 25 May,<sup>(6)</sup> the Governing Council urgently appealed to the Conference Preparatory Committee to give high priority to the uses of new and renewable energy sources which would make it possible to tackle the major problem of fuel wood.

Taking note of the UNEP report and supporting this appeal, the Economic and Social Council, in its July resolution on the environment,<sup>(4)</sup> invited the Conference to consider the environmental effects of various renewable energy sources and said UNEP should have an active role in the environmental aspects of the Conference follow-up.

The Conference, in a resolution of 21 August,<sup>(2)</sup> invited Governments, in their development plans and with due respect for the sovereignty of each State, to consider energy policy in close relation with general environmental policies, particularly soil, water and forest policies, as well as to consider co-operation with the world soils policy (p. 831). The resolution was introduced by Colombia and co-sponsored by Australia and China.

In its December resolution on UNEP,<sup>(5)</sup> the Assembly welcomed the stress placed by the Conference on environmental aspects of energy production and use, and called on UNEP to play an active role in implementing the Nairobi Plan of Action for the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy adopted by the Conference (p. 689).

Three other Governing Council decisions of 26 May dealt with energy. Concerning the environment programme's long-term issues (p. 822), the Council emphasized the importance of redoubled efforts by the United Nations system in environmental management for long-term solutions to the energy problem.<sup>(8)</sup> With respect to priorities for serious environmental problems in the developing countries (p. 819), the Council identified energy, particularly national energy policies, as one such priority.<sup>(9)</sup> In regard to UNEP activities on energy,<sup>(10)</sup> the Council decided to continue allocating substantial funds to allow for the accelerated development of this aspect of the programme.

Environmental law

In May 1981, the UNEP Governing Council set out guidelines for an ad hoc meeting of environmental law experts, transmitted to the General Assembly an annual report on international conventions and protocols (p. 840), requested a further report on natural resources shared by two or more States (see above) and forwarded to States a set of guidelines on marine pollution caused by sea-bed activities (p. 832).

The Ad Hoc Meeting of Senior Government Officials Expert in Environmental Law was held at Montevideo, Uruguay, from 28 October to 6 November, preceded by a meeting of the UNEP Working Group of Experts on Environmental Law (Geneva, 9-18 September), which acted as a preparatory committee. The Meeting was convened by the UNEP Executive Director in response to an April 1980 Governing Council request<sup>(3)</sup> to assist preparation of the environmental law section of the 1984-1989 system-wide medium-term environment programme (p. 841). All interested States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations were invited to attend.

The Meeting's report<sup>(2)</sup> outlined a draft programme for the development and periodic review of environmental law, and contained conclusions and recommendations for the development of guidelines in three major subject areas: marine pollution from land-based sources; protection of the stratospheric ozone layer; and transport, handling and disposal of toxic and dangerous wastes. It further identified eight other subject areas for action: international co-operation in environmental emergencies; coastal zone management; soil conservation; transboundary air pollution; international trade in potentially harmful chemicals; protection of rivers and other inland waters against pollution; legal and administrative mechanisms for prevention and redress of pollution damage; and environmental impact assessment. Also recommended was action to promote the general development of environmental law.

In addition, the Meeting, by a roll-call vote of 28 to none, with 2 abstentions, expressed the conviction that the work on the marine environment done by the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea (p. 127) constituted an essential contribution to the development of environmental law.

The mandate and organizational arrangements of the Meeting had been established by the Council on 26 May,<sup>(1)</sup> when it also decided to consider the report at its 1982 regular session.

International instruments

In September 1981, in response to a 1975 General Assembly resolution,<sup>(2)</sup> the Secretary-General transmitted to the Assembly the annual reports of the UNEP Executive Director on international conventions and protocols in the environment field and on the UNEP register of such instruments, including information on additional parties.<sup>(1)</sup> Transmission of these reports to the Assembly was authorized by the UNEP Governing Council on 26 May 1981.<sup>(3)</sup>

International instruments concluded during 1981 were the Convention for Co-operation in the Protection and Development of the Marine and Coastal Environment of the West and Central African Region and the Protocol concerning Co-operation in Combating Pollution in Cases of Emergency. Both instruments were signed on 23 March at Abidjan, Ivory Coast (p. 833). As at 31 December, 98 international instruments were listed in the UNEP register.

Environmental education

On 26 May 1981, the UNEP Governing Council adopted four decisions on environmental education and training. Concerning the role of universities, the Council requested the Executive Director to promote professional training, research programmes, seminars, the preparation of methodologies and teaching materials, training for university teachers, the incorporation of environmental aspects in university courses and the use of existing education centres for training.<sup>(2)</sup>

With regard to Latin America and the Caribbean, the Council authorized UNEP support for an institutional network for environmental training in that region, proposed by the Ad Hoc Meeting of Representatives of the Latin American and Caribbean Countries and Spain (Montevideo, Uruguay, 19-21 November 1980).<sup>(3)</sup> Dealing with Asia and the Pacific, the Council requested the Executive Director to renew financial support for a further biennium to the Asian and Pacific Development Centre (p. 636), to take urgent measures to provide resources for a proposed regional network of universities and institutes for the conduct of post-graduate courses in environmental education and training, and to establish a programme activity centre for education and training in the region.<sup>(4)</sup> In respect of Africa, the Executive Director was requested to explore, with the Economic Commission for Africa, the possibilities of establishing a regional environmental education and training institution and to seek ways of supporting national institutions.<sup>(5)</sup>

Also on 26 May, in identifying long-term issues of the environment programme (p. 822), the Council emphasized the importance of redoubled efforts by the United Nations system in popular education and dissemination of information on environment-development relationships by the media and by non-governmental organizations.<sup>(1)</sup>

Technical co-operation and co-ordination in the UN system

Technical co-operation

The technical co-operation programme for 1981 approved in May by the UNEP Governing Council amounted to $2.73 million, as against $2.38 million already committed for the year. No new projects were approved. Emphasis was placed on providing advisory services in collaboration with United Nations regional commissions and UNEP regional offices, and through small-scale projects stressing training and technical co-operation among developing countries.

UNEP continued to collaborate with Governments in implementing projects in such sectors as the Global Environmental Monitoring System, the International Register of Potentially Toxic Chemicals (p. 826), the International Referral System for sources of environmental information (p. 826) and the regional seas programme (p. 833), as well as in desertification control (p. 827).

Co-ordination in the UN system

During 1981, work continued towards preparing the 1984-1989 system-wide medium-term environment programme, an interorganizational effort which was a major project of both UNEP and the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC), for submission to the UNEP Governing Council in 1982. The programme was to be the basic document for use by United Nations bodies in planning and programming for environment-related matters, encompassing UNEP-supported activities as well as those of an environmental nature in programmes of other United Nations organizations.

In a February 1981 report to the Council,<sup>(4)</sup> the Executive Director suggested that, after approving the programme's provisions, the Council might wish to provide general policy guidance for United Nations environmental programmes by inviting other organizations of the system to take full account in their own activities of provisions relevant to them. The report added that UNEP would endeavour to send high-level representatives to other organizations when future programmes were discussed to ensure that governing bodies would not lose sight of the broad environmental context of their programmes and that their activities would contribute to furthering environment programme objectives.

In its 1981 work on co-ordination in the United Nations system (p. 1075), ACC made several observations on the proposed programme. In a January report to the Governing Council,<sup>(3)</sup> ACC said the programme should be seen not only as a document of use to the Council but also, to the extent relevant to their mandates, as one of basic interest to governing bodies of other United Nations organizations. This view was reiterated in the ACC annual overview report to the Economic and Social Council, issued in May.<sup>(2)</sup> Other aspects of environmental co-ordination covered in ACC reports included long-term environmental perspectives (p. 822) and desertification control (p. 827).

On 26 May, the Governing Council provisionally approved the programme's structure and objectives, and urged the Executive Director to proceed with its development for submission at the Council's 1982 regular session.<sup>(10)</sup> It commended the views of ACC, recognized that the programme had to take into account the concerns of the organizations in the system, urged continued close co-operation on the programme between them and UNEP, and appealed to Members States to continue supporting the programme's further development.<sup>(9)</sup>

With regard to the ACC report as a whole, the Council noted with appreciation the continuing readiness of ACC to co-operate with UNEP in formulating the system-wide programme and the long-term perspective, and requested the Executive Director to continue participating fully in ACC meetings and to report regularly to the Council on relevant ACC decisions.<sup>(8)</sup> The Council also dealt with co-ordination in respect of the perspective document, the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (UNCHS) (p. 842) and United Nations regional commissions (p. 843).

The Economic and Social Council, in its July resolution on UNEP, requested the United Nations system to take fully into account the ACC view that the system-wide programme should be of basic interest to other organizations, and expressed appreciation for the continued efforts of UNEP and others to develop it.<sup>(5)</sup> This paragraph was orally amended and revised in informal consultations in the Council's First (Economic) Committee to have the Council request the United Nations system to take fully into account the view of ACC rather than having the Council simply endorse it.

The General Assembly, in its December resolution on the same subject,<sup>(6)</sup> restated the provisions of the Council resolution, with two differences: the Assembly did not use the word "fully" in requesting that the ACC view be taken into account and, with regard to the statement that the programme was of basic interest to governing bodies of the United Nations system, the Assembly qualified this by adding "to the extent that they deem appropriate". These changes were introduced in the draft submitted by a Vice-Chairman of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee as a result of informal consultations on the original 13-nation draft, which had used the Economic and Social Council's language in this paragraph.

During the Second Committee's debate on development and international economic co-operation, the Ukrainian SSR saw implementation of the system-wide programme as evidence of the capacity of UNEP to carry out its co-ordinating function in regard to the environment. Venezuela remarked that the general aims of medium-term environment programmes should be adopted by the Governing Council, while the strategy for implementing them should be formulated at the request of and in close consultation with Governments.

In more general comments on the environment programmes of UNEP and the United Nations system, the Federal Republic of Germany said UNEP must concentrate on urgent global questions and not embrace areas covered by other international organizations, particularly political ones. New Zealand hoped the programme would enable UNEP to identify activities it should undertake and those which should be undertaken by others.

The report on co-ordination prepared for the Governing Council's 1982 regular session<sup>(1)</sup> and approved by ACC on 30 October 1981<sup>(7)</sup> discussed inter-agency co-operation on the environment over the previous decade. With regard to the system-wide programme, ACC suggested that it should be further refined and elaborated, after which the Council could review it in 1983.

Co-operation between UNEP and UNCHS

Collaboration on environmental aspects of human settlements continued in 1981 between UNEP and UNCHS (Habitat). Two projects under way concerned the preparation of guidelines for environmental aspects of human settlements planning, begun during the year, and of a methodology for environmental impact assessment of large urban areas, to be tested in the valley of Mexico City. The UNEP Task Force on Human Settlements participated in two expert group meetings convened by UNCHS, on development of the indigenous construction sector (p. 856) and infrastructure for slums and squatter settlements (p. 857).

The Commission on Human Settlements, by a 6 May resolution on co-operation between the two bodies,<sup>(2)</sup> requested the UNCHS Executive Director, in consultation with that of UNEP, to study ways of strengthening co-operation to make it more effective and to report on the staff and budgetary demands for preparing and servicing the joint meetings held regularly between the two Executive Directors and the bureaux (officers) of the Commission and the UNEP Governing Council. On 26 May, the Council requested the UNEP Executive Director to co-operate on this request and also expressed satisfaction at the continued co-operation.<sup>(4)</sup>

Also on 26 May, the Council invited States to consider adopting policies on local environmental planning and management of human settlements, and requested the Executive Director to collaborate with UNCHS and other United Nations bodies in incorporating the environmental aspect into local planning and management policies through devising methodologies for integrated planning, encouraging studies and information dissemination, encouraging the United Nations system to respond to requests for assistance in formulating local environmental planning policies, and supporting training programmes for officials.<sup>(5)</sup>

At their fourth joint meeting (New York, 9 and 10 December), the bureaux of the Council and the Commission and the Executive Directors of UNEP and UNCHS emphasized the need for practical alternatives to solve critical environmental problems.<sup>(1)</sup>

The growing co-operation between the two bodies was welcomed by the General Assembly in its December resolution on UNEP.<sup>(3)</sup>

Decisions: UNEP Council (report, A/36/25), 26 May: <sup>(4)</sup>9/3, sect. IV; <sup>(5)</sup>9/14.

Co-operation with regional commissions

The Secretary-General submitted to the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination (CPC) in April 1981 a note on the distribution of tasks and responsibilities between regional commissions and other United Nations bodies regarding water resources (p. 686) and the environment.<sup>(2)</sup> In regard to the latter, the note suggested that close co-operation existed between UNEP and the commissions and that efficient distribution of responsibilities might hinge mainly on future arrangements between them.

In June,<sup>(3)</sup> CPC agreed to review the matter further in 1982, based on a report that would contain a detailed analysis of the various mandates and activities concerning the environment. It also agreed that the Secretariat should continue reviewing activities to determine whether tasks were being performed at appropriate levels.

The UNEP Governing Council, in its 26 May 1981 decision on co-ordination in the United Nations system (p. 841), expressed satisfaction at the fruitful co-operation between some of the regional commissions and UNEP, recommended that this be improved with the Economic Commission for Africa, and decided to take up in 1982 the subject of the regional presence of UNEP.<sup>(1)</sup>

During debate in the General Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, Belgium said it would not oppose the transfer from UNEP to the regional commissions of certain responsibilities for project planning and implementation, provided that they were confined to clearly defined and purely regional and inter-regional activities; but it would oppose the duplication that would arise from having both regional UNEP offices and environmental units in the commissions' secretariats.

Chapter XVII

Human settlements

The United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (UNCHS), also known as Habitat, continued during 1981 to implement its work programme based on the six major subject areas identified at Habitat: United Nations Conference on Human Settlements, in 1976 (p. 845). Its work was reviewed by the Commission on Human Settlements, and the General Assembly subsequently took action on some human settlements issues.

The Centre, under the Conference's guidelines, emphasized direct assistance to developing countries through technical co-operation projects (p. 850), research and development (including training) and the dissemination of information in the field of human settlements. It published, sponsored or co-sponsored the publication of several studies and reports, on such issues as energy utilization (p. 852), the construction industry (p. 856), infrastructure in slum areas (p. 857), problems of the disabled in housing (p. 856) and financing of human settlements (p. 856).

The Commission held its fourth session at Manila, Philippines, from 27 April to 6 May 1981.<sup>(1)</sup> Among the 15 resolutions and eight decisions it adopted were the Manila Communiqué on a Human Settlements Movement (p. 850) and a proposal to declare an international year of shelter for the homeless (p. 853). It approved the UNCHS work programme and budget for 1982-1983 (p. 845) and the medium-term plan for 1984-1989 (p. 846), but noted that the existing financial resources of UNCHS and the United Nations Habitat and Human Settlements Foundation were inadequate to ensure implementation of those plans (p. 847).

The General Assembly, in December, adopted three resolutions on human settlements. It welcomed the Manila Communiqué and urged the Commission to continue to provide support for technical co-operation among developing countries for human settlements programmes,<sup>(6)</sup> and requested the Centre's Executive Director to take steps to implement the recommendations of the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy (p. 689) which were within the mandate of the Centre.<sup>(7)</sup> By the third resolution, dealing with mobilization of financial resources for UNCHS, the Assembly appealed to Member States to contribute to the Human Settlements Foundation.<sup>(8)</sup>

By another resolution, the Assembly decided in principle to designate 1987 as the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless,<sup>(5)</sup> as recommended by the Economic and Social Council.<sup>(3)</sup> The Council, by another resolution of 24 July, welcomed the adoption of the Centre's work programme for 1982-1983 and the medium-term plan for 1984-1989 and noted the need for adequate financing.<sup>(2)</sup> By a third resolution, it welcomed the contributions by UNCHS to the preparations for the Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, and requested follow-up activities in the field of energy related to human settlements.<sup>(4)</sup>

Programme and finances of UNCHS

Programme policy decisions

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. The Economic and Social Council, having considered the report of the Commission on Human Settlements on the work of its 1981 session,<sup>(2)</sup> transmitted the report to the General Assembly by a resolution of 24 July.<sup>(3)</sup> It recommended that the Assembly approve the recommendations of the Commission and welcomed the Commission's adoption of the Centre's work programme for 1982-1983 (p. 845) and the draft medium-term plan for 1984-1989 (p. 847). Noting the need for adequate financing for the proper implementation of the activities set out in the draft work programme and programme budget, it reiterated the appeal by UNCHS to Member States for contributions. It called on the Commission to provide adequate support to technical co-operation among developing countries (TCDC) in the formulation and implementation of its programmes on human settlements (p. 850), and stressed the importance of UNCHS in providing project and advisory assistance to developing countries, particularly the least developed.

The Council adopted the resolution without vote, on the recommendation of its First (Economic) Committee, which approved the text on 21 July, also without vote. The resolution was based on a draft submitted by Venezuela, on behalf of the Group of 77 developing countries, and orally revised. The main changes were made in paragraphs 4, 5 and 7. By the revised version of paragraph 4, the Council noted the need for adequate financing, rather than noting that the existing financial resources of UNCHS and the United Nations Habitat and Human Settlements Foundation were insufficient, for the proper implementation of the projected activities. Revised paragraph 5 reiterated an urgent appeal to Member States to continue and, if possible, to increase their contributions, instead of reiterating an urgent appeal to those that had already made voluntary contributions to increase their contributions. Paragraph 7 stressed the importance of UNCHS in providing project and advisory assistance, instead of, as in the original version, underlining the need for it to increase its financial and advisory programme assistance.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. Acting on the recommendation of its Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, the General Assembly on 4 December adopted without vote a resolution on the Commission's report.<sup>(4)</sup> Welcoming the Manila Communiqué on a Human Settlements Movement (p. 851), adopted by the Commission on 6 May, it also urged the Commission to continue to take account of and to provide adequate support to TCDC for implementation of its human settlements programmes.

The text was based on a 16-nation draft resolution introduced in the Committee by the Philippines.<sup>(1)</sup> The draft was withdrawn by the sponsors following informal consultations in favour of a text introducing some changes of wording, which was submitted by a Committee Vice-Chairman and adopted without vote on 13 November.

Stating its position in the Committee, the USSR said it did not oppose the adoption of the draft without vote since all were interested, especially the developing countries, in promoting co-operation in the field of human settlements; the main objective was to support UNCHS and the national activities of developing countries.

Speaking during the Committee debate, New Zealand said the Commission had a central role to play in improving the settlements problems in developing countries.

Report of the Commission on Human Settlements

The General Assembly,

Further recalling the Vancouver Declaration on Human Settlements, 1976, and the other recommendations of Habitat: United Nations Conference on Human Settlements, Affirming the importance of the promotion of human settlements development as a distinct and specific policy measure for the attainment of the goals and objectives of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, adopted by the General Assembly in its resolution 35/56 of 5 December 1980.

Reaffirming that human settlements development should be viewed and taken into account in the context of the national plans and priorities and the development of all countries, in particular the developing countries,

Recognizing that the Commission on Human Settlements has continued to address itself effectively to substantive issues in the field of human settlements of priority concern to Member States, particularly developing countries,

Taking note of Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/69A of 24 July 1981 on international co-operation in the field of human settlements,

Having considered the report of the Commission on Human Settlements on the work of its fourth session,

1. Takes note of the report of the Commission on Human Settlements on the work of its fourth session;

2. Welcomes resolution 4/1, entitled "Manila Communique on a Human Settlements Movement", adopted on 6 May 1981 by the Commission on Human Settlements at its fourth session;

3. Urges the Commission on Human Settlements to continue to take account of and to provide adequate support to technical co-operation among developing countries in the formulation and implementation of its programmes on human settlements.

Work programme and budget for 1982-1983

The six subprogrammes of the UNCHS work programme and programme budget for 1982-1983<sup>(8)</sup> corresponded to the six categories identified at the 1976 Habitat Conference: settlement policies and strategies; settlement planning; shelter, infrastructure and services; land; public participation; and institutions and management.<sup>(9)</sup>

Endorsing the work programme and approving the proposed use of extrabudgetary funds for projects, the Commission on Human Settlements, by a decision of 6 May 1981,<sup>(7)</sup> requested the Centre's Executive Director to prepare for the 1982 Commission session a report on the use of all extrabudgetary resources broken down by source. The Commission further decided, in order to implement the regional component of the work programme, to request the Executive Director to seek the conversion by the General Assembly of the 12 temporary assistance posts deployed to the United Nations regional commissions to established regular-budget posts, with the aim of ensuring that the resulting resources would be utilized for implementing the regional component of the Commission's work programme. The Centre would be accountable to the Commission for the use of those funds. The Commission noted with concern that the 1982-1983 budget proposals of the Secretary-General (p. 1272) indicated a negative growth rate of 8.6 per cent, in spite of the fact that the Commission had urged that human settlements programmes be given higher priority. In a resolution of the same day, the Commission requested the Secretary-General to propose to the Assembly the conversion of the posts.<sup>(4)</sup>

The Commission's approval of the work programme was welcomed by the Economic and Social Council in a resolution of 24 July.<sup>(5)</sup>

Reporting to the Assembly's Second Committee on 1 October, the Executive Director said

UNCHS would require extrabudgetary contributions of about $10 million in order to be able to implement its 1982-1983 work programme. He urged all States to give the Centre the necessary support at the United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities in November (p. 426).

A report of 8 October on resources for the work programme at the regional level,<sup>(3)</sup> submitted by the Secretary-General to the Assembly's Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee, proposed that temporary posts at UNCHS be converted into established posts at the regional commissions on a permanent basis, in accordance with the Commission's action in May, and that those posts be included in the 1982-1983 programme budget. Financial implications for the two-year period would be $1.03 million.

The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ), in a report of 22 October, declared that it did not object to the request for the creation of 12 established posts for deployment to the regional commissions, but recommended that the Commission and the governing bodies of the regional commissions monitor the human settlements programmes at the regional level to ensure that staff resources were used effectively and that there was no duplication of work.<sup>(1)</sup>

The Fifth Committee approved without vote on 29 October the ACABQ recommendation for an additional appropriation of $1.03 million for the suggested transfer of posts. Following that decision, the United States said that, had there been a vote, it would have abstained because the redeployment of posts meant an increase of expenditure and was not in line with the concept of zero growth (p. 1275). The $1.03 million was included in the total appropriations for UNCHS, amounting to $8,312,200, approved by the Assembly in a resolution of 18 December.<sup>(6)</sup>

The Committee for Programme and Co-ordination (CPC), at its May/June 1981 session,<sup>(2)</sup> recommended that two subprogrammes—settlement policies and strategies, and settlement planning—be merged and funds consequently released be used for strengthening the capacities of the regional commissions in the field of human settlements (p. 859).

Speaking during the debate in the Second Committee, the Byelorussian SSR said the Centre's activities should be carried out with existing financial resources. Approval of the work programme was expressed by Finland (on behalf of the Nordic countries), Kenya and Poland. The Federal Republic of Germany said the Centre's activities were oriented in the right direction, especially since they gave priority to practical measures rather than theoretical studies. Belgium agreed that practical measures should have priority, but added that the lack of clearly defined priorities among the subprogrammes and projects was unfortunate. Kenya said it did not agree with the CPC recommendation to merge the two subprogrammes.

Medium-term plan for 1984-1989

At its 1981 session, the Commission on Human Settlements considered the medium-term plan for 1984-1989, presented by the Executive Director of UNCHS.<sup>(1)</sup> By a decision of 6 May,<sup>(3)</sup> the Commission approved the submission of the plan to the Office for Programme Planning and Co-ordination of the United Nations Department of International Economic and Social Affairs, CPC, the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly.

While the six priority areas selected at the 1976 Habitat Conference had provided the subprogrammes for the 1980-1983 medium-term plan, the Commission decided that for the 1984-1989 plan, subprogramme 3—shelter, infrastructure and services—should be divided, as suggested by the Executive Director, into four new subprogrammes: shelter and community services; development of the indigenous construction sector; low-cost infrastructure for human settlements; and mobilization of finance for human settlements development. The first three of these subprogrammes were to be given highest priority. Public participation, being a component of several other subprogrammes, was eliminated as a separate category. With four of the former subprogrammes—settlements policies and strategies; settlements planning; land; and human settlements institutions and management—included, the 1984-1989 plan consisted of eight subprogrammes.

The Executive Director was requested, in the preparation of future work programmes and programme budgets based on the plan, to continue to give high priority to the promotion of adequate living conditions for low-income groups, particularly those in the least developed, landlocked and island developing countries. The Commission also decided that no subprogramme activities proposed in the plan were obsolete, marginally useful or ineffective.

The Commission's approval of the plan was welcomed by the Economic and Social Council in a resolution of 24 July.<sup>(2)</sup>

During the debate on human settlements in the Assembly's Second Committee, Poland expressed support for the plan. Finland, speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries, said they appreciated the plan's quality.

Management of the Centre

Information system

The Commission, following up a 1979 recommendation of the General Assembly for the establishment of a unified information service within UNCHS,<sup>(2)</sup> noted in a resolution of 6 May 1981 that this had been accomplished and requested the Executive Director to ensure that technical co-operation projects implemented by the Centre contained the appropriate project support communications components, emphasizing human settlements aspects.<sup>(1)</sup>

Resolutions: <sup>(1)</sup>Commission on Human Settlements (report, A/36/8). 4/9, 6 May; <sup>(2)</sup>GA, 34/115, para. 1, 14 Dec. 1979 (YUN 1979, p. 708).

Selection of consultants and experts

By a resolution of 6 May 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the Commission requested the Executive Director to intensify his efforts to promote the use of consultants and experts from developing countries in all aspects of work concerning human settlements and to give preference to qualified indigenous personnel in project work. It also requested that due consideration be given to qualified personnel from developing countries in the compilation and updating of the UNCHS roster of consultants and experts.

Resolution: <sup>(1)</sup>Commission on Human Settlements (report, A/36/8), 4/10, 6 May.

UN Habitat and Human Settlements Foundation

In 1981, a total of $1.85 million of United Nations Habitat and Human Settlements Foundation funds was spent, as work continued on 48 projects in 31 countries, on 22 global projects and on 15 regional projects, as part of the 1980-1981 work programme (p. 848). In accordance with a 1979 resolution of the Commission on Human Settlements,<sup>(8)</sup> the activities of the Foundation were integrated into the work programme of UNCHS and its resources were utilized to provide extrabudgetary support for the Centre's work programme as well as for technical assistance projects.

The Executive Director's report on the proposed programme budget,<sup>(3)</sup> submitted to the Commission in March 1981, showed that the projected resources of the Foundation for 1982-1983 would include $4.43 million in available funds and $4.02 million in expected contributions and pledges. Expenditures proposed were $3.33 million; of this amount, $2.38 million would be used for the Centre's work programme and the remainder for programme support costs. It was expected that approximately $2 million would be committed for technical co-operation projects and that the reserve fund would be maintained at $553,300.

In a report presented to the Commission in April, the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions expressed the opinion that, with contributions and pledges for 1982-1983 not expected to exceed their level for 1980-1981, key programme and programme support costs of the Foundation should be kept below the estimate recommended by the Executive Director.<sup>(2)</sup>

The Commission, by a decision of 6 May,<sup>(7)</sup> approved the proposed allocation of funds for programme, programme support, project and reserve purposes for 1982-1983. Noting that the existing resources of UNCHS and the Foundation were inadequate to carry out the projected work programme for 1982-1983 and for 1984-1989, it appealed for contributions. By a resolution of the same date, it welcomed the participation of the Chairman of the Commission, in collaboration with the Executive Director, in the mobilization of financial resources.<sup>(4)</sup>

The Economic and Social Council, in a resolution of 24 July, reiterated the urgent appeal by UNCHS for contributions by Member States, particularly developed countries.<sup>(5)</sup>

The General Assembly, by a resolution of 4 December, also appealed for contributions and, if possible, for an increase in them, and appealed to those that had not contributed, particularly developed countries, to make voluntary contributions.<sup>(6)</sup>

The Assembly adopted the resolution without vote. Its Second (Economic and Financial) Committee had approved the text in like manner on 13 November, after an oral revision rewording the only operative paragraph urging States to contribute. The draft was submitted by a Vice-Chairman of the Committee, following informal consultations on a 16-nation draft which was subsequently withdrawn.<sup>(1)</sup>

After approval of the draft by the Committee, the USSR, expressing support for the Centre's objectives, said its work programmes should not exceed the funds allocated from the United Nations regular budget and wider use should be made of contributions in national currencies.

Speaking during the Committee debate, India expressed regret that work of UNCHS had been adversely affected by the lack of resources, and Kenya said it was important to increase and strengthen the resources of the Centre and the Foundation.

Mobilization of financial resources for the United Nations
Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat)

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 35/77 D of 5 December 1980, in which it urgently appealed to all States and appropriate financial institutions to make or to increase their voluntary contributions to the United Nations Habitat and Human Settlements Foundation in support of the activities of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat).

Noting the continued need for financial resources for the full implementation of the projected activities of the Centre under the work programme for the biennium 1982-1983 and the draft medium-term plan for the period 1984-1989 approved by the Commission on Human Settlements at its fourth session,

Taking note of Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/69 A of 24 July 1981, in particular paragraphs 4 and 5 thereof which refer to the need for adequate financing for the projected activities of the Centre,

Expressing its appreciation to those Governments that have so far made financial contributions to the activities of the Centre,

Reiterates its urgent appeal to Member States to contribute and, if possible, to increase their contributions to the United Nations Habitat and Human Settlements Foundation in support of the activities of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) and appeals to those that have not yet contributed, particularly developed countries and other countries in a position to do so, also to make voluntary contributions.

Human settlements activities

Activities of the Habitat Centre

In 1981, UNCHS continued to carry out technical co-operation projects in the six areas, or sub-programmes, defined by the 1976 Habitat Conference<sup>(2)</sup> (p. 845). They were described in a February 1982 report of the Executive Director.<sup>(1)</sup>

Projects corresponding to subprogramme 1 (settlement policies and strategies) were aimed at assisting in the formulation of regional and national policies and strategies, and at strengthening the institutions responsible for implementing them. Such projects were implemented in 18 countries, including: a project in Burundi aimed at developing a regional planning policy, strategies for the development of secondary centres, and a programme for the development of human settlements in urban and rural areas; a project in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya for the development of settlement policies and strategies; and two projects in Bangladesh, on national planning and on the development of an urban housing policy and programme. With regard to research and development activities, recommendations on policy guidelines for the Asia and Pacific region were prepared. Work continued on the preparation of the Quinquennial Global Report on Human Settlements, scheduled for publication in 1985.

Under subprogramme 2 (settlement planning), projects focused on establishing specific proposals on the use of resources in relation to needs, the location of activities and infrastructure investment, and the methodology for implementing priority programmes. Projects were carried out in 16 countries; they included master plans for Lagos, Nigeria, and Nicosia, Cyprus, and a reconstruction project to overcome the damage by hurricanes in Dominica (p. 858). UNCHS initiated research and development work to identify long-term global trends and prospects for human settlements. It carried out case studies on human settlements, population and the environment and, in co-operation with the United Nations Environment Programme, prepared recommendations for the formulation of environmental guidelines for human settlements planning. It organized an expert group meeting on planning for human settlements in disaster-prone areas (Nairobi, Kenya, 4-8 December) and was preparing a slide presentation on the topic. Several reports were prepared on rural settlements planning, as part of the Centre's work on a systems approach.

Subprogramme 3 (shelter, infrastructure and services) included such technical co-operation projects as implementation of sites-and-services schemes, development of local building materials, energy sources, urban and rural housing, and setting up financial mechanisms. Projects were carried out in 32 countries; among them were the integrated urban development of Musaga, Burundi, and a large-scale project to initiate and assist housing and building technology projects in several provinces of Argentina. An experimental training programme for high- and middle-level government officials responsible for housing programmes, undertaken with the Catholic University of Leuven, Belgium, continued, with workshops in Asia and Africa. Steps were also taken to prepare a strategy and plan for an extensive programme of integrated multidisciplinary demonstration projects designed to show how basic human needs could be met and living conditions improved in urban slums and squatter settlements.

An expert group meeting on development of the indigenous construction sector was held in November, and an ad hoc expert group meeting led to the preparation of a feasibility study on setting up an Asian human settlements bank (p. 856). An African housing development and finance institution known as "Shelter-Afrique", with headquarters at Nairobi, was established. Information activities included the production of two films on energy.

Technical co-operation projects under subprogramme 4 (land-use policy) were designed to assist Governments in formulating and implementing land policies and legislation. Most projects dealing with physical development at the national level or below related to this subprogramme. In 1981, there were such projects in five countries, including: a detailed land survey of all the islands belonging to Tuvalu; the setting up of institutional frameworks and methodologies for national land-use planning in Zimbabwe; and a Land Development Corporation in Cyprus, to advise on the institutional structure for the implementation of legislative measures governing land use. The Centre continued work on a theme paper on land for presentation to the Commission in 1983.

Programmes that most clearly involved active citizen participation in line with subprogramme 5 (public participation) were sites-and-services projects, projects dealing with the improvement of squatter settlements and pilot/demonstration projects. Projects were carried out in 14 countries. An example was a large-scale project to rehabilitate and develop the popular settlements in Nicaragua that had suffered extensive damage during recent years. A project on training for public participation in the design and construction of low-income housing and related infrastructure was approved by the Danish International Development Agency in May. Information activities included work on four films aimed at training and information dissemination at the community level.

Projects under subprogramme 6 (institutions and management) were concerned with establishing an appropriate institutional base for the formulation of human settlements development policies and for the execution of programmes in the fields of physical planning, building technology, housing, services and training. One of the 15 countries which benefited from activities under this subprogramme was Bahrain, where significant advances had been made in strengthening the Ministry of Public Works and in formulating plans for physical development, housing and infrastructure. Assistance was also provided to the United Arab Emirates to build up operational capacity in the fields of physical planning, housing and infrastructure, and to Sri Lanka for the establishment of an Urban Development Authority dealing with urban renewal and squatter improvement. A course was held by the Economic Development Institute and UNCHS on training in human settlements management (Dakar, Senegal, 25 May-3 July) and an Urban Data Management Workshop was held in March at Bogotá, Colombia. Information activities included a survey to identify national documentation services in the field of human settlements and to assess the need for technical assistance, the microfiching of all documents in the first UNCHS bibliography of unpublished reports, and the distribution of three issues of Habitat News, with an Arabic insert widely distributed in Arabic-speaking countries.

Also in 1981, co-operation and collaboration with intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations were an important aspect of the Centre's activities, with the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) remaining the main funding agency for field projects executed by the Centre (see below).

Speaking during the debate on human settlements in the General Assembly's Second Committee, Canada said the achievements of UNCHS in 1981 had been significant.

Technical co-operation

Technical co-operation projects were divided among the four geographical units of UNCHS. The unit concerned with sub-Sahara Africa was involved in 118 projects in 53 countries, 30 of which were completed in 1981 in 22 countries. Expenditures for 1981 in that area were $5,840,994.

In the Latin America and Caribbean unit, there were 59 projects in progress in 33 countries; 21 of those projects in 18 countries were completed in 1981. In addition, there were five ongoing regional projects. Expenditures for 1981 were $1,231,511.

The Asia and Pacific unit had 51 projects in 31 countries, completing 19 of them in 15 countries during 1981. Four regional projects were under way. Expenditures for 1981 in that region were $3,197,815.

There were 24 projects in 18 countries in the Western Asia, Northern Africa and Europe unit, five of which were completed in five countries during 1981. Expenditures for 1981 totalled $3,104,725.

During the year, UNCHS fielded 31 advisory missions to 21 countries, in particular the least developed.

Interregional and global technical co-operation projects were also undertaken. The Secretary-General reported<sup>(1)</sup> that about 90 per cent of the resources expended on technical co-operation by UNCHS during 1981 was provided by UNDP. Habitat was executing 86 UNDP-financed projects in 64 countries, of which 44 were initiated in 1981 (p. 848).

UNCHS also continued to co-ordinate its activities in the field with the World Bank. Such activities included: the training of technicians in policy formulation, project identification, analysis and preparation of detailed technical and financial mechanisms for low-income housing development projects; joint monitoring missions to ascertain the appropriate nature of large credit loans for pilot housing projects in the United Republic of Cameroon, the Upper Volta and Zimbabwe; and a joint monitoring and evaluation mission in Madagascar for the development of a human settlements programme.

The Economic and Social Council, in a resolution of 24 July,<sup>(2)</sup> called on the Commission on Human Settlements to take account of and to provide adequate support to technical co-operation among developing countries (TCDC) in the formulation and implementation of its programmes. It stressed the importance of UNCHS in providing project and advisory assistance to developing countries, particularly the least developed. The General Assembly took similar action in a resolution adopted on 4 December,<sup>(3)</sup> urging the Commission to continue to take account of and to provide adequate support to TCDC (p. 844).

During the debate in the Assembly's Second Committee, India expressed the hope that economic and technical co-operation between developing countries would feature prominently in the planning of UNCHS programmes, since developing countries possessed labour-intensive technologies particularly suited to the needs of others.

1981 Manila Communiqué

The Commission on Human Settlements, at its fourth session at Manila, Philippines, adopted on 6 May 1981 the Manila Communiqué on a Human Settlements Movement.<sup>(1)</sup> Expressing the view that human settlements development should encompass efforts to improve the quality of life by satisfying such basic human needs as water, energy, food, clothing, livelihood, medical services, education, culture and technology, sports and recreation, ecological balance and mobility, it emphasized the need to co-ordinate sectoral activities in the human settlements field within a comprehensive and integrated framework.

The Communique noted achievements of the Commission and UNCHS which focused on the role of the construction industry in human settlements programmes and national development (p. 856) and the provision of infrastructure in slums and squatter areas in human settlements (p. 857). It expressed appreciation for contributions by Governments to the United Nations Habitat and Human Settlements Foundation (p. 847), and called on Governments and international organizations to join in a comprehensive human settlements movement.

The adoption of the Communique was welcomed by the General Assembly in a resolution of 4 December.<sup>(2)</sup>

Speaking in the Assembly's Second Committee during the debate on human settlements, Kenya said the Manila Communique had proved to be one of the most important results of the 1981 Commission session and deserved close examination.

Resolutions: <sup>(1)</sup>Commission on Human Settlements (report, A/36/8), 4/1, 6 May; <sup>(2)</sup>GA, 36/72 A, para. 2, 4 Dec. (p. 845).

Human settlements development

By a resolution of 6 May 1981 on the mobilization of resources for human settlements development,<sup>(1)</sup> the Commission requested the UNCHS Executive Director to ensure the prompt utilization of resources allocated to the United Nations regional commissions and to intensify efforts to mobilize such resources. It called on all States and international organizations to increase contributions in this regard to developing countries. It also requested the Executive Director, in co-operation with the Executive Secretary of the Economic Commission for Africa, to harmonize their work with regard to manpower, training, public participation at the grass-roots level, financing, energy requirements and conservation, services and assistance in research relating to human settlements.

National action

In compliance with a 1979 General Assembly resolution,<sup>(2)</sup> the UNCHS Executive Director presented to the Commission in February 1981 an interim progress report<sup>(1)</sup> on implementation of the recommendations for national action, adopted at the 1976 Habitat Conference,<sup>(5)</sup> and on international and national funding for human settlements development.

To obtain the necessary information, the Executive Director had sent a letter to all Member States in August 1980 requesting an accounting that focused on national priority action, on the programmes adopted, on the amount of funds allocated or received through bilateral and multi-lateral arrangements, and on the volume of national resources devoted to human settlements development. Thirty States responded initially, but the report indicated that few of them dealt comprehensively with the level and sources of funding for human settlements activities. The report summarized the information provided by those countries and included suggestions for future biennial reporting. Two supplements of March and April 1981 added information from 14 more States.

On 6 May, the Commission adopted a decision on future progress reports, requesting the Executive Director to ask for information from Member States on progress in national action and on the level and sources of funding for national activities; to prepare a format that Member States could follow in the presentation of that information (see below); and to submit in 1983 an overview paper with an analysis based on the countries' responses.<sup>(4)</sup>

During the debate in the Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, Thailand said it believed that the development of human settlements should be viewed within the context of the national development plans and priorities, in particular in developing countries; activities related to human settlements played a key role in the economic and social development of a nation and were an integral part of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade.<sup>(3)</sup>

Decision: <sup>(4)</sup>Commission on Human Settlements (report, A/36/8): 4/21, 6 May 1981.

Periodic reports

In January 1981, the UNCHS Executive Director, in accordance with a 1979 General Assembly resolution,<sup>(2)</sup> presented to the Commission an interim report on financial and other assistance for human settlements activities to and among developing countries and on human settlements activities within and outside the United Nations system, suggesting for the requested biennial reporting a tabular format for use in collecting information on bilateral and multilateral assistance (p. 851), the tables to be annexed to a more analytical report.<sup>(1)</sup>

By a decision of 6 May,<sup>(3)</sup> the Commission approved the suggested format. It agreed with the Executive Director's proposal that reports on activities of intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations should be presented to it as information documents.

Energy requirements

In accordance with a July 1980 resolution of the Economic and Social Council,<sup>(4)</sup> the UNCHS Executive Director submitted to the Commission on Human Settlements in 1981 a report<sup>(2)</sup> which provided an overview of the potential role of new and renewable sources of energy for the development of human settlements. Stressing that developing countries needed a two-pronged approach to the problem of meeting their energy needs, the report stated that the use of costly commercial energy resources would have to be optimized through technological innovation, effective management and the development of more efficient settlements systems, and that greater reliance would have to be placed on new and renewable energy sources in the development, rehabilitation and management of human settlements.

Recommendations for national, regional and global action were proposed in five areas: settlement and energy policies; energy-efficient spatial patterns in human settlements; energy for physical infrastructure and services in human settlements; energy and building; and pilot demonstration projects. The report also contained an annex on the application of renewable energy sources to human settlements, with particular emphasis on meeting the energy needs of the poor in urban and rural settlements.

The Commission, by a decision of 6 May,<sup>(7)</sup> endorsed the Executive Director's recommendations and requested him to forward his report to both the Council and the Preparatory Committee for the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy (p. 694). It further decided that follow-up activities involving research and development, technical co-operation and information dissemination should be initiated in the field of energy as it related to human settlements, particularly the possibility of saving energy through appropriate planning, construction, rehabilitation, and building management and operation.

Noting with satisfaction the revised report<sup>(3)</sup> and welcoming the contributions of UNCHS to the Conference, the Council, by a resolution of 24 July, requested the Executive Director to make relevant reports and documents available to the Conference and to initiate follow-up activities involving research and development, technical co-operation and the dissemination of information.<sup>(5)</sup>

The Council adopted the resolution, without vote, on the recommendation of its. First (Economic) Committee which approved, on 21 July in the same manner, the text submitted by Venezuela for the Group of 77, as orally revised.

The General Assembly, by a resolution of 4 December, also welcomed the Centre's contributions to the Conference and requested the Executive Director to take appropriate steps for the implementation of the Conference's recommendations which were within the mandate of the Centre.<sup>(6)</sup>

The resolution was adopted without vote, after the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee approved it likewise on 13 November. The text was submitted by a Vice-Chairman of the Committee, following informal consultations on a 16-nation draft, introduced by the Philippines, which was subsequently withdrawn.<sup>(1)</sup>

Reporting to the Committee on 1 October, the Executive Director said the Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy had identified several issues which would have important implications for human settlements in the coming years, particularly in the field of solar energy, and he stressed the need to diversify the energy supply base. UNCHS planned to carry out research to help developing countries apply energy-efficient human settlements policies and would study measures and technology to conserve energy in rural areas at the village or household level. With urban population in developing countries expected to double in 20 years, economy in urban energy consumption would be an important factor in improving living standards.

Kenya, during the Committee discussions, commended UNCHS for its contribution to the preparatory stage of the Conference. Having supported the inclusion of energy supply to human settlements in the Centre's programme, the USSR noted with satisfaction that the programme for 1982-1983 included a project on criteria for using alternative sources of energy, more efficient use of energy and experimental construction projects using renewable sources 'of energy. Belgium said it was gratified that a programme element related to energy had been included in both the Centre's work programme (p. 845) and medium-term plan (p. 846).

Renewable sources of energy for human settlements

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling Its resolution 1980/47 of 23 July 1980, by which it called upon the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) to elaborate concrete and specific proposals aimed at making an effective and meaningful contribution to the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, to be held at Nairobi in August 1981, and to report thereon, through the Commission on Human Settlements, to the Economic and Social Council at Its second regular session of 1981.

Noting Commission on Human Settlements decision 4/23 of 6 May 1981, in which the Commission requested the Executive Director of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) to forward his report and any other documents or reports which he might prepare for the Conference to the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session of 1981.

Noting with satisfaction the report on renewable sources of energy for human settlements, submitted by the Centre,

1. Welcomes the contributions made by the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) to the preparations for the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy;

2. Requests the Executive Director of the Centre to make available the relevant reports and documents prepared by the Centre, including the report of the Commission on Human Settlements on the work of its fourth session and the report on renewable sources of energy for human settlements, to the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy;

3. Also requests the Executive Director, within the framework of the work programme of the Centre, to initiate follow-up activities involving research and development, technical co-operation and the dissemination of information in the field of energy as it relates to human settlements, based on the recommendations for action contained in the report on new and renewable sources of energy for human settlements.

Renewable sources of energy for human settlements

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 33/148 of 20 December 1978, 34/190 of 18 December 1979 and 35/204 of 16 December

1980 on the convening of the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy,

Taking note of Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/69 C of 24 July 1981 on renewable sources of energy for human settlements, Taking note, in this connection, of the Report of the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, held at Nairobi from 10 to 21 August 1981.

1. Welcomes the contributions made by the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) to the preparations for and success of the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy;

2. Requests the Executive Director of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements to take the appropriate steps for the implementation of those recommendations of the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy which are within the mandate of the Centre.

International Year of Shelter for the Homeless

In December 1981 the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the UNCHS Executive Director, the Commission on Human Settlements and the Economic and Social Council, decided in principle to designate 1987 the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless. The proposal for such a year had been made in 1980 by Sri Lanka.

The Executive Director, in compliance with a December 1980 Assembly resolution,<sup>(8)</sup> submitted in March 1981 a report<sup>(4)</sup> to the Commission on the implications of declaring an international year committed to shelter for the poor and the homeless and focusing world-wide attention on rehabilitation of slum dwellers. For the purpose of the report, "homeless" was taken to mean people without any shelter at all and people who lived in shelter "unfit for human habitation". The overall goal of the year would be to enable the homeless in urban and rural settlements to secure adequate shelter. Specific objectives would be to focus world attention on particular problems (including the plight of refugees and victims of natural disasters), to demonstrate approaches to their solution, to improve related policies, programmes and institutions, to disseminate information and to provide training. The proposed programme would be designed to contribute to the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade (p. 380) at the global level and to socio-economic development plans at the national level.

The Executive Director suggested that the Commission might act as the intergovernmental body responsible for guiding the work of the Secretariat and recommend to the Assembly that UNCHS be designated as lead agency reporting to the Secretary-General. He proposed that either 1984 or 1986 might be the most suitable for holding the international year, and made suggestions for possible activities at the national, regional and global levels. With regard to financing, he stated that additional resources and a separate budget exclusively for the year would be required.

Introducing the report to the Commission,<sup>(3)</sup> the Executive Director said that currently the total number of homeless was perhaps well over 1 billion, out of a total world population of just over 4 billion, and the situation was deteriorating. He expressed the hope that an international year would set in motion a process whereby application of the resources and ingenuity of the homeless themselves, combined with national efforts and support from the United Nations system, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, would produce significant results in providing and improving shelter during the 1980s and 1990s.

The Commission, by a resolution adopted on 6 May,<sup>(5)</sup> endorsed the report and requested the Executive Director to transmit a revised version, taking into account the Commission's comments, to the Economic and Social Council. It recommended to the Assembly, through the Council, the adoption of a draft resolution, by which the Assembly would proclaim 1986 as the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless, designate the Commission as the body responsible for organizing the Year and give the Executive Director the responsibility of guiding the work of the Secretariat and of reporting to the Secretary-General. It would stress the importance of mobilizing the resources and skills of the homeless for activities at the local and national levels. Besides asking the Secretary-General to prepare a draft report outlining the Year's programme, objectives and financial implications, the Assembly would request the Commission to submit a specific programme of activities, and it would decide to include in its 1982 provisional agenda an item on the Year.

The Secretary-General, in a note dated 8 June 1981 to the Council,<sup>(2)</sup> described the work done so far on the proposal for an international year. The Council, by a resolution of 24 July,<sup>(2)</sup> recommended that the Assembly designate 1987 as the International Year, provided that the necessary financing could be arranged, which should in principle be based on voluntary contributions. It also recommended that the Assembly request the Secretary-General to report in 1982 on the financial and organizational implications of holding the Year.

The Council adopted the resolution without vote, following similar approval by the First Committee on 21 July. The draft, submitted by Venezuela for the Group of 77, was orally revised as a result of informal consultations. The original text endorsed in principle the proclamation of 1986 as the International Year to coincide with the tenth anniversary of the Habitat Conference, and recommended to the Assembly the adoption of the draft resolution proposed by the Commission. The revised text also included a new preambular paragraph recalling a 1980 Council resolution setting out guidelines for international years.<sup>(6)</sup>

On 4 December 1981, on the recommendation of its Second Committee, the Assembly adopted, without vote, a resolution<sup>(9)</sup> by which it decided in principle to designate 1987 as the International Year, on the understanding that the criteria for financing and organizing international years set out by the Council in 1980 were complied with. It requested the UNCHS Executive Director to prepare a proposal on specific activities to be undertaken before and during 1987, and requested the Secretary-General to prepare, on the basis of that proposal, a report on organizational matters, including the availability of voluntary funds. Finally, it appealed to States, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and the public at large to indicate appropriate support for the Year.

The Assembly acted on a draft approved by the Committee without vote on 16 November. It was submitted by a Vice-Chairman, on the basis of informal consultations held on a draft resolution introduced by Algeria on behalf of the Group of 77, which was withdrawn by the sponsors.<sup>(1)</sup>

The draft approved by the Committee differed from Algeria's version in several aspects. A preambular paragraph was deleted that would have declared the Assembly's awareness that adequate preparation and support by Governments, specialized agencies, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and the public at large would be required for the Year to be successful. Under the operative paragraphs, it omitted a phrase by which the Assembly would have decided that financing should be based in principle on voluntary funds but stated instead that financing should comply with the Council's guidelines. Instead of asking the Commission to prepare a proposal on specific activities, it requested the Executive Director to do so. The final version appealed for indications of appropriate support for the Year rather than for support and generous contributions, and omitted a paragraph that would have designated the Commission as the body responsible for organizing the Year.

During the Committee debate, Canada, Jamaica, Kenya, Malaysia, Nepal, Sri Lanka and Thailand expressed support for holding an international year. The Byelorussian SSR said the Centre's participation should be carried out with its existing resources, and programme measures should be financed from voluntary sources.

Canada held it necessary to arrange financing before holding an international year. Finland, speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries, said they preferred the Council recommendation to designate 1987 the International Year, but Kenya considered the UNCHS recommendation for 1986 more appropriate since it would be the tenth anniversary of the Habitat Conference. Sri Lanka stated that the Assembly should take certain consequential steps, such as designating the Commission as the body responsible for organizing the Year.

Proposal to declare an international year of shelter for the homeless

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 35/76 of 5 December 1980, in which the Assembly expressed the view that an international year devoted to the problems of homeless people in urban and rural areas in the developing countries could be an appropriate occasion to focus the attention of the international community on those problems, and requested the Executive Director of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) to submit a report to the Council, through the Commission on Human Settlements at its fourth session, on the implications of declaring such an international year,

Considering that human settlements activities constitute an important policy measure for the attainment of the goals and objectives of the international Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, adopted by the General Assembly in its resolution 35/56 of 5 December 1980, Considering also that the improvement of human settlements is one of the essential elements for enhancing the quality of life.

Taking note of the report of the Executive Director of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) and of the note of the Secretary-General on the proposal to declare an international year devoted to the problems of the homeless,

Noting the recommendation set forth by the Commission on Human Settlements in its resolution 4/2 of 6 May 1981 that the General Assembly should proclaim 1986 as the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless,

Recalling in this context Economic and Social Council resolution 1980/67 of 25 July 1980, in the annex to which are set forth the guidelines for future international years,

1. Recommends to the General Assembly the year 1987 as an appropriate year for the holding of the International

Year of Shelter for the Homeless, provided that the arrangements necessary for its financing have been made, which should in principle be based on voluntary contributions;

2. Also recommends that the General Assembly should, at its thirty-sixth session, request the Secretary-General to prepare a report on the financial and organizational implications of holding the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless in 1987, to be submitted, through the Commission on Human Settlements at its fifth session, to the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session of 1982.

General Assembly resolution 36/71

Adopted without vote Meeting 84 4 December 1981

Approved by Second Committee (A/36/694/Add.10) without vote. 16 November (meeting 40): draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/36/L.69), based on Informal consultations on draft by Algeria, for Group of 77 (A/C.2/36/L.13), orally revised; agenda item 69 (k).

International Year of Shelter for the Homeless

The General Assembly,

6 Recalling its resolution 35/76 of 5 December 1980, in which it expressed the view that an international year devoted to the problems of homeless people in urban and rural areas of the developing countries would be an appropriate occasion to focus the attention of the international community on those problems,

Recognizing the grave and generally worsening situation of the homeless in the developing countries,

Emphasizing that the building, improvement and maintenance of shelter, related physical infrastructure and social facilities can contribute significantly to national development,

Convinced of the imperative need to mobilize effectively the considerable skill and resources that the homeless themselves possess for building, improving and maintaining their own shelter and neighbourhoods.

Convinced also that, because of their complexity and magnitude, the problems of the homeless require co-ordinated and concerted action at all levels,

Confident that an international year of shelter for the homeless could serve as a means of increasing public awareness at the local, national, regional and global levels and set in motion a process which would lead to significant improvement in the situation of the homeless,

Considering that human settlements activities are among the important policy measures for the attainment of the goals and objectives of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Noting with satisfaction the follow-up action so far taken by Member States with regard to the Implementation of the recommendations of Habitat: United Nations Conference on Human Settlements, and the support being provided by the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) to developing countries to facilitate that action.

Recalling in that connection its decision 35/424 of 5 December 1980 and Economic and Social Council resolution 1960/67 of 25 July 1980 on guidelines for international years and anniversaries,

Taking note of Economic and Social Council resolution 1961/69 B of 24 July 1981 on the proposal to declare an international year of shelter for the homeless,

1. Decides, in principle, to designate 1987 as the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless, on the understanding that the criteria for financing and organizing international years set out in the annex to Economic and Social Council resolution 1960/67 are complied with;

2. Requests the Executive Director of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) to prepare a proposal containing a specific programme of measures and activities to be undertaken prior to and during the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless and to report to the Economic and Social Council through the Commission on Human Settlements;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare, on the basis of that proposal, a report on the organizational matters regarding the holding of the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless in 1987, including the availability of voluntary funds, to be submitted to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session through the Economic and Social Council during 1982;

4. Appeals to all States, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and the public at large to indicate appropriate support for the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless.

Housing for disabled persons

The Commission on Human Settlements, by a resolution of 6 May 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> urged Governments to give special consideration to the needs of the disabled in their human settlements programmes and policies, and further urged Governments and the United Nations system to support and assist national and international endeavours to diminish or eliminate barriers in human settlements that prevented the full participation of the disabled in social development. The UNCHS Executive Director was requested to give due consideration in the Centre's work programme to the needs of disabled persons.

The Advisory Committee for the International Year of Disabled Persons (p. 795), in the report on its 1981 session,<sup>(1)</sup> also dealt with the problem of housing for the disabled. It encouraged Member States to adopt a policy ensuring access to all new public buildings, facilities, housing and transport systems, and to adopt measures to encourage access to existing facilities.

Resolution: <sup>(2)</sup>Commission on Human Settlements (report, A/36/8), 4/8, 6 May.

Financing of human settlements

Acting on a 1980 decision of the Commission,<sup>(4)</sup> the UNCHS Executive Director convened from 19 to 23 January 1981 at Nairobi, Kenya, an Ad Hoc Group of Experts on Ways and Means of Establishing or Strengthening Financial Institutions for Human Settlements Financing and Investment, focusing on the need for settlements infrastructure and services.

The 33 recommendations of the Group, presented to the Commission in January in a report of the Executive Director,<sup>(1)</sup> covered such questions as the need to re-examine and reform relations between different government levels, the problem of effective revenue administration at the local government level and the increased use by local authorities of benefit or user charges.

The Group recommended that consideration be given to the establishment of new specialized financial intermediaries or, preferably, to the extension of the activities and operations of existing development financing institutions. In order to encourage those institutions to extend their operations, it recommended that UNCHS COoperate with the World Federation of Development Financing Institutions, as well as with the regional associations of such institutions. Stating that there was a lack of information and knowledge about existing financial intermediaries specializing in the provision of human settlements infrastructure and services, the Group recommended that UNCHS assist in the review of experiences and in the acquisition and dissemination of knowledge.

Endorsing the recommendations, the Commission, on 6 May,<sup>(3)</sup> requested the Executive Director: to develop proposals, in conjunction with the World Bank, the regional development banks and the World Federation of Development Financing Institutions, to acquire and disseminate information about existing financial institutions in developing countries specializing in providing human settlements infrastructure and services; to co-operate with such institutions in order to encourage developing countries in financing human settlements projects, particularly for lower-income groups; to formulate proposals aimed at encouraging mobilization of additional financial resources in developing countries for urban services and more efficient management of services in urban areas; and to promote studies on solutions to problems in the area of financing posed by inflation.

By a resolution of the same date,<sup>(2)</sup> the Commission requested the Executive Director to conduct a feasibility study, in conjunction with the Asian Development Bank, on the creation of an Asian bank dealing with human settlements, as recommended by the 1979 Regional Conference on Human Settlements Finance and Management for Asia and the Pacific, held at Manila, Philippines. It called on regional and international funding agencies to assist in the study.

Construction industry

The UNCHS Executive Director, in a report to the Commission on Human Settlements on the role and contribution of the construction industry in human settlements programmes and national economic and social development,<sup>(1)</sup> examined the role played by the construction sector in the attainment of economic growth and a more equitable distribution of the benefits of such growth. The report analysed some major problems confronting the industry in developing countries and identified factors impeding the ability of Governments to manage the industry in such a way as to ensure that it contributed to national development goals. Suggestions were made as to the kind of action Governments might take and the kind of support UNCHS might be able to give to Member States.

Effective action to ensure the development of a soundly based construction industry, the report concluded, could be taken by Governments through legislation and planning controls, as well as through their involvement as client, designer, supervisor and/or producer in the construction process itself.

With regard to international action, the report suggested that UNCHS engage in a series of demonstration and pilot projects designed to adopt, test and demonstrate improved design concepts, technologies and products; that it support the promotion, development and use of local building materials; that it expand and improve training opportunities in the construction sector; and that it assist Governments in the analysis of problems and in the identification of construction elements in national plans.

After reviewing the report, the Commission, by a resolution of 6 May 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> requested the Executive Director to pay special attention to specific issues affecting the indigenous construction sector in developing countries and to provide assistance in the form of training and pilot projects. It recommended that he convene a meeting of an ad hoc group of experts to examine ways of developing that sector.

The Commission urged Governments to give high priority to construction investment and recommended that they formulate policies to develop indigenous resources in terms of technology, labour and building materials. It recommended that priority be given at the national level to the co-ordination of information, research and training, mobilization of resources, the involvement of local professionals and the creation of agencies for the evaluation of research projects in building materials.

In accordance with the resolution, an Ad Hoc Expert Group Meeting on the Development of the Indigenous Construction Sector met at Nairobi from 23 to 30 November.<sup>(2)</sup>

The Group suggested that Governments reformulate policies for the integrated promotion and development of the indigenous construction sector, with emphasis on the informal (non-governmental) sector. It called for developing a sense of partnership between the private and public sectors in the use of domestic construction resources, through such measures as mobilizing finance, upgrading worker and management skills, and increasing production of building materials. Technical support could be expanded to include training for trades and management, financial aid for research and development.

formulation of procedures for evaluating cost effectiveness and efficiency, and standardization of building methods. The Group suggested ways of minimizing environmental degradation and conserving energy, as well as guidelines for administrative and institutional structures to improve construction efficiency. It made recommendations on generating employment opportunities by emphasizing labour-intensive construction methods.

Regarding the role of international organizations, the Group recommended that they assist finance, technology and manpower development. In particular, it suggested low interest financing, assisting Governments in formulating projects and policies, expanding information services, promoting training and mobilizing non-governmental organizations to work with local communities. The Group suggested projects for designing low-technology shelter and infrastructure for water supply and sanitation in slums and squatter areas, providing small production units for walling and roofing materials using indigenous resources, establishing small and accessible distribution centres for building materials, and introducing simply equipped prototype workshops.

During the debate on human settlements in the General Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, Canada expressed agreement with the Commission on the importance of the construction industry's contribution to providing infrastructure in slums, squatter areas and rural settlements. The importance of the Commission action on construction in human settlements programmes was underlined by Finland, speaking for the Nordic countries, and by Jamaica and Kenya. The USSR emphasized the importance of helping developing countries expand their construction industries on the basis of their own material and financial resources, under comprehensive State housing programmes.

Improvement of slums and rural settlements

The UNCHS Executive Director submitted to the 1981 session of the Commission a medium-term work programme on the provision of infrastructure in slums and squatter areas and in rural settlements, with emphasis on water supply, sanitation, surface drainage and solid-waste disposal. The report<sup>(2)</sup> provided an overview of the extent of the infrastructure problem, stating that about 1.3 billion people, mainly in urban slums and squatter areas and rural settlements, were still without adequate water-supply services, and almost 1.7 billion lacked adequate sanitation. The report also described current national and international policies, particularly with regard to water supply and sanitation, and outlined unresolved issues.

Recommendations were made for national action and for activities of UNCHS. On the national level, the report recommended that user charges be applied for public utilities in urban areas, with the resulting revenue made available for infrastructure development in low-income settlements, and that national policies on the upgrading of low-income communities be established and programmes for upgrading low-income settlements be expanded. With regard to the Centre's work programmes for 1982-1983 and for 1984-1989 (annexed to the report), it was recommended that the Centre assist national authorities in: provision and analysis of data; project evaluation; transfer of information; production of visual aids and training materials; organization of seminars and workshops; and involvement in demonstration projects.

Commending the Executive Director on his efforts to formulate a work programme, the Commission decided on 6 May 1981<sup>(1)</sup> to request him: to continue the Centre's work on research and development in this field; to co-operate with other United Nations agencies in contributing to the International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade (1981-1990) (p. 684); to consider other aspects of infrastructure such as roads, transportation and energy supplies in the context of community development, with the participation of the informal sector; to promote the evaluation and development of appropriate materials, equipment, techniques and training manuals; and to communicate information to developing countries.

An Ad Hoc Expert Group Meeting on Appropriate Infrastructure Services, Standards and Technologies for Upgrading Slums and Squatter Areas and Rural Settlements (Nairobi, 2-9 November) emphasized the importance of training and information exchange and recommended that this should be reflected in the work programmes of both UNCHS and the United Nations Environment Programme. The report of the Meeting<sup>(3)</sup> identified and assessed available technologies, source levels and standards that had been found effective in promoting the provision of adequate infrastructure.

Speaking during the debate on human settlements in the Assembly's Second Committee, Kenya said the Commission's decision deserved special attention, and Nepal expressed support of the Centre's activities in improving infrastructure in such areas as water supply, sanitation, surface drainage and solid-waste disposal.

Special assistance

The Commission adopted on 6 May 1981 three resolutions requesting special assistance for Dominica, the Palestinian people and African national liberation movements.

Noting that three hurricanes had caused extensive damage to Dominica in 1979 and 1980, the Commission requested the UNCHS Executive Director to explore the possibility of extending assistance to replace damaged human settlements there, to consult with other United Nations organizations on such assistance (p. 525) and to report on his efforts in 1982.<sup>(3)</sup>

The Commission requested the Executive Director to continue his efforts to implement General Assembly resolutions on assistance to the Palestinian people (p. 273), in particular the request that United Nations organizations consult with the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) on implementing concrete projects to ensure improvement of the economic and social conditions of the Palestinians, and urged the Assembly to deplore the occupying authorities in Palestine for setting up obstacles that hindered assistance to the Palestinians.

The Executive Director reported on 6 January 1981 to the Commission on assistance to the Palestinians in the field of human settlements.<sup>(1)</sup> Pending a response from PLO as to how UNCHS could best provide such assistance, a number of possible activities had been explored in co-operation with the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). The occupying authorities had specifically required that UNDP execute projects itself rather than utilize any executing agencies; they had approved a project related to training in housing to be implemented by UNDP but, by the end of 1981, had not approved a second proposed project. Two more projects had not been submitted to the UNDP Governing Council because of the overall financial limitations of the UNDP programme of assistance to the Palestinian people.

By the third resolution,<sup>(4)</sup> the Commission called for assistance to victims of apartheid (p. 208) and colonialism (p. 1098). Commending the Executive Director for assistance provided to national liberation movements of South Africa and Namibia, the Commission requested him to intensify human settlements training assistance to those movements recognized by the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in order to make apartheid victims self-reliant and to help them improve their living conditions, to provide more assistance to those countries where human settlements had been disrupted by the Pretoria regime and to report in 1982. The Commission commended the OAU members and all other members of the international community for their support for the struggle against apartheid and colonialism, and strongly condemned the Pretoria régime for its repression in South Africa (p. 195) and its illegal occupation of Namibia (p. 1128), as well as its acts of aggression against the front-line States (p. 214).

During the debate on human settlements in the Assembly's Second Committee, Hungary stated that the Commission had greatly contributed towards resolving the problems of the Palestinians.

Co-ordination in the UN system

Regional activities

The Commission on Human Settlements adopted several resolutions on 6 May 1981 on regional activities in the field of human settlements.

Following up a 1980 resolution,<sup>(5)</sup> the Commission urged UNCHS and the regional commissions to continue to strengthen their co-operation through the establishment of joint units. It urged the commissions to improve regional and subregional collaboration by promoting technical co-operation among developing countries and to make sufficient resources available for that purpose. It requested UNCHS to improve co-ordination with other United Nations agencies and to ensure more effective action at the regional level, and asked the Executive Director to report in 1982 on the implementation of the resolution.<sup>(2)</sup>

The Commission requested that the Executive Director ensure prompt utilization of the resources allocated to the Economic Commission for Africa (ECA) and the other regional commissions,<sup>(3)</sup> and urged UNCHS and ECA to continue to strengthen their relationship through periodic discussions on programme co-ordination and exchanges of information on all regional and sub-regional human settlements activities in Africa<sup>(1)</sup>

The Commission requested the UNCHS Executive Director and the ECA Executive Secretary to harmonize their work programmes and priorities with regard to manpower, training, public participation at the grass-roots level, financing, energy requirements and conservation in human settlements, services and assistance in research relating to human settlements (p. 630).<sup>(4)</sup>

During the debate in the Assembly's Second Committee, Hungary called for strengthened relations between the regional commissions and UNCHS; as an example, it said, the Economic Commission for Europe had launched several joint projects from which countries in other regions might also benefit.

Resolution: Commission on Human Settlements (report, A/36/8), 6 May: <sup>(1)</sup>4/4; <sup>(2)</sup>4/5; <sup>(3)</sup>4/6, para. 2; 416, para. 6.

Co-operation with UNEP

By a resolution of 6 May 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the Commission requested the UNCHS Executive Director, in consultation with the Executive Director of the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP), to study ways of strengthening their co-operation to make it more effective (p. 842). It requested them to review the demands placed on their staff and budgetary resources in the preparation and servicing of joint bureau meetings and to report to the Commission on the results in 1982.

Chapter XVIII

Human rights

United Nations bodies continued during 1981 to investigate situations involving violations of human rights in several parts of the world, to develop international standards, and to pursue other means of promoting and protection fundamental rights and freedoms.

A highlight of the year was the proclamation by the General Assembly in November of a Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief.<sup>(39)</sup> The Declaration, based on a text prepared by the Commission on Human Rights and recommended by the Economic and Social Council,<sup>(20)</sup> enumerated nine freedoms included in the right to freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief.

The Commission adopted 41 resolutions and 12 decisions at its thirty-seventh session, held at Geneva from 2 February to 13 March.<sup>(1)</sup> Its Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities met for its thirty-fourth session from 17 August to 11 September, also at Geneva, where it adopted 22 resolutions and 5 decisions.<sup>(6)</sup> The work of the Commission was reviewed in May by the Economic and Social Council, which adopted 11 resolutions on the subject. The General Assembly adopted 32 resolutions on various human rights questions in October, November and December.

The Assembly and the Commission reviewed activities during the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination (1973-1983). The Commission urged States to create social and other conditions which would exclude the emergence of all forms of racial discrimination. The Assembly, acting in October 1981<sup>(31)</sup> on a proposal of the Economic and Social Council,<sup>(18)</sup> recommended a number of steps to eliminate apartheid and other forms of racial discrimination, including action by States to outlaw organizations based on racial hatred and prejudice. The Council authorized the appointment of a Preparatory Sub-Committee for the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, scheduled for 1983 (p. 868).

In 1981, three States became parties to the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination,<sup>(27)</sup> which, as at 31 December, had been ratified or acceded to by 111 countries. The Assembly, in October,<sup>(34)</sup> requested additional States to adhere.

At two sessions in 1981, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) examined reports by 37 States parties on measures they had taken to give effect to the Convention.<sup>(2)</sup> In October, the Assembly again invited States parties to furnish CERD with information and requested it to explore the possibility of preparing a study of measures to ensure economic, social and cultural rights to certain racial groups.<sup>(35)</sup>

Both the Commission on Human Rights, in February, and the General Assembly, in December,<sup>(57)</sup> condemned and urged action against all totalitarian or other ideologies and practices, in particular Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist ones, based on racial or ethnic exclusiveness or intolerance, hatred, terror and systematic denial of human rights. Suggestions for action by the mass media in the fight against racial discrimination were examined by the Secretary-General in a report<sup>(5)</sup> to the Assembly (p. 878).

The Commission continued work on a draft declaration on the rights of persons belonging to national, ethnic, religious and linguistic minorities (p. 883). The Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities considered the first part of a study on indigenous populations, to be completed in 1982, and requested authorization to establish an annual working group on this topic (p. 883). A Latin American seminar on protection of victims of racial discrimination, with particular reference to indigenous populations,<sup>(7)</sup> was held at Managua, Nicaragua, in December (p. 878).

A Working Group of the General Assembly met twice in 1981, in May and in October/November, to continue drafting a convention to protect the rights of migrant workers and their families. The Economic and Social Council decided to monitor in 1982 the status of work on this topic.<sup>(19)</sup> After considering the Working Group's report,<sup>(12)</sup> the Assembly decided in December that the Group should meet again in 1982 to complete its task.<sup>(56)</sup> The Assembly also reaffirmed the Council's request<sup>(16)</sup> that funds be provided for studies on questions concerning migrant workers.

Another Assembly working group continued work on a draft declaration on the human rights of non-citizens. In December, the Assembly decided to establish a further working group for this purpose in 1982.<sup>(60)</sup> Discrimination in the administration of criminal justice remained under study in the Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities (p. 889).

In 1981, four States became parties to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights<sup>(29)</sup> and two States adhered to its Optional Protocol; as at 31 December, 69 States had ratified or acceded to the Covenant and 27 States had become parties to the Protocol (p. 839). The Human Rights Committee, established to oversee implementation of the Covenant, held three sessions during 1981 to consider reports from 11 States parties on measures they had taken to give effect to civil and political rights.<sup>(4)</sup> For the first time, the Committee adopted general comments on implementation of the Covenant (p. 889).

In the context of its continuing consideration of the right of peoples to self-determination, the Commission on Human Rights again reaffirmed the legitimacy of the struggle for independence, territorial integrity and liberation from colonial or alien domination and foreign occupation, and demanded the release of all people imprisoned as a result of their struggle for self-determination. The Assembly made a similar reaffirmation in October,<sup>(32)</sup> and also called for the immediate cessation of foreign military intervention, aggression and occupation.<sup>(33)</sup> of Afghanistan continued to be denied their right to self-determination (p. 896) and, in a resolution endorsed by the Economic and Social Council, affirmed that the persistence of foreign occupation in Kampuchea was a violation of human rights and prevented the people from exercising their right to self-determination (p. 897). The Commission deplored the continued occupation of Western Sahara by Morocco, stating that it prevented the exercise of self-determination in that Territory (p. 898).

Several measures to protect the rights of prisoners and detained persons were under consideration in 1981. Arbitrary or summary executions were condemned by the Assembly in November.<sup>(37)</sup> The idea of a second optional protocol to the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, aiming at the ultimate abolition of capital punishment, was again discussed in the Assembly, which, in November, invited further comments from States.<sup>(44)</sup>

Work on a draft Body of Principles to protect persons under any form of detention or imprisonment continued in a working group of the Assembly's Sixth (Legal) Committee. In December, the Assembly decided to have a similar group conclude consideration of the draft in 1982 (p. 900).

Additional articles of a draft convention against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment were provisionally adopted in January and March by a working group of the Commission on Human Rights. The Economic and Social Council authorized meetings of a similar group in 1982,<sup>(21)</sup> and the General Assembly, in November, requested the Commission to complete the draft in 1982 as a matter of high priority.<sup>(45)</sup> In December 1981,<sup>(51)</sup> the Assembly redesignated the United Nations Trust Fund for Chile as the United Nations Voluntary Fund for Victims of Torture, as recommended by the Council.<sup>(23)</sup>

Draft Principles of Medical Ethics relevant to the role of health personnel in the protection of imprisoned and detained persons against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment were considered by the Assembly, which decided in November to consider the draft again in 1982 with a view to adopting it.<sup>(46)</sup> The Economic and Social Council had recommended in May that the Assembly take measures to finalize the text in 1981.<sup>(17)</sup>

The protection of those detained on grounds of mental ill-health was again taken up by the Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities and by the Assembly. The Sub-Commission requested the submission of a draft body of guidelines in 1982, while the Assembly, in November, requested the Commission on Human Rights to continue consideration of the question with a view to submitting a report in 1983.<sup>(41)</sup>

Both the Economic and Social Council, in May,<sup>(26)</sup> and the Assembly, in December,<sup>(62)</sup> appealed for the release of the Palestinian Ziad Abu Eain, who was extradited in December to Israel after having been held in a United States prison for more than two years.

Enforced or involuntary disappearances of persons were again considered by the Commission on Human Rights, its Working Group on this subject, the Sub-Commission, the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly. Having received information on upwards of 11,000 cases, the Working Group transmitted it to the Governments concerned with a request for further information. The Commission, with the Council's authorization, extended the Group's mandate for another year. The Sub-Commission proposed further action by the Commission, including steps to publicize the problem. The extension of the Working Group's mandate was welcomed in December by the Assembly,<sup>(58)</sup> which also urged continuation of the tracing of missing persons in Cyprus.<sup>(59)</sup>

At the Commission's request, the Sub-Commission designated two of its members to study the question of conscientious objection to military service (p. 913). Work continued on a Sub-Commission study on the independence of the judicial system (p. 913).

On the recommendation of its Working Group on Slavery, which held its seventh session in August at Geneva,<sup>(14)</sup> the Sub-Commission proposed measures to obtain more information about slavery-like practices and to increase public awareness of the problem (p. 913). The Economic and Social Council requested an inquiry on traffic in persons and exploitation of the prostitution of others.<sup>(24)</sup>

During the year, five States became parties to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights,<sup>(28)</sup> which had a total of 71 parties as at 31 December 1981 (p. 915). The Economic and Social Council's Sessional Working Group on implementation of the Covenant, at its third session in April,<sup>(13)</sup> considered reports from 22 States parties on what they had done to implement specific provisions. On the Group's recommendation, the Council decided on several aspects of future arrangements for the Group, including the organization of its work, its 1982 agenda and its membership (p. 917).

The Commission on Human Rights established a Working Group of Governmental Experts on the Right to Development, to submit proposals in 1982 for implementation of this right and for a draft international instrument

(p. 921). Following two sessions of the Group, in July and November/December, the Assembly, in December, declared that the right to development was an inalienable human right and requested the Commission to take measures to promote it. Also in December, the Assembly again invited States to consider adopting measures to ensure full implementation of the right to universal education.<sup>(52)</sup>

Another working group of the Commission continued an analysis of further action the United Nations system might take to promote and encourage human rights, including alternative approaches for improving their effective enjoyment. The Assembly, in December, requested the Commission to continue its analysis.<sup>(47)</sup>

Establishment of a post of United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, originally proposed in 1965, was discussed by several United Nations bodies. The Commission informed the Assembly that it had not reached a decision, while the Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities expressed its conviction that the establishment of such a post would be highly valuable. The Assembly, in December, requested the Commission to consider the question with the attention it deserved and to report in 1982, so that the Assembly could decide what steps might be taken.<sup>(49)</sup>

With regard to the activities and status of the Sub-Commission, the Commission decided to allocate high priority to the annual consideration of the Sub-Commission's report (p. 932).

The Assembly, in November, again invited States to become parties to the International Covenants on Human Rights.<sup>(43)</sup> For the thirty-fifth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, in 1983, the Assembly, in December, suggested several national and international activities.<sup>(61)</sup>

Under the United Nations programme of advisory services in the field of human rights, an international seminar on human rights, peace and development was held and a training course for Asian and Pacific countries focused on human rights guarantees in the administration of criminal justice (p. 937). The Economic and Social Council approved the provision of advisory services and other assistance to help guarantee the enjoyment of human rights in the Central African Republic (p. 937), Equatorial Guinea<sup>(22)</sup> and Uganda (p. 939).

On the recommendation of the Commission on Human Rights, the Council decided to terminate the periodic reporting system on human rights established in 1965 (p. 940). The Commission requested the Secretary-General to continue to implement public information programmes in human rights (p. 940). In December, the Assembly invited States to take steps to establish or strengthen national human rights institutions and to consider including human rights materials in their educational curriculum.<sup>(48)</sup> In connection with regional arrangements for human rights, the Assembly commended the Organization of African Unity on the adoption of an African Charter of Human and People's Rights, and authorized a United Nations seminar for the promotion and protection of human rights in the Asian region in 1982 at Colombo, Sri Lanka.<sup>(53)</sup>

Reports of violations of human rights in a number of countries and territories were considered by United Nations bodies during 1981.

South Africa's apartheid policies were the subject of several resolutions and reports. The Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts on Southern Africa reported<sup>(15)</sup> on policies and practices violating human rights in South Africa and Namibia (p. 943). The mandate of the Working Group was renewed by the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of the Commission on Human Rights. The Commission requested Security Council consideration of mandatory economic sanctions against South Africa and suggested that the General Assembly refer to the International Court of Justice the question of whether a State pursuing apartheid might lawfully continue to hold a place in the international community. It also called for an end to all forms of assistance to South Africa (p. 945). The Economic and Social Council demanded recognition of the right of the black trade union movements to freedom of association and unimpeded collective bargaining.<sup>(25)</sup>

As at 31 December, the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid<sup>(30)</sup> had been ratified or acceded to by 65 States, seven of which became parties during the year (p. 946). The Group of Three, set up to oversee implementation of the Convention, met in January to examine reports from 14 States parties.<sup>(3)</sup> In October, the General Assembly called for measures to prosecute and punish persons responsible for the crime of apartheid.<sup>(36)</sup>

The Special Rapporteur on the human rights situation in Chile, whose mandate was extended for another year by the Economic and Social Council, reported to the Assembly in November that it was not possible to report any improvement in the human rights situation in that country.<sup>(8)</sup> The Assembly, in December,<sup>(55)</sup> urged the Chilean authorities to put an end to a number of practices violating human rights.

The Commission and the Assembly condemned a series of Israeli policies and practices in the territories occupied since 1967 as a result of hostilities in the Middle East (p. 955). The Commission reaffirmed that Israel's settlement policy violated the 1949 Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War and affirmed the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination. The Assembly, in December, adopted seven resolutions on the situation in the occupied territories (p. 390), most of them dealing with human rights issues.

By decision of the Commission on Human Rights, approved by the Economic and Social Council, a Special Representative was appointed to investigate the human rights situation in El Salvador. After receiving in October an interim report of the Special Representative,<sup>(11)</sup> the Assembly, in December, requested the Salvadorian parties to arrive at a negotiated political solution in order to establish a democratically elected government, and reiterated its appeal to all States to abstain from intervening in the internal situation there.<sup>(54)</sup>

The Commission and the Assembly requested the Secretary-General to continue efforts to establish direct contacts with the Government of Guatemala on the human rights situation in that country (p. 963). A Special Envoy of the Commission reported in December on human rights in Bolivia (p. 957). The Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities urged the Secretary-General to continue efforts to persuade the Government of Iran to prevent further attacks on the Baha'i religious community and to grant them religious freedom (p. 965).

A Special Rapporteur of the Commission reported in December<sup>(10)</sup> on ways in which the international community could better cope with the human rights aspects of mass exoduses (p. 965). The taking of hostages was affirmed by the Commission as a grave human rights violation (p. 966). The Commission also deplored harsh and punitive treatment of individuals and groups as a result of their efforts to enjoy human rights (p. 966).

Working groups of the Commission and the Sub-Commission continued to deal on a confidential basis with communications from individuals and groups alleging denial or violation of human rights (p. 966).

As at 31 December, 20 States had become parties to one or both of the 1977 Protocols Additional to the 1949 Geneva Conventions concerning respect for human rights in armed conflicts, including two States which adhered during the year to Protocol I, on the protection of victims of international armed conflicts (p. 968). In December, the General Assembly decided to seek government views on a new proposal by Jordan for the promotion of a new international humanitarian order, encompassing human rights, disaster relief and development issues.<sup>(50)</sup>

The drafting of a convention on the rights of the child continued in a working group of the Commission on Human Rights, spurred by an Assembly request in November that the Commission give the highest priority to completion of the draft.<sup>(42)</sup> Suggestions to curb the exploitation of child labour were examined by the Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities (p. 971). Following action by the Commission emphasizing the role of youth in the promotion and protection of human rights, the Assembly, in November, called for the adoption of measures for the implementation and enjoyment by youth of human rights, particularly the right to education and to work.<sup>(38)</sup>

The relations between human rights, peace and development were examined at a seminar in August 1981 (p. 973). Acting on recommendations in a study by the Sub-Commission's Special Rapporteur on the duties of the individual to the community and limitations of rights,<sup>(9)</sup> the Commission decided to consider in 1982 the setting of further standards in this field, and the Council endorsed the appointment of a Special Rapporteur for a study on the status of the individual and contemporary international law (p. 975). The importance of action to ensure the use of scientific and technological progress in the interests of peace and for the benefit of mankind was stressed by the Commission in March and by the Assembly in November.<sup>(40)</sup>

Elimination of racial discrimination

Decade for Action to Combat
Racism and Racial Discrimination

Implementation of the Programme for the Decade

The Commission on Human Rights, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD), the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly continued in 1981 to follow action taken in implementation of the Programme for the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, launched by the Assembly in 1973.<sup>(6)</sup> Work began in preparation for the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, scheduled for 1983 (p. 868).

As called for in the Programme, the Secretary-General submitted two reports on activities relating to the Decade. His annual report to the Economic and Social Council on this topic<sup>(3)</sup> summarized actions, suggestions and trends emerging from the work of United Nations bodies, specialized agencies and regional inter-governmental organizations through mid-March, and transmitted information on activities by non-governmental organizations (NGOs). A report to the Assembly in September contained information on legislative, administrative and other measures taken by two Governments- Bulgaria and Greece-and on the activities of one NGO.<sup>(2)</sup>

ACTION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS. By a resolution of 23 February 1981,<sup>(4)</sup> the Commission on Human Rights urged States to create social and other conditions which would exclude the emergence of all forms of racial discrimination, or to combat them where they existed. States were invited to establish adequate, efficient and easily accessible recourse procedures for victims of racial discrimination, and to ensure that complaints of racial discrimination were dealt with expeditiously and that victims received full and immediate compensation. The Commission recommended that States adopt measures to ensure the widest possible dissemination of information and teaching designed to suppress human rights violations and racial discrimination. International organizations and United Nations organs and bodies were requested to intensify activities aimed at teaching and publicizing material on racial discrimination and apartheid.

The resolution was adopted by 32 votes to none, with 8 abstentions.

In co-operation with the Special Committee against Apartheid and the Commission, the United Nations Division of Human Rights organized a Seminar on Effective Measures to Prevent Transnational Corporations and Other Established Interests from Collaborating with the Racist Régime of South Africa (Geneya, 29 June-3 July) (p. 188).

CERD ACTIVITIES. In April and August, CERD (p. 871) reviewed activities relating to the Decade, including its own participation in seminars and other events.<sup>(1)</sup> It was invited to participate as an observer in the work of the Preparatory Sub-Committee for the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination and, as a contribution to the Conference, it designated two of its members to prepare studies (p. 870).

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. On 6 May, the Economic and Social Council, by a recorded vote of 42 to 10, adopted a 19-nation resolution on the Programme for the Decade.<sup>(5)</sup> It contained a draft resolution for action by the General Assembly, proposing a number of measures against racial discrimination (p. 865).

Explaining the negative votes of the European Community (EC) members, the United Kingdom said the draft contained elements which were not acceptable in the context of the Decade, such as its provisions on the Middle East situation; also, the text made no reference to the role of negotiation and international pressure in solving the problems of southern Africa, and its endorsement of armed struggle was unacceptable.

Israel said that some of the accusations made and actions recommended in the resolution were part of an anti-Israel campaign motivated by racial prejudice and political animosity; it was nonsense to seek to portray Israel's policies or practices as racial discrimination. Recalling that it had refused to endorse the Decade, the United States did not participate in the vote.

Argentina, though voting in favour, said it would have abstained on paragraph 3, reaffirming support for the national liberation struggle, because it believed that resolutions promoting armed struggle were incompatible with United Nations purposes. Chile said it would have abstained on paragraph 8, on the ground that the competence to impose sanctions lay with the Security Council. Ireland could not accept the manner in which the resolution assimilated the situations in the Middle East and southern Africa. Mexico explained that it would have abstained on paragraph 2, condemning racism in southern Africa, all occupied Arab territories and elsewhere, and on paragraph 10, singling out countries in regard to collaboration with South Africa.

Reservations on the reference to armed struggle were voiced by the Bahamas, Ecuador and Fiji, which voted for the resolution as a whole. The Bahamas, Chile, Fiji and Spain also had reservations on the singling out of certain States.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. Based on the text recommended by the Council, the General Assembly adopted on 28 October a resolution<sup>(8)</sup> inviting Member States and organizations to expand activities in support of the Programme for the Decade. The Assembly strongly condemned apartheid and racial discrimination in southern Africa, occupied Arab territories and elsewhere, including denial of the right to self-determination; and reaffirmed its support for the national liberation struggle against racial discrimination, apartheid, colonialism and foreign domination and for self-determination by all available means, including armed struggle. It called on States to declare punishable by law any dissemination of ideas based on racial superiority or hatred, and to outlaw organizations based on racial hatred and prejudice, including neo-Nazi and Fascist organizations. The Assembly noted progress on preparatory work for the Conference against racial discrimination (p. 868) and decided on the dates and place of Preparatory Sub-Committee sessions (p. 869).

With reference to southern Africa, the Assembly reaffirmed the right of Namibia to self-determination and independence (p. 1145), vigorously condemned South African aggression against neighbouring States (p. 215), requested the Security Council urgently to consider the imposition of full mandatory sanctions against South Africa (p. 168), approved the Declaration adopted in April by the International Seminar on the Implementation and Reinforcement of the Arms Embargo against South Africa (p. 173), and vigorously condemned collaboration with South Africa by certain Western countries, Israel and other States and by transnational corporations and other organizations (p. 180). It also asked for continued efforts to protect the rights of migrant workers and their families (p. 884).

The resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 121 to 19, with 6 abstentions, following its approval by the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee on 15 October by 110 votes to 19, with 4 abstentions. Paragraph 12, calling for measures declaring punishable the dissemination of ideas based on racial superiority, was adopted by 116 votes to none, with 25 abstentions. The text incorporated an oral amendment by Algeria, sub-amended by Morocco, affecting a preambular paragraph on migrant workers.

In another resolution of 28 October, on the self-determination of peoples, the Assembly called for maximizing all forms of assistance by States and organizations to victims of racial discrimination and apartheid through recognized national liberation movements.<sup>(9)</sup>

Explaining the votes of the Nordic States against the resolution on the Decade, Sweden said that, despite their advocacy of the elimination of racial discrimination, racism and all ideologies based thereon, they were unable to accept provisions referring to armed struggle and the arbitrary accusations against certain countries. The United Kingdom, speaking for the EC members, reaffirmed the reservations expressed in the Economic and Social Council (p. 864).

The United States announced that it would not participate in the vote on the ground that, although it fully supported the original objectives of the Decade, it could not agree that the concept of racism should be extended to include Zionism, as the Assembly had done in 1975.<sup>(7)</sup>

Among those abstaining in the vote, Japan said the text contained provisions on which it had serious reservations. Spain objected to what it called the unnecessary violence of some of the expressions used and the unjustifiable accusations against a group of countries with a well-established tradition of action against racism. Portugal abstained on the ground that the text introduced elements not relevant to the objectives originally defined for the Decade.

Though voting in favour, several States, including Chile, the Dominican Republic, Fiji, Turkey and Zaire, expressed reservations on the selective condemnation of specific countries. Argentina, Chile and the Dominican Republic objected to the support expressed for armed struggle. Botswana, Lesotho and Swaziland reserved their position on the imposition of sanctions.

The Ivory Coast thought the resolution should have included a paragraph requesting States with the right of veto in the Security Council to use it with moderation in cases where sanctions against States practising racial discrimination were being considered. Kuwait expressed a reservation on the provision concerning migrant workers. Uruguay reiterated its reservations made in 1978 with regard to the Declaration and the Programme of Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination<sup>(10)</sup>

(mentioned in the resolution's preamble); it also voiced reservations on the condemnation of collaboration with South Africa by certain States and the request to the Security Council to impose sanctions.

During the Third Committee's debate on racial discrimination, Bulgaria said that racial discrimination, closely linked with social discrimination, was still a part of capitalist society. The Byelorussian SSR described racial discrimination as a direct result of capitalism and said it was being used to exploit workers and arouse hostility between groups. Czechoslovakia stated that countries where racism was rife could prevent discrimination by legislation and information. Poland made the point that equality of rights was an empty slogan for some Governments and their repudiation of that principle was tolerated by what was called the world's humanitarian majority. In the view of the Ukrainian SSR, the problem of eliminating racial discrimination was not limited to apartheid; racism existed wherever imperialism ruled and vestiges of imperialism remained. The USSR considered that the proclamation of the Decade and the measures contained in its Programme had mobilized world public opinion against racism and had been partly responsible for the fact that many peoples had thrown off the colonial yoke.

Indonesia said former colonial Powers had maintained racial discrimination in some countries to further their interests, and in some newly independent countries racial minorities continued to control vital sectors. Iraq said it would boycott all organizations practising racial discrimination and would demand stronger measures against organizations co-operating with them. Japan saw the need for a sober and objective evaluation of international, regional and national activities aimed at eliminating racial discrimination, so that further measures could be elaborated. New Zealand observed that, since situations caused by racial prejudice were often the result of actions by people who lacked understanding of the nature of prejudice, the United Nations should explore ways of educating Governments and peoples about the dangers of racial discrimination and should seek better ways of overcoming them. Viet Nam said racial discrimination often occurred in the heart of allegedly civilized States which posed as the champions of human rights.

Morocco remarked that a second decade against racial discrimination might be needed in view of the failure to achieve the objectives of the current Decade, owing mainly to lack of more decisive financial measures. The United Republic of Tanzania said that efforts to implement the Programme of Action were being made by countries in which racial discrimination was almost non-existent, while the architects and practitioners of discrimination either were silent or gave a vague picture of their activities.

Nicaragua saw a need for international machinery to enable States to eliminate all types of discriminatory actions, especially through education of youth and widespread teaching of human rights. Teaching youth about the horrors of racism was necessary, said Trinidad and Tobago, in view of the emergence of several reactionary organizations devoted to the spread of racist doctrines.

France said it was not enough for a State's constitution to prohibit discriminatory practices; all countries should adopt comprehensive anti-racist laws, as France had done. Greece thought the United Nations should be credited with having created an awareness of the true size of the problem of racial discrimination. The United States said the United Nations should deal even-handedly with all forms of discrimination, wherever they occurred; in addition, inquiry into racial discrimination should focus not merely on a country's ideology and laws but also on whether the laws were enforced.

India and Yugoslavia were among those which regarded implementation of the Programme for the Decade as unsatisfactory. A number of States urged additional action against apartheid in South Africa and described steps they were taking to ensure that nothing was done to encourage that policy.

Implementation of the Programme for the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolve to bring about the total and unconditional eradication of racism, racial discrimination and apartheid, which still represent serious obstacles to further progress and to the Strengthening of international peace and security.

Recalling that, in its resolution 3057(XXVIII) of 2 November 1973 and in the Programme for the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination annexed thereto, and in other relevant resolutions, it called upon all peoples, Governments and institutions to continue their efforts to eradicate racism, racial discrimination and apartheid and thus to promote respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, without distinction as to race, colour, descent or national or ethnic origin.

Taking into account the Declaration and the Programme of Action adopted by the World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, Recalling that in the programme of activities to be undertaken during the second half of the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, contained in the annex to its resolution 34/24 of 15 November 1979, it called upon all States, United Nations organs and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to intensify their efforts to achieve the speediest attainment of the objectives of the Decade, aimed at the complete and final elimination of all forms of racism and racial discrimination.

Bearing in mind the resounding victory of the people of Zimbabwe, achieved as a result of the struggle which it waged for the reconquest of its sovereignty and independence against the racist colonial régime that was oppressing it,

Expressing its serious concern, however, at the situation prevailing in South Africa and throughout southern Africa as a result of the policies and actions of the apartheid régime, particularly its efforts to perpetuate and strengthen racist domination of the country, its policy of "bantustanization", its brutal repression of opponents of apartheid and its renewed acts of aggression against neighbouring States,

Reaffirming that apartheid is a crime against humanity,

Particularly concerned at the persistence of the illegal occupation of Namibia by the racist minority régime of South Africa, Disappointed that the talks between the United Nations and the South African racist and illegal occupation régime aimed at reaching a negotiated settlement of the question of Namibia have thus far failed because of the bad faith of that régime.

Reaffirming that any collaboration with the racist régime of South Africa constitutes a hostile act against the oppressed people of South Africa and a contemptuous defiance of the United Nations and the International community,

Considering that such collaboration strengthens the racist régime, encourages it to persist in its repressive and aggressive policy and seriously aggravates the situation in southern Africa, thus constituting a threat to international peace and security,

Seriously concerned at the fact that the principal Western and other trading partners of South Africa are continuing to collaborate with the racist régime and that their collaboration constitutes the main obstacle to the abolition of that régime and the elimination of the inhuman and criminal system of apartheid.

Alarmed at the persistent collaboration of certain Western States and Israel with the racist régime of South Africa in nuclear matters.

Aware of the constant need to mobilize public opinion against any political, military, economic and other assistance granted to the racist régime of South Africa.

Aware of the need to promote solutions to the problems of discrimination facing migrant workers and their families, wherever such problems exist,

Recalling its resolution 35/33 of 14 November 1980, in which it decided to hold in 1983 a Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, which, while reviewing and assessing the activities undertaken during the Decade, should have as its main purpose the formulation of ways and means and of specific measures aimed at ensuring the full and universal implementation of United Nations resolutions and decisions on racism, racial discrimination and apartheid,

Stressing the importance of attaining the objectives of the Decade,

Convinced that the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination will make a useful and constructive contribution to the attainment of those objectives,

1. Proclaims that the elimination of all forms of racism and of discrimination based on race and the attainment of the objectives of the Programme for the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination and of the programme of activities to be undertaken during the second half of the Decade are matters of high priority for the international community and, therefore, for the United Nations;

2. Strongly condemns the policies of apartheid, racism and racial discrimination pursued in southern Africa, all occupied Arab territories and elsewhere, including the denial of the right of peoples to self-determination and independence;

3. Reaffirms its strong support for the national liberation struggle against racism, racial discrimination, apartheid, colonialism and foreign domination and for self-determination by all available means, including armed struggle;

4. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the Namibian people to self-determination and independence;

5. Vigorously condemns the repeated acts of aggression committed by South Africa against neighbouring States.

particularly against Angola, Botswana, Mozambique and Zambia;

6. Expresses its profound solidarity with the front-line States that are victims of the racist aggression and destabilization attempts of the Pretoria régime;

7. Once again invites all Member States, United Nations organs, specialized agencies, intergovernmental organizations, national liberation movements, anti-apartheid and anti-racist organizations and other solidarity groups to strengthen and enlarge the scope of their activities in support of the objectives of the Programme for the Decade;

6. Again requests the Security Council to consider, as a matter of urgency, the imposition of full mandatory sanctions under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations against the racist régime of South Africa, including, in particular, an embargo on the delivery of oil and oil products to South Africa and the strengthening of the embargo on arms, with a view to putting an end to all military and nuclear collaboration with South Africa;

9. Approves the Declaration of the International Seminar on the Implementation and Reinforcement of the Arms Embargo against South Africa, held in London from 1 to 3 April 1981 under the sponsorship of the Special Committee against Apartheid;

10. Vigorously condemns the collaboration of certain Western countries, Israel and other States and of transnational corporations and other organizations which are maintaining or continuing to increase their collaboration with the racist régime of South Africa, particularly in the political, economic, military and nuclear fields, thereby encouraging that régime to persist in its inhuman and criminal policy of brutal oppression of the peoples of southern Africa and in its denial of human rights;

11. Calls once again upon all Governments which have not yet done so to take legislative, administrative and other measures in respect of their nationals and the bodies corporate under their jurisdiction that own enterprises in southern Africa in order to put an end to such enterprises;

12. Calls upon all States to adopt, as a matter of high priority, measures declaring punishable by law any dissemination of ideas based on racial superiority or hatred and outlawing organizations based on racial hatred and prejudice, including neo-Nazi and Fascist organizations and private clubs and institutions established on the basis of racial criteria or propagating ideas of racial discrimination and apartheid;

13. Invites Member States, the organs and bodies of the United Nations system and the specialized agencies to continue their efforts with a view to the protection of the rights of all migrant workers and their families;

14. Takes note of the progress made by the Economic and Social Council at its first regular session of 1981 in connection with the preparatory work for the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination;

15. Decides that the Preparatory Sub-Committee for the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, established by the President of the Economic and Social Council in accordance with Council decision 1981/130 of 6 May 1981, shall hold its first session in New York during the first quarter of 1982, for a period of two weeks, and shall report to the Council at its first regular session of 1982, the Council being the Preparatory Committee for the Conference;

16. Requests the Secretary-General to provide the Preparatory Sub-Committee with all necessary assistance;

17. Further requests the Secretary-General to appoint in 1982, after consultation with the regional groups, a Secretary-General of the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, who shall have the rank of Assistant Secretary-General and shall be responsible for the organization of the Conference and co-ordination with Member States, organs and bodies of the United Nations, specialized agencies and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations;

18. Invites Member States to continue to co-operate with the Secretary-General as part of the Programme for the Decade and the preparations for the Conference;

19. Invites the appropriate organs and bodies of the United Nations system to contribute to the preparations for the Conference;

20. Expresses its satisfaction to the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, the Special Committee against Apartheid, the United Nations Council for Namibia, the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People and the Commission on Human Rights, through its Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts on Southern Africa, for their contribution to the Implementation of the Programme for the Decade and invites them to include in their activities the preparations for the Conference;

21. Decides to consider at its thirty-seventh session the status of preparations for the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination;

22. Decides to consider at its thirty-seventh session, as a matter of high priority, the item entitled "Implementation of the Programme for the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination".

Preparations for the Second World Conference

The Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly took further action in 1981 to prepare for the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, scheduled for 1983. The main purpose of the Conference, decided on by the Assembly in November 1980, was to formulate ways and means and specific measures to ensure the full and universal implementation of United Nations decisions on racial discrimination and apartheid.<sup>(3)</sup>

After the Council decided in May 1981 to establish a Preparatory Sub-Committee (p. 869) the Assembly, in its resolution of 28 October on implementation of the Programme for the Decade,<sup>(1)</sup> took note of the Council's progress and invited Member States to continue to co-operate with the Secretary-General in the preparations. It also invited the contribution of United Nations bodies, specifically CERD and those dealing with apartheid, Namibia, colonial countries, Palestinians and human rights. The Secretary-General was requested to appoint in 1982, after consultation with the regional groups of States, a Secretary-General of the Conference, with the rank of Assistant Secretary-General, who would be responsible for organization and co-ordination with States and organizations.

In a resolution of the same date<sup>(5)</sup> on the status of the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid,<sup>(2)</sup> the Assembly requested the Economic and Social Council, in preparing for the Conference, to give special attention to activities aimed at the eradication of apartheid.

In the Third Committee's debate on racial discrimination, Austria expressed the view that, by concentrating on procedures and activities to ensure the fullest possible implementation of international instruments and United Nations resolutions, the Conference could assess the results of the Decade and ensure the continuation of efforts to combat racism. Chile thought the Conference should consider the problems posed by colonialism and neo-colonialism, the treatment of ethnic minorities and the enslavement of entire peoples. The Congo and the German Democratic Republic said the Conference could contribute to the mobilization against racism and apartheid. Egypt spoke of the need to co-ordinate efforts and proposals by United Nations organs in connection with Conference preparations. Indonesia supported the plan to hold the Conference but observed that regional and subregional meetings attended by prominent figures and public leaders were no less important. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya called for maximum publicity for the Conference by information media.

New Zealand hoped the Conference would find a way to bring about changes in the social attitudes and practices which gave rise to racial discrimination and were to be found in varying degrees in every society. Denmark, speaking for the Nordic States, hoped preparations for the Conference would be based on the Decade's original aims, avoiding the divisive issues raised in recent years. Tunisia and Venezuela believed the Conference not only should review the Decade's activities but should formulate specific measures to ensure full and universal implementation of United Nations decisions on the subject. The United Arab Emirates hoped the Conference would give new impetus to the liberation struggle of Africans and Palestinians. Yugoslavia thought the Conference should sum up the results of the Decade, analyse weaknesses and attempt to find ways of pursuing the struggle against racism.

Establishment of the Preparatory Sub-Committee. On 6 May 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> the Economic and Social Council authorized its President, in consultation with the regional groups of States, to appoint a geographically representative committee of 23 United Nations Member States that would act as the Preparatory Sub-Committee for the Conference. The Sub-Committee would be concerned, in particular, with the Conference's provisional agenda, provisional rules of procedure, organization of work, date and place, cost, modalities of representation and documentation.

This decision was adopted by a recorded vote of 46 to none, with 7 abstentions. The text was introduced by Algeria on behalf of 15 sponsors.

Belgium said it had to abstain in the vote because the decision could not be considered separately from the resolution dealing with the substance of the Decade (p. 864), which Belgium had voted against. Also abstaining, the United Kingdom said that, although it associated itself with the intention of the European Community members to join in the preparatory work for the Conference, the Council resolution on the Decade had reinforced his delegation's hesitations due to past disagreements about the scope of the Decade.

Voting in favour, Ireland said that, although prospects for the Preparatory Sub-Committee were not auspicious, it had not lost all hope that the Committee would perform a positive role. Denmark stated that it had cast a positive vote in the expectation that the Conference preparations would be carried out on the basis of the original goals of the Decade. The USSR said it did not oppose the establishment of the Sub-Committee out of respect for the wishes of developing countries, but it hoped the costs would be met from savings within the budget.

In its resolution of 28 October on the Decade against racial discrimination,<sup>(1)</sup> the General Assembly decided that the Sub-Committee should hold its first session in New York for two weeks during the first quarter of 1982 and report to the Council at its first regular session of 1982, the Council being the Preparatory Committee.

Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination

At its 14th plenary meeting, on 6 May 1981, the Council—recalling its resolution 1980/7 of 24 April 1980 and recalling in particular General Assembly resolution 35/33 of 14 November 1980, by which the Assembly decided to hold, in 1983, a second world conference to combat racism and racial discrimination—authorized its President, in consultation with the regional groups, to appoint, on the basis of equitable geographical distribution and prior to the completion of the Council's work for 1981, a committee of twenty-three Member States, which, acting as the Preparatory Sub-Committee of the Council, in consultation with the Secretary-General, should complete the preparations for the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, in particular with respect to:

- (a) Provisional agenda;
- (b) Provisional rules of procedure;
- (c) Organization of work;
- (d) Date and venue of the Conference;
- (e) Cost;
- (f) Modalities of representation;
- (g) Documentation.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Australia, Belgium, Canada, France, Germany, Federal Republic of Italy, United Kingdom.

Membership of the Sub-Committee. The President of the Economic and Social Council reported to the Council on 25 November 1981 on his consultations with the regional groups concerning the appointment of the 23 members of the Preparatory Sub-Committee for the Conference. He stated that the Groups of Asian, Latin American and Eastern European States had nominated candidates and he expected to receive shortly the candidatures from the African Group. The Chairman of the Group of Western European and other States had informed him that no State had shown interest in taking part in the Sub-Committee's work.

On an oral proposal by the President, the Council decided without vote on the same day to authorize him to proceed with the appointment of the States nominated, on the understanding that he would pursue efforts to complete the Sub-Committee's membership.<sup>(1)</sup>

By a letter of 15 December,<sup>(2)</sup> the President informed the Secretary-General that he had appointed 19 States (see APPENDIX III for the Sub-Committee's membership).

Appointment of the members of the Preparatory Sub-Committee for the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination

At its 45th plenary meeting, on 25 November 1981, the Council, after hearing a statement by the President concerning the appointment of twenty-three members of the Preparatory Sub-Committee for the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, agreed that, without prejudice to the provisions of Council decision 1981/130 of 6 May 1981, the President would proceed with the appointment of the States so far nominated by the regional groups on the understanding that he would pursue his efforts, with a view to completing the membership of the Preparatory Sub-Committee.

Participation of CERD. The Economic and Social Council, by a decision of 25 November 1981 orally proposed by the President and adopted without vote, invited the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) to designate one of its members to participate as an observer in the work of the Preparatory Sub-Committee for the Conference.<sup>(5)</sup> The action was taken in response to a wish expressed by CERD in August that it be represented by one of its members in the Sub-Committee.<sup>(2)</sup> This wish was communicated to the Council in a note by the United Nations Secretariat.<sup>(1)</sup>

In April, as part of its contribution to the Conference, CERD designated two of its members to undertake studies on the implementation of two articles of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination.<sup>(3)</sup> José D. Ingles (Philippines) was named Special Rapporteur for a study on the implementation of article 4 of the Convention (on punishment for the dissemination of ideas based on racial superiority or hatred) and Georges Tene-kides (Greece) was named Special Rapporteur for a study on the implementation of article 7 (on measures against racial prejudices).

In a resolution of 28 October on the activities of CERD, the General Assembly requested CERD to explore the possibility of preparing an additional study for the Conference, on the implementation of subparagraph (e) of article 5 (guarantee of economic, social and cultural rights) in conjunction with paragraph 2 of article 2 (measures to ensure the rights of certain racial groups).<sup>(4)</sup>

Preparation of this study was suggested by Yugoslavia. Greece, however, thought it too early to undertake such studies, which it felt might upset the legal balance of the Convention. Canada thought it unnecessary for CERD to consider a report on the problems of minorities and indigenous populations (p. 883) when those topics were being dealt with by other bodies.

Preparatory Sub-Committee for the Second World

Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination

At its 45th plenary meeting, on 25 November 1981, the Council decided to invite the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination to designate one of its members to participate, as an observer, in the work of the Preparatory Sub-Committee for the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination.

Convention against racial discrimination

Implementation of the Convention

CERD ACTIVITIES. The Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD), set up under article 8 of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination,<sup>(2)</sup> held two sessions in 1981: the twenty-third from 23 March to 10 April at Geneva and the twenty-fourth from 4 to 21 August in New York.

At those sessions, CERD devoted three quarters of its meetings to an examination of reports and additional information submitted by 37 States parties under article 9 of the Convention, concerning legislative, judicial, administrative or other measures they had adopted to give effect to the provisions of the Convention. Representatives of 34 reporting States (all but Madagascar, Rwanda and Sweden) participated in the consideration of their respective reports. The annual report of CERD to the General Assembly<sup>(1)</sup> summarized the views of Committee members on each country report and the statements by the representatives of the States parties concerned.

The reports examined were from: Algeria, Bangladesh, Bulgaria, Burundi, Canada, Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Denmark, France, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Holy See, India, Israel, Ivory Coast, Kuwait, Lebanon, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Mongolia, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Republic of Korea, Rwanda, Senegal, Seychelles, Spain, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Trinidad and Tobago, Upper Volta, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

At each of its 1981 sessions, the Committee requested the Secretary-General to send reminders to States whose reports were overdue. These numbered 44 States at the March/April session and 36 States at the August session.

In addition, CERD examined copies of petitions, reports and other information concerning Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted to it by the Trusteeship Council (p. 1120) and the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. CERD submitted to the Assembly recommendations on implementation of the principles and objectives of the Convention in 10 Territories: in Africa, Namibia and Western Sahara; in the Pacific Ocean, Guam and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands; in the Indian Ocean, the Cocos (Keeling) Islands; in the Caribbean area, Belize (before its independence), the British Virgin Islands and the United States Virgin Islands; and in the Atlantic Ocean, Bermuda and St. Helena.

During both 1981 sessions, the Committee discussed its activities within the framework of the Decade against racial discrimination (p. 864), including the possibility of holding sessions in developing countries, and its participation in preparations for the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination (p. 870). At both sessions, it agreed to hold its first session of 1982 in an African city, subject to General Assembly approval.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution of 28 October,<sup>(3)</sup> the General Assembly took note of the CERD report, commended the Committee for paying greater attention to Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, and called on United Nations bodies and administering Powers to provide information. It invited States parties to furnish information on implementation of the Convention against racial discrimination, including information on the demographic composition of their population and their relations with South Africa. It called for legislative, socio-economic and other measures to eliminate or prevent discrimination based on race, colour, descent, or national or ethnic origin. It reiterated its grave concern that some States parties were being prevented from fulfilling their Convention obligations in parts of their territories.

The Assembly urged Member States to adopt political, economic and other measures to eliminate apartheid in South Africa and Namibia; commended CERD for taking up discrimination against migrant workers (p. 884); called on States parties to protect the rights of national or ethnic minorities and indigenous populations (p. 883); and requested CERD to explore the possibility of preparing an additional study for the Conference against racial discrimination (p. 870).

The resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 145 to 1, with 1 abstention. The Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee approved the 22-nation draft, as orally revised by the sponsors and orally amended by Australia, on 16 October, by a recorded vote of 134 to 1. The Committee decided, by votes of 115 to 1, with 19 abstentions, and 112 to none, with 20 abstentions, respectively, to retain paragraph 2, urging measures against apartheid, and paragraph 5, inviting the submission of information on implementation of the Convention, including information on relations with South Africa.

The oral revisions by the sponsors included an additional paragraph commending CERD for paying attention to measures by States parties to assure recourse procedures for victims of racial discrimination, and a substitution that had the Assembly commend CERD for paying greater attention to (rather than concentrating attention on) apartheid. In addition, the revised text had the Assembly note the decision of CERD to hold its first 1982 session at Nairobi, Kenya, and request the Secretary-General to explore the possibility of holding the session in the context of the Decade against racial discrimination; the original version would have had the Assembly approve the CERD decision, request the Secretary-General to arrange for the session and, as an exceptional measure, provide for the additional expenses in the context of the Programme for the Decade. Australia's oral amendment, which was accepted by the sponsors, concerned the location of the new paragraph.

Introducing the resolution, Yugoslavia said the debate on racial discrimination had stressed the importance and necessity of further universalization and more consistent implementation of the Convention.

The United States said it would vote against the resolution because of paragraph 2.

Voting for the resolution but abstaining on paragraph 5, Denmark (also on behalf of Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden) and the United Kingdom (for the European Community (EC) members) also voiced reservations on paragraph 2. In addition, the EC members reserved their position on paragraph 3, commending CERD for paying greater attention to the elimination of apartheid; in their view, the paragraph gave a distorted picture of the Committee's mandate and activities.

Also voting in favour, Australia, Austria, Denmark (for the Nordic States), Japan and the United Kingdom (for the EC members) thought any additional expenses entailed by holding a session away from United Nations Headquarters should comply with established rules (specifying that the extra costs be met by the host country). Australia also stated that, if the tendency for resolutions on CERD to deal mainly with apartheid gained strength, that body might in the long run be diverted from universal humanitarian concerns and from acting as a group of independent experts. Austria regretted that the resolution contained elements having little to do with the CERD report, while Chile thought the resolution contained political considerations alien to the Convention. New Zealand expressed concern that there was a tendency to focus attention only on certain countries or regions.

The Syrian Arab Republic, welcoming the added paragraph on recourse procedures, stated that Israel had not introduced appeal procedures in its jurisdiction, with consequences for the occupied territories.

In the Third Committee's debate on the report of CERD, Botswana found it disheartening that countries which practised discrimination had not submitted reports. Kenya expressed the view that States not yet parties to the Convention should at least be guided by it. Remarking that not all parties were actively engaged in eliminating racial discrimination, the United Republic of Tanzania appealed to them not to prevent others from doing so.

Pakistan favoured a strengthening of the functions of CERD and a widening of its scope so that it could examine the situation in all signatory States in regard to racial discrimination and other matters for which the Convention gave it a mandate. Uruguay thought it important that CERD be careful to avoid politicization and not to exceed its mandate.

Addressing specific aspects of CERD activities, France thought that body should make general suggestions and recommendations based on its examination of reports and information from States parties, from which universally applicable lessons could be drawn. The Netherlands suggested that CERD consider drawing attention to the possibility of States parties requesting its advice on specific questions concerning implementation of the Convention, and also consider whether it might adopt both general recommendations on implementation and suggestions to specific States on action against racial discrimination.

Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany voiced concern that a number of States parties had failed to submit reports and that some reports were incomplete. For the Nordic States, Denmark warned that failure to submit reports on time might erode the Convention's control procedures. Yugoslavia said CERD should give more attention to the problem and not merely send out routine reminders.

Report of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 35/40 of 25 November 1980 on the report of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination and 36/11 of 28 October 1981 on the status of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, as well as its other relevant resolutions on the implementation of the Programme for the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination,

Having considered the report of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination on its twenty-third and twenty-fourth sessions, submitted under article 9, paragraph 2, of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination,

Emphasizing that It is important for the successful struggle against all practices of racial discrimination, including the vestiges and manifestations of racist ideologies wherever they exist, that all Member States should be guided in their internal and foreign policies by the basic provisions of the Convention,

Mindful of the obligation of the States parties to comply fully with the provisions of the Convention,

Welcoming the continued co-operation of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination with the competent specialized agencies and other United Nations bodies, especially with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization and the International Labour Organisation,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the report of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination on its twenty-third and twenty-fourth sessions;

2. Strongly condemns the policy of apartheid in South Africa and Namibia as the most abhorrent form of racial discrimination and urges all Member States to adopt effective political, economic and other measures in order to secure the elimination of that policy and to achieve the full implementation of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, the Security Council and other United Nations bodies;

3. Commends the Committee for paying greater attention to the question of the elimination of the policy of apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, as well as to the elimination of acts and practices of racial discrimination in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories and in all other Territories to which General Assembly resolution 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960 applies;

4. Calls upon the United Nations bodies concerned to ensure that the Committee is supplied with all relevant information on all the Territories to which General Assembly resolution 1514(XV) applies and urges the administering Powers to co-operate with these bodies by providing all necessary information in order to enable the Committee to discharge fully its responsibilities under article 15 of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination;

5. Once again invites States parties to the Convention to furnish the Committee, in accordance with its general guidelines, with the information on the implementation of the provisions of the Convention, including information on the demographic composition of their population and on their relations with the racist régime of South Africa;

8. Calls upon all Member States to adopt effective legislative, socio-economic and other necessary measures for elimination or prevention of discrimination based on race, colour, descent or national or ethnic origin;

7. Commends the Committee for paying due attention to the steps taken by the States parties to the Convention to assure within their Jurisdiction the availability of appropriate recourse procedures for the victims of racial discrimination;

8. Further commends the Committee for taking up the problems of discrimination of migrant workers and requests States parties to the Convention to protect fully the rights of those workers;

9. Calls upon States parties to the Convention to protect fully, through the introduction of relevant legislative and other measures, the rights of national or ethnic minorities, as well as the rights of indigenous populations;

10. Reiterates its grave concern that some States parties to the Convention, owing to reasons beyond their control, are being prevented from fulfilling their obligations under the Convention in parts of their respective territories;

11. Takes note with appreciation of the Committee's plans to participate in the preparations and the work of the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, to be held in 1983;

12. Requests the Committee to explore the possibility of preparing also for the Conference, in addition to studies on the implementation of articles 4 and 7 of the Convention, a study on the implementation of subparagraph (e) of article 5 in conjunction with paragraph 2 of article 2;

13. Takes note of the decision of the Committee to hold its spring 1982 session at the United Nations offices at Nairobi and requests the Secretary-General to explore the possibility of holding this session within the context of the implementation of the Programme for the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination.

Accessions and ratifications

As at 31 December 1981, there were 111 States parties to the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, adopted by the General Assembly in 1965.<sup>(2)</sup> The parties italics indicate those adhering in 1981) were:

Algeria, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Bulgaria, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Guinea, Guyana, Haiti, Holy See, Hungary, Iceland, India, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Jordan, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Mali, Malta, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Republic of Korea, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Spain, Sudan, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Togo, Tonga, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, United Republic of Cameroon, United Republic of Tanzania, Upper Volta, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia.

Eight of the States parties—Costa Rica, Ecuador, Iceland, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden and Uruguay—had made declarations under article 14 of the Convention, recognizing the competence of CERD to receive and consider communications from individuals or groups within their jurisdiction claiming to be victims of a violation by the State party concerned of any of the rights set forth in the Convention. Iceland submitted its declaration during 1981. Under article 14, the Committee was to be competent to exercise this function when at least 10 States parties were bound by such declarations.

The Secretary-General submitted in September his annual report to the General Assembly on the status of the Convention, listing the States which had signed, ratified, acceded or succeeded to it as at 1 September.<sup>(1)</sup>

By a resolution of 28 October,<sup>(3)</sup> the Assembly expressed satisfaction with the increase in the number of States that had ratified or acceded to the Convention. It reaffirmed its conviction that universal adherence to the Convention and implementation of its provisions were necessary to realize the objectives of the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination (p. 864). It requested States which had not become parties to do so and appealed to parties to consider the possibility of making the declaration provided for in article 14.

The resolution was adopted, without vote, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, which approved the text on 15 October in the same manner, on the basis of a 31-nation draft introduced by Belgium. It incorporated an amendment by Costa Rica, Ecuador and Uruguay, adding the provision by which the Assembly appealed to States parties to consider the possibility of making a declaration under article 14. This amendment was adopted by 80 votes to none, with 50 abstentions.

Introducing the new paragraph, Uruguay said its purpose was to correct the shortcoming that, without such a declaration, victims of a violation of the rights provided for in the Convention had no recourse and were unable to ensure respect for their rights.

During the Third Committee's debate on racial discrimination, calls for more ratifications of the Convention were made by Australia, Egypt, Hungary, India, Mongolia, New Zealand, Romania, Rwanda, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, the USSR, the United Kingdom, the United Republic of Tanzania, Venezuela and Zaire.

Status of the international Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 3057(XXVIII) of 2 November 1973, 3135(XXVIII) of 14 December 1973, 3225(XXIX) of 6 November 1974, 3381 (XXX) of 10 November 1975, 31/79 of 13 December 1976, 32/11 of 7 November 1977, 33/101 of 16 December 1978, 34/26 of 15 November 1979 and 35/38 of 25 November 1980.

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the status of the international Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination;

2. Expresses its satisfaction with the increase in the number of States that have ratified the Convention or acceded thereto;

3. Reaffirms once again its conviction that ratification of or accession to the Convention on a universal basis and implementation of its provisions are necessary for the realization of the objectives of the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination;

4. Requests States that have not yet become parties to the Convention to ratify it or accede thereto;

5. Appeals to States parties to the Convention to consider the possibility of making the declaration provided for in article 14 of the Convention;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to submit to the General Assembly annual reports concerning the status of the Convention, in accordance with Assembly resolution 2106 A (XX) of 21 December 1965.

Measures against nazism and fascism

The Commission on Human Rights and the General Assembly adopted similar resolutions in 1981 concerning measures against Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist activities and other ideologies and practices based on racial intolerance, hatred and terror.

By a resolution of 23 February,<sup>(2)</sup> adopted by a roll-call vote of 38 to none, with 1 abstention, the Commission condemned all totalitarian or other ideologies and practices, in particular Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist ones, based on racial or ethnic exclusiveness or intolerance, hatred, terror and systematic denial of human rights. It urged States to draw attention to the threats to democratic institutions by those ideologies and practices, and to consider taking measures to prohibit or otherwise deter activities by groups and organizations practising them. It also called on international, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to initiate or intensify measures against such ideologies and practices. The Commission appealed to States to become parties to relevant human rights instruments.

As requested by the Assembly in December 1980,<sup>(8)</sup> the Secretary-General submitted in April 1981 a report (with addenda in September and December) summarizing comments by 30 States on problems in regard to this topic and their suggestions on national and international measures to eradicate nazism, fascism and related ideologies based on racial intolerance, hatred and terror.<sup>(1)</sup>

The Economic and Social Council, on 8 May,<sup>(10)</sup> took note of the report and decided to transmit it to the Assembly. The decision, orally proposed by the Chairman of the Second (Social) Committee, was adopted without vote, following similar approval by the Committee on 5 May.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted a resolution<sup>(9)</sup> repeating most of the provisions of the Commission's resolution. In addition, it invited Member States to adopt, in accordance with their constitutions and with international human rights instruments, measures declaring punishable by law any dissemination of ideas based on racial superiority or hatred and of war propaganda, including Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist ideologies. It called again on States to submit their comments for inclusion in a further report by the Secretary-General, and requested the Commission to continue consideration of the subject in 1982.

The Assembly adopted this resolution without vote, after similarly adopting an amendment by the Netherlands. The revised 14-nation text had been recommended by the Third Committee on 3 December by a recorded vote, requested by the Ukrainian SSR, of 125 to none, with 13 abstentions, after the Committee rejected, by 58 votes to 52, with 18 abstentions, a proposal by Australia, Canada, Greece, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom to delete paragraph 4, by which the Assembly invited States to adopt measures declaring punishable any dissemination of ideas based on racial superiority. The subsequent amendment by the Netherlands, presented in the Assembly, added to this paragraph the qualifying phrase stating that such measures should be in accordance with States' constitutional systems and with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights<sup>(3)</sup> and the International Covenants on Human Rights.<sup>(4)</sup>

Other amendments by the five Western States were accepted in Committee by the resolution's sponsors. They altered the terminology used to describe the ideologies and practices addressed by the resolution, to read "all totalitarian or other ideologies and practices, in particular Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist, based on racial or ethnic exclusiveness or intolerance, hatred, terror, systematic denial of human rights and fundamental freedoms, or which have such consequences". This phrase replaced varying references in five paragraphs of the original draft to nazism and fascism, and to Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist activities and all other forms of totalitarian ideologies and practices based on racial intolerance, hatred and terror, and those based on the systematic denial of human rights and fundamental freedoms. The revised phrase was also used to specify the title under which this subject was to be considered by the Commission.

According to another change proposed by the five delegations and accepted by the sponsors, the Assembly urged States to draw attention to the threats to democratic institutions by such ideologies and practices and to consider taking measures, in accordance with their constitutional systems and with the Declaration of Human Rights and the Covenants on Human Rights, to prohibit or otherwise deter activities by groups or organizations or whoever was practising those ideologies. This replaced a paragraph by which States would have been urged to give due consideration to implementing a 1971 Assembly resolution on nazism<sup>(6)</sup> in accordance with national constitutional systems and with the Declaration and Covenants, and especially to taking measures against activities of groups and organizations practising nazism, fascism, neo-fascism and other ideologies based on racial intolerance, hatred and terror.

Introducing the draft in the Committee, the German Democratic Republic said it reflected profound international concern at the upsurge of activities of groups and organizations which spread and practised nazism, fascism and neo-fascism with increasing international co-ordination, thereby threatening peace and security.

In the Assembly, the United States dissociated itself from the consensus on the resolution, saying it could not accept the view that government repression of the dissemination of ideas was an appropriate or effective way to oppose totalitarianism; in the Committee, where it abstained in the vote, the United States described the text as a cynical propagandistic exercise by totalitarian States.

Reservations on paragraph 4, on measures against dissemination of ideas based on racial superiority, and on paragraph 5, containing an appeal to ratify or accede to certain conventions, were voiced by Japan and Sweden. Norway and others objected to paragraph 4 on the ground that it might be interpreted as limiting freedom of speech and of the press. Israel said it supported the resolution despite the questionable motives of its authors and the totalitarian character of their regimes and despite the fact that the propaganda it contained was extraneous to the central theme of the resolution.

Canada abstained because it could not accept the ideas in paragraph 4. Austria said it wished to change its vote from abstaining to supporting because, although paragraph 4 had been retained, the other amendments had made the draft acceptable.

Australia, Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands, Turkey and the United Kingdom, though voting in favour, voiced reservations on paragraph 4; Belgium also thought that parts of the resolution were contrary to basic principles to which it subscribed, such as those in the European Convention on Human Rights. Portugal expressed reservations on the references in the twelfth preambular paragraph to the possibility of elaborating a draft declaration and in paragraph 5 to the Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity<sup>(5)</sup> and the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid,<sup>(7)</sup> some of whose provisions were contrary to the Portuguese legal order.

Albania thought the draft failed to draw attention to the main political, economic and social causes of fascism and nazism, and the Fascist acts of aggression by the imperialist super-Powers.

During the Committee's debate, concern at the resurgence of fascism and neo-fascism and calls for United Nations action to deal with the problem were voiced by Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Cuba, Hungary, Mongolia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR. Bulgaria stated that growing social insecurity in Western countries was creating favourable conditions for the reactivation of nazism, fascism and neo-fascism. To allow Fascist theories or other ideas based on intolerance and hatred to be propagated without hindrance, Hungary stated, showed a misunderstanding of democracy; democratic institutions could only gain from legal measures to put an end to such fundamentally anti-social activities. The United Nations would not be fulfilling its duty to the millions of people killed in the Second World War and the millions of victims of Fascist terror if it did not strive to remove the threat of a revival of fascism and nazism, the USSR declared.

Measures to be taken against Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist activities and all other forms of totalitarian ideologies and practices based on racial intolerance, hatred and terror
The General Assembly,

Recalling that the United Nations emerged from the struggle against nazism, fascism, aggression and foreign occupation, and that the peoples expressed their resolve in the Charter of the United Nations to save future generations from the scourge of war,

Bearing in mind the suffering, destruction and death of millions of victims of aggression, foreign occupation, nazism and fascism,

Reaffirming the purposes and principles laid down in the Charter, which are aimed at maintaining international peace and security, developing friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, and achieving international co-operation,

Emphasizing that all totalitarian or other Ideologies and practices, in particular Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist, based on racial or ethnic exclusiveness or intolerance, hatred, terror, systematic denial of human rights and fundamental freedoms, or which have such consequences, may jeopardize world peace and constitute obstacles to friendly relations between States and to the realization of human rights and fundamental freedoms,

Reaffirming that the prosecution and punishment of war crimes and crimes against peace and humanity, as laid down in General Assembly resolutions 3(I) of 13 February 1946 and 95(I) of 11 December 1946, constitute a universal commitment for all States,

Recalling its resolutions 2331 (XXII) of 18 December 1967, 2438(XXIII) of 19 December 1968, 2545(XXIV) of 11 December 1969, 2713(XXV) of 15 December 1970, 2839(XXVI) of 18 December 1971, 34/24 of 15 November 1979 and 35/200 of 15 December 1980,

Recalling also the Declaration on Social Progress and Development, the United Nations Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, Underlining the importance of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenants on Human Rights, the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide and other relevant international instruments,

Reaffirming that all totalitarian or other ideologies and practices, in particular Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist, based on racial or ethnic exclusiveness or intolerance, hatred, terror, systematic denial of human rights and fundamental freedoms, or which have such consequences, are incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenants on Human Rights, the international Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, the Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity, the international Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid, the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide and other relevant international instruments,

Commending the fact that a number of States provided the Secretary-General with their comments on the problems discussed in his report,

Acknowledging the fact that a number of States have set up legal regulations which are suited to prevent the activities of Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist groups and organizations,

Welcoming Commission on Human Rights resolution 3(XXXVII) of 23 February 1981 providing measures on this subject, including the possibility of elaborating a draft declaration,

Noting with deep concern that the proponents of Fascist ideologies have, in a number of countries, intensified their activities and are increasingly co-ordinating them on an international scale,

1. Again condemns all totalitarian or other ideologies and practices, in particular Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist, based on racial or ethnic exclusiveness or intolerance, hatred, terror, systematic denial of human rights and fundamental freedoms, or which have such consequences;

2. Urges all States to draw attention to the threats to democratic institutions by the above-mentioned ideologies and practices and to consider taking measures, in accordance with their national constitutional systems and with the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenants on Human Rights, to prohibit or otherwise deter activities by groups or organizations or whoever is practising those ideologies;

3. Calls upon the appropriate specialized agencies as well as intergovernmental and international non-governmental organizations to initiate or intensify measures against the ideologies and practices described in paragraph 1 above;

4. Invites Member States to adopt, in accordance with their national constitutional systems and with the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenants on Human Rights, as a matter of high priority, measures declaring punishable by law any dissemination of ideas based on racial superiority or hatred and of war propaganda, including Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist ideologies;

5. Appeals to all States that have not yet done so to ratify or to accede to the International Covenants on Human Rights, the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, the Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity, and the international Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid;

6. Calls once again upon all States to provide the Secretary-General with their comments on this question;

7. Requests the Commission on Human Rights to continue the consideration of this subject at its thirty-eighth session under the title "Measures to be taken against all totalitarian or other ideologies and practices, in particular Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist, based on racial or ethnic exclusiveness or intolerance, hatred, terror, systematic denial of human rights and fundamental freedoms, or which have such consequences";

8. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report, through the Economic and Social Council, to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session in the light of the discussion that would take place in the Commission on Human Rights and on the basis of comments provided by States and international organizations.

International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination

As in previous years, the International Day, for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination was observed at a meeting of the Special Committee against Apartheid held on 20 March 1981.<sup>(1)</sup> Statements were made by the Secretary-General, the President of the Security Council, other United Nations officials, representatives of the regional groups of States and observers from national liberation movements. The Day commemorated the date (21 March 1960) when 69 demonstrators against the "pass laws" of the apartheid system were killed and 180 others were wounded at Sharpeville, South Africa.

Role of the mass media

As requested by the General Assembly in 1978,<sup>(3)</sup> the Secretary-General submitted in January 1981 a study on education activities and activities of the mass media in the fight against racial discrimination.<sup>(1)</sup> The study examined the potential and limitations of the media in that fight, and international and national action to inform and educate the public. Among its main conclusions were: research should be conducted into racial discrimination in communication, including a study of distribution, control, ownership, support, resources, production, presentation, content, availability, exposure, consumption, use and influence; journalistic procedures in reporting on racial issues should be questioned, as they did not appear adequate for balanced coverage; minorities should have access to mass media professions, especially journalism; the media should publicize meetings and United Nations activities on racial discrimination; and United Nations public information activities against racism should be strengthened.

In March, the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) submitted a progress report to the Economic and Social Council on UNESCO action to study the role of the mass media in combating racial discrimination and apartheid.<sup>(2)</sup> The report stated that the 1978 UNESCO Declaration on Fundamental Principles concerning the Contribution of the Mass Media to Strengthening Peace and International Understanding, to the Promotion of Human Rights and to Countering Racism, Apartheid and Incitement to War<sup>(5)</sup> had been translated and issued in 16 languages. Press reaction to the Declaration in France, the Federal Republic of Germany and the United Kingdom had been studied, and three regional seminars on it had been organized in 1980. Other 1981-1983 activities included a study on the possibility of improving the communication media available to national liberation movements and three seminars that would discuss the role of the media in countering racial discrimination and apartheid.

On 6 May 1981, the Council took note of this report, on an oral proposal by its President adopted without vote.<sup>(4)</sup>

Commenting on the Secretary-General's report during the debate on racial discrimination in the Assembly's Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, Argentina said it was necessary to study the attitudes of information

disseminators, since they determined the point of view from which events were perceived. India observed that, since racial stereotypes and pejorative portrayals of racial groups had a lasting impact on attitudes, it was important to ensure that such portrayals in the mass media did not create or intensify prejudices. Kenya supported the views expressed in the report and observed that the oppressed people of South Africa and the poor should be given the means to express themselves through the mass media.

New Zealand stressed the need for a balanced approach in presenting information and commended the report's suggestion that effective information dissemination could be achieved by the use of a more informal style in United Nations reports and communications. Nigeria pointed out that non-governmental organizations as well as governmental authorities had a vital role to play and their cumulative effort represented a strong link in the international drive against racial discrimination. Pakistan regretted that the mass media in some advanced countries which influenced media elsewhere had not joined in efforts to combat racial discrimination. Support for the report's recommendations was also voiced by Egypt and Jamaica.

Role of the mass media in combating racism, racial discrimination and apartheid

At its 15th plenary meeting, on 6 May 1981, the Council took note of the progress report of the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization on the role of the mass media in combating racism, racial discrimination and apartheid.

Protection against racial discrimination

Under the programme for the second half (1980-1983) of the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, adopted by the General Assembly in 1979,<sup>(2)</sup> the United Nations Division of Human Rights organized at Managua, Nicaragua, from 14 to 21 December 1981, a seminar for members of the Economic Commission for Latin America on recourse procedures and other protection available to victims of racial discrimination and activities to be undertaken nationally and regionally, with particular reference to indigenous populations (p. 883).

The participants reached a consensus, set out in the seminar report,<sup>(1)</sup> on the need to: exchange and disseminate information on violations of the rights of indigenous peoples; exert pressure aimed at changing the views of international bodies and banks which financed development plans affecting indigenous peoples; organize information programmes and activities for a broad audience on the problems of indigenous groups; facilitate contacts and the exchange of information and experience among indigenous organizations; publicize within indigenous groups the abuses such groups suffered in various countries of the region and the forms of struggle and alternatives they had devised; further indigenous culture in a coherent and integrated manner rather than through isolated manifestations; facilitate the compilation and dissemination of educational material aimed at strengthening ethnic consciousness; and grant to developing countries the resources needed to guarantee the development of peoples, including minorities.

Other aspects of discrimination

Declaration against religious intolerance

On 25 November 1981, the General Assembly adopted without vote a resolution by which it proclaimed the Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief.<sup>(8)</sup>

The eight-article Declaration proclaimed the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion. It stated that no one should be subject to discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief; that such discrimination should be condemned as a human rights violation; that States should act to prevent and eliminate such discrimination; and that the parents or legal guardians of the child had the right to organize life within the family in accordance with their religion or belief. The Assembly enumerated nine freedoms as included in the right to freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief, and declared that the rights and freedoms set forth in the Declaration should be accorded in national legislations in such a manner that everyone should be able to practise them.

The Declaration was drafted by a Working Group of the Commission on Human Rights, open to all members of the Commission, which completed its work at meetings between 4 February and 5 March 1981. A preliminary draft had been prepared in 1964 by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities,<sup>(10)</sup> and work on the draft had continued in working groups established by the Commission at each of its annual sessions since 1974. Adoption of the draft Declaration was recommended by the Commission on 10 March by 33 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.<sup>(3)</sup>

The Commission's draft was passed on to the Assembly by the Economic and Social Council in a resolution of 8 May, with a recommendation that it be considered with a view to adaption.<sup>(4)</sup> The Council adopted the resolution by 45 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, following approval on 5 May by its Second (Social) Committee by a vote of 45 to none, with 5 abstentions. Following changes in the text as a result of consultations conducted by the Chairman of the Assembly's Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, the Committee approved the revised text without vote on 9 November.

After adopting the Declaration, the Assembly decided to consider further in 1982 the item "Elimination of all forms of religious intolerance".<sup>(5)</sup> This decision was taken, without vote, on 25 November 1981 on the recommendation of the Third Committee where, on 9 November, the 26-nation text, introduced by the Netherlands, was approved in the same manner.

As the text of the preamble, the first four articles and paragraph 1 of article 5 had been agreed on at previous sessions, discussion in the Commission's Working Group in 1981 focused on the remaining part of article 5 and articles 6 and 7. The Group did not adopt the proposed additional articles 8 (to ensure equal rights of citizens irrespective of their attitude to religion, equality of all religions before the law and no coercion to profess or not to profess a religion, and to prohibit the State and church from interference in one another's affairs) and 9 (stating that religion and belief, as used in the Declaration, included religious, non-religious and atheistic convictions), as well as another additional article (stating that nothing in the Declaration would affect, modify or add to the provisions of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights<sup>(7)</sup> or other international instruments relating to the elimination of intolerance and discrimination based on religion or belief).<sup>(2)</sup>

In the Council's Second Committee, an amendment by the Byelorussian SSR<sup>(1)</sup> to have the draft transmitted to States for comments was rejected by 25 votes to 10, with 13 abstentions. Following this vote, the Byelorussian SSR said it would not insist on a vote on a second amendment, which would have had the Council recommend that the Commission consider the draft again in 1982 with a view to adopting it by consensus.

As a result of consultations in the Assembly's Third Committee, amendments were made to five paragraphs of the Commission's text.

In the second preambular paragraph, stating that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights<sup>(5)</sup> and the International Covenants on Human Rights<sup>(6)</sup> proclaimed the principles of non-discrimination and equality before the law and the right to freedom of thought, conscience, religion and belief, the final phrase, "including the right to choose, manifest and change one's religion or belief", was deleted. The third preambular paragraph was amended to insert the word "whatever" before "belief" in the statement that infringement of the right to freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief had brought wars and suffering. The same change was made to article 1, paragraph 1, and in that paragraph the phrase "or to adopt" was deleted from a sentence stating that the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion included freedom to have or to adopt a religion or belief. The phrase "or to adopt" was also removed from article 1, paragraph 2, which had stated that no one should be subject to coercion which would impair his freedom to have or to adopt a religion or belief of his choice. Finally, a new article 8 was added, which stated that nothing in the Declaration should be construed as restricting or derogating from any right defined in the Declaration of Human Rights and the Covenants on Human Rights.

An oral amendment by Indonesia was not acted upon. Stating that religion should never be imposed on anyone, Indonesia suggested that article 1 (2) be amended to add "or any kind of persuasion" to the prohibition against coercion in the choice of religion or belief.

Commenting on the agreed text, Cuba said its participation in the consensus conformed to the principles of religious freedom established in its Constitution. The German Democratic Republic said the Declaration did not embrace the same rights and guarantees for atheism as it did for religious activities. Poland held that it disregarded the rights of persons who did not profess any religion or belief. Czechoslovakia similarly believed that the Declaration lacked balance. Sweden agreed to participate in the adoption of the Declaration without vote on the understanding that it did not restrict already established freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief, including the right to choose, practise or change a religion or belief. Viet Nam stated that any attempt to use religion as a pretext for subversive activities against the Vietnamese task of nation-building must be condemned.

Some States expressed reservations or understandings on particular provisions of the Declaration.

China, speaking of article 5 on the religious upbringing of children, stated its understanding that, under the influence of their parents, guardians or others, children could decide to participate or not to participate in religious activities and, as they grew older, to adopt or not to adopt a religion. Egypt stressed that the Declaration should never be used as a pretext for interfering in a State's internal affairs or be exploited for political ends; it also reserved its position on the mention in article 8 of the Covenants on Human Rights, which it had not ratified. Iraq reserved the position of the members of the Organization of the Islamic Conference on any wording in the Declaration contrary to Islamic law or to any legislation or act based on that law. The Syrian Arab Republic stated that two provisions ran counter to the spirit and letter of its Constitution or to its religious and cultural traditions: article 6 (f), on voluntary financial and other contributions, and article 7, on the incorporation of rights and freedoms in national legislation.

The USSR said it supported the adoption of the Declaration without vote, on the understanding that: protection for freedom of religion and belief included freedom not to profess any religion, to have atheistic beliefs and to propagandize them without restrictions; no one should be subject to discrimination on religious grounds or for holding atheistic beliefs; freedom of conscience presupposed the inadmissibility of using religion to the prejudice of the State, society or its citizens; education was secular in many countries and schools were separate from the church; and no provision of the Declaration could permit interference in the internal affairs of States. Bulgaria made similar points, adding that the Declaration was one-sided in protecting the rights of a certain category of institutions and in enumerating, in article 6, rights that had no importance for a person who had no religion while failing to protect him against intolerance and discrimination and his children against religious propaganda.

Yugoslavia expressed reservations with regard to two provisions: article 6 (b), whose clause on the right to establish and maintain charitable or humanitarian institutions contrasted with Yugoslav law prohibiting religious communities from establishing institutions which did not serve the direct needs of their believers; and article 6 (h), which recognized a right to observe days of rest in accordance with religious beliefs, whereas in Yugoslavia religious holidays were private and the right to days of rest could not be based on them. Romania had reservations on the same provisions and on two others: regarding article 5 (2), on religious education, such education in Romania could be provided only at places of worship; and regarding article 6 (i), on communications in matters of religion or belief, such communications should be conducted in accordance with national legislation.

Speaking during the Committee debate on human rights issues, Ghana characterized the adoption of the Declaration as a milestone in the history of human rights, while Chile thought the Declaration was only a first step which should lead to a convention. The United States said the Declaration not only was in line with the dream of the authors of the Charter of the United Nations and the Declaration of Human Rights, but also was an act of fidelity to those who had entrusted the United Nations with the task of realizing that dream.

The Declaration was supported by a number of States, including Argentina, Australia, Canada, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Ghana, India, Indonesia, Ireland, Jamaica, Japan, Madagascar, Mexico, Morocco, Nepal, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Sierra Leone, Uganda and the United Kingdom (speaking for the European Community members). Malawi welcomed the clause (article 1 (3)) recognizing the freedom to manifest religions and beliefs subject to limitations prescribed by law.

Speaking before the adoption of the changes agreed upon in consultations, most Eastern European countries regarded the text submitted by the Council as unsatisfactory and said further work was needed before it could be adopted. In Bulgaria's opinion, instead of guaranteeing that no one should be subject to coercion which would impair the freedom to have a religion or belief of one's choice, the draft attempted to force societies and individuals that professed non-religious or atheistic beliefs to adopt religious beliefs. The Byelorussian SSR and others believed it better not to restrict the principle of tolerance to religious creeds but to extend it explicitly to atheistic beliefs. The German Democratic Republic also felt the Declaration would have been better balanced if principles governing the relationship between State and church had been laid down in a manner compatible with the situation in each State. The German Democratic Republic, Hungary and the Ukrainian SSR maintained that the Declaration should take into account the situations of different States, while the USSR thought it gave a one-sided interpretation of freedom of conscience.

Iran said the United Nations was a secular body, and secular bodies were not qualified to deal with religious matters; Iran accepted the Declaration in so far as it was in total conformity with Islamic jurisprudence.

Draft Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief

The Economic and Social Council, Recalling General Assembly resolution 3267(XXIX) of 10 December 1974, in which the Assembly requested the Commission on Human Rights to submit, through the Economic and Social Council, to the Assembly a single draft Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief, Expressing its appreciation to the Commission on Human Rights for having concluded the elaboration of a draft Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief, Recommends to the General Assembly that it should consider the draft Declaration annexed to the present resolution with a view to adopting and solemnly proclaiming it, at its thirty-sixth session, as the United Nations Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief.

ANNEX

Draft Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief

[Text as in General Assembly resolution 36/55 below, except for the second and third preambular paragraphs and paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 1, and omitting article 8.]

Considering that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenants on Human Rights proclaim the principles of non-discrimination and equality before the law and the right to freedom of thought, conscience, religion and belief, including the right to choose, manifest and change one's religion or belief,

Considering that the disregard and infringement of human rights and fundamental freedoms, in particular of the right to freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief, have brought, directly or indirectly, wars and great suffering to mankind, especially where they serve as a means of foreign interference in the internal affairs of other States and amount to kindling hatred between peoples and nations,

Article 1

1. Everyone shall have the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion. This right shall include freedom to have or to adopt a religion or belief of his choice, and freedom, either individually or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in worship, observance, practice and teaching.

2. No one shall be subject to coercion which would impair his freedom to have or to adopt a religion or belief of his choice.

General Assembly resolution 36/55

Adopted without vote Meeting 73 25 November 1981

Approved by Third Committee (A/36/684) without vote. 9 November (meeting 43); draft Declaration recommended by Economic and Social Council (resolution 1981/36, annex) as amended following consultations (A/C.3/36/L.45); agenda item 75.

Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief

The General Assembly,

Considering that one of the basic principles of the Charter of the United Nations is that of the dignity and equality inherent in all human beings, and that all Member States have pledged themselves to take joint and separate action in co-operation with the United Nations to promote and encourage universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion,

Considering that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenants on Human Rights proclaim the principles of non-discrimination and equality before the law and the right to freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief,

Considering that the disregard and infringement of human rights and fundamental freedoms, in particular of the right to freedom of thought, conscience, religion or whatever belief, have brought, directly or indirectly, wars and great suffering to mankind, especially where they serve as a means of foreign interference in the internal affairs of other States and amount to kindling hatred between peoples and nations.

Considering that religion or belief, for anyone who professes either, is one of the fundamental elements in his conception of life and that freedom of religion or belief should be fully respected and guaranteed,

Considering that it is essential to promote understanding, tolerance and respect in matters relating to freedom of religion or belief and to ensure that the use of religion or belief for ends inconsistent with the Charter, other relevant instruments of the United Nations and the purposes and principles of the present Declaration is inadmissible,

Convinced that freedom of religion or belief should also contribute to the attainment of the goals of world peace, social justice and friendship among peoples and to the elimination of ideologies or practices of colonialism and racial discrimination.

Noting with satisfaction the adoption of several, and the coming into force of some, conventions, under the aegis of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies, for the elimination of various forms of discrimination.

Concerned by manifestations of intolerance and by the existence of discrimination in matters of religion or belief still in evidence in some areas of the world,

Resolved to adopt all necessary measures for the speedy elimination of such intolerance in all its forms and manifestations and to prevent and combat discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief,

Proclaims this Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief:

Article 1

1. Everyone shall have the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion. This right shall include freedom to have a religion or whatever belief of his choice, and freedom, either individually or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in worship, observance, practice and teaching.

2. No one shall be subject to coercion which would impair his freedom to have a religion or belief of his choice.

3. Freedom to manifest one's religion or belief may be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary to protect public safety, order, health or morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others.

Article 2

1. No one shall be subject to discrimination by any State, institution, group of persons or person on the grounds of religion or belief.

2. For the purposes of the present Declaration, the expression "intolerance and discrimination based on religion or belief" means any distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference based on religion or belief and having as its purpose or as its effect nullification or impairment of the recognition, enjoyment or exercise of human rights and fundamental freedoms on an equal basis.

Article 3

Discrimination between human beings on the grounds of religion or belief constitutes an affront to human dignity and a disavowal of the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, and shall be condemned as a violation of the human rights and fundamental freedoms proclaimed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and enunciated in detail in the International Covenants on Human Rights, and as an obstacle to friendly and peaceful relations between nations.

Article 4

1. All States shall take effective measures to prevent and eliminate discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief in the recognition, exercise and enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms in all fields of civil, economic, political, social and cultural life.

2. All States shall make all efforts to enact or rescind legislation where necessary to prohibit any such discrimination, and to take all appropriate measures to combat intolerance on the grounds of religion or belief in this matter.

Article 5

1. The parents or, as the case may be, the legal guardians of the child have the right to organize the life within the family in accordance with their religion or belief and bearing in mind the moral education in which they believe the child should be brought up.

2. Every child shall enjoy the right to have access to education in the matter of religion or belief in accordance with the wishes of his parents or, as the case may be, legal guardians, and shall not be compelled to receive teaching on religion or belief against the wishes of his parents or legal guardians, the best interests of the child being the guiding principle.

3. The child shall be protected from any form of discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief. He shall be brought up in a spirit of understanding, tolerance, friendship among peoples, peace and universal brotherhood, respect for freedom of religion or belief of others, and in full consciousness that his energy and talents should be devoted to the service of his fellow men.

4. In the case of a child who is not under the care either of his parents or of legal guardians, due account shall be taken of their expressed wishes or of any other proof of their wishes in the matter of religion or belief, the best interests of the child being the guiding principle.

5. Practices of a religion or belief in which a child is brought up must not be injurious to his physical or mental health or to his full development, taking into account article 1, paragraph 3, of the present Declaration.

Article 6

In accordance with article 1 of the present Declaration, and subject to the provisions of article 1, paragraph 3, the right to freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief shall include, inter alia, the following freedoms:

(a) To worship or assemble in connection with a religion or belief, and to establish and maintain places for these purposes;

(b) To establish and maintain appropriate charitable or humanitarian institutions;

(c) To make, acquire and use to an adequate extent the necessary articles and materials related to the rites or customs of a religion or belief;

(d) To write, issue and disseminate relevant publications in these areas;

(e) To teach a religion or belief in places suitable for these purposes;

(f) To solicit and receive voluntary financial and other contributions from individuals and institutions;

(g) To train, appoint, elect or designate by succession appropriate leaders called for by the requirements and standards of any religion or belief;

(h) To observe days of rest and to celebrate holidays and ceremonies in accordance with the precepts of one's religion or belief;

(i) To establish and maintain communications with individuals and communities in matters of religion or belief at the national and international levels.

Article 7

The rights and freedoms set forth in the present Declaration shall be accorded in national legislations in such a manner that everyone shall be able to avail himself of such rights and freedoms in practice.

Article 8

Nothing in the present Declaration shall be construed as restricting or derogating from any right defined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenants on Human Rights.

Elimination of all forms of religious intolerance

At its 73rd plenary meeting, on 25 November 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, recalling its resolution 36/55 of 25 November 1981 by which it proclaimed the Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief, decided to consider further at its thirty-seventh session the item entitled "Elimination of all forms of religious intolerance".

Minorities

At its February/March 1981 session, the Commission on Human Rights, through an informal Working Group open to all Commission members, continued work on a draft declaration on the rights of persons belonging to national, ethnic, religious and linguistic minorities. Basing its work on a revised draft prepared by its Chairman/Rapporteur in 1980, the Group reached preliminary agreement on six preambular paragraphs.<sup>(1)</sup>

On 10 March 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> after receiving the Working Group's report, the Commission decided to establish at its 1982 session an open-ended working group to continue consideration of the revised draft declaration, originally proposed by Yugoslavia in 1978.<sup>(5)</sup>

On 28 October 1981, by its resolution on the activities of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD),<sup>(4)</sup> the General Assembly called on States parties to the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination<sup>(3)</sup> to protect fully, through legislative and other measures, the rights of national or ethnic minorities and of indigenous populations.

During the debate in the Third Committee on racial discrimination, Yugoslavia expressed the view that the adoption of a declaration on the rights of minorities would contribute to the strengthening of international peace and security.

Indigenous populations

On 11 March 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> the Commission on Human Rights expressed hope that its Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities would make recommendations to the Commission on the promotion and protection of the human rights of indigenous peoples, and endorsed the Sub-Commission's request that the Secretary-General assist the Special Rapporteur appointed by the Sub-Commission to study the topic, as authorized by the Economic and Social Council in 1971.<sup>(3)</sup>

The first part of the study was submitted to the Sub-Commission in 1981 by the Special Rapporteur, José R. Martínez Cobo (Ecuador).<sup>(1)</sup> Based on the situation in 37 countries, it dealt with the following aspects: composition of indigenous populations; basic principles, including constitutional provisions and basic legal status; general measures to prohibit, prevent and eliminate discrimination; measures adopted by the United Nations; other international action through conferences and organizations; and language. Conclusions and recommendations were to be submitted later.

On 8 September,<sup>(5)</sup> the Sub-Commission requested the Special Rapporteur to submit the supplementary parts of his final report in 1982, along with conclusions and proposals that were to include draft principles on the rights of indigenous populations.

Also on that date,<sup>(4)</sup> the Sub-Commission, through the Commission, requested authorization from the Economic and Social Council to establish annually a working group on indigenous populations. The group would meet for up to five working days before the annual sessions of the Sub-Commission in order to review developments pertaining to the promotion and protection of the human rights and fundamental freedoms of indigenous populations. It would examine information to be requested by the Secretary-General annually from Governments, specialized agencies, regional intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations, particularly those of indigenous peoples. The group would analyse such materials and submit its conclusions to the Sub-Commission. It would give special attention to the evolution of standards concerning the rights of indigenous populations, taking account of both similarities and differences in the situations and aspirations of such populations throughout the world.

During the debate in the General Assembly's Third Committee on racial discrimination, Australia expressed interest in a proposed study by CERD touching on problems of indigenous peoples (p. 870) and remarked that more thought should be given to defining norms for their special situation, taking their views into account. Denmark, on behalf of the Nordic States, expressed the belief that CERD could make a substantial contribution to promoting and protecting the human rights of indigenous peoples.

Protection of migrant workers

Work continued in 1981 on an international convention on the protection of the rights of all migrant workers and their families (see below), and the Economic and Social Council, in May, requested that studies be carried out on the welfare of such workers (p. 886). In addition, the General Assembly, by a resolution of 28 October on the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination,<sup>(2)</sup> invited Member States, United Nations bodies and specialized agencies to continue efforts to protect the rights of all migrant workers and their families. By another resolution of 28 October,<sup>(3)</sup> the Assembly commended CERD for taking up the problems of discrimination against migrant workers and requested the parties to the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination<sup>(1)</sup> to protect fully the rights of those workers.

The resolution on the Decade, which had been recommended by the Council, was orally amended in the Assembly's Third Committee by Algeria, with a sub-amendment by Morocco. Affecting a preambular reference to the need to promote solutions to discrimination problems facing migrant workers and their families, the amendment added the phrase "wherever such problems exist". The word "problems", proposed by Morocco, replaced "discrimination" in the original Algerian amendment. Morocco, which had originally proposed that the paragraph be qualified by the phrase "in certain parts of the world", felt that, as there were some excellent host countries, it would be appropriate to use less categorical wording.

Speaking in explanation of vote, Kuwait said it found the operative paragraph on migrant workers unsatisfactory. Kuwait and Oman had previously voiced reservations on the original paragraph, observing that the Third Committee was already working on a draft convention on the subject. Yugoslavia responded that migrant workers were victims of discrimination based on race, colour and origin.

Resolutions: GA: <sup>(1)</sup>2106 A (XX), annex, 21 Dec. 1965 (YUN 1965, p. 440); <sup>(2)</sup>36/8, para. 13, 28 Oct. 1981 (p. 868); <sup>(3)</sup>36/12, para. 8, 28 Oct. (p. 873).

Draft convention

ACTION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS. By a resolution of 12 March 1981,<sup>(4)</sup> adopted by 34 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, the Commission on Human Rights welcomed the fact that the Working Group on the Drafting of an International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Their Families established by the General Assembly in 1979,<sup>(7)</sup> had begun work in 1980.<sup>(11)</sup> The Commission expressed hope that the Assembly would complete the elaboration of the convention in 1981.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. By a resolution of 8 May,<sup>(6)</sup> the Economic and Social Council expressed the conviction that the drafting of a convention would facilitate the exchanges of view needed for protecting the human rights and improving the situation of migrant workers and their families. The Council expressed hope that the Working Group would make substantial progress at its May session and that the drafting of the convention would be completed during the 1981 Assembly session. The Council decided to consider at its first regular session of 1982 measures to improve the situation and ensure the human rights and dignity of migrant workers, and to monitor the status of work done to protect the rights of migrant workers and their families.

The Working Group's progress was also welcomed by the Council in a resolution of 6 May concerned mainly with studies on migrant workers.<sup>(5)</sup>

The Council adopted the 8 May resolution, by 50 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, on the recommendation of the Second (Social) Committee, which approved the orally revised draft on 5 May by a recorded vote, requested by Algeria, of 44 to none, with 2 abstentions. The draft was sponsored by 10 nations and introduced by Algeria. As a result of the oral revision by the sponsors, the Council decided to monitor work done with a view to protecting the rights of migrant workers and their families, rather than work relating to the elaboration of a convention, as the original text had provided.

WORKING GROUP ACTION. As authorized by the General Assembly in December 1980,<sup>(9)</sup> the Working Group on the Drafting of an International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Their Families, open to all United Nations Members, held 15 meetings at Headquarters from 11 to 22 May 1981 and 16 meetings from 12 October to 20 November. A preliminary draft convention was presented in May by Algeria, Barbados, Egypt, Mexico, Pakistan, Turkey and Yugoslavia, and proposals for a framework for the convention were submitted by Finland, Greece, Italy, Norway, Portugal, Spain and Sweden.

By the end of its October/November meetings, held during the 1981 Assembly session, the Working Group had provisionally agreed on a 21-paragraph preamble and on 17 articles, on the understanding that this text would be examined further in order to simplify it and adopt a single text in cases where alternative wording remained for some provisions. The Group agreed that part I of the convention would contain, in articles 1 to 6, provisions on the scope of the convention and definitions, while part II would deal with general principles concerning fundamental human rights applicable to all migrant workers and their families. The Group completed the first reading of articles 7 to 23 of part II and postponed the remaining work to its next session.

The Group was unable to adopt a report at its May session owing to lack of time. The Chairman, Antonio Gonzalez de León (Mexico), by a letter of 25 May,<sup>(1)</sup> transmitted to the Secretary-General a draft report he had prepared on that session, together with working papers submitted by participants. Communications proposing amendments to the draft report—sent by Denmark (on behalf of the Nordic States), Italy, the Netherlands, Spain and the United States—were circulated by the Secretary-General in a note of 22 September.<sup>(2)</sup> The report of the Working Group, annexing the provisionally agreed texts,<sup>(3)</sup> was submitted to the Assembly's Third Committee in November.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. After examining the Working Group's report, the General Assembly, by a resolution of 16 December,<sup>(10)</sup> decided that the Group should meet again for two weeks in New York in May 1982 as well as during the 1982 Assembly session to continue and, if possible, to complete its task. The resolution was adopted without vote, following similar approval by the Third Committee on 30 November of a 23-nation draft.

Introducing this text, Mexico observed that elaborating a convention on this subject was particularly difficult because of its complexity and the delicacy of the situations often created by the movements of migrant workers. Nevertheless, there was need for a legal framework to deal with the problems posed by those movements. Above all, it was important to preserve the basic rights of human beings.

The United States, while not opposing the adoption of the resolution without vote, believed that the International Labour Organisation (ILO) should elaborate the convention; it also wondered whether, in view of the administrative and financial implications, the Working Group should hold an inter-sessional meeting. Morocco explained that it had not become a sponsor of the resolution because no mention was made (in the operative paragraphs) of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women.<sup>(8)</sup>

In the Third Committee, the need for a convention to protect the rights of migrant workers was stressed by Argentina, Pakistan and Yugoslavia. The Netherlands said the convention should include provisions reflecting the right of States to determine and apply immigration laws but should not reiterate previously codified civil and political rights, as the current draft sought to do.

Measures to improve the situation and ensure the human rights and dignity of all migrant workers and their families
The Economic and Social Council,

Mindful of the need for international co-operation in solving international problems of an economic, social, intellectual or humanitarian nature and in developing and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion,

Recalling in that regard the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination and of the international Covenants on Human Rights,

Mindful of the contribution made by migrant workers to the economic growth and the social and cultural development of the host countries,

Noting, in particular, that the problems of migrant workers, which are becoming more serious in some regions for political and economic reasons and for social and cultural reasons, constitute a matter of grave concern and continue to be of the greatest importance to certain countries,

Mindful of the important contribution made by the International Labour Organisation in the protection of the rights of all migrant workers,

Appreciating also the efforts of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in matters relating to migrant workers,

Deeply concerned at the fact that, despite the general effort made by Member States, regional intergovernmental organizations and various United Nations bodies, migrant workers are still unable fully to exercise their rights in the social field and in the labour field as defined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,

Emphasizing, therefore, the efforts that must still be made effectively to protect the rights of all migrant workers and their families and to improve their living conditions,

Recalling its resolution 1981/21 of 6 May 1981, recommended for adoption by the Commission for Social Development, and resolution 37(XXXVII) of 12 March 1981 of the Commission on Human Rights,

Recalling its resolution 1980/16 of 30 April 1980,

1. Welcomes the fact that the Working Group on the Drafting of an International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Their Families, established in pursuance of General Assembly resolution 34/172 of 17 December 1979, began its work during the thirty-fifth session of the Assembly;

2. Expresses its conviction that the drafting of that convention will further facilitate the exchanges of views needed for protecting the human rights and improving the situation of migrant workers and their families;

3. Expresses the hope that substantial progress will be made by the Working Group during the inter-sessional meeting to be held in May 1981 in accordance with General Assembly resolution 35/198 of 15 December 1980, so that the Working Group may fully discharge its mandate and complete the drafting of the convention during the thirty-sixth session of the General Assembly;

4. Decides to consider at its first regular session of 1982 the item entitled "Measures to improve the situation and ensure the human rights and dignity of all migrant workers" and to monitor the status of work done with a view to protecting the rights of all migrant workers and their families.

Measures to improve the situation and ensure the human rights and dignity of all migrant workers

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the permanent validity of the principles and standards embodied in the basic instruments regarding the international protection of human rights, in particular in the

Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, the International Covenants on Human Rights and the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women,

Taking into account the principles and standards established within the framework of the International Labour Organisation and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization; and the importance of the task carried out in connection with migrant workers and their families in other specialized agencies and in various organs of the United Nations,

Reiterating that, in spite of the existence of a body of principles and standards already established, there is need to make further efforts to improve the situation and ensure the human rights and dignity of all migrant workers and their families,

Recalling its resolution 34/172 of 17 December 1979, in which it decided to create a working group open to all Member States to elaborate an international convention on the protection of the rights of all migrant workers and their families,

Recalling also its resolution 35/198 of 15 December 1980, in which it renewed the mandate of the Working Group on the Drafting of an International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Their Families and requested it to continue its work, Having examined the progress made by the Working Group during its inter-sessional meeting held from 11 to 22 May 1981 and the contributions of various Governments.

Having also examined the report of the Working Group during the current session of the General Assembly,

1. Takes note of the report of the Working Group on the Drafting of an International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Their Families and expresses its satisfaction with the substantial progress that the Working Group has so far made in the accomplishment of its mandate;

2. Decides that, in order to enable the Working Group to complete its task as soon as possible, the Working Group shall hold again an inter-sessional meeting of two weeks' duration in New York, in May 1982, immediately after the first regular session of the Economic and Social Council;

3. Invites the Secretary-General to transmit to Governments the report of the Working Group so as to allow the members of the Working Group to continue their task during the inter-sessional meeting to be held in May 1982, as well as to transmit the results obtained in that meeting in order that the General Assembly may consider them during its thirty-seventh session;

4. Also invites the Secretary-General to transmit the above-mentioned documents to the competent organs of the United Nations and to international organizations concerned, for their information, so as to enable them to continue their co-operation with the Working Group;

5. Decides that the Working Group shall meet during the thirty-seventh session of the General Assembly to continue and, if possible, to complete the elaboration of an international convention on the protection of the rights of all migrant workers and their families.

Studies on migrant workers

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. By a resolution of 6 May 1981,<sup>(4)</sup> the Economic and Social Council reaffirmed the need to consider the situation of migrant workers in an interrelated manner, and invited Member States to present research findings and government reports to the Secretary-General. It welcomed the progress made by the Working Group on a convention on the rights of migrant workers (p. 884). The Council requested the Secretary-General to include in the 1982-1983 budget comprehensive studies with recommendations on the welfare of migrant workers, and to ensure that reports requested by the Council in 1975<sup>(2)</sup> and 1979<sup>(3)</sup> (on principles concerning migrant workers and their families embodied in international instruments, and on national legislative and administrative regulations) were presented to the Commission for Social Development in 1983. In addition, the Council recommended that the welfare of migrant workers be included in the Commission's 1983 agenda.

The resolution was adopted, by 51 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, which approved the draft on 29 April by a vote, requested by the Federal Republic of Germany, of 48 to none, with 3 abstentions. The draft originated in the Commission for Social Development, which approved it on 17 February.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. Recalling the Economic and Social Council resolution, the General Assembly, on 16 December, reaffirmed the Council's request to include in the 1982-1983 budget studies on questions concerning migrant workers which would take account of, and complement, studies by ILO.<sup>(6)</sup>

The Assembly took this decision, without vote, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, which approved the orally revised draft in the same manner on 1 December. The sponsors were Algeria, Barbados, India, Italy, Mexico, Pakistan, Turkey and Yugoslavia. Mention of ILO studies was added by the sponsors after the United States orally proposed an amendment to have this request met within 1982-1983 appropriations by eliminating an equivalent programme of lower priority. After the draft decision was revised the United States withdrew its amendment.

In a resolution of 18 December on budget and programme matters,<sup>(5)</sup> the Assembly decided not to endorse a June recommendation by the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination<sup>(*)</sup> to delete activities on the welfare of migrant workers from the proposed budget for 1982-1983 on the ground that they would duplicate the work of ILO.

Welfare of migrant workers and their families

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1926(LVIII) of 6 May 1975 and 1979/12 of 9 May 1979,

Conscious of the fact that in certain regions the problems of migrant workers are becoming more serious as a result of current economic trends and related social and cultural issues,

Concerned about the fact that, despite the efforts of Member States and international organizations, migrant workers and their families are, to a great extent, not always able to enjoy all the benefits of the application of the basic principle of equality of opportunity and treatment with regard to their working and living conditions,

Noting that the social provisions of bilateral agreements concluded between labour-employing and labour-supplying countries are often limited to general statements,

Taking into account the conventions and recommendations of the international Labour Organisation concerning migration for employment, migrant workers, migration in abusive conditions and the promotion of equality of opportunity for the treatment of workers,

Recognizing the need for further efforts to improve the welfare of migrant workers and their families as well as the preservation of their identity,

Recalling the World Population Plan of Action, adopted by the World Population Conference, in which, inter alia, both labour-employing and labour-supplying countries were urged, if they had not yet done so, to conclude bilateral or multilateral agreements which would protect and assist migrant workers and safeguard the interests of the countries concerned,

1. Reaffirms the need for the United Nations to consider the situation of migrant workers in an interrelated manner, bearing in mind that the principle of equality of treatment extends to include the living conditions of migrant workers and their families, particularly with regard to housing, health, education and cultural and social welfare;

2. Invites Member States to present existing research findings and governmental reports to the Secretary-General so as to obtain an overall view of the situation of migrant workers and their families;

3. Welcomes the progress made by the Working Group on the Drafting of an International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Their Families, established in accordance with General Assembly resolution 34/172 of 17 December 1979;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to include in the programme budget for 1982-1983 studies on the questions concerned with the welfare of migrant workers and their families, and to undertake those studies in a comprehensive manner to include common recommendations;

5. Also requests the Secretary-General to ensure, taking into account the views of the Governments and organizations concerned, that the reports requested in Economic and Social Council resolutions 1926(LVIII) and 1979/12 shall be presented to the Commission for Social Development at its twenty-eighth session;

6. Recommends the inclusion of the question of the welfare of migrant workers and their families in the agenda of the twenty-eighth session of the Commission for Social Development to permit an exchange of views and to promote further attention to this specific group.

General Assembly decision 36/434

Welfare of migrant workers and their families

At its 101st plenary meeting, on 16 December 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, recalling Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/21 of 6 May 1981 and taking note of the views expressed at the second regular session of 1981 of the Council with respect to the report of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination on the work of its twenty-first session, reaffirmed the request in Council resolution 1981/21 to include in the programme budget of the United Nations for 1982-1983 studies on the questions concerned with the welfare of migrant workers and their families which would take account of, and complement, the studies already undertaken by the International Labour Organisation.

Protection of the human rights of non-citizens

Work continued in 1981 on the drafting of a declaration on the human rights of individuals who were not citizens of the country in which they lived. A Working Group established under a 1980 General Assembly resolution,<sup>(3)</sup> open to all United Nations Members and chaired by Pera Caroline Wells (Australia), held nine meetings between 29 September and 27 November 1981. It provisionally adopted three articles in addition to the two which a similar group had provisionally adopted in November 1980.<sup>(6)</sup> The discussion was based mainly on a revised draft declaration presented in 1979 by a Special Rapporteur of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, Baroness Elles (United Kingdom),<sup>(5)</sup> transmitted to the Assembly by the Economic and Social Council in 1980,<sup>(2)</sup> and on amendments and proposals submitted to the Group by several countries and by the Chair in the light of informal consultations.

In 1981, the Working Group provisionally adopted article 3 of the draft declaration, stating that every State was to make public any laws, regulations or administrative provisions distinguishing between nationals and aliens; article 4, specifying the rights of aliens, including the rights to life, liberty and security of person, protection against arbitrary interference, equal access to and treatment by judicial organs and authorities, choice of a spouse, freedom of thought and religion, retention of language and culture, liberty of movement, travel from the country, freedom of expression, manifestation of religion or belief and freedom of peaceful assembly; and article 5, providing that no alien be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention. Some proposed wording for these articles on which the Working Group did not reach agreement, including the proposed mention of the rights to be reunited with a spouse or other family members, to return to one's country of nationality and to own property, were to be examined further at its next session.

On 16 December, the Assembly adopted without vote a resolution<sup>(4)</sup> by which it took note of the Working Group's report<sup>(1)</sup> and of the fact that, although it had done useful work, it had not had sufficient time to conclude its task. The Assembly decided to establish, in 1982, an open-ended working group for the purpose of concluding the elaboration of the draft declaration and expressed hope that it would be adopted in 1982.

This resolution originated in a draft: by 16 nations, introduced by the United Kingdom, which the Third Committee approved on 1 December, also without vote.

Question of the international legal protection of the human rights of individuals who are not citizens of the country in which they live

The General Assembly,

Bearing in mind Economic and Social Council resolutions 1790(LIV) of 18 May 1973 and 1871 (LVI) of 17 May 1974 concerning the question of the international legal protection of the human rights of individuals who are not citizens of the country in which they live,

Noting Commission on Human Rights resolutions 8(XXIX) of 21 March 1973, 11 (XXX) of 6 March 1974, 16(XXXV) of 14 March 1979, and 19(XXXVI) of 29 February 1980, on the same subject,

Noting also resolution 9(XXXI) of 13 September 1978 of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities,

Recalling that the Economic and Social Council, by its resolution 1980/29 of 2 May 1980, decided to transmit to the General Assembly at its thirty-fifth session the text of the draft declaration on the human rights of individuals who are not citizens of the country in which they live, prepared by the Special Rapporteur of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, the Baroness Elles, and amended by the Sub-Commission, together with the comments on the text received from Member States in response to Council decision 1979/36 of 10 May 1979, and recommended that the Assembly should consider the adoption of a declaration on the subject,

Recalling also its resolution 35/199 of 15 December 1980, in which it decided to establish an open-ended working group for the purpose of concluding the elaboration of the draft declaration on the human rights of individuals who are not citizens of the country in which they live.

Having considered the report of the Working Group.

1. Takes note of the report of the Working Group and of the fact that, although the Working Group has done useful work, it has not had sufficient time to conclude its task;

2. Decides to establish, at its thirty-seventh session, an open-ended working group for the purpose of concluding the elaboration of the draft declaration on the human rights of individuals who are not citizens of the country in which they live;

3. Expresses the hope that a draft declaration on the human rights of individuals who are not citizens of the country in which they live will be adopted by the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session.

Discrimination in the administration of criminal justice

On 9 September 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> the Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities requested its Special Rapporteur, Abu Sayeed Chowdhury (Bangladesh), to continue work on and submit in 1982 his study on discriminatory treatment of members of racial, ethnic, religious or linguistic groups at various levels in the administration of criminal justice, such as police, military, administrative and judicial investigations, arrest, detention, trial and execution of sentences, including the ideologies or beliefs contributing or leading to racism in the administration of criminal justice. The study was authorized by the Economic and Social Council in May 1980.<sup>(2)</sup> A preliminary draft report<sup>(1)</sup> was discussed at the Sub-Commission's 1981 session.

Under the United Nations programme of advisory services in human rights (p. 937), a regional training course on human rights guarantees in the administration of criminal justice was organized at the Institute of Criminology in Canberra, in collaboration with the Government of Australia. It was attended by participants from 19 countries in Asia and the Pacific.

Civil and political rights

International Covenant and Protocol

Accessions and ratifications

As at 31 December 1981, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the Optional Protocol thereto, which were adopted by the General Assembly in 1966<sup>(2)</sup> and entered into force on 23 March 1976,<sup>(4)</sup> had been ratified or acceded to by 69 and 27 States, respectively.

The States which had ratified or acceded to the Covenant (italics indicate those acceding in 1981) were:

Australia, Austria, Barbados, Bulgaria, Byelorussian SSR, Canada, Central African Republic, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Finland, France, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Guinea, Guyana, Hungary, Iceland, India, Iran, Iraq, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Lebanon, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Mali, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Senegal, Spain, Sri Lanka, Suriname, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Kingdom, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Zaire.

The Optional Protocol had been ratified or acceded to by the following States (italics indicate those acceding in 1981):

Barbados, Canada, Central African Republic, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Finland, Iceland, Italy, Jamaica, Madagascar, Mauritius, Netherlands, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Peru, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Senegal, Suriname, Sweden, Trinidad and Tobago, Uruguay, Venezuela, Zaire.

In addition, Senegal made a declaration during the year under article 41 of the Covenant, recognizing the competence of the Human Rights Committee to receive and consider communications to the effect that a State party claimed that another State party was not fulfilling its obligations under the Covenant. A total of 14 parties had made such a declaration: Austria, Canada, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Federal Republic of, Iceland, Italy, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Senegal, Sri Lanka, Sweden, United Kingdom.

The Commission on Human Rights, on 10 March,<sup>(1)</sup> and the General Assembly, on 25 November,<sup>(3)</sup> again invited all States that had not done so to become parties to the International Covenants on Human Rights (p. 933), including the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the Optional Protocol, and invited the parties to consider making a declaration under article 41. They requested the Secretary-General to submit reports in 1982 on the status of both instruments.

Implementation of the Covenant

HUMAN RIGHTS COMMITTEE ACTION. The Human Rights Committee, established under article 28 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights,<sup>(2)</sup> held three sessions during 1981: the twelfth at United Nations Headquarters from 23 March to 10 April, the thirteenth at Geneva from 13 to 31 July, and the fourteenth at Bonn, Federal Republic of Germany, from 19 to 30 October.

During those sessions, the Committee considered reports and additional information submitted by 11 States parties under article 40 of the Covenant, on measures adopted to give effect to civil and political rights and progress made in their enjoyment. The reports were submitted by Barbados, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Mali, Morocco, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal and the United Republic of Tanzania. The Committee also concluded consideration of 13 communications submitted under article 2 of the Optional Protocol to the Covenant<sup>(3)</sup> by individuals claiming to be victims of violations of civil and political rights, and adopted its views on the merits of those cases. The cases concerned Canada (two), Finland (one), Mauritius (one), Sweden (one) and Uruguay (eight). The Committee also discussed matters concerning publicity for its work.

By a decision of 22 July on periodicity of reports, the Committee requested States parties, after the consideration of their initial report (due within a year following the entry into force of the Covenant for each of them) or additional information requested by the Committee, to submit subsequent reports every five years. On 27 July, it adopted guidelines regarding the form and content of reports.

The Committee adopted five general comments on 28 July concerning implementation of the Covenant. In summary, these were:

(1) States should pay immediate attention to their reporting responsibilities, as only a small number of reports had been submitted on time.

(2) Some reports had been too brief and general to satisfy reporting requirements under the Covenant, while others had been incomplete in regard to national legislation, machinery and court decisions.

(3) States not only must respect rights but also must undertake specific activities to enable individuals to enjoy them, including steps to publicize the Covenant and familiarize authorities with its provisions.

(4) In order to help ensure the equal right of men and women to the enjoyment of civil and political rights, laws and measures which inherently drew a distinction between the sexes should be reviewed in so far as they adversely affected those rights, and States should report specific information about all legislative and other measures in that area.

(5) Although the Covenant authorized limited

derogation from certain rights under an officially proclaimed public emergency threatening the life of the nation, it was unclear in a few cases whether a state of emergency had been officially declared, whether rights from which the Covenant allowed no derogation had been affected and whether other States parties had been informed as the Covenant required; measures taken in such situations must be exceptional and temporary, must last only as long as the nation's life was threatened, and must be reported to other States parties and to the Committee.

The fifth annual report of the Committee,<sup>(1)</sup> covering its three sessions between 20 October 1980 and 31 July 1981, was adopted at the conclusion of the thirteenth session and was submitted through the Economic and Social Council to the General Assembly. The Council, on 21 October, authorized the Secretary-General to transmit the report directly to the Assembly.<sup>(5)</sup>

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By its resolution of 25 November on the International Covenants on Human Rights,<sup>(4)</sup> the General Assembly noted with appreciation the report of the Human Rights Committee and urged States parties to submit their reports to the Committee as speedily as possible and to provide additional information when the Committee requested. It also took note of the Committee's decisions on periodicity and guidelines for those reports, as well as of the adoption of general comments. It emphasized the importance of the strictest compliance by States parties with their obligations under the Covenant and the Protocol, and expressed appreciation that the Committee continued to strive for uniform standards of implementation. The Assembly welcomed measures by the Secretary-General to improve publicity for the Committee's work and requested him to report in 1982 on the most appropriate steps for publication of its documents.

During the debate on human rights in the Assembly's Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, France expressed the view that the Human Rights Committee's role in examining national reports was to be concerned with the interests of States rather than with censuring them when it found adverse aspects, and to act as guide and adviser by suggesting measures for remedying shortcomings; in addition, when the Assembly considered the Committee's report, it should avoid going into questions of human rights violations and should concentrate on principles and on the practical ideas contained in the general comments and recommendations, thus contributing to the preparation of a practical guide for States parties. The Federal Republic of Germany considered that a frank and critical dialogue in the United Nations and the co-operation of States with the Human Rights Committee were among the best ways of strengthening respect for human rights.

In Mongolia's view, the Human Rights Committee should bear in mind the existence of different social and economic systems and the wide diversity in levels of development; the achievement of human rights was a long-term process and implementation of the Covenant should be judged accordingly. The USSR said the Committee should continue to work constructively, in a spirit of strengthening friendly relations among States.

Referring to the Human Rights Committee's decision on the periodic reporting procedure, Canada believed it insufficient for States to submit a report once every five years; whenever the Committee had serious reason to believe that certain fundamental provisions of the Covenant had been breached, it should request the State concerned to report urgently on the status of respect for human rights. The German Democratic Republic, however, thought the Committee's decision guaranteed that all States would be treated equally and that ad hoc reports from individual States would not be demanded at random. The Netherlands thought the five-year interval was well chosen because it allowed serious evaluation and the improvement of legislation and enforcement measures. New Zealand and Portugal also endorsed the Committee's decision.

Bulgaria regretted that some Western countries parties to the Covenant maintained their reservations regarding article 20, thus admitting their unwillingness to prohibit war propaganda and propaganda of national, racial or religious hatred. Rwanda was pleased to see the Committee stress that the Covenant applied in emergencies as well as in normal times.

Morocco remarked that any failure by a member of the Committee to live up to the qualities of integrity, impartiality, judgement and discretion might jeopardize the confidence of Governments in that body and provide an easy opportunity for those with interventionist aims. Romania voiced concern at what it called the tendency of certain members to base themselves on documentation other than the legislation and internal practices of States parties, whereas the Committee had been established exclusively to study the reports of States parties.

Italy and the Netherlands expressed the view that the Human Rights Committee's general comments on the reports by States parties should be addressed to individual States; if the Committee was unable to agree on that point, Italy added, the Assembly should provide it with a clear interpretation. The Netherlands and the United Kingdom endorsed the Committee's proposal to have its official records published in annual volumes, the United Kingdom adding that the cost should be met from savings elsewhere in the budget. Uruguay said the Committee should respect the confidentiality of the communications it received under the Optional Protocol and not reproduce them in full in its report; Uruguay was engaged in a dialogue with the Committee and was confident that its procedural errors could be remedied.

Self-determination of peoples

ACTION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS. In the context of its continuing consideration of the right of peoples to self-determination, the Commission on Human Rights, on 6 March 1981,<sup>(4)</sup> reaffirmed once more the legitimacy of peoples' struggle for independence, territorial integrity and liberation from colonial or foreign domination and foreign occupation by all available means, including armed struggle. It demanded the immediate and unconditional release of all people detained or imprisoned as a result of their struggle for self-determination, independence and fundamental rights. The Commission reaffirmed that the use of mercenaries against national liberation movements and States was a criminal act (p. 1216).

Referring to specific instances, the Commission reaffirmed the inalienable right of the Namibians, South Africans and Palestinians, and of all peoples under alien and colonial domination, to self-determination, national independence, territorial integrity, national unity and sovereignty without external interference. It condemned South Africa's massacres of innocent people (p. 944) and aggression against neighbouring front-line States (p. 214), as well as Israel's aggression against Arab civilians (p. 956). It also condemned the policy of States which maintained relations with South Africa (p. 945).

The resolution was adopted by a roll-call vote of 31 to 8 (Australia, Canada, Denmark, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Netherlands, United Kingdom, United States), with 3 abstentions.

The Commission adopted four other resolutions under its agenda item on the self-determination of peoples, concerning Afghanistan (p. 896), Kampuchea (p. 897), Western Sahara (p. 898) and the territories occupied by Israel (p. 955).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 28 October, the General Assembly adopted two resolutions on the right of peoples to self-determination.

By the first of these,<sup>(9)</sup> it reaffirmed the legitimacy of the struggle for independence, territorial integrity, national unity and liberation from colonial and foreign domination and foreign occupation by all available means, including armed struggle. It reaffirmed the inalienable right of the Namibians, the Palestinians and all peoples under alien and colonial domination to self-determination, national independence, territorial integrity, national unity and sovereignty without external interference, and strongly condemned the continued violations of those peoples' human rights. It strongly condemned Governments which did not recognize the right to self-determination and independence of all peoples under such domination, notably those of Africa and the Palestinians. It demanded the immediate and unconditional release of all persons detained or imprisoned as a result of their struggle for self-determination and independence, full respect for their rights, and the observance of prohibitions against torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.

The Assembly called on States to outlaw the recruitment and financing of mercenaries (p. 1216) and called for assistance to peoples under colonial and foreign rule (p. 1100). It condemned South Africa for armed attacks on the front-line States (p. 214), including Angola (p. 221); condemned policies of countries whose relations with South Africa encouraged it to persist in suppressing the people's aspirations; demanded application of the mandatory arms embargo (p. 173); noted with satisfaction the Paris Declaration on Sanctions against South Africa (p. 165); and demanded implementation of the Assembly's resolution of 14 September on a Namibia settlement(s) and the release of imprisoned South African and Namibian children (p. 199). It noted a decision to hold a referendum in Western Sahara (p. 1194) and contacts between the Comoros and France concerning the Comorian island of Mayotte (p. 223). Israeli expansionist activities and bombing of Palestinians were condemned (p. 265), as was Israeli aggression against Lebanon (p. 291). The Assembly also urged support to the Palestinians through the Palestine Liberation Organization in their struggle for self-determination and independence.

This resolution was adopted by a vote of 120 to 17, with 9 abstentions. The Third Committee approved the revised text on 16 October by a vote of 111 to 17, with 8 abstentions, on the basis of a draft introduced by Angola on behalf of the African Group. Paragraphs 18 and 19, on the Palestinians and on Israel and Lebanon, were orally revised twice by the sponsors prior to the Committee's approval of the draft.

After the second revision, Lebanon withdrew two amendments it had proposed. One of these,<sup>(1)</sup> to paragraph 2, would have added to the reaffirmation of the legitimacy of the struggle for independence and other political goals the phrase "without prejudice to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the host countries and peoples of the area". The second amendment<sup>(2)</sup> would have affected the provision on Israel and Lebanon.

By its second resolution on self-determination,<sup>(10)</sup> the Assembly reaffirmed that the realization of the right of all peoples, including those under colonial, foreign and alien domination, to self-determination was fundamental for the effective guarantee, observance, preservation and promotion of human rights. It declared firm opposition to foreign military intervention, aggression and occupation, called for their immediate cessation, and requested the Commission on Human Rights to continue to give special attention to the violation of human rights, especially the right to self-determination, resulting from foreign military intervention, aggression or occupation. The Secretary-General was requested to report on that issue in 1982.

This resolution was adopted without vote, following similar approval by the Third Committee on 16 October, where the draft was introduced by Pakistan on behalf of 16 nations.

The title of the resolution and three paragraphs were orally revised by the sponsors, taking into account some suggestions by Ethiopia. The original title, "Importance of the universal realization of the rights of peoples to self-determination", was changed to "Universal realization of the right of peoples to self-determination". To the international instruments listed in the first preambular paragraph (reaffirming the importance of the right to self-determination for the effective guarantee and observance of human rights), the Assembly's 1960 Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples<sup>(5)</sup> was added. The fourth preambular paragraph, expressing grave concern that millions of people had been and were being uprooted as refugees as a consequence of foreign intervention and occupation, was expanded to include displaced persons. To operative paragraph 1, whereby the Assembly reaffirmed the right of peoples to self-determination, the sponsors specified "all" peoples, "including those under colonial, foreign and alien domination".

The legitimacy of the struggle of peoples under colonial and alien domination to (exercise their right to self-determination and independence by all necessary means at their disposal was again affirmed by the Assembly in a resolution of 1 December 1981 on decolonization.<sup>(11)</sup>

Introducing the draft of the first resolution on behalf of the African Group, Angola said the text was the result of a consensus among the African States. Violations of the human rights of peoples under colonial subjugation and foreign domination, such as in southern Africa and the territories under Israeli occupation, became the concern of all mankind.

Explaining the opposition of the European Community (EC) members to this text, the United Kingdom objected to what it called the allusions to the nature of some States' relations with southern Africa, unbalanced references to the Middle East situation, encouragement of armed struggle, the idea that relations with another State meant approval or encouragement of its policy, and omission of references to flagrant violations of self-determination in Afghanistan and Kampuchea. Also voting against, Israel opposed the inclusion of the two paragraphs condemning Israeli expansionist activities and aggression against Lebanon.

Reservations to specific paragraphs were voiced by several others: by Argentina, Australia, the Bahamas, Bangladesh, Chile, Fiji, Panama, Singapore, Turkey and the United States on paragraph 11, condemning relations of members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and others with South Africa; by Botswana, Lesotho and Swaziland on paragraph 13, taking note with satisfaction of the Paris Declaration on sanctions; by Argentina and Chile on paragraph 14, concerning Namibia; by Panama (paragraph 18), Argentina and Thailand (paragraph 19), Burma, Chile, Costa Rica and the United States on the paragraphs condemning Israel's expansionist activities and aggression; and by Argentina, Australia, Chile, Costa Rica, Fiji and Uruguay on paragraph 2, reaffirming the legitimacy of armed struggle. Portugal stated that isolating South Africa was not the best way to solve the Namibian problem and the apartheid question.

Introducing the second resolution on self-determination, Pakistan said the sponsors were motivated not only by a grave concern over the violation of the right to self-determination but also by the resulting plight of millions of refugees.

Explaining their position on this resolution, Ethiopia and India said the fact they had not opposed its adoption without vote did not imply a change in their position on resolutions on self-determination, for which they had not voted, adopted by the Commission on Human Rights and referred to in the preamble. Ethiopia added that the resolution's title should have included a reference to independence for colonial countries.

Panama said it should have mentioned indirect military intervention, which was the most common form of interference in the internal affairs of States. The USSR considered that the resolution should have contained warnings against imperialists and hegemonists who continued to deny peoples their right to self-determination, interfered openly in the internal affairs of States and sought to repress the liberation movements of oppressed peoples.

Democratic Kampuchea and the United States said they had joined in the consensus because the resolution applied to Afghanistan and Kampuchea. The United Kingdom, speaking for the EC members, said the resolution dealt primarily with situations in which the right of sovereign States to self-determination had been violated by foreign military intervention and occupation.

During the Third Committee's debate on self-determination of peoples, Australia expressed the view that the United Nations and its Members had the responsibility to oppose foreign military intervention, aggression and occupation, which led to the suppression of the right to self-determination and other human rights; the right to self-determination was not confined to colonial situations. A General Assembly resolution of November 1980 on self-determination,<sup>(7)</sup> Canada said, placed the denial of self-determination, traditionally linked to a colonial situation, in the equally legitimate context of foreign military intervention and occupation. The Federal Republic of Germany said it was important for the United Nations to ensure that the old form of colonialism was not superseded by an ideologically motivated neo-colonialism and a new policy of hegemony; implementation of the basic rights of the individual and of the right to self-determination could not be attained one without the other. Whenever illegal force was used internationally, said Greece, the right to self-determination was violated.

Portugal remarked that, in several parts of the world, the right to self-determination was regarded with contempt, and the territorial integrity of States and their right to choose their system of government were blatantly disregarded. The United Kingdom stated that the achievement of independence by over 40 of its formerly dependent Territories demonstrated its attachment to the right to self-determination; if the international community sat by while that right was violated in certain countries, it would contribute to the erosion of the principle of self-determination. The United States said there were two opposed concepts of self-determination: one of them had led the Western countries to renounce their empires, while the other had resulted in the consolidation and expansion of the last remaining empire.

Bulgaria observed that there were about 20 colonial Territories with a total population of 3 million which had not been able to exercise their right to self-determination and independence; the maintenance of Western military bases constituted a further obstacle to that independence. The USSR saw it as intolerable that a significant number of small territories and enclaves still remained under colonialism.

Czechoslovakia stated that fallacious interpretations of the right to self-determination went along with attempts to create artificial problems and to misuse the term for selfish motives in regions where development conflicted with the interests of world imperialism and hegemonism. The German Democratic Republic said imperialist policies violated the right to self-determination and threatened the vital interests of all peoples. Poland voiced dismay at attempts to divert the discussion of self-determination away from the struggle to eliminate all vestiges of colonialism and neo-colonial domination. Romania commented that respect for the sovereignty of peoples was an essential element in the right to self-determination.

The right to self-determination was so generally recognized, said Afghanistan, that even advocates of colonialism, neo-colonialism, aggression and domination shed crocodile tears over the sufferings of oppressed peoples. Iraq stated that any agreement violating the right to self-determination should be considered as null and void. Kuwait considered that no practical measures had been taken to ensure even the partial implementation of United Nations resolutions on self-determination, mainly because the Western countries saw them as an expression of Utopian dreams that could not be realized in the modern world. Madagascar remarked that exercise of the right to self-determination was a prerequisite for the exercise of other rights. Morocco said the Assembly must protect the self-determination of independent peoples and the international community must do all it could to ensure implementation of the right of self-determination of the individual. Viet Nam said the current stage of the struggle for self-determination was marked by attempts by former colonial forces to regain control of the territories they had lost and to impose their own model of society or development.

In Uruguay's view, universal respect for self-determination could not be guaranteed if States did not meet the obligation not to impede exercise of that right by the people of another State or act in any way incompatible with such exercise. Venezuela said the United Nations must encourage the struggle not only against classic colonialism but also against new, subtle forms of pressure exerted by one State against another, particularly in Latin America and the Caribbean.

Some speakers stressed the economic aspects of self-determination. Bangladesh said it could not be universally realized unless the economic and social balance between countries was redressed. The Philippines remarked that economic emancipation was essential in the elimination of political domination. In Hungary's view, the right to self-determination implied the right of peoples to struggle with every means for their liberation and to choose freely their path of social and economic development. In a similar vein, Yugoslavia said the right to development was an important aspect of the right to self-determination; without it, there could be no peace, freedom, progress or prosperity. Zaire called attention to links with the rights to development, to health and to use of natural resources.

Also during the debate, various speakers called for implementation of the right to self-determination in reference to Afghanistan, Cyprus, Kampuchea, Namibia, the Palestinians, South Africa and Western Sahara.

The Secretary-General submitted to the Assembly in September a report<sup>(3)</sup> on action taken, pursuant to a November 1980 Assembly resolution,<sup>(6)</sup> with regard to implementation of the right to self-determination. The report summarized replies received from 18 Governments, two regional intergovernmental organizations and four non-governmental organizations.

Reaffirming that "bantustanization" is incompatible with genuine independence, national unity and sovereignty and has the effect of perpetuating the power of the white minority and the racist system of apartheid in South Africa,

Reaffirming the obligation of all Member States to comply with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and the resolutions of the United Nations regarding the exercise of the right to self-determination by peoples under colonial and alien domination,

Universal realization of the right of peoples to self-determination

The General Assembly.

Reaffirming the importance, for the effective guarantee and observance of human rights, of the universal realization of the right of peoples to self-determination enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations and embodied in the International Covenants on Human Rights, as well as in the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960,

Welcoming the progressive exercise of the right to self-determination by peoples under colonial, foreign or alien occupation and their emergence into sovereign statehood and independence,

Deeply concerned at the continuation of acts or threats of foreign military intervention and occupation, which are endangering, or have already resulted in the suppression of, the right to self-determination of an increasing number of sovereign peoples and nations,

Further expressing grave concern that, as a consequence of the persistence of such actions, millions of people have been and are being uprooted from their homes as refugees and displaced persons, and emphasizing the urgent necessity of concerted international action to alleviate their conditions,

Recalling the relevant resolutions regarding the violation of the right of peoples to self-determination and of other human rights as a result of military intervention and foreign aggression and occupation, adopted by the Commission on Human Rights at its thirty-sixth and thirty-seventh sessions,

Reiterating its resolution 35/35 B of 14 November 1980,

Taking note of the note by the Secretary-General of 1 October 1981,

1. Reaffirms that the universal realization of the right of all peoples, including those under colonial, foreign and alien domination, to self-determination is a fundamental condition for the effective guarantee and observance of human rights and for the preservation and promotion of such rights;

2. Declares its firm opposition to acts of foreign military intervention, aggression and occupation, since these have resulted in the suppression of the right of peoples to self-determination and of other human rights in certain parts of the world;

3. Calls upon those States responsible to cease immediately their military intervention and occupation of foreign countries and territories, and to cease all acts of repression, discrimination, exploitation and maltreatment, particularly the brutal and inhuman methods reportedly employed for the execution of these acts against the peoples concerned;

4. Deplores the plight of the hundreds of thousands of refugees and displaced persons who have been uprooted by the aforementioned acts and reaffirms their right to return to their homes voluntarily in safety and honour;

5. Requests the Commission on Human Rights to continue to give special attention to the violation of human rights, especially the right to self-determination, resulting from foreign military intervention, aggression or occupation;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to report on this issue to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session, under the item entitled 'Importance of the universal realization of the right of peoples to self-determination and of the speedy granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples for the effective guarantee and observance of human rights'.

Afghanistan

On 6 March 1981, the Commission on Human Rights adopted, by a roll-call vote of 31 to 8 (Bulgaria, Byelorussian SSR, Cuba, Ethiopia, Mongolia, Poland, Syrian Arab Republic, USSR), with 3 abstentions, a resolution on the Afghanistan situation<sup>(*)</sup> by which it reaffirmed its most profound concern that the people of Afghanistan continued to be denied their right to self-determination and to determine their own government and choose their economic, political and social system free from outside intervention, subversion, coercion or constraint. The Commission called for the immediate withdrawal of foreign troops and for a political settlement on the basis of full respect for Afghanistan's independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity and non-aligned status, and strict observance of the principle of non-intervention and non-interference.

The Commission appealed for humanitarian assistance to Afghan refugees and affirmed their right to return home. It urged all concerned to work towards a settlement ensuring that the Afghan people would determine their destiny free from outside interference, and to co-operate with the Secretary-General and his Personal Representative (p. 232) in their efforts to resolve the situation. It decided to consider the matter in 1982 with high priority.

By a resolution of 9 September 1981, <sup>(3)</sup> adopted by 19 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions, the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities expressed satisfaction at the call for immediate foreign troop withdrawal from Afghanistan and deep sympathy with and support for the refugees, and called on the Commission to reaffirm the need for a political settlement on the basis set out in its March resolution.

A reaffirmation of the right of the Afghan people to determine their own form of government and to choose their economic, political and social system free from outside intervention, subversion, coercion or constraint was included in a General Assembly resolution of 18 November on the Afghanistan situation.<sup>(2)</sup>

Kampuchea

The Commission on Human Rights, by a resolution of 6 March 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> reiterated its condemnation of gross and flagrant violations of human rights in Kampuchea. It affirmed that the primary violation of human rights there was the persistence of foreign occupation which prevented the people from exercising their right to self-determination. The Commission called for a cessation of hostilities and the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of foreign forces. It called on all parties to join in the search for a comprehensive solution through a United Nations-sponsored international conference in accordance with an October 1980 General Assembly resolution<sup>(2)</sup> and requested the Secretary-General to appoint a Special Representative to assist him in implementing that resolution.

The Commission requested its Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities to review material on human rights in Kampuchea and to submit it to the Commission in 1982, along with recommendations. The Commission recommended that the Economic and Social Council consider the situation with a view to ensuring the full enjoyment of the human rights and freedoms of the Kampuchians, including the right to self-determination, and decided to keep the situation under review in 1982 as a priority matter.

The resolution was adopted by a roll-call vote of 26 to 9 (Bulgaria, Byelorussian SSR, Cuba, Ethiopia, India, Mongolia, Poland, Syrian Arab Republic, USSR), with 6 abstentions.

The Council, on 8 May,<sup>(5)</sup> endorsed the Commission's resolution, welcomed the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General to achieve a peaceful solution in South-East Asia, reaffirmed the Commission's call to all parties to join in the search for a peaceful solution through a United Nations-sponsored conference and noted with appreciation the visit to the area (23 March-11 April) by the Secretary-General's Special Representative. The decision was taken by a recorded vote of 42 to 8, with 1 abstention, following approval by the Second (Social) Committee on 5 May by a recorded vote of 39 to 7, with 1 abstention.

By a resolution of 10 September,<sup>(4)</sup> adopted by 17 votes to 4, the Sub-Commission requested that material on human rights in Kampuchea reviewed by one of its members, Asbjorn Eide (Norway), be transmitted to the Commission on Human Rights in 1982. Endorsing United Nations resolutions on Kampuchea designed to bring about the withdrawal of foreign forces and to enable its people freely to determine their own form of government without coercion or domination, the Sub-Commission reiterated its recommendation that the Commission keep the situation under review.

The right of the Kampuchians to determine their destiny was one of the principal components of a just and lasting resolution to the Kampuchean problem listed by the General Assembly in its resolution of 21 October 1981 on the Kampuchean situation.<sup>(3)</sup>

The right of peoples to self-determination and its application to peoples under colonial or alien domination or foreign occupation

At its 18th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council endorsed resolution 11 (XXXVII) of the Commission on Human Rights, by which the Commission, inter alia, called for the withdrawal of foreign forces from Kampuchea, thus allowing the full enjoyment by the Kampuchean people of their fundamental human rights and freedoms, including the right to self-determination. The Council welcomed the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General aimed at achieving a peaceful solution to the situation in South-East Asia and endorsed the Commission's call to all parties concerned to join in the search for a peaceful solution to the Kampuchean problem through an international conference sponsored by the United Nations in accordance with General Assembly resolution 35/6 of 22 October 1980. The Council noted with appreciation the recent visit to the area by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General.

Western Sahara

On 6 March 1981, the Commission on Human Rights adopted a resolution <sup>(1)</sup> emphasizing the determination of the United Nations to co-operate full with the Organization of African Unity (OAU) with a view to enabling the people of Western Sahara to exercise its right to self-determination and independence. The Commission deplored the continuance of the occupation of Western Sahara by Morocco, preventing the people of that Territory from exercising its right to self-determination and independence and other human rights. It decided to follow the situation closely and to consider it in 1982 as a high-priority matter.

The resolution was adopted by a roll-call vote of 26 to 5 (Iraq, Morocco, Senegal, United States, Zaire), with 11 abstentions.

The General Assembly, by its resolution of 28 October 1981 on the self-determination of peoples, <sup>(2)</sup> took note with satisfaction of the resolution on a general and free referendum on self-determination in Western Sahara, adopted in June by the OAU Assembly of Heads of State and Government, and the decision by the OAU Implementation Committee in August to organize and conduct such a referendum (p. 1193). A resolution reaffirming the right of the people of Western Sahara to self-determination and independence, and reaffirming the determination of the United Nations to co-operate with OAU on the referendum, was adopted by the Assembly on 24 November. <sup>(3)</sup>

Rights of prisoners and detained persons

Capital punishment

Arbitrary or summary executions

The Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities decided on 3 September 1981 to draw the attention of the Commission on Human Rights to the increasing scale of politically motivated executions and recommended that the Commission request the Economic and Social Council to call on Governments to abolish capital punishment for political offences. <sup>(3)</sup>

Pursuant to a December 1980 General Assembly resolution, <sup>(1)</sup> the Council, on 21 October 1981, decided to add the item 'Arbitrary or summary executions' to the 1982 agenda of the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control. <sup>(4)</sup> The decision, orally proposed by the Council President, was taken, without vote.

By a resolution of 9 November 1981, <sup>(2)</sup> adopted without vote, the Assembly condemned summary and arbitrary executions and strongly deplored the increasing number of the former as well as the continued incidence of the latter in different parts of the world. It noted with concern the occurrence of politically motivated executions, urged all States concerned to respect the minimum standard of legal safeguards and again requested the Secretary-General to use his best endeavours in cases where that minimum standard appeared not to be respected. The Assembly invited Member States and organizations to answer the Secretary-General's request for their views on the problem and requested the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control to examine the problem in 1982 with a view to making recommendations.

The resolution was adopted on the recommendation of the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, which approved the 14-nation draft, introduced by Belgium, without vote on 26 October.

Speaking during the debate on human rights in the Third Committee, Norway expressed hope that the Commission on Human Rights would deal with the question of arbitrary or summary executions. The United Kingdom, on behalf of the European Community members, urged States resorting to summary executions to put an end to that practice-an appeal also made by Denmark and expressed particular concern at reports of such executions in Iran. In reply, Iran said it was shocked at the support being given to criminals.

Arbitrary or summary executions

The General Assembly,

Having regard to the provisions bearing on capital punishment in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, particularly its articles 6, 14 and 15,

Recalling its resolution 2393(XXIII) of 26 November 1968, in which it invited Governments of Member States, inter alia, to ensure the most careful legal procedures and the greatest possible Safeguards for the accused in capital cases in countries where the death penalty obtained,

Recalling also its resolution 35/172 of 15 December 1980 on arbitrary or summary executions,

Bearing in mind its resolution 35/171 of 15 December 1980, in which it, inter alia, endorsed the Caracas Declaration, adopted by consensus at the Sixth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, annexed to that resolution,

1. Condemns the practice of summary executions and arbitrary executions;
2. Strongly deplores the increasing number of summary executions as well as the continued incidence of arbitrary executions in different parts of the world;
3. Notes with concern the occurrence of executions that are widely regarded as being politically motivated;
4. Urges all States concerned to respect the minimum standard of legal Safeguards referred to in paragraph 1 (a) of General Assembly resolution 35/172;
5. Again requests the Secretary-General to use his best endeavours in cases where this minimum standard of legal safeguards appears not to be respected;
6. Invites Member States, specialized agencies, regional intergovernmental organizations and relevant non-governmental organizations in consultative status with the Economic and Social Council to answer the Secretary-General's request for their views and observations concerning the problem of arbitrary executions and summary executions;
7. Requests the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control to examine the problem of arbitrary executions and summary executions at its seventh session with a view to making recommendations.

Draft second optional protocol to the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights

The General Assembly, by a resolution of 25 November 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> invited further comments from Member States on a 1980 draft resolution<sup>(4)</sup> proposing measures aiming at the ultimate abolition of capital punishment through the adoption of a second optional protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. The Assembly decided to consider in 1982 the elaboration of such a protocol.

The resolution was adopted, without vote, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, which similarly approved the revised 14-nation draft on 3 November.

Comments on the idea of elaborating a second optional protocol were received in 1981 from 25 Governments in response to a December 1980 Assembly request.<sup>(3)</sup> They were circulated to the Assembly in a report of the Secretary-General.<sup>(5)</sup>

Introducing the draft resolution, the Federal Republic of Germany said that, despite the interest in the Committee, the small number of comments from Governments suggested that the time had not come to take a decision on a second protocol.

Guyana and Morocco explained that their participation in the consensus on the resolution did not reflect any commitment on their part with respect to the substance; Guyana added that it would have abstained if there had been a vote. Singapore declared that its participation implied no change in its position on capital punishment.

During the debate in the Committee, several countries, including Austria, Canada, the Netherlands, Portugal and Uruguay, favoured the universal abolition of capital punishment, while Iran, Japan, the Ukrainian SSR, Zaire and others did not favour this approach. India, while appreciating the humanitarian concerns behind the proposal, thought it premature to take a substantive decision, as most countries had not abolished capital punishment. Norway believed that the idea needed further study and that a decision should be postponed.

Australia thought it necessary to reduce the incidence of capital punishment, eliminate summary executions, progressively reduce the number of capital offences and guarantee the accused the right of due process and appeal. In Austria's view, the proposed protocol would have to be optional to meet legal and other difficulties in a number of States and to give them time to prepare public opinion and adjust legislation. France said it agreed in principle with the proposed protocol. The Federal Republic of Germany was not convinced that the protocol should require States to seek to abolish the death penalty; in the long term the protocol could become universally valid, but its optional character would ensure the decision-making freedom of the countries that had not ratified it. Supporting the elaboration of a protocol, the Netherlands said it would never seek to force Governments which maintained capital punishment to change their position, but it asked them to allow other countries to move towards abolition through a request to the Commission on Human Rights to elaborate a draft.

The German Democratic Republic, on the other hand, thought the preparation of a second protocol would probably raise many problems. Hungary said that, although socialist criminal law advocated the eventual abolition of capital punishment, and in Hungary death sentences were not imposed for economic crimes and crimes against property, the protection of society required the retention of capital punishment for crimes against humanity, the gravest crimes against life and acts of terrorism. Japan believed it inappropriate to create an international instrument which would not be applied uniformly throughout the world and thought the majority public opinion in each country should be fully taken into account; in Japan, the death penalty existed for a very limited number of particularly heinous offences and was regarded as a deterrent. Morocco hoped that those who favoured abolition would refrain from making value judgements on the death penalty, which remained in force in 115 countries for reasons which those States evidently considered valid.

Romania believed that the proposal for such a protocol raised several political and legal difficulties, and that the question should first be studied by the Commission on Human Rights and the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control. The Ukrainian SSR stated that the idea of a second protocol had provoked considerable disagreement; such a protocol would encroach on the prerogative of a State to decide how it would combat crime. Uganda said it considered the death penalty an effective deterrent to crime and it was unlikely that Uganda would be able, at least in the near future, to adhere to any instrument enjoining abolition; however, it did not oppose adoption of a protocol and encouraged all other countries in a position to do so to abolish the death penalty. In Zaire's opinion, any attempt to introduce an instrument to be uniformly applied throughout the world was clearly unwarranted; the issues had philosophical, cultural, historical, religious and legal implications which could not be dealt with superficially without calling into question the principle of autonomy and cultural identity of peoples.

Madagascar said it had eliminated the death penalty except for extremely serious cases; the death sentence had only a deterrent power, as clemency was almost automatically granted by the President. The Philippines explained that, as the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights was under consideration by its Government, it could not be a party to a second optional protocol; however, a bill for abolition of the death penalty was before the National Assembly.

Capital punishment

The General Assembly,

Recalling its decision 35/437 of 15 December 1980,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General,

1. Invites Member States to submit further comments and observations on the draft resolution entitled "Measures aiming at the ultimate abolition of capital punishment (draft Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights)", submitted at the thirty-fifth session of the General Assembly, and requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Assembly at its thirty-seventh session a report containing the views expressed by Governments;

2. Decides to consider at its thirty-seventh session, under the item entitled "International Covenants on Human Rights", the idea of elaborating a draft of a second optional protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, aiming at the abolition of the death penalty.

Treatment of prisoners and detained persons

Draft Body of Principles

A working group open to all members of the General Assembly's Sixth (Legal) Committee, established by the Committee on 22 September 1981, continued work on a draft Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment. The Assembly had decided in December 1980 to establish such a group,<sup>(2)</sup> after an open-ended working group of the Third Committee<sup>(5)</sup> had begun reviewing a draft adopted in 1978 by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities.

The 1981 working group, chaired by Luigi Ferrari Bravo (Italy), held 14 meetings between 12 October and 25 November. Following the example of the 1980 group, which had provisionally adopted six principles and parts of a seventh, it continued to elaborate the principles on the understanding that it would reconsider the texts once definitions had been accepted. Taking up where the earlier group had left off, the working group provisionally adopted two further principles and parts of two others, which were set out in its report.<sup>(1)</sup>

The approved principles included the following: A person who believed that a violation of the principles had occurred or was about to occur would have the right to report the matter to the appropriate authorities (principle 6, paragraph 3); the treatment of detained persons would be appropriate to their unconvicted status and they would be kept separate from prisoners whenever possible (principle 7); arresting, detaining and investigating authorities would exercise only those powers granted by law, subject to recourse to a judicial or other authority (principle 8); and a detained person must be heard promptly by a judicial or other authority and be given the right to defend himself or be assisted by counsel (principle 9, paragraph 1).

On 10 December, the Assembly decided to refer the draft Body of Principles to its 1982 session and to establish another open-ended working group to conclude consideration of the draft.<sup>(3)</sup> The decision was taken without vote following its approval by consensus in the Sixth Committee on 1 December, on an oral proposal by Sweden.

Introducing the draft decision, Sweden expressed hope that it would soon be possible to agree on a complete draft Body of Principles, for which the fruitful work of the Committee's working group would provide a good basis. Sweden believed that the method of work used in 1981, which had proved satisfactory, should be used again.

Draft Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment

At its 92nd plenary meeting, on 10 December 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Sixth Committee, decided:

(a) 'To refer to its thirty-seventh session the draft Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment for further consideration by the Sixth Committee;

(b) To establish, at its thirty-seventh session, an open-ended working group to conclude the consideration of the draft Body of Principles with a view to its adoption by the General Assembly.

Torture and other cruel treatment

Draft convention

Work continued in 1981 in the Commission on Human Rights on a draft convention against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. The General Assembly, in November, requested the Commission to submit a completed draft in 1982.

A working group open to all Commission members, meeting at Geneva from 26 to 30 January 1981 and during the Commission's session until 6 March, provisionally adopted two additional articles and revised or adopted portions of several others which it had considered in 1979<sup>(7)</sup> and 1980.<sup>(8)</sup> The newly approved articles provided for compensation for victims of torture and for the prevention of other acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. The working group did not complete work on two articles relating to extradition and on provisions for implementing the future convention. Sixteen draft articles were transmitted to the Commission in the group's report, which was reproduced in the Commission's report to the Economic and Social Council.<sup>(1)</sup>

The Council, on 8 May,<sup>(4)</sup> authorized a meeting of an open-ended working group for a period of one week prior to the 1982 session of the Commission, to complete work on the draft convention. The resolution was adopted without vote, following its approval by the Second (Social) Committee on 5 May in the same manner.

Adoption of the resolution had been recommended to the Council by the Commission on 10 March. The Commission recognized that it was advisable to continue work on the draft convention in a working group which should meet before its 1982 session and decided to accord high priority at that session to consideration of the draft.<sup>(3)</sup>

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. The Economic and Social Council resolution was welcomed by the General Assembly on 25 November. In addition, the Assembly requested the Commission on Human Rights to complete the drafting of the convention as a matter of high priority in 1982, including provisions for its implementation.

The Assembly adopted the resolution, without vote, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, which similarly approved the 15-nation draft on 3 November. Introducing the text in the Committee, Sweden said that, despite the divergent opinions expressed in the Commission's working group, the sponsors felt that the group could complete its work on the draft in 1982.

During the Committee debate on human rights, the progress made in drafting a convention was welcomed by several countries, including Madagascar, Norway and Uganda. Portugal said the moral commitment to stamp out torture must be backed by a legal commitment; accordingly, the completion of a draft convention should be given highest priority. Bulgaria, Hungary and Madagascar stated that their legislation contained all legal provisions to prevent anyone from being subjected to torture and other cruel treatment. Sierra Leone noted that the Charter of the organization of African Unity prohibited torture and other cruel treatment.

As at 16 October 1981, the Secretary-General had received, in accordance with a December 1980 resolution,<sup>(5)</sup> unilateral declarations against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment from Australia, the Bahamas and Egypt. He transmitted the three declarations in a report to the Assembly.<sup>(2)</sup>

Adopted without vote Meeting 18 8 May 1981

Approved by Second Committee (E/1981/46) without vote, 5 May (meeting 18); draft by Commission on Human Rights (E/1981/25); agenda Item 7.

Draft convention against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 35/178 of 15 December 1980, by which the Assembly requested the Commission on Human Rights to complete as a matter of urgency, at its thirty-seventh session, the drafting of a convention against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, and Economic and Social Council resolution 1980/32 of 2 May 1980, by which the Council authorized a meeting of an open-ended working group of the Commission on Human Rights for a period of one week prior to the thirty-seventh session of the Commission to complete the work on a draft convention against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment,

Considering that it was not found possible to complete the work on the draft convention during the thirty-seventh session of the Commission,

Taking note of resolution 25(XXXVII) of 10 March 1981 of the Commission on Human Rights,

1. Authorizes a meeting of an open-ended working group for a period of one week prior to the thirty-eighth session of the Commission on Human Rights to complete the work on a draft convention against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit to the Commission on Human Rights at its thirty-eighth session all relevant material relating to the draft convention.

Torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment

The General Assembly,

Recalling the Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Being Subjected to Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, adopted by the General Assembly in its resolution 3452(XXX) of 9 December 1975.

Bearing in mind article 7 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

Recalling also its resolutions 32/62 of 8 December 1977, in which it requested the Commission on Human Rights to draw up a draft convention against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in the light of the principles embodied in the Declaration, and 32/63 of 8 December 1977,

Noting that, in its resolution 11 of 5 September 1980, the Sixth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders expressed the belief that the draft convention should be finalized at the earliest possible time.

1. Welcomes Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/37 of 8 May 1981, by which the Council authorized an open-ended working group of the Commission on Human Rights to meet for a period of one week prior to the thirty-eighth session of the Commission to complete the work on a draft convention;

2. Requests the Commission on Human Rights to complete as a matter of highest priority, at its thirty-eighth session, the drafting of a convention against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, with a view to submitting a draft, including provisions for the effective implementation of the future convention, to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session;

3. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-seventh session the item entitled "Torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment".

Draft Principles of Medical Ethics

Following consideration by the Economic and Social Council in May 1981, the General Assembly decided in November to seek further comments from Member States on a revised set of draft Principles of Medical Ethics relevant to the role of health personnel in the protection of imprisoned and detained persons against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

The draft Principles, originally in the form of a draft Code of Medical Ethics, had been endorsed by the Executive Board of the World Health Organization (WHO) in 1979.<sup>(6)</sup> As revised by a group of States during the 1981 Assembly session, principle 1 stated that prisoners and detainees had the same rights as others to the protection of physical or mental health and treatment of disease. Principles 2 to 4 declared it to be in contravention of medical ethics for health personnel to participate in torture or other cruel treatment, to be involved with prisoners or detainees in any relationship other than medical, to assist in interrogation, and to certify prisoners fit for punishment that might adversely affect their health. Principle 5 stated that participation of health personnel in any procedure for restraining prisoners was not in conformity with medical ethics unless it was necessary for health or safety reasons, and principle 6 declared that there might be no derogation from the other principles on any ground.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. By a resolution adopted without vote on 6 May, the Economic and Social Council recommended that the Assembly take measures to finalize the draft Code in 1981.<sup>(2)</sup> The text was approved without vote by the Second Committee on 29 April.

The resolution was sponsored by Denmark (which introduced it), Finland, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Spain and Sweden. They orally revised it by deleting from the operative paragraph the phrase "so as to be able to adopt the draft Code".

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution of 25 November,<sup>(5)</sup> the General Assembly requested the Secretary-General to circulate the revised draft Principles among Member States for further comments and decided to consider the question again in 1982 with a view to adopting them. The draft Principles were annexed to the resolution.

The resolution was adopted without vote, following its approval by the Third Committee on 3 November in the same manner. In response to a suggestion by the USSR, the 14 sponsors orally changed their text to delete a phrase stating that the draft Principles had been revised "in the light of the replies received by the Secretary-General". The USSR remarked that revision of the draft should be the task of all States and not only of the sponsors.

An initial set of comments and suggestions received as at 15 October 1981 from 12 States, a specialized agency and 5 non-governmental organizations was submitted to the Assembly in a report by the Secretary-General,<sup>(*)</sup> as requested by the Assembly in December 1980.<sup>(4)</sup>

Introducing the resolution in the Third Committee, the Netherlands said the sponsors felt it desirable that States should submit further comments so that the Principles could be adopted in 1982. In revising the WHO draft, the sponsors had had the following points in mind: the purpose was the elimination of all forms of torture and inhuman treatment; the Principles should be applicable to both physicians and other health personnel; in general, "health" should be understood to cover both physical and mental health; there should be no escape clause for physicians who contravened the Principles on the pretext of duress; and the Principles should be clear and not need an explanation.

Explaining its position, Guyana said it supported the idea of a code of medical ethics but believed that the draft Principles should be improved; it would have abstained had the resolution been put to vote. Japan asked that its written observations on the draft be taken into account.

Mexico and Morocco voiced reservations on the definition of torture in the footnote to principle 2, on the ground that it would endorse legal sanctions which could cause pain or suffering. The Netherlands responded that this definition had appeared in the Assembly's 1975 Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Being Subjected to Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.<sup>(3)</sup>

During debate in the Committee prior to the revisions introduced by the sponsors of the resolution, a number of countries expressed support for the draft Code. Madagascar said its adoption would be an important step towards establishing international norms, while Portugal viewed it as an important part of the struggle to eliminate torture. Australia and New Zealand also favoured its adoption.

Several countries were critical of aspects of the original WHO draft. Bulgaria, though welcoming the idea of a code, thought its principles needed further work to ensure that it reflected more fully the common interests of States. Hungary declared its full support but said the draft Principles could not be accepted in their current form. Uganda believed the draft required further study and harmonization; in particular, the emphasis on physicians rendered it difficult to make the code applicable to all medical and paramedical workers, and the inclusion of the concept of duress raised some complex issues, since in certain cases the subjective application of that concept could negate some of the basic premises of the Code. Sierra Leone considered that the Code should apply to all medical personnel, not only to doctors. Cuba suggested the insertion of a paragraph stating that medical ethics, by its very nature, was opposed to any form of torture or other cruel treatment.

Draft Code of Medical Ethics

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 35/179 of 15 December 1980, in which the Assembly requested the Economic and Social Council to consider the draft Code of Medical Ethics, taking into account the comments and recommendations submitted, with a view to presenting the draft Code to the Assembly,

Recalling also resolution 11 of the Sixth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, in which the hope was expressed that the General Assembly would adopt the draft Code, subject to any amendments which might appear to be necessary,

Taking note of the revised report of the Secretary-General requested in General Assembly resolution 35/179,

Convinced that the adoption of a code of medical ethics constitutes an important step in the progressive setting of international standards within the field of human rights, Recommends that the General Assembly should take measures to finalize the draft Code of Medical Ethics at its thirty-sixth session.

General Assembly resolution 36/61

Adopted without vote Meeting 73 25 November 1981

Approved by Third Committee (A/36/685) without vote. 3 November (meeting 38): 14-nation draft (A/C.3/36/L.38). orally amended by USSR and orally revised; agenda item 91 (b).

Draft Code of Medical Ethics

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Being Subjected to Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, as unanimously adopted in General Assembly resolution 3452(XXX) of 9 December 1975,

Recalling its resolution 31/85 of 13 December 1976, in which it invited the World Health Organization to prepare a draft code of medical ethics relevant to the protection of persons subjected to any form of detention or imprisonment against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment,

Expressing its appreciation to the Executive Board of the World Health Organization which, at its sixty-third session in January 1979, endorsed the principles set forth in a report entitled "Development of codes of medical ethics" containing, in an annex, a draft body of principles prepared by the council for International Organizations of Medical Sciences and entitled "Principles of medical ethics relevant to the role of health personnel in the protection of persons against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment",

Recalling also resolution 11 adopted on 5 September 1980 by the Sixth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, in which the Congress expressed the hope that the General Assembly would adopt the draft Code, subject to any amendments which might appear to be necessary,

Taking note with appreciation of the Guidelines for Medical Doctors concerning Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment in relation to Detention and Imprisonment, adopted by the twenty-ninth World Medical Assembly, held in Tokyo in October 1975,

Bearing in mind Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/27 of 6 May 1981, in which the Council recommended that the General Assembly should take measures to finalize a draft Code at its thirty-sixth session,

Recognizing that throughout the world significant medical activities are increasingly being performed by health personnel other than physicians, such as physicians' assistants, physical therapists and nurse practitioners,

Alarmed that not infrequently members of the medical profession or other health personnel are engaged in activities which are difficult to reconcile with medical ethics,

Convinced of the need to set standards in this field which ought to be implemented by members of the medical profession and other health personnel as well as by government officials,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the comments on the proposed principles of medical ethics endorsed by the Executive Board of the World Health Organization which were received by the Secretary-General from Governments, specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to circulate among Member States for their further comments the revised draft principles of medical ethics set forth in the annex to the present resolution;

3. Decides to consider this question at its thirty-seventh session with a view to adopting the draft Principles of Medical Ethics relevant to the role of health personnel in the protection of persons against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

ANNEX

Draft Principles of Medical Ethics relevant to the role of health personnel in the protection of persons against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment:

1. Prisoners and detainees have the same rights to the protection of physical or mental health and the treatment of disease as those who are not in prison or detained.

2. It is a gross contravention of medical ethics for health personnel, in particular physicians, having clinical responsibility for prisoners or detainees, to engage, actively or passively, in acts which constitute participation in, complicity in, incitement to or attempts to commit, torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.*

3. It is a contravention of medical ethics for health personnel, in particular physicians, to be involved in any relationship with prisoners or detainees that is not a medical relationship in the sense that its purpose is the protection or improvement of the physical or mental health of the prisoner or detainee.

4. It is also a contravention of medical ethics for health personnel, in particular physicians:

(a) To apply their knowledge and skills in order to assist in methods of interrogation;

(b) To certify prisoners or detainees fit for any form of punishment that may adversely affect physical or mental health.

5. Participation of health personnel, in particular physicians, in any procedure for restraining prisoners or detainees, is not in conformity with medical ethics unless it is determined by purely medical criteria in a manner which presents no hazard to the health of prisoners or detainees and is necessary for the physical or mental health and safety of the prisoner himself and/or of his fellow prisoners or detainees or of his guardians.

6. There may be no derogation from the foregoing principles on any ground whatsoever, including public emergency.

* For the purpose of the present Declaration, torture means any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted by, or at the instigation of, a public official on a person for such purposes as obtaining from him or a third person information or confession, punishing him for an act he has committed or is suspected of having committed, or intimidating him or other persons; it does not include pain or suffering arising only from. Inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions to the extent consistent with the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners. Torture constitutes an aggravated and deliberate form of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

UN Voluntary Fund for Victims of Torture

The General Assembly, on 16 December 1981,<sup>(7)</sup> decided to extend the mandate of the United Nations Trust Fund for Chile, established in 1978,<sup>(6)</sup> so that it could receive voluntary contributions for distribution, through established channels of assistance, as humanitarian, legal and financial aid to victims of torture and their relatives. Priority was to be given to aiding victims of violations by States in which the human rights situation had been the subject of United Nations resolutions. The Trust Fund was redesignated as the United Nations Voluntary Fund for Victims of Torture, to be administered by the Secretary-General with the advice of a Board of Trustees. The Assembly adopted arrangements proposed by the Secretary-General for the Fund's management, authorized the Board to solicit contributions and appealed to Governments to respond to requests for contributions.

The resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 96 to 15, with 33 abstentions, following its approval by the Third Committee on 30 November by 73 votes to 17, with 40 abstentions.

The resolution originated in the Commission on Human Rights, which approved it on 11 March along with a recommendation to the Economic and Social Council that the Secretary-General be requested to submit to the Council in 1982 proposals on the Fund's management.<sup>(4)</sup> On 8 May,<sup>(5)</sup> by 33 votes to 5, with 11 abstentions, the Council recommended that the Assembly adopt the Commission's draft but, as the result of an oral amendment by Denmark approved without vote, it altered the accompanying request to ask that proposals on management be submitted to the Assembly in 1981 rather than to the Council in 1982.

The draft was approved on 5 May by the Second Committee by 34 votes to 5, with 10 abstentions, after it rejected, by 23 votes to 8, with 16 abstentions, amendments by the USSR designed to maintain the existing title and mandate of the Fund.<sup>(1)</sup> The amendments would have retained the emphasis on Chile while having the Assembly decide to study the possibility of using the Fund to assist torture victims generally.

The Assembly's attention was drawn to the Council resolution by the Secretary-General in a report of 30 September.<sup>(3)</sup>

The Secretary-General's proposals on the Fund's management, annexed to a note of 29 September<sup>(2)</sup> and approved by the Assembly in its December resolution, covered solicitation and acknowledgement of pledges, collection of contributions, Secretariat arrangements for operation and control, and reporting. It provided for submission to the Assembly and the Commission on Human Rights of an annual report on available funds, contributions and expenditures.

Explaining its opposition to the resolution in the Third Committee, the Ukrainian SSR said it ran counter to the original aim of the Fund, which was to help the victims of Chilean reactionaries.

The USSR said that, at a time when the human rights situation in Chile was continuing to deteriorate, conversion of the Trust Fund for Chile into a Fund for Victims of Torture would hamper United Nations efforts; establishment of such a fund would be an implicit recognition that torture was a normal, everyday occurrence. Viet Nam also found such conversion inadvisable, as did the Byelorussian SSR, which said it would run counter to all Assembly resolutions on human rights and would lead to a decrease in assistance to the victims of the Chilean junta.

Mexico and Yugoslavia said their abstentions in the Committee vote (Mexico voted affirmatively in the Assembly) did not imply opposition to a Fund for Victims of Torture; however, they could not support the abolition of the Trust Fund for Chile.

Explaining its vote for the resolution, Costa Rica said it recognized the humanitarian nature of assistance to all torture victims. Denmark, also speaking on behalf of Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden, described the resolution as an important step in United Nations endeavours to protect the human rights of the individual. The Netherlands, though regretting that the creation of such a fund was necessary, said it had always supported the idea of transforming the Trust Fund for Chile into a more general fund. New Zealand saw the establishment of the Fund as a practical step towards alleviating the situation of victims and helping them resume a normal life.

During the debate in the Committee, Australia said the establishment of the Fund was indicative of the potential of the United Nations to direct resources to areas of genuine humanitarian need. The United Kingdom, speaking for the European Community members, hoped the Committee would support the provision of humanitarian assistance to victims of torture and their relatives, torture being one of the worst human rights violations.

Taking note of resolution 35(XXXVII) of 11 March 1981 of the Commission on Human Rights.

1. Recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of the following draft resolution:

[Text as in General Assembly resolution 36/151 below.]

Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its thirty-sixth session specific proposals for the arrangements for the management of the fund in accordance with the principles set forth in paragraph 1 (a) of the draft resolution recommended for adoption by the General Assembly.

96-15-33 (recorded vote) Meeting 101 16 December 1981

Approved by Third Committee (A/36/792) by vote (73-17-40), 30 November (meeting 66): draft recommended by Economic and Social Council (resolution 1981/39); agenda item 12.

United Nations Voluntary Fund for Victims of Torture
The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 33/174 of 20 December 1978, by which it established a United Nations Trust Fund for Chile as a voluntary fund to receive contributions and distribute humanitarian, legal and financial aid to persons whose human rights had been violated by detention or imprisonment in Chile,

Recalling also its resolution 35/190 of 15 December 1980, by which it requested the Commission on Human Rights to study the possibility of extending the mandate of the United Nations Trust Fund for Chile,

Taking note of Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/39 of 8 May 1981 and Commission on Human Rights resolution 35(XXXVII) of 11 March 1981,

Noting that all Governments have an obligation to respect and promote human rights in accordance with the responsibilities they have undertaken under various international instruments,

Noting with deep concern that acts of torture take place in various countries.

Considering the plight of victims of torture wherever it takes place,

Recognizing the need to provide assistance to the victims of torture in a purely humanitarian spirit.

1. Decides:

(a) To extend the mandate of the United Nations Trust Fund for Chile, established by General Assembly resolution 33/174, in order to make it capable of receiving voluntary contributions for distribution, through established channels of assistance, as humanitarian, legal and financial aid to individuals whose human rights have been severely violated as a result of torture and to relatives of such victims, priority being given to aid to victims of violations by States in which the human rights situation has been the subject of resolutions or decisions adopted by either the Assembly, the Economic and Social Council or the Commission on Human Rights;

(b) To redesignate the United Nations Trust Fund for Chile as United Nations Voluntary Fund for Victims of Torture;

(c) That the United Nations Voluntary Fund for Victims of Torture shall be administered in accordance with the Financial Regulations of the United Nations by the Secretary-General, with the advice of a Board of Trustees of the Fund, composed of a chairman and four members with wide experience in the field of human rights, acting in their personal capacity, to be appointed by the Secretary-General with due regard to equitable geographical distribution and in consultation with their Governments;

(b) To adopt the arrangements for the management of the Fund set forth in the annex to the report of the Secretary-General;

(e) To authorize the Board of Trustees of the Fund to promote and solicit contributions and pledges;

(f) To request the Secretary-General to give the Board of Trustees of the Fund all the assistance it may require:

2. Appeals to all Governments to respond favourably to requests for contributions to the Fund.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Barbados, Belgium, Benin, Bolivia, Botswana, Burundi, Canada, Chad, Chile, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cyprus, Democratic Yemen,<sup>1</sup> Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, Iran, Iraq,<sup>2</sup> Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Japan, Kenya, Lesotho, Liberia, Luxembourg, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Morocco, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Norway, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Portugal, Qatar,<sup>3</sup> Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Spain, Sudan, Sweden, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, United Republic of Cameroon, United Republic of Tanzania, United States, Upper Volta, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Abstaining: Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Belize, Bhutan, Brazil, Burma, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, China, India, Indonesia, Jordan, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malaysia, Mozambique, Nepal, Oman, Pakistan, Paraguay, Philippines, Romania, Singapore, Sri Lanka, Suriname, Swaziland, Syrian Arab Republic, Uruguay, Yugoslavia, Zaire.

Detention on grounds of mental illness

A preliminary report on a study of guidelines, principles and guarantees for the protection of persons detained on grounds of mental ill-health or suffering from mental disorder was examined in 1981 by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, which had entrusted the study in September 1980 to one of its members, Erica-Irene A. Daes (Greece).<sup>(4)</sup> On 10 September 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> the Sub-Commission requested Mrs. Daes, as Special Rapporteur for the study, to submit her final report in 1982, including a draft body of guidelines related to procedures for determining whether adequate reasons existed for detaining persons on grounds of mental ill-health or mental disorder, principles for the treatment and protection of persons suffering from mental disorder, and guarantees for protection of the human rights of persons suffering from mental disorder.

By a resolution of 25 November 1981, adopted without vote,<sup>(2)</sup> the General Assembly requested the Commission on Human Rights to continue considering the protection of those detained on grounds of mental ill-health, in the light of the action being taken by the Sub-Commission, with a view to submitting a report to the Assembly in 1983, through the Economic and Social Council.

The Third Committee approved the 15-nation draft, orally amended by India, on 3 November, also without vote. The amendment, accepted by the sponsors, replaced a preambular paragraph by which the Assembly would have expressed concern at reports from several parts of the world of persons being detained in mental institutions on account of their political views and on other non-medical grounds with a paragraph by which the Assembly expressed conviction that detention of persons in medical institutions on account of their political views or on other non-medical grounds was a violation of their human rights.

Introducing the resolution in the Committee under its agenda item on human rights and scientific and technological developments (p. 976), the United Kingdom said the benefits and abuses produced by such developments should be considered together, and it was the task of Governments and the international community to maximize the benefits and avert the abuses. The text referred to no specific situations and made no reference to the 1981 Sub-Commission resolution on the item. The sponsors hoped it would be viewed from a strictly humanitarian point of view.

During the human rights debate in the Committee, the United States cited reports of what it called serious violations in the USSR of the human rights of some of its citizens through abuse of psychiatric treatment during detention, including the administration of drugs to healthy persons. The USSR rejected the statement and asserted that United States authorities kept thousands of innocent people in psychiatric hospitals and prisons, where they were forced to participate in experiments to test chemicals and poisons.

The General Assembly.

Recalling its resolution 33/53 of 14 December 1978, in which it requested the Commission on Human Rights to urge the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities to undertake as a matter of priority a study of the question of the protection of those detained on the grounds of mental ill-health with a view to formulating guidelines,

Recalling also its resolution 35/130 B of 11 December 1980, in which it welcomed the action taken by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities to implement General Assembly resolution 33/53,

Convinced that detention of persons in mental institutions on account of their political views or on other non-medical grounds is a violation of their human rights,

Noting with satisfaction the work being undertaken by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities on this subject in accordance with General Assembly resolutions 33/53 and 35/130 B,

Requests the Commission on Human Rights to continue its consideration of this question in the light of the action being taken by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, with a view to submitting a report to the General Assembly at its thirty-eighth session, through the Economic and Social Council.

Extradition of Ziad Abu Eain

In 1981, the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly appealed for the release of the Palestinian Ziad Abu Eain, who was extradited to Israel in December 1981 from the United States.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. On 8 May 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> the Economic and Social Council appealed to the United States to release Mr. Abu Eain. It stated that he had been illegally detained in a United States prison for over a year, that the sole basis for "probable cause" against him was a statement in Hebrew made by a person in Israeli custody and that no United States court would sustain a trial on the basis of such "evidence".

This resolution, sponsored by Algeria, Iraq, Jordan, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Morocco and the Sudan, was adopted by a recorded vote of 24 to 14, with 12 abstentions. Algeria requested an immediate vote while Iraq asked that it be recorded.

A motion by the United States not to take a decision on the resolution was rejected by 22 votes to 18, with 12 abstentions. Introducing the motion, the United States remarked that rule 54 of the Council's rules of procedure, requiring that proposals be circulated in writing 24 hours before they were put to the vote, had not been respected. The United States considered the resolution unacceptable also by reason of its contents, as the preamble was tendentious and distorted the facts, while the operative paragraph attacked the integrity of United States judicial processes and its fulfilment of treaty obligations. Mr. Abu Eain had been charged with planting a bomb in a market (on 14 May 1979 at Tiberias, Israel), causing death to two civilians and injury to 30. Israel had applied to the United States for his extradition and the issue was before United States courts.

Spain explained that it had voted for the motion in the light of rule 54; once 24 hours had elapsed, the question could be considered on humanitarian grounds by other appropriate bodies.

Explaining the negative votes on the resolution cast by the members of the European Community (EC), the United Kingdom said they had not had time to study the case, which involved complex legal and constitutional issues; the Council should not act so quickly and on the basis of so little information, especially since the case was subject to normal judicial proceedings.

Brazil and Cyprus, though voting in favour, said their support of the text did not imply any judgement of the United States legal and judicial system; Cyprus added that it would have preferred a different wording and that its positive vote should be interpreted as an appeal. The USSR said it had cast a positive vote because it believed that the text concerned a further flagrant violation by Israel of the human rights of the Arab Palestinians.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 16 December, four days after the extradition of Mr. Abu Eain from the United States to Israel, the Assembly adopted a resolution<sup>(3)</sup> by which it strongly deplored this action and demanded that he be immediately released and that the United States, being responsible for his safety, facilitate his safe transfer to the country of his choice. It requested the Secretary-General to report by 31 December on implementation of the resolution and decided to retain the item on its agenda. The preamble described Mr. Abu Eain as a Palestinian national from occupied Palestinian territory and a Jordanian citizen, illegally detained in prison in the United States for over two years. It added that the sole basis for "probable cause" against him had been a statement in Hebrew extracted from a person in Israeli custody with no knowledge of that language and whose statement had later been recanted.

The resolution, sponsored by 20 Arab States and introduced by Kuwait, was adopted by a recorded vote of 75 to 21, with 43 abstentions.

During debate in the Assembly and the Third Committee, Jordan said the detention of Mr. Abu Eain set a dangerous precedent for the United States judicial process and universal norms of human rights. Although a Palestinian from the occupied West Bank, Mr. Abu Eain was legally a citizen of Jordan; the imprisonment of a national of a third country, Jordan, at the request of a second party, Israel, on the basis of a treaty between the United States and Israel, was tantamount to the taking of a hostage; it was unprecedented for someone to be extradited to a State other than his own. Since the West Bank was Jordanian territory, the trial of Mr. Abu Eain under Israeli laws would be unlawful and a human rights violation. The United States court had not considered testimony by 11 witnesses that Mr. Abu Eain had been at Ramallah, more than 120 miles from Tiberias, when the explosion occurred; the only contrary witness had been forced to sign a paper in Hebrew, a language which he did not understand, and had later retracted his incrimination.

The United States opposed the resolution as an unwarranted and misguided disparagement of the American judicial system. It said Israel's request for extradition had been independently and impartially reviewed at three levels of the United States judiciary, up to the Supreme Court, before the Secretary of State had authorized extradition. The United States frequently extradited fugitives to stand trial in countries of which they were not nationals. Regarding the statement in Hebrew mentioned in the preamble, evidence had been presented to the effect that its author understood the statement and had made it freely; the allegation that he had recanted should be considered at the trial. The resolution disregarded the procedural rights of due process accorded to Mr. Abu Eain, misrepresented the nature of the evidence on which probable cause had been found for the belief that he had committed the crimes for which extradition was requested, and took a cavalier attitude towards the international consequences of treating terrorist acts as "political". Mr. Abu Eain was assured a fair trial in an Israeli civilian court.

Israel rejected the Assembly resolution as an intervention in matters within its domestic jurisdiction. It expressed surprise that a certain group of States should preoccupy and pre-empt the Assembly's time in the case of a single individual accused of terrorist murder, whose legal rights were fully guaranteed, and at a time when millions of people were systematically deprived of human rights. Israel would not go into the substance of the matter, since it was sub judice.

Austria explained that it had cast a negative vote mainly for legal reasons; it could not subscribe to a text that implied criticism of the judicial system of a Member State and considered that the third and fourth preambular paragraphs (relating to details of the case) were not fully consistent seemed unbalanced. Denmark (speaking also for Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden) and the Netherlands, although sympathizing with the raising of humanitarian issues in the Assembly and other United Nations organs, found some judgements and views contained in the text unacceptable. The Federal Republic of Germany made the same point, objecting to the implied endorsement of armed struggle, the criticism of the United States judicial system, the allegation that Mr. Abu Eain had been detained illegally in the United States and the appeal to the United States to facilitate his safe transfer to the country of his choice.

Ireland found it particularly unacceptable that the resolution characterized the proceedings of the United States Administration and courts as illegal, and found it unwarranted that the Assembly strongly deplored the United States actions; also, the act of violence had occurred within Israeli boundaries and not in the occupied territories, as the text might imply. The United Kingdom said it voted against the text principally because it contained immoderate and unjustified attacks on the handling of the case in the United States in accordance with established procedures; had the resolution been directed at humanitarian aspects, the United Kingdom position would have been different.

Basing its negative vote on legal grounds, Costa Rica advanced several arguments: that the United Nations had repeatedly refused to consider individual human rights violations, that it was counter to the principle of non-intervention to assume that the Assembly could express a judgement, that the case concerned a person accused of a common crime and that the United States had obtained guarantees from Israel regarding the trial of the accused.

Explaining its abstention in the vote, Chile said its policy was not to express a judgement on judicial matters exclusively within the internal jurisdiction of States. Saint Lucia said that, while the United States had acted on proper grounds in honouring the extradition agreement, the nature of the act was not without political content; the Assembly was not a law court, but was the custodian of the legitimate rights and interests of all States and peoples.

France recalled its opposition in principle to the extradition of persons persecuted for political reasons but said the Assembly should not pronounce on the case of Mr. Abu Eain, if only because it lacked the necessary information. Greece thought the text raised complex and delicate legal questions and might be construed as interference in a State's judiciary system; however, Greece hoped that the United States would exercise its influence to make sure that Mr. Abu Eain was given a fair trial and that his human and legal rights were safeguarded. Spain abstained on the ground that the contradictory allegations were difficult to verify in a political forum such as the Assembly, which was not in a position to evaluate judicial cases; moreover, the resolution seemed to call into question the United States judicial system. Turkey said that, while it could not but oppose terrorist acts, especially against civilians, it did not have all the necessary information about the case and did not believe matters pertaining to national court decisions could be discussed by the United Nations.

Voting in favour, Bangladesh said it was not fully conversant with the facts and legal background of the case; however, in the well-known context of Israeli actions in respect of the Arab countries and the cause of the Palestine Liberation Organization, Bangladesh recognized the humanitarian appeal of the resolution. India said that, given Israel's record with regard to the treatment of Arabs and Palestinians in the occupied territories and its general attitude of not respecting international opinion and convention, there was reason to be concerned, on humanitarian grounds, about Mr. Abu Eain's treatment. The USSR said it had voted for the resolution because it dealt with a manifestation of the flagrant and massive violation of human rights by Israeli authorities in the occupied Arab territories and the United States encouragement of that policy.

Prior to the extradition, Jordan submitted to the Third Committee on 28 October a draft decision, revised the following day, by which the Assembly would have requested its President to communicate on its behalf to the United States the concerns expressed on behalf of Mr. Abu Eain and to appeal that he not be extradited to Israel.<sup>(1)</sup> This proposal, submitted in connection with the agenda item on torture and other cruel treatment (p. 901), was subsequently withdrawn. Jordan later told the Assembly that it had not pressed for action at that time because it had thought it could save Mr. Abu Eain's life through quiet diplomacy.

When Jordan raised this issue in the Committee, the United States asked that it be ruled out of order on the ground that the issue was a domestic matter that did not fall within the scope of the item on torture. The Chairman responded that the United Nations Legal Counsel had advised him that it would not be appropriate for Jordan to raise the case under that item. However, in a roll-call vote requested by the United States, the Committee decided, by 65 votes to 19, with 31 abstentions, to approve a motion by Jordan to allow its statement to be heard.

Explaining their negative votes on this motion, Australia, Austria, Denmark, Ireland, Liberia and Sweden said they had voted on procedural grounds on the basis of the Legal Counsel's findings. The United States said its objections had been procedural, because the matter could have been taken up under another item.

Among those voting to allow Jordan to be heard, Cuba and Democratic Yemen said they wanted the case to be discussed. The Syrian Arab Republic stated that representatives had never required permission from the Committee before explaining cases of human rights violations. The United Arab Emirates said the United States should endeavour to ensure freedom of speech in the United Nations. Spain and the Upper Volta said they had taken a procedural stand without reference to the substance of the matter.

In the Committee debate, the Syrian Arab Republic said that, presumably, an Arab could not get a fair hearing in United States courts when the interests of Israel were at stake.

On 18 December, in deciding to resume its 1981 session at a date to be announced, the Assembly listed the question of human rights relating to the case of Mr. Abu Eain among the topics to be taken up when it resumed.<sup>(4)</sup>

Human fights questions: the case of Ziad Abu Eain

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 32/14 of 7 November 1977, in which the Assembly, inter alia, reaffirmed the legitimacy of the struggle for independence, territorial integrity, national unity and liberation from colonial and foreign domination and alien subjugation by all available means,

Bearing in mind that the Government of Israel defiantly considers internationally recognized and legitimate resistance by the Palestinian population under illegal occupation as "common crimes" and that the Israeli authorities of occupation systematically violate the human rights of the Palestinian population under Israeli military occupation, Noting that Mr. Ziad Abu Eain has been detained illegally in a United States prison for over a year pending his extradition to Israel.

Noting also that the sole basis for "probable cause" against Mr. Ziad Abu Eain is a Hebrew language statement made by a person who was in Israeli custody, Noting further that no United States court will sustain a trial of a person on the basis of such "evidence".

Appeals to the Government of the United States of America to release Mr. Ziad Abu Eain from the United States prison in which he is being detained.

Question of human rights relating to the case of Mr. Ziad Abu Eain

The General Assembly,

Recalling the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,

Recalling its resolution 32/14 of 7 November 1977 and other pertinent resolutions in which the General Assembly, inter alia, reaffirmed the legitimacy of the struggle for independence, territorial integrity, national unity and liberation from colonial and foreign domination and alien subjugation by all available means,

Noting that Mr. Ziad Abu Eain, a Palestinian national from occupied Palestinian territory and a Jordanian citizen, was illegally detained in prison in the United States of America for over two years,

Noting a/s/o that the sole basis for "probable cause" against Mr. Ziad Abu Eain was a statement in Hebrew extracted from a person who had no knowledge of the Hebrew language and who was in Israeli custody, whose statement was later recanted, Deeply concerned that the Government of the United States has extradited Mr. Ziad Abu Eain and delivered him to Israel, the occupying Power,

1. Strongly deplores the action of the Government of the United States of America in extraditing Mr. Ziad Abu Eain to Israel, the occupying Power;

2. Demands that Mr. Ziad Abu Eain be immediately released and that the Government of the United States, being responsible for his safety, should facilitate his safe transfer to the country of his choice;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly no later than 31 December 1981 on the implementation of the present resolution;

Disappearance of persons

The problem of enforced or involuntary disappearance of persons was considered in 1981 by the Commission on Human Rights and its Working Group on this subject, the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly.

WORKING GROUP REPORT (JANUARY/FEBRUARY). The five-member Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances presented to the Commission on Human Rights in January 1981 a report<sup>(1)</sup> on its activities at the three sessions it had held at Geneva (9-13 June, 15-19 September, 8-19 December 1980) since its establishment in February 1980.<sup>(10)</sup>

The Group had received information from Governments, organizations and individuals on a total of 11,000 to 13,000 cases in Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Cyprus, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Indonesia, Mexico, Nicaragua, Peru, the Philippines, South Africa and Uruguay. It transmitted this material to the respective Governments with a request for views and further information, and authorized its Chairman to perform this function when urgent reports of disappearances were received between sessions. Under this authorization, the Chairman transmitted reports to the Governments of Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, El Salvador and Peru. During its December 1980 session the Group met with representatives of Argentina (also at its September session), Cyprus, Indonesia, Mexico, Nicaragua, Peru and Uruguay, and of the Turkish Cypriot community. After analysing some of the information, the Group concluded that it warranted the deepest concern for the danger to the life, liberty and security of the disappeared persons and for the anguish and sorrow caused to their relatives.

The Group's principal recommendation was that the Commission continue to give close consideration to enforced or involuntary disappearances and their underlying causes, and that it select a mechanism to take action between Commission sessions. It also recommended that the Commission call on Governments to co-operate with the United Nations on this topic, furnish information, ensure the cessation of all disappearances and undertake urgent and thorough investigations, and it urged greater publicity for United Nations actions on the subject. It further recommended the ratification and full implementation of the relevant United Nations instruments, in particular the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (p. 889).

The Group met again at Geneva on 13 February 1981 to review information received since its December 1980 session. An addendum to its report described communications relating to cases in Nicaragua, Paraguay and Uruguay.

ACTION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS AND ITSSUB-COMMISSION. On 26 February<sup>(11)</sup> the Commission on Human Rights, noting that the Working Group had not always obtained the full co-operation of government authorities, extended the term of the Group's mandate for another year. It requested the Working Group to report in 1982 with conclusions and recommendations, and to bear in mind the obligation to discharge its mandate with discretion so as to protect persons providing information or to limit the dissemination of information provided by Governments. The Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities was requested to continue studying the most effective means for eliminating enforced or involuntary disappearances, with a view to making general recommendations.

In a resolution of the same date<sup>(12)</sup> on human rights in Chile (p. 951), the Commission expressed deep concern at the lack of information on numerous disappeared persons. It once more urged the Chilean authorities to investigate and clarify the fate of persons who had disappeared for political reasons, to inform relatives of the outcome and to institute criminal proceedings against those responsible. The Chilean judiciary was called upon to employ fully and without restrictions its power under habeas corpus and amparo in order to prevent disappearances and other violations.

On 8 May 1981,<sup>(13)</sup> the Economic and Social Council approved the one-year extension of the Working Group's mandate. The decision, taken on a draft by the Commission, was adopted without vote, following its approval by the Second (Social) Committee on 5 May in like manner.

The Sub-Commission, on 10 September,<sup>(14)</sup> expressed hope that Governments would respond to Working Group requests for information and enable the Group's members to visit. Expressing its conviction that the extension of the Working Group's mandate was indispensable, it recommended that the Commission consider the following action: taking steps to make world public opinion aware of the grave nature of the phenomenon of disappearances and of United Nations action to eliminate the practice; regarding a Government's failure to supply requested information within a reasonable time as confirmation of the occurrence of events; urging States to repeal or refrain from adopting laws which could impede inquiries; giving attention to the need for special measures to protect informants, including relatives; and requesting the Working Group to prepare for the 1982 Sub-Commission session a report that would permit the Sub-Commission to continue making recommendations. The Sub-Commission decided to accord the subject high priority in 1982.

The Sub-Commission's resolution was adopted by 15 votes to 3, with 2 abstentions.

WORKING GROUP ACTION (MAY-DECEMBER). The Working Group on disappearances held its fourth, fifth and sixth sessions in 1981 (New York, 11-15 May; Geneva, 14-18 September; Geneva, 30 November-7 December), and adopted on 7 December a report to the Commission on Human Rights.<sup>(2)</sup>

During the year the Group continued to receive information and forward it to the Governments concerned. The information related to the countries dealt with in 1980 (excluding Peru), as well as Guinea, Honduras, Iran, Lesotho, Sri Lanka, Uganda and Zaire. Governments, humanitarian organizations, relatives of reported missing persons and other reliable sources were contacted for further information. The Group approached eight Governments regarding urgent reports of the disappearance of some 55 persons, of whom 18 were later reported to be free or in prison and one was said to have been found dead. It met with representatives of the Governments of Argentina, El Salvador, Mexico and Uruguay. It explored with Governments the possibility of visiting several countries; Mexico agreed to such a visit, to take place in 1982.

The Group concluded that the number of disappeared persons was increasing and that such cases were receiving world-wide publicity and attracting widespread protest. Although it was not aware of any country where disappearances had been reported which did not provide for the basic right of relatives to be informed in such cases, in all too many cases the constitutional and legal safeguards had yielded no result. The Group commended the example of countries which had set up special machinery to investigate disappearances, and endorsed recommendations by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights that Governments should keep central records on detained persons so that relatives and others could learn promptly of arrests, that arrests should be made only by competent authorities and that arrested persons should be kept in premises designated for that purpose. It considered that the problem could be solved by the proper implementation of existing national laws.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. The General Assembly dealt with the disappearance of persons in three resolutions adopted on 16 December. In a general resolution on the subject,<sup>(6)</sup> it welcomed the decision of the Commission on Human Rights to extend the term of the Working Group's mandate; requested the Commission to continue to study the question as a matter of priority and to take any step necessary to the pursuit of the Group's task; and appealed to all Governments to co-operate. The resolution was adopted, without vote, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, which similarly approved the orally revised text on 30 November.

By the second resolution, the Assembly urged continuation of the tracing of missing persons in Cyprus, called on the parties to assist in investigations and requested the Secretary-General to continue to provide his good offices.<sup>(7)</sup> In a resolution on human rights in Chile, the Assembly urged the Chilean authorities to investigate and clarify the fate of persons who had disappeared for political reasons, to inform their relatives of the outcome of the investigation and to prosecute and punish those responsible.<sup>(5)</sup>

In order not to prejudge the Commission's decisions, the 13 sponsors of the resolution on the Working Group's mandate deleted from paragraph 3 the phrase "with all due effectiveness" in reference to the pursuit of the Group's task.

Introducing the text, France said the question of involuntary or enforced disappearances was one of profound concern to the international community, which looked to the Commission to take the necessary measures. The resolution made it clear that the Working Group had aroused considerable hope.

The extension of the Group's mandate was welcomed in the Third Committee by several speakers, including Cyprus, Denmark, New Zealand, Sweden and the United Kingdom, the last on behalf of the EC members. Norway commended the Group's analysis and hoped the report on its 1981 sessions would be comprehensive and would pave the way for further action. Several speakers referred in particular to the fate of missing persons in Chile, dealt with in a report by the Special Rapporteur on the human rights situation in Chile (p. 951).

Question of involuntary or enforced disappearances

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 33/173 of 20 December 1978, entitled "Disappeared persons", and its resolution 35/193 of 15 December 1980 on the question of involuntary or enforced disappearances,

Bearing in mind Commission on Human Rights resolution 10(XXXVII) of 26 February 1981, in which it was decided to extend for one year the term of the mandate of the Working Group dealing with involuntary or enforced disappearances, and Economic and Social Council decision 1981/139 of 8 May 1981, by which the Council approved the Commission's decision,

Convinced that the action taken, in consultation with the Governments concerned, to promote the implementation of the provisions of General Assembly resolution 33/173 and other United Nations resolutions relevant to the plight of missing or disappeared persons should be continued,

Expressing its emotion at the anguish and sorrow of the families of victims of involuntary or enforced disappearances,

1. Welcomes the decision of the Commission on Human Rights to extend for one year the term of the mandate of the Working Group as laid down in Commission resolution 10(XXXVII);

2. Expresses its appreciation to the Working Group for the work done and to those Governments that have co-operated with it;

3. Requests the Commission on Human Rights to continue to study this question as a matter of priority and to take any step it may deem necessary to the pursuit of the task of the Working Group, when it considers the report to be submitted by the Group at its thirty-eighth session;

4. Appeals to all Governments to provide the Working Group and the Commission on Human Rights with the full co-operation warranted by their strictly humanitarian objectives and their working methods based on discretion;

5. Renews its request to the Secretary-General to continue to provide the Working Group with all necessary assistance.

Other aspects of civil and political rights

Conscientious objectors

The Commission on Human Rights, by a resolution of 12 March 1981<sup>(1)</sup> adopted by 25 votes to 3, with 12 abstentions, welcomed the replies of Governments in response to its March 1980 request<sup>(4)</sup> for information on national legislation and other measures and practices relating to conscientious objection to military service and alternative service. It requested the Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities to study the question of conscientious objection, in particular the implementation of a 1978 General Assembly resolution recognizing the right to refuse service in military or police forces used to enforce apartheid!!') with a view to making recommendations.

Responding to this resolution, the Sub-Commission, on 10 September,<sup>(3)</sup> requested two of its members, Asbjorn Eide (Norway) and Chama L. C. Mubanga-Chipoya (Zambia), to analyse the various dimensions of conscientious objection to military service and its interrelationships with the promotion and protection of human rights, and to report in 1982 with conclusions and recommendations.

Independence of the judicial system

In June 1981, the Special Rapporteur for the study on the independence and impartiality of the judiciary, jurors and assessors and the independence of lawyers, L. M. Singhvi (India), presented to the Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities a progress report<sup>(1)</sup> on the study, which had been authorized by the Economic and Social Council in May 1980.<sup>(4)</sup> He noted that the topic had been discussed at various United Nations and non-governmental meetings, and said a questionnaire had been addressed to Governments, organizations and institutions. An August addendum to the report<sup>(2)</sup> reproduced draft principles on the independence of the judiciary prepared by a committee of experts convened by the International Association of Penal Law and the International Commission of Jurists (Siracusa, Italy, 25-29 May).

On 10 September,(") the Sub-Commission requested the Special Rapporteur to continue his study and submit a final report in 1982.

Slavery

The Working Group on Slavery, established in 1974 by the Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities,(") held its seventh session at Geneva from 10 to 14 August 1981 and adopted its report on 20 August.<sup>(2)</sup> It reviewed developments on slavery and the slave trade, including statements by the Anti-Slavery Society for Protection of Human Rights, the Minority Rights Group and the International Abolitionist Federation alleging the continuation of slavery-like practices in Ethiopia, Mauritania and other countries. The Working Group also discussed debt bondage, the sale of children and child labour, child prostitution, sexual mutilation of female children, and apartheid and colonialism as collective forms of slavery.

The Working Group adopted several recommendations for consideration by the Sub-Commission. It proposed the inclusion of a standing item in the Sub-Commission's agenda on discrimination against women and children, and suggested that that body consider a proposal for an International Anti-Slavery Year. The Group further recommended: that the attention of Mauritania be drawn to assistance programmes of the United Nations and specialized agencies, including human rights advisory services; that Ethiopia be invited to comment on a statement by the Anti-Slavery Society on alleged forced labour in that country; that statements on child labour in Greece and Jamaica, by the International Council of Women and the Anti-Slavery Society, respectively, be submitted to those Governments for information and observations; and that the statement of the Minority Rights Group on exploitation of child prostitution in some Asian countries through intermediary agencies based in Western countries be brought to the attention of the Netherlands and other Governments.

The Working Group also made several recommendations with regard to prostitution (see below) and recommended that the plight of Bihari families stranded in Bangladesh as a result of the war of independence from Pakistan in 1971 be brought to the attention of the relevant United Nations organs so that effective steps could be taken for their transport, rehabilitation, resettlement and employment.

After considering the Working Group's report, the Sub-Commission, on 10 September 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> recommended that the Commission on Human Rights: appeal to United Nations Member States to take measures against prostitution; recognize that apartheid was a slavery-like practice and endorse the call for mandatory economic sanctions against South Africa (p. 165); request that the statements made to the Group by the three non-governmental organizations (NGOs), together with the Group's recommendations, be transmitted to the Governments and organizations concerned; call on parties to anti-slavery conventions to report regularly on the situation in their countries, and on other States and organizations to supply information to the Group; and request the United Nations Department of Public Information to increase public awareness of slavery and slavery-like institutions and practices and to mobilize action for their eradication. The Sub-Commission sought authorization to send a delegation to study the situation in Mauritania and ascertain the country's needs.

The Sub-Commission's Special Rapporteur on slavery, Benjamin Charles George Whitaker (United Kingdom), continued work on updating an earlier report on the topic, in accordance with a Ma 1980 Economic and Social Council decision.<sup>(5)</sup> In a July 1981 progress report,<sup>(1)</sup> he stated that he had received replies to a questionnaire (annexed to the report) from 21 States and a number of organizations. The Sub-Commission, on 10 September,<sup>(4)</sup> invited him to submit his final report in 1982.

Prostitution

The Economic and Social Council, on 8 May 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> requested the Secretary-General to undertake an inquiry among Member States and international organizations on the status of the question of traffic in persons and exploitation of the prostitution of others, and to report to the General Assembly in 1982. The resolution, sponsored by France and Japan, was adopted without vote, following similar approval by the Second (Social) Committee on 5 May.

The resolution was orally revised by its sponsors to include international NGOs among the organizations mentioned. Also in its revised version, the text referred to prostitution as a form rather than a new form of slavery.

On the recommendation of the Working Group on Slavery (see above), made in August 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities, in its resolution of 10 September on slavery,<sup>(4)</sup> recommended that the Commission on Human Rights appeal to Member States: to ratify and implement the 1949 Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others;<sup>(3)</sup> to undertake concerted action against all enterprises promoting prostitution and traffic in persons, and to include relevant information in their reports concerning the Convention; to intensify research into the economic, social, psychological, sexual and emotional causes of prostitution and pimping; and to promote the social reintegration of victims of prostitution. The Voluntary Fund for the United Nations Decade for Women (p. 982) would be invited to consider supporting projects to rehabilitate prostitutes in poor areas.

In its resolution of 10 September on the work of its Working Group on the Encouragement of Universal Acceptance of Human Rights Instruments,<sup>(5)</sup> the Sub-Commission decided to consider in 1982 whether to include the Convention on prostitution in the list of instruments considered by the Group (p. 936).

Combating the traffic in persons and the exploitation of the prostitution of others

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolution 1980/4 of 16 April 1980, in which it requested the Secretary-General to prepare a report on the application of the Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others,

Recalling a/so resolution 1(XXVII) of 4 April 1978 of the Commission on the Status of Women,

Considering the provisions of resolution 43 on the exploitation of the prostitution of others and traffic in persons, adopted by the World Conference of the United Nations Decade for Women,

Considering that slavery may be defined as the condition of a person who is entirely under the domination of another,

Having been informed that, for these reasons, the Working Group on Slavery of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities has been invited to collaborate in the preparation of a study on procuring,

Considering further that these practices, frequently condemned by various United Nations bodies, constitute a flagrant violation of human rights,

Considering that the combating and suppression of such traffic involves a number of different national and international organizations,

Requests the Secretary-General to undertake an inquiry among the Governments of Member States and the international organizations concerned--the regional commissions, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, Interpol and the international non-governmental organizations concerned--on the status of the question and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session, so that, with full knowledge of the facts, joint measures can be envisaged to put an end to this form of slavery.

Implementation of the Covenant

Reports from States parties

At its third session, held in New York from 14 to 29 April 1981, the Economic and Social Council's Sessional Working Group on the Implementation of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights<sup>(1)</sup> considered reports submitted by 22 States parties on their implementation of specific provisions of the Covenant. On each report, the Group heard statements by, and put questions to, the respective State representative. Under a programme established by the Council in 1976,<sup>(2)</sup> reports required under the Covenant were to be submitted in three biennial cycles or stages, each stage covering a related group of articles.

From the first stage (due 1 September 1977), the Working Group examined reports submitted in 1980 by Czechoslovakia and Madagascar<sup>(4)</sup> concerning rights covered by articles 6 to 9 of the Covenant (the right to work and to favourable conditions of work, the rights of trade unionists and the right to social security). At the request of the Syrian Arab Republic, the Group deferred consideration of its report<sup>(5)</sup> until 1982. Reports received later in 1981 from Barbados, Canada, the Syrian Arab Republic and the United Kingdom (the last covering the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man)<sup>(6)</sup> were also to be examined in 1982.

The Group also considered<sup>(23)</sup> second-stage reports (due 1 September 1979) on rights covered by articles 10 to 12 (protection of the family, mothers and children; an adequate living standard; and physical and mental health) from the following 21 States: Australia, Austria, Byelorussian SSR, Chile, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Finland, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Iraq, Mongolia, Norway, Poland, Romania, Senegal, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, USSR, United Kingdom (covering the Channel Islands, the Isle of Man and dependent Territories), United Republic of Tanzania.<sup>(7)</sup> Reports received in 1981 from Panama (two) and the Ukrainian SSR<sup>(8)</sup> were to be examined in 1982.

Reports relating to the third stage (due 1 September 1981), on rights covered by articles 13 to 15 (education, including compulsory education, and participation in cultural life) were received during 1981 from the Byelorussian SSR, the German Democratic Republic, Guyana, Hungary, Japan, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mexico, Mongolia, Norway, Romania, Sweden, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR.<sup>(9)</sup>

The Secretary-General submitted to the Council in February a note listing the reports received from States<sup>(1)</sup> and an analytical summary of reports on rights covered by articles 10 to 12 received from 11 States since the submission of a similar report in January 1980.<sup>(10)</sup> In March 1981, he transmitted to the Council the first report of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations relating to provisions in article 11 of the Covenant recognizing the right of rural populations to an adequate standard of living and the right of everyone to be free from hunger,<sup>(2)</sup> and the fourth report of the International Labour Organisation on the work of its Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.<sup>(3)</sup>

On 17 April, after consideration of the report of Chile, the Chairman made a statement summing up discussions in the Working Group during which some members had referred to expressions by United Nations bodies of concern on human rights in Chile (p. 951). He said members of the Group believed that Chile should provide additional information concerning rights covered by articles 10 to 12.

On the Working Group's recommendation, the Council, on 8 May, decided without vote to request States parties that had not submitted their reports to do so as soon as possible.<sup>(15)</sup> The decision was orally amended by Barbados to include reference to the 1976 Council resolution establishing the programme under which States were to furnish their reports.

Referring during the Council debate to the reporting system established under the Covenant, Canada remarked that States parties had a right to expect that the examination of reports should be at least at the same level as for the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.<sup>(13)</sup> Denmark felt it was necessary to expand the Working Group's reports to the Council, drawing on the experience of the Human Rights Committee (p. 889) and the Committee on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (p. 871). France considered that the Group's reports should include a summary of individual national reports, a description of areas in which the State's activities could be strengthened or improved, and a technical opinion about the factors and difficulties preventing States from fulfilling their obligations under the Covenant; the control exercised by the Council through the reporting system must have an impact on national and international public opinion.

The Federal Republic of Germany remarked that the work methods and sessional character of the Group did not allow for a more detailed examination of national reports; the Council should receive a report from the Group which reflected the different quality of national reports and the different co-operation of States' representatives. A change of the reporting system was also advocated by Italy.

Expressing dissatisfaction with the current monitoring system, Japan hoped that ways for effectively monitoring the implementation of the Covenant would continue to be explored. The Netherlands suggested that the Group consider making recommendations to the Council as to whether it should transmit the reports of States parties to the Commission on Human Rights for study and general recommendation or for information. In New Zealand's view, the Group's reports might give broader coverage of its activities in monitoring national reports and might draw attention to ways in which such reports could be improved; also, reducing the frequency of national reports would increase the Group's effectiveness. Norway thought the ideal solution was to have the Group present substantive reports giving a faithful picture of how the States parties discharged their obligations, the measures adopted and the progress made in achieving observance of the rights recognized in the Covenant.

In Brazil's view, there was no reason for States not parties to the Covenant to concern themselves with measures taken by States parties; the Council should not have to analyse national reports. The USSR felt that the existing monitoring method was the best because the Group could analyse each State's legislation and compare the relative progress made in the implementation of the provisions of the Covenant without questioning the economic and social structure of individual States.

Noting that States parties were under a contractual obligation to submit their reports, Cyprus felt that only a reminder rather than an appeal was required to parties which had not met that obligation.

The General Assembly, by a resolution of 25 November 1981 on the International Covenants on Human Rights,<sup>(14)</sup> urged States parties to the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights to submit their reports as soon as possible.

Economic and Social Council decision 1981/159

Adopted without vote

Draft by Working Group (E/1981/64), orally amended by Barbados; agenda item 3.

Reports called for under article 16 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

At its 19th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council decided to request States parties to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights that had not yet submitted their reports in conformity with article 16 of the Covenant and Council resolution 1988(LX) of 11 May 1976 to do so as soon as possible.

Arrangements for the Working Group

Organization of work. On 8 May 1981, the Economic and Social Council decided without vote on several aspects of future arrangements for the Working Group.<sup>(8)</sup> It added "of Governmental Experts" to the Group's name, making it the Sessional Working Group of Governmental Experts on the Implementation of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. It decided that the Group would meet for three weeks each year, starting one week before the Council's first regular session (rather than during the session as in the past). The Group's other work methods were to remain as established by the Council in 1979.<sup>(3)</sup> A list of States parties to the Covenant and an indication of the status of submission of their reports were to be annexed to the Group's reports. At the end of the Group's discussion of each State's report, representatives of specialized agencies could make general statements on matters in their field, with the reporting States being free to respond. Analytical summaries of States' reports, prepared by the Secretariat and originally authorized in 1978,<sup>(6)</sup> were to be discontinued.

The Council also decided on the agenda (p. 919), membership (p. 920) and officers (p. 921) of the Working Group.

The Council's action was based on the Group's recommendations, made on 29 April 1981.<sup>(2)</sup>

Also on 8 May, the Council decided without vote to review, at its first regular session of 1982, the composition, organization and administrative arrangements of the Working Group.<sup>(9)</sup> This decision was proposed by the Netherlands, which orally revised it to delete a phrase stating that the review would take place in the Council's Second (Social) Committee and a paragraph by which this would have been taken up as a separate agenda item. On an oral amendment by Cyprus, the Working Group's methods of work were omitted from the scope of the review.

The Cyprus amendment was accepted by the Council after the Byelorussian SSR and the USSR said its acceptance, and the revisions by the sponsor, would make a consensus possible.

The composition, organization and administrative arrangements of the Working Group had been inconclusively discussed by the Council in February 1981. On 6 February, it decided to review the matter further at its first regular session (April/May) and fixed the dates for the Group's 1981 session.<sup>(7)</sup> It also took note of the appointment of 15 States as members of the Group. This decision, based on a draft by the President following informal consultations, was adopted without vote.

In this decision, the Council also noted a January 1981 report of the Secretary-General, which it had requested in May 1980,<sup>(4)</sup> containing his comments on this topic as well as the views and suggestions of 18 Governments.<sup>(1)</sup> In his comments on organization and administrative arrangements, the Secretary-General noted that all the Governments which had expressed their views had supported an extension of the Group's meetings to three or more weeks annually, or to as many as required for the reports to be thoroughly examined. Some Governments had suggested changes, such as having the Group meet between Council sessions or use rules of procedure similar to those of the Human Rights Committee rather than of the Council. The Secretary-General expressed the opinion that existing work methods were adequate to permit a thorough and expert examination of reports from States, provided that the difficulties relating to composition, membership, and timing and duration of meetings were resolved and that the Group was given sufficient time for its work.

In the Council's February discussion, Brazil explained that it did not object to the consensus reached; however, if the decision taken at that time had been put to a vote, it would have abstained because of its position that States not parties to the Covenant should not be obliged to cover the related expenses through the regular United Nations budget.

Speaking in the Council in May on the original proposal by the Netherlands, the USSR said a further review of the Group's arrangements in 1982 would be tantamount to a review of the Covenant and would have considerable financial implications. Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR and the German Democratic Republic also appealed to the Netherlands to withdraw the proposal, saying it called into question the compromise reached in the Working Group. The Byelorussian SSR expressed concern at what it saw as the intention to transform the review process, intended to consider only organizational matters, into a continuous review that could only destroy the Group's work. Also opposed to the draft was Ecuador, which felt that the proposal would reopen the entire debate on the report of the Working Group.

Australia, Canada, Denmark, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, New Zealand, Spain and the United Kingdom supported the Netherlands proposal, which its sponsor said was strictly procedural and would guarantee a thorough review of the monitoring system.

Stating that matters relating to the Covenant were exclusively the concern of the States parties, Brazil declared that it would not participate in any of the debates or votes.

Australia, Cyprus, the Federal Republic of Germany and others expressed support for all the draft decisions and for the Working Group's recommendations, with the reservations that summary records of meetings (Australia) and analytical summaries of national reports (Cyprus) should continue to be provided.

Denmark felt that the steps suggested for a review of the arrangements of the Working Group were not adequate; the Council should, for example, consider the possibility of an inter-sessional role for the Group. Norway, on the other hand, suggested that the Working Group meet parallel with the first regular Council session of each year, thereby saving the heavy cost involved in inter-sessional meetings; the Group's report could then be considered by the Council at its second regular session.

Concerning the participation of the specialized agencies, the United Kingdom expressed hope that their role under the Covenant could be made more effective. France, though agreeing with the Secretary-General's view that the reports submitted by the agencies should be considered together with those of States parties, said the possibility of considering them separately should not be ruled out; the reports could include information on the agencies' own activities.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. The General Assembly, in its resolution of 25 November 1981 on the International Covenants on Human Rights, noted the Council's May decision on further review of the Working Group's arrangements and said it looked forward to results at the Council's first session of 1982.<sup>(5)</sup>

During the human rights debate in the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, the Byelorussian SSR expressed concern that a number of States, mostly from one region, paid more attention to organizational aspects than to the activities of the Working Group. Romania believed that the Council's decisions would improve the work of the Group, while the USSR said the methods of work already approved for the Group would provide a good basis for its efficient operation.

Canada said the Working Group had not fully carried out its mandate to study national reports. In the opinion of the Federal Republic of Germany, the Group had not reached the standard of the Human Rights Committee. Japan did not believe the same reporting system should be applied to the two Covenants, since the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights called for the progressive implementation of rights to the extent of a State's resources. Portugal welcomed the organizational arrangements proposed for the Group but believed additional progress could be made in the review planned for 1982. The United Kingdom hoped the Group would develop the same effective and methodical approach to reports taken by the Human Rights Committee.

Future review of the composition, organization and administrative arrangements of the Sessional Working Group of Governmental Experts on the Implementation of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

At its 19th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council, having considered the report of the Sessional Working Group on the Implementation of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, decided to review the composition, organization and administrative arrangements of the Working Group at its first regular session of 1982.

Agenda for the 1982 session. On 8 May 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> the Economic and Social Council approved without vote the Working Group's provisional agenda for 1982, which called for consideration of reports by States parties under all three phases of the reporting procedure (p. 917), including for the first time the third phase, dealing with articles 13 to 15 (education and culture). The decision, including the provisional agenda, had been recommended by the Working Group on 29 April.<sup>(1)</sup>

At its 19th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council approved the provisional agenda for 1982 of the Sessional Working Group of Governmental Experts on the Implementation of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights set out below:

Provisional agenda for 1982 of the Sessional Working Group of Governmental Experts on the Implementation of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

  - Any other reports received by the Secretary-General
2. Consideration of reports submitted in accordance with Council resolution 1988(LX) by States parties to the Covenant concerning rights covered by articles 10 to 12
  - Documentation

3. Consideration of reports submitted in accordance with Council resolution 1988(LX) by States parties to the Covenant concerning rights covered by articles 13 to 15
  - Documentation
  - Reports received by the Secretary-General
4. Consideration of the report of the Sessional Working Group of Governmental Experts on the Implementation of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

Membership. The 15 members of the Working Group were appointed by the Economic and Social Council President (see APPENDIX III). The Council, on 6 February 1981, took note of the appointment and urged the Group's members to include in their delegations experts in matters dealt with in the Covenant.<sup>(5)</sup>

The composition and membership of the body assisting the Council in the consideration of reports from States parties to the Covenant was dealt with in the January report by the Secretary-General<sup>(1)</sup> on future arrangements for the Working Group (p. 917). The Secretary-General expressed the opinion that it should be constituted of persons possessing expertise and competence in matters dealt with in the Covenant. Several of the replies received from States and reproduced in the report from Austria, Canada, Finland, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Senegal and the United Kingdom-supported the establishment of a group of experts.

The Secretary-General recalled an April 1980 suggestion by the Working Group that consideration be given to appointing its members for two- or three-year terms from a list of candidates nominated by States parties.<sup>(7)</sup> He remarked that the adoption of such an approach would give more permanence to the machinery. The members could be elected by the Council, taking into account the principle of equitable geographical distribution and the representation of different legal and socio-economic systems; or they could be appointed by the Council President in consultation with the Secretary-General or with the Council members. The Secretary-General's approach was supported by a number of States; the replies ranged from proposals to maintain the current arrangements to proposals for the establishment of an expert committee whose members could be elected by States parties, following procedures similar to those under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.<sup>(3)</sup>

In its decision of 8 May on arrangements for the Working Group,<sup>(6)</sup> the Council kept the number of its members at 15, distributed equally among the geographical regions (three from each group), but added that this number should be reviewed when an increase in the number of States parties made a review desirable. The members would continue to be appointed each year by the Council President, as decided in 1978,<sup>(4)</sup> subject to further review if a change seemed necessary. These actions on membership had been Proposed by the Working Group on 29 April.<sup>(2)</sup>

During the debate, Canada, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway and the United Kingdom favoured the establishment of a group of independent experts, similar to the Human Rights Committee, to monitor implementation of the Covenant. As the two Covenants on human rights were equal, Canada remarked, it was only logical that adequate mechanisms should exist to monitor the implementation of both.

Bulgaria, Cyprus, France, India, New Zealand, the USSR and others preferred the establishment of a group of governmental experts. However, Cyprus observed that the current method, which limited the selection of experts to countries which were both States parties and Council members, implied that a non-expert who fulfilled those requirements would have to be preferred over an expert of a non-member country. India remarked that it would be difficult for an individual to specialize in more than one or two of the areas covered by the Covenant; member States could be urged to appoint one or more experts.

Though disappointed with the report of the Working Group, Japan said the monitoring body should remain an intergovernmental body whose members would appoint persons with expertise in their respective fields; to ensure continuity, its member States should be appointed for longer terms, perhaps three years. Italy too favoured a three-year term. A three-year membership, with one third of the Group being elected every year, was suggested by the Netherlands which, though favouring a body of independent experts, thought the solution of a sessional meeting of governmental experts should be tried out.

With regard to the Working Group's recommendation to retain the arrangement of 15 seats equally distributed among the five regional groups, the Netherlands suggested that the membership be distributed so that three regional groups would have three experts, one group would have two experts and one group would have four experts; in order to obtain that composition, the States parties within the Council should decide on the membership, possibly through election. India said it could not endorse the Netherlands suggestion for proportional representation, which was feasible only when the composition of a group was stable. Equitable geographical distribution was also advocated by France, while Italy felt that a change in that direction should be made as soon as the Covenant had been ratified by half of the United Nations Members. Norway thought the question should be continuously reviewed, taking into account in particular the number of countries ratifying the Covenant.

During the human rights debate in the General Assembly's Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, Mongolia said it did not support the idea of reorganizing the Working Group into a body of independent experts. The Netherlands reiterated its view that the composition of the Group did not reflect that of the States parties (p. 915) and repeated its suggestion for annual election of the members. Romania mentioned the need for equitable geographical distribution of the membership.

Draft by Working Group (E/1981/64); agenda item 3.

Bureau for 1982 of the Sessional Working Group of Governmental Experts on the Implementation of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

At its 19th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council decided that the Bureau for 1982 of the Sessional Working Group of Governmental Experts on the Implementation of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights should be constituted as follows:

Chairman: African States;

Vice-chairmen: Western European and other States. Asian States, Latin American States; Rapporteur: Eastern European States.

Other aspects of economic, social and cultural rights

Right to development

ACTION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS. On 11 March 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> the Commission on Human Rights expressed deep concern at the situation in regard to attainment of the objectives of the General Assembly's 1974 Declaration<sup>(4)</sup> and Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order<sup>(5)</sup> and the consequent adverse effects on the full achievement of human rights, including the right to development. It reaffirmed the right of all nations to pursue freely their economic and social development and to exercise full sovereignty over their natural resources without prejudice to any commitment arising out of international solidarity and economic co-operation. The Commission reiterated the need to ensure the realization of work, education, health and proper nourishment through the adoption of national and international measures, as a necessity for the full enjoyment of human rights; and reaffirmed that foreign occupation, colonialism, apartheid, racism, racial discrimination and the denial of the right of peoples to self-determination were serious impediments to economic and social progress.

The Commission urged the Secretary-General to complete before its 1982 session his study, requested in February 1980,<sup>(12)</sup> on the regional and national dimensions of the right to development as a human right; and requested him to hold in August 1981 at United Nations Headquarters the seminar called for by the General Assembly in December 1980<sup>(7)</sup> on the relations between human rights, peace and development (p. 973).

The Commission decided to establish a working group of 15 government experts on the right to development and the realization of economic, social and cultural rights, which was to pay particular attention to the obstacles encountered by developing countries in their efforts to secure the enjoyment of human rights. The Working Group was requested to submit in 1982 a report with concrete proposals for implementation of the right to development and for a draft international instrument. The Commission decided to consider the question with high priority in 1982, with a view to adopting concrete measures on the basis of the Group's recommendations.

The resolution was adopted by a roll-call vote of 40 to 1 (United States), with 2 abstentions.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. On 8 May 1981,<sup>(11)</sup> the Economic and Social Council approved the decision of the Commission on Human Rights to establish the Working Group on the right to development. It also approved the Commission's request that the Group hold three series of meetings at Geneva between July 1981 and the start of the Commission's 1982 session.

The Council took this decision, by 51 votes to 1, on the recommendation of the Second (Social) Committee, which approved the draft, submitted by the Commission, by a recorded vote, requested by Brazil, of 50 to 1.

ACTIVITIES OF THE WORKING GROUP. The Working Group of Governmental Experts on the Right to Development held two sessions at Geneva during 1981, from 20 to 24 July and from 23 November to 4 December.<sup>(2)</sup> Discussion focused on the following: scope and content of the right to development; means to ensure the realization, in all countries, of the economic, social and cultural rights enshrined in various international instruments; obstacles encountered by developing countries in their efforts to secure the enjoyment of human rights; and proposals for a draft international instrument on the right to development.

ACTION BY THE SUB-COMMISSION ON DISCRIMINATION AND MINORITIES. A progress report<sup>(1)</sup> on the preparation of a study on the new international economic order and the promotion of human rights, authorized by the Economic and Social Council in May 1980,<sup>(10)</sup> was submitted in August 1981 by the Special Rapporteur responsible for the study, Raúl Ferrero Costa (Peru), to the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities. The Special Rapporteur outlined the contents of the study, which was to include conclusions and recommendations.

The Sub-Commission, on 10 September,<sup>(9)</sup> requested its Special Rapporteur to continue his work with a view to submitting his final report in 1982.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. In a resolution of 14 December 1981 on measures for the advancement of human rights,<sup>(8)</sup> the General Assembly reiterated that establishment of the new international economic order was essential for the promotion and full enjoyment of human rights. It declared that the right to development was an inalienable human right and requested the Commission on Human Rights to take measures to promote that right, taking into account the work of the Working Group. The Assembly reaffirmed that, in order to ensure the full enjoyment of all human rights and complete personal dignity, it was necessary to promote the right to education and to work, health and proper nourishment, through adoption of national measures, including those providing for the right of workers to participate in management, and international measures, including the establishment of the new international economic order.

The text was orally revised by the sponsors to state the need to "promote" rather than "guarantee" the right to education and other rights; to delete the phrase "belonging to all peoples and to every individual" from the paragraph describing the right to development as an inalienable human right (Morocco had objected to the phrase as an unjustifiable extension of the meaning of the right to development); and to move to the preamble an operative paragraph recognizing that international peace and security were essential for full realization of the right to development. Taking into account an oral proposal by Morocco, the sponsors revised paragraph 7 to position the right to education ahead of the right to work.

Explaining its negative vote, the United States said the resolution was unacceptable because it sought to divert attention from individual to collective human rights; the right to development was an individual right to personal development and it was debatable whether it was inalienable. Along with the United States, the Federal Republic of Germany, which abstained, said the draft prejudged the discussion in the Working Group; they also did not believe that the right to development or the establishment of a new international economic order were prerequisites for guaranteeing other human rights. Italy, which also abstained, voiced a similar opinion, adding that the fact that reference was made to the human rights of peoples before the human rights of individuals could lead to mistaken interpretations.

Reservations on paragraph 8, characterizing the right to development as an inalienable human right, were expressed by Canada, which abstained, and by Ireland, the Netherlands and New Zealand, which voted for the resolution. They considered that a decision on the right to development was premature, since the results of the Working Group were not known. New Zealand added that it would have abstained had a vote been taken on the paragraph. Similarly, the United Kingdom, which abstained, believed that it was premature to refer to the right to development as though agreement had already been reached on a definition; it also had substantial reservations concerning the link between establishment of the new international economic order and the effective promotion and full enjoyment of human rights, as well as between international peace and security and the full realization of the right to development.

Finland (speaking for the five Nordic States) and the Netherlands expressed a similar opinion about paragraph 8, despite their favourable votes on the resolution as a whole; Finland added that the right to development was the right of the individual to participate fully in the development process and to enjoy its benefits, while the right of nations and peoples to development had been enshrined in the Assembly's 1974 Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States,<sup>(6)</sup> a document that dealt with collective rights, which were different from individual rights.

Also voting in favour, Australia rejected any idea that States might be exempted from the obligation to protect the rights of the individual on the basis that it was necessary to change international economic relations. Costa Rica deemed it inappropriate to give second place to human beings by stating that the right to development was an inalienable human right, and thought the resolution gave the impression that human rights could not be promoted unless a new international economic order was established. Sweden said the right of the individual fully to participate in and benefit from development should be confirmed; however, the resolution might give rise to other interpretations which could not be contained in the concept of human rights. Turkey, while sharing the view that the exercise of fundamental human rights could be facilitated by economic welfare and social justice, said those factors were neither determining elements nor essential conditions for the existence of and respect for human rights.

Casting a positive vote in the Assembly after abstaining in Committee, Belgium said the text attached exclusive importance to a certain type of rights. Belgium, Guatemala and Italy also expressed reservations on paragraph 7, which referred to the need for national measures on the right of workers to participate in management and international measures including the establishment of the new international economic order.

During the debate, Cuba stated that development consisted primarily of attention to the human person, who must be at the centre of any development effort. Czechoslovakia thought the restructuring of international economic relations on a more just and equitable footing was of crucial importance in promoting the international protection of human rights. Democratic Yemen and the Lao People's Democratic Republic held the implementation of the new international economic order to be essential for the effective enjoyment and promotion of human rights and fundamental freedoms. India considered that efforts to establish a new international economic order would be strengthened by universal acceptance of the right to development; to view human rights in an integrated manner, it was necessary to take into account the developmental dimension of human rights and the human rights dimension of development.

Madagascar observed that, since the right to development had been recognized by the Assembly as a fundamental human right, the rights of the people had priority, but that did not mean that individual rights should be sacrificed. Viet Nam saw the right to development as including all aspects of economic, social and individual development, including the right to a decent standard of living, clothing, housing, access to education, adequate medical care, and a harmonious and dignified life. Yugoslavia stated that the imposition of foreign development models on a country constituted a violation of the human rights of the country and its people.

Costa Rica, on the other hand, expressed the view that the original clear distinction between mandatory rights, such as the right to freedom, and programmatic rights, such as economic and social rights, had been blurred for political motives.

Australia emphasized that it was not sufficient in the human rights context to talk about the need for a new international economic order; the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee must examine the human rights dimension of that issue and work to have the question considered in other forums. France stressed the need to establish a balance between two concepts: that every individual should enjoy human rights irrespective of the conditions in the society to which he or she belonged, and that respect for human rights was the foundation of freedom, justice and peace.

The Netherlands agreed in principle that the establishment of a new international economic order was an essential element for the effective promotion of human rights, but did not accept that respect for human rights depended on the achievement of development; there were human rights and fundamental freedoms that could never be derogated from, even in situations of underdevelopment. The United States saw the concept of development as complex and going far beyond material and economic matters to include the full flowering of spiritual life and the growth of liberty.

Realization of the economic, social and cultural rights contained in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and In the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and study of the special problems faced by developing countries In their efforts to achieve those rights At its 18th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council took note of resolution 36(XXXVII) of 11 March 1981 of the Commission on Human Rights, and approved the decision of the Commission to establish a working group of fifteen governmental experts appointed by the Chairman of the Commission, taking into account the need for equitable geographical distribution, to study the scope and contents of the right to development and the most effective means to ensure the realization, in all countries, of the economic, social and cultural rights enshrined in various international instruments, paying particular attention to the obstacles encountered by developing countries in their efforts to secure the enjoyment of human rights; the Council also approved the Commission's request to the Working Group to hold three meetings at Geneva, the first in the month of July 1981, the second towards the end of 1981, for a period of two weeks, and the third for one week before the beginning of the thirty-eighth session of the Commission on Human Rights. The Council requested the Secretary-General to provide all necessary assistance to the Working Group.

Right to education

UNESCO REPORT. In accordance with a General Assembly resolution of December

1980,<sup>(3)</sup> an interim report on measures taken by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) for the effective implementation of the right to education, prepared by the UNESCO Director-General, was transmitted to the Assembly by the Secretary-General in October 1981.<sup>(1)</sup> Referring to the UNESCO education programme (p. 1411), the Director-General stated that $280.1 million had been allocated for 1981-1983, including $105.7 million under the regular programme. Extra-budgetary allocations for projects in developing countries had increased from $99.6 million in 1979-1980 to an estimated $174.4 million in 1981-1983.

It was becoming increasingly clear, the Director-General stated, that full exercise of the right to education was not only a moral imperative but also a prerequisite for social progress and economic growth; the right to education and its democratization, which included guaranteeing free access of all to education and equality of educational opportunity, was a fundamental human right and should be a central concern of UNESCO. Emphasis should be placed on the needs of disadvantaged groups—such as refugees, migrant workers, physically and mentally handicapped persons, and minorities—and on the need for equality of educational opportunity for women. Eradication of illiteracy, through promotion of universal primary education and literacy training for adults, was an unquestionable priority. To ensure greater relevance of education to the needs of society, the links between education and the world of work must be strengthened.

These points were set out in a resolution adopted by the UNESCO General Conference at its September/October 1980 session and appended to the Director-General's report. Also appended was a resolution on the right to education adopted by the UNESCO Executive Board in May 1981, stating that UNESCO would be in a position to prepare a final report on the topic in 1982.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution of 16 December 1981,<sup>(4)</sup> the General Assembly again invited States to consider adopting legislative, administrative and other measures, including material guarantees, to ensure full implementation of the right to universal education through free and compulsory primary education, universal and gradually free secondary education, equal access to all educational facilities and access of youth to science and culture. Specialized agencies were invited to co-operate with UNESCO to ensure a high priority for education in development activities. The Assembly appealed again to all States, in particular the developed countries, to support actively through fellowships and other means, including the general increase of resources, the efforts of developing countries to educate and train national personnel for industry, agriculture and other economic and social sectors. The UNESCO Director-General was requested to submit in 1982 a report on full implementation of the right to education.

The resolution was adopted without vote, following similar approval by the Third Committee on 30 November of a 55-nation draft.

Introducing this text, Romania said it reiterated, developed and brought up to date the ideas contained in the 1980 Assembly resolution on the right to education.<sup>(3)</sup> The sponsors, aware of the ever more disquieting phenomenon of the persistence of illiteracy in numerous areas, had included a new preambular paragraph recognizing that the eradication of illiteracy had a special priority and urgency.

Though joining in the consensus on the resolution, Brazil believed that paragraph 1, inviting States to adopt measures to ensure full implementation of the right to universal education, should not lead to encroachment on national legislation or be interpreted as urging Governments to bear the entire cost of secondary education; and that paragraphs 2 and 3, inviting States to determine the means for implementing the provisions on the role of education in the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade<sup>(2)</sup> and inviting the co-operation of specialized agencies, could have the effect of splitting up the Strategy, of which all the objectives, not just the social ones, should be supported by developing countries.

The right to education

The General Assembly,

Recalling Its resolutions 34/170 of 17 December 1979 and 35/191 of 15 December 1980 on the right to education,

Recalling the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, adopted by its resolution 2200 A (XXI) of 16 December 1966, which recognizes the right of everyone to education,

Bearing in mind the importance of the Convention against Discrimination in Education, adopted on 14 December 1960 by the General Conference of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization,

Reaffirming the paramount importance of the implementation of the right to education for the full development of the human personality and for the enjoyment of other fundamental human rights and freedoms,

Recognizing that for the effective implementation of the right to education the eradication of illiteracy has a particular priority and urgency,

Convinced that the educational process could bring a substantial contribution to social progress, national development, mutual understanding and co-operation among peoples and to strengthening peace and international security,

Recalling that the establishment of the new international economic order requires effective support for the improvement and expansion of educational systems and for the training of specialized personnel and qualified cadres for the economic development of the developing countries,

Convinced of the topicality and urgency of the provisions on education contained in the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Recalling that, since its establishment, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization has constantly striven for the effective realization of the right to education and equality of educational opportunities for all, without distinction as to race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, economic status or birth and that, for many years past, activities directed to securing the right to education and the extension and improvement of educational and training systems in member States, more particularly in the developing countries, have occupied a central place in that organization's programme,

Taking note with satisfaction of the interest shown by the Executive Board of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 34/170 and 35/191,

1. Invites again all States to consider the adoption of appropriate legislative, administrative and other measures, including material guarantees, in order to ensure the full implementation of the right to universal education through, inter alia, free and compulsory primary education, universal and gradually free-of-charge secondary education, equal access to all educational facilities and the access of the young generation to science and culture;

2. Invites all States to give all necessary attention to defining and determining in a more precise manner the means for implementing the provisions concerning the role of education in the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade;

3. Invites all specialized agencies to co-operate with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to ensure education a high priority in the implementation of various programmes and projects within the framework of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade;

4. Appeals again to all States, in particular the developed countries, to support actively through fellowships and other means, including the general increasing of resources for education and training, the efforts of the developing countries in the education and training of national personnel needed in industry, agriculture and other economic and social sectors;

5. Expresses its thanks to the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization for the report on the right to education, prepared pursuant to General Assembly resolution 35/191;

6. Requests the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to submit to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session a report dealing with the questions raised in resolution 35/191 and also in the present resolution, on the basis of the broad lines of approach established in the draft medium-term plan of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization for 1984-1989, with a view to fostering the full implementation of the right to education.

Advancement of human rights

The Commission on Human Rights and the General Assembly continued consideration in 1981 of the item entitled "Alternative approaches and ways and means within the United Nations system for improving the effective enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms". The Secretary-General submitted a report on international conditions and human rights. Under this agenda item, the Assembly also considered the proposal for a High Commissioner for Human Rights (p. 929) and national institutions for human rights (p. 941).

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL. In response to requests made by the General Assembly in 1979<sup>(5)</sup> and 1980,<sup>(6)</sup> the Secretary-General submitted in October 1981 a report on current international conditions and human rights.<sup>(3)</sup> The report referred in general terms to situations with negative effects on the human rights of individuals and peoples, such as: racial discrimination and apartheid; patterns of alien subjugation, domination and exploitation; threats or uses of force to establish new ties of dependency or extend existing ones; the existence of an unjust system of international economic relations; obstacles to the establishment of the new international economic order; and the arms race.

As possible ways in which States could contribute to eliminating massive and flagrant violations of human rights and the rights of peoples, the Secretary-General mentioned: full implementation of the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and of international human rights instruments; establishment of a new international economic order and promotion of the right to development (p. 921); utilization of resources spent on arms for assistance to the needy and disadvantaged; the exercise by States of the political will needed to change conditions and policies leading to the violation of human rights; cultivation of public opinion by teaching, training, education and information dissemination (p. 940); the fight against racial discrimination (p. 864); and implementation of the right to self-determination of peoples and other activities against colonialism, foreign domination and occupation (p. 891).

Among the United Nations activities designed to advance human rights, the Secretary-General referred to approaches for dealing with human rights violations, including his good offices, diplomatic and conciliatory approaches, fact-finding and complaint procedures, public consideration in United Nations organs and assistance measures. To strengthen human rights activities, he suggested that the Assembly consider ways in which awareness of the human rights dimension of issues such as peace, disarmament, development and the establishment of a new international economic order could be heightened, and that periodic reviews of the world human rights situation be undertaken by the Assembly with the assistance of the Commission on Human Rights and the Economic and Social Council.

ACTION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS. At the beginning of its 1981 session, the Commission on Human Rights established, as decided in March 1980,<sup>(9)</sup> a sessional Working Group, open to all its members, to continue an analysis and to make recommendations on the further promotion and encouragement of human rights, including the Commission's programme and work methods, alternative approaches in the United Nations system for improving the enjoyment of human rights and the co-ordination of specific human rights activities within the system.

The Working Group met between 12 February and 4 March 1981. Its debate focused on three areas: an inter-sessional role for the Commission's officers and the possible need for convening emergency sessions of the Commission; the Commission's future work and programme; and the Secretariat's resource needs. References were also made to the proposed establishment of a United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (p. 929).

The general view stated in the Group's report (reproduced in the Commission's report to the Economic and Social Council)<sup>(1)</sup> was that the matters raised required further consideration before decisions could be taken. The Group therefore expressed the view that consideration should continue at the 1982 Commission session as a matter of high priority.

Noting that the report of the Working Group contained a number of ideas which merited further study, the Commission, on 10 March 1981, decided to establish at its 1982 session an open-ended working group to continue the analysis and make recommendations.<sup>(4)</sup>

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution of 14 December,<sup>(7)</sup> the General Assembly requested the Commission on Human Rights to continue work on this topic. It reaffirmed the importance of States' undertaking specific obligations by adhering to international human rights instruments (p. 937), said that standard-setting work within the United Nations system and the implementation of international instruments should be encouraged, and reiterated that the international community should accord priority to the search for solutions to mass and flagrant violations of human rights of peoples and individuals (p. 967). After calling for measures to promote the right to development (p. 922), it affirmed that efforts to promote and protect civil and political rights as well as economic, social and cultural rights should continue, and reiterated the need to ensure economic and political stability, nationally and internationally, for the full enjoyment, promotion and observance of human rights of peoples and individuals.

The resolution was adopted, by a recorded vote of 135 to 1, with 13 abstentions, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, which approved the 20-nation draft on 13 November, as revised in writing and orally, by a recorded vote of 118 to 1, with 16 abstentions. The vote in Committee was requested by the United States, and Yugoslavia requested that it be recorded.

The draft resolution was introduced by Cuba, which revised it orally on behalf of the sponsors. A preambular reference to work for human rights "through the existing structures of the United Nations system" was deleted. Paragraph 6, originally reaffirming the need to create satisfactory conditions at the national and international levels for the full promotion and protection of the human rights of individuals and peoples, was reworded to have the Assembly reiterate the need to ensure economic and political stability at the national and international levels for the full enjoyment, promotion and observance of human rights of peoples and individuals. Paragraphs on the right to development were also altered.

In a vote requested by Sweden, the words "of peoples and individuals" at the end of paragraph 6 were retained by 102 to 4, with 24 abstentions.

In a separate decision,<sup>(8)</sup> the Assembly, on 25 November, took note of the report of its Third Committee on the review and co-ordination of human rights programmes of United Nations organizations and co-operation with other international human rights programmes.<sup>(2)</sup> The decision, orally proposed by the President, was adopted without vote. The Committee's report contained no recommendations.

The United States, in voting against the resolution, cited its provisions on the right to development and the establishment of a new international economic order, and rejected the attempt to establish prerequisites for the respect or enjoyment of human rights. Abstaining, Canada, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy and the United Kingdom voiced reservations on the same provisions, as did Belgium, which abstained in Committee but voted affirmatively in the Assembly.

With regard to other aspects of the resolution, Canada thought it hazardous to emphasize certain rights, thus diminishing the importance of others; Canada also said it would have expected the draft to reflect the Assembly's concern for other serious and flagrant human rights violations, such as torture, inhuman or degrading treatment of prisoners, and arbitrary and summary executions. Italy felt that the fact that reference was made to the human rights of peoples before those of individuals could lead to mistaken interpretations and was unclear. The United Kingdom thought the resolution did not give due attention to civil and political rights.

Belgium stated that the text attached exclusive importance to a certain type of rights and placed excessive emphasis on international as opposed to national responsibility for promoting human rights. Though voting in favour, Ireland felt there should be no economic or political prerequisites for the protection and promotion of human rights, while New Zealand found the text unbalanced in giving economic, social and cultural rights priority over civil and political rights.

Sweden explained that its vote in favour was due to efforts by the sponsors to improve the text, which, however, represented a continued erosion of the concept of human rights as one which essentially concerned the relationship between State power and the individual. Turkey thought the principle of the exercise of human rights through safeguarding individual freedom and ensuring the participation of all citizens in decision-making was not adequately expressed in the text.

Brazil said it had voted in favour on the understanding that paragraph 2, reaffirming that adherence to international instruments was of paramount importance for the promotion of human rights, did not imply interference in the decision-making of sovereign countries. Guatemala and Malaysia also expressed reservations on that paragraph.

Belgium and Guatemala had reservations on paragraph 3, on priority for mass and flagrant human rights violations, and the Federal Republic of Germany regretted that the text emphasized certain categories of violations. Belgium also reserved its position on paragraph 6, on the need to ensure economic and political stability for the full enjoyment of human rights.

During the human rights debate in the Committee, several countries, including Bulgaria and Hungary, considered the existing United Nations structure for dealing with human rights to be satisfactory. Bulgaria called for measures to enable both the Economic and Social Council and the Commission on Human Rights to function more effectively. Brazil thought the aim of the search for alternative approaches should be to perfect the existing system. The German Democratic Republic, India and the USSR believed that the solution lay not in searching for new procedures but in utilizing existing possibilities in the United Nations system.

The Byelorussian SSR found the operation of United Nations human rights organs hampered by unnecessary links and by an increase in new working groups and other bodies. In Poland's view, simplification of the work of the international bodies concerned with human rights would suffice to ensure that procedures functioned more effectively.

Chile, on the other hand, thought the United Nations system for the protection of human rights required a radical overhaul and not simple changes such as those under study in the Commission; human rights bodies had become more politicized and there was a need for precise rules governing the actions of States, organizations and individuals. Finland and the United Kingdom, the latter speaking for the European Community (EC) members, also considered the international machinery for the implementation of human rights standards to be inadequate.

In France's opinion, the results of the search for ways to improve the enjoyment of human rights had been meagre; the Commission's Working Group on the subject should define the main lines of proposals made by delegations, after which its Chairman could submit a document listing the questions of greatest interest, in order to fix priorities.

Hungary said it was the role of the United Nations to establish universally accepted guidelines and norms, while regarding it as the responsibility of Governments to protect and promote human rights through implementation of those norms. The Netherlands stated that the search for alternative approaches should not distract attention from conventional approaches, based on human rights instruments, which should receive universal ratification; at the same time, it was important to elaborate general norms in more detailed conventions.

With regard to the functioning of the Commission on Human Rights, Canada and France suggested that it might hold two regular sessions every year, and the Netherlands and Venezuela favoured the holding of emergency or special sessions. Australia, Canada, the Netherlands and Venezuela supported the idea of inter-sessional meetings of the Commission's officers to deal with gross violations of human rights. Hungary and Mongolia opposed inter-sessional meetings, saying the officers were not in a position to express the political will of the Commission; in addition, Hungary did not think the Commission should hold emergency sessions.

Referring to the Secretary-General's report on international conditions and human rights, Australia endorsed its general conclusion that the Assembly should consider ways in which awareness of the human rights dimensions of issues confronting the United Nations could be heightened and that periodic reviews of the world human rights situation be undertaken. Canada and Cuba suggested that such a study be issued every two years. Ecuador suggested that the Assembly commission an annual report on the human rights situation in each country, including non-member States, and that every State be required to give an account of what was happening at home before expressing views on the situation in other countries.

UN machinery

Proposal for a UN

High Commissioner for Human Rights

Establishment of a post of United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, proposed for the first time in 1965 by Costa Rica,<sup>(8)</sup> was discussed again in 1981 by the Commission on Human Rights, its Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities and the General Assembly.

On 10 March, the Commission decided to inform the Assembly, through the Economic and Social Council, that it had not reached a decision on the establishment of the post.<sup>(6)</sup> The decision was taken by 25 votes to none, with 16 abstentions.

On 10 September,<sup>(5)</sup> by 15 votes to 2, with 5 abstentions, the Sub-Commission decided to inform the Commission that it was convinced that the number and scale of gross violations of human rights in many parts of the world required urgent and effective United Nations action and that the establishment of such a post would be highly valuable. On the same day, by 15 votes to 4, with 4 abstentions, the Sub-Commission decided to consider in 1982 the positive role a High Commissioner should play in the full enjoyment of human rights and requested the Secretary-General to provide it with information on the establishment of such an office.<sup>(7)</sup>

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution of 14 December 1981,<sup>(4)</sup> the General Assembly requested the Commission on Human Rights to consider this question with the attention it deserved and to report in 1982. It decided to examine in 1982 what steps might be taken in regard to the matter.

The resolution was adopted without vote, following similar approval by the Third Committee on 27 November of a twice-revised 20-nation draft. Introducing the original version of this draft, Costa Rica said the sponsors believed that the establishment of a post of High Commissioner would be an important step towards achieving effective human rights machinery and would produce positive results similar to those achieved by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR).

In the second revision of their draft, the sponsors took account of amendments proposed by Algeria, Cuba, India and Yugoslavia,<sup>(1)</sup> which after the revision were not pressed to a vote. The amendments, proposed to the initial version of the draft, were: from the preamble, to delete the words "with regret" from a paragraph noting the Commission's inability to reach a decision on the matter and to delete a paragraph stating that a decision must be made; in operative paragraph 1, to delete "as a matter of the highest priority" from the request for Commission consideration; in paragraphs 2 and 3, to have the Commission submit the results of its discussions rather than its "substantive recommendations"; and in paragraph 3, to delete phrases that would have had the Assembly decide "to take action . . . with a view to reaching a decision".

Endorsing the amendments, Yugoslavia said the original draft resolution would have prejudged the Commission's opinion. Argentina, Brazil, the Byelorussian SSR and Ethiopia also supported the amendments.

Italy, one of the sponsors of the draft resolution, submitted sub-amendments<sup>(2)</sup> that would have altered the four-nation amendments by: adding a preambular paragraph noting that the Commission had been seized of this important question since 1978; adding the phrase "with the urgency required by the importance of the issue" to the request for Commission consideration; urging the Commission to submit "concrete proposals" rather than the results of its discussions; and adding a phrase to have the Assembly decide to examine the possibility of acting on those proposals in 1982. Some elements of these sub-amendments, which were endorsed by Lesotho, were later incorporated into the final text.

After the sponsors submitted the first revision of their proposal, India orally proposed another set of amendments that would have: replaced a request that the Commission consider the question "with the attention required by the importance of the issue" by the phrase "as one of the issues deserving its attention among others to be discussed under the relevant item of its agenda"; had the Commission submit "the results of its deliberations" to the Assembly through the Economic and Social Council, rather than have it submit "conclusions and recommendations" directly to the Assembly; and had the Assembly also consider the views expressed by States at the 1981 Assembly session when it took up the Commission's report in 1982. These amendments were endorsed by Algeria, Cuba, Democratic Yemen, Indonesia, Kuwait and Yugoslavia.

Italy, supported by Costa Rica, orally proposed sub-amendments to India's amendments that would have had the Commission consider the question as an issue deserving "priority" rather than "attention", and would have added the phrase "including the proposals adopted" to the request for the results of the Commission's deliberations. These sub-amendments were endorsed by the Netherlands, while Ethiopia said it could not support them.

Explaining their position on the text finally approved, Bangladesh, Cuba, Ethiopia, India, Oman, Pakistan and Yugoslavia said that, had the draft been put to the vote, they would have abstained; Yugoslavia believed that the text still contained some formulations prejudicial to the Commission's work. Argentina, Brazil, Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, India and the USSR stated that they had joined in the consensus because the text was procedural.

In the Third Committee debate, support for the post of a High Commissioner was expressed by, among others, Australia, Canada, Chile, Costa Rica, France, Ireland, Lesotho, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, the United Kingdom (speaking for the EC members) and Venezuela. Australia regarded the resolution as giving the Commission a mandate to look thoroughly into the question. Nigeria said that in view of the changed political climate in that country it would hardly be logical for it to oppose the appointment of a High Commissioner; however, since a number of others were unable to support the idea without further consideration, Nigeria would accept the resolution without prejudging the issue.

Canada believed that a High Commissioner would contribute to promoting and protecting human rights throughout the world, since its incumbent would serve as an intermediary in finding specific solutions. In Costa Rica's opinion, the main question in relation to such a post was improving the capacity of the international community to react to human rights violations; an independent expert could hold the post and discharge its functions satisfactorily, as in the case of UNHCR. Chile also considered the example of UNHCR worthy of imitation. France cautioned that the person occupying the post could fully discharge his functions only if he enjoyed broad international support. Jamaica said the proposal to create a post of High Commissioner should not be regarded as something to be warded off because it might be used for interference in internal affairs of countries; such an official could not trespass without being called to account.

New Zealand hoped the Sub-Commission's recommendation would give new impetus to the question. Somalia thought such a post would complement the activities of other United Nations bodies. Spain hoped that the post would be established as soon as possible. The United Kingdom, speaking for the EC members, thought the appointment of a High Commissioner would be an effective way of helping the Secretary-General between sessions of the Commission.

The Eastern European countries, as well as others such as Brazil, Cuba, Madagascar, the Philippines and the Syrian Arab Republic, opposed the creation of such a post. A number of speakers, among them Bangladesh, Brazil, Bulgaria, Cuba, India, Madagascar, Mongolia, Oman, Poland, Romania, the USSR and Viet Nam, held the view that existing human rights machinery was sufficient, or that it should be improved before new organs were created. Democratic Yemen believed it would encroach on the sphere of existing bodies. Romania said attention should centre on a global review and evaluation by the Commission before the Assembly considered the creation of such a post.

In Yugoslavia's opinion, a High Commissioner would only be able to play the role of an international policeman to see how far developing countries implemented certain human rights concepts. Ethiopia did not think a policeman's role would be the best approach; promotion of human rights should be pursued through persuasion rather than coercion. The Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia, the Syrian Arab Republic, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR believed that the existence of a High Commissioner would provide an opportunity to interfere in the internal affairs of States. The Syrian Arab Republic added that the Assembly could always ask the Secretary-General to intervene in special cases, as it had done in the past.

Bulgaria thought that a High Commissioner for Human Rights could do no more than offer good offices to help States in the implementation of their internal human rights policies; however, good offices were an exclusive prerogative of the Secretary-General. Madagascar held it preferable to encourage accession to the International Covenants on Human Rights;<sup>(3)</sup> the greater the number of States complying with the obligations imposed by those Covenants, the greater would be the number of measures to promote and protect human rights.

The USSR stated that establishment of a post of High Commissioner would divert attention from such urgent problems as apartheid and human rights violations in the territories occupied by Israel. Czechoslovakia and the Lao People's Democratic Republic suggested that, instead of seeking to establish a new body, priority should be given to the search for solutions to mass and flagrant human rights violations.

Alternative approaches and ways and means in the United Nations system for improving the effective enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 35/175 of 15 December 1980, in which it decided to consider at its thirty-sixth session the question of the establishment of a post of United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights under the item entitled "Alternative approaches and ways and means within the United Nations system for improving the effective enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms",

Having considered the report of the Commission on Human Rights on its thirty-seventh session,

Noting that the Commission on Human Rights informed the General Assembly that it had not been able to reach a decision at its thirty-seventh session on the desirability of the establishment of a post of United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights,

Noting also that the Commission on Human Rights has been seized of this question since its thirty-fourth session under the item entitled "Further promotion and encouragement of human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the question of the programme and methods of work of the Commission: alternative approaches and ways and means within the United Nations system for improving the effective enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms",

1. Requests the Commission on Human Rights at its thirty-eighth session to consider this question with the attention it deserves;

2. Further requests the Commission on Human Rights to submit a report on its deliberations and their results to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session, through the Economic and Social Council;

3. Decides to resume consideration of this question at its thirty-seventh session, also taking into account the report of the Commission on Human Rights on its thirty-eighth session and the views expressed by Member States at the thirty-sixth session of the General Assembly under the item entitled "Alternative approaches and ways and means within the United Nations system for improving the effective enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms" and to examine what steps may be taken in this regard.

Review of the activities of the Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities

On 10 March 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the Commission on Human Rights, expressing appreciation for the valuable contribution of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities in the promotion and protection of human rights, requested it to indicate in its annual reports all matters requiring Commission approval, and asked the Secretary-General to draw Commission members' attention to relevant material as well as to other matters arising from those reports on which the Secretariat had already taken action. The Commission decided to allocate high priority to the annual consideration of the Sub-Commission's report, particularly its recommendations, and drew the attention of States and Sub-Commission members to the nature of the Sub-Commission's work as a body of individually qualified experts elected in their personal capacity, and to the Commission's view that the practice of permitting alternates to represent Sub-Commission members might not on occasion be in keeping with its character.

On 4 September,<sup>(2)</sup> the Sub-Commission decided, by 20 votes to 2, to place on its 1982 agenda a new, high priority item on review of the status and activities of the Sub-Commission and its relationships with the Commission and other United Nations bodies.

During the human rights debate in the General Assembly's Third Committee, the United Kingdom, speaking for the EC members, welcomed the Commission's decision to allocate high priority to the Sub-Commission's reports and recommendations.

Medium-term plan for 1984-1989

The draft included four subprogrammes: implementation of international standards, instruments and procedures; elimination and prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities and vulnerable groups; advisory services, technical assistance and publications; and standard setting, research and studies. The Commission invited the Secretariat to bear in mind, when finalizing the plan, the observations made in the Commission.

International human rights instruments

International Covenants on Human Rights

As at 31 December 1981, the International Covenants on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (p. 915) and on Civil and Political Rights (p. 889), which were adopted by the General Assembly in 1966<sup>(3)</sup> and entered into force in 1976,<sup>(5)</sup> had been ratified or acceded to by 71 and 69 States, respectively. In 1981, five States became parties to the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, while four became parties to the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. During the year, two States adhered to the Optional Protocol to the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, raising to 27 the total of States parties to that instrument.

A report of the Secretary-General to the General Assembly included a list of States which, as at 1 September 1981, had signed, ratified or acceded to the Covenants and the Optional Protocol.<sup>(1)</sup>

On 10 March,<sup>(2)</sup> the Commission on Human Rights reaffirmed the importance of the Covenants as major parts of international efforts to promote universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and urged States to become parties. It emphasized the importance of the strictest compliance by States parties with their obligations under the Covenants and encouraged Governments to publish and distribute their texts.

By a resolution of 25 November,<sup>(4)</sup> the General Assembly again invited States to become parties to the Covenants and made recommendations on implementation of each of them. The Secretary-General was requested to continue to ensure that the Secretariat's Division of Human Rights was able to assist the Human Rights Committee and the Economic and Social Council in the implementation of their functions under the Covenants.

The resolution was adopted, without vote, on the recommendation of the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, which approved the text in like manner on 3 November, on the basis of a 14-nation proposal.

Introducing the resolution on behalf of the sponsors, Denmark stated that international protection of human rights could best be achieved by legally binding treaties and the establishment of suitable forms of international supervision and control. Universal application of the Covenants must continue to be the principal aim in realizing the international protection of human rights.

During the Third Committee's debate on human rights, the Byelorussian SSR said a number of developed capitalist States parties to the Covenants were not taking measures to fulfil their obligations, which included laying down in their constitutions and legislation the main rights set out in the Covenants; in practice, those rights were being interpreted to serve the interests of the ruling classes. Remarking that political and economic rights could not be separated, the German Democratic Republic said it was time to end the artificial division between the Covenants. The Ukrainian SSR said the Covenants had stood the test of time; it regretted, however, that over half of the United Nations membership had yet to accede to them.

The USSR observed that the Covenants had not been signed by some developed countries whose representatives used human rights as an excuse for attempts to interfere in the internal affairs of other States. Similar comments were made by Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary and Mongolia; Czechoslovakia added that only if States adhered to international instruments and ensured their implementation could those instruments govern all international relations and their reporting and monitoring systems be widely utilized.

Finland believed that all States could undertake the obligations set out in the Covenants, regardless of their stage of economic development; even those countries which did not wish to ratify the Covenants should remember that, as United Nations Members, they had pledged themselves to promote the enjoyment of human rights.

Italy expressed hope that the Covenants and other human rights conventions would in future provide a basis for the elaboration of a world code of human rights applied by all Member States. In Portugal's opinion, the Covenants meant that the observance of human rights was no longer merely a matter of domestic jurisdiction and that violators could be called to account not only before world opinion but also in international forums; it hoped that States not parties would nevertheless regard the Covenants as a minimum standard for their human rights policies.

Zimbabwe suggested that consideration be given to setting up a United Nations fund to enable the Covenants to be translated into languages accessible to ordinary people.

Universal Declaration of Human Rights

Human Rights Day

A report on the annual observance of Human Rights Day on 10 December, the anniversary of the adoption by the General Assembly in 1948 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,<sup>(2)</sup> was presented by the Secretary-General to the Assembly in October 1981. This report<sup>(1)</sup> summarized information received from 27 countries on their 1980 celebration of the Day, the thirty-second anniversary of the Declaration.

Thirty-fifth anniversary of the Declaration

The General Assembly, by a resolution of 16 December 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> invited Member States and organizations to celebrate the thirty-fifth anniversary, in 1983, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It requested the Secretary-General to initiate United Nations activities and invited the United Nations Postal Administration to consider issuing commemorative postage stamps. The Assembly also decided to include in the provisional agenda of its 1983 session an item entitled "Thirty-five years of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: international co-operation for the promotion and observance of civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights", and to hold a commemorative meeting to celebrate the anniversary, which fell on 10 December 1983.

An annex to the resolution contained measures suggested by the Secretary-General for the celebration. At the national level these included: messages and meetings of parliamentary and other public and private institutions on Human Rights Day; efforts by States to ratify or accede to international human rights instruments (p. 937); establishment or strengthening of national and local human rights institutions; encouragement of teaching programmes on human rights at various educational levels; dissemination of the Declaration in national languages, including minority languages; issuance of postage stamps; encouragement of participation by non-governmental organizations; and organization of an essay competition. Recommendations for measures by the United Nations included the organization of commemorative events and of an international seminar in 1983 at Geneva on the experiences of countries in the implementation of international human rights standards, and issuance and distribution of information material.

The Secretary-General's suggestions on the observance were made in a note of 2 October 1981<sup>(1)</sup> in which he recalled that, since the adoption of the Declaration in 1948,<sup>(2)</sup> the United Nations had provided for special observances every five years since the tenth anniversary.

The resolution was adopted, without vote, on the recommendation of the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, which similarly approved the 16-nation text on 30 November, as orally revised. Prior to the Committee's approval, the sponsors deleted from the annex a recommendation for the award of human rights prizes. Explaining this change, Canada thought the related cost estimates of $80,800 to be excessive and suggested that human rights prizes be awarded on the fortieth anniversary of the Declaration, in 1988.

Introducing the resolution, Canada said the Declaration had won a special place in human affairs. Since 1948, the Assembly had thought it appropriate to mark the anniversary of its adoption and to celebrate it in certain years with special events. The resolution was intended to continue that tradition.

The USSR stated that human rights prizes should be awarded to deserving persons and that the practice of choosing the recipients without reference to the views of certain regional groups should be ended.

Observance of the thirty-fifth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights

The General Assembly,

Considering that the year 1983 will mark the thirty-fifth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which, conceived as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, has been and rightly continues to be a fundamental source of inspiration for national and international efforts for the protection and promotion of human rights and fundamental freedoms,

Aware that for their full observance human rights must be ensured to all human beings and that this aim cannot be attained unless human rights are made known to them, particularly through teaching and education,

Recalling in this respect that the General Assembly, in proclaiming the Declaration, demanded that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, should strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms,

Recalling also its resolution 32/123 of 16 December 1977 concerning the observance of the thirtieth anniversary of the Declaration,

Appealing to Member States, the specialized agencies and all international organizations, governmental and non-governmental, concerned with the protection and promotion of human rights, to take appropriate measures to ensure that the thirty-fifth anniversary of the Declaration is the occasion of special efforts to promote international understanding, co-operation and peace as well as universal and effective respect for human rights, particularly by laying stress on the educational approach both within and outside formal school systems,

Desiring to give appropriate significance to the thirty-fifth anniversary of the Declaration,

Taking note with appreciation of the suggestions contained in the note by the Secretary-General concerning the observance of the thirty-fifth anniversary of the Declaration,

1. Invites Member States, the specialized agencies and regional intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations to take appropriate measures, such as those set forth in the annex to the present resolution, to celebrate the thirty-fifth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to initiate appropriate activities at the United Nations level, such as those indicated in the annex to the present resolution, to celebrate the thirty-fifth anniversary of the Declaration;

3. Invites the United Nations Postal Administration to consider issuing commemorative postage stamps on the occasion of the thirty-fifth anniversary of the Declaration;

4. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-eighth session an item entitled "Thirty-five years of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: International co-operation for the promotion and observance of civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights" and recommends that this item should be considered in plenary meeting;

5. Further decides to hold a special commemorative meeting to celebrate the thirty-fifth anniversary of the Declaration, which falls on 10 December 1983, and requests the Secretary-General to make the necessary preparations for the programme of that meeting.

ANNEX

Accessions and ratifications

The Working Group on the Encouragement of Universal Acceptance of Human Rights Instruments, established in 1979 by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities<sup>(5)</sup> and composed of five of its members, met between 19 August and 4 September 1981 to examine ways of encouraging Governments to adhere to such instruments and information submitted by Governments as to why they had not done so. Based on recommendations in the Group's report, reproduced in its own report to the Commission on Human Rights,<sup>(1)</sup> the Sub-Commission, by a resolution of 10 September<sup>(4)</sup> adopted by 20 votes to none, with 1 abstention, requested the Secretary-General to renew the invitation to Governments to inform the Sub-Commission of the circumstances which had so far not enabled them to become parties to nine instruments listed by the Sub-Commission in 1979, and decided to consider in 1982 whether to include in the list the Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others (p. 915).

The General Assembly, by its resolution of 14 December 1981 on measures for the advancement of human rights, reaffirmed that it was of paramount importance for human rights that Member States should undertake specific obligations through adherence to international human rights instruments, and that the standard-setting work within the United Nations system in this field and the universal acceptance and implementation of the relevant international instruments should be encouraged.<sup>(2)</sup>

Guatemala and Malaysia voiced reservations on this paragraph, and Brazil explained that it had voted in favour of the resolution with the understanding that the paragraph did not imply interference in the freedom of countries to decide on adherence to international instruments.

Special efforts by States to become parties to human rights instruments, including those on the rights of women, were included among suggested measures for the celebration in 1983 of the thirty-fifth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (p. 935), annexed to an Assembly resolution of 16 December 1981.<sup>(3)</sup>

Other measures to advance human rights

Advisory services

In 1981, a seminar and a training course were held under the United Nations programme of advisory services in the field of human rights. From 3 to 14 August, a Seminar on the Relations that Exist between Human Rights, Peace and Development was held in New York (p. 973). A regional training course was organized at Canberra, Australia, on human rights guarantees in the administration of criminal justice (p. 889).

During the year, 29 individual human rights fellowships were granted to nationals of the following countries: Algeria, Benin, Burundi, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Greece, Haiti, Italy, Jordan, Mali, Mongolia, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Portugal, Romania, Senegal, Singapore, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Syrian Arab Republic, USSR, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia. The fellowships included awards for study on subjects dealing with the role of human rights in relation to women, children, immigrants and refugees; freedom of information; the environment; and other social and economic as well as civil and political factors.

In the absence of requests from Governments, no expert services were provided to countries in 1981. However, in response to requests from the Governments of the Central African Republic (see below), Equatorial Guinea (p. 938) and Uganda (p. 939), the Commission on Human Rights requested the Secretary-General to provide advisory services and other human rights assistance to those countries.

On 12 March 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the Commission on Human Rights took note of a report by the Secretary-General describing 1980 activities under the advisory services programme.<sup>(2)</sup>

Central African Republic

The Economic and Social Council, on 8 May 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> approved a decision taken by the Commission on Human Rights on 9 March<sup>(1)</sup> to request the Secretary-General, in response to the interest displayed by the Central African Republic, to provide advisory services and other assistance to help that Government continue to guarantee the enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms. The Commission also invited States, specialized agencies, United Nations organs and humanitarian and non-governmental organizations to provide co-operation and assistance to the Central African Republic in human rights and other areas.

The Council adopted the decision without vote, following similar approval by the Second (Social) Committee on 5 May.

Assistance to the Government of the Central African Republic in its efforts to guarantee the enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms

At its 18th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council approved the decision of the Commission on Human Rights, in its resolution 15(XXXVII) of 9 March 1981, to request the Secretary-General, in response to the interest displayed by the Government of the Central African Republic, to provide advisory services and other forms of appropriate assistance to help that Government to continue to guarantee the enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms in that country.

Equatorial Guinea

The human rights situation in Equatorial Guinea was under review in 1981 by the Commission on Human Rights and the Economic and Social Council. A three-stage plan for the full restoration of human rights in that country was submitted to the Government and the Commission by a United Nations expert.

Fernando Volio Jiménez, the expert appointed in 1980<sup>(5)</sup> to study the human rights situation in Equatorial Guinea, presented a report<sup>(2)</sup> which was considered by the Commission in 1981. He described his visit to Equatorial Guinea (27 November-4 December 1980), preceded by talks in Spain, the former administering Power.

In his conclusions, the expert noted that the effects of 11 years of dictatorship were still to be seen. Economic and social conditions were distressing, with acute and widespread poverty. Working conditions were hard and national customs created unjust conditions for women. However, there had been positive changes; the country had a new body of legal norms which provided a suitable basis on which to found a system for the protection of human rights. Improvements seemed to have been made in health care, education and the administration of justice. Freedom of information seemed to have improved, although radio and television were State-controlled.

The expert recommended gradual transfer of power from the military Government to civilian authorities. For the full restoration of human rights, he recommended a three-stage plan, including: a review of existing legislation; the improvement of conditions with regard to education, the status of women, freedom of the press, public health and training of public employees; and the convening of a constitutional convention or constituent assembly to draft a constitution that would be submitted for popular approval by referendum. For the practical implementation of that three-stage plan, approved by the Government of Equatorial Guinea, the expert made a number of recommendations, including the establishment by the Government of a review commission and the provision of United Nations and other external assistance.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. By a resolution of 8 May 1981,<sup>(4)</sup> the Economic and Social Council reiterated its readiness to assist the Government of Equatorial Guinea, at its request, in the task of restoring human rights and requested the Secretary-General to invite the expert to continue to place his advice and assistance at the Government's disposal. The Council further requested the Secretary-General to draw up, in consultation with the expert and the Government, a draft plan of action for implementing the expert's recommendations. It asked the Secretary-General to consult Governments, United Nations organs and organizations and the Organization of African Unity to determine how they might be able to contribute towards the plan's implementation and to inform the Council of the results. The Council expressed appreciation to the Government for its efforts towards the restoration of human rights and invited it to continue its efforts to restore the democratic freedoms abolished by the former Government and to encourage citizen participation in that process.

The resolution was adopted without vote, following similar approval by the Council's Second Committee on 5 May. Adoption of the text was recommended on 11 March by the Commission on Human Rights, which decided to keep the human rights situation in Equatorial Guinea under review in 1982.<sup>(3)</sup>

By a note of 6 June 1981, the Secretary-General informed the Council that he could not submit in 1981 the draft plan of action requested by the Council, as consultations were still in progress.<sup>(1)</sup> The Council, on 16 July, invited the Commission to study the draft plan in 1982 and to make recommendations, which the Council would consider at its first regular session of 1982.<sup>(6)</sup>

The Council took the decision without vote. The draft was orally proposed by the President and amended by Canada to include the invitation to the Commission to study the plan and to make recommendations; the President further revised the text to have the Council consider the Commission's report.

The efforts of Equatorial Guinea to restore human rights, and the provision of United Nations assistance to help the Government in doing so, were welcomed in the Council by Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany, Spain and the United Kingdom. Belgium thought the experiment in Equatorial Guinea was extremely important because it was the first time that a country had requested United Nations aid in implementing human rights. The Federal Republic of Germany said much remained to be done in order to re-establish human rights firmly in the country and protect them against further infringement. Spain regretted that the plan of action had not been completed and urged the Secretary-General to expedite consultations.

Assistance to the Government of Equatorial Guinea in its efforts to guarantee the enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its decision 1980/137 of 2 May 1980 on the situation of human rights in Equatorial Guinea, as well as resolutions 15(XXXV) of 13 March 1979, 33(XXXVI) of 11 March 1980 and 31 (XXXVII) of 11 March 1981 of the Commission on Human Rights.

Taking note with appreciation of the report submitted by Professor Fernando Volio Jiménez, expert appointed by the Secretary-General in pursuance of resolution 33(XXXVI) of the Commission on Human Rights,

Bearing in mind General Assembly resolutions 34/123 of 14 December 1979 and 35/105 of 5 December 1980 on assistance to Equatorial Guinea, Conscious of the need to ensure that such assistance should include a response to the human rights requirements of the situation.

Mindful of the efforts being made by the Government of Equatorial Guinea to ensure respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms in that country,

Noting that the Government of Equatorial Guinea would be prepared to accept the working plan submitted by the expert to assist it in its efforts to restore the full enjoyment of human rights in the country,

1. Expresses its appreciation to Professor Fernando Volio Jiménez, expert appointed in accordance with resolution 33(XXXVI) of the Commission on Human Rights, for his efforts to provide advice and assistance to the Government of Equatorial Guinea and also for his report;

2. Expresses its appreciation also to the Government of Equatorial Guinea for its efforts towards the restoration of human rights in Equatorial Guinea and for the co-operation extended to the expert, and invites the Government to continue its efforts to restore the democratic freedoms abolished by the former Government and to encourage the participation of the citizens in the restoration of the democratic system in the country;

3. Reiterates its readiness to assist the Government of Equatorial Guinea, at its request, in the task of restoring human rights in Equatorial Guinea and, to that end, requests the Secretary-General to invite the expert to continue to place his advice and assistance at the disposal of the Government of Equatorial Guinea, particularly with a view to the implementation of his recommendations to that Government, taking into account the political, economic and social conditions of the country;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, bearing in mind the need for co-ordination with other assistance activities, to draw up, in consultation with the expert and the Government and to submit to the Economic and Social Council for consideration at its second regular session of 1981, a draft plan of action for implementing those recommendations of the expert which he deems feasible;

5. Further requests the Secretary-General, in drawing up the draft plan of action, to consult Governments, other United Nations organs and the relevant parts of the United Nations Secretariat, specialized agencies, non-governmental organizations in consultative status and the Organization of African Unity, with a view to determining in what ways they may be able to contribute towards implementing the plan, and to inform the Council of the results of those consultations.

Provision of expert services in the field of human rights to Equatorial Guinea

At its 37th plenary meeting, on 16 July 1981, the Council:

(a) Took note of the note by the Secretary-General on the implementation of Council resolution 1981/38 of 8 May 1981 regarding the provision of expert services in the field of human rights to Equatorial Guinea;

(b) Decided to invite the Commission on Human Rights to study at its thirty-eighth session the draft plan of action to be prepared by the Secretary-General in pursuance of Council resolution 1981/38, and to request the Commission to report to the Council, making any recommendations that it may consider to be appropriate;

(c) Decided to consider the draft plan of action, and the report of the Commission on Human Rights requested in paragraph (b) above, at its first regular session of 1982.

Uganda

The Economic and Social Council, on 8 May 1981, <sup>(2)</sup> approved the decision taken on 11 March by the Commission on Human Rights <sup>(1)</sup> to request the Secretary-General, in response to the interest expressed by the Government of Uganda, to provide advisory services and other assistance to help that Government continue to guarantee the enjoyment of human rights. The Commission also invited States, specialized agencies, United Nations organs and humanitarian and non-governmental organizations to support Uganda in its human rights efforts.

The Council decision, which had been recommended by the Commission, was adopted without vote, following its approval in the same manner by the Second Committee on 5 May.

Assistance to the Government of Uganda in its efforts to guarantee the enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms

At its 18th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council approved the decision taken by the Commission on Human Rights, in its resolution 30(XXXVII) of 11 March 1981, to request the Secretary-General, in response to the interest expressed by the Government of Uganda, to provide advisory services and other forms of appropriate assistance to help that Government in taking appropriate measures to continue to guarantee the enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms in that country.

Termination of the periodic reports system

On the recommendation of the Commission on Human Rights, made on 13 March 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> the Economic and Social Council, on 8 May,<sup>(3)</sup> decided to terminate the periodic reporting system on human rights established in 1965,<sup>(1)</sup> under which Governments reported regularly to the United Nations on the human rights situation in their country and specialized agencies reported on matters pertaining to particular groups of rights. The Council decision was taken without vote, following similar approval by the Second Committee on 5 May.

Periodic reports on human rights

At its 18th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council, noting decision 10(XXXVII) of 13 March 1981 of the Commission on Human Rights, decided to terminate the periodic reporting system established by Council resolution 1074 C (XXXIX) of 28 July 1965.

Public information activities in human rights

As requested by the Economic and Social Council in May 1980,<sup>(3)</sup> the Secretary-General presented to the Commission on Human Rights in January 1981 a programme for United Nations dissemination of international human rights instruments in as many languages as possible.<sup>(1)</sup> The programme, to be implemented in two stages of two years each, foresaw for 1982-1983 the updating of the publication Human Rights: A Compilation of international Instruments and the reprinting of the pamphlet The International Bill of Human Rights in the six official languages of the General Assembly. These publications would be issued in additional languages in 1984-1985, when the Universal Declaration of Human Rights would also be reissued in pamphlet form and additional copies of instruments in specific fields, such as non-discrimination and the abolition of torture, would be disseminated. The Secretary-General also informed the Commission about United Nations public information activities on human rights, including films, radio programmes, press releases and publications.

On 10 March 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> the Commission requested the Secretary-General to continue to implement the programmes referred to in his reports on public information activities in the field of human rights and to report each year on implementation. The Commission also invited him to consider ways of facilitating the stimulation of public interest in the promotion and protection of human rights and to report in 1982. It requested Governments to continue considering action to facilitate publicity on United Nations human rights activities.

On 8 May 1981, the Economic and Social Council approved the Commission's request that the Secretary-General continue to implement the programmes referred to in his reports and keep the Commission informed.<sup>(5)</sup>

The decision was adopted without vote, following its approval in the same manner by the Second Committee on 5 May, where the draft submitted by the Commission was orally amended by Brazil to replace a reference to reports on "this subject" with reports on "measures taken to enhance public information activities in the field of human rights".

The General Assembly, in its resolution of 14 December on national institutions for human rights,<sup>(4)</sup> requested the Secretary-General, in carrying out public information activities in the field of human rights, to give due attention to the role of national institutions and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) concerned with the promotion and protection of human rights. It also invited Member States to disseminate the texts of human rights instruments, including international conventions, in national or local languages.

Development of public information activities in the field of human rights

At its 18th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council took note of resolution 24(XXXVII) of 10 March 1981 of the Commission on Human Rights, and approved the Commission's request to the Secretary-General to continue to implement the programmes referred to in his reports on measures taken to enhance public information activities in the field of human rights and to keep the Commission informed thereon.

National Institutions for human rights

In response to 1979 requests by the Commission on Human Rights<sup>(5)</sup> and the General Assembly,<sup>(2)</sup> the Secretary-General submitted to the Assembly in October 1981 a report describing various types of national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights.<sup>(1)</sup> In the area of protection, the report covered judicial and independent non-judicial institutions, legislative organs, administrative institutions such as the police, legal counselling and assistance, and the role of NGOs. It also dealt with special problems regarding the protection of persons in certain categories, including children and minorities. In the area of promotion, it covered participation in government, institutions for education and information dissemination, health care systems, social security and social welfare schemes, labour institutions, institutions to promote the rights of the child and racial harmony, and NGOs.

Taking note of this report, the Assembly, by a resolution of 14 December,<sup>(3)</sup> invited Member States to take steps to establish or strengthen national human rights institutions and to disseminate the texts of human rights instruments in national and local languages. The Secretary-General was requested to provide assistance for such dissemination, particularly to developing countries. The Assembly also recommended that Member States consider including material on human rights issues in their educational curriculum and that they encourage the exchange of experience in the establishment of national human rights institutions. It requested the Secretary-General to submit in 1983 a report providing details on various types of national human rights institutions and, in carrying out public information activities on human rights (p. 940), to give due attention to the role of national institutions.

The resolution was adopted, without vote, on the recommendation of the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, which similarly approved the lo-nation text on 9 November, as orally revised by the sponsors. In the revision, the phrase "drawing upon all available sources of information" was dropped from the request that the Secretary-General report on various types of national institutions.

Introducing the draft, India said the sponsors wished to reaffirm their belief in the important role of national institutions in the promotion and protection of human rights. Several of the concepts in the draft were drawn from previous Assembly resolutions and the thrust of the text was to enhance public awareness of international human rights instruments.

The United States said its understanding was that the resolution, especially the requests to the Secretary-General to provide assistance and submit a report, would have no financial implications.

During the Committee debate on human rights, Madagascar said it had been applying most of the guidelines recommended by the 1978 Seminar on National and Local Institutions for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights.<sup>(4)</sup> Jamaica remarked that, if national institutions were functioning as they had been intended to do, there would be no need for further action.

National institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 32/123 of 16 December 1977, 33/46 of 14 December 1978 and 34/49 of 23 November 1979 concerning national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights,

Mindful of the guidelines on the structure and functioning of national and local institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights, endorsed by the General Assembly in its resolution 33/46,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights,

Mindful also of the need to create conditions, at the national and international levels, for the promotion and protection of the human rights of individuals and peoples,

Emphasizing the importance of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenants on Human Rights and other international human rights instruments for promoting respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms,

Reiterating its conviction that all human rights and fundamental freedoms are indivisible and interdependent, and that equal attention and urgent consideration should be given to the implementation, promotion and protection of both civil and political rights, and economic, social and cultural rights,

Noting that the Commission on Human Rights and the Economic and Social Council have been giving attention to the development of public information activities in the field of human rights,

1. Invites all Member States to take appropriate steps for the establishment or, where they already exist, the strengthening of national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights;

2. Emphasizes the importance of the integrity and independence of such national institutions, in accordance with national legislation;

3. Draws attention to the constructive role that national non-governmental organizations can play in the work of national institutions;

4. Invites all Member States to take appropriate steps to disseminate the texts of human rights instruments, including international covenants and conventions, in their respective national or local languages in order to give the widest possible publicity to these instruments;

5. Recommends that all Member States should consider including material relevant to a comprehensive understanding of human rights issues in their educational curriculum;

6. Recommends that all Member States should take appropriate steps to encourage the exchange of experience in the establishment of national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights;

7. Requests the Secretary-General, in carrying out public information activities in the field of human rights, to give due attention to the role of national institutions and non-governmental organizations concerned with the promotion and protection of human rights;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to provide all necessary assistance to Member States, upon their request, in the implementation of paragraph 4 above, high priority being accorded to the needs of developing countries;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its thirty-eighth session a report providing detailed information on the various types of national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights, taking into account differing social and legal systems and the contribution that national institutions can make towards the implementation of the international human rights instruments;

10. Recommends that Member States should bring the present resolution to the attention of representatives of their national institutions;

11. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-eighth session a sub-item entitled "National institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights".

Regional arrangements for human rights

In compliance with a December 1980 General Assembly request,<sup>(2)</sup> the Secretary-General, in a July 1981 report,<sup>(1)</sup> informed the Assembly that, subject to finalization of consultations, it had been decided to defer until 1982 the holding of a seminar of the Asian States on arrangements for the promotion and protection of human rights. He also reported that, in connection with efforts currently under way in the Organization of African Unity (OAU) to elaborate an African Charter of human rights and to establish an African commission on human rights, he had maintained contacts with the OAU Secretary-General with a view to making United Nations assistance available.

The Assembly, by a resolution of 16 December,<sup>(*)</sup> commended OAU on the adoption of the African Charter of Human and People's Rights. It noted with satisfaction that consultations had been held with Asian States on the holding of a seminar at Colombo, Sri Lanka, to consider arrangements for the promotion and protection of human rights in the region, and requested the Secretary-General to organize that seminar in 1982 and report to the Assembly on its deliberations.

The resolution was adopted without vote, following similar approval by the Third Committee on 30 November. The 13-nation draft was introduced by Sri Lanka.

Explaining its position in the Committee, Viet Nam stated that the views of Asian States on human rights continued to differ owing to manipulation by certain Powers which had themselves violated human rights and were determined to impose their distorted version of facts; it would be difficult to prevent participants in the seminar from being misled and to ensure that the meeting contributed to improving the human rights situation in Asia. The Byelorussian SSR, Mongolia and the USSR also voiced reservations on the convening of the seminar, saying its objectives and agenda should be the subject of consultations with all Asian States. In addition, the USSR believed that the seminar should not entail additional expenditure.

India hoped for a constructive exchange of views at the seminar and a more substantive discussion once its conclusions were available. New Zealand welcomed Sri Lanka's offer to host the seminar.

Regional arrangements for the promotion and protection of human rights

The General Assembly.

Recalling its resolution 34/171 of 17 December 1979, in which it reiterated its appeal to States in areas where regional arrangements in the field of human rights do not yet exist to consider agreements with a view to the establishment within their respective regions of suitable regional arrangements for the promotion and protection of human rights,

Recalling also its resolution 35/197 of 15 December 1980,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General.

Welcoming recent developments in the Organization of African Unity towards the establishment of regional arrangements for the promotion and protection of human rights,

1. Commends the Organization of African Unity on the adoption of the African Charter of Human and People's Rights;

2. Notes with satisfaction that consultations were held with Member States of the Asian region with a view to the holding of a seminar at Colombo to consider appropriate arrangements for the promotion and protection of human rights in the region;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to organize the above-mentioned seminar at Colombo in 1982 and to report to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session on the deliberations of the seminar.

Human rights violations

Situations involving alleged violations of human rights on a large scale in several countries were again examined in 1981 by the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council and the Commission on Human Rights, as well as by special bodies and officials appointed to examine some of these situations. The Assembly and/or the Council took action on South Africa and Namibia (see below), Chile (p. 951), the territories occupied by Israel (p. 955), Bolivia (p. 957), El Salvador (p. 958) and Guatemala (p. 963). Situations in Cyprus (p. 958) and Iran (p. 965) were raised before the Commission. The problems of mass exoduses (p. 965) and hostages (p. 966) were also under study, as were United Nations procedures for dealing with human rights violations (p. 966).

In addition, the United Nations offered assistance to the Central African Republic (p. 937), Equatorial Guinea (p. 938) and Uganda (p. 939), p where human rights violations under former regimes had been reported.

South Africa and Namibia

WORKING GROUP ACTIVITIES. The Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts on Southern Africa, established in 1967 by the Commission on Human Rights,<sup>(6)</sup> submitted a report in January 1981 which dealt with developments concerning policies and practices violating human rights in South Africa and Namibia.<sup>(1)</sup> The report was based mainly on first-hand information which the Group had received in the form of testimony and written communications from individuals and organizations during a mission of inquiry from 4 to 29 August 1980, as well as an analysis of published information.

On the basis of the information received, the Group formulated the following conclusions: In South Africa, the situation had not changed; apartheid remained government policy, with repressive measures continuing against all those, mostly blacks, who sought to eliminate apartheid. Political repression, detention without trial, mass removal of populations, torture of political prisoners and detainees sometimes resulting in death, harassment of trade union leaders (p. 949) and students, and the exploitation of large numbers of black labourers had been noticeable. Some minor changes had taken place, such as enabling some blacks to participate in so-called white sporting events, but they were of form rather than substance. The number of persons sentenced to death had more than doubled in 1980 compared with the previous nine years. The Bantu homelands policy, involving forced mass removal of blacks from their traditional homes, continued to be at variance with the right of people to self-determination. Conditions of black workers continued to be precarious and widespread school boycotts had occurred.

The Group suggested that the Commission renew its request for Security Council action, not excluding resort to Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations (on action with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression) (p. 165). It reiterated its suggestion for a General Assembly study of the South African Government's legitimacy in view of its apartheid policy and its systematic refusal to apply the principles of the Charter and other international instruments, and an Assembly reaffirmation that the struggle against apartheid was legitimate and required United Nations assistance; in particular, persons in South Africa who refused to comply with its inhuman policies should be entitled to special consideration as refugees. Also, the Commission should urge countries to terminate political, economic, cultural and other collaboration with South Africa (p. 180), and authorize the Working Group to continue to study human rights violations there, with particular reference to the ill-treatment of women and children (p. 198).

Concerning Namibia (p. 1128), the Group noted that the basic measures taken by South Africa had been to facilitate the accession to power of the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance, against the wishes of United Nations bodies legally responsible for administering the Territory and in contravention of proposals endorsed by the Security Council. South Africa had consolidated its jurisdiction and military occupation, and its military incursions into border localities of Angola and Zambia had escalated. Black workers continued to suffer from discrimination, wage reduction and inequality, wretched working conditions especially in the mines, lack of medical care and a ban on trade union activities. For the first time, the Group had been informed of the existence of trained South African squads with licence to assassinate supporters of the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO). South African security laws, providing severe penalties of detention and imprisonment for "political offences", were still applied to Namibia, and the number of detainees had increased.

The Group reiterated its recommendations on the right of the Namibians to self-determination and independence and the enjoyment of human rights. It recommended that the Commission: call on South Africa to desist from using Namibia for launching attacks against neighbouring States (p. 214); strongly condemn the violations of the territorial integrity of Angola which were causing massacres of civilians (p. 217); call on South Africa to conform to the international standard minimum rules for the treatment of prisoners; and authorize the Group to continue to study cases of torture and mutilation of refugees captured at Kassinga Camp in Angola and detained at the Hardap Dam Camp near Marienthal in southern Namibia. The Group recommended that a study be undertaken on the harmful effects of apartheid on women and children and that the Commission continue to institute inquiries in respect of persons suspected of having been guilty in Namibia of the crime of apartheid or of a serious violation of human rights.

The Working Group also submitted in January a study on ways of ensuring implementation of international instruments such as the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid, including the establishment of the international jurisdiction envisaged by the Convention (p. 947).

Following the renewal of its mandate by the Commission in February (p. 945), the Working Group carried out a mission of inquiry in London from 29 June to 3 July 1981 to gather information for a report it was to present to the Commission in 1982.

ACTION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS. On 23 February 1981, the Commission on Human Rights adopted two resolutions on the report of the Working Group. By one of them,<sup>(3)</sup> it adopted the Group's conclusions and recommendations, renewed its mandate (p. 945) and suggested that the General Assembly refer to the International Court of Justice the question of whether a State like South Africa, pursuing apartheid and denying human rights, might lawfully continue to hold a place in the international community. By the other resolution,<sup>(2)</sup> concerned mainly with Namibia, the Commission requested the Security Council to consider imposing mandatory economic sanctions against South Africa, in particular a mandatory embargo on the supply of petroleum and petroleum products (p. 175), and to reinforce the arms embargo against South Africa (p. 172) by adopting comprehensive measures to end all military and nuclear collaboration with the apartheid régime.

In the resolution by which it renewed the Working Group's mandate, the Commission also denounced bantustanization; requested the Assembly to reaffirm that the struggle against apartheid justified the granting of United Nations assistance to those taking part in that struggle; and, referring to apartheid as a crime against humanity, invited countries collaborating with South Africa to terminate such relations. The Commission appealed for ratification of the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid and invited Member States to make observations on proposals for an international penal tribunal under that Convention (p. 947).

Provisions on Namibia were contained in both resolutions. In the more general one, the Commission condemned South Africa's increased military presence and its attempt to impose a puppet regime. It denounced and condemned South Africa's attacks on neighbouring States and, in the resolution concerned largely with Namibia, it called on that country to desist from aggression. Also in the latter resolution, the Commission welcomed the declared readiness of SWAPO to agree to a cease-fire and the placement of the United Nations Transition Assistance Group in Namibia, reaffirmed the Namibians' right to self-determination and independence, and declared that only exercise of that right under conditions determined by the United Nations conformed to international law. It demanded that South Africa cease torture and ill-treatment of Namibian detainees and prisoners and that captured freedom fighters be granted prisoner-of-war status, and called for the immediate release of all Namibian political prisoners. It called on countries to prevent the recruitment of their nationals as mercenaries to fight with the South African army in Namibia, and appealed to States and United Nations organs to increase political, financial and material assistance to SWAPO.

The resolution by which the Commission endorsed the Group's recommendations and renewed its mandate was adopted by 33 votes to 3, with 5 abstentions, while the resolution on Namibia was adopted by a roll-call vote of 35 to none, with 6 abstentions.

On 6 March, in a resolution on the self-determination of peoples (p. 891),<sup>(4)</sup> the Commission condemned increasing massacres of innocent and defenceless people by the racist régime, as well as South Africa's aggression against neighbouring front-line States (p. 214) and death sentences passed against freedom fighters of the African National Congress of South Africa and SWAPO (p. 195). It called on South Africa to reprieve the sentences for humanitarian reasons.

On 8 May,<sup>(5)</sup> the Economic and Social Council decided to transmit to the Assembly, the Security Council and the Special Committee against Apartheid the more general of the Commission's resolutions on the Group's report. This decision, based on a draft approved by the Commission, was adopted without vote, following its approval by the Second (Social) Committee on 5 May in the same manner.

Violations of human rights in southern Africa: report of the Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts

At its 18th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council, noting resolution 5(XXXVII) of 23 February 1981 of the Commission on Human Rights, decided to transmit that resolution to the General Assembly, the Security Council and the Special Committee against Apartheid.

Continuation of the Working Group

The Commission on Human Rights, in its resolution of 23 February 1981<sup>(1)</sup> on the activities of the Working Group on Southern Africa (p. 943), renewed the Group's mandate. It decided that the Group should continue to examine policies and practices violating human rights in South Africa and Namibia, inquire about persons suspected of having been guilty in Namibia of the crime of apartheid or any other serious human rights violation, and bring immediately to the attention of the Commission Chairman particularly serious violations or violations calling for urgent action. The Group was requested: to examine reports on apartheid as a form of slavery and on child labour in South Africa; to study what the Commission might do or suggest for active participation in the struggle against apartheid; to investigate, in co-operation with the Special Committee against Apartheid, the conditions of imprisonment and the health of persons captured at Kassinga and imprisoned at the Hardap Dam Camp; to study the effects of apartheid on black women and children; and to submit a progress report in 1982 and a report on its findings in 1983.

On 8 May 1981, the Economic and Social Council approved the Commission's decision to renew the Working Group's mandate.<sup>(2)</sup> This decision, based on a draft approved by the Commission, was adopted without vote, following its approval by the Second Committee on 5 May in the same manner.

At its 18th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council approved the decision of the Commission on Human Rights, 'in its resolution 5(XXXVII) of 23 February 1981, to renew the mandate of the Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts and to request the Secretary-General to provide every assistance and the resources required to enable the Ad Hoc Working Group to discharge its responsibilities in accordance with its terms of reference.

Foreign support of South Africa

Under the agenda item on adverse consequences for the enjoyment of human rights of political, military, economic and other assistance to the colonial and racist régimes in southern Africa, the Commission on Human Rights adopted on 23 February 1981, by 30 votes to 4, with 6 abstentions, a resolution<sup>(2)</sup> calling for an end to all forms of assistance to the racist régime in South Africa (p. 180); affirming the inalienable right of the peoples of South Africa and Namibia to self-determination, independence and the enjoyment of their natural resources; and expressing full support for the May 1981 International Conference on Sanctions against South Africa (p. 165).

The Commission welcomed the September 1980 decision of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities<sup>(6)</sup> to mandate Special Rapporteur Ahmed Mohamed Khalifa (Egypt) to continue updating the list of banks, transnational corporations (TNCs) and other organizations assisting the South African régime, and to submit a revised report through the Sub-Commission for consideration by the Commission in 1982 (p. 188). It called on States, specialized agencies and non-governmental and other organizations to continue to publicize the report, and called on the countries in which the listed banks, TNCs and organizations were based to take action to end their trading, manufacturing and investing in South Africa and Namibia.

On 6 March, in a resolution on the self-determination of peoples (p. 891),<sup>(3)</sup> the Commission condemned the policy of States which maintained political, economic, military and other relations with South Africa, thus supporting, protecting and encouraging its persistence in suppressing aspirations for self-determination and independence.

The mandate of the Special Rapporteur was endorsed by the Economic and Social Council on 8 May.<sup>(5)</sup> The decision, based on a draft by the Commission, was adopted by 42 votes to 5, with 6 abstentions, following its approval by the Second Committee on 5 May by 39 votes to 5, with 6 abstentions.

The updated report was issued in July.<sup>(1)</sup> Noting it with satisfaction, the Sub-Commission, on 9 September,<sup>(4)</sup> invited the Special Rapporteur to continue updating the list for annual review. The Secretary-General was invited to give the report widest publicity. The Sub-Commission recommended to the Commission that the Group of Three set up under the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid (see below) be asked to examine whether the actions of TNCs operating in South Africa came under the definition of the crime of apartheid and whether or not legal action could be taken under the Convention. The Sub-Commission also decided to give the matter high priority in 1982.

Adverse consequences for the enjoyment of human rights of political, military, economic and other forms of assistance given to the colonial and racist régime in South Africa

At its 18th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council noted resolution 8(XXXVII) of 23 February 1981 of the Commission on Human Rights and approved the decision of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, in its resolution 2(XXXIII) of 2 September 1980, to give Mr. Ahmed Khalifa, Special Rapporteur, a mandate to continue to update the list of banks, transnational corporations and other organizations giving assistance to the colonial and racist regime in South Africa and to submit a revised report, through the Sub-Commission, to the Commission on Human Rights.

Convention against apartheid

Ratifications and accessions

During 1981, seven more States adhered to the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid which was adopted by the General Assembly in 1973<sup>(6)</sup> and entered into force on 18 July 1976.<sup>(9)</sup>

This brought to 65 the number of States (italics indicate those adhering in 1981) having ratified or acceded to the Convention as at 31 December 1981:

Bahamas, Barbados, Benin, Bulgaria, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Guinea, Guyana, Haiti, Hungary, India, Iraq, Jamaica, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Mali, Mexico, Mongolia, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Panama, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sao Tome and Principe, Senegal, Seychelles, Somalia, Sudan, Suriname, Syrian Arab Republic, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Cameroon, United Republic of Tanzania, Upper Volta, Viet Nam, Yugoslavia, Zaire.

In resolutions of 23 February on human rights violations in southern Africa<sup>(4)</sup> (p. 944) and on implementation of the Convention<sup>(5)</sup> (p. 947), the Commission on Human Rights appealed to States to ratify or accede to the Convention without delay. Appeals for adherence to the Convention were made by the General Assembly in resolutions of 28 October on the status of the Convention<sup>(7)</sup> and of 17 December on the situation in South Africa.<sup>(8)</sup>

During the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee's debate on racial discrimination, the Bahamas, Hungary, India, Jamaica, Mongolia, the Philippines, Romania, Rwanda, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, the USSR and Zaire were among those urging additional adherences to the Convention. Egypt and others deplored the fact that so few States had become parties. The Ukrainian SSR said it was significant that not one member of the Western Group had signed the Convention; the Byelorussian SSR said that was so because they wanted to continue co-operating with South Africa.

In notes verbales to the Secretary-General dated 12, 17 and 30 November, respectively, annexed to letters of the same dates, the USSR,<sup>(3)</sup> the Byelorussian SSR<sup>(1)</sup> and the Ukrainian SSR<sup>(2)</sup> stated that they regarded the accession to the Convention by "so-called 'Democratic Kampuchea'" as illegal and without legal force.

Implementation of the Convention

ACTIVITIES OF THE GROUP OF THREE. The Group of Three, established under article IX of the Convention against apartheid<sup>(6)</sup> to consider reports by States parties on measures, they had taken to implement the Convention's provisions, held its fourth session at Geneva from 26 to 30 January 1981<sup>(1)</sup> The Group, consisting of Bulgaria, Cuba and Nigeria for the 1981 session, considered first (initial) reports from six States parties (Burundi, Egypt, Mali, Qatar, Tunisia, Yugoslavia) and second reports from eight States (Bulgaria, Byelorussian SSR, Cuba, Nigeria, Poland, Romania, Ukrainian SSR, USSR). Representatives of these States, except for Mali, attended the meetings to supplement the information in the reports.

In its conclusions and recommendations, the Group expressed the opinion that the presence of States' representatives at its meetings in connection with the consideration of reports should be continued. The Group called on States to provide more comprehensive information on measures taken and difficulties encountered in implementing article IV of the Convention, on suppression or prevention of encouragement of apartheid and prosecution and punishment for the crime of apartheid.

The Group appealed once again for the strengthening of international co-operation to implement fully the decisions of the Security Council and other United Nations organs aimed at the prevention, suppression and punishment of apartheid. In that connection, it drew attention to the importance of strengthening assistance to liberation movements in southern Africa.

The Group recommended that the list of individuals, organizations, institutions and State representatives responsible for crimes of apartheid drawn up by the Commission on Human Rights in accordance with article X, be brought again to the attention of United Nations Members and be further publicized. It also drew attention to the desirability of disseminating information relating to the Convention, its implementation and the work of the Group.

In accordance with the Group's recommendation, the list of those responsible for crimes of apartheid was published in the Bulletin of Human Rights (issue No. 28).

On 23 February,<sup>(5)</sup> the Commission took note with appreciation of the Group's report and recommendations, appealed for additional ratifications of the Convention (p. 946), commended States parties that had submitted their reports and appealed to others to do so as soon as possible. It requested that States parties be invited to comment on the study on implementation prepared by the Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts on Southern Africa (see below). The Commission decided that the Group of Three should meet for no more than five days before the 1982 Commission session.

The resolution was, adopted by 30 votes to none, with 11 abstentions.

STUDY BY THE WORKING GROUP ON SOUTHERN AFRICA. In January 1981, the Commission's Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts on Southern Africa (p. 943) submitted to the Commission a study on ways of ensuring implementation of international instruments such as the Convention, including the establishment of the international jurisdiction envisaged by the Convention.<sup>(3)</sup> The study suggested two alternative courses: (a) establishment of an international penal tribunal for the suppression and punishment of the crime of apartheid by means of a draft convention that would permit States to add other international crimes to the tribunal's jurisdiction; and (b) use of existing United Nations machinery along with an international panel of judges to adjudicate violations of the Convention against apartheid, to be established under an additional protocol to the Convention.

In a resolution of 23 February<sup>(4)</sup> on human rights violations in South Africa and Namibia (p. 944), the Commission invited Member States to make observations on the proposals for an international penal tribunal submitted by the Working Group.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution of 28 October,<sup>(7)</sup> the General Assembly also appealed to States parties to submit reports as soon as possible, appealed for additional ratifications of the Convention, and appealed to States and organizations to step up activities to enhance public awareness through denouncing the crimes committed by South Africa. States parties were called on to implement article IV of the Convention through legislative, judicial and administrative measures to prosecute, try and punish persons responsible for, or accused of, the crime of apartheid. The Secretary-General was requested to intensify dissemination of information on the Convention and its implementation. The Commission on Human Rights was invited to intensify, in co-operation with the Special Committee against Apartheid, its periodic compilation of the list of individuals, organizations, institutions and State representatives deemed responsible for the crime of apartheid. States parties and United Nations organs were called on to continue to provide information for the list.

The resolution was adopted, by a recorded vote of 124 to 1, with 23 abstentions, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, which approved the 34-nation text on 15 October by 115 votes to 1, with 23 abstentions.

Introducing the resolution in the Committee, the German Democratic Republic stated that, during the more than five years of its existence, the Convention had succeeded in giving fresh impetus to the struggle to eliminate the apartheid régime.

Voting against the resolution, the United States explained that, although it condemned apartheid it considered that apartheid not constitute a crime in the sense attributed to the term in international law; it was not a party to the Convention and had not encouraged others to sign or ratify it.

Explaining the abstentions of the European Community members, the United Kingdom said that, while categorically condemning apartheid, they considered that the Convention was flawed and would not help international measures aimed at eliminating apartheid. Austria abstained because it was not a party to the Convention but explained that that did not weaken its explicit position on apartheid. Japan and Portugal said the Convention contained provisions incompatible with their legislation—a point also made by Chile, which voted affirmatively in the Assembly.

Although voting for the resolution, Turkey said the incorporation of the Convention into Turkish legislation would raise a number of problems, as certain provisions were incompatible with its legal system. Uruguay also voiced reservations to certain legal concepts in the Convention, in particular concerning the legal competence of States parties in respect of acts by non-nationals committed outside the territory of those States, the unduly vague definition of apartheid as a crime and the mandate to implement the Convention conferred on a United Nations body some of whose members were not parties to that instrument.

The Secretary-General, in a report to the Assembly on the status of the Convention,<sup>(2)</sup> described steps taken in regard to it by United Nations bodies. Annexed to the report were a list of States which had signed, ratified or acceded as at 1 September 1981, as well as conclusions and recommendations of the Group of Three at previous sessions and comments by seven States parties.

Status of the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 3068(XXVIII) of 30 November 1973, by which it adopted and opened for signature and ratification the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid, and its resolutions 3380(XXX) of 10 November 1975, 31/80 of 13 December 1976, 32/12 of 7 November 1977, 33/103 of 16 December 1978, 34/27 of 15 November 1979 and 35/39 of 25 November 1980,

Recalling also Commission on Human Rights resolutions 13(XXXIII) of 11 March 1977, 7(XXXIV) of 22 February 1978, 10(XXXV) of 5 March 1979, 12(XXXVI) and 13(XXXVI) of 26 February 1980 and 6(XXXVII) of 23 February 1981,

Convinced that the Declaration and the Programme of Action adopted by the World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, as well as the programme of activities to be undertaken during the second half of the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, adopted by the General Assembly in its resolution 34/24 of 15 November 1979, and their full implementation will contribute to the final eradication of all vestiges of apartheid, racism and racial discrimination,

Reaffirming its conviction that apartheid constitutes a total negation of the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and is a gross violation of human rights and a crime against humanity, seriously threatening international peace and security,

Strongly condemning South Africa's stepping up its policy of apartheid, repression and "bantustanization" and its continued illegal occupation of Namibia, thereby perpetuating on Namibian territory its odious policy of apartheid, racial discrimination and fragmentation,

Deeply concerned about South Africa's repeated acts of aggression against sovereign African States, which constitute a manifest breach of international peace and security,

Underlining that the strengthening of the existing mandatory arms embargo and the application of comprehensive mandatory economic sanctions under Chapter VII of the Charter are vital in order to compel the racist régime of South Africa to abandon its policy of apartheid,

Condemning the continued collaboration of certain States and transnational corporations with the racist regime of South Africa in the political, economic, military and other fields as an encouragement to the intensification of its odious policy of apartheid,

Commending the Paris Declaration on Sanctions against South Africa and the Special Declaration on Namibia, adopted by the International Conference on Sanctions against South Africa, held in Paris from 20 to 27 May 1981,

Stressing the need to disseminate on a wider basis more information on the crimes committed by the racist regime of South Africa, taking into consideration the recommendation contained in the documents adopted by the International Seminar on Publicity and the Role of the Mass Media in the International Mobilization against Apartheid, held at Berlin, German Democratic Republic, from 31 August to 2 September 1981,

Underlining that ratification of and accession to the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid on a universal basis and the implementation of its provisions without any delay are necessary for its effectiveness and would be a useful contribution towards achieving the goals of the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination.

firmly convinced that the legitimate struggle of the oppressed peoples in southern Africa against apartheid, racism and colonialism and for the effective implementation of their inalienable right to self-determination and independence demands more than ever all necessary support by the international community and, in particular, further action by the Security Council.

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the status of the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid;

2. Commends those States parties to the Convention that have submitted their reports under article VII of the Convention, in particular those which presented their second reports, and appeals to those States parties that have not yet done so to submit their reports as soon as possible;

3. Appeals once again to those States that have not yet done so to ratify or to accede to the Convention without further delay;

4. Requests States parties to the Convention to take fully into account the guidelines prepared by the Group of Three of the Commission on Human Rights, established in accordance with article IX of the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid;

5. Calls upon all States parties to implement fully article IV of the Convention by adopting legislative, judicial and administrative measures to prosecute, bring to trial and punish, in accordance with their jurisdiction, persons responsible for, or accused of, the acts enumerated in article II of the Convention;

6. Again calls upon all States parties to the Convention and the competent United Nations organs to consider the conclusions and recommendations of the Group of Three contained in its reports and to submit their views and comments to the Secretary-General;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to intensify his efforts through appropriate channels to disseminate information on the Convention and its implementation with a view to further promoting ratification of or accession to the Convention;

8. Requests the Commission on Human Rights to continue to undertake the functions set out in article X of the Convention and invites the Commission to intensify, in co-operation with the Special Committee against Apartheid, its efforts to compile periodically the progressive list of individuals, organizations, institutions and representatives of States deemed responsible for crimes enumerated in article II of the Convention, as well as of those against whom or which legal proceedings have been undertaken;

9. Requests the Commission on Human Rights to take into account General Assembly resolutions 33/23 of 29 November 1978 and 35/32 of 14 November 1980 as well as relevant documents of the Commission and its subsidiary organs in which it is reaffirmed, inter alia, that States giving assistance to the racist regime of South Africa become accomplices in the inhuman practices of racial discrimination and apartheid;

10. Calls upon all States parties to the Convention and competent United Nations organs to continue to provide the Commission on Human Rights, through the Secretary-General, with information relevant to the periodic compilation of the above-mentioned list as well as with information concerning the obstacles that prevent the effective suppression and punishment of the crime of apartheid;

11. Appeals to all States, United Nations organs, specialized agencies and international and national non-governmental organizations to step up their activities in enhancing public awareness through denouncing the crimes committed by the racist regime of South Africa;

12. Requests the Economic and Social Council, in preparing for the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, to be held in 1983, to give special attention to the activities aimed at the eradication of apartheid;

13. Welcomes the active campaign waged by the Special Committee against Apartheid, in co-operation with the Commission on Human Rights, to publicize the importance of the Convention;

tion and all Member States and to bring such facts to the attention of the public by all means of mass communication;

15. Requests the Secretary-General to include in his next annual report under General Assembly resolution 3380(XXX) a special section concerning the implementation of the Convention.

Trade union rights

In 1981, the Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts on Southern Africa continued to study allegations of infringements of trade union rights in South Africa, in response to 9979<sup>(3)</sup> and 1980<sup>(4)</sup> resolutions of the Economic and Social Council. The Group's report to the Commission on Human Rights (p. 943) included information conveyed to the Council through a note by the Secretariat<sup>(2)</sup> -on suppression of the right to organize trade unions and persecution of workers because of their activities, particularly as a consequence of strikes.

The Group reached the conclusion that the conditions of black workers, particularly agricultural workers, continued to be precarious as a result of unmitigated exploitation, low pay, ill-treatment and job insecurity. Their attempts to organize were stifled. The proposals of the 1979 Wiehahn Commission, set up to examine ways in which industrial relations in South Africa could be reformed, seemed to have failed; contrary to their stated objectives, the proposals had had the effect of enabling the South African Government to exercise greater control over African trade unions. Nor had the Code of Conduct of the European Economic Community (recommended to companies operating in the country) brought much change; on the contrary, it had provided transnational corporations with justification for continuing to operate in South Africa, where they had made huge profits at the expense of the African workers.

In March 1981, the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council a communication and covering letter of 29 July 1980 from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, containing allegations of infringements of trade union rights in 'South Africa,<sup>(1)</sup> including arrest and detention of trade unionists, police and State intervention in industrial disputes, and pressure on workers to dissociate themselves from their unions. With a view to having the allegations referred to the Fact-finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association, a body of the International Labour Organisation (ILO), the Secretary-General sought the consent of South Africa (not an ILO member) to this procedure, but as at 10 February 1981 he had received no reply.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. By a resolution of 8 May,<sup>(5)</sup> the Economic and Social Council took note of the conclusions of the Working Group. It deplored the inhuman conditions of African workers, particularly in agriculture; condemned the continuing police and State interference in industrial disputes and demanded its cessation, as well as recognition of the right of black trade union movements to full freedom of association and unimpeded collective bargaining; and requested the Group to continue to study the situation and to report to the Commission on Human Rights and the Council in 1982.

By a decision of the same date,<sup>(6)</sup> the Council, noting that as at 1 May 1981 South Africa had not replied to the Secretary-General's request for consent to refer the allegations of infringement of trade union rights to ILO, decided to transmit them to the Working Group and requested it to report to the Commission and the Council in 1982.

The resolution and decision were adopted, without vote, on the recommendation of the Second (Social) Committee, which similarly approved the 18-nation drafts on 5 May, as revised by the sponsors in writing (resolution) and orally (resolution and decision).

Introducing the drafts in the Committee, Nigeria orally revised the decision by, inserting 1982 as the year in which the Working Group was to report and made two changes in the resolution: In paragraph 3, the Council, instead of regretting that the conditions of African workers continued to be unsatisfactory, deplored their inhuman conditions; and in paragraph 7, a phrase was inserted to specify that the question would be considered as a sub-item under the item "Human rights questions" instead of simply under that item.

Report of the Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts of the Commission on Human Rights on allegations of infringements of trade union rights in the Republic of South Africa

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolution 1979/39 of 10 May 1979 on the report of the Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts of the Commission on Human Rights on allegations regarding infringements of trade union rights in the Republic of South Africa,

Recalling also its resolution 1980/33 of 2 May 1980 on allegations regarding infringements of trade union rights in the Republic of South Africa,

Recognizing the contribution which the reports of the Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts have made and are continuing to make to the efforts of the United Nations to seek out and combat the violations of human rights, in particular the policies of apartheid and racial discrimination, pursued in South Africa and Namibia, Having examined the report of the Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts requested by the Council in its resolution 1980/33.

Noting that the South African authorities, far from changing their policies of apartheid, are strengthening them by various means,

Noting also that the proposals for the reform of industrial relations in South Africa put forward by the Wiehahn Commission appear to have failed,

Noting further that the Code of Conduct of the European Economic Community has not brought about much appreciable change,

1. Congratulates the Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts of the Commission on Human Rights on the work it has done;

2. Takes note of the report of the Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts requested in its resolution 1980/33 and of the conclusions contained therein;

3. Deplores the inhuman conditions of African workers, particularly agricultural workers;

4. Condemns the continuing police and State interference in industrial disputes in South Africa;

5. Demands the cessation of all police and State interference in industrial disputes and the recognition of the right of the black trade union movements in South Africa to full freedom of association and to unimpeded collective bargaining;

6. Requests the Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts to continue to study the situation and to report thereon to the Commission on Human Rights and the Economic and Social Council in 1982;

7. Decides to consider the question of allegations of infringements of trade union rights in the Republic of South Africa as a sub-item under the item entitled "Human rights questions" at its first regular session of 1982.

Allegations regarding infringements of trade union rights in South Africa

At its 18th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council, noting the allegations regarding infringements of trade union rights submitted by the international Confederation of Free Trade Unions and noting also that as at 1 May 1981 the Government of South Africa had not replied to the request of the Secretary-General, dated 29 October 1980, for consent by the Government of South Africa to refer the above-mentioned allegations of infringements of trade union rights to the Fact-finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association of the International Labour Organisation, in accordance with the provisions of Council resolution 277(X) of 17 February 1950, decided to transmit to the Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts of the Commission on Human Rights, for consideration, the allegations regarding infringements of trade union rights in South Africa received by the Secretary-General from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and requested the Ad Hoc Working Group to report thereon to the Commission on Human Rights and to the Council in 1982.

Chile

During 1981, the question of violations of human rights in Chile was again taken up by the Commission on Human Rights, the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly. A report by the Special Rapporteur on the human rights situation in Chile was submitted to the Commission and to the Assembly. The mandate of the Special Rapporteur was extended by the Council for another year.

ACTION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS. On 26 February 1981,<sup>(6)</sup> the Commission on Human Rights commended the Special Rapporteur for the report he had submitted in 1980<sup>(2)</sup> and reiterated its indignation at the persistence and further deterioration of the human rights situation in Chile. It cited: the imposition of a new constitution and restrictive legislation; continuation of the state of emergency; increased detentions often followed by disappearances, torture and death; persecution of trade unionists, academics and church figures; limitations of economic, social and cultural rights; and extreme poverty and lack of protection.

The Commission strongly urged the Chilean authorities to respect and promote human rights and in particular to: end the state of emergency and restore democratic institutions and constitutional safeguards; ensure an immediate end to torture and other inhuman treatment, and punish those responsible; restore full enjoyment of civil and political rights; enable the judiciary to fulfil its duty to protect detainees; allow Chileans freely to enter, leave and live in their country, and restore Chilean nationality to persons deprived of it for political reasons; respect economic, social and cultural rights, in particular of the indigenous population; and abandon the practice of banishment, which amounted to forced exile. The Commission expressed deep concern at the lack of information on numerous persons who had disappeared and urged the Chilean authorities to investigate and clarify their fate (p. 911). It called on the Chilean judiciary to employ fully its power under habeas corpus and amparo to protect individuals from arbitrary arrest and detention.

The Commission again urged the Chilean authorities to co-operate fully with the Special Rapporteur, and decided to extend his mandate for another year and have him report in 1982.

The resolution was adopted by a roll-call vote of 22 to 4 (Argentina, Brazil, United States, Uruguay), with 17 abstentions.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. On 8 May, the Economic and Social Council extended the mandate of the Special Rapporteur for another year and requested the Secretary-General to make arrangements for financing and staff.<sup>(11)</sup> The decision, based on a draft by the Commission, was adopted by 29 votes to 4, with 19 abstentions, following approval by the Second Committee on 5 May by 27 votes to 4, with 19 abstentions.

On the same date,<sup>(7)</sup> the Council recommended that the General Assembly redesignate the United Nations Trust Fund for Chile as a United Nations voluntary fund for victims of torture, as suggested by the Commission on 11 March.

REPORT OF THE SPECIAL RAPPOREUR. The Special Rapporteur's 1981 report on the human rights situation in Chile was transmitted in November to the General Assembly by a note of the Secretary-General.<sup>(5)</sup> The report was based on the testimony of witnesses, on official and other documents published in the Chilean press, on reports and studies by national and international governmental and non-governmental organizations, and on documents and letters from individuals in Chile and elsewhere. The Special Rapporteur stated that the Chilean authorities had refused any contact with him and he expressed the view that no effort should be spared to secure their co-operation.

In his observations and recommendations, the Special Rapporteur said the country faced no emergency situation justifying the suspension of fundamental human rights. Nevertheless, new constitutional provisions and legislative instruments during the preceding few months authorized the simultaneous existence of various states of emergency involving serious limitations on individual freedoms and rights, giving the executive branch discretionary powers which the judiciary was not equipped to monitor. The authorities systematically refused to respect the rights of political opponents to liberty, physical and moral integrity, and security of person. Individuals had been arrested, generally without warrant or decree, held incommunicado, and sometimes subjected to violence, maltreatment and harassment. Torture continued to be practised and murders, particularly of political dissidents, were committed by security agencies and anonymous groups.

The Special Rapporteur recommended that the Assembly request Chile to comply with its international obligations in matters relating to life, liberty, physical and moral integrity and safety, by ensuring that arrests were always made in public places and in the manner prescribed by law, and that those arrested were assured of a regular hearing before competent judges empowered to protect individual rights, monitor official acts and investigate official irregularities or offences. In addition, Chile should be asked to ensure that political prisoners were kept separate from other prisoners and that their ill-treatment and punishment were discontinued. He called for the exercise by the judiciary of its full power to investigate the fate of missing persons.

Concerning living conditions, the report stated that most people had had to reduce considerably their consumption of essential items, while the better-off minorities had increased their consumption appreciably. The purchasing power of the poor had been brutally reduced since 1973, while the wages of the better-off groups had tended to rise. There had been a tendency to eliminate certain workers' rights concerning wages and conditions of work, including the right to join forces for collective bargaining or the right to strike. Trade unions were subject to control by the labour department and their leaders were subjected to prosecution and detention. The situation of the indigenous population had continued to deteriorate, with indigenous communities being deprived of their lands and displaced.

Summing up his observations, the Special Rapporteur said it was not possible to report any improvement in the human rights situation in Chile. The new constitutional and institutional situation had not helped to reduce the scope of restrictions and violations or to change repressive measures. No measures had been adopted conducive to restoring the exercise of human rights. He concluded that the international community should continue to devote attention to the situation and use whatever means it deemed appropriate to ensure the full restoration of human rights.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution of 16 December,<sup>(10)</sup> the General Assembly reiterated its grave concern at the persistence and even deterioration of the human rights situation in Chile. It urged the Chilean authorities to respect and promote human rights through such steps as: ending the state of emergency and restoring democratic institutions and constitutional guarantees; ending arbitrary detention, intimidation and prosecution of persons who exercised their right to freedom of expression and opinion; respecting the human rights of political detainees; acting to prevent torture; investigating and clarifying the fate of persons who had disappeared for political reasons; restoring trade union rights; and guaranteeing the freedom of assembly and association and the freedom of citizens to enter and leave the country. The Chilean authorities were urged to co-operate with the Special Rapporteur, whose mandate the Commission on Human Rights was invited to extend for another year.

The resolution was adopted, by a recorded vote of 84 to 20, with 42 abstentions, on the recommendation of the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, which approved the lo-nation text on 3 December, as revised by the sponsors, by a recorded vote of 83 to 20, with 36 abstentions.

Another draft resolution, submitted in the Committee by Algeria, Cuba, Mexico and Yugoslavia,<sup>(11)</sup> was subsequently withdrawn and its sponsors joined the sponsors of the resolution later adopted. The withdrawn text included provisions by which the Assembly would have: condemned the forced exile of Chilean parliamentarians and leaders; concluded that continued vigilance with regard to the grave situation prevailing in the country was essential, given the disdain shown by the Chilean authorities on human rights; called on the Chilean judiciary to assume fully its obligations so as to prevent disappearances and torture; and demanded that the authorities co-operate fully with the Special Rapporteur and abandon their unwarranted attitude of contempt for international mechanisms for human rights protection. The Assembly also would have expressed concern at specific aspects of the human rights situation; these were incorporated in the lo-nation draft.

Also on 16 December, as recommended by the Economic and Social Council, the Assembly decided to extend the mandate of the United Nations Trust Fund for Chile and to redesignate it as the United Nations Voluntary Fund for Victims of Torture.<sup>(9)</sup>

Introducing the resolution on human rights in Chile, the Netherlands said it was based essentially on the last paragraph of the Special Rapporteur's report, stating that it was not possible to report any improvement in the human rights situation in Chile and that the international community should continue to give its attention to the question and do all it could to ensure the full restoration of rights.

Rejecting the resolution, Chile said it distorted the situation and flagrantly violated the principle of non-intervention in internal affairs. Chile could not accept selective and discriminatory treatment and the maintenance of the Special Rapporteur, and rejected the politicization of the United Nations human rights system. The resolution's claim that trade unions could not operate freely and that workers could not strike was absurd in view of the fact that there had been 57 strikes in Chile, involving more than 15,000 workers, since January 1981. Chile's gross domestic product had grown in recent years at a record rate of 7.2 per cent, the inflation rate had declined from 500 per cent in 1973 to about 10 per cent in 1981, and infant mortality had declined between 1973 and 1980 from 65.2 to 31.8 per thousand. Chile, like some other Latin American countries, was the victim of a campaign orchestrated and planned from outside, aimed at disturbing its tranquillity.

Also opposing the text, Argentina denounced what it called the tendency to make the United Nations a court of inquisition on human rights violations, which had only induced countries to deny the co-operation needed to pursue United Nations activities in this field. In Bolivia's view, the resolution was aimed at creating divisions in Latin America to facilitate penetration by extremists. Costa Rica thought the resolution reflected an inconsistent and selective human rights policy directed against Latin America, was the result of a mandate entirely outside the purview of the Special Rapporteur, did not take into account the institutionalization which Chile was attempting to carry out, and lacked objectivity in that it accused Chile of violations of which others, including some sponsors of the resolution, committed officially. Guatemala said there had been an evident improvement in the human rights situation in Chile.

Israel voted against the resolution on the ground that it was unbalanced and unjustifiably selective. The Philippines said it did not believe in appointing a Special Rapporteur to study the human rights situation in Chile or in any other country. The United States said that, although the human rights situation in Chile was not entirely satisfactory, it had improved considerably in that detention without trial and disappearances had stopped, most political prisoners had been released and the political opposition had some access to the media; the resolution, however, like the Special Rapporteur's report, took no account of the progress made and required Chile to do things not demanded of any other country.

Abstaining, Colombia, Fiji, Papua New Guinea, Singapore and Solomon Islands also disagreed with the selective condemnation of countries. Colombia added that the text jeopardized the constitutional order of Chile and served political interests. Ecuador said that, although it was deeply disquieted by the continuing human rights violations in Chile, the resolution would have the Assembly meddle in internal affairs by stating that the new Chilean Constitution failed to reflect a freely expressed political will and by making a judgement on the Chilean judiciary. Peru also said the resolution betrayed a desire to intervene in internal affairs. Saint Lucia declared that every human rights violation by any country must be recorded and monitored; until that principle was observed, it would continue to abstain.

Supporting the resolution, Austria and Vanuatu said they favoured respect for human rights everywhere. Belgium said it had voted in favour out of concern for the human rights situation in Chile and because the Special Rapporteur's mandate should be extended; however, there were a number of shortcomings in United Nations action to protect human rights throughout the world. Canada felt the United Nations should envisage more effective machinery for dealing with human rights in Chile, such as making the Human Rights Committee responsible for maintaining a continuous dialogue with the Government to encourage it to fulfil its obligations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.<sup>(8)</sup>

Reservations were also voiced by others. Portugal hoped the United Nations would revise the criteria applicable to situations in which human rights violations were verified; the different cases should be closely studied and receive equal treatment. Tunisia—which cast a negative vote in the Committee but voted in favour in the Assembly—said it was not convinced of the effectiveness of the United Nations approach, as could be seen by the failure of its efforts to re-establish the enjoyment of human rights in Chile; ways of ending human rights violations should be sought first at the national level and then regionally and internationally, rather than by dispatching special rapporteurs who were not recognized by the countries concerned.

The United Kingdom explained that it had voted for the text because the human rights situation in Chile was still a cause for concern, but it saw a tendency to introduce elements of selectivity and imbalance; human rights were violated in other countries, but the international community had not thought fit to appoint a special rapporteur for them. The USSR stated that the resolution was the minimum the United Nations could do to compel the Chilean junta to end human rights violations. Venezuela expressed reservations on some wording, saying that it would prevent the Special Rapporteur from complying with his mandate.

During the Third Committee's debate, Australia said the conclusion that the human rights situation in Chile had not improved was based on a thorough study, albeit from secondary sources; had the Special Rapporteur received co-operation from the Government, he might have been able to throw more light on some aspects. Cuba said that evidence of the deterioration of the situation in Chile could be found in the destruction of democratic institutions, growing restrictions on the exercise of human rights, many instances of arbitrary arrest and torture, lack of guarantees for citizens, and the prevailing sense of fear and insecurity.

New Zealand regretted that the Chilean authorities had not responded more vigorously to the concern expressed about human rights violations. Norway observed that it had been hoped that the authorities would co-operate with the Special Rapporteur in order to initiate a process which would ultimately restore the enjoyment of human rights. Sweden felt that the world should continue to focus attention on the human rights situation in Chile as long as its authorities did not respect the commitment undertaken when Chile had ratified the International Covenants on Human Rights. The United Kingdom said the European Community members were deeply disturbed by conclusions about cases of torture; they appealed to the Chilean authorities to pay heed to the widespread international concern those practices continued to arouse. Yugoslavia called for continued attention to the situation and efforts to improve it.

Hungary thought the international community should use whatever means it deemed appropriate to ensure the full restoration of human rights in Chile. The German Democratic Republic said the Fascist terror in Chile could not have persisted without the support of outside forces interested in maintaining it. Condemnation of the human rights situation in Chile was also voiced by Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Mongolia, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR.

OTHER DEVELOPMENTS. By a note verbale of 12 August,<sup>(2)</sup> Chile protested against remarks concerning the Chilean Government made on 11 August by a speaker invited to appear before the Special Committee against Apartheid on the occasion of the International Day of Solidarity with the Struggle of Women in South Africa and Namibia (p. 199).

In the General Assembly's Credentials Committee, which on 10 and 16 September approved the credentials of representatives to the eighth emergency special session<sup>(3)</sup> and the 1981 regular session,<sup>(4)</sup> respectively (p. 351), the USSR stated that it did not recognize the credentials of the delegates appointed by the regime of Augusto Pinochet in Chile. The United States, on the other hand, said there was no basis for the objection to the credentials of the Chilean representatives.

Protection of human rights in Chile

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its responsibility to promote and encourage respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all,

Underlining the obligation of Governments to protect and promote human rights and to carry out the responsibilities they have undertaken under various international instruments,

Determined to remain vigilant with regard to violations of human rights wherever they occur and to take measures in order to restore respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms,

Recalling its resolutions 31/124 of 16 December 1976, 32/118 of 16 December 1977, 33/175 of 20 December 1978, 34/179 of 17 December 1979 and 35/188 of 15 December 1980 on the protection of human rights in Chile, and 33/173 of 20 December 1978 on disappeared persons,

Recalling also Commission on Human Rights resolution 11 (XXXV) of 6 March 1979 on violations of human rights in Chile, in which the Commission, inter alia, decided to appoint a Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Chile, and resolution 9(XXXVII) of 26 February 1981, in which It decided to extend the mandate of the Special Rapporteur for another year,

Deploing the fact that the Chilean authorities have consistently refused to co-operate with the Special Rapporteur appointed by the Commission on Human Rights and with other United Nations bodies in the field of human rights,

Deeply concerned about the persistence and, in certain respects, the deterioration of situations which affect the enjoyment and exercise of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Chile, as stated in the report of the Special Rapporteur,

Expressing deep concern that the whereabouts of the numerous persons who have disappeared over the past years for political reasons are still unknown and that the Chilean authorities continue to fail to take urgent and effective measures to investigate and clarify the fate of persons who have disappeared,

Noting with grave concern that the new Constitution in force in Chile as from 11 March 1981, which was prepared with a lack of popular participation, not only fails to guarantee fully, but in certain respects allows interference with, human rights and fundamental freedoms,

1. Commends the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Chile for his report, prepared in accordance with Commission on Human Rights resolution 9(XXXVII):

2. Reiterates its grave concern at the persistence and, in some respects, the deterioration of the human rights situation in Chile, as stated by the Special Rapporteur, and particularly:

(a) The disruption of the traditional democratic legal order and its Institutions by the maintenance and expansion of emergency legislation and the promulgation of a constitution that fails to reflect a freely expressed popular will and clearly hampers the human rights and fundamental freedoms of the Chilean people and allows interference with such rights and freedoms;

(b) The intensification of practices such as arbitrary detention and confinement in secret places, often accompanied by torture and inhuman or degrading treatment which, on occasion, result in unexplained deaths;

(c) The persecution, intimidation and imprisonment, as well as the banishment and forced exile, of a number of persons who participate in trade union, academic and cultural and humanitarian activities;

3. Reiterates also its great concern at the fact that the remedies of habeas corpus or amparo prove to be not effective owing to the fact that the judiciary in Chile does not fully exercise its powers in this respect and performs its functions with utmost restrictions;

4. Urges the Chilean authorities to respect and promote human rights in accordance with their obligations under various international instruments and, in particular, to take the following concrete steps that could enable the Commission on Human Rights to consider terminating the mandate of the Special Rapporteur:

(a) To put an end to the state of emergency, under which continued human rights violations occur, and to restore the democratic institutions and constitutional guarantees formerly enjoyed by the Chilean people;

(b) To put an end to arbitrary detentions, physical or psychological intimidation and prosecution of persons who exercise their right to freedom of expression and opinion, including the right to petition;

(c) To respect the human rights of persons detained for political reasons and to separate them from those detained for criminal offences;

(d) To take effective measures to prevent torture and other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment resulting, inter alia, in unexplained deaths and to prosecute and punish those responsible for such practices;

(e) To investigate and clarify the fate of persons who have disappeared for political reasons, to inform the relatives of those persons of the outcome of the investigation and to prosecute and punish those responsible for such disappearances;

(f) To restore fully trade union rights, especially the freedom to form trade unions which can operate freely without governmental control and can exercise fully the right to strike;

(g) To guarantee the freedom of assembly and association, and the freedom of Chilean citizens freely to enter and leave the country, and to end the practice of banishment applied to nationals, a practice which amounts to forced exile from the country;

5. Urges once more the Chilean authorities to co-operate with the Special Rapporteur and to comply with their obligations under various international human rights instruments;

6. Requests the Commission on Human Rights at its thirty-eighth session to study thoroughly the report of the Special Rapporteur;

7. Invites the Commission on Human Rights to extend the mandate of the Special Rapporteur for another year and requests the Commission to report on the human rights situation in Chile, through the Economic and Social Council, to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session.

Territories occupied by Israel

During 1981, the question of human rights violations in the territories occupied by Israel as a result of 1967 hostilities in the Middle East was again considered by the Commission on Human Rights and its Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities. This was in addition to the consideration of political and other aspects by the General Assembly and other bodies (p. 300).

ACTION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS. On 11 February, the Commission on Human Rights adopted two resolutions on human rights violations in the occupied Arab territories and another on self-determination for the Palestinian people.

By the first resolution, <sup>(2)</sup> adopted by a roll-call vote of 31 to 3 (Australia, Canada, United States), with 8 abstentions, the Commission reaffirmed that occupation constituted a fundamental violation of the human rights of the civilians in the territories. It expressed alarm that Israel's policy there was based on the so-called "Homeland" doctrine envisaging a Jewish State including those territories. It called on Israel to take immediate steps for the return of displaced Arabs to their homes and property, and declared that Israel's grave breaches of the 1949 Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (p. 306) were war crimes and an affront to humanity. It rejected and condemned Israel's decision to annex Jerusalem and alter its character and status (p. 269), shared the Assembly's concern at reports of Israel's intention to legislate changes in the character and status of the occupied Syrian Golan Heights (p. 307), and condemned Israel's persistence in changing the character, demography, institutions and status of that area.

The Commission condemned specified policies and practices and demanded that Israel desist from them, including administrative and legislative measures to encourage and expand the establishment of settler colonies in the occupied territories, which demonstrated a determination to annex the territories. It reaffirmed that all such measures were null and void and that Israel's settlement policy in the territories constituted a flagrant violation of the Geneva Convention and United Nations resolutions. The Commission also condemned the June 1980 assassination attempts on the Mayors of Nablus, Ramallah and Al Bireh (p. 314), as well as the deliberate destruction of the Syrian city of Quneitra in 1974.<sup>(15)</sup> It called for implementation of resolutions on the return of the expelled Mayors of Hebron and Halhul (p. 313). It demanded that Israel cease all torture and ill-treatment of Arab detainees and prisoners, and called for their release. It renewed its request to the Secretary-General to collect information on detainees and make it available to the Commission in 1982.

The Commission reiterated its call not to recognize any changes carried out by Israel in the occupied territories and to avoid taking any action or extending any aid which Israel might use in pursuit of its annexation and colonization policies. It called on Israel to report on implementation of the resolution and decided to give the question high priority in 1982.

By the second resolution,<sup>(3)</sup> adopted by a roll-call vote of 41 to 1 (United States), the Commission condemned Israel's failure to acknowledge the applicability to the occupied territories of the Geneva Convention and expressed deep concern at the consequences of Israel's refusal to apply it. The Commission called on Israel to abide by and respect its obligations arising from the Convention, the Charter of the United Nations and other international instruments, and urged the States parties to the Convention to exert all efforts to ensure respect for and compliance with its provisions in the occupied territories.

By its resolution on self-determination for the Palestinians,<sup>(4)</sup> the Commission reaffirmed the inalienable right of the Palestinian people to self-determination without external interference and the establishment of a fully independent and sovereign State in Palestine, and their right to return to their homes and property. It recognized the right of the Palestinians to regain their rights by all means in accordance with the United Nations Charter. It reaffirmed its concern that the 1978 Camp David agreements (between Egypt and Israel) had been concluded outside the United Nations framework and without the participation of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO); rejected provisions which ignored, infringed, violated or denied Palestinian rights and envisaged continued Israeli occupation; strongly condemned all partial agreements which violated Palestinian rights; and declared invalid the Camp David agreements and others purporting to determine the future of the Palestinians and the occupied territories. It urged support to the Palestinians through PLO.

The Commission adopted the text by a roll-call vote of 25 to 9 (Australia, Canada, Denmark, Federal Republic of Germany, Netherlands, Portugal, United Kingdom, United States, Zaire), with 8 abstentions.

In its general resolution on the right of peoples to self-determination (p. 891), adopted on 6 March,<sup>(5)</sup> the Commission condemned Israel's expansionist policy, its practices in the region and continued aggression against Arab civilians, particularly the Palestinians, and the destruction of their villages and camps. It described these acts as serious obstacles to Palestinian self-determination and independence.

ACTION BY THE SUB-COMMISSION ON DISCRIMINATION AND MINORITIES. On 9 September,<sup>(14)</sup> the Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities recommended that the Commission on Human Rights: reaffirm the right of the Palestinians to self-determination and the establishment of an independent State, as well as their right to return to their homes and property; urge Israel to withdraw from all the occupied territories, including Jerusalem; deplore human rights violations by Israeli authorities in the occupied territories; condemn the bombardment of Palestinian refugee camps in Lebanon (p. 283);

and disapprove of Israel's refusal to implement United Nations resolutions on Jerusalem.

This resolution was adopted by 20 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions.

OTHER ACTION. The Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories, in its annual report to the General Assembly,<sup>(1)</sup> issued in September, presented information on the situation and the treatment of civilians in the occupied territories. The Committee concluded that Israel's policy not only denied the right to self-determination but also was the source of continuing and systematic human rights violations (p. 301).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted seven resolutions on the situation in the territories occupied by Israel.

One of them<sup>(9)</sup> contained the Assembly's strong condemnation of a series of Israeli policies and practices, including annexation, establishment and expansion of Israeli settlements, expulsion and transfer of Arabs, confiscation of property, transformation and pillaging of cultural property, destruction of houses, mass arrests, ill-treatment of detainees, interference with religious freedoms, family customs, education, development and freedom of movement, and illegal exploitation of natural resources and population. The Assembly demanded that Israel desist from those policies and practices and, by another resolution,<sup>(s)</sup> determined that Israeli measures designed to change the legal status, geographical nature and demographic composition of the occupied territories, including Jerusalem, had no legal validity.

By four other resolutions, the Assembly demanded that Israel facilitate the immediate return of the Mayors of Hebron and Halhul and the Islamic Judge of Hebron,<sup>(10)</sup> report on assassination attempts against three other mayors,<sup>(13)</sup> rescind orders for the closure of three universities,<sup>(12)</sup> and desist from repressive measures against Syrians in the Golan Heights.<sup>(11)</sup> The Assembly also reaffirmed that the 1949 Geneva Convention on the protection of civilians was applicable to the occupied territories and demanded that Israel comply with its provisions.<sup>(7)</sup>

In a resolution of 28 October on the right of peoples to self-determination,<sup>(6)</sup> the Assembly condemned the expansionist activities of Israel and bombing of Palestinian civilians, and urged support for PLO in its struggle for self-determination.

Other countries

Bolivia

A Special Envoy, appointed at the request of the Commission on Human Rights in March 1981, visited Bolivia in October to study the human rights situation in that country. The Commission acted at the request of the General Assembly, which in December 1980 had asked it to accept an invitation from the Bolivian Government to have a delegation from the Commission study the situation.<sup>(5)</sup>

The mandate of the Special Envoy, set by the Commission on 11 March 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> was to make a thorough study of the human rights situation in Bolivia. The Bolivian Government was invited to extend its co-operation and the Special Envoy was requested to report to the Commission in 1982 in a manner which would give the Government adequate opportunity to comment in writing. The Commission adopted this resolution by 29 votes to 3, with 8 abstentions.

The appointment of a Special Envoy was approved by the Economic and Social Council on 8 May,<sup>(4)</sup> on the Commission's recommendation. The decision was adopted by 38 votes to 3, with 13 abstentions, following its approval by the Second (Social) Committee on 5 May by 37 votes to 3, with 11 abstentions.

In accordance with the Commission's resolution, its Chairman, after consultations with the other officers, appointed Héctor Gros Espiell (Uruguay) as the Special Envoy. After visiting Bolivia from 20 to 27 October, the Special Envoy transmitted a report to the Government in November which was submitted in December as a document of the Commission.<sup>(1)</sup>

In this report, the Special Envoy said he was convinced that grave, massive and persistent violations of human rights had been committed after 17 July 1980 (the date of the assumption of power by a military Government). Violations of civil and political rights had been committed by State authorities as well as by groups apparently acting in collusion with, at the instigation of or without interference by the authorities. However, the situation appeared to have improved in the months prior to September 1981 and the most serious violations had not recurred with the same intensity.

Official statements by the Government which had come to power on 4 September, to the effect that it would respect human rights, appeared to have had beneficial effects but had to be translated into deeds. The inadmissible activities of the Government's Special Security Service had to be eradicated, legal guarantees enforced, the efficacy of legal remedies guaranteed, and progress made towards ensuring freedom of expression, assembly and association and prohibiting torture, degrading treatment and arbitrary detention -all the subject of serious abuse since October 1980.

The report added that, on 28 December 1981, Bolivia had asked for an extension to mid-January 1982 of the time-limit for submission of its comments.

Approved by Second Committee (E/1981/46) by vote (37-3-11). 5 May (meeting 19): draft by Commission on Human Rights (E/1981/25); agenda item 7.

Situation Of human rights in Bolivia

At its 18th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council took note of resolution 34(XXXVII) of 11 March 1981 of the Commission on Human Rights, and approved the Commission's decision to request its Chairman to appoint, after consultations within the Bureau, a Special Envoy of the Commission whose mandate will be to make a thorough study Of the human rights situation in Bolivia; the Council also requested the Secretary-General to give all necessary assistance to the Special Envoy of the Commission.

Cyprus

On 9 March 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the Commission on Human Rights decided to postpone until 1982 debate on the question of human rights in Cyprus, on the understanding that action required by previous Commission resolutions continued to remain operative, including the request to the Secretary-General to provide a report on their implementation.

Decision: <sup>(1)</sup>Commission on Human Rights (report, E/1981/25), 5(XXXVII), 9 Mar.

El Salvador

ACTION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS. On 11 March 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> the Commission on Human Rights expressed deep concern at grave violations of human rights in El Salvador and deplored the murders, abductions, disappearances, terrorist acts and all grave violations reported there. It called on all parties to bring about a peaceful settlement and to seek an end to acts of violence, and urged the Government to take steps to ensure full respect for human rights. The Commission emphasized that the people of El Salvador had the right to establish a democratically elected government, in an atmosphere free from intimidation and terror, and to determine their own future, free from outside interference.

It requested its Chairman to appoint, after consultations with other Commission officers, a Special Representative to investigate all grave human rights violations; to recommend steps the Commission could take to help secure the enjoyment of human rights, including economic, social and cultural rights; and to submit an interim report to the General Assembly in 1981 and a report on his findings to the Commission in 1982. The Government and others concerned were invited to extend their co-operation.

The resolution was adopted by 29 votes to 1, with 11 abstentions.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. The decision to appoint a Special Representative was approved by the Economic and Social Council on 8 May.<sup>(5)</sup> The Council's decision, based on a draft by the Commission on Human Rights, was adopted by 40 votes to none, with 14 abstentions, following its approval by the Second (Social) Committee on 5 May by 37 votes to none, with 14 abstentions.

ACTION BY THE SUB-COMMISSION ON DISCRIMINATION AND MINORITIES. On 9 September,<sup>(4)</sup> the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities recommended that the Commission on Human Rights continue to consider the human rights situation in El Salvador. It requested the Secretary-General to bring to the attention of the Commission and its Special Representative the information received by the Sub-Commission on grave human rights violations, and to inform the Sub-Commission in 1982 of the Special Representative's actions and of any consideration by other United Nations bodies. The resolution was adopted by 23 votes to 1.

REPORT OF THE SPECIAL REPRESENTATIVE. The Secretary-General transmitted to the Assembly on 28 October an interim report by the Commission's Special Representative, José Antonio Pastor Ridruejo, on the situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in El Salvador.<sup>(6)</sup>

For his analysis, the Special Representative used information from Governments, specialized agencies and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations. During a visit to the country from 7 to 10 September, he interviewed a number of people, including the President, Vice-President and members of the Salvadorian junta; he also visited a refugee centre in San Salvador, interviewed two prisoners detained in national police offices, and held talks with diplomatic representatives and private citizens. After that visit, the Special Representative talked with former junta members in exile, and heard statements and testimony from refugees.

After evaluating the information available, the Special Representative concluded that it was obvious that the great majority of the people did not exercise important economic, social and cultural rights at acceptable minimum levels. Wealth was inequitably distributed and the essential public services of the State, including educational and health services, were insufficient to meet the requirements of the majority. Consequently, far-reaching administrative and social reforms were necessary, especially agrarian reform.

As for civil and political rights, there had been a consistent pattern of gross violations which, in many cases, had culminated in attempts on human life. Members of the State apparatus, violent groups of the extreme right and armed groups of the extreme left were responsible. Deaths and other human rights violations had also resulted from armed clashes between regular forces of the Salvadorian army and opposition guerrilla groups. Executive and judicial organs had adopted a widespread attitude of passivity and inactivity with regard to human rights violations.

The ultimate objective, the Special Representative stated, should be a situation of peace and social justice in which human rights were respected and in which the Salvadorian people was the sole master of its destiny without any outside interference. To attain that objective, he suggested that democratic elections be held in a manner to be specified. He viewed the government plan for holding elections as legitimate and acceptable if and when they took place in a climate of peace in which the rights of free expression, association and assembly were fully respected, a complete and genuine voters' roll was available and the authenticity of the ballot was guaranteed. As a sine qua non for elections, the Government and other parties should take steps to end the serious human rights violations, including steps by the Government to control all members of the armed and security forces and all armed organizations and individuals committing such acts. The Government should demonstrate openness and flexibility in regard to other pacification measures, not excluding dialogue with the opposition.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution of 16 December,<sup>(3)</sup> the General Assembly requested the Salvadorian parties to arrive at a negotiated political solution in order to establish a democratically elected government. It deeply deplored all acts of violence and grave violations of human rights, drew attention to the fact that the rules of international law were applicable to armed conflicts not of an international character, and requested the parties to apply a minimum standard of protection to the affected population. The Assembly reiterated its appeal to all States to abstain from intervening in the internal situation in El Salvador and to suspend all arms supplies and any type of military support, so as to allow the political forces in that country to restore peace and security. It urged the Government to ensure full respect for human rights, primarily by creating conditions that could lead to a political solution through full participation of all representative political forces. The Commission on Human Rights was requested to examine the situation thoroughly in 1982.

The resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 69 to 22, with 53 abstentions, following its approval by the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee on 3 December by a recorded vote of 65 to 21, with 54 abstentions.

In the Committee, the 10 sponsors orally revised their text by inserting a new paragraph urging the parties to co-operate and not interfere with the activities of humanitarian organizations dedicated to alleviating the suffering of civilians.

Introducing the draft, Mexico said it reflected the concern of many Governments and democratically minded people at the seriousness of the situation, confirmed in the interim report of the Special Representative. El Salvador, as well as all of Central America, could be in serious danger if the internal struggles continued indefinitely and the conflict became increasingly internationalized. The text was not directed against anyone; its sponsors were trying to promote the self-determination of the Salvadorian people and to defend its fundamental rights, thus contributing to the maintenance of peace and security in the region.

El Salvador rejected the resolution as biased and said it overstepped the humanitarian sphere and included highly political considerations which fell exclusively under internal jurisdiction; also, it presented the situation out of context and included elements that were not in keeping with the facts. El Salvador recognized neither the legitimacy of the Special Representative's nomination nor the validity of his interim report, which contained partial judgements, twisted information, showed a desire to interfere in internal affairs and did not reflect the positive attitude of the Government, which had allowed him complete freedom of action and movement. The report gave preference to information and organizations belonging to the extremist opposition and to information from politically motivated sources; it omitted many details on terrorist acts committed by the extremists, to whose uncontrolled violence the Government was compelled to respond. The Government was taking steps aimed at democratization and the establishment of social justice and, in spite of great difficulties, at restoring peace.

Among those voting against the resolution, Bolivia said it was reprehensible, by a seeming defence of human rights, to attempt to clear the way for international terrorism. Brazil stated that it was for the Salvadorian people alone to decide, without outside interference, on the means of achieving a wise democratic and pluralistic solution. Colombia expressed concern that the noble cause of human rights had become an instrument serving the political designs of a certain ideology, supported by those who did not care much about human rights and did not respect them in their own societies but who considered the protection of human rights useful in their efforts to introduce destabilizing factors into States or regions where they wanted to prevent the strengthening of democratic institutions.

Argentina, Chile, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Haiti, Paraguay, the Philippines and Venezuela also opposed the singling out of Latin American countries for alleged human rights violations and the interference in their internal affairs. Costa Rica added that the resolution did not reflect the complexity of El Salvador's problems and ignored the efforts by the people and Government to attain peace and justice. Venezuela condemned all human rights violations in El Salvador but opposed the resolution as interference in the country's internal affairs, in violation of the principle of self-determination.

Also casting a negative vote, Israel characterized the resolution as unbalanced and unjustifiably selective. Morocco believed that the resolution took a position in the conflict by contrasting the Government and the armed organizations, giving preference to the latter and thus endowing them with a dimension disproportionate to their political and military weight; Morocco also opposed attempts to compromise efforts for free elections safeguarded from foreign intervention, and thought the best contribution the United Nations could make to reducing tensions in the region would be to support the electoral process. In the view of the United States, the resolution denied the possibility of elections under any conditions foreseeable in practical terms and recommended that the Government begin talks for the purpose of sharing power with the violent Marxist-Leninist minority trying to overthrow it; that approach contrasted with the endorsement of the Government's plans to hold elections in March 1982, given on 7 December 1981 by the General Assembly of the Organization of American States (OAS).

Among countries abstaining in the vote, Australia thought it inappropriate for the resolution to indicate the procedures for a political solution; it should tackle problems from a purely humanitarian standpoint. In New Zealand's opinion, the resolution was not sufficiently objective and would not contribute to peace and harmony; it regretted that efforts to tone down some passages-particularly paragraphs 2 and 3 and the preambular paragraph which spoke of a passive attitude among the authorities with respect to human rights violations- had not been successful. Singapore believed that the text sought to impose a political solution on the people of El Salvador instead of leaving them to choose their own future, through the ballot box rather than the bullet. Tunisia thought it was essentially up to OAS to find solutions to the problems of one of its members.

Portugal found the text unbalanced and expressed reservations on paragraphs 2, 3 and 5 requesting a negotiated political solution, regretting acts by governmental paramilitary organizations and other armed groups, and appealing for a suspension of military support). Spain said the resolution was polemical and would not help to end the violence; the situation was not due solely to the Government but resulted from a social and economic imbalance exacerbated by external intervention. The United Kingdom said the resolution was unbalanced and did not recognize the lawlessness and violence in El Salvador and the difficulties any Government would have in remedying the situation.

Though supporting certain provisions, particularly the vigorous condemnation of violations, Canada said the resolution included points which went beyond the information given in the Special Representative's report. Though supporting the resolution's appeal to States to abstain from intervention and the call for measures by the Government to ensure respect for human rights, Ecuador said that laying down conditions for reaching a settlement constituted interference in internal affairs. Fiji, Malaysia, Papua New Guinea, Peru and Solomon Islands abstained because of the text's selective approach; Peru also thought it tried to intervene in El Salvador's internal affairs and said the fact that its sponsors recognized certain political forces in the country was contrary to international law.

Ethiopia said it had voted for the resolution out of respect for human rights but had reservations on some paragraphs. Ghana voted for the text in the belief that the problems in El Salvador should not be seen in an East-West context but rather in terms of the basic interest of the Salvadorian people. Kenya said it would have voted against some provisions if they had been put to the vote. Vanuatu, although agreeing that other situations of human rights violations merited international attention, could not accept that as a reason not to vote for what it believed to be the principles of the Charter of the United Nations; however, it expressed concern that the southern part of the western hemisphere was being singled out in examining possible human rights violations.

Though endorsing the condemnation of violence in El Salvador and the appeals for peace-making and full respect for human rights, Belgium believed the resolution was incomplete because it did not stress the need for free and democratic elections; a comprehensive political solution prior to elections was an option neither realistic nor democratic. Finland, while supporting the appeal for a peaceful settlement, said some provisions appeared tendentious and even contrary to the conclusions in the Special Representative's report. France said the resolution responded to the gravity of the situation; only a political settlement of national reconciliation, through economic and social reforms and the elimination of outside interference, could ensure full respect for human rights. Stating that its affirmative vote should not be construed as taking sides in the conflict in El Salvador, the Federal Republic of Germany expressed regret that several points of the text attributed blame to one side only.

In Cuba's opinion, it could not be claimed that a call for the restoration of peace, for the elimination of martial law and for strict respect of civil and political rights constituted interference in internal affairs; the only interference was the action of a hegemonistic super-Power providing the Salvadorian junta with 31 per cent of all military assistance to Latin America. Mexico said the resolution opened the way for whatever democratic solution might emerge and did not prejudge that solution. Saint Lucia supported the resolution on the ground that its call for a negotiated political solution would create an appropriate environment for free elections.

During debate in the Third Committee, a number of speakers called for negotiations between the contending parties to bring about a political settlement that would protect human rights. Canada called on all political groups in the country to seek a political solution through elections, and offered to provide technical assistance and to participate in international monitoring of such elections. Sweden, however, said that a political solution through elections was no longer a realistic solution; only after a cease-fire and through a negotiated settlement with the participation of all parties would it be possible to control the army and guerrilla forces and organize general elections.

Nicaragua stressed the need to promote a political solution through a global and unconditional dialogue involving all parties. The United Kingdom said the European Community (EC) members favoured a dialogue between the Government and all parties, including the opposition, in preparation for elections to be held as soon as possible in conditions which would ensure an impartial and fair result; they called on all parties involved in the fighting to forsake violence and bring an end to the conflict, as well as to promote and respect the free and fair functioning of the democratic process. Yugoslavia spoke of the need for a political and democratic solution, taking account of all political forces in the country and without external interference.

Commenting on the human rights situation as described in the Special Representative's report, Australia expressed concern about human rights violations perpetrated by armed forces of various political persuasions. Denmark said the pattern of atrocities, murders, abductions and large-scale disappearances described in the report was shocking. Norway said the report had confirmed its view of the situation and would serve as a good basis for future work.

Bulgaria stated that the Salvadorian junta, encouraged by imperialist support, had pursued a policy of mass terror against its own people, massacring tens of thousands of them without trial. Hungary and Poland condemned what they described as the crimes committed against the Salvadorians by the military junta.

Calling for an end to flagrant interference in El Salvador's affairs, the Ukrainian SSR said the United States had not stopped supplying military equipment to that country and had sent military advisers to train units carrying out punitive expeditions and to participate in military operations against Salvadorian patriots. The United States, said Mongolia, was providing military assistance to the junta and supporting the mass violations of human rights. The USSR said the imperialist circles of a certain Power were directly involved in the bloody crimes committed in El Salvador. Given the large-scale outside assistance from a country which sought to prove its own prestige and strength, Czechoslovakia said, the people of El Salvador could not realize their aspirations for a democratic society.

The United States said the El Salvador Government, although it had an imperfect command of its security forces confronting a violent enemy, was committed to reform and social justice, whereas the insurgents were not interested in a political solution that would permit the people to decide.

During the debate, the Netherlands proposed that the Special Representative be invited to assist the Third Committee in its discussion of his interim report. Following discussion of this proposal, the Chairman announced that it had been withdrawn after a request by Venezuela and others that he decide the question. Having concluded that the proposal would have been adopted if it had been put to the vote, the Chairman had invited the Special Representative to attend but he had declined, stating in a letter that he had taken great care to ensure a climate of mutual confidence and co-operation between himself and all parties in El Salvador.

Situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in El Salvador

The General Assembly,
Recognizing the permanent validity of the principles enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations and in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,

Conscious of its responsibility to promote and guarantee the maintenance of those principles and to contribute to ensuring respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all,

Reiterating once more that all Member States have an obligation to protect human rights and fundamental freedoms and to fulfil in this respect the obligations they have undertaken through the various international instruments in this field,

Recalling its resolution 35/192 of 15 December 1980, in which, among other things, it expressed deep concern at the violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms in El Salvador, especially in view of the death of thousands of persons and the climate of repression and insecurity which prevailed in that country, and deplored the assassinations, disappearances and other serious violations of human rights in El Salvador,

Reiterating the appeal made by the General Assembly in that resolution for the cessation of violence and the re-establishment of full respect for human rights in El Salvador and for Governments of all States to refrain from supplying arms and lending other forms of military assistance in the current circumstances,

Bearing in mind Commission on Human Rights resolution 32(XXXVII) of 11 March 1981, approved by the Economic and Social Council in its decision 1981/147 of 8 May 1981, in which the Commission noted the persistence of the climate of violence and insecurity which prevails in El Salvador,

Endorsing the appeal to the Salvadorian parties involved, made by the Commission on Human Rights in its resolution 32(XXXVII), to arrive at a peaceful settlement and put an end to violence in order to prevent further loss of lives and to alleviate the suffering of the people of El Salvador,

Taking note of resolution 10(XXXIV) of 9 September 1981, adopted by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, in which the Sub-Commission stated that only respect for article 25 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights will assure to the Salvadorian nation, through the participation of all its political forces, the full exercise of its fundamental rights in establishing a democratically elected government, but also noted that at the present time these conditions do not exist in El Salvador,

Having studied the interim report on the situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in El Salvador, prepared by the Special Representative appointed by the Commission on Human Rights, which confirms the seriousness of the situation prevailing in El Salvador and, among other things, provides evidence on the general attitude of passiveness and inactivity of the present Salvadorian authorities with respect to the constant human rights violations in that country,

Noting that the situation in El Salvador, as clearly shown in the interim report of the Special Representative, has its root causes in internal political, economic and social factors,

1. Reiterates its deep concern for the situation prevailing in El Salvador and the suffering of the Salvadorian people;

2. Requests once more the Salvadorian parties involved to arrive at a negotiated political solution in order to establish, in an atmosphere free from intimidation and terror, a democratically elected government;

3. Deeply deplores all acts of violence and all grave violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and regrets in particular the persistence of a situation in which governmental paramilitary organizations and other armed groups continue to act with total contempt for the life, security and tranquillity of the civilian population;

4. Draws the attention of all parties concerned to the fact that the rules of international law, as contained in common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, are applicable to armed conflicts not of an international character and requests the parties involved to apply a minimum standard of protection to the affected population;

5. Reiterates its appeal to all States to abstain from intervening in the internal situation in El Salvador and to suspend all supplies of arms and any type of military support, so as to allow the political forces in that country to restore peace and security;

6. Affirms once more that it is incumbent only on the Salvadorian people to exercise their right to determine freely their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development and to establish the conditions and undertake the changes most adequate to their aspirations as a people and as a nation without external interference Of any kind;

7. Urges the Government of El Salvador to adopt the necessary measures to ensure full respect for the human rights of its population in all their expressions, primarily by creating conditions which could lead to a political solution of the present crisis through the full participation of all representative political forces in that country;

8. Urges the parties concerned to co-operate and not interfere with the activities of the humanitarian organizations which are dedicated to alleviating the suffering of the civilian population in El Salvador;

9. Requests the Commission on Human Rights at its thirty-eighth session thoroughly to examine the situation in El Salvador on the basis of the final report of the Special Representative of the Commission on Human Rights;

10. Decides to maintain under consideration, during its thirty-seventh session, the situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms in El Salvador, in order to examine anew this situation in the light of additional elements provided by the Commission on Human Rights and the Economic and Social Council.

Guatemala

ACTION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS. In response to a March 1980 resolution by the Commission on Human Rights,<sup>(6)</sup> the Secretary-General reported in January 1981 on action taken in regard to the human rights situation in Guatemala.<sup>(2)</sup>

The report included a letter to Guatemala from the Secretary-General, dated 13 June 1980, proposing to appoint a representative to visit the country in pursuance of the Commission's request that he bring its resolution to the Government's attention and report on the results of the contact. Guatemala replied on 12 September that in due course it would indicate dates for the visit but, because of violence by clandestine factions, the dispatch of such a representative would not be appropriate for the time being. Replying on 27 October to an expression of hope by the Commission Chairman that human rights would be fully respected, Guatemala again stated that, for the time being, it could not receive a representative of the Secretary-General but that arrangements for a visit by the OAS Inter-American Commission on Human Rights would be concluded when adequate security and conditions for the Commission to fulfil its task were guaranteed.

The report also transmitted information on the situation in Guatemala from one Government (Venezuela) and four non-governmental organizations, received in response to a 1980 request by the Secretary-General.

Noting the Secretary-General's report, the Commission on Human Rights, on 11 March 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> requested that he continue his efforts to establish direct contacts with the Government of Guatemala and to collect information from all relevant sources. The Commission requested him to present an interim report to the General Assembly in 1981 and a report to the Commission in 1982. It asked the Government to extend its co-operation and decided to keep the question under review as a priority item.

The resolution was adopted by 28 votes to 2, with 10 abstentions.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL. As requested by the Commission on Human Rights, the Secretary-General presented to the General Assembly in November an interim report<sup>(1)</sup> giving an account of his efforts to establish contacts with Guatemala. By a letter of 24 August, the Under-Secretary-General for Political and General Assembly Affairs had proposed that Julio Prado Vallejo (Ecuador), a member of the Human Rights Committee, should act as the contact. Guatemala had responded on 11 September that Mr. Prado Vallejo's appointment was unacceptable, since the contacts must be established through a Secretariat member rather than a member of the Committee established under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights,<sup>(4)</sup> to which Guatemala was not a party. At the time of submission, the report stated, representatives of the Secretary-General remained in contact with the Government in their effort to establish direct contacts.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 16 December,<sup>(5)</sup> the General Assembly requested the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to establish direct contacts and asked Guatemala to co-operate further. The Assembly took this decision, by a recorded vote of 81 to 18, with 45 abstentions, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, which approved the text, revised in writing and orally, on 3 December by a recorded vote, requested by Guatemala, of 68 to 18, with 41 abstentions.

The draft was orally revised by its sponsors, Ghana and the Netherlands, to have the Assembly request rather than appeal to Guatemala to co-operate, and to insert "further" after "co-operate".

Introducing the original text in the Committee, Ghana said that, in establishing his contacts with Guatemala, the Secretary-General should be able to choose a Secretariat official or an international expert. There were strong grounds for believing in Guatemala's willingness to co-operate with the Secretary-General. Introducing the revised version, Ghana remarked that a State should not be a Member of the United Nations without having to meet certain international obligations; one of the Organization's functions was to establish norms requiring international respect.

Guatemala rejected the decision, stating that it was inappropriate in a forum like the Assembly; the only appropriate decision would be a procedural one, not a text including conditions and prejudgments which embodied an intention to condemn. Guatemala also rejected the accusations against it, stating that it considered respect for the human person to be the basic principle of law. An international conspiracy, supported by certain Western and Latin American countries, sought to impose on Guatemala a materialist system and ideology, and the Government had taken steps to deal with the violence fomented by them. It would not tolerate interference in its internal affairs. Guatemala had sent a special representative to the 1981 session of the Commission on Human Rights, but the political interests of some members of that body had prompted them to deny him a hearing and to condemn Guatemala without evidence.

Also voting against the decision, Argentina said it refused to co-operate with those who wanted to make Latin America a battleground for conflicts alien to the region. In Bolivia's view, the resolution was aimed at creating divisions in Latin America in order to facilitate extremist penetration. Costa Rica stated that the decision represented an unjust and isolated accusation of a Latin American country that was not being left in peace to demonstrate its good faith by allowing the Secretary-General's representative to visit. Israel described the decision as unbalanced and unjustifiably selective. The United States said it refused to associate itself with a scenario designed to concentrate attention in human rights matters solely on one part of the world.

Abstaining, Fiji, the Philippines and Solomon Islands objected that the decision referred selectively to a single country. Peru said it betrayed a desire to intervene in internal affairs. Tunisia said it was essentially up to OAS to find solutions to its members' problems.

Though voting in favour, Vanuatu expressed concern that the southern part of the western hemisphere was being singled out in examining possible human rights violations.

Speaking during the Committee's debate on human rights, Sweden said that, in order to avoid developments similar to those in El Salvador (p. 958), the spiralling violence must be stopped and the political process resumed. The United Kingdom said the EC members were concerned at the high level of violence committed by both sides and urged the Government to encourage peace and reconciliation.

Australia, Canada and others expressed hope that the Guatemalan Government would enable the Secretary-General to carry out his mission. The Netherlands hoped the Secretary-General would convey the concern of Member States to the Guatemalan Government. However, Morocco said it was well known that in cases of alleged human rights violations no intervention was possible without the agreement of the country concerned; it had always been understood that prior agreement should be obtained before a special rapporteur was sent.

Other aspects of human rights violations

Mass exoduses

A Special Rapporteur appointed under a March 1981 resolution of the Commission on Human Rights submitted a study in December on human rights and mass exoduses.

The Commission acted after receiving a January 1981 report by the Secretary-General, submitted in accordance with a March 1980 Commission resolution<sup>(5)</sup> requesting him to consider establishing contacts with Governments in cases where large-scale exoduses had become a matter of international concern and solidarity, to assess the relationship between that situation and full enjoyment of human rights, and to make recommendations for improving the situation.

In his report,<sup>(1)</sup> the Secretary-General gave a brief account of the methods employed by the United Nations to facilitate solutions and alleviate suffering in such situations, through contacts and consultations with the parties, the exercise of good offices and appeals for international assistance. He expressed the view that further investigation or articulation of the nexus between human rights violations and mass exoduses deserved consideration by United Nations organs such as the Commission. In devising approaches or procedures for dealing with mass exoduses, caution was to be exercised in the public disclosure of the precise substance of his contacts with Governments, so as to avoid prejudicing future efforts.

Taking note of the Secretary-General's report, the Commission decided on 11 March<sup>(3)</sup> to appoint for one year a special rapporteur to study the question of human rights and mass exoduses. He was authorized to seek information mainly from United Nations agencies and departments, Governments, and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations. He was requested to submit his study to the Commission in 1982, together with conclusions and recommendations.

The appointment was approved by the Economic and Social Council on 8 May<sup>(4)</sup> by 46 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions. The Second (Social) Committee approved the decision, based on a draft by the Commission, on 5 May, by 43 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions.

In his report,<sup>(2)</sup> the Special Rapporteur, Sadruddin Aga Khan (former United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees), concluded that mass movements had become more commonplace and the principle of the law of asylum had been eroded. In exoduses caused by man-made situations, there was a lack of contact between the authorities of the country of origin and the country of asylum, causing humanitarian operations to develop in a vacuum without relation to the origins of the situation. Timely distribution of aid could help circumscribe the flow of persons; conversely, the availability of assistance exclusively within the receiving country could help precipitate population movements. United Nations organs that dealt with causes and prevention of mass exoduses tended to be compartmentalized and ponderous or hamstrung by political constraints, and did not co-ordinate with assistance agencies.

The Special Rapporteur recommended a series of measures to deal with the problem, including: an updating of refugee, nationality and labour law, and fresh consideration of asylum practice; simultaneous approaches to the country of origin and country of asylum to gain a comprehensive view that would improve planning; reappraisal of developing countries' economic needs in relation to possible causes of exodus; standardization of international aid criteria; relating multilateral to bilateral aid so as to prevent duplication and ensure an integrated approach; introduction of a census mechanism to determine the number of border-crossers requiring assistance; introduction of an early-warning system on potential mass exoduses; and the appointment of a special representative for humanitarian questions to forewarn, monitor and depoliticize situations, carry out functions not assumed by humanitarian agencies and serve as an intermediary between parties.

Human rights and mass exoduses

At its 18th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council took note of resolution 29(XXXVII) of 11 March 1981 of the Commission on Human Rights, and approved the Commission's decision to appoint for a period of one year a special rapporteur to study the question of human rights and mass exoduses; the Council also requested the Secretary-General to provide the special rapporteur with all necessary assistance, in particular staff and resources, to carry out his study.

Hostages

The Commission on Human Rights, on 11 March 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> affirmed that the taking of hostages constituted a grave human rights violation, exposing the hostages to privation, hardship, anguish, and danger to life and health. The Commission called on all States to observe fully and unconditionally their international obligations to protect diplomatic and consular personnel and premises and to prevent the taking of hostages, and resolved that it would accord due consideration to violations of human rights through hostage-taking.

Resolution: <sup>(1)</sup>Commission on Human Rights (report, E/1981/25), 27(XXXVII), 11 Mar.

Right to promote observance of human rights

The Commission on Human Rights, on 11 March 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> reiterated the right and responsibility of individuals and organs of society to strive for the promotion and observance of the rights recognized in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights<sup>(2)</sup> and the International Covenants on Human Rights.<sup>(3)</sup> It deplored harsh and punitive treatment of individuals, groups or organs of society as a result of their efforts to enjoy civil and political as well as economic, social and cultural rights, and reaffirmed that their responsibility to promote respect for human rights should be in accordance with the relevant international instruments. The Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities was requested to study the subject without omitting the indivisibility and interdependence of the two groups of rights, with a view to considering what further action might be desirable.

Procedures for examining human rights violations

In accordance with a procedure established by the Economic and Social Council in 1970 for dealing with communications to the United Nations alleging denial or violation of human rights,<sup>(3)</sup> five-member working groups established respectively by the Commission on Human Rights and its Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities met privately prior to the 1981 sessions of both bodies to examine such communications and related material. The procedure called for the Sub-Commission to refer to the Commission communications and government replies which appeared to reveal a consistent pattern of gross and reliably attested violations, and for the Commission to decide whether particular situations should be investigated. All actions under this procedure were to remain confidential until the Commission decided to make recommendations to the Council.

The Commission's working group examined documents referred to it by the Sub-Commission in 1980 and submitted a confidential report which the Commission examined at 12 closed meetings in February and March 1981.<sup>(1)</sup> In addition, the Secretary-General distributed to Commission members confidential lists of communications concerning human rights, replies of Governments and a confidential document of a statistical nature. The Commission took confidential decisions relating to Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, the Central African Republic, Chile, El Salvador, Ethiopia, the German Democratic Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Indonesia, Japan, Mozambique, Paraguay, the Republic of Korea, Uganda and Uruguay.

As it had done in previous years, the Commission decided on 6 March to set up a working group of five of its members to meet for one week prior to its 1982 session, to examine situations referred to it by the Sub-Commission as well as situations the Commission had decided to keep under review.<sup>(5)</sup> The Economic and Social Council approved this decision without vote on 8 May 1981,<sup>(6)</sup> following similar approval by the Second (Social) Committee on 5 May.

Prior to the August/September session of the Sub-Commission, its five-member Working Group on Communications held its tenth session from 3 to 14 August and submitted a confidential report containing its findings. After considering the matter at four closed meetings on 4 and 7 September,<sup>(2)</sup> the Sub-Commission transmitted its findings to the Commission in a confidential report. The Sub-Commission rejected a proposal to have the working group take its decisions by consensus instead of majority vote.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY CONSIDERATION. In its resolution of 14 December on measures to advance human rights, the General Assembly reiterated that priority should continue to be accorded to the search for solutions to mass and flagrant violations of human rights of peoples and individuals, paying due attention to other human rights violations.<sup>(4)</sup>

During the human rights debate in the Assembly's Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural)

Committee, Canada said the United Nations should design and set up a new procedure to deal rapidly and effectively with all urgent situations involving serious violations of human rights; no State should enjoy any immunity in that regard. France suggested that the Commission conduct a public investigation of alleged human rights violations when the confidential procedure proved fruitless. The United Kingdom, speaking for the European Community members, said they were keenly disappointed by the failure of the United Nations to agree on proposals to remedy the lack of machinery to deal with violations, such as establishment of a post of United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (p. 929) or inter-sessional activities by the Commission (p. 926).

Some countries criticized what they described as a selective approach by the United Nations to human rights violations. Argentina deplored what it saw as growing politicization of certain aspects of human rights, with the result that, instead of co-operating, Governments rejected the misrepresentation of problems for political reasons and solutions became more remote. Colombia charged that some countries were using human rights, for which they had little respect at home, as a pretext for stirring up trouble in certain States and destabilizing them; while terrorist violence was increasing, international human rights machinery remained silent. Israel regretted that the United Nations did not concern itself with injustices to all minorities and all groups deprived of their rights but dealt almost exclusively with issues in which the numerical majority were interested and which served the propaganda purposes of countries that were among the most flagrant violators of human rights.

New Zealand said that, while it was sometimes necessary to keep the situation in certain countries under special review, the United Nations should not ignore serious violations elsewhere lest its effectiveness in combating abuses all over the world be weakened. The United States asserted that no aspect of United Nations affairs had been more perverted by politicization than its human rights activities; human rights had become a bludgeon wielded by the strong against the weak, by the majority against the isolated, by blocs against the unorganized.

Australia, though agreeing that the United Nations should be concerned about violations wherever they occurred, stated that the action it took on one situation could not be invalidated on the ground that other comparable or even worse situations had not been considered. In India's view, it was difficult to agree that the international community should not concern itself with any human rights violations until it was in a position to deal with all such situations. Mexico said that, to argue that certain cases could not be condemned or censured unless all were condemned or censured, would lead to the absurd thesis that no criminal could be apprehended and punished unless all were.

The Netherlands observed that United Nations involvement could favourably affect a national human rights situation in general and the fate of individuals in particular; the Committee should take advantage of the fact that the attention paid to Governments in the Committee was of concern to them.

The Byelorussian SSR believed that human rights violations should be dealt with by organs consisting of representatives of Member States. The German Democratic Republic saw a need to establish unambiguous criteria as to what was meant by systematic and mass violations; and the USSR believed that priority should be given to combating mass and flagrant human rights violations in situations which threatened peace and security and which were the consequence of aggression, fascism, racism and the suppression of national liberation movements and democratic forces.

Establishment of a working group of the Commission on Human Rights to examine situations referred to the Commission under Economic and Social Council resolution 1503(XLVIII) and those situations of which the Commission is seized

At its 18th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council approved the decision taken by the Commission on Human Rights, in its decision 4(XXXVII) of 6 March 1981, to set up a working group composed of five of its members to meet for one week prior to its thirty-eighth session to examine such particular situations as might be referred to the Commission by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities at its thirty-fourth session, under Council resolution 1503(XLVIII) of 27 May 1970, and those situations of which the Commission is seized.

Other human rights questions

Human rights in armed conflicts

In February 1981, the Secretary-General submitted, in accordance with a 1979 General Assembly resolution,<sup>(3)</sup> his annual report on States that had ratified or acceded to the two 1977 Protocols<sup>(4)</sup> Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 concerning respect for human rights in armed conflicts.<sup>(1)</sup>

As at 31 December 1981 -according to information submitted in the corresponding report for 1982<sup>(2)</sup>-20 States had ratified or acceded to Protocol I, on protection of victims of international armed conflicts (names of States adhering in 1981 are italicized): Bahamas, Bangladesh, Botswana, Cyprus, Denmark, Ecuador, El Salvador, Finland, Gabon, Ghana, Jordan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mauritania, Niger, Norway, Sweden, Tunisia, Viet Nam, Yugoslavia. All of these States except Cyprus and Viet Nam had also adhered to Protocol II, on protection of victims of non-international conflicts.

Proposed establishment of a new international humanitarian order

By a resolution of 14 December 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> the General Assembly requested the Secretary-General to seek the views of Governments on a proposal by Jordan for the promotion of a new international humanitarian order, and decided to consider the question in 1982 on the basis of the Secretary-General's report.

The resolution was adopted, without vote, on the recommendation of the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, which approved the 12-nation draft on 30 November 1981 in like manner.

The proposal on a new international humanitarian order had been submitted by Jordan in a letter of 28 October<sup>(1)</sup> requesting the inclusion of an item on the subject in the agenda of the 1981 Assembly session. Annexed to the letter were a general outline of the concept and historical background on humanitarian law.

Introducing the draft resolution, Jordan said the concept of a new international humanitarian order, proposed by Crown Prince Hassan of Jordan in a statement to the Assembly in September, was based on the urgently felt need to fill gaps in international humanitarian law, in terms of both principles and mechanisms for remedial action. The response to major natural and man-made disasters had been generous but fragmentary, and much remained to be done in regard to both human welfare-including disaster relief and international economic disparities-and human rights. Once a basic framework was established for the new order, its implementation would depend on the improvement of international institutions. To elaborate the idea, Jordan suggested the establishment of a working group of some 20 leading personalities in human rights or experts in international humanitarian law.

In the Committee, Yugoslavia favoured the deletion of the second and third preambular paragraphs (citing the importance of improving a comprehensive international framework relating to humanitarian questions and the possible need to strengthen institutional arrangements and action of governmental and non-governmental bodies) on the ground that they implied that the Committee had already taken a stand on the proposal, which might prejudice the discussion in 1982.

In Australia's view, efforts for missing persons and the elimination of torture were among the more important issues to be addressed in this context. Romania thought that priority should be given to issues requiring concerted action, such as hunger and malnutrition, diseases, illiteracy, education, natural disasters, and guarantees for economic, social and cultural rights; to promoting a new humanism based on the principle that personal happiness was incompatible with exploitation of man by man; and to universal respect for the right to peace. Speaking for the European Community members, the United Kingdom said the proposal seemed to have the laudable goal of consolidating methods and instruments; in view of the extremely complex problems involved, however, Governments would need time to consider it.

New International humanitarian order

The General Assembly,

Noting with Interest the proposal for the promotion of a new international humanitarian order,

Recognizing the Importance of further Improving a comprehensive international framework which takes fully Into account existing instruments relating to humanitarian questions as well as the need for addressing those aspects which are not yet adequately covered,

Bearing in mind that institutional arrangements and action of governmental and non-governmental bodies might need to be further strengthened to respond effectively in situations requiring humanitarian action,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to seek the views of Governments on the proposal for the promotion of a new International humanitarian order:

2. Decides to consider the question at its thirty-seventh session on the basis of the report of the Secretary-General.

Rights of the child

Draft convention

ACTIVITIES OF THE WORKING GROUP. The Working Group on a draft convention on the rights of the child, established by the Commission on Human Rights, met at Geneva between 26 January and 27 February 1981 to continue work begun in 1979 on the basis of a draft submitted that year by Poland. The Group completed one article that had been partially approved in 1980 and adopted five additional articles, but was unable to complete consideration of the draft for lack of time.<sup>(1)</sup>

The Group, open to all Commission members, was headed by Adam Lopatka (Poland) as Chairman/Rapporteur. As authorized by the Economic and Social Council in May 1980 at the Commission's request,<sup>(4)</sup> the Group met from 26 to 30 January, prior to the Commission's 1981 session. The Commission then decided on 3 February that the work of the Group should continue during its session.

The Working Group adopted paragraph 2 of article 2, and articles 3, 4, 5, 7 and 8. These pertained to: acquisition of the nationality of the State where the child was born if no other nationality was granted; ensuring that the child's best interests would be taken into account, that the child's views would be heard, that protection and care would be afforded and that personnel of child-care institutions were properly supervised; the guarantee of each child's rights without distinction or discrimination; the duty of States parties to ensure those rights through administrative and legislative measures; free expression of the child's opinion; and primary responsibility of parents or guardians for the child's upbringing and development, and provision for assistance from the State, including measures to ensure child-care services and facilities.

ACTION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL. On 10 March,<sup>(2)</sup> the Commission on Human Rights decided to continue in 1982 its work on the draft convention with a view to completing it for transmission to the General Assembly through the Economic and Social Council. To facilitate completion of the draft convention, the Commission requested the Council to authorize a one-week session of an open-ended working group prior to the Commission's 1982 session.

The Council gave its authorization on 8 May 1981, by a decision<sup>(5)</sup> adopted without vote. The Second (Social) Committee had approved the text, based on a draft by the Commission, on 5 May in like manner.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution of 25 November,<sup>(3)</sup> the Assembly welcomed the Council decision to authorize a working group and requested the Commission to give the highest priority to completion of the draft convention. It decided to include the item in the provisional agenda of its 1982 session.

The Assembly adopted the resolution, without vote, on the recommendation of its Third Committee, which approved the 66-nation draft on 3 November 1981 in the same manner.

Introducing the draft resolution, Poland said it took into account the advanced stage of work and offered the Assembly's encouragement to the Commission. Poland's initiative for a convention had resulted from mounting concern over the fact that children were the first to suffer from poverty, and from the conviction that a convention could enhance the complementarity of national and international efforts and serve as a catalyst for change.

In October, Poland submitted to the Third Committee a working paper on the status of the draft convention, including the articles agreed on by the Commission and the proposed text of 20 additional articles, incorporating revisions to the text previously submitted.<sup>(6)</sup>

In the Committee, many speakers expressed support for the adoption of a draft convention, among them Australia, the Byelorussian SSR, Cuba, Democratic Kampuchea, France, the German Democratic Republic, Ghana, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Norway, the Philippines, Portugal, Sierra Leone, Tunisia, the USSR, Viet Nam and Zaire. Bulgaria, Mongolia, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR hoped the draft convention would be completed and adopted in 1982. The Council decision to authorize a working group was welcomed by the Byelorussian SSR, Hungary, New Zealand and others.

In Guyana's view, effective protection of the rights of the child meant first of all meeting the child's basic needs, such as sufficient food, adequate medical care, a decent level of living and a proper education; the enjoyment of those rights was inseparable from an improvement in the economic and social conditions of developing countries and the establishment of a new and more just international economic order. Uganda thought that some provisions of the draft convention placed on States responsibilities with vast financial implications, such as that of guaranteeing an education to all children, which developing countries would be unable to implement in the near future.

Argentina thought the distinction between childhood and adolescence should be clearly reflected in the convention, and that age of minority should not be included since it was a legal state rather than a stage of psycho-biological development. The Lao People's Democratic Republic said it did not agree with the proposal to delete or rephrase draft article 6 which, in its opinion, fully guaranteed the rights of the child, the responsibility for whom lay essentially with the family. Yemen thought that, in elaborating the convention, special attention should be given to the situation of children in Namibia, South Africa and occupied Palestine.

Question of a convention on the rights of the child

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 33/166 of 20 December 1978, 34/4 of 18 October 1979 and 35/131 of 11 December 1980,

Mindful of the vital link between programmes benefiting children and the observance of their rights, and a broader and more comprehensive framework of overall economic and social development in conditions of peace,

Convinced that the fresh and necessary impetus to activities generated by the International Year of the Child should be maintained and that the new perspectives it has created should be followed by appropriate action in the years to come,

Reaffirming the important role that the United Nations Children's Fund has to play in the subject-matter concerned,

Aware of the importance of an international convention on the rights of the child for the protection of children's rights and improvement in their situation,

Having in mind Commission on Human Rights resolutions 20(XXXIV) of 8 March 1978, 19(XXXV) of 14 March 1979, 36(XXXVI) of 12 March 1980 and 26(XXXVII) of 10 March 1981, as well as Economic and Social Council resolutions 1978/18 of 5 May 1978 and 1978/40 of 1 August 1978 and Council decisions 1980/138 of 2 May 1980 and 1981/144 of 8 May 1981.

Noting with appreciation the further progress made in the elaboration of a draft convention on the rights of the child by the Commission on Human Rights prior to and during its thirty-seventh session,

1. Welcomes Economic and Social Council decision 1981/144 by which the Council authorized an open-ended working group of the Commission on Human Rights to meet for a period of one week prior to the thirty-eighth session of the Commission to facilitate completion of the work on the draft convention on the rights of the child;

2. Requests the Commission on Human Rights to give the highest priority to the question of completing the draft convention;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to provide all necessary assistance to the working group in order to ensure its smooth and efficient work;

4. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-seventh session the item entitled 'Question of a convention on the rights of the child'.

Exploitation of child labour

REPORT OF THE SPECIAL RAPPORTEUR. A report on the exploitation of child labour,<sup>(1)</sup> authorized by the Economic and Social Council in May 1980<sup>(4)</sup> and prepared by a Special Rapporteur of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, Abdelwahab Bouhdiba (Tunisia), was submitted to the Sub-Commission in 1981.

The report was based on documentation supplied by the United Nations, specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations (NGOs), including studies by the Anti-Slavery Society for Protection of Human Rights. The report dealt with economic, social, cultural and psychological aspects of the problem of child labour, affecting an estimated 145 million children, especially in developing countries. It also dealt with activities which fell into the category of slavery and slavery-like practices: the sale of children and pressing them into serfdom, child prostitution and child pornography.

The report contained suggestions for a global campaign strategy against the exploitation of child labour, including: a broad public information campaign; an appeal for national legislation on the minimum age for admission to employment; an international training programme for inspectors specializing in child labour, with the assistance of international organizations; special activities by trade unions; and national or regional research into the forms, conditions, structures and implications of the exploitation of child labour.

The Special Rapporteur stressed the need to make families aware of their responsibilities and of the need to avoid concealing or being unwitting parties to the activities of child exploiters. Also, consideration should be given to the relationship between school, apprenticeship and child labour. He called for action by the International Criminal Police Organization (Interpol) and increased pressure on States in the most flagrant types of exploitation, including sale and serfdom, child prostitution and trafficking in pornography, and under-aged maidservants in positions of servitude. Further suggestions included extension of the Sub-Commission's role to support the strategy, organization of a human rights seminar on the subject, joint research and other activities by NGOs, and international assistance to help States with national measures.

REPORT BY THE WORKING GROUP ON SLAVERY. In its 1981 report to the Sub-Commission,<sup>(2)</sup> the Working Group on Slavery (p. 913) also dealt with the exploitation of child labour, urging further consideration of reports on child labour in Greece and Jamaica, and on child prostitution, especially in certain Asian countries.

ACTION BY THE SUB-COMMISSION ON DISCRIMINATION AND MINORITIES. Endorsing the conclusions and recommendations of the Special Rapporteur, the Sub-Commission, on 10 September,<sup>(3)</sup> by 22 votes to none, decided to transmit his report to the Commission on Human Rights and recommended that it also be transmitted to several specialized agencies and United Nations bodies, as well as to Interpol, for comment. The Sub-Commission requested that the attention of the United Nations University be drawn to the Rapporteur's suggestion that the University undertake a five-year research programme and regional pilot studies on child labour and its circumstances. It recommended that the United Nations Division of Human Rights hold as soon as possible, under its advisory services programme (p. 937), a seminar on human rights violations through the exploitation of child labour. It decided to consider in 1982 the drawing up of a concrete programme of action to combat violations of the human rights of children through the exploitation of child labour, and invited the Special Rapporteur to present recommendations or observations.

The Sub-Commission recommended that the Economic and Social Council authorize the printing and widest possible distribution of the report and that the Commission on Human Rights invite the Sub-Commission to present to the Council, through the Commission, an action programme to combat human rights violations through exploitation of child labour.

Youth and human rights

ACTION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS. By a resolution of 12 March 1981 on the role of youth in the promotion and protection of human rights,<sup>(1)</sup> the Commission on Human Rights emphasized the important role of young people in the promotion of their country's economic and social development, especially in efforts to overcome such obstacles to development as colonialism and neo-colonialism, racial discrimination and apartheid foreign domination and occupation, aggression and threats to national sovereignty, national unity and territorial integrity, and denial of the right of peoples to self-determination and the exercise of full sovereignty over their natural wealth and resources. The Commission called on Member States to encourage and ensure the active participation of youth in the formulation and implementation of development programmes, and decided to consider in 1982 the role of youth in the promotion of social and economic progress.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution of 13 November,<sup>(3)</sup> the General Assembly called on all States, in view of the International Youth Year (IYY) in 1985 (p. 1019), to adopt legislative, administrative and other measures for the implementation and enjoyment by youth of human rights, particularly the right to education and to work, aimed at solving the problem of youth unemployment. It appealed to governmental organizations and NGOs to pay increased attention to securing the basic right of young people to education, vocational training and work. The Assembly requested the Commission on Human Rights and other United Nations bodies and agencies to give continuous attention to the youth unemployment problem, and requested the Advisory Committee for IYY to ensure systematic and continuous attention to the promotion of human rights and their enjoyment by youth.

The resolution was adopted, by a recorded vote of 136 to none, with 5 abstentions, on the recommendation of the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, which approved the 21-nation text on 26 October by a recorded vote, requested by Singapore, of 129 to none, with 11 abstentions. The text had been revised by the sponsors, twice in writing and once orally, and amended by the Committee.

The text incorporated two amendments by Morocco which were adopted by vote in Committee. One of them affected paragraph 3, by which the Assembly requested that attention be given to the problems of youth unemployment; at the end of this paragraph the amendment, adopted by 80 votes to 30, with 18 abstentions, replaced the phrase "and the securing of its right to work" by "and to resolving them". The other amendment, adopted by 86 votes to 25, with 19 abstentions, inserted the words "whenever possible" in the fourth preambular paragraph, which mentioned the need for action to codify and implement the rights of youth. The amended preambular paragraph was adopted by a recorded vote of 99 to none, with 37 abstentions; the vote was requested by Sweden and the German Democratic Republic asked that it be recorded.

The sponsors had orally revised their draft in the light of other amendments by Morocco. As a result, references to the right to education were inserted in the resolution's title and three places in its text. In addition, as proposed by Sweden in an oral sub-amendment which Morocco had accepted, the words "human rights of youth" were replaced by "enjoyment by youth of human rights". The revised text also incorporated editorial changes suggested orally by Ethiopia and Ghana.

Morocco withdrew several other amendments it had proposed to an earlier version of the text, including a proposal to remove youth unemployment problems from the list of topics for the IYY Advisory Committee. Introducing these amendments, Morocco remarked that the objective of the resolution, though commendable, could not be achieved in the immediate future in view of the difficulties many States had in dealing with unemployment.

Introducing the original draft in the Committee, Czechoslovakia stated that the most critical problem afflicting young people was unemployment. The resolution sought to encourage Governments and international organizations to focus on improving the legal and material status of young people and safeguarding their right to work.

Speaking of an earlier version of the text prior to the incorporation of some of the Moroccan amendments, the United Kingdom remarked, on behalf of the European Community (EC) members, that care should be taken not to accord young people special rights which would make them a privileged group; also, the lack of a definition of the right to work made the text too vague and open to conflicting interpretations. Czechoslovakia responded that the right to work was provided for in the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights,<sup>(2)</sup> and could not be omitted from a resolution drawn up on that basis.

Explaining its abstention in the Committee and Assembly votes, the United States expressed regret that the text had been politicized by insertion of the phrase "right to work", the use of which was intended to promote the supposed benefits of a centralized economy, based on compulsion. Abstaining in Committee, Canada voted for the resolution in the Assembly, saying its purposes and aims were valid; however, Canada continued to be against any further codification of the rights of youth or any other group of that kind. A similar point was made by the United Kingdom on behalf of the EC members, which voted for the resolution. Though voting in favour, Sweden, speaking for the five Nordic States, commented that it was unnecessary and misleading to speak of young people's right to work as a separate issue, since the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights embodied everybody's right to work; the problem should be solved not by legislation but by economic policy aimed at full employment and by training programmes.

Efforts and measures for securing the implementation and the enjoyment by youth of human rights, particularly the right to education and to work

The General Assembly,

Mindful of the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Recalling its resolution 34/151 of 17 December 1979, by which it decided to designate 1985 as International Youth Year: Participation. Development. Peace, Recognizing the profound importance of the role of youth for the all-round development of each country.

Convinced of the need for further action aimed at the codification and implementation, whenever possible, of the rights of youth with special regard for the right to work, stipulated in article 6 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights as one of the fundamental human rights.

Aware of the fact that the unemployment of youth is a hindrance to the full participation of young people in the socio-economic life of their country, limits their ability to participate in the development process and is, furthermore, a source of increased social ills, and in this regard emphasizing the importance of secondary and higher education of youth as well as of its access to appropriate technical, vocational guidance and training programmes,

Considering it necessary that States and also international organizations and their bodies should examine in a more comprehensive, systematic and effective manner ways and means to secure the implementation of human rights and their enjoyment by youth, particularly the right to education and to work, aimed at solving the problem of youth unemployment,

1. Calls upon all States, in view of the forthcoming International Youth Year, to adopt appropriate legislative, administrative and other measures, for the implementation and the enjoyment by youth of human rights, particularly the right to education and to work, aimed at solving the problem of youth unemployment;

2. Appeals to the respective governmental and non-governmental organizations to pay, during the preparation and observance of the International Youth Year, increased attention to the securing and realization of the basic right of young people to education and vocational training and to work;

3. Requests the Economic and Social Council, the Commission for Social Development and the Commission on Human Rights, as well as other relevant bodies of the United Nations and specialized agencies, to give continuous attention to the problems of the unemployment of youth and to resolving them;

4. Requests the Advisory Committee for the International Youth Year to ensure that, in the context of the preparations for the Year, systematic and continuous attention is given to the efforts aimed at the promotion of human rights and their enjoyment by youth, particularly the right to education and vocational training and to work, with a view to resolving the problem of youth unemployment.

Human rights, peace and development

WORK OF THE SEMINAR. A Seminar on the Relations that Exist between Human Rights, Peace and Development, organized within the framework of the human rights advisory service programme (p. 937), was held in New York from 3 to 14 August 1981. The decision to convene the Seminar had been taken by the General Assembly in December 1980.<sup>(5)</sup> The Commission on Human Rights, in a resolution of 11 March 1981<sup>(3)</sup> concerned mainly with the right to development (p. 921), requested the Secretary-General to hold the Seminar at United Nations Headquarters in August and established three priority items for it to consider: the relationship between human rights, peace and development; the impact of the arms race in the realization of peace and the right to development; and concrete measures for the full enjoyment of human rights, particularly of peace and the right to development.

The Commission's request was endorsed by the Economic and Social Council on 8 May.<sup>(9)</sup> The Council took this decision by 38 votes to 1, with 12 abstentions, following approval by its Second (Social) Committee on 5 May by the same vote. The 15-nation draft was introduced by Algeria.

The Seminar, attended by representatives of 28 Governments, United Nations and specialized agency officials, and participants from intergovernmental organizations, NGOs and four national liberation movements, adopted by consensus a number of conclusions, which, were included in its report.<sup>(2)</sup> It agreed that human rights, peace and development were interrelated and that the absence of peace or development could not exempt a State from its obligation to ensure respect for human rights. The maintenance of international peace and security for all peoples and individuals was vital for social and economic progress and for the full realization of human rights, and the great resources which would be released by disarmament could contribute in a major way to the development of all States, especially developing countries.

The Seminar recommended that: human rights organs, particularly the Commission on Human Rights and its Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, should examine practical issues arising from the interrelationship between human rights, peace and development; the United Nations, when dealing with development, should give human rights aspects greater attention, and concerns for human rights should be reflected in the deliberations and in the principles and programme of action of the 1982 special session of the General Assembly on disarmament (p. 27); and the enlightenment of public opinion by information dissemination through the mass media and educational institutions was vital for the promotion and realization of human rights, peace and development.

The Secretary-General, by a note of 25 September,<sup>(1)</sup> informed the General Assembly that the Seminar had recommended that its report be submitted to the 1981 Assembly session and to several United Nations human rights bodies.

ACTION BY THE SUB-COMMISSION ON DISCRIMINATION AND MINORITIES. On 10 September 1981,<sup>(10)</sup> the Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities decided to include in the provisional agenda of its 1982 session a new item entitled "The effects of gross violations of human rights on international peace and security".

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. In the preamble of its resolution of 14 December 1981 on measures for the advancement of human rights,<sup>(8)</sup> the General Assembly took note with appreciation of the Seminar's report.

The Assembly, in a resolution of 9 December on strengthening international security, stated that respect for and promotion of human rights and fundamental freedoms in their civil, political, economic, social and cultural aspects contributed to the strengthening of international peace and security.<sup>(6)</sup>

In its Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention and Interference in the Internal Affairs of States,<sup>(7)</sup> adopted on the same day, the Assembly declared it to be the duty of a State to refrain from exploitation and distortion of human rights issues as a means of interference in the internal affairs of States, of exerting pressure on other States or creating distrust and disorder within and among States or groups of States. It also declared that States had the right and duty to observe, promote and defend all human rights and fundamental freedoms within their territories and to work for the elimination of massive and flagrant violations of the rights of nations and peoples, in particular apartheid and racial discrimination.

Explaining its position on the Declaration, the United States objected to the provision on exploitation and distortion of human rights issues, stating that its confusing and imprecise language could be interpreted as discouraging progress towards internationally recognized standards. Finland said it would have voted against the paragraph, and Greece said it could not subscribe to provisions which appeared to limit human rights. Ireland thought some provisions were inconsistent with the Assembly's 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights.<sup>(4)</sup>

In the Third Committee debate on human rights, several States commented on the results of the Seminar on human rights, peace and development. One important result, said Australia, was the conclusion that it was possible to examine critically the meaning of international human rights standards without detracting from their universality; to acknowledge that there were universal standards did not mean that those standards should be systematically implemented in the same way and always judged by the same criteria. Bulgaria and the Byelorussian SSR believed that respect for human rights was feasible only in conditions of peace, international security and understanding. The German Democratic Republic suggested that United Nations bodies, particularly the Commission on Human Rights, give maximum priority to an analysis of the disastrous consequences of the arms race for the implementation of human rights. Lesotho endorsed the Seminar's conclusion that human rights, peace and development were interdependent.

The Netherlands said it did not accept the notion that respect for human rights was dependent on the achievement of development; there were rights that could never be derogated from, even in situations of underdevelopment. In New Zealand's opinion, the proposal by the Seminar to place on the Assembly's agenda a new item concerning the world human rights situation deserved careful study.

Seminar on the relations that exist between human rights, peace and development

At its 18th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council, noting resolution 36(XXXVII) of 11 March 1981 of the Commission on Human Rights, endorsed the request of the Commission to the Secretary-General to hold at United Nations Headquarters, within the framework of the advisory service programme, the seminar on the relations that exist between human rights, peace and development to be held in August 1981, as decided by the General Assembly in its resolution 35/174 of 15 December 1980, and to give priority in the programme of the seminar to the items mentioned in the annex to resolution 36(XXXVII) of the Commission on Human Rights.

Duty of the individual to the community

STUDY BY THE SPECIAL RAPPORTEUR. At the 1981 session of the Commission on Human Rights, a Special Rapporteur of the Sub-

Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, Erica-Irene A. Daes (Greece), introduced her study on the individual's duties to the community and limitations on human rights and freedoms. <sup>(1)</sup> The study had been requested by the Sub-Commission in 1974.<sup>(6)</sup>

The general purposes of the study, the Special Rapporteur stated, were to contribute to the freedom of the individual under law, to provide guidelines and supply Governments with United Nations standards, to examine and define the duties and responsibilities of the individual to the community, and to indicate the basic judicial and other procedures and remedies against unlawful or arbitrary restrictions on individual rights and freedoms.

The report contained several recommendations. In connection with the duties of the individual to the community, it suggested that the General Assembly recommend to Member States that human rights teaching and education be developed at all levels in school and out-of-school education, and that such teaching should also concern human rights in armed conflicts. It also recommended that the Sub-Commission prepare a draft declaration on the principles governing the responsibilities of the individual in connection with the promotion and observance of human rights, to be submitted to the Commission on Human Rights in 1983.

With regard to limitations on the exercise of certain human rights and freedoms, the Special Rapporteur presented a number of conclusions interpreting the grounds for imposing limitations or restrictions, and recommended that the Sub-Commission elaborate principles and guidelines for United Nations standards. She also recommended the elaboration of standards for the protection of human rights in time of public emergency.

ACTION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL. On 10 March 1981,<sup>(4)</sup> the Commission on Human Rights recommended to the Economic and Social Council that the study on the individual's duties to the community and limitations of rights be printed and given the widest possible distribution. The Commission endorsed the Special Rapporteur's recommendation on teaching and education on human rights, and decided to consider in 1982 the question of setting further standards in the field. The Commission adopted this resolution by 28 votes to 4, with 5 abstentions.

Taking up another recommendation of the Special Rapporteur in her report, the Commission, also on 10 March,<sup>(3)</sup> recommended to the Council that it authorize the Sub-Commission to appoint Mrs. Daes as Special Rapporteur for a study on the status of the individual and contemporary international law, taking into account doctrines and practices in various legal systems. The Commission requested the Special Rapporteur to submit a preliminary report to the Sub-Commission in 1982 and a final report the following year. The resolution was adopted by 26 votes to none, with 9 abstentions.

The Council took the requested action on 8 May 1981.<sup>(5)</sup> The decision, based on drafts by the Commission, was taken without vote, following similar approval by the Second Committee on 5 May.

The Special Rapporteur informed the Sub-Commission in September of the approach she intended to follow for preparation of the new study.<sup>(2)</sup>

The individual's duties to the community and the limitations on human rights and freedoms under article 29 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights:

a contribution to the freedom of the individual under law
At its 18th plenary meeting, on 8 May 1981, the Council:

(a) Took note of resolution 18(XXXVII) of 10 March 1981 of the Commission on Human Rights and decided to authorize the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities to appoint Mrs. Erica-Irene A. (b) Took note of resolution 19(XXXVII) of 10 March 1981 of the commission on Human Rights, and decided that the study prepared by Mrs. Erica-Irene A. Daes, entitled "Study on the individual's duties to the community and the limitations on human rights and freedoms under article 29 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: a contribution to the freedom of the individual under law", should be printed and given the widest possible distribution, including distribution in Arabic.

Human rights and science and technology

ACTION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS. By a resolution of 12 March 1981,<sup>(3)</sup>

the Commission on Human Rights stressed the importance of implementing the General Assembly's 1975 Declaration on the Use of Scientific and Technological Progress in the Interests of Peace and for the Benefit of Mankind.<sup>(4)</sup> It instructed the Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities to study the use of the results of scientific and technological progress for the realization of the rights to work and to development, and decided to examine the study in 1983.

The resolution was adopted by 28 votes to 1, with 13 abstentions.

CONSIDERATION BY THE SUB-COMMISSION ON DISCRIMINATION AND MINORITIES. This topic was considered in September 1981 by the Sub-Commission on discrimination and minorities, which reviewed an ongoing study of guidelines for the protection of persons detained on grounds of mental illness (p. 906) and heard a statement outlining the content of a continuing study on guidelines for computerized personal files, particularly as they affected the privacy of the individual.<sup>(2)</sup>

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution of 25 November,<sup>(6)</sup> the General Assembly stressed the importance of implementing the Declaration on scientific and technological progress. It called on States to use the achievements of science and technology in order to promote peaceful social, economic and cultural development; requested United Nations agencies and organizations to take account of the provisions of the Declaration in their programmes and activities; and invited them as well as Member States to submit information on its implementation. The Assembly requested the Commission on Human Rights to give special attention to implementation of the Declaration.

The Assembly took note of a September 1981 report by the Secretary-General,<sup>(1)</sup> which it had requested in December 1980,<sup>(5)</sup> containing information submitted by 13 Governments on implementation of the Declaration.

The resolution was adopted, by a recorded vote of 119 to none, with 24 abstentions, on the recommendation of the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, where, on 3 November, the 25-nation draft was approved by 116 votes to none, with 25 abstentions.

The approved text incorporated oral revisions by the sponsors. The main change, taking account of a suggestion by Somalia affecting paragraph 2, had the Assembly call on States to use scientific and technological achievements to "promote peaceful social, economic and cultural development and progress", rather than to "ensure the right to work and right to development".

In another resolution adopted in connection with this topic, the Assembly requested the Commission on Human Rights to continue consideration of the protection of persons detained on grounds of mental ill-health.<sup>(7)</sup>

Introducing the resolution on human rights and science and technology, the Byelorussian SSR held it essential to prevent the results of scientific and technological progress from being used to the detriment of human rights.

Explaining the abstentions of the European Community (EC) members in the vote, the United Kingdom said that, as in their view the 1975 Declaration did not sufficiently guarantee individual human rights, they had reservations about the validity of the request that the Commission on Human Rights give special attention to its implementation.

Speaking during the Committee debate, Argentina hoped the communications media would promote the ideas contained in the Declaration. Colombia stated that countries with scientific and technological know-how should not be preoccupied with opportunism and a concern for short-term commercial gain; developing countries must have access to all scientific knowledge, not only to the portion others judged good for them. Cuba said the Committee should condemn the misuse of science and technology of the kind that had been directed against Cuba by the United States.

Liberia believed that deterioration of the environment and violations of such individual rights as the right to life and the right to a good standard of living were the most serious issues which would arise in connection with scientific and technological progress during the next decade. Malawi considered the question of human rights and scientific and technological developments to be of immediate importance for national development. Mali thought the question should be studied in the light of the ethics of each people. Morocco suggested that, following completion of the studies already requested from the Secretary-General, the Assembly might recommend exhaustive studies on the topic and consider drafting specific instruments to protect the individual, as well as to protect peoples against the threat of weapons of mass destruction. Zimbabwe stated that technological advances must be used to better the lives of peoples, not push them to the brink of extinction; the major arms-producing countries must be persuaded that their efforts should be directed to development.

The Byelorussian SSR, Hungary, the Lao People's Democratic Republic and others expressed the conviction that the strengthening of peace and international security and the curbing of the arms race were among the essential prerequisites for the application of the results of scientific and technological progress to development. The German Democratic Republic called for a closer examination of the impact of scientific and technical development, which in capitalist countries had led to intensified exploitation and growing unemployment, on the right to work and the conditions of work. Romania stressed the need for scientists throughout the world to wage an unremitting struggle to ensure that the fruits of their labour contributed to building a better and more just world and not to war and discord. The Ukrainian SSR stated that it used science and technology only in the interest of society and to encourage democracy, not as a means of interfering in the private lives of citizens. The USSR described steps it was taking to ensure that science and technology were placed at the service of all members of Soviet society.

Stating that inadequate scientific and technological development limited the effective enjoyment of human rights, France said it had reservations on a number of past United Nations resolutions because they had not taken full account of two aspects: the need to define uses contrary to human rights and to determine what measures were conducive to accelerating scientific and technological progress in all countries. The United Kingdom, speaking for the EC members, said the benefits from science and technology could not be dissociated from the abuses to which they gave rise, nor could their prospect of a world free from hunger and want be dissociated from the threat they posed to human rights; Governments had the obligation to protect their people from the abuses, whether they were modern weapons threatening human survival or the misuse of psychiatry by authorities to imprison in mental hospitals sane individuals who disagreed with the established regime.

The General Assembly,

Noting that scientific and technological progress is one of the important factors in the development of human society,

Reaffirming that scientific and technological progress is a necessary prerequisite for accelerating social and economic development in all countries.

Noting once again the great importance of the Declaration on the Use of Scientific and Technological Progress in the Interests of Peace and for the Benefit of Mankind, adopted by the General Assembly in its resolution 3384(XXX) of 10 November 1975,

Considering that implementation of the said Declaration will contribute to the strengthening of international peace and the security of peoples, and to their economic and social development as well as to international co-operation in the field of human rights.

Seriously concerned that the results of scientific and technological progress could be used for the arms race to the detriment of international peace and security and social progress, human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the dignity of the human person,

Convinced that, in the era of modern scientific and technological progress, the resources of mankind and the activities of scientists should be used for the peaceful economic, social and cultural development of all countries and for raising the living standards of peoples,

Recognizing that the establishment of the new international economic order calls in particular for an important contribution to be made by science and technology to economic and social progress,

Bearing in mind that the exchange and transfer of scientific and technological knowledge is one of the basic ways to accelerate the social and economic development of the developing countries,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on human rights and scientific and technological developments,

1. Stresses the importance of the implementation by all States of the provisions and principles contained in the Declaration on the Use of Scientific and Technological Progress in the Interests of Peace and for the Benefit of Mankind in order to promote human rights and fundamental freedoms under conditions of scientific and technological progress;

2. Calls upon all States to make every effort to use the achievements of science and technology in order to promote peaceful social, economic and cultural development and progress;

3. Requests the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system to take into account in their programmes and activities the provisions of the Declaration;

4. Invites those Member States, specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system that have not yet done so to submit their information in accordance with General Assembly resolution 35/130 A of 11 December 1980;

5. Requests the Commission on Human Rights to give special attention, in its consideration of the item entitled "Human rights and scientific and technological developments", to the question of the implementation of the provisions of the Declaration;

6. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-seventh session the item entitled "Human rights and scientific and technological developments".

Publication

On 25 November 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the General Assembly requested the Secretary-General to instruct the United Nations Department of Public Information to prepare in United Nations working languages a booklet outlining the main points of studies he had prepared on human rights and scientific and technological developments.

Human rights and scientific and technological developments

At its 73rd plenary meeting, on 25 November 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, decided to request the Secretary-General to instruct the Department of Public Information to prepare, using the available resources, in the various working languages of the United Nations so as to give it the widest possible publicity, a booklet outlining the main points of the studies on human rights and scientific and technological developments which had been prepared by the Secretary-General in pursuance of Assembly resolution 2450(XXIII) of 19 December 1968 and other relevant resolutions of the Assembly and had been submitted to the Assembly and the Commission on Human Rights.

Chapter XIX

Women

Efforts for the advancement of women were highlighted in 1981 by the entry into force in September of the 1979 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, a fact welcomed with great satisfaction by the General Assembly.<sup>(17)</sup> At year's end, the Convention had been signed by 87 States, and ratified or acceded to by 32 States.

Also in 1981, the Assembly requested the Secretary-General to prepare a multisectoral and interdisciplinary survey on women's role in development.<sup>(5)</sup> It considered but deferred action on a draft Declaration on the Participation of Women in the Struggle for the Strengthening of International Peace and for the Solution of Other Vital National and International Problems (p. 990).

In connection with the United Nations Decade for Women (1976-1985), the Economic and Social Council<sup>(2)</sup> stressed the need for urgent implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Half of the Decade, and the Assembly<sup>(6)</sup> called on Governments to continue taking measures aimed at ensuring women's equal participation in the development process (p. 985). At the same time, the Assembly requested the Commission on the Status of Women to give priority consideration in 1982 to the question of preparations for the 1985 World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women, and to submit proposals to the Assembly (p. 985).

Among a series of guidelines given to competent bodies within the United Nations system, the Assembly defined the role of its Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee and the Commission on the Status of Women with regard to questions on women's role in development;<sup>(7)</sup> decided that the Voluntary Fund for the United Nations Decade for Women should continue its activities beyond the Decade (p. 982); and requested the Secretary-General to report in 1984 on the implications of relocating the Fund within the Secretariat's Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs, at Vienna, Austria.<sup>(9)</sup> The Economic and Social Council, for its part, wished that prompt and effective co-operation would be instituted between the Centre's Branch for the Advancement of Women, the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women

(INSTRAW), the Statistical Office and the Commission on the Status of Women;<sup>(1)</sup> and invited all United Nations organizations not to perpetuate the idea that women constituted a marginal category relating only to social welfare.<sup>(4)</sup>

The Assembly also pronounced on the question of equal rights to work, when it invited Governments in host countries to consider granting working permits for spouses accompanying members of diplomatic missions or consular posts and staff members of international organizations.<sup>(10)</sup>

Work of INSTRAW in 1981 focused on the development of organizational and administrative procedures (p. 996). The agreement between the United Nations and the Dominican Republic concerning establishment of INSTRAW at Santo Domingo was signed in March (p. 998), and Dunja Pastizzi-Ferencic of Yugoslavia assumed her duties as the Institute's Director in June (p. 997).

Sharing the hope expressed by the Council<sup>(3)</sup> that INSTRAW would start functioning shortly, the Assembly urged all Governments to consider making financial contributions or extending co-operation to it.<sup>(8)</sup>

All Assembly action was taken in December, while the Council adopted its resolutions relating to women in May.

Implementation of the Programme for 1981-1985

In 1981, both the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly dealt with implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Half of the United Nations Decade for Women, adopted by the 1980 World Conference of the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace.<sup>(5)</sup> The Council acted after consideration of proposals by the Secretary-General for Programme implementation. Information on Programme implementation was also contained in a report on preparations for the 1985 World Conference of the United Nations Decade for Women (p. 985), submitted by the Secretary-General to the Assembly in October."

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. The Economic and Social Council, by a resolution of 6 May adopted by a recorded vote of 47 to 1, with 5 abstentions,<sup>(3)</sup> reaffirmed the importance and need for urgent implementation of the Programme of Action. The Council recognized the role of resident co-ordinators in Programme implementation, reaffirmed the importance of strengthening the role of the regional commissions and invited relevant United Nations bodies to inform the Council of action taken to integrate their activities into the global effort to implement the Programme. In addition, the Council requested the Secretary-General to submit to the Assembly later in the year a report containing concrete proposals and specific measures to ensure its urgent and full implementation.

Venezuela introduced the text on behalf of the Group of 77 developing countries and orally revised it to indicate that the resident co-ordinators not only could help ensure but, indeed, should ensure co-ordination of activities. The Council's Second (Social) Committee approved the draft on 29 April by a recorded vote of 45 to 1, with 5 abstentions.

In a 13 April report to the Council on Programme implementation proposals,<sup>(2)</sup> the Secretary-General noted the suggestions made at the March meeting of the Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination, including the establishment of interorganizational working groups in the four regional commissions in developing regions. At the national level, designation of resident representatives of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) as co-ordinators and team-leaders was considered helpful in maintaining co-operation among all United Nations organizations.

In addition, the Secretary-General informed the Council of activities undertaken by the Branch for the Advancement of Women, of the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs (CSDHA), which served as the focal point of the Decade for Women, and noted that a programme of monitoring, review and research had been prepared to look into relationships between women's advancement and various determining factors.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. Welcoming the entry into force in 1981 of the Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (p. 994), the General Assembly affirmed on 14 December<sup>(4)</sup> that the implementation of the Programme of Action and recommendations made at the 1980 World Conference should result in the complete integration of women into the development process (p. 986) and in the effective realization of the objectives of the United Nations Decade for Women.

The Assembly called on Governments to continue taking measures aimed at full implementation of the Programme, and urged United Nations organizations to devote resources and attention to Programme implementation and the regional commissions to report to the Economic and Social Council in 1982 on the evolution of women in their development programmes. It requested the Council to consider Programme implementation and the Commission on the Status of Women to submit in 1982 proposals for the preparations for the 1985 World Conference (p. 985). It emphasized the role of CSDHA as the focal point in the United Nations system for Programme implementation; stressed the need for close and continued co-operation between the United Nations system and the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women (p. 996); and took note with satisfaction of the effective contribution by the Voluntary Fund for the United Nations Decade for Women (p. 983) to the Programme's implementation.

The resolution was adopted without vote, following its approval in the same manner by the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee on 24 November.

The text was introduced by Algeria on behalf of the Group of 77 and was subsequently orally revised to incorporate some amendments suggested by France, such as deleting a request that the regional commissions submit reports on the subject every two years.

In explanation of positions, continued reservations on the Programme of Action, particularly its paragraph 5 containing a reference to Zionism as a form of racism, were expressed by Australia, Austria, Japan, New Zealand, Norway (for the Nordic countries), Portugal, the United Kingdom (on behalf of the 10 States members of the European Community) and the United States. Spain also reiterated the reservations it had expressed at the 1980 Conference, and Canada hoped the adoption of the text would help overcome the divisiveness that had arisen at that Conference as a result of the introduction of extraneous elements. Israel dissociated itself from the consensus on this and other resolutions based on the Programme of Action, which contained a call for the elimination of Zionism.

Support for the Programme was expressed during the Committee debate by a number of countries, including Afghanistan, Cape Verde, the Congo, the German Democratic Republic, Japan, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Oman, Poland, Uganda, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR and Zimbabwe.

The German Democratic Republic said the Programme provided effective machinery to ensure women's equality in all spheres of life. The Byelorussian SSR stated that implementation of the Programme's objectives depended on the nature and extent of national efforts, while the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya called for Programme implementation by international organizations and specialized agencies. Egypt thought that the Secretariat should have taken further steps to draw attention to the need to implement the Programme.

The Netherlands said it was endeavouring to formulate a national action programme based on the Programme, and New Zealand explained that, although it could not formally vote in favour of the Programme of Action, it had taken specific steps to implement a national programme. The importance of national action within the framework of the Programme was reaffirmed by several other States, including Belgium, Bolivia, the USSR and Yugoslavia.

Speaking for the Nordic countries, Denmark stated that only very slow progress had been made during the first half of the Decade and that determined political efforts were necessary if the Programme was to be implemented satisfactorily. Portugal and the United Kingdom thought that, despite some unacceptable elements, the Programme contained realistic proposals.

Reservations to the Programme were made by Chile. The United States declared it would continue to participate in activities beneficial to women and in efforts to attain the objectives of the Decade; however, propaganda must be left behind and attention must be given to the real problems of women which were the need for better food, better health facilities and care, education, and less arduous work.

Several countries attached importance to the provisions of the Programme linking the struggle for international peace and security with the struggle for women's equality (p. 990), among them Bulgaria, Cuba, the German Democratic Republic, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Uganda and the USSR.

Recognizing the need for women's active participation in the achievement of a just and lasting peace and social progress, the establishment of the new international economic order, complete respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and the integration of women into the development process so that the equality of men and women may be affirmed and their situation improved,

6. #### United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 35/136 of 11 December 1980, in which it endorsed the Programme of Action for the Second Half of the United Nations Decade for Women, and decided to convene in 1985, at the conclusion of the Decade, a World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women,

Bearing in mind its resolutions 3201 (S-VI) and 3202 (S-VI) of 1 May 1974, containing the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order, 3281 (XXIX) of 12 December 1974, containing the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, and 3362 (S-VII) of 16 September 1975, on development and International economic co-operation,

Emphasizing the importance attached in the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade to the need to improve the status of women and ensure their full participation in the development process as agents and beneficiaries of development,

Taking note of chapter XXV, on the role of women in development, of the New Delhi Declaration, adopted by the conference of Ministers for Foreign Affairs of Non-Aligned Countries, held at New Delhi from 9 to 13 February 1981,

Emphasizing that the recommendations made in the Programme of Action for the Second Half of the Decade and in other relevant decisions and resolutions adopted by the World Conference of the United Nations Decade for Women should immediately be translated into concrete action by States, the organizations of the United Nations system and inter-governmental and non-governmental organisations,

Welcoming the entry into force on 3 September 1981 of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women and the growing number of States that have ratified it,

Convinced that the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women must be given the assistance needed to enable it to begin to function as early as possible in the host country,

Noting that the review and appraisal of the progress made by Governments in implementing the Programme of Action will be carried out by the Commission on the Status of Women every two years, beginning with the Commission's twenty-ninth session,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the World Conference of the United Nations Decade for Women,

1. Affirms that the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Half of the United Nations Decade for Women and of the relevant recommendations, resolutions and decisions adopted by the World Conference of the United Nations Decade for Women should result in the complete integration of women into the development process and in the effective realization of the objectives of the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace;

2. Calls upon Governments to continue taking the measures necessary for achieving substantial progress in the implementation of the relevant recommendations of the Programme of Action with a view to ensuring equal participation by women as agents and beneficiaries in all sectors and at all levels of the development process;

3. Calls upon the organizations of the United Nations system, including the regional commissions, to reserve adequate resources for, and pay increased attention to, the implementation of the Programme of Action, particularly as regards the dissemination of information of the participation of women;

4. Urges the regional commissions to report in full to the Economic and Social Council, at its first regular session of 1982, on the evolution of the situation of women in all the sectors of their development programmes, in order to strengthen and reorient the programmes and reporting methods of those commissions, so as to reflect more adequately the regional concerns of women;

5. Requests the Economic and Social Council, at its first regular session of 1982, to consider the implementation of the Programme of Action, giving high priority in this regard to the report of the Commission on the Status of Women;

6. Emphasizes the role of the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat as the focal point for the organizations of the United Nations system with regard to the implementation of the Programme of Action, in order to achieve the goals and objectives of the Decade, and requests the Secretary-General to give the Centre the assistance required to enable it to carry out its mandate;

7. Requests the Commission on the Status of Women at its twenty-ninth session, to be held in February 1982, to give priority to the question of the preparations for the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women, to be held in 1985, which will mark the end of the Decade, with a view to submitting to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session, through the Economic and Social Council, specific proposals on that question;

8. Stresses the need for close and continued co-operation between the United Nations system and the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women and requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary measures to allow the Institute to carry out its mandate;

9. Takes note with satisfaction of the effective contribution made by the Voluntary Fund for the United Nations Decade for Women to the implementation of the Programme of Action;

10. Invites the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly, at its thirty-seventh session, a report on the steps taken to implement the present resolution;

11. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-seventh session the item entitled "United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace".

Voluntary Fund for the Decade

In 1981, $3.4 million in funding was approved for 68 new and five ongoing projects under the Voluntary Fund for the United Nations Decade for Women, of which 56 were at the country level and 17 at the regional and subregional levels. Of all country projects financed from the Fund, 59 per cent were located in least developed, land-locked and island developing countries:

Rural and poor urban women, many of them heads of families, continued to be the Fund's major beneficiaries and there was a noticeable increase in 1981 in projects dealing with women in urban slums who worked in large-scale industries. Intended to give women more equitable access to the resources and benefits of the development process, the Fund continued to assist innovative and experimental activities which could later be financed from other sources: energy projects originally sponsored by the Fund, for instance, attracted several million dollars from other funds in 1981.<sup>(4)</sup>

The $2.1 million pledged at the 1981 United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities (p. 426) was considered insufficient to meet the multiplying demands on the Fund. Lack of resources affected the Fund's operations at a time when women's critical role in the fight against poverty had begun to be recognized and the Fund's activities were demonstrating that women could contribute more productively to development and participate more equitably in its benefits.

Information on developments and activities of the Fund in 1981, an outline of its financial situation and needs, and a summary of the recommendations made by the Consultative Committee on the Fund at its ninth (16-20 March) and tenth (31 August-4 September) sessions in New York, were contained in a November report of the Secretary-General to the General Assembly.<sup>(2)</sup>

Concerning the Fund's future beyond the United Nations Decade for Women ending in 1985, the Consultative Committee noted that an overwhelming majority of responses from Member States and organs of the United Nations system were in favour of continuation, for reasons of the Fund's catalytic, innovative and co-ordinating roles as well as absence of other more immediate or permanent resources.<sup>(3)</sup> The Committee considered it desirable that an affirmative decision be taken following the 1985 World Conference (p. 985).

In its 14 December resolution on the United Nations Decade for Women,<sup>(5)</sup> the Assembly took note with satisfaction of the effective contribution made by the Fund to the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Half of the Decade. In a separate action, taken without vote on the same day,<sup>(6)</sup> the Assembly underlined the importance of the Fund's contributions towards realization of the goals of the Decade; decided that the Fund should continue its activities beyond the Decade; urged Member States to increase their contributions; and stressed the Fund's interrelationship with the Advancement of Women Branch of CSDHA (p. 985).

The draft was approved without vote in the Third Committee on 19 November, when it was introduced by the Netherlands, also on behalf of the Bahamas, Morocco, New Zealand, Oman, Samoa, Senegal and Somalia. It was presented as a compromise text incorporating the views contained in another draft which was co-sponsored, and later withdrawn, by India, Jamaica and Nigeria.<sup>(1)</sup> That draft, rather than noting the interrelationship, stressed the need for integration of the Fund's activities within CSDHA and emphasized the importance of those activities' responding to the priorities in the Programme of Action.

Introducing the revised draft, the Netherlands said that, while there were divergent views on the Fund's future, there was clear support for its activities.

Appreciation and support for the Fund's activities, in particular projects in rural areas and for the least developed, land-locked and island developing countries, was expressed during the Committee debate by a number of speakers, among them Australia, Austria, Belgium, Bhutan, Chile, Egypt, France, Japan, Malawi, Nepal, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Sri Lanka, Uganda, the United Kingdom, Venezuela, Yugoslavia and Zimbabwe. Morocco noted with satisfaction that the Fund had financed 220 projects with contributions from 70 Member States, and New Zealand said the Fund had done much to increase the direct participation of women in development projects (p. 985). Sri Lanka welcomed in particular the emphasis on support to employment-generating activity. Nepal said the Fund's resources should be more closely geared to the needs of the poorest women in low-income countries, while Italy felt that the Fund should be not only a source of direct support for innovative and experimental activities benefiting rural and poor urban women, but also a catalyst encouraging major agencies and funds to consider women's needs in their development assistance programmes. Algeria considered that the Fund should enable the implementation of projects normally not included in national programming. Japan urged that efforts be made to involve more countries in the Fund's Consultative Committee.

Extension of the Fund beyond the end of the Decade was favoured by the majority of speakers, among them Belgium, Egypt, Ethiopia, Guyana, India, Morocco, Nepal, Suriname and Zimbabwe. The United Kingdom, on the other hand, said it would welcome more time to consider the matter, and Australia felt that the Fund should be retained at the end of 1985 but as a special fund within UNDP. The Netherlands hoped that, by the end of the Decade, United Nations agencies would have integrated the Fund's activities in their regular programmes. Yugoslavia was convinced that CSDHA would succeed in finding the most propitious way of ensuring continuation of the Fund's activities.

Several countries, including Benin, Sierra Leone and Uganda, expressed concern at the shortage of the Fund's resources and appealed for generous contributions.

The following table shows the status, as at 31 December 1981, of contributions and pledges made to the Fund.

Voluntary Fund for the United Nations Decade for Women The General Assembly.

Recalling its resolution 3520(XXX) of 15 December 1975, by which it proclaimed the period from 1976 to 1985 United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace,

Recalling its decision of 15 December 1975 to extend the activities of the Voluntary Fund for the International Women's Year so as to cover the period of the Decade,

Recalling its resolution 31/133 of 16 December 1976, containing the criteria and arrangements for the management of the Fund,

Recalling its resolution 32/138 of 16 December 1977,

Recalling also its resolution 34/156 of 17 December 1979, in which it expressed the desire to see the activities developed by the Fund continued beyond the United Nations Decade for Women and decided to review at its thirty-sixth session the decision regarding the location of the Fund in New York,

Recalling further Economic and Social Council resolution 1980/3 of 16 April 1980,

Bearing in mind its resolution 35/136 of 11 December 1980, in which it endorsed the Programme of Action for the Second Half of the United Nations Decade for Women,

Conscious that the Fund is intended to supplement, through financial and technical support, the activities for implementing the goals for the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace,

Noting with appreciation the effective management and continuing expansion of the Fund's activities and the co-operation extended by the relevant organs of the United Nations, including the United Nations Development Programme, the United Nations Children's Fund and the regional commissions,

Reaffirming the role of the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat as the focal point for inter-agency co-operation towards the implementation of the Programme of Action,

Noting with appreciation the support given by the Fund to projects in the developing countries,

/Voting also with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General on the future of the Fund,

1. Notes with satisfaction the decisions of the Consultative Committee on the Voluntary Fund for the United Nations Decade for Women during its ninth and tenth sessions;

2. Expresses its appreciation for the voluntary contributions pledged by Member States and urges them to contribute or increase their contributions to the Fund;

3. Decides that the Fund should continue its activities beyond the United Nations Decade for Women;

4. Stresses the importance of the contributions of the Fund towards the realization of the goals and objectives of the United Nations Decade for Women;

5. Stresses also the interrelationship of the Voluntary Fund with the Advancement of Women Branch of the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs, of the Secretariat;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to invite the views of Member States on how best the Fund can continue its activities beyond the Decade and to submit a report thereon to the General Assembly at its thirty-ninth session;

7. Requests also the Secretary-General, taking into account the views expressed by Member States on this matter, to submit to the General Assembly at its thirty-ninth session a report on the substantive and financial implications of, and his proposals for the timing and modalities for, a relocation of the Fund within the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat in order to enable Member States to take a decision in the matter.

Location of the Fund

The Secretary-General noted in his November 1981 report<sup>(1)</sup> that the question of the Fund's location had elicited responses from 24 Member States, of which 12 considered that the Fund should remain in New York, 11 favoured its location at Vienna, Austria, and one wished to make no comment. He recalled that while the Fund's managing body, CSDHA, had moved to Vienna in 1979, the Fund itself remained administratively located in New York. In view of the fact that the Fund's activities were essential for achieving the goals of the Decade and integral to the continuing programme for the advancement of women, with which CSDHA was charged, the Secretary-General considered it logical and desirable that the Fund's operation be fully integrated within CSDHA at Vienna.

The General Assembly, in a resolution of 14 December,<sup>(2)</sup> requested the Secretary-General to submit in 1984 a report on the substantive and financial implications of, and his proposals for the timing and modalities for, a relocation of the Fund within CSDHA in order to enable Member States to decide on the matter.

During the debate in the Assembly's Third Committee, several countries, including Algeria, Argentina, Austria, Jamaica, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Suriname, spoke for relocation of the Fund to Vienna, while others, such as Australia, Guyana, Italy, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States, thought it should remain in New York.

Nigeria expressed regret that a final decision had not been reached and Pakistan urged a quick decision. Malawi, on the other hand, said the proposal to relocate the Fund must be carefully assessed with regard to the Fund's effectiveness, and Ethiopia felt that a change of location required stronger justification than had been presented. Sri Lanka considered it preferable to await the results of the deliberations of the Fund's Consultative Committee, rather than attempt to resolve the question in 1981. In Egypt's view, the decision should be based on practical considerations and should ensure that the Fund's activities were not adversely affected.

1985 World Conference

The World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women, to be convened in 1985 at the conclusion of the Decade, was to review achievements and consider a strategy for future United Nations activities. The decision to hold the Conference was taken by the General Assembly in December 1980.<sup>(2)</sup>

In an October 1981 report,<sup>(1)</sup> the Secretary-General indicated that the Secretariat was giving preliminary consideration to the Conference's preparation and a report would be submitted to the Commission on the Status of Women in 1982. Preliminary arrangements were also being made to ensure that the procedures for undertaking the 1982-1983 round of monitoring, review and appraisal of implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Half of the Decade (p. 979) and other international instruments for the advancement of women were adapted to the need to provide the Conference with up-to-date information.

In its 14 December resolution on the Decade,<sup>(3)</sup> the General Assembly requested the Commission on the Status of Women, at its February 1982 session, to give priority consideration to the question of preparations for the 1985 World Conference and to submit specific proposals to the Assembly at its 1982 session, through the Economic and Social Council.

Speaking during the Third Committee's debate on women, Argentina expressed the hope that, in preparing for the Conference, the Commission would take into account the need to strengthen those activities in which the least progress had been achieved. Nepal said preparatory measures should be intensified on all levels, and Yugoslavia held it necessary to make new efforts for co-ordination within the United Nations system in preparing for the Conference. Stating that the political elements introduced at the 1980 World Conference had prevented a consensus on the Programme of Action and relevant resolutions, Chile stressed the importance of careful preparations for the 1985 Conference.

Women and society

Women in development

Calls for greater recognition of women's right to participate in development, both as agents and as beneficiaries, were issued in many international forums during 1981.

Making that call to all United Nations organizations, the Economic and Social Council, in a 6 May resolution adopted without vote, also invited them not to perpetuate the widely accepted idea that women constituted a marginal category relating only to social welfare.<sup>(6)</sup> The text was approved likewise on 29 April by the Council's Second (Social) Committee, where it was introduced by France, also on behalf of Belgium and Poland, and was orally revised by the sponsors on the basis of consultations to replace "commonly" with "widely".

Information contributed by various United Nations organs and agencies was submitted by the Secretary-General in a 16 September note to the General Assembly,<sup>(1)</sup> concerning their assessment of women's involvement in financial and technical support activities and evaluation of the impact of those activities on women.

The Executive Director of the United Nations Children's Fund observed that low governmental priorities for women's concerns and the ad hoc nature of women's projects seemed to indicate that many policy-makers viewed programmes for women as a drain on the national budget rather than as productive investments or even as cost-effective welfare expenditures. Governments needed to be made aware of women's multiple roles as integral to the successful implementation of national policies and overall economic development.<sup>(4)</sup>

Echoing that sentiment, the High-level Committee on the Review of Technical Co-operation among Developing Countries, meeting in New York from 1 to 8 June, invited Governments and United Nations organizations to promote complete integration of women in the technical co-operation process.<sup>(10)</sup>

The Industrial Development Board of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) on 30 May<sup>(3)</sup> recognized that the integration of women should be seen as an intrinsic element in UNIDO activities; considered that the impact of UNIDO efforts to increase the participation of women in the development process must be greatest in the developing countries themselves; and requested the secretariat to focus on activities aimed at generating employment for women in their home countries.

The UNIDO Executive Director, in a report submitted through the Secretary-General to the General Assembly in September,<sup>(5)</sup> discussed relevant activities of the organization, including a Seminar on the Role of Women in the Development of Industrial Branches Traditionally Employing Female Labour, scheduled for October at Sofia, Bulgaria. However, due to increased financial and staff constraints, UNIDO indicated its inability to carry out proposed new activities for women, except those for which extrabudgetary resources might be made available. The Assembly took note of the report on 4 December without vote,<sup>(11)</sup> as did its Second (Economic and Financial) Committee on 20 November when it approved the text as orally proposed by its Chairman. By the same decision, the Assembly took note of the reports of the Secretary-General on the role of United Nations agencies and organizations in facilitating the integration of women in rural development (p. 987) and on the implementation of the resolution on women, science and technology, adopted by the 1979 United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development (p. 992).

By a note verbale of 9 September to the Secretary-General, Cuba transmitted the Final Document adopted at the meeting of High-level Experts of Non-Aligned and Other Developing Countries Concerned with the Role of 'Women in Development, held at Havana, Cuba, From 25 to 27 May.<sup>(2)</sup> It contained a programme of action aimed at contributing to women's total liberation from domination, subordination and socio-political inequality, enabling them to possess true human dignity and lead independent and creative lives.

The Assembly, in its 14 December resolution on the United Nations Decade for Women,<sup>(8)</sup> affirmed that the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Half of the Decade and of the relevant resolutions and decisions adopted by the 1980 World Conference should result in the complete integration of women into the development process, and called on Governments to continue taking measures to ensure women's equal participation as agents and beneficiaries in all sectors and at all levels of that process. The Assembly urged the regional commissions to report to the Economic and Social Council in 1982 on the evolution of women in their development programmes so that programmes and reporting methods could be adjusted to reflect more adequately women's regional concerns.

In related action, the Assembly requested the Secretary-General to prepare a multisectoral and interdisciplinary survey on women's role in development,<sup>(7)</sup> and further defined the role of its Third Committee and the Commission on the Status of Women in relation to questions on women's role in development.<sup>(9)</sup>

During discussions in the Assembly's Second and Third Committees, many speakers, including Bolivia, Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Chad, China, Denmark, Finland, France, the German Democratic Republic, Greece, Grenada, Guyana, Italy, Kenya, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malaysia, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, Yemen and Yugoslavia, underlined the importance of women's participation in the development process. Uganda said the integration of women in development had to be viewed in the light of the new international economic order, while Morocco held it premature to call on women to contribute to the establishment of such an order. Mexico considered the full implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Half of the Decade (p. 979) as a key element for the total integration of women in the development process.

France said that, while the international community should focus its efforts on poor countries, women's role in economic life should also be promoted in industrialized countries; it asserted that some of the United Nations measures to involve women in development had been left in abeyance because of the lack of resources and staff.

Italy believed that many United Nations organizations and programmes were increasingly committed to involving women in their financial and technical support activities. Denmark, speaking for the Nordic countries in the Third Committee, thought that only very slow progress had been made during the first half of the Decade and, in many cases, the situation of women had worsened; solutions to the social and economic problems affecting women must be integrated in the planning and implementation of regular programmes and activities, not only in those specifically designed for women. A similar opinion was expressed in the Second Committee by Finland, also on behalf of the Nordic States.

Women and development

The Economic and Social Council,

Having taken cognizance of the report of the Commission for Social Development on its twenty-seventh session, Recalling the contents of the report of the Ad Hoc Working Group on the Social Aspects of the Development Activities of the United Nations.

Conscious that women, like men, are an integral part of the population of the world,

Aware that women, like men, participate in the economic, social and cultural development of their country, although too frequently in a subordinate capacity.

1. Invites all the organizations of the United Nations system to refrain from perpetuating the widely accepted idea that women constitute a marginal category relating only to social welfare;

2. Calls upon all the organizations of the United Nations System to emphasize the right of women to participate, as agents and as beneficiaries, in all aspects of economic and social development.

General Assembly decision 36/422

Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/36/694/Add.11) without vote. 20 November (meeting 42): oral proposal by Chairman (paras. (a) -(c) as a whole); agenda item 69 (I).

Effective mobilization and Integration of women in development

At Its 84th plenary meeting, on 4 December 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, took note of the following documents:

(a) Note by the Secretary-General transmitting the report of the Executive Director of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization on the Integration of women in development:

(b) Report of the Secretary-General on the role of United Nations agencies and organizations in assisting Governments to facilitate the integration of women in rural development;

(c) Report of the Secretary-General on the Implementation of resolution 2, entitled "Women, science and technology", adopted by the United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development.

Rural areas

As requested by the General Assembly in a December 1980 resolution,<sup>(2)</sup> the Secretary-General reported in October 1981 on a wide range of activities undertaken by United Nations agencies and organizations to assist Governments in facilitating the integration of women in rural development,<sup>(1)</sup> including those relating to equality of legal status; access to rural services; women's organization and participation; educational and employment opportunities; problems resulting from migration from rural to urban areas; training; impact of agro-business on women's traditional work; and women's participation in the co-operative movement and access to land, credit and marketing facilities (p. 399).

Within the United Nations Secretariat, the integrated reporting system on the status of women, for instance, was anticipated to enable clearer identification of the special problems of women in rural development, and a study which was expected to be completed during the year included a comprehensive survey of rural women workers with 'special reference to labour legislation and maternity protection.

On 4 December, the Assembly took note of the Secretary-General's report.<sup>(3)</sup>

In the Third Committee debate on women, France said discrimination against women would not disappear until the poorest women and women in rural areas had access to the same general opportunities as other women.

Survey on women in development

In response to a General Assembly call of December 1980 for preparation of a comprehensive outline for an interdisciplinary and multisectoral world survey on women's role in overall development,<sup>(4)</sup> the Secretary-General proposed in an October 1981 report to the Assembly<sup>(2)</sup> that the survey be prepared by the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs as part of its regular work programme, and that the final draft be submitted by the end of 1983, with the anticipated publication date in mid-1984.

It was further proposed that the survey comprise two parts, the first focusing on women in rural/urban sectors and studying the implications of women's limited participation in production and politics, and the second being organized from the viewpoint of the individual life cycle, with particular attention to health, education and employment.

Acting without vote, the Assembly recommended on 4 December 1981<sup>(5)</sup> that the survey should analyse the role of women in relation to key developmental issues as envisaged in the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,<sup>(3)</sup> focusing in particular on trade, agriculture, industry, energy, money and finance, and science and technology. The Assembly recommended that the survey should include an assessment of benefits women derived from their participation in development, and should cover ways and means of improving women's role as agents and beneficiaries of development (p. 985) as well as the potential impact of such improvements on the achievement of overall development goals. Further, it invited the Secretary-General to give due attention to the achievement of goals of self-reliance and to economic and technical co-operation among developing countries; to prepare the survey with contributions from all United Nations organs and organizations, including the regional commissions and the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women; and to submit a progress report in 1982 and the survey in its final form in 1984.

The revised text was approved by the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee on 20 November, also without vote, after the USSR withdrew its proposal<sup>(1)</sup> for an additional preambular paragraph dealing with the provisions of the report of the 1980 World Conference of the United Nations Decade for Women and the 1979 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. As a result of consultations, the preamble of the final text included a general reference to relevant documents adopted at the World Conference.

In explanation of positions, Poland, speaking on behalf of the Eastern European States, asserted that the survey should aim at guaranteeing the equality of women and their participation in the struggle against all forms of racism and foreign domination (p. 990). While joining the consensus, the United States reiterated its objection to those provisions of the Programme of Action adopted at the World Conference which were not connected with the real problems of 'women. Israel joined the consensus on the understanding that the third preambular paragraph mentioning provisions of documents adopted at the Conference referred exclusively to the agreed measures concerning the integration of women in development; it remained opposed to certain ill-advised politicizing provisions of the Programme of Action.

Introducing the original draft on behalf of the 14 sponsors, Egypt said it was designed to put the survey on the right course; the outline as proposed by the Secretary-General was incoherent, particularly in the first part, and reflected the traditional and stereotypical approaches adopted in earlier surveys. Egypt in particular objected to the proposal for emphasizing the rural and urban sectors rather than the different sectors of the economy; the situation of women in the rural world had already been studied on many occasions and, with regard to part two of the outline, the survey should rather deal with economic aspects than be organized from the viewpoint of the individual life cycle of women. Also, the preparation of the survey should not be entrusted to one particular department but should be dealt with by all specialized agencies dealing with economic development.

Ecuador expressed regret that the multidisciplinary and multisectoral approach had been abandoned and emphasis had been placed on the social aspect which had already been considered at the World Conference. It was useless to duplicate such work or the work done by the Third Committee; what was needed was a survey reflecting the reality of the situation of women in various sectors of the economy.

Meanwhile in the Third Committee, Italy expressed agreement with the structure and content of the proposed outline of the survey, in particular with the necessity of identifying the causes of the ineffectiveness and distortion of the role of women in the development process, of studying the existing relationships between women as individuals and the social environment, and the salient issues of women at all ages. Morocco wondered to what extent it would be possible for the Commission on the Status of Women to participate in the preparation of the survey, and France thought the Commission should be consulted during its elaboration.

Australia hoped that the results of such meetings as the Expert Group Meeting on Women and the International Development Strategy, scheduled for December 1981, would be taken into account in the preparation of the survey.

Comprehensive outline of a world survey on the role of women in development

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 3201 (S-VI) and 3202(S-VI) of 1 May 1974, containing the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order, 3281 (XXIX) of 12 December 1974, containing the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, and 3362(S-VII) of 16 September 1975 on development and international economic co-operation,

Recalling also its resolution 35/56 of 5 December 1980, the annex to which contains the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Recalling further the provisions concerning the participation of women in development contained in the documents adopted at the World Conference of the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace,

Recalling its resolution 35/78 of 5 December 1980 on the effective mobilization and integration of women in development, in which it, inter alia, called for the preparation of a comprehensive and detailed outline for an interdisciplinary and multisectoral world survey on the role of women in overall development,

Bearing in mind the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, in particular the special provisions relating to the integration of women in overall development with a view to securing women's equal participation both as agents and as beneficiaries in all sectors and at all levels of the development process,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on a comprehensive outline of a world survey on the role of women in development,

1. Emphasizes the need for a multisectoral and interdisciplinary survey on the role of women in development;

2. Recommends that the survey should analyse the role of women in relation to key developmental issues as envisaged in the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, focusing in particular on trade, agriculture, industry, energy, money and finance, and science and technology;

3. Further recommends that, in its analysis, the survey should cover:

(a) The present role of women as active agents of development in each sector;

(b) An assessment of the benefits accruing to women as a result of their participation in development, namely, income, conditions of work, and decision-making;

(c) Ways and means of improving women's role as agents and beneficiaries of development at the national, regional and international levels;

(d) The potential impact of such improvements on the achievement of overall development goals;

4. Invites the Secretary-General, in preparing the survey, to give due attention to the problems and requirements of women in every region and to the contribution of women to the achievement of goals of self-reliance and to economic and technical co-operation among developing countries;

5. Calls upon the Secretary-General to include in the survey an overview analysing interrelationships among key developmental issues with regard to women's current and future roles in development with a view to providing a basis for future action for women's effective mobilization and integration in development;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare the survey in close collaboration and co-operation with the appropriate organizations of the United Nations system and with contributions from all organs and organizations concerned of the United Nations system, including the regional commissions and the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women, as well as national institutions having expertise on this subject;

7. further requests the Secretary-General to submit a progress report on the preparation of the survey to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session and to submit the survey in its final form to the Assembly at its thirty-ninth session.

Role of the Third Committee and the Commission on the Status of Women

On the recommendation of its Third Committee, the General Assembly, by a resolution adopted without vote on 14 December 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> recommended that documents on the integration of women in development be made available to the Third Committee and that the Assembly's General Committee be informed of this wish. The Assembly expressed the desire that the Third Committee be seized of the world survey on the role of women in development (p. 987) and requested that the Commission on the Status of Women be consulted in its preparation. In addition, the Assembly requested the Commission to give special attention at its 1982 session to questions on women's participation in development.

The Committee approved the text without vote on 19 November after agreeing to incorporate a number of oral amendments by Canada and Egypt. Canada's proposals dealt with the preambular paragraphs, making them more general in nature, while the Egyptian proposal specifically requested transmittal of documents to the Third Committee rather than allocating the item and relevant documents to both the Second and Third Committees. Further, on the basis of an Egyptian proposal, a new operative paragraph was inserted to define the role of the Third Committee in the world survey.

Introducing the text, also on behalf of Chad, Italy, the Ivory Coast, the Philippines and Romania, France considered it sometimes useful that questions involving a number of aspects be studied in different committees and that there should be communication and a transmittal of documents between them; such joint consideration was already practised in a number of national parliaments and the approach suggested in the draft would enable the Assembly to consider development as a whole rather than dividing it into compartments.

Speaking during the debate on women in the Third Committee, Jamaica expressed the view that the time had come for rationalizing the way the Assembly dealt with women's issues; currently, the Third and Second Committees each dealt with different aspects on the basis of different documents.

Consideration within the United Nations of questions concerning the role of women in development

The General Assembly.

Recalling the objectives of the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace,

Recalling further its resolution 35/78 of 5 December 1980 in which it emphasized the need to integrate the objectives of the United Nations Decade for Women into the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Having taken cognizance of the report prepared by the Ad Hoc Working Group on the Social Aspects of the Development Activities of the United Nations, established pursuant to Economic and Social Council resolution 1979/45 of 11 May 1979, and, in particular, of paragraphs 80 to 82 of the report,

Having also taken cognizance of the report of the Secretary-General, which contains a comprehensive outline of a world survey on the role of women in development,

1. Recommends, in the light of paragraphs 80 to 82 of the report of the Ad Hoc Working Group on the Social Aspects of the Development Activities of the United Nations, that documents concerning the Integration of women in development should be made available to the Third Committee under the relevant agenda item;

2. Expresses the desire that the recommendation in paragraph 1 above should be brought to the attention of the General Committee of the General Assembly;

3. Expresses also the desire that the Third Committee should be seized of the world survey on the role of women in development, whose comprehensive outline is contained in the report of the Secretary-General;

4. Requests the Commission on the Status of Women to give special attention at its twenty-ninth session, to be held in February 1982, to questions pertaining to the participation of women in development, under its agenda item 3 concerning the Implementation of the World Plan of Action for the Implementation of the Objectives of the International Women's Year;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the Commission on the Status of Women is consulted in the preparation of the world survey on the role of women in development requested by the General Assembly in paragraph 10 of its resolution 35/78 and, to the extent possible, regarding any survey or proposed action concerning women.

Women and peace

Draft Declaration

In 1981, the General Assembly again deferred action on a draft Declaration on women and peace, an idea which first emerged in 1977.<sup>(8)</sup> Expressing appreciation of the interest shown and the discussions held on the draft Declaration on the Participation of Women in the Struggle for the Strengthening of International Peace and for the Solution of Other Vital National and International Problems, and realizing that neither the debate nor the examination of proposals could be concluded in 1981 due to lack of time, the Assembly, in a 14 December decision adopted without vote,<sup>(10)</sup> requested the Secretary-General to present a report based on further comments from Member States, with a view to ensuring an early adoption of the draft Declaration at the Assembly's 1982 session.

The text, as orally proposed by Ethiopia on behalf of the sponsors of the draft Declaration, was approved without vote by the Third Committee on 3 December.

Explaining its position on the decision, the German Democratic Republic asserted that it did not feel proper procedure had been followed in dealing with the draft. The United Kingdom reiterated the view that the draft Declaration should be referred first to the Commission on the Status of Women.

For its consideration, the Assembly had before it a report plus addendum submitted by the Secretary-General,<sup>(7)</sup> containing the views of 25 Governments on the draft Declaration, as received until 3 November 1981 in response to its December 1980 call,<sup>(9)</sup> as well as two documents, transmitted by a note verbale of 20 October from Czechoslovakia<sup>(6)</sup> - an "Appeal to Women of the World", calling for a stop to the arms race, and a declaration entitled "Equality, National Independence, Peace" - both adopted by the World Congress of Women, held at Prague, Czechoslovakia, from 8 to 13 October, with participants from 132 countries and 234 national and 90 international organizations.

Introducing the 30-nation draft Declaration,<sup>(3)</sup> the German Democratic Republic stated that it aimed at creating, with women's participation, the conditions necessary for guaranteeing such social rights as the maintenance of peace and the elimination of colonialism, racism and apartheid. The draft was originally entitled "Draft Declaration on the Participation of Women in the Struggle for the Strengthening of International Peace and Security and Against Colonialism, Apartheid All Forms of Racial Discrimination, Foreign Aggression, Occupation and All Forms of Foreign Domination".

The text, consisting of a preamble and three operative parts, incorporated several written and oral amendments by a number of countries, including an oral proposal by Singapore to insert the words "intervention and" in the phrase "foreign aggression" throughout the text. Amendments by Australia and New Zealand dealt mainly with the incorporation of phrases on the elimination of sexism and discrimination against women,<sup>(4)</sup> and Morocco's amendments concerned insertion or rewording of phrases, including a reference to respect for national sovereignty.<sup>(5)</sup> By making a series of oral amendments, including insertion of reference to foreign intervention and domination as well as new forms of colonialism, Pakistan withdrew the amendments it had originally submitted in writing.<sup>(1)</sup>

The sponsors, however, categorically rejected a series of amendments proposed by the United States,<sup>(2)</sup> calling them a manoeuvre to create confusion, delay adoption of the text and divert it from its main purpose. The United States remarked that its amendments were intended to highlight the draft's inadequacies, incompleteness and selective approach to women's rights. The proposed amendments suggested insertion, throughout the text, of denunciation of, among others, threats or use of force, arbitrary arrest and detention, totalitarianism, chemical and biological warfare, systematic denial of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and suppression of peaceful political dissent.

In the preamble of the text as presented and revised by the sponsors, the Assembly would have expressed serious concern at the continuing arms race and colonial racist oppression, emphasized the need for a just restructuring of international economic relations and welcomed women's contribution to the strengthening of international peace and security. Member States would have been invited to put into action the principles contained in the operative part of the Declaration.

Article 1 on women's rights would have recommended encouragement of equal participation of women in the political and economic affairs of society, including, as suggested by Australia and New Zealand,<sup>(4)</sup> the decision-making processes.

By article 2, States would have been encouraged to create the necessary prerequisites for women's participation in the struggle for disarmament, through freedom of speech and assembly, as proposed by Australia and New Zealand; the resources released as a result of disarmament were to be used for economic and social development in the developing countries, with special attention to the advancement of women and to the protection of mother and child.

Under article 3, all obstacles to achieving world-wide peace and the happiness and welfare of women were to be eliminated. Among the list of obstacles, proposals by Australia and New Zealand for inclusion of reference to sex discrimination and human rights violations were accepted, whereas those for the suppression of peaceful political dissent were not.

Article 4 would have had all forms of oppression and inhuman treatment of women considered contrary to the Charter of the United Nations and recognized as a matter of concern to the international community, as suggested by Australia and New Zealand, rather than as crimes against humanity and gross violations of human rights as originally phrased. Comprehensive solidarity and assistance would be rendered to those women who were victims of foreign aggression and racism and who were compelled to live under most adverse conditions.

By article 5, the full sovereign right of every State to establish an economic, social and political order of its own choice free from foreign intervention was to be ensured with a view to safeguarding international peace and creating the socio-economic conditions for women's development.

In part II of the draft Declaration, the Assembly would have called on all States to ensure implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Half of the United Nations Decade for Women (p. 979) and adopt programmes for the achievement of the goals of the Declaration, including exchange of experience, ensuring women freedom of thought and expression, and provision of effective legal remedies against violation of their fundamental rights. While a number of amendments, or their essence, by Australia, Morocco and New Zealand were incorporated in part II, a proposal by Australia and New Zealand, for insertion of a paragraph calling for States' dedication to the elimination of all exploitative and dependent relations, including those between women and men, was not accepted by the draft's sponsors.

Under part III, the Assembly and other United Nations bodies would have been called on to review regularly the progress made in promoting the equality of women in respect of their participation in the struggle for peace and for the solution of other vital national and international problems.

In the Third Committee debate, while a number of States, including Afghanistan, Cuba, Democratic Yemen, Ethiopia, the Gambia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia, Sierra Leone, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR and Viet Nam, urged adoption of the draft Declaration without delay, the wisdom of the negotiating and drafting procedures used as well as the contents of the text were questioned by many others.

Portugal and the United States asserted that the draft was based on closed bilateral negotiations rather than on multilateral consultations and debate as befitting an international instrument. Belgium, the United Kingdom and the United States questioned the validity of unilateral and selective acceptance or rejection of amendments, as practised by the sponsors, as if the draft were a resolution rather than a declaration.

Observing that no competent body had discussed or endorsed the draft Declaration before its submission to the Third Committee, Australia, Belgium, Pakistan, the United Kingdom (speaking for the member countries of the European Community (EC)) and the United States asserted that the draft should be referred to the Commission on the Status of Women, while Ghana suggested that the Assembly should establish a small joint committee consisting of representatives of the Third Committee and the Sixth (Legal) Committee. Several other countries, including Canada, Ireland, Japan, New Zealand, Portugal, Singapore and Spain, also deemed it advisable not to act with haste on the text before detailed consideration took place in a suitable forum. Belgium, Denmark, Ghana, the Netherlands and Pakistan also urged postponement of action on the draft.

Doubts were expressed by Belgium, Canada, Ghana, Japan, the Netherlands, Spain and the United Kingdom about the ideological aspects of the text, its validity as well as its relevance to the question of women. Still others, such as Australia, Morocco, New Zealand, Pakistan and the United States, spoke of omissions and a selective approach to the real problems facing women.

Belgium and the United Kingdom, the latter for the EC members, considered that the text, rather than referring to women's rights, contained didactic and paternalistic expressions and highly debatable assertions; they expressed concern that the draft might perpetuate sex discrimination by implying that women could not claim rights which were not specifically acknowledged as theirs. As political considerations and goals applied equally to both sexes, Ireland proposed replacing the word "women" with more general terms such as "individuals and peoples" in a number of articles.

The need for a declaration in general was questioned by several speakers, such as Canada, Italy, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United States. In addition, noting the absence of declarations granting particular rights to particular social groups, the United Kingdom feared the possible consequences of creating a precedent by adopting the draft.

Most Eastern European countries, as well as Cuba, Sierra Leone and Viet Nam, regarded the Declaration as a substantive contribution towards achieving the goals of the Decade for women. Support for the draft was also expressed by others, among them Benin, the Congo and Suriname.

Draft Declaration on the Participation of Women in the Struggle for the Strengthening of International Peace and for the Solution of Other Vital National and International Problems

At its 97th plenary meeting, on 14 December 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, appreciating the interest shown in the draft Declaration on the Participation of Women in the Struggle for the Strengthening of International Peace and for the Solution of Other Vital National and International Problems by a large number of Member States and the extensive discussions held on the subject in the Third Committee during the thirty-fifth and thirty-sixth sessions of the Assembly and realizing that, in view of lack of time, the Committee had been unable to conclude these discussions and examine fully all the proposals before it, decided to request the Secretary-General to seek further comments from Member States and to submit a report based on their comments as well as on the proposals submitted so far, with a view to ensuring the early adoption of the draft Declaration during the thirty-seventh session of the Assembly.

Women and science and technology

As requested by the General Assembly in 1979,<sup>(3)</sup> the Secretary-General reported in October 1981<sup>(1)</sup> on the implementation of the resolution adopted by the 1979 United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development<sup>(6)</sup> by which States were invited to facilitate women's participation in the decision-making process related to science and technology and their equal access to training and careers in the field.

Among relevant United Nations activities, the Secretary-General indicated in his report-which was taken note of by the Assembly on 4 December<sup>(5)</sup> that data were collected through the integrated reporting system on women, established in 1979,<sup>(2)</sup> and that a newly established data bank on the advancement of women possessed information classified by geographical, functional and organizational categories.

In a resolution of 5 June 1981 on its work programme (p. 752), the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development invited its Advisory Committee to give due regard in its deliberations to the effective implementation of the 1979 Conference resolution on women and science and technology.<sup>(4)</sup>

Social indicators on women

Recognizing the importance of a systematic analysis of the global situation of women, the Economic and Social Council, by a resolution adopted without vote on 6 May 1981, expressed the wish that prompt and effective co-operation be instituted between the Advancement of Women Branch of the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs, the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women (INSTRAW) (p. 996), the Statistical Office and the Commission on the Status of Women, particularly during the second half of the United Nations Decade for Women.<sup>(1)</sup>

Introducing the draft in the Council's Second (Social) Committee, France said social indicators should be developed for measuring the progress made in promoting the advancement of women. Prior to the Committee action on the text, France orally revised the fourth preambular paragraph by adding a phrase specifying that the work of standardizing terms of reference and harmonizing data collection should be submitted to the Commission on the Status of Women. It also orally revised the operative paragraph to include the Commission in the co-operation originally called for between the Advancement of Women Branch and INSTRAW. On 29 April, the Committee approved without vote the text as orally revised.

In addition, prior to the Council's adoption of the resolution, France orally amended the fourth preambular and the operative paragraphs to include mention of the Statistical Office.

Social Indicators applicable to studies on women

The Economic and Social Council,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General containing proposals for the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Half of the United Nations Decade for Women,

Recalling resolution 38 of 30 July 1980 of the World Conference of the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace,

Recognizing the importance of a systematic analysis of the situation of women in the world,

Noting that the work of standardizing terms of reference and harmonizing the collection of data, in the organizations of the United Nations system, should be undertaken promptly by the Advancement of Women Branch of the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs. In co-operation with the Statistical Office, and submitted to the Commission on the Status of Women at its twenty-ninth session,

Noting further that the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women, the establishment of which has extended the scope of research on the status of women, can provide valuable assistance to the aforementioned Branch, in particular in the preparation of sets of social indicators,

Expresses the wish that prompt and effective co-operation may be instituted between the Advancement of Women Branch, the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women, the Statistical Office and the Commission on the Status of Women, whose role must continue to be fundamental, particularly during the second half of the United Nations Decade for Women.

Employment of spouses of diplomats and international civil servants

Recalling its previous recommendations on the need to create conditions conducive to the enjoyment of equal rights to work, the General Assembly on 14 December 1981 invited Governments in host countries to consider granting, when appropriate and to the extent possible, working permits for spouses accompanying members of diplomatic missions or consular posts and staff members of international organizations.<sup>(1)</sup> In the preamble, the Assembly also expressed concern over the continued under-representation of women in the professional staffs of international organizations and occasional discrimination against them at the time of recruitment.

The Assembly adopted the resolution without vote, following the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee's approval of the text on 27 November in like manner. The fourth preambular paragraph, as orally amended by Morocco to add the reference to discrimination in recruitment, was approved in Committee by a vote of 46 to none, with 60 abstentions. After introducing the draft, Sweden had proposed to delete that paragraph altogether; it also orally introduced some changes of wording in the other preambular paragraphs and revised the operative paragraph, which in the original would have had the Assembly invite Governments to consider favourably working permit applications.

In explanation of positions, Brazil, Chile, Ethiopia and Turkey understood that the granting of working permits would be in conformity with the national legislation of the host State. Belgium would have preferred consideration of the matter in a more appropriate body than the Third Committee, and said granting permits to one particular group might give rise to discrimination between foreigners on the labour market as well as legal problems. Canada joined the consensus on the understanding that the measures referred to would be based on reciprocity. Morocco continued to have reservations on the text as it considered that the operative part should have invited Governments to ensure more effective and greater participation of women in the political decision-making process; also, a paragraph should have been added inviting the Secretary-General and agency heads to recruit women.

Introducing the 23-nation text, Sweden observed that the 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations<sup>(2)</sup> and the 1963 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations<sup>(3)</sup> had not excluded the possibility that family members of diplomats might work in the receiving State. Asserting that the question should be solved bilaterally, the USSR considered that the text conflicted with existing regulations under international law, and Pakistan feared it would create difficulties for developing countries. Cyprus and Ethiopia also shared Pakistan's view, and Nigeria questioned the competence of the Third Committee to deal with the serious legal implications of the text.

Equal rights to work

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 34/155 of 17 December 1979, in which it called upon Governments to take steps to ensure the effective participation of women in the decision-making process with respect to foreign policy and international economic and political co-operation, including steps to ensure that they have equal access to diplomatic functions and that they are represented in the United Nations and other international organizations,

Recalling also its resolutions 33/184 of 29 January 1979 and 34/159 of 17 December 1979, in which it recommended that States should envisage in their policies all appropriate measures to create necessary conditions which will enable women to participate in work on an equal footing with men,

Noting that in some countries legal and administrative regulations hamper the possibilities of accompanying spouses of members of diplomatic missions or consular posts and of staff members of intergovernmental organizations to work,

Concerned that women continue to be under-represented in the professional staffs of international organizations, including the United Nations and the specialized agencies, and are not always exempt from discrimination when they are recruited,

Invites Governments in host countries to consider granting, when appropriate and to the extent possible, working permits for spouses accompanying members of diplomatic missions or consular posts and staff members of intergovernmental organizations.

Convention on discrimination against women

The 1979 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women<sup>(2)</sup> entered into force on 3 September 1981, on the thirtieth day after the date of deposit with the Secretary-General of the twentieth instrument of ratification or accession, as stipulated under article 27. The Convention also called for the election, six months after its entry into force, of 18 members of a Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women; however, if at that time 35 instruments of ratification or accession had been deposited, the Committee would comprise 23 members. The reservations made by States at the time of ratification were annexed to the Secretary-General's report on the status of the Convention.<sup>(1)</sup>

By a resolution of 14 December,<sup>(3)</sup> the General Assembly welcomed with great satisfaction the entry into force of the Convention, invited States that had not done so to become parties to it and requested the Secretary-General to report in 1982 on its status.

The resolution was adopted without vote, following its similar approval by the Third Committee on 23 November. Introducing the 24-nation text, Sweden said the Convention was a major step towards achievement of equal rights for women, and the draft reflected the satisfaction with the instrument.

Explaining its position, Colombia welcomed the fact that the draft had been adopted by consensus. Despite joining in the consensus, Morocco expressed reservations, as did Iraq.

During the debate, the Convention's entry into force was welcomed by a number of speakers, among them Argentina, Chile, the Congo, Cuba, Egypt, Ethiopia, Hungary, Italy, Nepal, Nigeria, Portugal and Zaire. Support for the Convention was also expressed by others, such as Cape Verde, Grenada, Jamaica, Japan, Sri Lanka, the Sudan and Yugoslavia.

Several countries, including the Comoros, the Congo and India, urged adherence by more Member States. Hungary and Japan trusted that the Convention would soon be a truly universal instrument.

Many speakers, among them Australia and Papua New Guinea, regarded the Convention as a serious instrument with practical implications. New Zealand and Suriname thought it was a solid basis for enhancement of the participation of women in many aspects of life, while Bolivia, the Byelorussian SSR, the Syrian Arab Republic, the USSR and others considered it an important achievement of the United Nations Decade for Women. The German Democratic Republic said the Convention benefited women in all countries, especially those where women's participation in political, economic, social and cultural affairs had not been comprehensively guaranteed. Bulgaria and Denmark, the latter speaking for the Nordic countries, regarded the Convention as a major step towards achieving equal rights for women, and France believed that it brought discrimination against women to the attention of decision-makers and the public at large.

Declaring its support of the goals and objectives of the Convention, Pakistan stated that some provisions must be considered in accordance with its religious belief and its legislation based on the Islamic Sharia. Belgium said it planned to introduce a number of modifications in its domestic legislation with a view to ratifying the Convention without, or with a minimum of, reservations. Yugoslavia stated that ratification would not necessitate adjustments or additions to its national legislation which, in some areas, went even further.

As at 31 December, the following 87 States had signed the Convention (including 6 during 1981, indicated in italics):

Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Barbados, Belgium, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Brazil, Bulgaria, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Denmark, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Mexico, Mongolia, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Rwanda, Senegal, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Kingdom, United Republic of Tanzania, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia.

At year's end, the Convention had been ratified or acceded to by the following 32 States (including 21 during 1981, indicated in italics):

Barbados, Bhutan, Byelorussian SSR, Canada, Cape Verde, China, Cuba, Dominica, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, German Democratic Republic, Guyana, Haiti, Hungary, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mexico, Mongolia, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Rwanda, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Uruguay.

Status of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women

The General Assembly,

Considering that one of the purposes of the United Nations, as stated in Articles 1 and 55 of the Charter, is to promote universal respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms without distinction of any kind, including any distinction as to sex,

Affirming that women and men should, on the basis of equality, participate and contribute to the social, economic and political processes of development and should share equally in improved conditions of life,

Recalling Its resolution 34/180 of 18 December 1979, by which it adopted the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women,

Recalling also its resolution 35/140 of 11 December 1980, Having taken note of the report of the Secretary-General on the status of the Convention,

1. Notes with appreciation that a significant number of Member States have already ratified or acceded to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women;

2. Welcomes with great satisfaction the fact that, as a result, the Convention entered into force on 3 September 1981;

3. Notes further that an important number of Member States have signed the Convention;

4. Invites all States that have not yet done so to become parties to the Convention by ratifying or acceding to it;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session a report on the status of the Convention.

Institute for the advancement of women

Activities of the Institute

During 1981, work of the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women (INSTRAW), which it had been decided to establish in 1976,<sup>(4)</sup> focused on the development of organizational and administrative procedures aimed at ensuring its readiness to engage in substantive programmes at the earliest possible time. The agreement between the United Nations and the Dominican Republic concerning the arrangements for the establishment of INSTRAW headquarters at Santo Domingo was signed in New York on 31 March 1981 and was later proved by that country's National Congress (p. 998). The Institute's Director assumed her duties in June (p. 997) and participated in a United Nations technical mission to the Dominican Republic in July for consultations.<sup>(2)</sup>

The Institute's expenditure for 1981 was estimated at $127,656, making a total of $344,817 for the 1980-1981 biennium. On the basis of tentative estimates as at the end of 1981, the unencumbered balance of the United Nations Trust Fund for INSTRAW amounted to $2,474,510, of which $507,846 represented unpaid pledges. In addition, $337,742 was pledged by Member States at the 1981 United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities, held at United Nations Headquarters in November (p. 997)<sup>(3)</sup>

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. By a resolution of 6 May, the Economic and Social Council expressed the hope that INSTRAW would start functioning shortly and requested the Secretary-General to submit to the Council at its first regular session of 1982 a report on the organization, programme and activities of the Institute.<sup>(5)</sup>

The resolution was adopted without vote, following its similar approval on 29 April by the Council's Second (Social) Committee, where it was introduced by Venezuela on behalf of the Group of 77 and orally revised to satisfy the concern originally expressed by France in its withdrawn draft<sup>(1)</sup> with regard to the interruption of the Institute's work for the preceding six months.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. Underlining the importance of the Institute's contributions to the advancement of women, the General Assembly, by a resolution of 14 December,<sup>(6)</sup> stressed the urgency of assuring its prompt establishment in the host country, reiterated the guidelines agreed on by the Economic and Social Council in 1976 regarding INSTRAW activities,<sup>(4)</sup> and requested United Nations organs and bodies to co-operate fully with the Institute. At the same time, Governments were urged to consider making financial contributions or extending co-operation (p. 997).

The Assembly adopted the text without vote, after similar approval by the Third Committee on 19 November. Introducing the 28-nation draft, Argentina said the sponsors wished to make clear the current state of progress in establishing INSTRAW, which had encountered some difficulties and for which funds, appeared to be insufficient. The text was orally revised by the sponsors to add a reference to the importance of INSTRAW contributions to the work of all United Nations bodies concerned with women's advancement.

During the Committee debate on women, a number of States, including Cuba, Democratic Kampuchea, Ethiopia, Nigeria and Pakistan, welcomed the establishment of INSTRAW. Several countries, among them Algeria, Australia and Japan, expressed hope that it would soon be in full operation. Chile, Democratic Kampuchea and others thought it could make a valuable contribution to the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Half of the United Nations Decade for Women (p. 979). Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Egypt, Pakistan and Yugoslavia were of the opinion that INSTRAW could play a useful part in promoting the participation of women in development. Malawi expected it to offer opportunities for practical and action-oriented research, and Jamaica wanted it to investigate women's integration into the major United Nations development programmes. Argentina and Chile called for the co-operation of INSTRAW with United Nations organizations and regional centres.

International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 31/135 of 16 December 1976, in which it approved the establishment of the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women,

Further recalling Economic and Social resolution 1981/13 of 6 May 1981, in which the Council, inter alia, took note of the progress made towards the full establishment of the Institute,

Convinced that the Institute can, with adequate resources, make a valuable contribution to the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Half of the United Nations Decade for Women, as well as to realizing the objectives of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

1. Insists on the urgency of assuring the prompt establishment of the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women in the host country;

2. Reiterates the guidelines set out in Economic and Social Council resolution 1998(LX) of 12 May 1976 regarding the activities of the Institute, in particular the need for close collaboration with the regional centres and institutes which have similar objectives;

3. Underlines the importance of the contributions of the Institute to the work of all United Nations bodies, agencies and institutions involved with the advancement of women, in particular the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat;

4. Urges all Governments to consider contributing financially to the United Nations Trust Fund for the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women or co-operating in other ways with the Institute in order to assure its regular and effective financing so that it can plan the expansion of its programmes;

5. Requests the regional commission, the specialized agencies and other organs and bodies in the United Nations system to co-operate fully with the Institute in their respective fields of competence.

Appointment of the Director

Following consultations with Member States and taking into account the views of the Institute's Board of Trustees on suitable candidates, the Secretary-General approved the appointment of Dunja Pastizzi-Ferencic of Yugoslavia as Director of INSTRAW.<sup>(1)</sup> The Economic and Social Council welcomed the appointment in its resolution on INSTRAW of 6 May 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> and the Director took up her duties in June.

Board of Trustees

The Board of Trustees of INSTRAW did not meet in 1981 despite its original intention to do so in January or February. No firm date had been set for the 1981 meeting in view of the impending appointment of the Director (see above). Consultations on the date and venue of the Board's session were to be conducted between its President and the Director upon the latter's appointment, and the postponement of the session was expected to enable the Director to prepare, among other things, a proposed revised work programme for INSTRAW covering the balance of the 1980-1981 biennium (p. 996).<sup>(1)</sup>

The Economic and Social Council, in its 6 May resolution on INSTRAW,<sup>(2)</sup> expressed the hope that the Board of Trustees would meet during the first quarter of 1982.

Contributions to the Institute

For 1981, a total of $334,913 was pledged by 14 Member States to the United Nations Trust Fund for INSTRAW, of which $205,074 had been collected from 10 States by 31 December; at that date, pledges for 1982 amounted to $350,879 (see table on next page). As estimated by the Secretary-General,<sup>(*)</sup> the unencumbered balance of the Trust Fund stood at $2,474,510, including unpaid pledges totalling $507,846.

A call for contributions to the Trust Fund, both financially and in kind, was made by the Economic and Social Council on 6 May <sup>(2)</sup> and repeated on 14 December by the General Assembly,<sup>(3)</sup> which hoped that INSTRAW would thus be assured of regular and effective financing so that it could plan the expansion of its programmes.

Location of the Institute

Consultations initiated in 1979<sup>(4)</sup> with the Dominican Republic led to the signing in New York on 31 March 1981 of the agreement between the United Nations and the host country concerning arrangements for the establishment of INSTRAW headquarters at Santo Domingo.

The Economic and Social Council, in its 6 May resolution on INSTRAW,<sup>(3)</sup> expressed satisfaction at the conclusion of the agreement. A draft by France, later withdrawn, would have had the Council also express gratitude to the host Government.<sup>(1)</sup>

In July, a United Nations technical mission, with the participation of the Institute's Director, visited the host country for consultations on matters relating to implementation of the agreement. By a note verbale of 3 November, the Dominican Republic informed the Secretary-General that its National Congress had on 18 August approved the agreement and its annex<sup>(*)</sup>.

Chapter XX

Children, youth and aging persons

Throughout 1981, the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) co-operated in programmes in 111 countries with a total child population (aged 0-15) of 1.3 billion, providing support in basic maternal and child health care, water supply, child nutrition, social services and education (p. 999).

The lead agency responsibilities of UNICEF in the Kampuchean relief operations were terminated on 31 December, ending the most critical phase of a massive international effort that had provided some $634 million in food, medical and other relief assistance to Kampucheans since October 1979.

The UNICEF Executive Board met in New York three times in 1981: from 11 to 22 May for its regular session;<sup>(3)</sup> for a special session on 22 and 23 January, on emergency relief assistance;<sup>(1)</sup> and for another special session from 22 to 24 October, to consider financial questions.<sup>(2)</sup> In the course of the year, the Board approved a total of $97.5 million in emergency relief, to assist 14 African countries, for the period 1981-1983 (p. 1001). It also accepted an offer by Denmark of new rent-free facilities for an integrated supply centre at Copenhagen, which set into motion a plan for the reorganization of the Fund's Supply Division for optimum efficiency and cost-effectiveness (p. 1011).

New funding arrangements went into effect in 1981, involving sponsorship of UNICEF-assisted projects by such inter-State institutions as the newly established Arab Gulf Programme for United Nations Development Organizations (p. 1009), and institutional loans to Governments for activities implemented by UNICEF.

The General Assembly, in December, reaffirmed the Fund's role as the lead agency in the United Nations system for co-ordinating the follow-up activities of the International Year of the Child (1979), invited Governments to pay their contributions early and appealed for an increase in contributions, if possible on a multiyear basis.<sup>(15)</sup> A similar appeal was made by the Economic and Social Council in July.<sup>(8)</sup>

The Assembly, also in December, decided to take up in 1982 the question of the draft Declaration on Social and Legal Principles relating to the Protection and Welfare of Children, with Special Reference to Foster Placement and Adoption Nationally and Internationally.<sup>(14)</sup> The Council had requested in May that the question be considered at the 1981 Assembly session.<sup>(5)</sup>

In November, the Assembly endorsed the Specific Programme of Measures and Activities for the International Youth Year (1985): Participation, Development, Peace;<sup>(12)</sup> and adopted additional guidelines for the improvement of the channels of communication between the United Nations and youth and youth organizations.<sup>(10)</sup>

The Council, in May, requested the Secretary-General to continue analysing the views and suggestions of the United Nations system on the question of youth<sup>(7)</sup> and to submit his report on youth to the Assembly at its 1981 session.<sup>(4)</sup> The Assembly, by another November resolution, invited Member States to develop sports activities and physical education within the context of continuing education, and recommended the promotion of indigenous forms of sport as well as a reduction of cost and infrastructure requirements so as to make them accessible to all.<sup>(9)</sup>

Accepting the offer of Austria to host the World Assembly on Aging, the General Assembly decided, also in November, that it be held at Vienna from 26 July to 6 August 1982, and called for generous voluntary contributions to the Fund for the World Assembly.<sup>(13)</sup> In May, the Economic and Social Council called on Member States, the United Nations system and non-governmental organizations to participate fully in the World Assembly and in its preparatory work.<sup>(6)</sup>

By another November resolution, the Assembly recommended that Governments continue to give attention to the question of aging in the formulation of national development policies and programmes, and invited Member States to consider designating a "Day for the Aging".<sup>(11)</sup>

GA: <sup>(9)</sup>36/16 (p. 1019), <sup>(10)</sup>36/17 (p. 1017), <sup>(11)</sup>36/20 (p. 1023), 9 Nov.; <sup>(12)</sup>36/28 (p. 1021), <sup>(13)</sup>36/30 (p. 1026), 13 Nov.; <sup>(14)</sup>36/167, 16 Dec. (p. 1013); <sup>(15)</sup>36/197, 17 Dec. (p. 1000).

Children

United Nations Children's Fund

In 1981, the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) was co-operating in programmes in 111 countries with a total child population, aged between 0 and 15, of approximately 1.3 billion. Support was given to basic maternal and child health services in 103 countries, and to water supply, child nutrition, social services and education in 80 to 90 countries. The average expenditure per child was 23 cents, compared to 26 cents in 1980.

Excluding emergency relief, the percentage breakdowns of expenditure by main category of programme were: 27 for basic child health, 25 for water supply and sanitation, 13 for formal education, 12 for general services, 10 for social welfare services for children, 8 for child nutrition, 4 for non-formal education and 1 for family planning.<sup>(2)</sup>

At its regular session in New York, from 11 to 22 May 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the UNICEF Executive Board approved programme commitments for multiyear implementation, totalling $351 million for services benefiting children in over 50 countries. Seven eighths of this total, or $307 million, was given firm approval. The remainder ($44 million) was given contingent approval to the extent that contributions received during the year exceeded $264 million. However, the 1981 income did not reach the level to put the contingent approval into effect.

Programme policy decisions

UNICEF EXECUTIVE BOARD CONSIDERATION. At its regular session (New York, 11-22 May 1981)<sup>(3)</sup> and at its special session (New York, 22-24 October),<sup>(2)</sup> the UNICEF Executive Board recognized the challenge to the ongoing work of the Fund by the deteriorating global circumstances on the one hand, and by the mandates of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade<sup>(5)</sup> for accelerated progress towards social, child-oriented goals on the other. There was general agreement that the primary focus of UNICEF was programme delivery and that it should continue to emphasize its field-oriented operational character and the basic services strategy.

The Board recognized the need for continuing growth of programmes, reaffirmed and further clarified its policy on UNICEF involvement in emergency relief, and decided to review its policy concerning co-ordination of humanitarian relief activities in the United Nations system.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. Reaffirming the principles and guidelines for the programme activities of UNICEF, particularly its field- and action-oriented approach, the Economic and Social Council, by a resolution adopted without vote on 22 July,<sup>(4)</sup> took note of the Board's decisions and conclusions, and appealed to Governments to increase their contributions to the Fund. The text, introduced by Norway on behalf of 11 countries, was approved without vote on 17 July by the Council's Third (Programme and Co-ordination) Committee.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 17 December,(@) the General Assembly commended UNICEF for its policies and activities, reaffirmed the Fund's role as the United Nations lead agency for co-ordinating the follow-up activities of the International Year of the Child (1979), and urged organizations within and outside the United Nations system to enhance their co-operation with UNICEF for maximizing the effectiveness of services for the benefit of children and mothers in developing countries. The Assembly also commended the Fund's efforts to enlarge its income so as to respond better to the needs of developing countries, invited those Governments that made pledges to make early payment of their contributions and appealed to all Governments to increase their contributions, if possible on a multiyear basis (p. 1008).

The resolution, adopted without vote, was approved by the Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee in like manner on 20 November. It was submitted by a Committee Vice-Chairman on the basis of informal consultations and contained minor stylistic changes to the original submitted by 19 nations.<sup>(1)</sup>

Explaining its position in the Committee, the United Republic of Cameroon expressed regret over the discrepancy between the volume of resources provided for in resolutions and those actually received by UNICEF; it was unpardonable that the arms race claimed enormous sums, while millions of children in the developing countries died for lack of essential services.

During the debate, a number of speakers, including Czechoslovakia, Ethiopia, Mauritania, the Sudan and Yugoslavia, expressed their appreciation of UNICEF assistance to developing countries. Several States, among them Canada, Italy and Yugoslavia, stressed that UNICEF assistance should remain field-oriented. In Indonesia's opinion, the Fund should give more determined support to assisting developing countries to achieve the minimum goals identified in the International Development Strategy, which included the reduction of infant mortality and mass illiteracy and the provision of primary health care. The USSR said UNICEF should pay special attention to assisting children in the countries struggling against colonialism.

United Nations Children's Fund

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 35/79 of 5 December 1980 and Council resolution 1980/62 of 25 July 1980,

Having considered the decisions and conclusions of the Executive Board of the United Nations Children's Fund adopted at its session held in New York from 11 to 22 May 1981,

Reaffirming the principles and guidelines for the programme activities of the Fund, in particular its field-oriented and action-oriented approach, as laid down by the Executive Board,

Fully aware of the important responsibilities entrusted to the Fund in helping Governments to implement the goals and objectives of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Noting with appreciation the full and careful consideration given to those matters by the Executive Board,

1. Takes note of the decisions and conclusions of the Executive Board of the United Nations Children's Fund, as adopted at its session held in May 1981;

2. Appeals to all Governments, especially those that are not contributing at a level commensurate with their capacity, to increase their voluntary contributions to the Fund, if possible on a multiyear basis.

General Assembly resolution 36/197

Adopted without vote Meeting 103 17 December 1981

Approved by Second Committee (A/36/812) without vote, 20 November (meeting 421); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/36/L.92), based on informal consultations on 19-nation draft (A/C.2/36/L.71); agenda item 70 (h).

United Nations Children's Fund

The General Assembly,

Taking note of Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/56 of 22 July 1981,

Having considered the report of the Executive Board of the United Nations Children's Fund on its session held at United Nations Headquarters from 11 to 22 May 1981.

Reaffirming the principles and guidelines for the programme activities of the United Nations Children's Fund laid down by the Executive Board, in particular the field-oriented and action-oriented approach of the Fund and the maintenance of a low ratio of administration to programme costs,

Acutely aware that the present global economic situation adversely affects the ability of developing countries to implement plans for the extension of basic services to children and mothers, which requires the most effective use of available resources to advance the well-being of children,

Concerned that the situation regarding the income of organizations of the United Nations system depending on voluntary contributions, including the United Nations Children's Fund, has recently been adversely affected by a number of unfavourable factors,

Bearing in mind that the programmes of co-operation of the United Nations Children's Fund are contributing to the realization of the relevant goals and objectives of the international Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

1. Commends the policies and activities of the United Nations Children's Fund;

2. Endorses Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/56;

3. Reaffirms the role of the United Nations Children's Fund as the lead agency in the United Nations system responsible for co-ordinating the follow-up activities of the International Year of the Child related to the goals and objectives concerning children set forth in the international Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade;

4. Commends the Executive Director and the secretariat of the United Nations Children's Fund for their efforts to enlarge the income of the Fund so that it may respond more effectively to the needs of developing countries in support of their programmes to enlarge basic services for the benefit of children and mothers;

5. Urges all organizations concerned in supporting the activities of the United Nations Children's Fund, including the national committees for the Fund and the co-operating non-governmental organizations, as well as other organizations of the United Nations system, to enlarge and enhance their co-operation with the Fund in order to maximize the effectiveness of such co-operation in the interests of children and mothers in developing countries;

6. Expresses its appreciation to Governments that have responded to the needs of the United Nations Children's Fund and expresses the hope that more Member States will follow their example;

7. Invites all Governments that make pledges of voluntary contributions to make payment thereof as early as possible so that the United Nations Children's Fund may proceed with the implementation of its programmes without undue delay while maintaining an adequate level of operating capital;

8. Appeals to all Governments to increase their contributions, if possible on a multiyear basis, so that the United Nations Children's Fund may, in the present global economic situation, be able to augment its co-operation with developing countries and respond to the urgent needs of the children in those countries.

Medium-term plan for 1980-1984

The medium-term plan for 1980-1984, submitted to the UNICEF Executive Board in April 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> defined as the two main goals of UNICEF work the reduction of infant and child mortality and the improvement of child development through promotion of primary health care, clean water, sanitation, nutrition, education and improved status of women in society. While programme trends were similar to those of the previous year, more emphasis was placed on child nutrition, community involvement in water and sanitation programmes, services benefiting children through women's activities, and services for the prevention and rehabilitation of childhood disability.

The UNICEF Committee on Administration and Finance, at its special session in New York on 22 and 23 October 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> considered the financial plan for 1980-1984, as well as budget estimates for 1982-1983 (p. 1007), and agreed to a series of proposals made by the Executive Director on income projections (p. 1006) and staffing and management (p. 1010). Recognizing that the low-income projections accepted in the revised financial plan would result in a smaller-than-planned increase over 1981 levels in the real value of programme co-operation, the Committee decided that reductions from planned growth levels should be made so as to minimize disruptions and protect the effectiveness of UNICEF programmes.

UNICEF programmes by region

In 1981, UNICEF programme expenditure was broadly maintained in all geographical regions, with slight growth in Africa and the Americas. Most of the nominal reductions in expenditure in East Asia and Pakistan resulted from the drop in expenditure for Kampuchean relief. The tables on the following pages show expenditure and commitments for 1981, and commitments and "notings" (awaiting funding) approved by the Executive Board in 1981 for regional and interregional projects. Data on commitments and programme expenditure were contained in the reports of the Board on its special session in January<sup>(1)</sup> and its regular session in May,<sup>(2)</sup> and in a report of the Executive Director highlighting 1981 activities.<sup>(3)</sup>

Africa

In 1981, UNICEF assistance in Africa dealt with basic education, social statistics, monitoring and evaluation, family welfare and the young child, appropriate technology and transport management. Between March and September, UNICEF implemented an emergency feeding programme for 250,000 people in the famine-stricken Karamoja region of Uganda, and followed it up with a supplementary feeding and nutritional surveillance project to monitor recurring problems. It also implemented in Somalia an emergency project funded by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (p. 1046). Measures were taken to improve the regional office's capacity to respond promptly to emergencies.

Emergency relief activities. At its special session in January 1981, the UNICEF Executive Board<sup>(2)</sup> approved, on the request of the Executive Director,<sup>(1)</sup> commitments of $10.7 million from general resources to increase immediate assistance to Angola, the Central African Republic, Chad, Djibouti, Ethiopia, Somalia, the Sudan, Uganda and Zimbabwe, where drought, internal strife and the influx of refugees had produced special situations requiring urgent attention. New "notings" for specific-purpose contributions totalling $19.8 million were also approved for three of these countries.

Receiving a report from the Executive Director that the problems those countries faced continued to grow more severe,<sup>(5)</sup> the Board approved, at its regular session in May, additional assistance totalling $27.2 million for the nine countries as well as for Mali, Mauritania, Senegal, the Upper Volta and Zaïre.<sup>(3)</sup> "Noted" projects amounting to $17 million were also approved for eight of the countries. In all, $97.5 million in emergency commitments and "notings" was approved in 1981 for the period 1981-1983.

Linked to long-term development objectives whenever possible, assistance was provided

Asia and the Pacific

In 1981, UNICEF committed substantial resources in South Central Asia to promote consistent delivery of basic services to women and children in deprived areas, paying special attention to encourage popular participation in project design, implementation and evaluation. In addition to identifying constraints to the implementation of UNICEF-assisted primary health care services, the Fund explored ways of improving supplementary feeding programmes and collaborated with the World Health Organization in preparing a public information campaign for effective infant-feeding practices. A quarter of UNICEF expenditures in the region was devoted to water supply programmes.

In East Asia, progress was made in integrated country-level planning and technical co-operation among developing countries. Country programmes reflected increased attention to young child development, local-level planning and the needs of the urban poor, who comprised 25 to 50 per cent of the region's swelling urban population.

At the May session of the UNICEF Executive Board, views were expressed that the Fund's lead agency role in the United Nations programme of humanitarian assistance for Kampuchians (p. 494) should end on 31 December. Following consultations with Governments, its lead agency responsibilities were terminated on that date, ending the most critical phase of a massive international effort that had provided some $634 million in food, medical and other relief assistance since October 1979.

Eastern Mediterranean

New funding arrangements for the Eastern Mediterranean region went into effect in 1981, involving sponsorship of UNICEF-assisted projects by inter-State institutions, such as the Arab Gulf Programme for United Nations Development Organizations, and institutional loans to Governments for activities implemented by UNICEF, such as the $25-million loan by the Arab Fund for Economic and Social Development to seven countries for UNICEF projects in the development of drinking water policies. In 1981, the Fund of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries contributed $3 million for UNICEF programmes.

During the year, UNICEF completed 47 out of 205 reconstruction projects in southern Lebanon, for which $47 million had been allocated by Arab Governments for joint activities of the Fund and Lebanon's Council for Reconstruction and Development for the repair and re-equipment of schools and hospitals and the provision of emergency water services (p. 528).

Regional trends showed an increase in assistance for water projects and reduced expenditures for nutrition and social services, resulting in part from the integration of these sectors into other programmes.

New UNICEF offices were opened in Bahrain, Democratic Yemen, Oman and Yemen.

Latin America and the Caribbean

In accordance with the Regional Programme of Action adopted by the Economic Commission for Latin America in 1981 (p. 661), UNICEF in 1981 encouraged national efforts to combine specific solutions to community problems with comprehensive solutions benefiting larger groups.

A preliminary examination of primary health care services in the Americas pointed to the need for improved co-ordination between Governments and organizations such as UNICEF and the World Health Organization. For the consideration of the Executive Board, a regional programme was prepared on technical and para-professional training in the provision of clean water and basic sanitation. In addition, UNICEF promoted breast-feeding, continued its efforts to develop simplified technologies for food production, encouraged school involvement in community development and supported experiments in pre-school education.

Interregional programmes

In 1981, the UNICEF Executive Board approved $7.8 million for the Interregional Fund for Programme Preparation for 1982-1983, and $7 million for additional support to selected countries in primary health care, water and sanitation, and maternal and child nutrition.

The Interregional Fund supported preparatory work leading to policy and programme formulation, assessment of activities and information exchange between countries and regions.

UNICEF programmes by sector

As in the previous three years, the Fund's largest share of expenditures in 1981 was devoted to child health (see below), with water supply and sanitation a close second. Other major programmes dealt with nutrition (p. 1005), social welfare services and education (p. 1006).

Support for basic services—basic maternal and child health, water supply and sanitation, and support for education—were found in virtually every country programme. Of UNICEF country programmes, 80 per cent included applied nutrition and non-formal education. <sup>(1)</sup>

Health services

In 1981, UNICEF expenditures on health programmes in 107 countries were more than $47 million. Including related co-operation in the fields of water supply, sanitation and child nutrition, expenditures exceeded $100 million. <sup>(2)</sup>

At its regular session in May, the UNICEF Executive Board <sup>(1)</sup> welcomed the co-operative efforts of the Fund and the World Health Organization (WHO) in comprehensive national approaches to primary health care (PHC), and approved the strengthening of support for PHC components, such as the expanded programme of immunization (p. 1005), diarrhoeal diseases control (see below) and the supply of essential drugs (p. 804). The Board also noted the discussions of the UNICEF/WHO Joint Committee on Health Policy on programmes concerned with immunization, leprosy and schistosomiasis (p. 1005), childhood disability (see below) and other health questions.

Diarrhoeal diseases. The Executive Board noted in May 1981 <sup>(1)</sup> that under the global programme for diarrhoeal diseases control, initiated in 1978, 70 countries were planning national programmes as part of PHC. In addition to the provision of oral rehydration salts, emphasis was placed on the importance of preventive measures such as safe water and a clean environment.

At the invitation of WHO, UNICEF became a sponsor of the global programme. The new arrangement would supplement the Fund's co-operation with countries in providing oral rehydration salts and improving capacity for their production.

Disability prevention. World-wide, it was estimated that one child in every 10 was born with or acquired an impairment, and that four out of five of those impaired children were in developing countries, often beyond the reach of even the most basic rehabilitation services.

In addition to its traditional assistance to disabled children—general child health and nutrition programmes, immunization and blindness prevention—UNICEF continued in 1981 to explore a new approach which recognized that the disruption of the normal process of child development could produce a more serious handicap than the impairment itself. The Fund therefore supported the incorporation of early detection as well as rehabilitation measures into existing community-based health, child welfare and education services.

Throughout the year, UNICEF maintained close contact with the secretariat of the International Year of Disabled Persons (1981) (IYDP) (p. 795) and made its staff available to assist IYDP national committees, develop the IYDP Trust Fund (p. 796) and analyse projects to be financed by the Fund. It also produced information material for the Year and co-sponsored the IYDP coin programme.

Other UNICEF-supported activities in 1981 included surveys on the prevalence of childhood disabilities, preparation of a field manual for communities, and the design of less costly rehabilitation devices adapted to local needs. UNICEF began a three-year programme, agreed upon in November 1980 with Rehabilitation International, to assist projects for the prevention of childhood impairment and disabilities and the expansion of services for disabled children.

Immunization. The expanded programme on immunization, first endorsed by the World Health Assembly in 1974,<sup>(1)</sup> had grown by 1981 to include over 100 developing countries, and an estimated $15 million was contributed to the programme annually by UNICEF, the United Nations Development Programme, the World Health Organization (WHO) and bilateral agencies. In addition to providing vaccines, the programme contributed to the development of management training and the improvement of equipment and methodologies.

Leprosy. While the number of estimated leprosy cases remained stationary at about 11 million world-wide, significant reductions were reported in 1981 in several countries of Africa and Asia where leprosy control programmes had been implemented with the support of UNICEF and WHO. The latest estimated number of patients registered for treatment was 3.6 million.

Infection with leprosy was acquired in childhood, and a wide network of health units was needed because of the chronic nature and diffuse distribution of the disease. However, mobile and static clinics were often the only means of providing services at the periphery. Progress continued to be made in research, particularly towards the development of vaccine.

Schistosomiasis. Schistosomiasis, one of the most complex parasitic infections, affected an estimated 200 million people in 1981, with an additional 500 million, in particular children, exposed to the risk of infection. As a result of advances in research and drug development, the strategy for schistosomiasis control had shifted from attempted eradication of the snail host to drug treatment of the human population.

Nutrition

In 1981, UNICEF expenditures on child nutrition amounted to $14 million. Activities to improve the nutritional status of children and mothers included promotion of food and nutrition policies and preparation of national plans, and efforts to control specific deficiency diseases. In selected cases, food supplements as well as vitamins and mineral supplements were provided to vulnerable mothers and children.<sup>(1)</sup> In addition, nutrition components were included in programmes on health, water supply and sanitation, education, social welfare services and emergency relief. A joint five-year work plan was developed between UNICEF and the World Health Organization (WHO) on improvement of nutrition through the primary health care approach.<sup>(2,3)</sup>

Infant feeding. Greatly strengthened by the adoption by the World Health Assembly in May 1981 of the International Code of Marketing of Breast-milk Substitutes (p. 1419), national and regional activities to promote breast-feeding and improve weaning practices were extended, often with UNICEF co-operation.<sup>(3)</sup> At least 35 countries adopted or were taking steps to adopt national codes.

The promotion of breast-feeding and the improvement of infant-feeding practices constituted a major component of the UNICEF/WHO five-year programme on nutrition.<sup>(1)</sup>

At its May session,<sup>(2)</sup> the UNICEF Executive Board endorsed a programme involving increased and more systematic UNICEF participation in such activities as surveillance of breast-feeding trends, orientation and training of health workers, preparation of information material for mothers, revision of health service practices, improvement of maternal nutrition and more widespread measures to combat infant malnutrition, emphasis on social support systems, and implementation of the Code of Marketing.

Studies undertaken in 1981 reported a continuing decline in breast-feeding and inadequate weaning practices in several countries. In addition to promoting breast-feeding and advocating improved weaning practices in country programmes, UNICEF established at headquarters a Task Force on Infant and Young Child Feeding to monitor progress in the field.

Education

In developing countries in 1981, only three or four children out of every 10 completed primary education, and the proportion of women among illiterates continued to grow.

UNICEF expenditures on primary and formal education reached $11 million in 1981, assistance which continued to be increasingly integrated with programmes of non-formal education, particularly for women and girls, in such areas as health education, child care, nutrition and income-earning skills. In 1981, approved commitments for formal education rose by $5 million over 1980 to $29.1 million, and commitments for non-formal education rose from $6.1 million to $29.9 million. The increased emphasis on non-formal education reflected efforts at reaching large numbers of out-of-school children through non-formal approaches.<sup>(1,2)</sup>

Child welfare in urban areas

Support by UNICEF to child welfare in low-income urban areas increased substantially in 1981, in anticipation of the increase in number, from the current estimated figure of 370 million to 666 million by the year 2000, of children under 15 living in such areas in the developing countries. Urban programmes supported by UNICEF operated in 43 countries, and field offices in 24 more countries had identified possibilities for collaborative urban efforts. Such programmes emphasized women's activities, pre-school and day-care programmes and early child development for children under six years of age, as well as primary health care and nutrition.

Reports: <sup>(1)</sup>UNICEF Board, E/1982/17.

UNICEF finances

UNICEF income in 1981 of $268 million, excluding $23 million contributed for Kampuchean relief operations, represented a net increase of 10 per cent over 1980 in real terms, while its expenditures of $265 million (excluding Kampuchean relief) represented an increase of 6 per cent. However, programme growth was hampered by the adverse world economic situation and commitments for all UNICEF country programmes were reduced by 12.5 per cent after the Board's May session. Further reductions following the Board's special session in October affected those countries which were considered most able to effect reductions.<sup>(4)</sup> At the same time, major efforts were made for fund-raising and many donors increased their contributions to general resources at the United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities in November (p. 426).

In May, the UNICEF Committee on Administration and Finance again considered a proposal submitted in 1980 by the Fund's Executive Director that he be granted authority to negotiate stand-by lines of credit with international banks as an overdraft arrangement.<sup>(3)</sup> The proposal failed to generate support, and the Board concluded that the Fund's current liquidity policy was adequate. <sup>(1)</sup> In October, in connection with the financial plan approved for 1980-1984 (p. 1007), the Board adopted a principle calling for the restoration, over a three-year period, of a liquidity provision covering one month's general resources cash needs in order to safeguard the Fund's programme delivery and financial integrity.<sup>(2)</sup>

Budgets

Revised administrative and programme support budgets for 1981. The UNICEF Executive Board, on the recommendation of its Committee on Administration and Finance,<sup>(3)</sup> approved in May 1981 revised budget estimates for the year, comprising $30.2 million gross ($26.6 million net) for administrative services and $48.6 million gross ($39.7 million net) for programme support.<sup>(2)</sup>

This represented an increase of 6.6 per cent over the amount initially approved by the Board in 1980 for administrative services during 1981 ($28.4 million) and an increase of 7.0 per cent over those for programme support ($45.4 million), a total increase of $5.1 million. About half of the increase resulted from inflation affecting salary scales and other costs, and the remainder related to unforeseen requirements and to the proposed establishment of eight new field offices.

The approved budget estimates for 1981 were $2 million less than those submitted by the Executive Director, who had estimated a total of $30.7 million gross for administrative services and $50.2 million for programme support. <sup>(1)</sup> It was agreed that, of the $2 million reduction, $419,000 related to items which would more appropriately be considered as part of the 1982-1983 budget estimates (p. 1007). The approved figures showed an increase over the 1980 level-$24.4 million for administrative services and $40.3 million for programme support.

Speaking in the General Assembly's Second (Economic- and Financial) Committee, Canada said the ratio of administrative to programme costs must remain as low as possible. The Byelorussian SSR called for more energetic action to reduce administrative costs.

Budget for 1982-1983. Following the recommendations of its Committee on Administration and Finance,<sup>(7)</sup> the Executive Board approved, in October 1981, 1982-1983 budget estimates for UNICEF totalling $171 million gross, presented for the first time in a biennial format and grouping activities under four parts—$13.6 million for policy-making, $21.8 million for external relations, $44 million for administration and $91.6 million for programme development.<sup>(5)</sup>

The estimates had undergone a series of revisions since the Board first acted in May,<sup>(6)</sup> when it requested the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) to review the estimates submitted by the Executive Director. These totalled $214 million, including $17.2 million for policy-making, $26.7 million for external relations, $54.2 million for administration and $115.7 million for programme development. <sup>(1)</sup> The initial estimates also included a proposed increase of 384 posts.

In its report of 9 September, ACABQ recommended expenditure reductions in the amount of $11.8 million, resulting in a net addition of 290 posts and budget estimates of $202 million.<sup>(4)</sup> After examining the Executive Director's revised proposals<sup>(2)</sup> and new estimates totalling $181.8 million,<sup>(3)</sup> followed by further revised estimates based on the 1980-1981 budget of 1,862 posts with a net addition of 30 field posts, the Board approved $43 million less than the initial estimates.

It also approved in October, on the recommendation of the Committee on Administration and Finance, income estimates of $28.2 million, consisting of $17.8 million in income from staff assessment, $6 million in other income and $4.4 million in government contributions to local costs. This reflected a decrease from the initial income projection of $31.4 million, including $21.1 million from staff assessment. <sup>(1)</sup> ACABQ had recommended a reduction of $1.4 million, while reductions of $1.3 million resulted from the deferment of budget expenditures and $1 million from fluctuations in exchange rates.

The consensus reached by the Board on the 1982-1983 budget was welcomed by Denmark, speaking in the General Assembly's Second Committee for the Nordic countries.

Financial plan for 1980-1984

The UNICEF financial plan for 1980-1984, set out in the medium-term work plan (p. 1001) issued in April 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> projected a 1981 income of $470 million, 50 per cent higher than projections made in 1980, in anticipation of additional contributions from various sources. Income projections for other years were: $540 million for 1982, $620 million for 1983 and $710 million for 1984. However, due to uncertainties over the timing of new contributions, the Executive Director presented to the Executive Board in May<sup>(4)</sup> income projections for the period that reflected reductions of some $50 million per year.

In response to the Board's concern that the original income projections were not sufficiently secure to meet the commitments proposed for 1982-1984, the Executive Director circulated a revised general-resources plan showing income of $264 million for 1981, or $55 million less than the original estimates.

On the recommendation of its Committee on Administration and Finance,<sup>(5)</sup> the Board gave firm approval to seven eighths, or $307 million, of the 1981 programme commitments, based on the lower-income projection; approval of the remaining one eighth, or $44 million, was contingent on receipt of income exceeding $264 million.

Reviewing proposals of the Executive Director for a revised rolling financial plan for 1980-1984,<sup>(2)</sup> in which general resources income estimates for 1981 had been reduced to $218 million, the Committee in October considered that the lower-income version of projections might still be too high and that a more cautious approach was called for in financial planning.<sup>(6)</sup>

The Board, at its special session in October,<sup>(3)</sup> agreed that the Fund's primary focus should be on programme delivery and accepted the low-income projection as a framework until June 1982 for the financial plan and decision-making on programming. On the recommendation of the Committee on Administration and Finance, the Board decided that reductions from planned growth levels should be allocated so as to minimize the disruption and protect the effectiveness of programmes.

Denmark, speaking in the General Assembly's Second Committee on behalf of the Nordic countries, welcomed the revised financial plan, and Australia said it was confident that the decisions taken by the Board in October would provide a sound basis for planning. Japan believed it was important for UNICEF to plan its future activities on the basis of realistic financial prospects and said the Board, at its October session, had had the difficult task of reconciling the need to expand activities with that of consolidating the financial and administrative basis at a time of global economic constraints.

Yugoslavia, on the other hand, deplored the fact that the Board had revised its financial plan on the basis of a low-income projection; if the financial situation did not improve, the rate of real increase in UNICEF assistance would be 1 per cent annually for 1982 and 1983, which was in contradiction with the increased needs of developing countries.

Accounts

Accounts for 1979. On the recommendation of its Committee on Administration and Finance <sup>(2)</sup> the UNICEF Executive Board, in May 1981, <sup>(1)</sup> noted the observations of the Board of Auditors and the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) on the Fund's 1979 financial report and that of the Greeting Card Operation (GCO) on its 1978/1979 season (p. 1011). It also noted the Executive Director's comments and actions in response to those observations, <sup>(3)</sup> including measures taken to strengthen administrative control of travel costs.

Accounts for 1980. Executive Board, following the recommendation of its Committee on Administration and Finance, <sup>(4)</sup> noted in May 1981 <sup>(3)</sup> the financial reports of UNICEF for 1980 and of GCO on its 1979/1980 season (p. 1011). The Board of Auditors made a series of recommendations on the Fund's accounts plan and on personnel questions at the UNICEF Packing and Assembly Centre (UNIPAC) at Copenhagen, Denmark. <sup>(2)</sup>

In its September report to the General Assembly, ACABQ noted the Auditors' comments and the UNICEF response thereto; called for an expeditious review of the accounts plan, as recommended by the Auditors; and agreed with the Fund on the current non-feasibility of UNIPAC itself hiring manual workers instead of using the services of a local firm. <sup>(1)</sup>

By a 30 November resolution, the Assembly accepted the 1980 financial report and the audit opinion of the Board of Auditors, concurred with the ACABQ observations and requested the Executive Director to take remedial action required by the Auditors. <sup>(5)</sup>

Contributions

The Executive Board noted at its May 1981 session that 72 per cent of 1980 UNICEF income came directly from Governments as regular and specific-purpose contributions and another 15 per cent from private sources other than GCO. <sup>(2)</sup>

At its special session in October, <sup>(1)</sup> the Board urged donors to make special contributions to general resources, take up additional "noted" projects, adopt projects as a short-term exceptional measure, and pay as much of their contributions as possible by 30 April, especially in 1982, 1983 and 1984 while the general resource liquidity was being restored (p. 1006).

On 17 December 1981, <sup>(4)</sup> the General Assembly invited all contributing Governments to make early payment of their pledges to UNICEF and appealed for increased contributions, if possible on a multiyear basis, to enable the Fund to augment its co-operation. The Assembly also endorsed an Economic and Social Council resolution of 22 July, which contained an appeal for increased contributions to UNICEF.

The contributions received or pledged in 1981—to UNICEF's general resources, supplementary funds and the Kampuchean relief operations—totalled $261,391,165, including a deduction of $186,396 in adjustments to prior years' income. Of this amount, $222,307,637 came from Governments and intergovernmental agencies, $35,949,299 from non-governmental sources and $3,320,623 from the United Nations system (see table on next page).

Concern at the downward trend in contributions and at the lack of adequate resources was expressed by several speakers in the Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, among them Bhutan and Italy. Ethiopia said the financial support actually provided to UNICEF was a sad contrast to the professions of support for it. Bangladesh and others appealed to developed countries to make adequate resources available. Yugoslavia appreciated the efforts of the Executive Director to raise special contributions to the general resources of UNICEF. Poland stated that the permanent shortage of its currency in UNICEF seemed to be the best proof that contributions in national currencies could be used; in the opinion of the Byelorussian SSR, the experience of UNICEF showed that the supposed difficulties created by contributions in national currencies had been groundlessly exaggerated and the great possibilities to be found in the socialist countries for providing assistance to developing countries had not been exploited to the full.

Arab Gulf Programme for UN Development Organizations. In early 1981, consultations between Prince Talal bin Abdul Aziz al Saud of Saudi Arabia and leaders of the Gulf Arab States resulted in the establishment of an Arab Gulf Programme for United Nations Development Organizations, to provide support for UNICEF, the United Nations Development Programme and other United Nations organizations concerned with human resources development. The Programme, initially known as the Arab Gulf Development Foundation for the United Nations, pledged $22 million to UNICEF for 1981.

In January<sup>(1)</sup> and May,<sup>(2)</sup> the UNICEF Executive Board, which had followed up on the Programme's development through a progress report of the Executive Director,<sup>(3)</sup> expressed appreciation to Prince Talal for his efforts.

In October, the Committee considered UNICEF-assisted projects totalling $25 million for the period covering September 1981 to September 1982, approved 10 of those projects totalling $10.2 million and set a target of $50 million for private contributions over the same period. Contributions to the Programme from its member States totalled $91 million in 1981, of which $69 million was pledged by Saudi Arabia.

Organizational questions

Administration and management

At its special session held in New York from 22 to 24 October 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the UNICEF Executive Board took note of the recommendations and conclusions of its Committee on Administration and Finance, which also met in New York, on 22 and 23 October,<sup>(2)</sup> and approved the creation of 30 posts over the staffing level of 1,862 posts for 1980-1981, primarily for the new field offices to be established in Beijing, China, and Salisbury, Zimbabwe, and in support of decentralization, field programme delivery and accountability. The Board also authorized 17 net upgradings to accommodate the proposed reclassification of posts, and the conversion of 11 posts at the UNICEF Packing and Assembly Centre at Copenhagen, Denmark (p. 1012), from the national officer to the international professional category.

The Executive Director agreed to submit to the 1982 Board session a report on his administration of the staffing guidelines approved by the Board in 1981. In addition, the Board agreed to include in the agenda of its 1982 session an item on resources, administrative efficiency and programme delivery.

In 1981, UNICEF became the first United Nations entity to meet the 25 per cent target set by the General Assembly in 1978 for the recruitment of women in the Professional category.<sup>(3)</sup>

During the debate in the Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, France said that, in view of the low increase of resources and in order to preserve the Fund's excellent reputation, the creation of new posts, particularly at high levels, would have to be done very cautiously and gradually. The Byelorussian SSR said UNICEF should seek to achieve a better balance in recruiting experts from various countries, especially the socialist countries.

Resolution: <sup>(3)</sup>GA, 33/143, sect. III, para. 1, 20 Dec. 1978 (YUN 1978, p. 989).

Relations with NGOs

An increasing number of non-governmental organizations (NGOs) were interested and involved in UNICEF work at the local, national and regional levels.

The Chairman of the NGO Committee on UNICEF, which included 116 international organizations world-wide, informed the UNICEF Executive Board at its regular session in May 1981<sup>(1)</sup> of the two symposia organized by the Committee early in the year, on childhood disability prevention and on breast-feeding promotion strategies.

National committees. In 1981, the income channelled from UNICEF national committees from fund-raising; including greeting card sales (p. 1011), amounted to $48 million, or 17 per cent of UNICEF total income.<sup>(2)</sup>

At the May session of the UNICEF Executive Board,<sup>(1)</sup> a number of representatives suggested that the UNICEF secretariat should give greater support to the national committees for the expansion of their work in new, more substantive fields. It was noted that, in addition to their traditional advocacy and fund-raising roles, the committees had become increasingly involved in information-sharing and development education, and served as focal points for the follow-up of the 1979 International Year of the Child.

Efforts to strengthen UNICEF relations with the national committees included a collective study tour to the field by a group of committees, implementation of a new system of 'twinning' between donor and recipient countries, and the holding of an information workshop for national committees, at Bienne/Twannberg, Switzerland, in November.

The role of the national committees was emphasized by Canada during the debate in the General Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee.

Public information

The advocacy and fund-raising efforts of the UNICEF Special Envoy, Prince Talal bin Abdul Aziz al Saud of Saudi Arabia (p. 1009), stimulated extensive media coverage and helped raise special funds in a number of industrialized countries as well as in the Gulf Arab States. In addition, the UNICEF Goodwill Ambassadors, Danny Kaye, Liv Ullmann and Peter Ustinov, contributed to raising public consciousness on behalf of children and mothers affected in emergency situations.

Information activities of UNICEF in 1981 included support for the international campaign for the promotion of breast-feeding, the International Code of Marketing of Breast-milk Substitutes (p. 1005), the International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation (1981-1990) (p. 684) and the International of Disabled Persons (1981) (p. 795). Support was provided for media visits to the field. Development education as a facet of information work received priority in many national committees.

The Executive Director's report on The State of the World's Children 1981-1982 was given expanded distribution, translated into 18 languages, and received extensive media coverage. Advocacy material produced during the year included 25 television co-productions and 10 films, one of them nominated in the United States for an Academy Award.<sup>(1)</sup>

Greeting Card Operation

During the 1980 Greeting Card Operation (GCO) season (1 May 1980-30 April 1981), 117 million cards (4 million more than the 1979 season), 478,000 calendars, 347,000 packs of stationery and other related items were sold in 132 countries, generating record gross proceeds of $47.2 million (an increase of 4.9 per cent over the previous season) and bringing in a record net income of $18.4 million ($1.3 million more than in 1979, but $4.2 million less than estimated) to UNICEF general resources.<sup>(3)</sup> Operational expenditures of $19.5 million were 12 per cent higher than the previous year but 2 per cent less than projected.<sup>(1)</sup>

At a meeting of the Committee on Administration and Finance in May,<sup>(2)</sup> the Senior Deputy Executive Director of UNICEF explained that the reported net income of the 1980 season was $5 million lower than the approved estimates, due to a lower-than-expected sales volume ($3 million) and to exchange rate fluctuations ($2 million).

Budget for 1981/1982. On the recommendation of the Committee on Administration and Finance,<sup>(3)</sup> the UNICEF Executive Board approved in May 1981<sup>(2)</sup> budget estimates for the 1981 GCO season (1 May 1981-30 April 1982) as submitted by the Executive Director.<sup>(1)</sup> The budget included $23.4 million (gross) for operational costs and a projected gross income of $49.7 million (or $26.3 million net). The Board also authorized the Executive Director to advance up to $7.2 million against 1982 expenditure estimates and to spend additional amounts under specified conditions.

Accounts for 1978/1979 and 1979/1980. At its May 1981 session, the UNICEF Executive Board,<sup>(5)</sup> on the recommendation of its Committee on Administration and Finance,<sup>(6)</sup> took note of the financial report for the 1979 GCO season (1 May 1979-30 April 1980), the observations of the Board of Auditors<sup>(2)</sup> and of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) on the financial report for the 1978 season (1 May 1978-30 April 1979), and the UNICEF Executive Director's response, submitted to the Committee on Administration and Finance in January 1981.<sup>(3)</sup>

Expressing concern over the expenditures for the maintenance of GCO sales offices in some countries, the Board of Auditors recommended a review of the arrangements and indicated that the administration agreed with that recommendation. The Executive Director noted that the development of an effective sales, distribution and marketing system necessitated high initial costs which should be viewed as an investment, and that as sales increased the ratio of income to expenses would improve.

At the May 1981 session of the Committee on Administration and Finance, several representatives emphasized that maximum profits should be made by minimizing the operating and administrative costs.

In their observations on the 1979 GCO season,<sup>(4)</sup> the Auditors made a series of recommendations on various aspects of management, including unrecorded obligations, procurement practices and over-production of cards. Examining those recommendations, ACABQ, in its September 1981 report to the General Assembly, <sup>(1)</sup> recommended that over-production be minimized, and noted UNICEF efforts to improve sales forecasting and sales of unsold cards.

Supply operations

During 1981, supplies requested by UNICEF programmes totalled $147 million and supplies valued at $138 million were ordered.<sup>(1)</sup> By year's end, orders were pending for supplies totalling $55 million. The total volume of supply purchases in over 80 developing countries amounted to $27 million and supplies worth $38 million were packed at the UNICEF Packing and Assembly Centre at Copenhagen, Denmark.

Emergency supply assistance decreased to $14 million from the 1980 figure of $34 million, due mainly to the improved situation in Kampuchea, which continued to receive the largest emergency supply assistance, valued at $10 million.

At the May 1981 session of the Executive Board, the Executive Director accepted Denmark's offer of new rent-free facilities for an integrated supply centre at Copenhagen. At that session, the Board also initiated plans for reorganization of the UNICEF Supply Division to consolidate supply operations for optimum efficiency and cost-effectiveness.

Budget of Packing and Assembly Centre. On the recommendation of its Committee on Administration and Finance,<sup>(5)</sup> the Executive Board,<sup>(4)</sup> in May 1981, approved revised budget estimates for 1981 for the UNICEF Packing and Assembly Centre (UNIPAC) at Copenhagen, except for a change of category of some posts from national officer to international professional. The revised estimates amounting to $6.3 million, or $0.5 million less than the original projections, had been submitted in April by the Executive Director, together with budget estimates for 1982-1983.<sup>(1)</sup>

The Board, also in May, referred the 1982-1983 estimates to the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, which, in its September report,<sup>(2)</sup> recommended approval of the estimates, but considered it unjustified to change the category of some UNIPAC posts. The change had been proposed in view of a 1980 decision of the International Civil Service Commission on national officers (permitting employment of national professionals only for functions at field offices which required local experience and could not be carried out as effectively by international professionals).

Following the Committee's recommendation, the Board, at its special session in October,<sup>(3)</sup> approved UNIPAC budget estimates of $15 million for 1982-1983 (an increase of $2.9 million over the combined 1980 expenditures and revised 1981 estimates). The Board, however, agreed to the proposed conversion of 11 posts from the national officer to the international professional category.

Increase in membership of the Executive Board

As agreed by the Executive Board in 1980, the Board Chairman held informal consultations aimed at reaching consensus on a recommendation to the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly relating to enlargement of the Board's membership, including number, criteria and composition. There was general agreement that such enlargement should be modest and should meet the criteria established by the Assembly in 1956<sup>(3)</sup> with respect to geographical distribution and the representation of the major contributing and recipient countries.

In May 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> the Board did not reach a consensus on the question, and requested its new Chairman to continue consultations in order to reach a decision at the Board's special session in October or at the next (1982) regular session. In October, the Chairman reported that consultations continued.<sup>(1)</sup>

Speaking in the Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee on behalf of the Nordic countries, Denmark expressed regret that no agreement had been reached; Australia hoped for an early settlement of the matter.

Resolution: <sup>(3)</sup>GA, 1038(XI), 7 Dec. 1956 (YUN 1956, p. 263).

Increase in membership of the Committee on Administration and Finance. Following up on an agreement reached at its regular session in May 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> that the Committee on Administration and Finance be enlarged to become a committee of the whole, the Executive Board, at its special session in October,<sup>(1)</sup> revised rule 18 of its rules of procedure. Rules 60 and 61, concerning observers at meetings of the Board and its committees of the whole, were also revised, as proposed by the United Nations Office of the Legal Counsel.

Draft declaration on adoption and foster placement

In 1981, the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council took up consideration of a draft declaration on adoption and foster placement, first submitted in 1979.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. On the recommendation of its Second (Social) Committee, the Economic and Social Council, by a resolution adopted without vote on 6 May, requested the General Assembly to consider in 1981 the draft declaration on social and legal principles relating to adoption and foster placement of children nationally and internationally.<sup>(5)</sup>

The Committee approved the text without vote on 29 April. The resolution was based on a draft approved by the Commission for Social Development (p. 770) on 16 February.<sup>(2)</sup>

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. The Secretary-General, by a note of 28 September to the Assembly,<sup>(1)</sup> recalled that the draft declaration had been prepared by a group of experts convened by him in response to a 1975 Economic and Social Council resolution,<sup>(3)</sup> that the text had been submitted to the Council in 1979<sup>(7)</sup> and that the Assembly had taken no action on the matter in 1979 or in 1980. The Council had noted in 1979 the wish of the Commission for Social Development that, in the event the declaration was adopted, a group of experts should draft guidelines for the use of Governments in implementing its principles.<sup>(4)</sup>

Acting without vote on 16 December 1981, the Assembly decided to include in its provisional agenda for 1982 an item on the draft Declaration on Social and Legal Principles relating to the Protection and Welfare of Children, with Special Reference to Foster Placement and Adoption Nationally and Internationally, with a view to its possible allocation to the Sixth (Legal) Committee.<sup>(6)</sup> The Assembly also decided that appropriate measures should be taken in 1982 to finalize the draft Declaration so that further action, as proposed by the Council in 1979, could proceed.

The draft Declaration, the text of which was annexed to the resolution, equated the best child welfare with good family welfare; emphasized the importance of children's rights to security, affection and continuing care; and asserted that foster family care should be a planned, temporary service leading to such forms of permanency as restoration of the child to the biological family or adoption. The text also contained a series of provisions on adoption.

Introducing the draft resolution in the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, Sweden said the item could well be discussed in the Sixth Committee because it entailed clear legal aspects and because the workload of that Committee offered better prospects for an early and thorough discussion; the question of how the Sixth Committee could deal with the matter was left open.

When the sponsor later proposed deletion, on the basis of informal consultations, of the reference to allocating the question to the Sixth Committee, Morocco asked for a vote on the retention of that phrase. After accepting a compromise amendment by Ethiopia, for inclusion of a reference to possible allocation of the question to the Sixth Committee, the Third Committee approved without vote on 30 November the text as a whole. Explaining their position, Iraq and Morocco asserted that the legislation of various Moslem countries was incompatible with some of the provisions of the draft Declaration, and Iraq stated it could not accept intercountry adoption.

Draft declaration on social and legal principles relating to adoption and foster placement of children nationally and internationally

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolution 1979/28 of 9 May 1979, in which it submitted the draft declaration on social and legal principles relating to adoption and foster placement of children nationally and internationally to the General Assembly for preliminary consideration at its thirty-fourth session,

Bearing in mind the report of the Secretary-General on views of Member States on the text of the draft declaration,

Convinced that adoption of the draft declaration will promote the well-being of children with special needs,

Requests the General Assembly to consider at its thirty-sixth session the draft declaration on social and legal principles relating to adoption and foster placement of children nationally and internationally so that the further action proposed in Economic and Social Council resolution 1979/28 may proceed.

General Assembly resolution 36/167

Adopted without vote Meeting 101 16 December 1981

Approved by Third Committee (A/36/792) without vote. 30 November (meeting 66); draft by Sweden (A/C.3/36/L.75), orally revised and orally amended by Morocco, sub-amended by Ethiopia; agenda item 12.

Draft Declaration on Social and Legal Principles relating to the Protection and Welfare of Children, with Special Reference to Foster Placement and Adoption Nationally and Internationally

The General Assembly,

Recalling Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/18 of 6 May 1981 entitled "Draft declaration on social and legal principles relating to adoption and foster placement of children nationally and internationally", by which the Council requested the General Assembly to consider at its thirty-sixth session the draft Declaration annexed to that resolution so that the further action proposed in Council resolution 1979/28 of 9 May 1979 may proceed,

Bearing in mind the report of the Secretary-General on views of Member States on the text of the draft Declaration,

Convinced that adoption of the draft Declaration will promote the well-being of children with special needs,

1. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-seventh session an item entitled "Draft Declaration on Social and Legal Principles relating to the Protection and Welfare of Children, with Special Reference to Foster Placement and Adoption Nationally and Internationally" with a view to the possible allocation of the item to the Sixth Committee;

2. Decides, in order that the further action proposed in Economic and Social Council resolution 1979/28 may proceed, that appropriate measures should be taken at Its thirty-seventh session to finalize the draft Declaration.

ANNEX

Draft Declaration on Social and Legal Principles relating to the Protection and Welfare of Children, with Special Reference to Foster Placement and Adoption Nationally and Internationally

A. General family and child welfare

1. It is in the best interest of every nation to give a high priority to family and child welfare as it plans for the use and further development of national resources.

2. It is recognized that the best child welfare is good family welfare.

3. It is affirmed that the first priority for a child is to be cared for by the biological parents. Other family members should be the first alternative if the biological parents cannot provide care for the child.

4. When biological family care is unavailable or inappropriate, substitute family care should be considered.

5. It must be recognized that there are parents who cannot bring up their own children and that the children's rights to security, affection and continuing care should be of greatest importance.

6. Providers of service should have professional social work training in family and child welfare.

B. Foster placement

7. Every child has a right to a family. Children who cannot remain in their biological family should be placed in a foster family or adoption in preference to Institutions, unless the child's particular needs can best be met in a specialized facility.

8. Children for whom institutional care was formerly regarded as the only option should be placed with families, both foster and adoptive.

9. Provision should be made for regulation of placement of children outside of their biological family.

10. Foster family care should be a planned, temporary service as a bridge to permanency for a child, which includes but is not limited to restoration to the biological family or adoption.

11. Planning for the child in foster family care must involve the biological family, foster family and child, if appropriate, under the auspices of a competent authorized agency.

C. Adoption

12. The primary purpose of adoption is to provide a permanent family for a child who cannot be cared for by his/her biological family.

13. Adoption procedures should be flexible enough to meet the child's needs in various situations.

14. In considering possible adoption placements, those responsible for the child should select the most appropriate environment for the particular child concerned.

15. Sufficient time and adequate counselling should be given to the biological parents to enable them to reach a decision on their child's future, recognizing that it is in the child's best interest to reach this decision as early as possible.

16. Legislation and services should ensure that the child becomes an integral part of the adoptive family.

17. The need of adult adoptees to know about their background should be recognized.

18. There should be recognition, in the law, of traditional adoption within the family, to ensure the protection of the children and to assist the family by counselling.

19. Governments should determine the adequacy of their national services for children and recognize those children whose needs are not being met by existing services. For some of these children, intercountry adoption may be considered as a suitable means of providing them with a family.

20. When intercountry adoption is considered, policy and legislation should be established to protect the children concerned.

21. In each country, placements should be made through authorized agencies competent to deal with intercountry adoption services and providing the same safeguards and standards as are applied in national adoptions.

22. Proxy adoptions are not acceptable, in consideration of the child's legal and social safety.

23. No adoption plan should be considered before it has been established that the child is legally free for adoption and the pertinent documents necessary to complete the adoption are available. All necessary consents must be in a form which is legally valid in both countries. It must be definitely established that the child will be able to immigrate into the country of the prospective adopters and can subsequently obtain their nationality.

24. In intercountry adoption, legal validation of the adoption should be assured in the countries involved.

25. The child should at all times have a name, a nationality and a legal guardian.

Youth

Youth and development

Youth in the 1980s would face a concrete structural crisis of chronic economic uncertainty and even deprivation, the Secretary-General warned in his January 1981 report on youth in the contemporary world,<sup>(2)</sup> prepared in response to a 1979 Economic and Social Council request<sup>(3)</sup> and considered by the Commission for Social Development at its February 1981 session.<sup>(1)</sup> The report pointed to a possible deterioration of the situation, particularly of youth in developing countries, which centred on illiteracy, lack of educational opportunities, unemployment, underemployment and the flight of rural youth to the cities. The effective integration and active participation of young people in society would most likely reduce the possibility of social dysfunction, lessen the probability of war and augment the possibility of development, peace and stability.

The Secretary-General also discussed major trends and activities of Member States in the field of youth and noted that considerable efforts were being made to provide youth with opportunities for productive work in the various socio-economic sectors.

Participation of youth in United Nations development activities was discussed in a March report of the Secretary-General to the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination (CPC) (p. 1016).

On the recommendation of its Second Committee, the Economic and Social Council, acting without vote on 6 May<sup>(4)</sup> requested the Secretary-General to submit his report to the 1981 General Assembly session and to take into account relevant views expressed in the Commission for Social Development in preparing the documentation for the Advisory Committee for the International Youth Year (1985) (p. 1019). It also decided to include in the agenda of the Commission's next (1983) session the question of youth in the contemporary world.

The draft resolution, approved by the Commission on 16 February, asked that all relevant documentation be submitted to the Assembly. When the Second Committee ascertained that the only documentation considered by the Commission had been the Secretary-General's report, it approved an oral amendment by Ireland to reflect that fact. The amended draft was approved by the Committee without vote on 29 April.

The importance of youth participation in development was emphasized by a number of speakers in the Assembly's Third Committee, among them China, the Congo, Fiji, Guinea, Indonesia, Kenya, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Nepal, Nicaragua, the Niger, Poland, Sierra Leone, Togo, the USSR, the Upper Volta, Yemen and Zambia. Guinea called for young people to receive priority in development plans and Zambia attached great importance to the participation of youth in decision-making and other development-related areas. Chile, China, Denmark and others believed that youth should be given a chance to participate, in particular in activities aimed at establishing a new international economic order. Indonesia warned that social dysfunction would result if youth were denied the chance to participate in development and to realize their potential.

Finland, on the other hand, said the participation of youth in development should be considered an integral part of general participation. Nicaragua agreed that the aim of youth participation in development should not be merely to resolve their own problems but to co-ordinate their efforts with other groups in society.

To integrate youth successfully into development, many countries, including the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Djibouti, Fiji, France, Indonesia, Mauritania, New Zealand, Norway, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR, the United States, Venezuela and Zambia, stressed the need to combat problems affecting young people, in particular youth unemployment. Norway called for effective measures by United Nations bodies to deal with youth unemployment and Fiji urged the United Nations to recommend national and local action. National programmes against youth unemployment were considered necessary by a number of States, among them the Byelorussian SSR, Mauritania, New Zealand, the USSR and Venezuela.

The youth unemployment problem was highlighted in an Assembly resolution of 13 November on youth and human rights (p. 972).

Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/16

Adopted without vote      Meeting 14      6 May 1981

Approved by Second Committee (E/1981/57) without vote, 29 April (meeting 11); draft by Commission for Social Development (E/1981/26), orally amended by Ireland; agenda item 10.

Youth in the contemporary world

The Economic and Social Council,

Noting with great interest the importance attached by the General Assembly and other United Nations bodies to the concerns of youth,

Recalling its resolution 1979/16 of 9 May 1979, as well as General Assembly resolutions 35/126 of 11 December 1980 on the International Youth Year: Participation, Development, Peace and 35/139 of 11 December 1980 on channels of communication between the United Nations and youth and youth organizations,

Noting with satisfaction that the Declaration on the Promotion among Youth of the Ideals of Peace, Mutual Respect and Understanding between Peoples continues to provide a useful basis and incentive for further action in the field of youth, at the national, regional, interregional and international levels,

Conv/need that the preservation and strengthening of international peace and security are prerequisites for a secure and happy future for the youth of all countries,

Recognizing the importance of integrating young people in the overall life of society and of taking fully into account their special needs when formulating national plans and programmes,

Emphasizing the need for increasing the quantity and quality of opportunities for young people for their active and productive participation in the general development of society,

Reaffirming the necessity to intensify and consolidate the efforts of the United Nations so as to give effect to a co-ordinated and practical approach to youth programmes of all the United Nations agencies involved, as well as to strengthen co-operation with non-governmental organizations of youth or directly dealing with youth,

Noting the views on the question of youth in the contemporary world expressed in the report of the Secretary-General and in the report of the Commission for Social Development on its twenty-seventh session,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the report of the Secretary-General on youth in the contemporary world, prepared for the Commission for Social Development;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to bring that report to the attention of the General Assembly at its thirty-sixth session;

3. Further requests the Secretary-General to take into account the views expressed on youth in the Commission for Social Development in the preparation of the documentation to be submitted to the Advisory Committee for the International Youth Year: Participation, Development, Peace;

4. Decides to include the item entitled "Youth in the contemporary world" in the agenda of the twenty-eighth session of the Commission for Social Development and that the Commission should consider under this item the second report on the situation of youth to be submitted by the Secretary-General in accordance with Economic and Social Council resolution 1979/16.

UN activities

Activities of the United Nations system related or directed to youth—defined by the Organization as those between the ages 15 and 24—were primarily field activities, 84 per cent of which were designed to provide them with services and 13 per cent to encourage their participation in development (p. 1014). Training was the main focus of some 87 per cent of field activities; other areas included institution-building, improvement of the situation of young workers, rural and underprivileged youth, and transfer of technological knowledge to youth.

Those activities, as described to the Commission for Social Development in a January 1981 report of the Secretary-General,<sup>(4)</sup> included assistance by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) for the training of youth leaders; technical advisory services by the International Labour Organisation on employment-oriented youth schemes; rural youth programmes by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations; youth involvement, under the World Health Organization, in promotion of primary health care; and projects by the United Nations Volunteers programme (p. 460) and by the regional commissions for the promotion of youth's role in economic and social development activities.

The Secretary-General, in a March report to the General Assembly on co-ordination of youth activities,<sup>(2)</sup> pointed to the importance of enhanced co-operation between the United Nations system and youth and student non-governmental organizations (p. 1017).

In his March report to CPC on a cross-organizational programme analysis of youth activities of the United Nations system,<sup>(3)</sup> the Secretary-General noted the need for a more coherent and integrated approach through project evaluation and agreed system-wide objectives, for the development of indicators on youth participation and for an increased focus on a number of substantive areas such as employment, rural youth and juvenile delinquency in urban areas.

Apart from those areas, CPC, at its May/June session,<sup>(1)</sup> recommended that future United Nations activities should also focus on the handicapped, refugees, equal opportunities for young women, education for peace, and participation, particularly at local levels, of youth in development. The main thrust of activities should be national rather than regional or global.

The Committee urged that programme formulation should have built-in evaluation indicators; it disagreed with the Secretary-General's suggestion for dispatching joint advisory missions, and concluded that more important than a set of system-wide objectives was for each organization, within its mandate, to have its own clear objectives and programmes.

By a resolution adopted without vote on 6 May,<sup>(5)</sup> the Economic and Social Council decided to consider at its second regular session of 1981 the question of the co-ordination of United Nations activities in the field of youth, in the light of the cross-organizational programme analysis and the comments and recommendations of CPC (p. 1076). The Council also requested the Secretary-General to continue, in the context of the 1985 International Youth Year (p. 1019), to analyse the views and suggestions of United Nations bodies and organizations on the question of youth and to report to the Council at its first regular session of 1982. The 14-nation text was introduced by Indonesia in the Council's Second Committee, where it was approved without vote on 29 April.

Co-ordination and information In the field of youth

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1979/27 of 9 May 1979 and 1980/25 of 2 May 1980 on co-ordination and information in the field of youth,

Recalling also General Assembly resolution 34/151 of 17 December 1979, by which the Assembly decided to designate 1985 as International Youth Year: Participation, Development, Peace,

Noting that the Advisory Committee for the international Youth Year has held its first session at which, in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 35/126 of 11 December 1980, it formulated a programme of measures and activities to be adopted and undertaken prior to and during the International Youth Year,

Considering that it is necessary to intensify and improve the co-ordination of the activities of the United Nations and the specialized agencies relating to youth, so as to contribute fully to the proper preparation and celebration of the International Youth Year,

Convinced of the importance of giving widespread publicity to the activities of the United Nations in the field of youth and of increasing the dissemination of information about youth, especially in the context of the preparations for the International Youth Year,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on co-ordination and information in the field of youth,

Recalling that the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination decided to undertake at its twenty-first session a cross-organizational programme analysis of the youth activities of the United Nations system,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to continue, in the light of the objectives and goals of the International Youth Year, to analyse the views, observations and suggestions of the specialized agencies and United Nations bodies on the situation, needs and aspirations of youth in the contemporary world and to report to the Council at its first regular session of 1982;

2. Decides to consider, at its second regular session of 1981, in the context of the discussion of the report of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination, the question of the co-ordination of United Nations activities in the field of youth. In the light of the cross-organizational programme analysis of the youth activities of the United Nations system and the comments and recommendations of the Committee.

Strengthening channels of communication between youth and the United Nations

In a September 1981 report to the General Assembly,<sup>(2)</sup> submitted in accordance with a December 1980 Assembly request,<sup>(6)</sup> the Secretary-General reviewed progress by the United Nations system in implementation of 1977 guidelines for the improvement of channels of communication between the United Nations and youth and youth organizations,<sup>(5)</sup> and proposed additional guidelines, including the establishment of national and regional co-ordinating committees for the International Youth Year (1985) (p. 1019).

The strengthening of co-operation between the United Nations and youth was also discussed in three other 1981 reports by the Secretary-General on: youth in the contemporary world,<sup>(4)</sup> submitted in January to the Commission for Social Development (p. 1014); a cross-organizational programme analysis of youth activities of the United Nations system,<sup>(3)</sup> presented to CPC in March (p. 1016); and co-ordination and information in the field of youth,<sup>(1)</sup> submitted to the Assembly in March.

Acting without vote on 9 November,<sup>(7)</sup> the Assembly adopted the additional guidelines; requested Member States, specialized agencies and other intergovernmental organizations to implement both the 1977 and 1981 guidelines, in co-operation with youth organizations; and asked the Secretary-General to report in 1982 on their implementation.

Annexed to the resolution, the additional guidelines-for national, regional and international action-invited Governments to consider the expansion of advisory services on youth activities provided by the United Nations, urged the regional commissions to promote integration and participation of youth in development (p. 1014), and called for the expansion of United Nations youth internships and the strengthening of the relationship with the Geneva informal meetings of international non-governmental youth organizations.

The 40-nation text, introduced in the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee by Egypt, was orally revised by the sponsors to include mention, in the preamble and in the guidelines, of the contribution that could be made by UNESCO to the improvement of channels of communication with youth. The Committee approved the text, as revised, on 23 October without vote.

During the Committee debate, a number of speakers, including the Congo, Denmark, Finland, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malaysia, Mongolia, Nepal, Romania and Venezuela, stressed the importance of strengthening channels of communication between youth and the United Nations. The Netherlands expressed the hope that the Assembly would recognize the informal meetings at Geneva as a main channel of communication between the United Nations and youth organizations.

Finland thought that one way of improving communication and representation between the United Nations and youth organizations was to enable those organizations to participate more actively in the work of the regional commissions. The Netherlands welcomed the opportunity for youth representatives to participate in the work of the Assembly. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Mauritania stressed the need to increase the number of young persons participating as interns or in the work of the United Nations system.

Channels of communication between the United Nations and youth and youth organizations

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 32/135 of 16 December 1977, in which it adopted guidelines for the improvement of the channels of communication between the United Nations and youth and youth organizations,

Recalling its resolution 35/139 of 11 December 1980, in which it requested the Secretary-General, taking into account the views expressed by Governments, to submit to the General Assembly at its thirty-sixth session, for adoption, proposals for additional guidelines, consistent with the guidelines already adopted in its resolution 32/135 and on the basis of the draft additional guidelines contained in the annex to its resolution 34/163 of 17 December 1979, as well as the suggestions of the Secretary-General in his reports to the Assembly at its thirty-third, thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth sessions,

Recalling also Economic and Social Council resolution 1980/25 of 2 May 1980 concerning co-ordination and information in the field of youth,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 10 September 1981,

Noting with appreciation that the report of the Advisory Committee for the International Youth Year contains useful proposals for the improvement of channels of communication between the United Nations and youth and youth organizations,

Convinced of the need to improve the efforts of the United Nations and the specialized agencies with regard to the participation of youth in achieving the objectives of the Charter of the United Nations,

Equally convinced of the valuable contributions that youth can make in promoting co-operation among States and in implementing the new international economic order and the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Taking note also of the valuable contribution that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization can make in the improvement of channels of communication between the United Nations and youth and youth organizations,

Bearing in mind the importance of the existence of channels of communication between the United Nations and youth and youth organizations for the proper information of youth and youth organizations and their effective participation in the United Nations and the specialized agencies at the national, regional and international levels,

Convinced that the existence and the proper functioning of channels of communication between the United Nations and youth organizations form a basic prerequisite of the successful preparation, celebration and follow-up of the International Youth Year: Participation, Development, Peace,

1. Adopts the additional guidelines for the improvement of the channels of communication between the United Nations and youth and youth organizations set forth in the annex to the present resolution;

2. Requests Member States, specialized agencies and other intergovernmental organizations to implement these additional guidelines, together with the guidelines adopted in General Assembly resolution 32/135, in co-operation with youth organizations in consultative status with the Economic and Social Council and with other youth organizations concerned;

3. Requests the Advisory Committee for the International Youth Year to promote the implementation of the additional guidelines, together with the guidelines adopted in resolution 32/135, during the preparation for and celebration of the International Youth Year: Participation, Development, Peace;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, on the basis of the reports of Member States, specialized agencies and other intergovernmental organizations as well as non-governmental youth organizations, to report to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session on the implementation of the present resolution.

ANNEX

Additional guidelines for the improvement of the channels of communication between the United Nations and youth and youth organizations

A. National

1. Attention should be given to the expansion of advisory services on youth activities provided by the United Nations to Governments at their request.

2. Governments should consider the inclusion of youth representatives in their national delegations to the General Assembly and other relevant United Nations meetings.

B. Regional

3. The regional commissions should review their relationships with regional non-governmental youth organizations in order to facilitate co-operation with and among such organizations.

4. The regional commissions should pay special attention to the question of the active participation of youth in the process of development and should consider the need to co-operate closely with the international programmes of the International Labour Organization, the United Nations Development Programme and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization for the provision of services for and by youth with regard to employment.

5. In the context of paragraph 4 above, the executive secretaries of the regional commissions, within their mandates, should consider the promotion and co-ordination within their respective regions of all activities regarding the integration and participation of youth in development.

6. The regional commissions should consider the possibility of organizing regional workshops on questions relating to youth.

7. The regional commissions should, with the assistance of regional liaison officers, strengthen their co-operation with youth organizations.

C. International

8. The Administrative Committee on Co-ordination should continue arrangements for the promotion and co-ordination of activities in the field of youth and the integration of those activities into the overall programmes of social and economic development. This could be done by, inter alia, regularly including the item concerning youth in its agenda or convening ad hoc inter-agency meetings on youth, or both.

9. The practice of providing internships for youth should be expanded in order to give a broad section of young people from all regions of the world the opportunity of being acquainted with the United Nations and thereby learning of its activities. Those internships should not be confined to United Nations Headquarters.

10. The Joint United Nations Information Committee should take into account the views of youth organizations representative of all regions of the world on all phases of production of United Nations publications of interest to youth and ensure the broadest possible circulation of such publications.

11. The Secretary-General should continue to strengthen and promote the relationship with, and assistance to, the Geneva informal meetings of international non-governmental youth organizations as an important channel of communication between the United Nations and youth and youth organizations.

Physical education and sports exchanges

The contribution of physical education and sports to human development and international understanding, as well as the relevant activities of Member States and UNESCO, were discussed in the Secretary-General's report of 9 September 1981 to the General Assembly,<sup>(1)</sup> submitted in accordance with a 1978 Assembly resolution.<sup>(2)</sup> The Secretary-General recommended that Member States be encouraged to develop physical education and sports activities to reach all sectors of society, especially the out-of-school youth and the rural population, and to promote indigenous forms of sport or adapt other forms through the use of local materials.

Taking note of the report, the Assembly, on 9 November, invited Member States to develop sports activities and physical education within the context of continuing education, and recommended the promotion of indigenous forms of sport as well as reduction of cost and infrastructure requirements so as to make sports accessible to all.<sup>(3)</sup>

The resolution was adopted unanimously, following its approval by the Third Committee on 23 October in like manner. Introducing the text on behalf of 17 nations, Argentina asserted that one of the aims of the draft was to foster indigenous forms of sports with a view to preserving the cultural identity of countries.

During the Committee debate, several speakers, among them the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Nepal, the USSR and Venezuela, stressed the importance of physical education of youth and of sports contacts among young people. The Ukrainian SSR expressed regret that the Secretary-General's report did not mention any examples of sports exchanges, not even the 1980 Olympic Games in Moscow. Denmark was pleased that the International Youth Year (see below) would provide an opportunity to promote physical education and sports exchanges and that the Secretary-General gave priority to programmes designed to implement a policy of sports for all. Particular interest in sports activities during the International Youth Year was also expressed by Honduras.

Physical education and sports exchanges among young people
The General Assembly,

Recalling the Declaration on the Promotion among Youth of the Ideals of Peace, Mutual Respect and Understanding between Peoples, proclaimed in its resolution 2037(XX) of 7 December 1965,

Recalling also its resolution 33/8 of 3 November 1978, in which it requested the Secretary-General to submit to it at its thirty-sixth session a report on the activities undertaken by Member States, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, regional organization and other interested organizations and programmes of the United Nations system in the field of physical education and sports, particularly among young people,

Taking into account the activities carried out by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization with a view to promoting physical education and sports in school curricula and their importance in furthering universal understanding and friendship,

Convinced of the importance of physical education and sports exchanges in promoting peace, mutual understanding, co-operation and the development of friendly relations among peoples,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General submitted pursuant to General Assembly resolution 33/8;

2. Takes note also of the replies of Member States to the request addressed by the Secretary-General in accordance with resolution 33/8;

3. Invites Member States to develop sports activities and physical education within the context of continuing education and, in particular, to give priority to programmes developed in the framework of a "sports for all" policy so as to reach all sectors of the population, especially young people who are not in school and the rural population;

4. Recommends that, in preparing programmes, special attention should be given to the promotion of indigenous forms of sport and physical training as well as to the adaptation of other forms of sport, especially through the use of local materials, and to the reduction of their cost and infrastructure requirements, so as to enable the largest possible number of persons to participate in these sports.

Preparations for the International Youth Year (1985)

Considering it necessary to disseminate among youth the ideals of peace, respect for human rights (p. 972) and dedication to the objectives of progress and development, the General Assembly endorsed in 1981 the Specific Programme of Measures and Activities for the International Youth Year (1985): Participation, Development, Peace.<sup>(4)</sup>

The Programme was prepared by the 24-member Advisory Committee for the International Youth Year at its first session, held at Vienna, Austria, from 30 March to 7 April.<sup>(3)</sup> Aimed at promoting policies relating to youth as an integral part of social and economic development (p. 1014), the Programme laid out the basic approach to the implementation of the objectives of the Year; established a timetable and guidelines for national, regional and international action; and discussed the role of non-governmental youth organizations. The Advisory Committee also made a proposal regarding the convening of its next session and took note of a list of regional and international meetings on youth, transmitted by the Secretariat.

Preparations for the Year were also discussed at an ad hoc inter-agency meeting, held at Vienna on 26 and 27 March,<sup>(2)</sup> where representatives of United Nations agencies and departments agreed that objectives and programme priorities of their activities should respond to the recommendations of the Advisory Committee. The meeting also proposed convening an inter-agency technical working group for effective co-ordination of activities and the establishment of a voluntary fund for the promotion of the Year.

By its resolution endorsing the Programme, adopted without vote on 13 November, the Assembly requested the Secretary-General to transmit the Programme to all concerned to ensure its early implementation, and to convene the second session of the Advisory Committee during the latter half of 1982. It also reiterated its appeals for timely and generous voluntary contributions to supplement funds provided for the Programme under the regular United Nations budget.

The Assembly's Third Committee approved the text without vote on 23 October. Australia suggested that, in connection with the Programme, the Advisory Committee might be asked to consider the celebration of a day on which the youth of the entire world would symbolically plant trees.

Explaining its position in the Assembly, the United States said it had joined in the consensus on the understanding that the Secretary-General would take all steps necessary to absorb the cost of the Year's activities within available resources; the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee, however, had advised that the adoption of the resolution would make additional funds necessary. On those grounds, the United States would have abstained had there been a vote, in spite of its general support for the goals of the Year. Concern that every effort be made to reduce costs was voiced by Canada.

In the Third Committee, the USSR declared that it had agreed to the approval of the draft on the understanding that no additional regular-budget funds would be required.

Introducing the text on behalf of 82 countries, Romania stated that it reflected the importance of young people's direct participation in shaping the future and of their role in solving the major problems of the world; while all the specialized agencies were invited to exert the necessary efforts, UNESCO, being particularly concerned with the problems of young people and because of its experience and knowledge, could make an essential contribution to the preparation and celebration of the Year. The sponsors stressed the need to make the best possible use of existing resources to cover the expenditures related to the Programme for the Year.

The majority of speakers in the Committee, among them Afghanistan, the Bahamas, Bangladesh, Barbados, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Indonesia, Ireland, Jamaica, Japan, Kenya, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mauritania, Mongolia, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, the Niger, Norway, Qatar, Sri Lanka, the Syrian Arab Republic, Trinidad and Tobago, Uganda, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR, the Upper Volta, Uruguay and Venezuela, reaffirmed their support for the Year. The Programme for the Year was endorsed by many countries, including Bangladesh, Barbados, the Byelorussian SSR, Chile, Hungary, Indonesia, Jamaica, Madagascar, Malaysia, Mauritania, Mongolia, Nepal, the Netherlands, Norway, Pakistan, Romania, Sierra Leone, Sri Lanka, Suriname, the Syrian Arab Republic, Uganda and Zambia. The USSR felt the Programme was on the whole useful, but needlessly exaggerated the role of the Secretariat's Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs.

Democratic Yemen, Japan and the Ukrainian SSR thought the Programme should be continuously reviewed and revised in the light of Member States' experience. New Zealand felt that States should not be expected to endorse the Programme before having had an opportunity to examine it carefully and before specific measures were undertaken as part of the preparations for the Year. Uganda expressed support for the elaboration of specific programmes for rural and urban youth and young women, but cautioned that such programmes should not result in offering unequal opportunities for certain groups.

Several speakers, such as the Bahamas, Chile, Denmark, Fiji, Finland, India, Indonesia, Jamaica, Nepal, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Rwanda and the Ukrainian SSR, agreed with the Advisory Committee that the major thrust of the activities for the Year should be at the national and local levels, with international activities being primarily supportive. Barbados, however, considered regional activities more important than national ones, particularly in the Caribbean. Nepal said the establishment of national committees should follow the formation of a regional committee, which should meet as soon as possible to find ways of assisting Programme implementation. Sri Lanka felt that regional meetings could play a catalytic role in creating an increased awareness of the objectives of the Year. The Congo believed that the success of the Year depended to a large extent on regional organizations and called for an international conference. Zambia said the solution to youth problems, which were similar in many parts of the world, required international co-operation and should not be left to Governments alone.

The United Kingdom suggested that, in so far as possible, young people should determine the theme and activities of the Year through voluntary and non-governmental organizations, thus ensuring that the Year did not become excessively politicized. Finland said young people should participate in the preparation and activities of the Year, and Sierra Leone said youth themselves should decide on the plans of action for the Year. Greece said it would concentrate on the participation of youth in the formulation and execution of decisions, and the Federal Republic of Germany stressed the need for their involvement in policy-making and Programme implementation to ensure that the Year had a lasting impact.

As part of the activities of the Year, Afghanistan and Democratic Yemen favoured the idea of a charter of rights and duties of youth. Japan and the Netherlands opposed its elaboration; New Zealand considered preparation of an international instrument unnecessary.

By a note verbale of 12 October, Romania informed the Secretary-General of the establishment on 19 September of a Romanian National Committee for the International Youth Year.<sup>(1)</sup>

International Youth Year: Participation, Development, Peace
The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 34/151 of 17 December 1979 and 35/126 of 11 December 1980, by which it decided to designate and observe 1985 as International Youth Year: Participation, Development, Peace,

Recalling a/so its decision 35/318 of 11 December 1980 on the appointment of the members of the Advisory Committee for the International Youth Year,

Recognizing the profound importance of the direct participation of youth in shaping the future of mankind and the valuable contribution that youth can make in the implementation of the new international economic order based on equity and justice.

Considering it necessary to disseminate among youth the ideals of peace, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, human solidarity and dedication to the objectives of progress and development,

Convinced of the imperative need to harness the energies, enthusiasms and creative abilities of youth to the tasks of nation-building, the struggle for self-determination and national independence, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, and against foreign domination and occupation, for the economic, social and cultural advancement of peoples, the implementation of the new international economic order, the preservation of world peace and the promotion of international co-operation and understanding,

Emphasizing again that the United Nations should give more attention to the role of young people in the world of today and to their demands for the world of tomorrow,

Recalling the topicality of assessing the needs and aspirations of youth, and reaffirming the importance of current and projected United Nations activities designed to increase the opportunities for youth and for its active participation in national development activities,

Believing that it is urgently desirable to consolidate the efforts of all States in carrying out specific programmes concerning youth and to improve the activities of the United Nations and the specialized agencies in the field of youth, including youth exchanges in the cultural, sporting and other fields,

Reaffirming the necessity for better co-ordination of efforts in dealing with specific problems confronting young people and in examining the manner in which those problems are being treated by the specialized agencies and by various United Nations bodies.

Convinced that the preparation and observance in 1985 of the International Youth Year under the motto "Participation, Development, Peace" will offer a useful and significant opportunity for drawing attention to the situation and specific needs and aspirations of youth, for increasing co-operation at all levels in dealing with youth issues, for undertaking concerted action programmes in favour of youth and for involving young people in the study and resolution of major national, regional and international problems,

Confident that the International Youth Year will serve to mobilize efforts at the local, national, regional and international levels in order to promote the best educational, professional and living conditions for young people, to ensure their active participation in the overall development of society and to encourage the preparation of new national and local policies and programmes in accordance with each country's experience, conditions and priorities,

Recognizing that the preparation and observance of the International Youth Year will contribute to the reaffirmation of the goals of the new international economic order and to the implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Recalling a/so in this connection its decision 35/424 of 5 December 1980 and Economic and Social Council resolution 1980/67 of 25 July 1980 on the question of guidelines for international years and anniversaries,

Aware that, for the International Youth Year to be successful and to maximize its impact and practical efficiency, adequate preparation and the widespread support of Governments, all specialized agencies, international intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and the public will be required,

Noting with great satisfaction the interest of Member States, various United Nations bodies and specialized agencies, as well as youth organizations, in the decision to designate and observe 1985 as International Youth Year: Participation, Development, Peace,

Taking note of the report of the Advisory Committee for the International Youth Year on its first session, held at Vienna from 30 March to 7 April 1981,

1. Endorses the Specific Programme of Measures and Activities to be undertaken prior to and during the International Youth Year, as adopted by the Advisory Committee for the International Youth Year and contained in the report of the Secretary-General, bearing in mind that continued review and revision of the Programme should be carried out in the coming years;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit the Specific Programme of Measures and Activities to all States, United Nations bodies, specialized agencies and regional commissions as well as to the international intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations concerned with a view to its early implementation;

3. Invites all States, all United Nations bodies, specialized agencies, regional commissions and the international intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations concerned, as well as youth organizations, to exert all possible efforts for the implementation of the Specific Programme of Measures and Activities, in accordance with their experience, conditions and priorities;

4. Stresses the importance of active and direct participation of youth organizations in the activities organized at the local, national, regional and international levels for the preparation and observance of the International Youth Year;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to take the necessary measures to ensure the proper co-ordination of the implementation and follow-up of the Specific Programme of Measures and Activities, including the provision of information;

6. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with Governments of Member States, specialized agencies and all the international bodies and organizations concerned, to prepare for submission to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session, through the Advisory Committee, a progress report on the implementation of the Specific Programme of Measures and Activities;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to convene the second session of the Advisory Committee during the second half of 1982, prior to the thirty-seventh session of the General Assembly, to provide it with all necessary assistance and to submit to it a progress report on the implementation of the Specific Programme of Measures and Activities;

8. Invites the Advisory Committee to pay particular attention to the implementation of the Specific Programme of Measures and Activities and, to this end, to submit adequate recommendations to the General Assembly;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to take concrete measures, through all the communications media at his disposal, to give widespread publicity to the activities of the United Nations system in the field of youth and to increase the dissemination of information on youth;

10. Further requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary measures in order to enable the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat to perform its tasks and responsibilities for the adequate preparation and observance of the international Youth Year;

11. Again appeals to all States, to international governmental and non-governmental organizations and to the public to make in due time generous voluntary contributions to supplement funds provided under the regular budget of the United Nations for the costs of the Specific Programme of Measures and Activities and requests the Secretary-General to take all appropriate measures for obtaining such voluntary contributions;

12. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-seventh session the item entitled "International Youth Year: Participation, Development, Peace" and to grant it high priority.

Aging persons

Social welfare of aging persons

By a resolution of 9 November 1981 relating to the elderly and the aged,<sup>(2)</sup> adopted without vote, the General Assembly recommended that Governments continue to give attention to the question of aging, particularly in the formulation of national development policies and programmes in accordance with their national priorities. It invited Member States to consider designating a 'Day for the Aging', appealed to them to make voluntary contributions to the United Nations Trust Fund for the World Assembly on Aging (p. 1024), and invited the United Nations Fund for Population Activities (UNFPA) to continue providing financial support, particularly for the implementation of the plan of action that would result from the 1982 World Assembly.

The Assembly requested the Secretary-General to use the Trust Fund to encourage further interest in the field of aging among developing countries, to report in 1982 on the status of the Fund and on Fund-financed project activities, and to strengthen activities such as monitoring and researching the implications of aging populations.

The 32-nation draft was introduced in the Third Committee by Malta, which orally revised it to have the Assembly: invite, rather than call upon, UNFPA to continue providing financial support; and request the Secretary-General to use the Trust Fund to encourage further interest in the field of aging among developing countries, rather than to meet their needs. The Committee approved the text, as revised, on 26 October without vote.

Speaking in the Committee, Greece stressed the importance of viewing the situation of the aged as a new category of human rights and endorsed the distinction made by France between the aged, who were dependent on others, and the elderly, who could contribute to society. In Kenya's view, action to solve the problems of the aged should reflect the needs of the particular regions and societies. The creation of a fund to improve the condition of the elderly was considered important by the Dominican Republic; the organization entrusted with administering that fund could protect their rights by promoting the adoption of special legislation and by providing economic and technical assistance to developing countries.

In preparation for the World Assembly, a Panel of Experts on Aging met at Vienna from 9 to 13 November, with the participation of 15 international experts as well as representatives of the International Labour Organisation, the World Health Organization (WHO), the United Nations Population Division and the European Centre for Social Welfare, Training and Research.<sup>(1)</sup> The Panel declared that aging, an achievement of the twentieth century, should be transformed into a social asset by restructuring existing social institutions and services as well as national policies, which originally evolved in response to a very different age pyramid. The Panel maintained that the issues of aging should be discussed broadly rather than within the narrow framework of charitable or welfare dimensions, and that the prevailing myths and stereotypes about old age needed to be dispelled and replaced by the positive aspects of an aging society. Research was needed to understand better the phenomenon and problems of aging and to anticipate population trends so as to assist Governments in designing their development and population policies.

Question of the elderly and the aged

The General Assembly,

Recalling Its resolution 34/153 of 17 December 1979 on the question of the elderly and the aged,

Recalling also its resolution 33/52 of 14 December 1978, In which It decided to convene a World Assembly on Aging in 1982 to launch an international programme of action on aging.

Considering that the international programme of action on aging should respond to the socio-economic implications of the aging of populations and to the specific needs of older persons, and should pay due regard to the special situation of developing countries, In particular of the least developed countries.

Convinced that the objectives of an international plan of action on aging must be adapted to the alms of the new international economic order and the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Noting with satisfaction the preparatory work for the World Assembly on Aging, and the leading role being played by the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat In the work of the United Nations In the field of aging.

Aware of the need for the continuing role of the Commission for Social Development and other appropriate United Nations bodies in the monitoring and evaluation of the international plan of action that would result from the World Assembly on Aging.

Appreciating the efforts of the specialized agencies and regional commissions and of the non-governmental organizations concerned In the promotion of awareness of the situation of the aging.

Recognizing the important role of the United Nations Fund for Population Activities In furthering solutions to the problems of the elderly and the aged,

Noting that a United Nations Trust Fund for the World Assembly on Aging has been established by the Secretary-General In pursuance of General Assembly resolution 35/129 of 11 December 1980,

Taking note with appreciation of the progress report of the Secretary-General on the question of the elderly and the aged.

1. Recommends that Governments should continue to give attention to the question of aging, particularly In the formulation of national development policies and programmes in accordance with their national priorities;

2. Invites Member States to consider designating In their respective countries a "Day for the Aging" devoted to activities by, and on behalf of, the elderly and the aged and to report their views and comments to the Secretary-General;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session the views and comments received from Member States pursuant to the invitation contained in paragraph 2 above;

4. Appeals to Member States to make voluntary contributions to the United Nations Trust Fund for the World Assembly on Aging;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to use the Trust Fund to encourage further interest In the field of aging among developing countries, particularly the least developed among them, within the context of the World Assembly on Aging;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session on the status of the Trust Fund and to include In his report an account of project activities financed by the Fund;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to strengthen, within the limits of existing resources and voluntary contributions, activities in the field of aging In co-operation with the organizations concerned, and In particular:

(a) To assist Governments, at their request, In the formulation and implementation of policies and programmes for the elderly;

(b) To continue to monitor and research the implications of aging populations, especially in developing countries;

(c) To promote technical co-operation among developing countries In the exchange of information and technology In this field;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at Its thirty-seventh session on the Implementation of paragraph 7 above and also to report any views received from Member States on the problems of the elderly and the aged;

9. Invites the United Nations Fund for Population Activities to continue to provide financial support In the field of aging, particularly for the implementation of the plan of action that would result from the World Assembly on Aging;

10. Decides to include In the provisional agenda of its thirty-seventh session the Item entitled "Question of the elderly and the aged".

UN activities

In accordance with a 1979 General Assembly resolution,<sup>(3)</sup> the Secretary-General, in a report of 13 January 1981 on national and international activities relating to the question of the elderly and the aged,<sup>(2)</sup> informed the Economic and Social Council and the Assembly that United Nations specialized agencies and regional commissions carried out their activities in co-operation with the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs (CSDHA), designated as the office responsible for the 1982 World Assembly on Aging (p. 1024). International non-governmental organizations (NGOs), including the two United Nations NGO Committees on Aging in New York and Vienna, actively campaigned for the cause of the elderly and for the World Assembly.

The report indicated that CSDHA was conducting two studies during 1980-1981, one assessing the situation of the elderly from the perspective of current aging population trends and the other identifying regional variations in the conditions and needs of the aging. In addition, CSDHA was expected to be involved in the implementation of an international plan of action, anticipated to emerge from the World Assembly.

The second Ad Hoc Inter-agency Meeting on Aging, held at Vienna from 27 to 29 April 1981, reviewed the preparatory activities of the United Nations system for the World Assembly, including the status of documentation being prepared by the specialized agencies.<sup>(1)</sup>

Speaking in the General Assembly's Third Committee, Uganda said new international programmes should focus on the welfare of the elderly and the aged world-wide and, in the case of the developing countries, should emphasize the provision of such necessities as agricultural equipment, building materials and adequate water supplies. In the framework of the preparation of an international action plan for the World Assembly, Romania proposed to create under the auspices of WHO regional training centres for personnel specializing in gerontology and geriatrics and to encourage in-depth studies on demographic trends.

Expressing hope for increased UNFPA commitment to activities for the elderly, Malta said the United Nations programme on aging assumed a vital role in view of the potential impact, on the developing countries, of the prospect that the aging would comprise nearly 10 per cent of the world population by the year 2000. Chile considered it important that programmes for the elderly be institutionalized within the United Nations, and the Byelorussian SSR called for a wider exchange of information on the problems of the elderly.

Preparations for the 1982 World Assembly on Aging

The official preparatory work for the 1982 World Assembly on Aging commenced on 1 January 1981, amid a wide range of related activities already under way throughout the world. The decision to convene the conference had been taken by the General Assembly in 1978.<sup>(9)</sup>

In his January 1981 report on questions of the elderly and the aged (p. 1023), the Secretary-General informed the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly that several Member States had convened national or regional meetings or were considering establishing national committees on aging, as suggested in his 1980 draft programme for the World Assembly.<sup>(5)</sup> From 19 to 23 October 1981, one of the four regional meetings on aging in the developing world, organized in preparation for the World Assembly with UNFPA assistance, took place at Manila, Philippines.<sup>(7)</sup> A draft international plan of action on aging, prepared by CSDHA, was revised and approved in April by the Ad Hoc Inter-agency Meeting on Aging.

The Economic and Social Council called in May for the full participation of Member States, United Nations agencies, regional commissions and NGOs in preparations for the World Assembly.

On the recommendation of the Advisory Committee for the World Assembly, which held its first session in August, the General Assembly, in November, accepted an offer by Austria to host the conference. Also in November, the Panel of Experts on Aging (p. 1022) suggested that World Assembly participants be given a package of documents dealing with demographic considerations, developmental aspects of aging and humanitarian issues.<sup>(4)</sup>

As at 31 December 1981, the United Nations Trust Fund for the World Assembly on Aging, established in response to a December 1980 General Assembly request,<sup>(11)</sup> had received contributions of $5,000 each from Norway and Sweden, and $361,000 from the United States.

INTER-AGENCY MEETING. The second Ad Hoc Inter-agency Meeting on Aging, held at Vienna from 27 to 29 April 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> endorsed the draft outline of an international plan of action prepared by CSDHA for the consideration of the Advisory Committee for the World Assembly, and agreed that CSDHA should prepare a draft declaration on the rights of the aging, to serve as an instrument for developing appropriate policies and programmes.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. By a resolution adopted without vote on 6 May,<sup>(8)</sup> the Economic and Social Council called on Member States, United Nations bodies and NGOs to participate fully in the World Assembly and in its preparatory work, and appealed to Member States to consider contributing to the Fund for the World Assembly. The Council requested the Secretary-General to convene two sessions in 1981 of the Advisory Committee for the World Assembly and to report to the General Assembly in 1983 on actions to implement the recommendations adopted at the conference.

Based on a draft approved by the Commission for Social Development on 17 February 1981, the text was orally amended in the Council's Second (Social) Committee by the USSR to omit a request that the decisions of the World Assembly be taken into account in planning the United Nations programme budget for 1982-1983. The Committee approved the text without vote on 29 April.

WORK OF THE ADVISORY COMMITTEE. The Advisory Committee for the World Assembly, at its first session held at Vienna from 17 to 21 August, recommended that the General Assembly accept Austria's offer to host the conference, which was conveyed by a letter of 6 May to the Secretary-General, who transmitted it to the Assembly in July.<sup>(2)</sup> Austria expressed the belief that holding the conference at Vienna would facilitate the preparatory work, as the relevant Secretariat units were based there.

The Advisory Committee also recommended that the General Assembly schedule two days of pre-conference organizational meetings, approve the holding of three simultaneous meetings throughout the World Assembly and allow for two additional Advisory Committee sessions in 1982. In addition to examining the draft international plan of action on aging, the Committee agreed that the provisional agenda for the World Assembly needed further consideration and that the desirability of a draft declaration on the rights of the aging should be discussed at a later session, when a preliminary draft of such a document was submitted by the Secretariat.

Transmitting the report of the Advisory Committee to the General Assembly, the Secretary-General, in a report of 8 October,<sup>(6)</sup> stated that 14 Member States had established national committees or similar bodies for the World Assembly, that preparations were under way for the convening of regional intergovernmental meetings, and that international NGOs had decided to hold a World Forum at Vienna from 29 March to 2 April 1982 under the theme "The Social and Economic Integration and Participation of the Aging".

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. Welcoming the Austrian offer, the General Assembly, acting without vote on 13 November 1981,<sup>(13)</sup> decided that the World Assembly would be held at Vienna from 26 July to 6 August 1982. To the extent of the availability of funds, the Assembly authorized the convening of two days of pre-conference organizational meetings at Vienna, approved the holding of three simultaneous meetings for the duration of the conference and requested the Secretary-General to convene at Vienna two sessions of the Advisory Committee, in February and May 1982, to finalize preparations and documentation. The General Assembly called for generous contributions to the Fund for the World Assembly and invited UNFPA to continue providing financial support to the conference preparatory work.

An appeal for contributions to the Fund was also made in an Assembly resolution of 9 November, as was a request to the Secretary-General to use the Fund to encourage further interest in the field of aging among developing countries, within the context of the World Assembly.<sup>(12)</sup>

Introducing the draft resolution on the conference in the Assembly's Third Committee also on behalf of Austria, the Dominican Republic, France, Japan, Malta and Nicaragua, the United States said international co-operation was needed in the search for solutions to the problems of the aging. The text was orally revised by the United States to have the financial conditions also apply to the holding of pre-conference meetings. The Committee approved the draft, as revised, on 26 October without vote.

Explaining its position in the Committee, the USSR said it had agreed to the approval of the text on the understanding that no additional regular-budget funds would be required for its implementation.

Another draft, circulated by France and subsequently withdrawn, would have had the General Assembly emphasize the need to distinguish between elderly people living in a state of dependence and those capable of making a contribution to the community, and have the World Assembly highlight that contribution.<sup>(1)</sup>

Support for the holding of the World Assembly was reaffirmed by the majority of speakers in the Third Committee, among them the Byelorussian SSR, Israel, Japan, Kenya, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malaysia, Nepal, Pakistan, Romania, Suriname, Uganda, the USSR, the United Kingdom and Uruguay.

A number of countries, including Japan, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malta, Mauritania, Nepal and Papua New Guinea, expressed approval of the preparations for the World Assembly by the Advisory Committee and of the proposed draft plan of action.

Many States, such as Hungary, Japan, Liberia, Nepal, New Zealand, Sierra Leone, the USSR and the United Kingdom, felt the main stress should be put on national activities. The United States urged Member States to promote private and public activities on a national level.

Papua New Guinea, on the other hand, believed that international efforts were required in order to arrive at appropriate solutions. In Chile's view, the holding of regional meetings was one of the best ways to prepare for the World Assembly, and Nepal emphasized the role of the regional commissions and international NGOs in the preparations.

The Syrian Arab Republic hoped that the plan of action would cover all the requirements of aging persons, while taking into consideration their capacities. Suriname said the plan's objectives should be geared to those of the new international economic order and the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade.<sup>(10)</sup> Romania felt the plan should offer the elderly and the aged a chance to contribute to national development, while the Byelorussian SSR and Hungary believed it should reflect the need for strengthening international peace and security. The United States said Member States must be urged to contribute practical proposals for the plan of action. New Zealand expressed the hope that the skills of NGOs would be utilized in the formulation and implementation of the plan.

France, Hungary, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and others supported the Advisory Committee's proposal that the World Assembly should emphasize the humanitarian and developmental aspects of policies for aging persons. Romania and the USSR considered it one of the basic tasks of the World Assembly to provide for an exchange of information and experience, and France thought the conference should make it possible to ensure the use, for the benefit of all, of the untapped source of wealth which women constituted.

The United States expressed concern that plans for the World Assembly were behind schedule and that only one of the two preparatory sessions planned for 1981 had been held. The holding of two further Advisory Committee sessions was also supported by others, such as Hungary and New Zealand.

The establishment of the Fund for the World Assembly was welcomed by several countries, including Malta, which cautioned that its finances should be managed carefully, particularly at the preparatory stage. Nepal and others appealed for contributions to the Fund.

The Byelorussian SSR said the World Assembly and its related activities should not have additional financial or administrative implications for the United Nations regular budget.

Chapter XXI

Refugees

Continued preoccupation with the plight of the growing world-wide population of refugees and displaced persons was reflected in a number of actions taken by major United Nations organs in 1981, requesting the international community and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) to provide both immediate and long-term assistance.

In 1981, UNHCR received the Nobel Peace Prize for the second time, and the accompanying cash award helped establish a Trust Fund for Handicapped Refugees. Other UNHCR contributions to the 1981 International Year of Disabled Persons (p. 795) included an August appeal to a number of countries to accept a large number of disabled refugees.

Total UNHCR programme expenditures in over 60 countries dropped from the 1980 level of almost $500 million to $474 million in 1981. More than one fifth of this amount was used to provide basic needs to over 2 million Afghan refugees in Pakistan. International attention focused on the situation of refugees in Africa, estimated to number some 5 million, when the ministerial-level International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa (ICARA)

(Geneva, 9 and 10 April) drew pledges of contributions in cash and kind amounting to some $567 million (p. 1039).

In South-East Asia, over 230,000 Indo-Chinese refugees still awaited a durable solution despite the overall caseload reduction due to massive resettlement. Refugees in Latin America numbered 280,000, and the tense and volatile refugee situation in Central America called for increased UNHCR presence and action. Europe had an estimated refugee population of 589,200 at year's end. In addition to its ongoing humanitarian activities, UNHCR assisted a number of countries in Africa and in South-East Asia in their programmes of voluntary repatriation or departure.

The activities of UNHCR from 1 April 1980 to 31 March 1981<sup>(1)</sup> and in the remainder of 1982<sup>(2)</sup> were described in annual reports of the High Commissioner to the General Assembly.

At its October session, the Executive Committee of the High Commissioner's Programme<sup>(3)</sup> expressed concern over the increasing number of refugees in northern Latin America, Pakistan, Iran, Angola and Zaire; noted with approval the High Commissioner's regional approach in the Horn of Africa and the Sudan; reaffirmed the importance of international protection and non-refoulement; called for burden-sharing; and urged Governments to seek removal of the root causes of large-scale movements (p. 1050).

In one of a series of December resolutions, the General Assembly urged UNHCR to provide humanitarian assistance to the vastly increased numbers of refugees, and called on the international community to share the burden of assisting refugees and displaced persons, taking into account the economic and demographic absorptive capacity of the countries concerned.<sup>(8)</sup>

Noting with concern the continuing massive flows of refugees (p. 965) and their implications for international peace and security, the Assembly established a 17-member Group of Governmental Experts on International Co-operation to Avert New Flows of Refugees to undertake a comprehensive review of the problem, with a view to developing recommendations and reporting to the Assembly in 1982.<sup>(9)</sup>

In four resolutions, the Assembly called for continued international and UNHCR assistance to meet the needs of refugees or displaced persons in Djibouti,<sup>(11)</sup> Ethiopia,<sup>(13)</sup> Somalia<sup>(10)</sup> and in the Sudan.<sup>(12)</sup> In May, the Economic and Social Council called for international assistance to Djibouti,<sup>(4)</sup> Ethiopia<sup>(6)</sup> and Somalia<sup>(5)</sup>.

The Assembly invited the three ICARA sponsors to ensure that the funds pledged at the Conference were channelled to priority projects, and requested the Secretary-General to keep the African refugee situation under close scrutiny so as to facilitate Assembly consideration of the need to convene a follow-up conference in 1983.<sup>(7)</sup>

On the proposed programme budget for 1982-1983, the Assembly requested the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the High Commissioner, to complete the current joint review of the financing of UNHCR administrative costs with a view to establishing a proper basis for their financing.<sup>(14)</sup>

UN High Commissioner for Refugees

UNHCR activities

In 1981, UNHCR saw a relentless progression in the magnitude and complexity of the refugee problem, which required intensive and sustained efforts to provide for both immediate needs and long-term solutions.<sup>(*)</sup>

Of some $474 million spent during the year on refugee assistance in over 60 countries, <sup>(2)</sup>$109.5 million went towards provision of basic needs to over 2 million Afghan refugees in Pakistan. UNHCR assisted a number of countries in Africa and in South-East Asia in their programmes of voluntary repatriation or departure, in addition to its ongoing humanitarian assistance activities. In South-East Asia, over 230,000 Indo-Chinese refugees still awaited a durable solution, despite the departure of 120,000 persons primarily to North America and Europe, which raised the total resettlement figure since 1977 to over 700,000. In Central America, the refugee situation remained tense and volatile, requiring increased UNHCR presence and action. New outflows of refugees in Europe called for UNHCR involvement on that continent on a slightly larger scale than usual, and the High Commissioner continued to act as Co-ordinator of United Nations Humanitarian Assistance for Cyprus (p. 1033).

As part of its contribution to the International Year of Disabled Persons (p. 795), UNHCR took steps to identify physically and mentally disabled refugees on a systematic basis, and launched in August a special appeal to a number of countries to give particular consideration to accepting a large number of disabled refugees.

The efforts of UNHCR were recognized by its receipt in December of the Nobel Peace Prize for the second time in history, and the 1 million Swedish kronor ($184,162) attached to the Prize was used to establish a Trust Fund for Handicapped Refugees.

Introducing his annual report in the General Assembly's Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee on 16 November, High Commissioner Poul Hartling said refugee protection continued to demand a sustained and alert response at all times. He reported achievement of durable solutions and stressed that, while the international community must continue to give priority to the root causes of the refugee problem, it should do so in the appropriate forums, leaving the humanitarian character of UNHCR unscathed. In addition to co-sponsoring ICARA (p. 1039), other accomplishments of UNHCR during the year included a consultation meeting (Geneva, 20-22 May) with 130 non-governmental organizations to enhance co-operation; completion of a provisional version of a Handbook for Emergencies, designed to improve the UNHCR emergency capacity by ensuring the use of experience gained in crises; and introduction of a project management system for project planning, financial monitoring and programme evaluation.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE ACTION. At its 1981 (thirty-second) session, held at Geneva from 12 to 21 October, the Executive Committee of the High Commissioner's Programme<sup>(3)</sup> adopted a series of decisions. Among them, it expressed concern over the increasing number of refugees in northern Latin America, Pakistan, Iran, Angola and Zaire; noted with approval the High Commissioner's regional approach in the Horn of Africa and the Sudan in dealing with the refugee problems in that area; and urged him to continue providing urgent humanitarian assistance to those refugees. It also urged the international community to continue its support to UNHCR assistance programmes, commended the High Commissioner for promoting the search for durable solutions, reaffirmed the purely humanitarian character of the High Commissioner's activities for the benefit of refugees and displaced persons of concern to UNHCR, and urged co-ordination of emergency humanitarian assistance activities among UNHCR and other United Nations bodies.

In addition to endorsing the recommendations of its Sub-Committee of the Whole on International Protection (p. 1054), the Executive Committee adopted a number of decisions concerning staffing, managerial, organizational and budgetary matters, and generally endorsed the High Commissioner's staffing proposals for 1981-1982 and his recommendations on strengthening the senior management level (p. 1038). These decisions were based on recommendations of the newly established Sub-Committee on Administrative and Financial Matters, whose terms of reference were fixed by the Committee in October.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. On 23 July 1981, the Economic and Social Council, on an oral proposal by its President, decided without vote to transmit, without debate, the

UNHCR annual report to the General Assembly at its thirty-sixth (1981) session.<sup>(5)</sup>

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution adopted without vote on 14 December,<sup>(4)</sup> the Assembly called on the international community to share the burden of assisting refugees and displaced persons, taking into account the economic and demographic absorptive capacity of the countries concerned; noted with concern the serious humanitarian problems resulting from armed attacks on refugee camps and settlements of concern to UNHCR; and urged Governments to join in greater international efforts for suppression of piracy on the high seas and to make generous contributions to UNHCR.

It urged the High Commissioner to provide humanitarian assistance to the vastly increased numbers of refugees in various regions, reaffirmed his leading responsibility in emergency refugee situations, commended him for his efforts on behalf of disabled refugees on the occasion of the International Year of Disabled Persons, urged him to explore arrangements to facilitate the disembarkation and resettlement of asylum seekers rescued at sea, and requested his continued participation in the ICARA follow-up.

The Assembly also took note of the High Commissioner's proposals on strengthening management and welcomed his intention to seek the assistance of the Secretariat's Administrative Management Service in undertaking a review of UNHCR managerial methods and organizational structure (p. 1038).

The Assembly's Third Committee had approved without vote on 24 November the 32-nation text, introduced by Norway. Before approval, the text was orally revised by the sponsors to add the phrase "taking into account the economic and demographic absorptive capacity of the host countries" in paragraph 3 on burden-sharing; Ethiopia further amended this phrase to replace "host countries" with "countries concerned". By other revisions, the Assembly urged Governments, in paragraph 6, "to join in greater international efforts in the suppression" of piracy on the high seas, rather than to co-operate in repression of piracy; and urged the High Commissioner, in paragraph 13, to explore arrangements to facilitate not only the disembarkation but also the "resettlement" of asylum seekers rescued at sea.

In the Committee's debate on the High Commissioner's report, a number of speakers estimated the world refugee population at between 10 and 12 million, and Finland said more than 10 million people were of UNHCR concern.

UNHCR efforts for humanitarian assistance were commended by many, among them Austria, China, Denmark, Djibouti, Ethiopia, Finland, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Japan, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Pakistan, Spain, Turkey and Viet Nam. Malaysia and the United States urged sustained international support of UNHCR activities, Zaire called for concerted global action, and Lebanon and Yugoslavia termed the refugee problem universal.

Yugoslavia commended as timely and useful the UNHCR contribution to the objectives of the United Nations Decade for Women (1976-1985) and the International Year of Disabled Persons (1981).

Belgium believed the High Commissioner should encourage States to help refugees acquire new nationalities, as had been done by the United Republic of Tanzania, and endeavour to persuade States which had made their accession to the 1951 Convention and the 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees (p. 1055) subject to reservations, to withdraw them progressively.

The idea of international responsibility and burden-sharing in refugee assistance was voiced by many, including Australia, Egypt, the Federal Republic of Germany and Japan; Canada, Denmark and France, in particular, called for greater and fairer burden-sharing. Argentina observed that entire regions were taking no part in the solution of the problem, and Chile regretted that some countries were not contributing adequately to UNHCR activities. For Pakistan, the nations that had refused to assist refugees by removing the root causes of the problems or through international humanitarian efforts had forfeited their right to talk of their commitment to the Charter of the United Nations.

While Italy expressed concern about the decrease in the UNHCR budget for 1981-1982, Pakistan urged the international community to provide the Office with adequate financial and material resources. Sierra Leone appealed to countries which tended to earmark their contributions to leave it up to the High Commissioner to decide on the funds' best use. France said it was important to provide the donor Governments with regular and detailed information on budgetary matters.

Many expressed support for the proposed review of managerial and operational methods of UNHCR, among them Australia, Canada, Denmark, the Sudan and Turkey. The Federal Republic of Germany, Ireland and New Zealand supported the High Commissioner's proposal to strengthen management. The Sudan considered the expansion of administrative capacity necessary and welcomed the staffing proposal. Lebanon supported the new recruitment policy for achieving the widest geographical representation. Canada and Denmark welcomed the establishment of the Sub-Committee on Administrative and Financial Matters (p. 1035), and Finland urged that body to concentrate on those matters and not depend solely on its 1981 operational experiences which, it said, were exceptional in many ways.

For France, what was needed to co-ordinate the humanitarian activities of the United Nations was not the creation of a new body but the establishment of flexible mechanisms at the international level and on the scene to deal with emergency situations.

Several speakers, including Argentina, the Central African Republic, Oman, Pakistan, Sierra Leone, Somalia and the United States, spoke of the burden borne by the asylum countries. China expressed sympathy and respect, and Ireland commended those countries.

In view of that burden, the Netherlands believed that material assistance to refugees should be integrated into the ongoing structural development programmes of the host countries. Agreeing with Lebanon that the UNHCR programme had expanded to cover not only emergency material relief but also quasi-developmental or socio-economic assistance components, Italy said that necessitated a programme examination and consideration of the possibility of entrusting to others within the United Nations system the task of seeking the most appropriate solutions. Ethiopia asserted that, while special consideration was sometimes necessary as regards the burden borne by some asylum countries, UNHCR should be critical in its approach so as not to perpetuate the problem; the growing tendency towards formulating approaches to assistance programmes for refugees on the basis of misplaced emphasis should be reversed, by obtaining accurate data through UNHCR machinery.

For Chad, it was the countries of origin that deserved assistance.

Liberia noted with interest that a working group of the Organization of African Unity and UNHCR, established in 1980, was conducting an examination of questions relating to the legal protection of refugees in Africa. Belgium, which saw a need for a proper international law on refugees, wondered whether giving the term "refugee" a broader meaning in Africa than in the rest of the world was a good legal practice and whether it might not be preferable for the concordance of the definitions of the term to be studied by a group of legal experts. Mexico asserted that the concepts applicable to persons seeking asylum, to refugees or to displaced persons were often confused or loosely used. For Australia, the search for lasting solutions must focus primarily on the problem of genuine refugees and not on those who might more accurately be described as migrants. Argentina considered it important to ensure that the aid provided did not become an incentive for people to leave their countries for purely economic reasons. Afghanistan and Viet Nam spoke of abuse and misuse of humanitarian aid given for refugees, and opposed aiding those who conducted political and subversive activities.

Denmark, Liberia and Sierra Leone considered that international assistance should be aimed at providing subsistence for the refugees and helping them achieve economic self-sufficiency.

Along with Belgium, which considered international protection of refugees as one of the essential tasks of the international community, New Zealand supported the High Commissioner's efforts to ensure refugees' physical safety; Chile and Denmark welcomed the decision to convene a working group to study the problems arising from the rescue, disembarkation and resettlement of "boat people".

The Federal Republic of Germany welcomed the close contacts between UNHCR and Member States as well as the improvement in the Executive Committee's consultative machinery, while Cyprus welcomed active UNHCR collaboration with other United Nations agencies and inter-governmental organizations. Noting the central co-ordinating role the High Commissioner played in emergency refugee situations, Australia urged others in the United Nations system to co-operate. Denmark was pleased with the close co-operation between UNHCR and other humanitarian organizations. Australia commended voluntary groups which provided humanitarian assistance.

While reaffirming the humanitarian and non-political mandate of UNHCR, many, including Australia, Canada, Egypt, Ethiopia, Greece, Malaysia, the Netherlands, New Zealand and Nigeria, stressed the need for the international community to explore the root causes of the refugee question (p. 1050). China also pointed to the need for humanitarian assistance as well as a political solution. Thailand considered it essential to continue seeking durable political solutions.

Voluntary repatriation was considered by Bangladesh as the most effective solution to the refugee problem, by Belgium as durable though not perfect, and by Zaire as ideal. Denmark noted the success of voluntary repatriation programmes, while Japan welcomed programmes of orderly departure and repatriation. Supporting voluntary repatriation as the best solution, New Zealand none the less recognized the principle of burden-sharing where that solution was not feasible. For Lebanon, permanent settlement and local integration of refugees were unacceptable measures that put the right of repatriation in jeopardy. Lebanon therefore had reservations regarding reference in the High Commissioner's report to local integration and resettlement possibilities, and provision of assistance to that end, for the refugees in that country.

Report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees
The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees on the activities of his Office, as well as the report of the Executive Committee of the Programme of the High Commissioner on the work of its thirty-second session, and having heard the High Commissioner's statement.

Recalling its resolutions 35/41 A and B and 35/42 of 25 November 1980,

Expressing deep concern at the persistence and gravity of the problems of refugees and displaced persons in the world, particularly in different parts of Africa, Asia, Latin America and Europe,

Noting with great appreciation the positive responses of Governments to the problems of refugees and displaced persons of concern to the Office of the High Commissioner through offers of asylum, voluntary repatriation, resettlement, rehabilitation and financial contributions, as well as the generous support given to the Office of the High Commissioner in its humanitarian task,

Reaffirming the eminently humanitarian and non-political character of the activity of the Office of the High Commissioner,

Extending its Congratulations to the Office of the High Commissioner for the award of the 1981 Nobel Peace Prize in recognition of its work for refugees,

Considering the continuing and urgent need for a substantial International effort to promote durable solutions to the problems of refugees and displaced persons of concern to the Office of the High Commissioner through voluntary repatriation or return and resettlement, drawing particular attention to women and children refugees, and disabled and elderly refugees,

Noting with satisfaction that a growing number of States have acceded to the 1951 Convention and the 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees,

Noting with great concern that, despite an increasingly broad understanding of the principles of international protection, refugees still encounter serious difficulties in many parts of the world in obtaining asylum and that they are exposed to the threat of refoulement, arbitrary detention and physical violence,

Deploring, in particular, the instances of military attacks on refugee camps in southern Africa and elsewhere and physical attacks on asylum seekers at sea,

Drawing attention, to the problem of refugees rescued at sea and the difficulties encountered for their disembarkation, involving threats of refoulement,

We/coming the success achieved by the International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa, held at Geneva on 9 and 10 April 1981, as a first step in arousing world-wide interest and support for refugees in Africa,

1. Commends the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and his staff for the manner in which they have continued to discharge their responsibilities for protecting and assisting refugees and displaced persons of concern to his Office;

2. Takes due note of the proposals made by the High Commissioner and generally endorsed by the Executive Committee of the Programme of the High Commissioner to strengthen the management of his Office on the basis of the principles and guidelines of the General Assembly, and welcomes his intention to seek the assistance of the Administrative Management Service of the Secretariat in undertaking expeditiously a review of the managerial methods and organizational structure of his Office, as recommended by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

3. Calls upon the international community to share the burden of assisting refugees and displaced persons the world over, taking into account the economic and demographic absorptive capacity of the countries concerned;

4. Reaffirms the fundamental nature of the High Commissioner's function to provide international protection to refugees and the importance of promoting durable and speedy solutions, in consultation and agreement with the countries concerned, through voluntary repatriation or return and subsequent assistance in rehabilitation and, whenever appropriate, integration in countries of asylum or resettlement in other countries of refugees and displaced persons of concern to the Office of the High Commissioner;

5. Urges Governments to intensify their support for activities which the High Commissioner is carrying out in accordance with his mandate and relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, especially by:

(a) Facilitating the High Commissioner's efforts in the field of international protection, in particular by scrupulously observing the principle of asylum and non-refoulement and by protecting asylum seekers in situations of large-scale influx, as endorsed by the Executive Committee of the Programme of the High Commissioner at its thirty-second session;

(b) Supporting his efforts to promote, in co-operation with Governments, United Nations bodies and non-governmental organizations, durable and speedy solutions to the problems of refugees and displaced persons of concern to the Office;

6. Urges Governments to join in greater international efforts in the suppression of piracy on the high seas, in accordance with their international obligations, and to take appropriate action to protect asylum seekers from acts of violence at sea;

7. Notes with great concern the serious humanitarian problems resulting from armed attacks on refugee camps and settlements which are the concern of the High Commissioner, and the need for special measures to protect and ensure the safety of such refugees;

8. We/comes the measures taken to implement the recommendations on the subject of assistance to women refugees and displaced women of concern to the High Commissioner in the Programme of Action for the Second Half of the United Nations Decade for Women, endorsed in General Assembly resolution 35/136 of 11 December 1960;

9. Commends the High Commissioner for his special efforts on behalf of disabled refugees on the occasion of the International Year of Disabled Persons;

10. Requests the High Commissioner to continue participating in the follow-up of the international Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa and urges the international community to maintain the momentum gained by the Conference in providing assistance to refugees in Africa commensurate with the growing number of African refugees;

11. Urges the High Commissioner to provide humanitarian assistance to meet the needs of the vastly increased numbers of refugees in various regions of Africa, Asia, Latin America and Europe;

12. Stresses the importance of maintaining the relief efforts and the resettlement momentum for boat and land cases in South-East Asia, including the Programme of Orderly Departure, and urges all Governments to provide opportunities for durable solutions to these refugees;

13. Urges the High Commissioner further to explore the elaboration of arrangements in order to facilitate the disembarkation and resettlement of asylum seekers rescued at sea;

14. Reaffirms the High Commissioner's leading responsibility in emergency situations regarding refugees and displaced persons of concern to his Office as well as his responsibility in the co-ordination of assistance in those situations and commends him for the considerable progress made in the elaboration of adequate procedures to meet emergency situations, in co-ordination with the relevant bodies of the United Nations system;

15. Requests the High Commissioner, while carrying out his responsibilities, to co-ordinate and co-operate closely with other organizations within and outside the United Nations system for greatest efficiency of relief in the case of major emergencies;

16. Urges all Governments in a position to do so to contribute generously in order to provide the High Commissioner with the necessary means to attain the objectives of his humanitarian programme.

Assistance to refugees

Africa. In 1981, African countries remained the haven for some 5 million refugees and displaced persons. In the Horn of Africa and the Sudan, the situation was aggravated by natural disasters in Somalia (p. 1046), limited possibilities for durable solutions in Djibouti (p. 1042) and large numbers of new refugee arrivals in the Sudan (p. 1049). The commencement in June 1981 of a programme of voluntary repatriation to Chad, arranged by UNHCR at the request of the Secretary-General, and a July proclamation of amnesty by the Government of Chad drew an immediate response, as demonstrated by a decline in the number of Chadian refugees in the United Republic of Cameroon from 110,000 in 1980 to 25,000 in 1981: Of a total of 150,000 returnees, some 66,000 were assisted by UNHCR.

The 1981 UNHCR expenditures in Africa totalled over $111 million under General Programmes and $55 million under Special Programmes. Of this amount, over $97 million was spent to promote local settlement of refugees.

The ministerial-level ICARA (Geneva, 9 and 10 April) drew pledges of contributions in cash and kind amounting to some $566.6 million (p. 1039).

In October, the Executive Committee of the High Commissioner's Programme<sup>(1)</sup> welcomed the successful conclusion of the United Nations humanitarian assistance programme, co-ordinated by UNHCR, for the initial settlement and rehabilitation of returnees and displaced persons in Zimbabwe. Almost all the 111 refugees remaining in Zimbabwe at year's end were South Africans.

The following countries were known to host refugees and displaced persons (breakdown by origin of the 1981 refugee population, where available, is given in parentheses): Algeria (150,000 Sahrawis, 2,000 others of various origin); Angola (70,000 Namibians, 18,000 Zairians, 5,000 South Africans); Botswana. (1,300 Angolans, South Africans and Namibians); Burundi (234,600); Djibouti (31,600, mostly Ethiopians); Egypt (5,500); Kenya (3,400, mainly Ethiopians and Rwandese, in addition to a resumed influx of Ugandans); Lesotho (11,500, mostly South African students); Morocco (500, mostly elderly Europeans, the rest being African and Latin American students); Mozambique (about 100, mostly South Africans); Rwanda (18,000, mostly from Burundi); Senegal (some 4,000 of various origin); Sudan (419,000 Ethiopians, 110,000 Ugandans, 16,000 Chadians, 5,000 Zairians); Swaziland (5,600 South Africans); Tunisia (some 200, mostly Europeans); Uganda (80,000 Rwandese, 32,000 Zairians, 1,000 Ethiopians and Sudanese); and Zambia (29,100 Angolans, 4,700 Zairians, 4,300 Namibians, 2,200 South Africans, 200 others).

In Angola, programme modification was necessitated by repeated armed attacks into the territory. In Ethiopia (p. 1044), around 5,500 of the 11,000 predominantly Sudanese refugees no longer required UNHCR assistance. In Nigeria, UNHCR was requested to provide an emergency programme starting in March to assist the refugees from Chad, which comprised the majority of the refugee population there of 105,000. In the face of several emergencies including drought, flooding, epidemics and malnutrition, the UNHCR programme in Somalia first emphasized relief assistance for an estimated refugee population of 700,000, followed by income-generating and self-help projects.

The refugee population increased by 8,000 to 164,000 in the United Republic of Tanzania, as a result of a legal study which established the refugee status for 9,000 (previously estimated at 4,000) Zairians settled there and owing also to new arrivals, mainly from Burundi. The direct responsibility of the High Commissioner for the Special Programme of Immediate Humanitarian Assistance in Uganda, launched in 1979, ended in March 1981; the Programme was subsequently administered by a special representative of the Secretary-General (p. 520). The continued influx of refugees from Uganda brought the refugee population in Zaire to 365,000 (215,000 Angolans, 115,000 Ugandans, 22,000 Rwandese, 11,000 from Burundi, 1,800 Zambia; emergency relief was necessary for a new influx of Ugandans at mid-year.

Asia and the Pacific. Total UNHCR obligations amounting to $250.8 million were recorded in 1981 for refugee assistance in Asia and the Pacific, where the number of Afghan refugees increased and the Indo-Chinese refugees continued to seek asylum.

In Pakistan, the number of Afghan refugees was estimated to have grown from 1,400,000 to over 2,375,000 in the course of the year, and the High Commissioner issued an appeal to the international community on 1 June for increased contributions. A rapid increase of Afghan asylum seekers at the end of 1980 led UNHCR to reopen an office in India, where the caseload involved 3,507 refugees, including 2,685 Afghans and 720 Iranians.

In South-East Asia, 99,000 Indo-Chinese refugees arrived in 1981 in countries of first asylum-75,000 by sea, as in the previous year, and 24,000 by land, half the 1980 figure. Although the departure of 120,000 persons primarily to North America and Europe raised the total resettlement figure since 1977 to over 700,000, more than 230,000 Indo-Chinese refugees still awaited a durable solution.

During the year, China received an additional 2,000 Vietnamese refugees, the number of Vietnamese "boat people" in Hong Kong decreased to 13,542, and Japan had a caseload balance of 1,798, after 1,026 arrivals and 1,181 departures for resettlement. In Indonesia, 7,395 refugees from Indo-China left for resettlement in third countries, arrivals totalled 9,328, and the first-asylum caseload of 6,191 awaited solution. A decline in Malaysia's refugee population to 9,845 Vietnamese and some 2,600 other Indo-Chinese, after the arrival of 23,113 "boat people" and resettlement of 25,652, made it possible to close a field camp and two transit centres.

In the Philippines, Indo-Chinese arrivals by boat doubled from the previous year to 8,353, 5,402 departed for resettlement in third countries and 6,628 persons awaited a durable solution. The 5,381 refugees arriving in Singapore in 1981 amounted to slightly over half the number in the previous year; 5,967 persons departed, 539 Vietnamese refugees awaited resettlement and an additional 21,569 Indo-Chinese refugees arrived in transit for resettlement.

Due to fewer arrivals (42,792) and continued departures for resettlement (101,961), Thailand's refugee population of concern to UNHCR-composed mainly of Kampuchean and Lao-decreased from 261,334 in 1980 to 192,998 in 1981. After the closing of six camps, there remained three holding centres and one camp for Kampucheans, eight camps for Lao and one camp for Vietnamese, as well as one resettlement processing centre and three transit centres.

UNHCR assistance in the Lao People's Democratic Republic was directed to the remaining 3,500 Kampuchean refugees and repatriates from Thailand. The estimated number of Kampuchean refugees in Viet Nam decreased by 3,000 to 30,000, and 9,815 people-more than double the 1980 figure- left the country under the Orderly Departure Programme.

In Oceania, Australia accepted 13,485 refugees and displaced persons from South-East Asia, including 11,983 "boat people", and New Zealand accepted 607 Indo-Chinese refugees, including 155 "boat people". The UNHCR branch office actively promoted accession to the 1951 Convention and the 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees (p. 1055).

Western Asia had an estimated refugee population of 70,000, excluding Afghan refugees in Iran. The 3,200 refugees in Lebanon received UNHCR assistance geared towards self-sufficiency and supplementary aid.

At its October session, the UNHCR Executive Committee<sup>(2)</sup> noted with concern the continuing increase in the refugee arrivals in Asia, aside from South-East Asia, and recognized the importance of assistance programmes corresponding to the needs of the respective situations.

In a letter dated 30 October,<sup>(1)</sup> Viet Nam transmitted to the Secretary-General a press release issued on 9 October by its Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs concerning the agreement reached between him and the High Commissioner, during their talks at Geneva from 5 to 9 October, on increasing the number and rate of legal departures and on resettling the Kampuchean refugees currently in Viet Nam.

Letter: <sup>(1)</sup>Viet Nam 30 Oct., A/36/640.

Europe. The number of refugees in Europe at the end of 1981 stood at 589,200, and the total expenditures in the region, excluding Cyprus, amounted to $8.8 million. There was a substantial increase in the number of Poles requesting asylum: nearly 30,000 Poles entered Austria, where $2 million was made available from the UNHCR Emergency Fund at the Government's request. The High Commissioner asked 24 countries to increase resettlement opportunities so as to lighten Austria's burden.

In addition to admitting Indo-Chinese refugees under established quotas, additional places were made available for handicapped refugees in the context of the 1981 International Year of Disabled Persons (p. 795). The local integration of 7,500 displaced persons from Africa continued in Portugal through UNHCR assistance, and the 20,500 Latin Americans in Spain continued to receive legal and other assistance.

At the request of the Secretary-General, the High Commissioner continued to act as Co-ordinator of United Nations Humanitarian Assistance for Cyprus (p. 346), providing medical, training and material assistance to those displaced as a result of the events of 1974. Total obligations in 1981 amounted to some $12.7 million, including $3.5 million for the construction of a hospital at Lanarca.

Latin America. Assistance totalling $18.9 million, including $9.9 million for emergency relief, was provided to refugees in Latin America, whose number reached 280,000 by the end of 1981.

In northern Latin America, where Salvadorians comprised 90 per cent of the estimated refugee population of 200,000, expenditures towards resettlement and local integration increased from $350,000 in 1980 to $3.3 million in 1981. While the number of asylum seekers from Guatemala and Nicaragua increased, smaller numbers arrived from the Caribbean and South America, mainly in Costa Rica.

Elsewhere, the overall refugee population in Argentina was estimated at 26,500, of whom 20,000 were from Europe, 5,000 from Latin America and 1,500 from Indo-China. The refugee population in Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Paraguay and Uruguay was 28,500, mostly of European origin, but the number of Latin American refugees was on the increase. In the course of the year, 710 Latin American refugees, mostly in Brazil and Chile, left for countries of permanent settlement.

In Peru, the new arrivals from other Latin American countries more than offset the departure of over 200 refugees for third countries and, at year's end, 730 Latin American refugees and 750 elderly Europeans remained in the country. Refugees of UNHCR concern in Colombia, Ecuador, Guyana, Suriname and Venezuela included 11,000 Europeans and 8,500 Latin Americans.

The Executive Committee of the High Commissioner's Programme, at its October session at Geneva, expressed concern at the increasingly serious situation of refugees in Central America and called on Governments to continue cooperating fully with UNHCR in extending international protection and material assistance to the refugees in that region.<sup>(1)</sup>

Resettlement of refugees

UNHCR spent some $13.5 million in 1981 on resettlement activities, mostly for the transportation of refugees arranged by the Intergovernmental Committee for Migration (ICM). A tripartite agreement between ICM, the International Council of Voluntary Agencies and UNHCR was concluded in 1981 to set up an International Refugee Integration Resource Centre (IRIRC), to facilitate the sharing of resource materials, data and information on resettlement and integration.<sup>(1)</sup>

Many refugees in Africa, primarily from the Horn and from the south, were placed in urban centres which had no resources to absorb them. In Europe, a large number of asylum seekers arriving in Western Europe sought resettlement elsewhere, and some 34,000 asylum seekers were officially registered in Austria alone. The vast majority of Central American refugees had been allowed to settle locally, while refugees in Argentina and Brazil along with smaller numbers in Peru awaited resettlement. During the year, 1,550 persons were resettled from Latin America to 24 countries.

In South-East Asia, 120,000 Indo-Chinese departed from various camps, leaving behind some 45,000 "boat people" in countries of temporary asylum. Some 90,000 land cases, mostly Lao, and 97,000 Kampuchean remained in camps and holding centres in Thailand awaiting durable solutions. Discussions were held to accelerate departures of Vietnamese under the Orderly Departure Programme (p. 1033), and nearly 10,000 persons left Viet Nam in 1981 for 30 countries of resettlement. In addition, some 1,400 Kampuchean refugees left Viet Nam for resettlement in 16 countries.

The UNHCR Executive Committee, in an October decision on resettlement,<sup>(2)</sup> urged Governments to be liberal in accepting refugees, particularly of special cases; commended Governments for accepting refugees rescued at sea by ships flying their flag; commended the High Commissioner for promoting the Orderly Departure Programme; and noted with appreciation the agreement reached on establishing IRIRC.

Financial and administrative aspects

Expenditures

In 1981, expenditure for UNHCR programmes, including expenditure for programme support and administration, dropped from the 1980 level of almost $500 million to $474.3 million.<sup>(1)</sup> Of this amount, $319 million was spent for General Programmes and some $155 million for Special Programmes and other trust funds. For the year's expenditure by country or area and by main types of assistance activities, see table on p. 1036.

Report: <sup>(1)</sup>UNHCR, A/37/12.

Income

Total UNHCR income in 1981 amounted to $506,778,000—including $346,881,000 for General Programmes and $159,483,000 for Special Programmes.<sup>(1)</sup>

Income for voluntary funds under the Special Programmes category included $28.5 million for the Trust Fund for Kampucheans, $12.8 million for the Cyprus operation, $10.3 million for repatriation and rehabilitation of Chadians, $9.5 million for the Refugee Education Account, $9.1 million for processing centres in South-East Asia, $7.9 million for assistance to returnees to Ethiopia, $4.1 million for language training in South-East Asia, $3.8 million for the Trust Fund for Kampuchean Returnees, $2.4 million for the Special Fund for Durable Solutions, $1.7 million for the Orderly Departure Programme for Viet Nam, and $1.3 million for the United Nations Trust Fund for South Africa.

The Executive Committee, by an October decision<sup>(2)</sup> on the status of contributions and the overall financial requirements for 1981-1982, reaffirmed the need for more equitable and widespread financial support within the international community for UNHCR programmes, and invited donors to at least maintain a proportionate level of contribution in relation to the increased programme and budget requirements.

Some $120 million was pledged to the 1982 UNHCR programme at a 20 November 1981 meeting, in New York, of the Ad Hoc Committee of the General Assembly for the Announcement of Voluntary Contributions to UNHCR.

By a 14 December resolution on the work of the High Commissioner, the Assembly urged Governments to contribute generously so as to provide the High Commissioner with the means to attain the objectives of his humanitarian programme.<sup>(3)</sup>

Contributions paid or pledged to the UNHCR assistance programmes for 1981 and 1982 are listed in the table on p. 1037.

Administrative expenses

The Board of Auditors, in examining the financial statements of the UNHCR-administered voluntary funds for the year ended 31 December 1980 (p. 1038), noted that over the years voluntary funds had assumed an ever-increasing share of the administrative costs of UNHCR, despite the stipulation in the UNHCR statute that the administrative expenditures relating to the functioning of that Office should be borne by the regular budget of the United Nations.

The UNHCR Executive Committee, at Geneva in October 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> urged the High Commissioner and the Secretary-General to pursue an equitable apportionment of the administrative costs of UNHCR. It also formally established the Subcommittee on Administrative and Financial Matters to assist in the managerial, financial and administrative aspects of its work.

By a resolution of 18 December, on the proposed programme budget for 1982-1983,<sup>(2)</sup> the General Assembly requested the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the High Commissioner, to complete by the 1982 Assembly session the current joint review of the financing of the administrative costs of UNHCR with a view to establishing a proper basis for their financing. This action was taken by a recorded vote of 126 to 9. The text was recommended by the Assembly's Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee on 15 December as sponsored by Lebanon and approved by 81 votes to 7.

In explanation of vote, the USSR questioned the appropriateness of the Fifth Committee's taking action on a question whose substance had been discussed in the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee; it voted negatively because the Fifth Committee had rejected its request for deferring consideration of the item until 1982. Japan supported the call for completion of the joint review, on the understanding that the text did not prejudice the outcome of that review. Panama supported the decision as it attached importance to UNHCR work, and the United Republic of Tanzania considered the text appropriate for Fifth Committee action.

Introducing the text, Lebanon said the review, to be completed on the recommendation of the UNHCR Executive Committee, had taken longer than expected; the draft called for completion of that review so that the Fifth Committee could reach agreement on the funding of additional administrative costs, bearing in mind the universal responsibility of the international community and the essentially non-political, humanitarian vocation of UNHCR.

Support for the review's completion was voiced by Austria, Chile, India, Morocco, Pakistan and Sweden, the last on behalf of the Nordic countries. In addition, Algeria observed that there would be ample time in 1982 to go into the substance; India saw no need to postpone action, as the text simply requested the Secretary-General to meet a deadline.

A number of countries, including Austria, Chile, India, Lebanon and the Sudan, expressed concern over the financing of administrative costs from voluntary funds and asked that the United Nations regular budget meet a substantial portion of those costs. Chad agreed with Lebanon that the policy of budgetary restraint should not hinder the activities of an organ which faced ever-increasing responsibilities. Pakistan considered it important to determine an appropriate allocation of UNHCR administrative costs between the United Nations regular budget and voluntary funds.

Accounts for voluntary funds

The financial statements on the UNHCR-administered voluntary funds, examined by the Board of Auditors,<sup>(2)</sup> indicated that the funds' income for the year ended 31 December 1980 amounted to $466,238,000 and their expenditures totalled $496,956,000.

Meeting with the Board in June 1981, the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ)<sup>(1)</sup> noted the Board's recommendation that the responsibility for control of administrative expenditure be transferred from the Finance Division of the United Nations Office at Geneva to UNHCR in order to rectify the unsatisfactory situation arising from the current arrangement, under which the UNHCR Budget and Management Section rarely dealt with follow-up on payments and supporting documentation while the United Nations counterpart was not sufficiently involved with the evolution of the projects and the problems of the UNHCR field offices.

In response to queries, the Secretariat informed ACABQ that, in view of the importance of keeping separate the programme and financial responsibilities, the action proposed by the Board would adversely affect the responsibility of the Office of Financial Services for regular budget accounts; and that discussions were under way with UNHCR staff regarding proper financial procedures and controls as well as provision of management information as required to UNHCR.

By a resolution of 30 November on the reports of the Board of Auditors,<sup>(3)</sup> the General Assembly accepted the 1980 financial statements on UNHCR voluntary funds along with the audit opinions of the Board, concurred with the comments made by ACABQ, and requested the Board and ACABQ to give greater attention to areas regarding which they had made observations. The Assembly also requested the High Commissioner to take remedial action where required.

Administration and management

In a note of 27 August 1981 to the UNHCR Executive Committee,<sup>(1)</sup> the High Commissioner proposed a series of measures aimed at strengthening the management of UNHCR, including decentralization of responsibility and authority within its Geneva headquarters and to 86 field offices, strengthening the programme implementation and evaluation, and reinforcing the mechanism for consultation and operational co-operation with other humanitarian assistance organizations.

The Executive Committee,<sup>(2)</sup> in October, generally endorsed the High Commissioner's staffing proposals for 1981 and 1982, stressed the importance of delegating authority as a means of strengthening UNHCR, and welcomed his intention to have its managerial methods and organizational structure reviewed by the Secretariat's Administrative Management Service. The Committee believed that the review should include consideration of steps to facilitate decision-making, possibilities for improving programme delivery through redeployment of existing staff, and administrative costs and their implications for the United Nations regular budget.

By a resolution of 14 December on the report of UNHCR,<sup>(3)</sup> the General Assembly noted the proposals by the High Commissioner to strengthen UNHCR management on the basis of the Assembly's principles and guidelines, and welcomed his intention to seek the assistance of the Administrative Management Service in undertaking expeditiously a review of the managerial methods and organizational structure of his Office, as recommended by ACABQ.

Public information

The International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa (p. 1039) and the 1981 Nobel Peace Prize awarded to UNHCR provided major focal points for the public information activities of UNHCR in 1981.<sup>(1)</sup> In connection with the Conference, a special report entitled "Africa's Refugees and UNHCR" was issued as a follow-up and two itinerant journalists' seminars visited refugee camps in Africa. The announcement of the Nobel award resulted in hundreds of media interviews, production of special radio programmes and world-wide distribution of a television film, "Road to Survival", covering the Office's 30-year history.

Increased demand for UNHCR publications, which included the fortnightly Refugee Update, led to the introduction of a computerized distribution system. The photo library provided 50,000 photographs, double the 1980 figure, to media, schools and non-governmental organizations. Among the documentary films produced were "Zimbabwe: From Swords to Ploughshares" and "Refugees: A Historical View".

The Executive Committee,<sup>(2)</sup> in October 1981, reaffirmed the importance of effective public information in increasing global awareness of refugee situations and urged the High Commissioner to continue his efforts in that regard.

Assistance to refugees in Africa

International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa

CONFERENCE ACTIVITIES. Contributions in cash and kind amounting to $566.6 million (see table on p. 1042) were pledged by 46 countries and the European Community (EC) at the International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa (ICARA),<sup>(2)</sup> which met at Geneva on 9 and 10 April 1981. Of this amount, unspecified pledges totalled $451.9 million, those for ongoing United Nations programmes amounted to $66.9 million and indications of bilateral assistance totalled $41.1 million.

The ministerial-level Conference was convened by the Secretary-General, in response to a 1980 General Assembly request,<sup>(6)</sup> in close cooperation with the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and the High Commissioner. Attended by 99 of the 131 States invited and by over 120 non-governmental organizations (NGOs), it focused on the plight of both the refugees and the countries of asylum, and reconfirmed the central role of OAU in pursuing basic remedies, as well as the need for international agencies to give priority to African refugee problems.

The Secretary-General, acting as ICARA President, informed the gathering on 9 April that Africa hosted more than half the world's refugee population; the number of refugees there had risen from 750,000 in 1970 to 5 million in 1980, mostly in the last two years. Eighty per cent of them were sheltered in 18 African countries, the majority of which were among the least developed in the world. The less publicized but much larger part of the refugee burden—its effect on the economy—was disproportionate to the resources available to those countries. While the priority was to meet the refugees' immediate life-sustaining needs, resettlement programmes required full support so as not to perpetuate the problem.

To mobilize support for ICARA, representatives of the Secretary-General, OAU and UNHCR held several joint meetings at Geneva with regional groups, and missions were dispatched to donor countries. A document on assistance measures proposed by Governments and calling for some $893 million was assembled by the Conference secretariat.

Following the Conference, an ICARA Steering Committee, comprising representatives of the sponsoring organizations, was established to implement the Conference's conclusions, including examination of projects for funding from pledges.<sup>(3)</sup> The Committee, advised by a technical working group composed of representatives of OAU, the Economic Commission for Africa and UNHCR, referred a first selection of projects worth $38 million to the African Governments concerned for final consideration and, on 22 December, UNHCR on behalf of the Committee transmitted to all Conference participants a summary of selected projects requiring funding on a priority basis.

COMMUNICATION. In a letter dated 14 April to the Secretary-General,<sup>(1)</sup> the Minister for Foreign Affairs and Information of South Africa denied allegations made at ICARA that refugees were fleeing inhuman living conditions and persecution in Namibia and South Africa. He stated further that, while South Africa's requests for UNHCR assistance to Angolan refugees in Namibia had been ignored for political expediency, a considerable portion of the funds dispensed by UNHCR and the United Nations Development Programme went to programmes executed by or benefiting the African National Congress of South Africa, the Pan Africanist Congress of Azania and the South West Africa People's Organization in promoting their political aims through violence and terror. Stating that it had been prevented from participating in ICARA by its organizers, South Africa requested that its letter form part of the ICARA documentation as well as that of the General Assembly.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. Acting without vote on 6 May, the Economic and Social Council, on an oral proposal by its President, took note of the oral report on ICARA proceedings made on behalf of the Secretary-General on 24 April by the Joint Co-ordinator for Special Economic Assistance Programmes.<sup>(9)</sup>

In a 22 July resolution on assistance to colonial countries,<sup>(5)</sup> the Council expressed appreciation to Governments and organizations for their pledges at ICARA and called for generous contributions to the funds earmarked for assistance to refugees in Africa, particularly those displaced as a result of the policy imposed by the racist minority regime of South Africa in Namibia and South Africa.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE ACTION. Noting the success of the Conference, the UNHCR Executive Committee, in October, thanked the High Commissioner for his efforts in convening ICARA, urged the international community to maintain the momentum in assisting African refugees and noted the wish expressed by delegations for a follow-up conference.<sup>(4)</sup>

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a 14 December resolution<sup>(8)</sup> adopted without vote, the General Assembly commended the three ICARA sponsors and invited them to continue their co-operation to ensure the channelling of Conference funds to priority projects. The Assembly called on pertinent development-oriented bodies of the United Nations system to envisage co-ordinated actions aimed at harmonizing assistance programmes in affected countries so that the potentialities of refugees or returnees might constitute an advantage rather than a burden on national development. The Secretary-General was asked to keep the African refugee situation under close scrutiny and provide the Council in 1982 with up-to-date information, in order to facilitate Assembly consideration of the need to convene an international follow-up conference in 1983.

In a resolution of 9 December<sup>(7)</sup> on co-operation between the United Nations and OAU, the Assembly called on all Member States and regional and international organizations, particularly those of the United Nations system, as well as NGOs to increase substantially their aid to refugees in Africa.

The resolution on ICARA was approved by the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee without vote on 24 November. Introducing the text on behalf of the African Group, Benin said some amendments proposed by donor countries had been incorporated.

Many countries in the Committee debate considered ICARA a success, among them Argentina, Austria, Bangladesh, Democratic Kampuchea, the United Kingdom (for the EC members), the United States and Yugoslavia. The Congo said ICARA had made clear that it was time to act before it was too late. Argentina, France and Japan said ICARA had given the international community a chance to express solidarity.

The Central African Republic, Egypt, Finland, Ireland, the Sudan and the United Kingdom, the last for the EC countries, said ICARA had helped to raise the consciousness of the magnitude of the refugee problem in Africa. Sharing that view, New Zealand believed it had generated support for the efforts of the African countries directly affected. The United States said ICARA had made the international community aware of the efforts of the African nations in providing asylum and sharing their resources with the refugees to the maximum extent. Australia spoke of burden-sharing, and Liberia said ICARA had highlighted the need for concerted international action to provide the refugees with subsistence and to help them become self-supporting.

Lebanon, Nigeria, Pakistan, the Sudan and Yugoslavia called for maintaining the momentum created at the Conference, and the United Kingdom (for the EC countries) said the funds pledged should thus be deployed efficiently and responsibly through existing multilateral and national channels. The Sudan said the international community should review by 1983 the progress achieved and decide on further measures that might be needed at that time. Lebanon suggested that consideration be given to the possibility of convening a follow-up conference in 1983.

For the Sudan, ICARA had succeeded in providing reasonable financial and material assistance to the refugees. Somalia believed the amount pledged could go a long way towards assisting asylum countries and hoped that the funds' allocation would be commensurate with the magnitude of the refugee problem in those countries. The Central African Republic and Lebanon said ICARA had contributed to assisting both the refugees and the countries of asylum.

Chad, which was unable to attend the Conference, thanked the international community for its generous contribution and said ICARA should have focused its attention on assisting the countries of origin in order to facilitate the return of the refugees. The Conference objectives had been only partially met, according to Zaire, which asserted that international assistance continued to be insufficient in relation to the accumulated obligations and additional burden which the presence of refugees implied for the economies of the asylum States.

Sierra Leone was disappointed at the lack of response from States which had called themselves friends of Africa. In a similar vein, the United Kingdom, for the EC countries, expressed regret that one group of countries was conspicuously absent at ICARA.

Canada commended UNHCR for the pivotal role it had played in the planning, organization and execution of ICARA.

At its 15th plenary meeting, on 6 May 1981, the Council took note of the oral report under agenda item 4 made on behalf of the Secretary-General at its 8th meeting on 24 April 1981 on the proceedings of the International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa, held at Geneva on 9 and 10 April 1981.

International Conference on Assistance to Refugees In Africa

The General Assembly,

Recalling Its resolution 35/42 of 25 November 1980 relating to the International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa, held at Geneva on 9 and 10 April 1981,

Taking note of resolution CM/Res.868(XXXVII) regarding the Conference and Its follow-up, adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its thirty-seventh ordinary session, held at Nairobi from 15 to 26 June 1981,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the Conference and the report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees on the activities of his Office,

Gravely concerned at the growing number of refugees on the African continent, who now constitute over half the population of refugees in the world,

Regretting that, In spite of the efforts made, the assistance provided to the growing number of African refugees is still very inadequate,

Aware of the economic and social burden imposed on African countries of asylum by the growing influx of refugees and its consequences for their development and of the heavy sacrifices made by them, despite their limited resources, to alleviate the plight of those refugees,

Recognizing, therefore, the need of the countries of asylum for adequate human, technical and financial assistance to enable them properly to shoulder their increased responsibilities and assume the additional burden which the presence of refugees represents for their economies,

Recognizing further the need to assist similarly the countries of origin in the voluntary repatriation and resettlement of returnees, as set out in the procedures of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees,

Convinced that the attendance of high-ranking officials and representatives of ninety-nine countries and over one hundred twenty non-governmental organizations at the International Conference on Assistance to Refugees In Africa bears evidence to the fact that the Conference drew international public attention to the situation and needs of African refugees.

1. Commends the initiative taken by the three sponsors of the International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa-the Organization of African Unity, the United Nations and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees-to maintain their close co-operation properly to define the follow-up actions that will be called for, and invites them to continue and develop their tripartite consultations and co-operation at all appropriate levels, so that the Conference funds are channelled to priority projects and put to the best use;

2. Reiterates its congratulations to the Secretary-General of the United Nations for his efforts towards the preparation of the International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa in close consultation with the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, as well as for his personal concern for African refugee problems and for the very able manner in which he presided over the Conference, thus bringing it to a successful end;

3. Expresses its appreciation and gratitude to all donor countries and to the international community at large for their very positive response to the appeal for assistance to African refugees and for their contribution to the assistance to refugees in Africa;

4. Urges the International community to continue to support the annual programmes of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and of other United Nations agencies co-operating with that Office on behalf of refugees in Africa;

5. Calls upon the pertinent development-oriented organizations and agencies of the United Nations system to envisage, at the stages of conception and implementation, all concerted efforts and co-ordinated actions aimed at harmonizing assistance programmes in the countries of asylum as well as in the countries of origin during the repatriation process, and current or future development programmes, so that the potentialities of refugees or returnees may constitute an advantage rather than a burden on national development;

6. Requests the Secretary-General, in close co-operation with the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, to keep the African refugee situation under close and constant scrutiny and to submit to the Economic and Social Council, at its second regular session of 1982, a report containing up-to-date information on the condition of refugees in the countries concerned in order to facilitate consideration by the General Assembly, at its thirty-seventh session, of the necessity of convening an international conference in 1983 to review the status of contributions and commitments made at the International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa, and to assess the needs and measures for further assistance for refugees and returnees in implementation of programmes for their relief, rehabilitation and resettlement;

7. Invites governmental bodies of specialized agencies, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to consider, within their sphere of competence, various ways and means to increase substantially assistance to African refugees and returnees;

8. Requests the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, in close co-operation with the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity, to keep under constant review the situation of refugees in Africa in order to ensure maximum international assistance on a global basis;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Assistance to refugees in Djibouti

REPORT OF THE HIGH COMMISSIONER. In the annex to an April 1981 report of the Secretary-General to the General Assembly,<sup>(1)</sup> UNHCR stated that, of the $7 million allocated for the year for intensified assistance to the refugees in Djibouti, $1 million was designated for supplementary food and commodities transport and $500,000 for domestic utensils, clothing and blankets. Further funds were earmarked for construction of housing and storage facilities, procurement of medical supplies and an extension of educational and training facilities. The staffing of the UNHCR branch office had been increased.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. The Joint Co-ordinator for Special Economic Assistance Programmes orally informed the Economic and Social Council on 24 April that the UNHCR programme was being supplemented by contributions from the World Food Programme and voluntary organizations, and that Djibouti, drought-stricken for a number of years (p. 491) and a recent victim of devastating floods.. was in need of additional international relief assistance (p. 507).

Calling for international support, the representative of Djibouti told the Council that the need to cope with the continuous influx of refugees and the prolonged drought and devastating floods had placed heavy demands on the country's meagre resources and paralysed its social and economic infrastructure.

The number of refugees in Djibouti was estimated at 45,000 in May.

The Council, on 4 May,<sup>(2)</sup> requested the High Commissioner to ensure adequate assistance to refugees in Djibouti and to maintain contact with Member States and organizations concerned to mobilize assistance to the Government to cope with the refugee situation, which had been complicated by the recent floods. The 23-nation draft, introduced by Bangladesh, was adopted without vote.

The Council remained seized of the problem and, on an oral proposal of its President, took note in a decision adopted without vote on 20 July<sup>(4)</sup> of the High Commissioner's 14 July oral report on efforts being made to help the refugees, mostly of semi-nomadic background, attain some self-sufficiency.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution adopted without vote on 16 December,<sup>(3)</sup> the General Assembly requested UNHCR to continue ensuring that adequate assistance programmes were organized for the refugees in Djibouti, and to maintain close contact with Member States and organizations concerned to mobilize assistance for the Government to cope effectively with the refugee situation aggravated by the debilitating effects of the drought. The Assembly also called on Member States, the United Nations system and other organizations for continued support to the Government of Djibouti to cope with the needs of the refugee population and other victims of the drought.

The Third Committee, which approved without vote the 45-nation text on 30 November, heard on 19 November an oral report by the High Commissioner. Introducing the resolution, Zaire called it purely humanitarian, and added that the international community was duty-bound to provide assistance at a level commensurate with the urgency and importance of the problem.

In the Committee debate, Djibouti said the presence of some 50,000 to 55,000 refugees, constituting more than 15 per cent of the country's total population, was overburdening the infrastructure. Four years of prolonged drought had resulted in the loss of 40 per cent of its livestock, thus threatening about 130,000 nomads with famine. The Government had established 17 temporary camps to accommodate the displaced nomadic population.

Assistance to displaced persons in Ethiopia

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. The Commissioner for Relief and Rehabilitation of Ethiopia told the Economic and Social Council on 24 April 1981 that persistent drought and other calamities in his country practically nullified the efforts made by the Government and the international community. The food situation was rapidly deteriorating and the United Nations Co-ordinating Committee for Relief and Rehabilitation in Ethiopia had recommended immediate assistance of $215,439,000 and food aid amounting to 224,000 metric tons of grain and edible oil. However, the Secretary-General's appeal for aid had met with disappointing results. The Commissioner called for global assistance to resolve the plight of displaced persons in Africa, numbering four times more than refugees, and avert the worsening of the situation.

On behalf of the Secretary-General, the Joint Co-ordinator for Special Economic Assistance Programmes informed the Council that the displaced persons, estimated by the Ethiopian Government to number 2.4 million, suffered from disease and a scarcity of food and water. An inter-agency mission to Ethiopia had calculated that 870,000 tons of food assistance would be required over a three-and-a-half year period. With funds provided by UNHCR, the Government would implement a project for five reception centres to assist in the repatriation and resettlement of voluntary returnees.

The United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator noted the findings of the United Nations Co-ordinating Committee that about 1.5 million people in Ethiopia desperately needed help and that the estimated 1981 national food deficit of 350,000 tons was likely to affect over 1 million people.

On 6 May, the Council reiterated its appeal to the international community for prompt and generous assistance to the displaced persons in Ethiopia.<sup>(2)</sup>

The adoption without vote of the 16-nation draft, introduced by Zimbabwe, followed the Council's decision, by 23 votes to 13, with 14 abstentions, to agree to a motion by Morocco not to act on a series of amendments by Somalia<sup>(1)</sup> to this resolution and on amendments proposed by Ethiopia to a resolution on assistance to refugees in Somalia (p. 1046).

Somalia had proposed rewording the second preambular paragraph so that the statement by the Ethiopian Commissioner would be characterized as that dealing with "the question of displaced persons of Ethiopia" rather than referring to the grave situation and the difficulties encountered. The words "with regret" would have been deleted from the fifth preambular paragraph where the response to the Secretary-General's appeal was noted, and the sixth preambular paragraph, noting the extreme difficulties encountered by the Government of Ethiopia in providing relief, would have been replaced by a new paragraph noting "the extreme difficulties encountered by displaced persons in Ethiopia while victims of both the oppressive policies of the Government of Ethiopia and of natural disasters".
