Somalia's proposed amendment to operative paragraph 2 would have had the Council describe the international appeal as for the provision of relief to the displaced persons, rather than for assistance to the Government in its relief and rehabilitation effort. The basis for an appeal for assistance, in paragraph 4, would have been confined to "the appeal of the Secretary-General dated 11 November 1980", and a new paragraph would have called on all concerned to ensure that any assistance given was used solely for the purpose of providing relief to the displaced persons. In paragraph 5, the word "certified" would have been inserted to qualify the voluntary returnees for whom the humanitarian assistance was requested.

In the Council's debate, Bangladesh said that natural and man-made disasters threatened more than 5.1 million people in Ethiopia, of whom as many as 1.5 million faced certain starvation unless supplementary rations were made available for the coming 18 months. The German Democratic Republic and Yugoslavia saw Ethiopia as struggling to surmount the problems resulting from its colonial heritage. The USSR said it shared Ethiopia's concern that assistance to that country was being sabotaged by some United Nations organizations and agencies, whose heads practised discrimination against a sovereign State, thus demonstrating the imperialist Powers' efforts to use the Organization for disruption of Ethiopia's economic development.

Ethiopia and Somalia exchanged a series of charges as to the cause of the refugee problem in the region, Ethiopia said that one State sought to describe part of the territory of a neighbouring State as an integral part of its own; that the refugee problem had been created solely by the war of aggression waged by Somalia against Ethiopia since 1978; and that, if Somalia was right in referring to refugees from western Somalia, then they were displaced persons and not refugees. Somalia considered the root cause of exodus to have been the official policy of the Ethiopian regime since 1977, and charged that Ethiopia continued to plead for assistance for its so-called displaced persons, while busy squandering its meagre resources on acquisition of arms.

The Council's decision not to act on the proposed amendments but to adopt the text as originally submitted was criticized by some, among them Algeria, Ethiopia and Zambia, as creating a dangerous precedent with serious implications of denying delegations the right to submit amendments. The German Democratic Republic said the Council should not make a wholesale rejection of amendments, and the Sudan did not participate in the decision because it believed in consultations as the only way to settle differences.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. The High Commissioner informed the Third Committee on 19 November of assistance measures developed in Ethiopia for refugees returning from neighbouring countries.

By a 16 December resolution adopted without vote,<sup>(3)</sup> the General Assembly endorsed the appeals of the Secretary-General and the Council for assistance to displaced persons in Ethiopia and requested the High Commissioner to continue his efforts to mobilize humanitarian assistance for the relief and rehabilitation of the voluntary returnees.

The revised 34-nation draft, introduced by Zaire, was approved without vote on 30 November by the Third Committee. The approved text incorporated an oral revision by the sponsors adding to paragraph 1 the phrase "concerning assistance to displaced persons in Ethiopia" after the endorsement of previous appeals.

Assistance to displaced persons in Ethiopia

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 35/183 of 15 December 1980, in which the Assembly called for international assistance to alleviate the plight of displaced persons in Ethiopia,

Having heard the statement by the Commissioner for Relief and Rehabilitation of Ethiopia on 24 April 1981, outlining the grave situation of displaced persons and the difficulties encountered by his Government in providing relief and rehabilitation to millions of displaced persons in Ethiopia,

Having also heard the oral report of the representative of the Secretary-General on assistance to displaced persons in Ethiopia, presented pursuant to General Assembly resolution 35/183,

Taking note of the appeal of the Secretary-General in his note verbale of 11 November 1980, Noting with regret that the response to the appeal of the Secretary-General for providing generous assistance to alleviate the sufferings of displaced persons in Ethiopia has been inadequate.

Noting further the extreme difficulties encountered by the Government of Ethiopia in providing relief and rehabilitation to several millions of its citizens who are victims of both man-made and natural disasters, as well as to the voluntary returnees,

Recognizing the need for urgent and continued humanitarian assistance to save the lives and alleviate the plight of displaced persons in Ethiopia,

1. Takes note of the oral report presented by the representative of the Secretary-General on assistance to displaced persons in Ethiopia;

2. Reaffirms its appeal and that of the Secretary-General to Member States, Intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and voluntary agencies to assist the Government of Ethiopia in its effort to provide relief and rehabilitation to the displaced persons in that country;

3. Notes with appreciation the assistance thus far provided through the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees;

4. Appeals once more to all Member States, governmental and non-governmental organizations, specialized agencies, other organizations of the United Nations system and voluntary agencies to provide prompt and generous assistance to the displaced persons in Ethiopia on the basis of the recommendations made in the report of the inter-agency mission to Ethiopia annexed to the report of the Secretary-General on assistance to displaced persons in Ethiopia;

5. Requests the Secretary-General and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to continue their efforts to mobilize humanitarian assistance for the relief and rehabilitation of displaced persons and voluntary returnees;

6. Further requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its thirty-sixth session and to the Economic and Social Council at its first regular session of 1982 on the progress achieved in the implementation of the present resolution.

Assistance to displaced persons in Ethiopia

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 35/91 of 5 December 1980 and Economic and Social Council resolution 1980/54 of 24 July 1980,

Having heard the statement of the representative of the Secretary-General and of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on assistance to displaced persons in Ethiopia, prepared pursuant to Economic and Social Council resolution 1980/8 of 28 April 1980,

Taking note also of the appeal of the Secretary-General in his note verbale of 11 November 1980,

Deeply concerned that the appeals of the Secretary-General, the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly have yet to meet adequate response,

1. Endorses once again the appeals of the Secretary-General and the Economic and Social Council concerning assistance to displaced persons in Ethiopia:

2. Requests the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to continue his efforts to mobilize humanitarian assistance for the relief and rehabilitation of the large number of voluntary returnees:

3. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Economic and Social Council at its first regular session of 1982 and to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session on the progress achieved in the implementation of the present resolution.

Assistance to refugees in Somalia

REVIEW MISSION REPORT. In response to a December 1980 General Assembly resolution,<sup>(5)</sup> a United Nations mission, led by the Joint Co-ordinator for Special Economic Assistance Programmes, visited Somalia from 11 to 18 January 1981 to review the refugee situation.

Its findings, annexed to a report of 26 March by the Secretary-General,<sup>(2)</sup> pointed to the needs of the refugees whose number equalled nearly a quarter of the country's entire population. Over 1 million refugees were found in 30 camps and seven transit centres, in addition to an estimated 800,000 mostly nomadic people living elsewhere. Their composition was about 60 per cent children, 30 per cent women and 10 per cent men. Despite improved food delivery and increased food stocks, malnutrition persisted, potable water and medicines were in short supply, and other necessities such as tents, clothing, tools and domestic fuel were scarce.

The mission called for increased international assistance to the camps, totalling $234.6 million for 1981, and recommended several expert studies, including those concerning the provision of domestic fuels to the camps, the bulk handling of relief supplies, and the animal health problem created by the influx of cattle into Somalia. Further, the mission recommended some $171 million in additional multiyear assistance to develop Somalia's economic and social infrastructure to service the refugees.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. By a resolution adopted without vote on 6 May,<sup>(4)</sup> the Economic and Social Council strongly endorsed the Secretary-General's appeal for assistance and urged the international community to help Somalia strengthen its social and economic infrastructure so that essential services and facilities could be expanded. The Council commended the Secretary-General for promoting international action to assist the Somali Government in providing relief aid to the refugees, noted with appreciation the measures taken by the Government, and requested the High Commissioner to bring to the attention of the Assembly all pertinent changes and developments in the refugee situation since the January visit of the review mission.

The adoption without vote of the 27-nation draft, introduced by Zaire as an apolitical and purely humanitarian measure, followed the Council's decision, by 23 votes to 13, with 14 abstentions, to agree to a motion by Morocco not to act on amendments proposed by Ethiopia<sup>(1)</sup> to this resolution and on amendments proposed by Somalia to a resolution on assistance to displaced persons in Ethiopia (p. 1044).

Ethiopia had proposed deleting, in the fourth preambular paragraph, a phrase describing the nature of the review mission's report; deleting, in the fifth preambular paragraph, the date of the Secretary-General's appeal for aid; and replacing, in the sixth preambular paragraph, recognition of the heavy burden placed on the Government of Somalia with recognition of the refugees' need for generous international assistance.

In operative paragraph 1, Ethiopia had proposed replacing the word "strongly" by "once more" in the endorsement of the Secretary-General's appeal; in paragraph 2, the Secretary-General would have been commended for "assisting the Government of Somalia in securing relief aid for the refugees" instead of for promoting international action to assist the Government in providing relief. In paragraph 5, the Council would have taken note of the mission's report, rather than endorse its findings and recommendations. Paragraph 6, whereby the Council took note with appreciation of the measures the Government was taking to provide services to the refugees, would have been replaced with a paragraph simply noting the measures taken. In paragraph 8, assistance to strengthen Somalia's social and economic infrastructure would have been qualified as "necessary for the provision of relief aid for the refugees", and the reference to expanding and strengthening essential services would have been deleted.

Further, Ethiopia had proposed insertion of a new paragraph, which would have had the Council call on all concerned to ensure that the international assistance provided would be used for the sole purpose of providing relief and rehabilitation for the refugees. Paragraphs 9 and 10, providing for updated information on the refugee situation, would have been replaced by a paragraph requesting the Secretary-General to report to the Assembly at its 1981 session, and the High Commissioner to report to the Council at its first regular session of 1982, on the progress achieved in implementing the resolution.

Subsequently, Ethiopia orally proposed replacing its amendment to paragraph 6 with a paragraph which would have had the Council deplore "the expansionist policy of the Government of Somalia, which is the root cause of the refugee problem in the whole of Africa". Ethiopia expressed readiness to withdraw the oral proposal if Somalia withdrew its amendment to the sixth preambular paragraph of the draft on assistance to displaced persons in Ethiopia (p. 1044), containing a reference to "the oppressive policies of the Government of Ethiopia".

Morocco regretted that the drafts had been subjected to political demagoguery and confrontation, and appealed to Ethiopia and Somalia to forget their differences in the name of compassion for the refugees and withdraw their amendments.

Zaire said the text's sponsors could not accept the Ethiopian amendments, most of which were unjustified and unnecessary. The fourth and sixth preambular paragraphs and paragraphs 2 and 8 were part of a unanimously adopted 1980 Assembly resolution,<sup>(5)</sup> and no alteration was justified. Ethiopia's proposal to replace the word "strongly" with "once more" in paragraph 1 was inappropriate as the Council was considering the appeal of 11 March for the first time, and the gravity of the situation called for a strong endorsement; rejecting in paragraph 6 the simple gesture of commending the Government of Somalia ran counter to the humanitarian spirit and traditions of the Council; and the sponsors could not accept replacing paragraphs 9 and 10 with a single paragraph of different intent.

Zambia, a sponsor of the original text, hoped the Council would adopt it unamended.

During the debate, Somalia said the unprecedented magnitude of the refugee situation in that country had seriously depleted its national resources and food reserves, and it feared that the heavy demands made on the ecological system had serious environmental implications. Bangladesh said the situation needed immediate attention and that all possible assistance should be provided on an emergency basis.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL. In October, the Secretary-General transmitted to the Assembly the information supplied by UNHCR on the refugee situation since the mission's January visit.<sup>(3)</sup>

UNHCR reported that the exceptionally early and heavy rains following a drought had resulted in flooding that threatened the refugee camps; emergency measures for water supply had been followed by the provision of relief transport. In March, the camps were serviced by 150 international and 180 local medical personnel, new health centres were under construction, and a well-drilling project was started to secure an average of 20 litres of potable water per refugee per day. A comprehensive transport and distribution system was implemented in April, agricultural projects for self-reliance were extended in all camps, surveys were undertaken to identify new projects, a reforestation scheme was being planned, and experimentation with solar energy for cooking was being pursued. A committee set up by the Somali Government in August began a camp-by-camp headcount of refugees to establish precise figures for assistance needs.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. The High Commissioner told the Third Committee on 19 November that the UNHCR programme in Somalia consisted largely of humanitarian assistance for relief purposes, while attention was also being paid to the development of self-reliance schemes in agriculture.

By a resolution adopted without vote on 16 December,<sup>(6)</sup> the General Assembly requested the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the High Commissioner, to dispatch a mission to Somalia early in 1982 to review the overall needs of the refugees, including those aspects relating to their settlement and rehabilitation. The Assembly also appealed to Member States, international organizations and voluntary agencies for maximum material, financial and technical assistance to the Government of Somalia in its efforts to assist the refugees.

The Third Committee had approved without vote on 30 November the 51-nation draft, which Zaire, in introducing it, called purely humanitarian.

Assistance to refugees in the Sudan

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL. In a 22 April 1981 report<sup>(1)</sup> to the General Assembly, prepared in co-operation with UNHCR, the Secretary-General noted that, of the seven technical feasibility missions recommended by a June 1980 inter-agency mission to the Sudan,<sup>(5)</sup> those organized by UNHCR concerning the planning for new settlements, the development of integrated housing programmes, and planning and project design for agricultural programmes for refugee zones had been completed. The mission on a health-delivery system for refugees in the Sudan was to be undertaken by the World Health Organization (WHO) in late April, and the remaining three missions-relating to education, training, and planning for social development and welfare services-were to be conducted in November by the Economic Commission for Africa (ECA), in co-operation with United Nations agencies.

Based on the recommendations of a combined mission, which dealt with regional development for new settlements and project design for agricultural programmes in refugee zones, UNHCR took steps in 1981 to establish three new settlements and a water-supply system, create an agricultural extension service and order equipment for water supply and agriculture. Recommendations made by a mission on integrated housing programmes were under discussion between the Sudanese authorities and UNHCR.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. Acting without vote on a 27-nation draft introduced by Indonesia, the Economic and Social Council took note; on 4 May,<sup>(2)</sup> of the Secretary-General's report, on the situation of refugees in the Sudan and requested him to arrange for the completion of all technical follow-up missions and to report thereon to the Council at its second regular session of 1981 and to the Assembly later in the year.

Accordingly, the Joint Co-ordinator for Special Economic Assistance Programmes orally reported to the Council on 14 July, on behalf of the Secretary-General. He noted that the WHO mission conducted in April and May had recommended a programme worth $9 million to strengthen the Government's already over-stretched health services, along with a proposal that a similar programme be considered also for the southern region, where the number of refugees had been increasing. As regards the missions on education, vocational training and social services, ECA had carried out the field work in June and July and the reports were under preparation for submission to the Government.

On 20 July, the Council took note of the oral report of the Joint Co-ordinator.<sup>(4)</sup>

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 19 November, the High Commissioner reported to the Third Committee that much progress had been achieved in the Sudan in terms of durable solutions and that some 100,000 refugees had been settled in the country.

By a 16 December resolution adopted without vote,<sup>(3)</sup> the Assembly appealed to Member States, international organizations and voluntary agencies to render the maximum possible financial, material and technical assistance to the Government of Sudan in its efforts to help the refugees. The Assembly also requested the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the relevant agencies, to arrange for the completion of the remaining technical follow-up missions.

The 39-nation text, introduced by Zaire as purely humanitarian in character, was approved by the Third Committee on 30 November, also without vote.

Situation of refugees in the Sudan

Recalling its resolutions 1980/10 of 28 April 1980 and 1980/45 of 23 July 1980,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the situation of refugees in the Sudan and the report annexed thereto, prepared in co-operation with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, which describes the steps taken to implement General Assembly resolution 35/181 and contains the findings of the sectoral follow-up missions that have thus far been completed;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the relevant agencies, to arrange for the completion of all technical follow-up missions, and to report thereon to the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session of 1981 and to the General Assembly at its thirty-sixth session.

Situation of refugees in the Sudan

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 35/181 of 15 December 1980 on the situation of refugees in the Sudan,

Recalling further Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/5 of 4 May 1981,

Having heard the statement delivered by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees before the Third Committee on 16 November 1981,

Taking note of the ever-increasing number of refugees arriving in the Sudan,

Appreciating the measures which the Government of the Sudan, a least developed country, is taking in order to provide shelter, food and other services to the growing number of refugees in the Sudan,

Recognizing the heavy burden placed on the Government of the Sudan in caring for the growing number of refugees and the need for adequate international assistance to continue its efforts to render assistance to the refugees,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General containing the findings of the sectoral follow-up missions which have so far been completed;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the relevant agencies, to arrange for the completion of the remaining technical follow-up missions;

3. Expresses its appreciation to the donor Governments, intergovernmental organizations, non-governmental organizations, the Secretary-General and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees for their valuable assistance rendered to refugees in the Sudan;

4. Appeals to all Member States, international organizations and voluntary agencies to render the maximum possible financial, material and technical assistance to the Government of the Sudan in its efforts to provide all necessary service to the refugees;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the High Commissioner, to submit a comprehensive report to the Economic and Social Council at its first regular session of 1982 as well as to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session on the progress achieved in the implementation of the present resolution.

International co-operation to avert new flows of refugees

Expressing grave concern about the continuing massive flows of refugees and their implications for international peace and security, the General Assembly, by a resolution adopted without vote on 16 December 1981,<sup>(4)</sup> established a 17-member group of governmental experts to undertake a comprehensive review of the problem in all its aspects, with a view to developing recommendations on means of international co-operation.

The Assembly requested the Group of Governmental Experts on International Co-operation to Avert New Flows of Refugees, in preparing a report in time for Assembly deliberation in 1982, to pay due regard to the existing international instruments, norms and principles, including the principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of sovereign States; to the right of refugees to return to their homelands or otherwise receive adequate compensation; and to the importance of reaching general agreement whenever that had significance for the outcome of its work.

The experts, upon nomination by Member States, were to be appointed by the Secretary-General after consultation with the regional groups and with due regard to equitable geographical distribution. Each nominating State, as a rule, would bear the expenses for its appointed expert.

For the Assembly's consideration of this item, the Secretary-General had transmitted to it the views and suggestions<sup>(1)</sup> of 26 States and six United Nations organs, submitted in response to a 1980 Assembly request.<sup>(3)</sup>

Human rights aspects of mass exoduses were also the subject of a report prepared for the Commission on Human Rights (p. 965).

The resolution, as orally revised, had been approved without vote by the Special Political Committee on 30 November. Introducing the 37-nation text, Senegal said that the latest estimated number of refugees, excluding those considered as temporarily settled, was over 12.6 million. In Africa, which harboured more than half that number, one person in every 75 was a refugee; of the 10 States having the greatest number of refugees in proportion to the local population, six were African. If nothing was done, the 1980s would become the "refugee decade". In addition to the human suffering, the refugee flows threatened the order and stability of the countries of asylum and the entire region.

Senegal saw the 1980 initiative by the Federal Republic of Germany for Assembly consideration of the question<sup>(5)</sup> as having helped enlarge the earlier concept of the refugee problem. The current resolution aimed at opening the way for a far-reaching discussion on measures of a preventive and political nature and at enlarging the degree of consensus obtained in 1980. The sponsors envisaged the proposed group of governmental experts, representing all regional groups, as being based in New York and conducting its work by consensus, without affecting the current distribution of functions and responsibilities within the United Nations system.

On behalf of the sponsors, Senegal orally revised paragraph 3, on the right of refugees not wishing to return to their homelands to receive adequate compensation, by adding a phrase indicating recognition of that right in previous Assembly resolutions. It also revised paragraph 4 by inserting the words "as a rule" to qualify the financial responsibility of the nominating States. Senegal subsequently revised paragraph 5 to ensure that the Group would pay due regard to, rather than merely keep in mind, the principle of non-intervention.

Although no vote was taken, explanations of position were made by 11 States, including Ethiopia, Guinea, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Madagascar and Viet Nam, which indicated they would have abstained.

The Lao People's Democratic Republic considered that paragraph 3 on refugees' rights could have been better worded to avoid misunderstanding. For Viet Nam, the text, though improved, remained unbalanced and ambiguous. Guinea considered that the text failed to reflect the cause of refugee flows, and feared the future international co-operation based on the text, especially on the fifth preambular paragraph, would prove superficial.

Caution against a proliferation of organs was sounded by Brazil and Cuba. Madagascar and the USSR called for non-duplication of the work of existing United Nations organs. Brazil also felt that the Group's mandate was not specific enough. Madagascar believed that what was needed was the establishment of a new international economic order and the elimination of apartheid and colonialism.

Cuba supported the resolution in so far as it was not an instrument for demographic protection, cold war or interference in the internal affairs of States. The USSR also opposed using the refugee question for political or propaganda purposes, and called for due regard to such principles as the inadmissibility of interference in the internal affairs of States by other States or by the United Nations.

Israel supported the text on the understanding that, where there was an anomalous relationship, including a state of war, between countries concerned in refugee flows, the right to return and the question of compensation would form part of the comprehensive settlement and peace agreement negotiations between those States.

Cyprus requested that the resolution be regarded as covering both refugees and displaced persons. Somalia pointed out, however, that the text made no mention of displaced persons and that the statement by Cyprus reflected the position of that delegation only.

In the Committee debate, the United Kingdom, a sponsor, stated that the reference to colonialism in the fifth preambular paragraph was unrelated to the United Kingdom's relations with its few remaining dependent Territories.

The 1980 initiative of the Federal Republic of Germany leading to Assembly consideration of the question was welcomed by Australia, Austria, Egypt, Finland, Indonesia, Malaysia, Morocco, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, the Philippines, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Spain, the Sudan, Togo and Zaire. Austria said the issues of migration and refugees might prove to be among the most important and troubling world problems of the coming decades, directly affecting the concept of the modern nation State and of international relations.

Many States supported the establishment of a group of governmental experts, among them Democratic Kampuchea, Egypt, Indonesia, Pakistan and Zaire. Other supporters, including Greece, Norway, the Philippines, Portugal, Sierra Leone and the United Kingdom, the last on behalf of the members of the European Community (EC), said the Group should draw on existing international instruments. Pakistan thought it valuable to synthesize and develop the existing body of knowledge-which consisted of a number of scattered legal instruments and patchy experience-on the pattern of the Assembly's 1970 Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.<sup>(2)</sup>

Canada, Egypt, the Federal Republic of Germany, Malaysia, Norway, Somalia, Spain and the EC countries called on the Group to develop practical measures and/or general guidelines. New Zealand advised it to focus on specific aspects rather than be diverted by related problems that could more appropriately be handled in other United Nations organs. Italy suggested that the Group study ways of enhancing the United Nations responsiveness to emergency situations involving massive exodus of refugees.

Australia, although it would have preferred an ad hoc committee, expressed support for the Group and said it was ready to nominate an expert. Kenya thought a comprehensive review and the preparation of guidelines based on non-interference could be carried out either on the basis of existing instruments or through the creation of a group.

Italy, Japan, Portugal and Spain called for the Group's adherence to the respect for State sovereignty and for non-intervention in internal affairs. Malaysia expressed confidence that the resolution provided the Group with clear guidelines, including non-interference in States' internal affairs and non-infringement of the prerogatives of existing international organizations and institutions.

As to the Group's composition, Indonesia and Kenya said consideration should be given to equitable geographical distribution. Australia and Kenya called, in addition, for the use of expertise in dealing with refugee questions, and the Sudan asked that experts from the developing world, especially from those States directly concerned with the problem, be asked to participate at United Nations expense. Australia, Indonesia and the Sudan believed the Group should conduct its work by consensus.

Misgivings or opposition to the creation of an expert group were voiced by, among others, Bangladesh, Ethiopia, India, Mexico and the Sudan. Bangladesh said that, although the Group could serve a useful purpose, it preferred to await a consensus on the proposal to establish it. India asserted that existing guidelines and machinery were more than adequate, and Bangladesh and Mexico said examining and improving them might help solve the problem and avoid duplication of work. Viet Nam supported making the existing machinery and instruments more effective to encourage the most appropriate solution through bilateral agreements. Ethiopia and the Sudan called for more scrupulous adherence to the existing instruments, notably the Charter of the United Nations; the Sudan also expected the group, if established, to define the role of existing organs.

India warned that, if the Security Council could not halt aggression or restore the inalienable rights of peoples and nations under foreign occupation, a subsidiary organ of the Assembly was unlikely to achieve that result. Mexico considered it the task of the Council and other appropriate organs, rather than of an expert group, to deal with political conflicts which went beyond national boundaries and threatened international peace and security. For Ethiopia, the creation of a new organ would contribute little, provide an additional instrument for interference in the internal affairs of States and lead to more refugee flows.

Morocco said a comprehensive review of the problem should clarify the practical measures needed, including the possibility of preparing a declaration or creating a new machinery; however, the powers of the Secretary-General or the Security Council might suffice. India wanted the group to respect the principle of non-interference in States' internal affairs.

In addition to their sympathy for the human suffering involved, many countries, including Australia, Canada, China, Egypt, Finland, Greece, Japan, Malaysia, Morocco, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, the Philippines, Sierra Leone, Somalia and Zambia, expressed concern at the implications of massive refugee flows, notably the burden on receiving States, destabilizing effects on the internal economic and social order, and increased tension and threats to regional and international peace and security. Zaire said it knew from experience that humanitarian duty imposed a heavy financial burden on receiving States, and Pakistan mentioned that it had spent $200 million in 1981 to provide for the 2.5 million Afghan refugees on its territory. Indonesia stated that refugee flows not only created a burden on the receiving States but also placed the Government responsible for causing them in difficult circumstances, both internally and internationally.

Aside from natural disasters, most speakers considered the diverse causes of refugee flows to be basically political.

Most often mentioned as a cause were political and military developments, both domestic and foreign—such as political oppression, foreign intervention, armed aggression and military occupation, as Somalia put it. Ethiopia, Kenya, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, the Sudan and Viet Nam identified colonialism as a cause, while denial of the right of peoples to self-determination was mentioned by Bangladesh, Egypt, Pakistan and Somalia. Violation of international law was cited by Democratic Kampuchea, Greece and Singapore, while human rights violations were listed by Austria, India, Sierra Leone, the United Kingdom (for the EC members) and Zambia. Racial discrimination was another cause, according to Austria, Japan and the Sudan, and apartheid was listed by Bangladesh, Kenya, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Pakistan, Viet Nam and Zambia. Bangladesh, the Lao People's Democratic Republic and Viet Nam regarded Zionism as a cause. Iran said people sometimes fled their homelands to preserve independence, freedom and faith.

Social and/or economic factors were mentioned by Austria, Ethiopia, Italy, Singapore, the Sudan and the United Kingdom, the last on behalf of the EC members. Economic disparities and the absence of a new international economic order were other factors, according to Bangladesh, India, the Lao People's Democratic Republic and Sierra Leone.

Specific recent events were listed by some as having caused massive flows of refugees. Democratic Kampuchea spoke of the USSR invasion of Afghanistan, wars of aggression in the Horn of Africa and in southern Africa, the Vietnamese invasion of Kampuchea and the tragedy of the Vietnamese "boat people". Japan spoke of millions of people forced to flee as a result of two military incursions within the past three years. Iran charged that Iraq expelled its citizens for their racial and ancestral ties with the Iranians.

For Malaysia, mass exoduses were caused by "push and pull" factors, which included propaganda, incitement and other forms of encouragement through the mass media; it hoped the expert Group would deal with States' obligations not to set such factors in motion.

A search for preventive rather than purely curative or remedial measures was called for by many, among them Australia, Canada, Finland, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Italy, Norway, Singapore, Somalia, Zaire and Zambia. Finland, the Federal Republic of Germany, Pakistan and the Sudan said humanitarian efforts should be supplemented by political action. While Canada, Egypt and Portugal stressed the need for political solutions, the Lao People's Democratic Republic said the issue should be totally depoliticized and approached from the humanitarian angle alone.

Finland said the concept of the international community's responsibility should not be seen as absolving the States that had caused a refugee problem. Democratic Kampuchea called for exerting pressure on the culprits, and the Philippines pointed to the need to deal with the acts of States that resulted in refugee flows. China saw the need to force those responsible to abide by United Nations resolutions, including the possibility of dispatching fact-finding missions. Viet Nam asserted that the political causes of the problem were too numerous and diverse to be attributed solely to the conduct of Governments of the countries of origin.

Bangladesh, Ethiopia, the Lao People's Democratic Republic and Morocco believed that the establishment of a new international economic order could help prevent refugee flows. In India's opinion, what was needed was a new system of international relations based on respect for independence, security and development of all peoples.

As for more specific measures, Australia suggested the establishment of early-warning mechanisms and the empowering of international organs to carry out such functions as inquiry into potential mass-flow situations, mediation and the formulation of recommendations for their solution or improvement. Making a similar suggestion, Somalia said the findings of such a special body could form a basis for action by the General Assembly or the Security Council. Some countries, including Austria, advised that account be taken of the prerogatives of the Council and the good offices of the Secretary-General. The Federal Republic of Germany suggested improving international mechanisms-for instance by broadening the mandates of United Nations bodies and specialized agencies, creating new bodies within the system and enhancing the role of regional organizations; any recommendations regarding the institutional framework should be geared to making it easier rather than more difficult for States to seek international assistance.

A number of countries, among them Egypt, Greece, Malaysia and the Sudan, asked that special regard be paid to the right of refugees to return home. Greece also mentioned a similar right for displaced persons. Ethiopia asserted that, since there were 17 million displaced persons in the world as compared to 10 million refugees, no satisfactory solution to the refugee-flow problem could be envisaged without a simultaneous effort to solve that of displaced persons.

Egypt said the States responsible for causing refugee flows had the obligation to adopt measures for repatriation or for compensation to those who preferred not to return. While supporting the right to repatriation, Canada said that, in view of the size and complexity of the refugee situation, the idea of compensating refugees not wishing to return would require considerable study of financial and legal implications and practical aspects. Japan said due account should be taken of the right of everyone to leave any country, including his own.

International co-operation to avert new flows of refugees
The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 35/124 of 11 December 1980 on international co-operation to avert new massive flows of refugees,

Having examined the report of the Secretary-General,

Taking note of the comments and suggestions submitted by Member States, organs of the United Nations and specialized agencies in response to General Assembly resolution 35/124,

Gravely concerned about the continuing massive flows of refugees in many parts of the world and the human suffering affecting millions of men, women and children who flee or are forcibly expelled from their homelands,

Reaffirming the strong condemnation of policies and practices of oppressive and racist régimes, as well as aggression, colonialism, apartheid, alien domination, foreign intervention and occupation, which are among the root causes of new massive flows of refugees throughout the world resulting in great human suffering,

Taking into account the importance of socio-economic factors in the creation of refugee situations,

Reaffirming the inviolability of the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of other existing International instruments, norms and principles relevant, inter alia, to responsibilities of States with regard to averting new massive flows of refugees, as well as to the status and the protection of refugees, and also reaffirming the framework of competences of existing international organizations and institutions,

Stressing that massive flows of refugees may not only affect the domestic order and stability of receiving States but also jeopardize the political and social stability and the economic development of entire regions and thus endanger international peace and security,

Noting that, in addition to creating individual human misery, massive flows of refugees can impose great political, economic and social burdens upon the international community as a whole, with dire effects on developing countries, particularly those with limited resources of their own,

Convinced that averting new massive flows of refugees is, therefore, a matter of urgent concern for the international community as a whole,

Reaffirming its resolution 2625(XXV) of 24 October 1970, by which it approved the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations,

Commending the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and his staff for their untiring humanitarian and social efforts, for which the Office of the High Commissioner has twice been awarded the Nobel Peace Prize,

Commending also for their contributions all Governments, organs of the United Nations, specialized agencies and inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations which have provided aid, and stressing the importance of their efforts in this field,

Conscious of the importance of developing, in order to avert new massive flows of refugees, appropriate means of international co-operation in accordance with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and, in particular, with the principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of sovereign States and also with the principle that nothing in the Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters that are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Welcomes the comments and suggestions submitted in response to General Assembly resolution 35/124 by Member States, organs of the United Nations and specialized agencies on international co-operation to avert new massive flows of refugees and on facilitating the return of those refugees who wish to return;

3. Emphasizes the right of refugees to return to their homes in their homelands and reaffirms the right, as contained in its previous resolutions, of those who do not wish to return to receive adequate compensation;

4. Decides to establish a group of governmental experts of seventeen members who shall be appointed by the Secretary-General, upon nomination by the Member States concerned after appropriate consultation with the regional groups and with due regard to equitable geographical distribution, and whose expenses as a rule shall be borne by each nominating State for its expert;

5. Requests the Group of Governmental Experts on International Co-operation to Avert New Flows of Refugees, in the light of the existing relevant international instruments, norms and principles and with due regard to the rights mentioned in paragraph 3 above, to undertake as soon as possible, in order to improve international co-operation to avert new massive flows of refugees, a comprehensive review of the problem in all its aspects, with a view to developing recommendations on appropriate means of international co-operation in this field, having due regard to the principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of sovereign States;

6. Requests the Group of Governmental Experts to be mindful of the importance of reaching general agreement whenever that has significance for the outcome of its work;

7. Calls upon the Group of Governmental Experts to take into account the comments and suggestions submitted to the Secretary-General in response to resolution 35/124 and any further comments and suggestions from Member States, organs and organizations of the United Nations and specialized agencies, as well as the views expressed during the debate on this item at the thirty-sixth session of the General Assembly and also the study to be submitted to the Commission on Human Rights at its thirty-eighth session by the special rapporteur, pursuant to its resolution 29(XXXVII) of 11 March 1981, and furthermore the deliberations on this study by the Commission;

8. Calls upon Member States that have not yet submitted to the Secretary-General their comments and suggestions on this item to do so as soon as possible;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare a further compilation of the replies received in accordance with paragraph 8 above and to provide the Group of Governmental Experts with all necessary assistance and facilities for the completion of its task;

10. Calls upon the Group of Governmental Experts to submit a report to the Secretary-General in time for deliberation by the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session;

International protection of refugees

REPORT OF THE HIGH COMMISSIONER. In his report<sup>(1)</sup> to the General Assembly on developments during 1981, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees stated that Governments were adopting an increasingly restrictive approach in granting asylum and refugee status, possibly due to continued arrival of asylum seekers and public hostility against them. Moreover, the economic recession encouraged the view that all aliens were potential competitors for limited economic opportunities, thus resulting in overlooking the special situation of refugees.

In many parts of the world, asylum seekers continued to face physical danger. In South Asia and Central America, refugees were shot down while trying to reach the safety of a refugee camp, and some 50 per cent of asylum seekers in the South China Sea reaching the shores of their country of first asylum were victims of physical assault and robbery in the course of their flight. Numerous cases of murder and abduction were also recorded. In some countries, refugees in camps were the victims of attacks by the military forces of neighbouring countries.

The High Commissioner also noted with utmost concern the cases of refoulement- the forcible return of asylum seekers to countries where they faced the danger of persecution or death. In addition to a large-scale distribution of identity cards to refugees in a number of countries, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) provided some 8,000 convention travel documents- papers enabling refugees to travel outside their country of asylum - to Governments on request.

The High Commissioner convened at Geneva in April a meeting of a group of experts on temporary refuge in situations of large-scale influx, as had been requested by the Executive Committee of the High Commissioner's Programme. In December, a Symposium on the Promotion, Dissemination and Teaching of Fundamental Human Rights of Refugees was held in Tokyo, under the joint auspices of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, UNHCR and the United Nations University.

REGIONAL ACTION. At the regional level, the Inter-American Convention on Extradition, containing a provision prohibiting the extradition of bona fide refugees, was adopted at Caracas, Venezuela, in February 1981, and the Colloquium on Asylum and the International Protection of Refugees in Latin America, meeting in Mexico in May, recognized the need for harmonizing the concepts defined in relevant inter-American conventions with those in international instruments. The African Charter of Human and People's Rights, adopted in July at Nairobi, Kenya, affirmed the right of the persecuted to seek and obtain asylum, as did the Universal Islamic Declaration on Human Rights, which was adopted in September. In November, the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe adopted a recommendation on the harmonization of national procedures relating to asylum.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE ACTION. The UNHCR Executive Committee noted at its October 1981 session<sup>(2)</sup> that, despite a broader understanding of the principles of international protection, the basic rights of refugees had been disregarded in a number of areas in the world. It noted with particular concern that in certain areas refugees had been denied asylum, rejected at the frontier or subjected to expulsion or forcible return, and had fallen victim to pirate attacks at sea. It also noted with grave concern the military attacks on refugee camps in southern Africa and elsewhere.

The Committee stated that, in situations of large-scale influx, asylum seekers should be admitted to the extent possible to the State in which they first sought refuge, and that the principle of non-refoulement -including non-rejection at the frontier-should be observed. The Committee listed 16 minimum basic human standards for the treatment of asylum seekers temporarily admitted to States pending arrangements for a durable solution, and declared that asylum seekers and UNHCR were to be entitled access to each other. The Committee also called for burden-sharing with the receiving States so requesting, and urged Governments to seek removal of the root causes of large-scale movements (P. 1050).

Further, the Committee requested the High Commissioner to convene a working group- comprising representatives of the maritime States, the coastal States most concerned, potential countries of resettlement and competent international bodies- to elaborate principles and measures to deal with the complex problems arising from the rescue, disembarkation and resettlement of asylum seekers at sea. The group was requested to report to the Executive Committee in 1982.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 14 December 1981, the General Assembly urged Governments to support the High Commissioner in promoting international protection, by observing the principle of asylum and non-refoulement and by protecting asylum seekers in large-scale influx situations.

The UNHCR Executive Committee,<sup>(1)</sup> at its October session at Geneva, expressed hope for further accessions to the Convention and the Protocol and for those States maintaining geographical limitation in respect of their obligations under the Convention to withdraw that limitation. It also noted with satisfaction the measures taken by various States for the effective implementation of their obligations under the Convention, particularly as regards determination of refugee status.

Chapter XXII

Drugs of abuse

The drug abuse situation continued to deteriorate in 1981 in most parts of the world, affecting all age groups and social strata, and creating social and human problems. United Nations bodies reported expanded production and trafficking of illicit narcotic drugs and increased abuse of psychotropic substances. The work of the international drug control organs, particularly the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, focused on such priority areas as improvement of the control system, reduction of illicit drug traffic and rehabilitation of drug abusers.

In December, the General Assembly adopted two resolutions aimed at remedying the situation. In one, it adopted an International Drug Abuse Control Strategy and a five-year programme of action for 1982-1986,<sup>(8)</sup> as finalized by the Commission in February. In the other, the Assembly acknowledged the need for a comprehensive international campaign against traffic in drugs and declared that such a campaign, in the context of the Strategy, should aim at strengthening regional and international law enforcement and co-operation.<sup>(7)</sup>

Recognizing that better-informed public opinion could increase the effectiveness of the fight against drug abuse, the Economic and Social Council, in May, urged Governments to give primary importance to the provision of full and accurate information on the hazardous effects of the abuse of narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances.<sup>(5)</sup>

and called on both importing and exporting countries to remain vigilant so as to prevent diversion from licit to illicit uses.<sup>(3)</sup> Further, in order to maintain a world-wide balance between the supply and the legitimate demand for narcotic drugs for medical and scientific purposes, the Council appealed to the importing countries to support the longest-standing supplier countries.<sup>(4)</sup>

In addition, the Council authorized the Commission to hold a special five-day session in 1982 to examine, in detail, specific topics related to the social and human problems created by drug abuse.<sup>(6)</sup>

The Commission on Narcotic Drugs held its twenty-ninth session at Vienna, Austria, from 2 to 11 February 1981.<sup>(2)</sup> In addition to the recommendations made to the Council, it urged Governments to participate in the Certification Scheme on the Quality of Pharmaceutical Products Moving in International Commerce, as formulated by the World Health Organization, in order to prevent the importation of low-quality or falsely labelled narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances into developing countries (p. 1062). The Commission also recommended that Governments speed up and intensify measures to identify the nature, extent and characteristics of the illicit demand for drugs (p. 1059).

The International Narcotics Control Board held two sessions at Vienna—18 to 29 May (twenty-ninth session) and 13 October to 6 November (thirtieth session)<sup>(1)</sup>—and published in December a study on the demand and supply of opiates for medical and scientific needs.

Long-term UN programme

An international strategy for drug abuse control and a five-year programme of action for 1982-1986 were adopted on 11 February 1981 by the Commission on Narcotic Drugs.<sup>(1)</sup> In inviting the Economic and Social Council to transmit to the General Assembly the strategy and the programme, the Commission stressed the need for the full and active co-operation and dedication of all countries concerned, and recommended that the proposed projects be carried out as much as possible in 1982 as a start for the five-year programme of action.

The strategy recognized that the global dimensions of the problem of drug abuse called for a universal approach, co-ordinated through the United Nations. It outlined a series of policy measures to improve the drug control system, achieve a balance between demand for and supply of drugs for legitimate purposes, reduce the illicit drug traffic and rehabilitate drug abusers. The five-year programme spelled out the guidelines for action, as well as 22 projects for implementation during 1982, to complement the existing United Nations activities in the field of drug abuse.

On 6 May, the Economic and Social Council, acting without vote, decided to transmit to the General Assembly at its 1981 session the strategy and the five-year programme, as well as comments made in the Council.<sup>(3)</sup> The Council's Second (Social) Committee approved the draft in like manner on 21 April, as orally proposed by its Chairman on a recommendation by the Commission. Speaking in explanation of position on behalf of the Nordic countries, Sweden stated that the strategy's success depended on the provision of adequate resources to the agencies concerned.

In a 16 December resolution,<sup>(2)</sup> adopted without vote, the Assembly adopted the International Drug Abuse Control Strategy and the programme of action, and called for their implementation by all concerned. It requested the Commission, within available resources, to establish a task force to monitor, co-ordinate and report on progress in their implementation. The task force would be composed of representatives of the Member States most interested in and affected by drug abuse problems or the licit production of drugs and by those of the United Nations drug-related bodies. The Commission was asked to review the work of the task force and report to the Assembly in 1983 and annually thereafter, through the Economic and Social Council. Further, the Assembly urged Member States to initiate or increase contributions to the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control (p. 1065), in order to ensure the success of the Strategy and to give a firm impetus to the battle against international drug traffickers.

Introducing the draft in the Assembly's Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, also on behalf of Australia, Bolivia, India, Malaysia, Mali, Morocco, Pakistan, Sweden and Turkey, the United States said it was intended to encourage all States to participate in the fight against all aspects of the problems associated with the production, trafficking and consumption of illicit drugs.

Subsequently, the sponsors orally revised the text by deleting a paragraph requesting the Secretary-General, within available resources, to assist in the Strategy's implementation. By another change, the task force was to include Member States interested in and affected by the "licit production of drugs" rather than by the "abuse of legally produced drugs". When the Committee approved the text, as revised, on 30 November without vote, the USSR said its joining the consensus did not signify a change in its position regarding the financing of the Fund. Belgium would have preferred that the United Nations refrain from establishing new international drug control bodies, such as the proposed task force.

Support for the Strategy and the programme were expressed in the Committee by Argentina, the Federal Republic of Germany, India, Madagascar, Malaysia, New Zealand, Norway (on behalf of Nordic countries), Pakistan and the United States. The United Kingdom expressed concern that the proposed task force might duplicate the work of the Commission itself.

International Drug Abuse Control Strategy

The General Assembly,

Having received from the Economic and Social Council the report containing the draft International Drug Abuse Control Strategy that was requested by the General Assembly in resolutions 32/124 of 16 December 1977, 33/168 of 20 December 1978, 34/177 of 17 December 1979 and 35/195 of 15 December 1980.

Considering that the scourge of drug abuse continues to spread and has reached epidemic proportions in many parts of the world and that, as specified in the request for the inclusion of the item entitled "International campaign against traffic in drugs" in the agenda of the thirty-sixth session of the General Assembly, it is necessary to adopt scientific, technical and political measures commensurate with the gravity of the problem,

Emphasizing the conclusion contained in paragraph 2 of Commission on Narcotic Drugs resolution 1(XXIX) of 11 February 1981 that, in order for any international action in the field of drug abuse control to be successful, the full and active co-operation and dedication of all countries must be forthcoming,

Recognizing the urgent need for an effective, comprehensive, co-ordinated global strategy to prevent and control drug trafficking, the illicit demand for drugs and drug abuse, as well as for comprehensive, co-ordinated strategies at the regional and national levels,

1. Adopts the International Drug Abuse Control Strategy and the basic five-year programme of action dealt with in Commission on Narcotic Drugs resolution 1(XXIX) which the Economic and Social Council, in its decision 1981/113 of 6 May 1981, decided to transmit to the General Assembly;

2. Urges that the international Drug Abuse Control Strategy and the programme of action be given priority by all Governments and be implemented as quickly as possible by the relevant bodies of the United Nations and other international organizations;

3. Requests the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, within available resources, to establish a task force, in consultation with the Directors-General of the appropriate specialized agencies and other United Nations drug-related bodies, composed of representatives of these agencies and bodies and representatives of the Member States most interested in and affected by the production, trafficking and consumption of and demand for illicit drugs, as well as those interested in and affected by the licit production of drugs, to review, monitor and co-ordinate the implementation of the International Drug Abuse Control Strategy and the programme of action and to submit a report to the Commission at each session or special session on the progress made in implementing the Strategy and programme of action and to provide any recommendations it deems necessary regarding future revision of such Strategy and programme of action;

4. Requests the Commission on Narcotic Drugs to review the report of its task force and to report thereon, through the Economic and Social Council, to the General Assembly at its thirty-eighth session and annually thereafter;

5. Urges all Member States and non-member States parties to the international drug control treaties, specialized agencies and other international organizations and private institutions concerned with the drug abuse problem to participate in and support activities related to international drug abuse control strategy and policies;

6. Also urges, in order to ensure the success of the International Drug Abuse Control Strategy and to give a firm impetus to the battle of the world community against international drug traffickers, that Member States initiate or increase contributions to the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit the text of the present resolution and related documents to all Member States and non-member States parties to the international drug control treaties and to all relevant international, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations.

Financing

Expressing its concern over the imbalance between the financial requirements of the five-year programme of action and the funds allocated in the United Nations regular budget for international drug control activities, the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, on 11 February 1981, requested the appropriate United Nations bodies to reallocate within the United Nations budget the funds needed for the efficient functioning of the international drug control system.<sup>(1)</sup> At the same time, the Commission invited the Economic and Social Council to consider that request and transmit it to other appropriate bodies.

Drug abuse

The Commission on Narcotic Drugs, at its 1981 session,<sup>(1)</sup> observed a sharp increase in drug-related deaths and a further increase in the abuse of amphetamines, cocaine hydrochloride, barbiturates, non-barbiturate sedative-hypnotics and benzodiazepines. While heroin abuse continued to spread, the abuse of LSD (lysergic acid diethylamide) was reported levelling off. Cannabis remained the drug most widely abused in the world and stronger preparations were increasingly available on illicit markets (p. 1060). Although the recorded drug abuse predominantly affected the young, people of all age groups and social strata were found to be abusers.

In an 8 October report to the General Assembly, the Secretary-General observed a sharp increase in the illicit production, near the supply source, of more potent narcotic drugs by processes which reduced the volume and thus made smuggling easier; the illicit production of, and traffic in, psychotropic substances were also increasing in many parts of the world.<sup>(2)</sup>

Control of drug abuse

Recognizing the need for determined action to prevent or reduce illicit demand for drugs, the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, on 10 February 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> recommended that Governments strengthen measures already being taken in accordance with international drug control treaties, and speed up and intensify measures to identify the nature, extent and characteristics of illicit demand. The Commission also recommended that Governments take all practicable measures to develop community-based programmes for drug abuse prevention as well as for the early identification, treatment and rehabilitation of drug abusers. In addition, the Commission urged the Secretary-General, the World Health Organization, the International Labour Organisation and all other concerned international organizations to give priority to the allocation of resources to assist Member States to achieve those goals.

Information dissemination

On the recommendation of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, the Economic and Social Council, on 6 May 1981, requested Governments to give primary importance to the provision of full and accurate information on the hazardous effects of the abuse of narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances.<sup>(1)</sup> The Council, by a resolution adopted without vote, also urged Governments, having due regard to their constitutional and other systems, to stop publication of material encouraging drug abuse, and asked them to confine all official statements to accurate information that avoided presumption or speculation.

When the Council's Second (Social) Committee approved the text without vote on 21 April, the United States said that, although Governments had a role to play in drug abuse prevention, each country had the sovereign responsibility to act through the mechanisms most suitable to its needs and in conformity with its own constitutional, legal and social systems. The United Kingdom accepted the consensus on the understanding that the text's provisions were not in contradiction with the freedom of the press in democratic countries.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/9

Adopted without vote Meeting 14 6 May 1981

Approved by Second Committee (E/1981/58) without vote. 21 April (meeting 4); draft by Commission on Narcotic Drugs (E/1981/24): agenda item 11.

Promotion of understanding of the problems of drug abuse by the general public

The Economic and Social Council.

Recalling article 38, paragraph 3, of the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, 1961, as amended by the 1972 Protocol Amending the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, 1961, and article 20, paragraph 3, of the Convention on Psychotropic Substances, 1971.

Recalling also General Assembly resolution 35/195 of 15 December 1980.

Deeply concerned that the spread of drug abuse threatens the health of the young and constitutes a problem that jeopardizes the future of a number of communities,

Recognizing that better-informed public opinion could substantially increase the effectiveness of the fight against drug abuse,

Recognizing also that full and accurate information is essential if the maximum effect is to be obtained from the efforts of the International community,

1. Requests Governments to attribute primary importance to ensuring that full and accurate information concerning the hazardous effects of the abuse of narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances is available to all who may be able to assist in preventing drug abuse, especially among young people;

2. Urges Governments, having due regard to their constitutional, legal and administrative systems, to take all possible action to stop the publication or propagation of any written or other material that directly or indirectly encourages, stimulates or aims at increasing drug abuse;

3. Invites Governments to supply in the most appropriate manner all information and material necessary to ensure that national and international public opinion is correctly informed of efforts and achievements against drug abuse and the illicit drug traffic;

4. Asks the Governments and agencies concerned to confine any press releases or statements from official sources to accurate information that avoids any presumption or speculation for which no proof exists;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit the present resolution to the Governments, specialized agencies, inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations concerned for their consideration and appropriate action.

Scientific research on cannabis

The Vienna-based International Narcotics Control Board (INCB), in its 1981 report,<sup>(1)</sup> observed that cannabis and its products continued to dominate the illicit drug traffic in many countries and that the consumption of cannabis, in the high potency unavailable 10 years earlier, had risen steeply.

The Board reported that, according to studies carried out in a number of countries, heavy cannabis use could produce acute psychotic reactions, lowered resistance to disease, and adverse effects on the reproductive and endocrine systems, the lungs and even personality. Sophisticated pulmonary-function testing in many well-controlled studies concluded that cannabis smoking was more injurious to the lungs than tobacco. Even occasional use of cannabis could cause maladies severe enough to require medical intervention. The Board concluded that the dissemination of the research findings could help to discourage cannabis use, and that Governments should, therefore, make such evidence known to the public at large and conduct research so as to monitor changes in national drug use levels and public attitudes.

Supply and demand

In December 1981, INCB published a study on the demand and supply of opiates for medical and scientific needs,<sup>(2)</sup> on the basis of information obtained during a series of consultations conducted in 1980 and 1981 with all Governments concerned as producers, manufacturers and consumers. The Board also continued its study of the factors that determined the balance between the demand and supply of opiates for such needs, in order to formulate a programme of action.

In its 1980 annual report,<sup>(1)</sup> submitted to the Economic and Social Council for consideration in 1981, INCB noted that the maintenance of excessive stocks in producing countries had cast heavy additional financial and other burdens on those countries; asserted that India and Turkey, as the longest-standing producers for export, merited special consideration and practical support from the international community; and suggested that both importing and exporting countries should exercise control and monitor the movement and amount of drugs.<sup>(3)</sup>

Noting that the maintenance of a world-wide balance between the supply of narcotic drugs and the legitimate demand for them constituted an important aspect of the international drug abuse control strategy and policy, the Council, on 6 May,<sup>(5)</sup> appealed to the importing countries to support those supplier countries which had been the longest-standing producers for export of narcotic raw materials for medical and scientific purposes. It also urged major producing countries with recently established export capacity to restrict their production to meet mainly their domestic requirements. The resolution was adopted by 45 votes to none, with 5 abstentions. Acting on a February recommendation of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, the Council's Second (Social) Committee approved the draft on 21 April by 41 votes to none, with 6 abstentions.

In a related action of 10 February,<sup>(4)</sup> the Commission, by 25 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions, urged parties to the 1961 Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, if engaged in the cultivation of Papaver bracteatum (the thebaine poppy), to report voluntarily to INCB on production and on the area of cultivation. The Commission recommended that INCB consider the steps necessary to monitor the production and utilization of Papaver bracteatum, which was not under international control.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/8

--------	---------	----	---	-----	------

Approved by Second Committee (E/1981/58) by vote (41-0-6) 21 April (meeting 4); draft by Commission on Narcotic Drugs (E/1981/24); agenda item 11.

Maintenance of a world-wide balance between the supply of narcotic drugs and the legitimate demand for these drugs for medical and scientific purposes

Recalling the relevant provisions of the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, 1961, to limit the cultivation, production, manufacture and use of narcotic drugs to a quantity required for medical and scientific purposes,

Recalling its resolutions 1979/8 of 9 May 1979 and 1980/20 of 30 April 1980 and General Assembly resolution 35/195 of 15 December 1980.

Bearing in mind that the maintenance of a world-wide balance between the supply of narcotic drugs and the legitimate demand for those drugs for medical and scientific purposes constitutes an important aspect of the international drug abuse control strategy and policy,

Having considered the report of the International Narcotics Control Board for 1980 on the world requirements and supply of narcotic raw materials for medical and scientific purposes, In particular the observations made in paragraphs 58 and 60 of the report,

Noting the observations of the Board that maintenance of excessive stocks in some countries has cast heavy additional financial and other burdens on those countries,

1. Appeals to the Governments of all importing countries to support the countries referred to in paragraph 58 of the report of the international Narcotics Control Board for 1980, which, as traditional supplier countries, have been the longest-standing producers for export of narcotic raw materials for medical and scientific purposes;

2. Urges the Governments of major producing countries that have recently set up additional capacities for export to restrict, as recommended in paragraph 60 of the report of the International Narcotics Control Board for 1980, their production programmes to meet mainly their domestic requirements;

3. Requests the International Narcotics Control Board to continue a dialogue with the Governments concerned in regard to expeditious implementation of the resolutions on the subject so as to restore a lasting balance between supply and demand;

4. Requests also the Secretary-General to transmit the text of the present resolution to all Governments for their consideration.

Illicit traffic

In its 1980 report,<sup>(6)</sup> INCB stated that opium continued to be produced illicitly in enormous quantities and trafficked primarily in the form of heroin. Parts of the Middle East ranked as the world's main source of the illegal opiates, most of them destined for Western Europe and North America. Quantitatively, cannabis and its products dominated the illicit traffic in many countries, and the total volume of trade was mounting rapidly. Large amounts of coca leaf continued to be cultivated in Bolivia and Peru, and cocaine was manufactured mainly in Colombia and Ecuador.<sup>(5)</sup> In its 1981 report,<sup>(7)</sup> INCB said the trade in chemicals which served as precursors or agents in the illicit manufacture of drugs continued to pose serious problems because of the wide legitimate industrial use of most of them. It suggested that consideration might be given to the establishment of a precursor surveillance programme at the international level.

When the Commission on Narcotic Drugs reviewed the 1980 INCB report at its February 1981 session<sup>(4)</sup> it noted that unilateral action against the illicit drug traffic was insufficient and that there was a clear need for a co-ordinated international approach supported to the fullest extent possible by the United Nations.

On 6 May, the Economic and Social Council, by 48 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, decided to insert in its calendar of conferences and meetings for 1982 and 1983 one meeting each year for the Sub-Commission on Illicit Drug Traffic and Related Matters in the Near and Middle East and for the Meeting of Operational Heads of Narcotics Law Enforcement Agencies, Far East Region.<sup>(9)</sup> The meetings would be held in capitals in the respective regions at dates to be determined.

The Council's Second Committee approved the decision, recommended by the Commission, on 21 April by 41 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

At its 1981 session, the General Assembly took up, at the request of Bolivia, a new agenda item entitled "International campaign against traffic in drugs". Acting without vote on 14 December,<sup>(8)</sup> the Assembly acknowledged the need for a comprehensive campaign, within the context of the International Drug Abuse Control Strategy (p. 1057), and decided that such a campaign should focus on the enactment of effective national legislation, the strengthening of regional efforts, a review of the situation and needs of transit States, the provision of technical and financial assistance to countries with limited resources for drug abuse control programmes, the strengthening of law enforcement and co-operation at the regional and international levels, and a comprehensive information campaign on the harmful effects of drug abuse.

In explanation of its position after the Assembly action, Brazil said it would have preferred the use of the word "drugs" for "narcotics" in the third and fifth preambular paragraphs since "drugs" referred both to narcotics, whose traffic occurred mainly from developing to developed countries, and to psychotropics, whose traffic occurred mainly from developed to developing countries.

The 16-nation draft was introduced in the Assembly's Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee by the Bahamas, which orally revised the text to add the adjective "illegal" before the word "possession" in the ninth preambular paragraph, in view of the fact that certain persons were entitled to possess drugs. When the Third Committee approved the draft without vote on 1 December, the United States welcomed the fact that the text did not seek to establish any costly new machinery which would have to be financed by the United Nations.

In the Third Committee debate, Argentina, the Bahamas, Madagascar, the Philippines, Turkey and the United States stressed the need for international co-operation in drug traffic control and prevention. The Bahamas and Bolivia asserted that the drug traffic had a criminal, corrupting and disturbing impact on a number of developing countries. Turkey believed a relationship existed between international terrorism and narcotics smuggling, and that some of the proceeds were being used to destabilize countries for political ends.

Drug traffic was the topic of three letters from Bolivia to the Secretary-General during 1981. In the first, dated 9 April, Bolivia appealed to the United Nations to establish an international committee for the campaign against narcotics traffic, an emergency fund for rehabilitation of drug abusers and a multinational coca control agency, and to convene a world anti-drug conference in 1981.<sup>(1)</sup> In the second letter, dated 22 May, Bolivia described its campaign against the clandestine cocaine production and trade, and asserted that clear links existed between drug traffickers, members of international extremist guerrilla movements and arms suppliers.<sup>(2)</sup> Its request, contained in a letter of 11 August,<sup>(3)</sup> led to the inclusion in the 1981 Assembly agenda of an item on an international campaign against traffic in drugs.

International campaign against traffic in drugs

The General Assembly,

Recalling the relevant provisions of the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs of 1961, as amended by the 1972 Protocol Amending the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs of 1961, and the Convention on Psychotropic Substances of 1971,

Concerned that, despite national, regional and international efforts, the illicit traffic in narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances is increasing in many parts of the world,

Recognizing that many States, including those that are not producers or significant consumers of illicit narcotics, are increasingly affected by the international drug traffic,

Bearing in mind that the extensive and increasing abuse of narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances in many countries is directly linked to the volume of the traffic in illicit drugs into or through such countries,

Convinced that greater control over the production and distribution of narcotic raw materials and the reduction of the demand for illicit narcotics are necessary prerequisites for reducing the illicit traffic in narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances,

Aware of the links between drug trafficking and organized crime, illegal acquisition of firearms, exchange control violations, customs offences, various forms of criminality and other serious problems of a socio-economic nature,

Affirming the need for increased surveillance and stronger penalties regarding the use of boats, aircraft and other means of transport of any type for illicit traffic in drugs,

Acknowledging that constraints of an economic and technical nature are obstacles in many developing countries to their fight against drug trafficking,

Convinced that any liberalization of national legislation with regard to the illegal possession of and traffic in narcotics will have a negative effect on international efforts to control the illicit traffic in narcotic drugs,

Conscious of the fact that drug abuse and the related trafficking present a threat to the health and social well-being of peoples, particularly youth, and endanger the national security, resilience and future of many countries,

Mindful of the important role of an informed public opinion in the struggle against drug trafficking,

Bearing in mind United Nations programmes related to combating the problem of drug trafficking, in particular the international Drug Abuse Control Strategy,

Acknowledging the need for a comprehensive international campaign against traffic in drugs,

1. Recognizes the need for an effective international campaign against traffic in drugs in the context of the International Drug Abuse Control Strategy, which would involve activities at the national, regional and international levels, with particular emphasis on, inter alia:

(a) The enactment of effective national legislation and the strengthening of existing legislation against drug abuse, wherever necessary;

(b) The strengthening of regional efforts, with due regard to the specific problems and needs of each region;

(c) A review of the situation and needs of those States that are primarily transit States;

(d) The provision of technical and financial assistance to countries, particularly developing countries, whose limited resources are strained by their efforts to implement drug abuse control programmes;

(e) The strengthening of law enforcement efforts and increasing co-operation at the regional and international levels;

(f) A comprehensive information campaign on the hazardous effects of the abuse of narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances and the dangers of drug trafficking, and on the positive achievements in this regard;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit the present resolution to Member States, relevant bodies of the United Nations system and non-governmental organizations for comments and proposals on an effective international campaign against traffic in drugs and to report, through the Economic and Social Council, to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session;

Trade in substandard drugs

Expressing concern over the reported large-scale introduction of low-quality or falsely labelled narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances into developing countries, the Commission on Narcotic Drugs,<sup>(1)</sup> on 10 February 1981, recommended that Governments participate in the Certification Scheme on the Quality of Pharmaceutical Products Moving in International Commerce, as formulated by the World Health Organization (WHO), in order to prevent the importation of such drugs (p. 824). The Commission invited WHO, the United Nations Narcotics Laboratory and other organizations concerned to assist developing countries to develop their national drug control systems.

Implementation of the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, 1961

During 1981, no additional States adhered to the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, 1961, and the total number of parties to the unamended Convention stood at 113. Three countries—Gabon, Nigeria and Rwanda—acceded in 1981 to the Convention as amended by the 25 March 1972 Protocol, and Sri Lanka acceded to the Protocol, thus bringing to 76 the total number of parties to the Convention as amended.

In accordance with the provisions of the Convention, the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, on 4 February, decided to amend Schedule III of the Convention and its Protocol to include certain preparations containing dextropropoxyphene salts.<sup>(1)</sup>

On the same date, the Commission, by a roll-call vote of 21 to 4 (Federal Republic of Germany, India, Spain, United Kingdom), upheld its 1980 decision to include dextropropoxyphene in Schedule II of the Convention. This action was taken in response to a request by Spain that the Economic and Social Council review that decision. Spain maintained that the drug had a low dependence-liability and questioned the appropriateness of controlling the substance under the Convention,<sup>(3)</sup> a view shared by the three other dissenting countries in the Commission vote.<sup>(4)</sup> Subsequently, the Council's Second (Social) Committee, on an oral proposal by its Chairman, recommended approval of the Commission's decision without vote on 21 April, and the Council itself acted likewise on 6 May to confirm the 1980 decision.<sup>(2)</sup>

Economic and Social Council decision 1981/119

Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (E/1981/58) without vote, 21 April (meeting 4); oral proposal by Chairman; agenda item 11.

Review of decision 1 (S-VI) of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs

At its 14th plenary meeting, on 6 May 1981, the Council decided to confirm decision 1 (S-VI) of 14 February 1980 of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs on the inclusion of dextropropoxyphene in Schedule II annexed to the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, 1961, and to that Convention as amended by the 1972 Protocol.

International control of psychotropic substance

In its annual report for 1980,<sup>(2)</sup> the International Narcotics Control Board observed that effective international control of psychotropic substances was proving more complex than was originally foreseen because of the large number of such substances, their extensive use in medicine, their rapidly developing non-medical use and the great potential for clandestine manufacture. <sup>(1)</sup> The Board believed that the 1971 Convention on Psychotropic Substances (see below) should be fully implemented in order to stem the diversion of certain psychotropic substances into illicit channels.

In 1981, the Board noted that substantial licit over-production continued, especially in the case of amphetamines, methaqualone and other Schedule II substances, thus increasing the dangers of diversion, misuse and abuse.<sup>(3)</sup> The Board felt it imperative that more States accede as soon as possible to the 1971 Convention.

Implementation of the 1971 Convention

In a resolution on the implementation of the 1971 Convention on Psychotropic Substances,<sup>(1)</sup> adopted, without vote, on 6 May 1981 on the recommendation of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, the Economic and Social Council appealed to all States not parties to adhere promptly to the instrument and to States parties to enforce the control measures provided for under the Convention. The Council called on exporting countries to scrutinize the authenticity of each import authorization and on both importing and exporting countries concerned to ensure that the amounts of the substances involved were commensurate with legal requirements of manufacture or domestic consumption of the importing country, in order to prevent diversion from licit manufacture and trade. In addition, the Council invited Governments to consider the Board's suggestion that they should voluntarily refrain from exporting certain substances in amounts exceeding the likely needs unless the needs were confirmed by the importing country.

When the Council's Second (Social) Committee approved the text without vote on 21 April, the United States supported the strengthening of the Convention and called for its full implementation. The United Kingdom, though not opposed to the text, expressed some doubts about the introduction of new variations in the control of psychotropic substances.

By a series of actions taken on 4 February, the Commission on Narcotic Drugs decided that Schedule IV of the Convention should be amended to include four more substances: benzphetamine,<sup>(2)</sup> mazindol,<sup>(3)</sup> phendimetrazine<sup>(4)</sup> and phentermine.<sup>(5)</sup> In addition, the Commission decided to terminate the exemption of certain preparations from control measures, in response to notifications from the Governments of Bulgaria (for Barbamil, Hexadorm-Calcium and Glutethimide)<sup>(6)</sup> and Mexico (for Almotracina "S", Dilacoran, Fenadrops, Sedadrops and Visparax).<sup>(7)</sup>

As at the end of 1981, the following 75 States were parties to the Convention (those in italics either ratified or acceded during 1981):

Algeria, Argentina, Barbados, Benin, Brazil, Bulgaria, Byelorussian SSR, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, Finland, France, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guyana, Holy See, Hungary, Iceland, India, Iraq, Italy, Jordan, Kuwait, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Mauritius, Mexico, Monaco, Morocco, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Republic of Korea, Rwanda, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, South Africa, Spain, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Tonga, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Republic of Cameroon, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Zaire.

Implementation of the 1971 Convention on Psychotropic Substances

The Economic and Social Council,

Bearing in mind the provisions of the 1971 Convention on Psychotropic Substances,

Recalling its resolution 1576(L) of 20 May 1971, in which it endorsed the invitation of the United Nations Conference for the Adoption of a Protocol on Psychotropic Substances to States, to the extent they were able to do so, to apply provisionally the measures of control provided in the Convention pending its entry into force for each of them,

Recalling also its resolutions 1773(LIV) of 18 May 1973 and 1847(LVI) of 15 May 1974, in which it urged Governments that had not yet done so to ratify or accede to the Convention as soon as possible,

Noting with deep concern the extensive and increasing abuse of psychotropic substances and the related trafficking, which often involves diversion from licit channels,

Noting that the international Narcotics Control Board has drawn attention to cases of substantial diversion of substances listed in Schedule II of the Convention, in particular of methaqualone, amphetamine and methamphetamine.

Noting, in particular, paragraphs 21 to 36 and 162 to 172 of the report of the international Narcotics Control Board for 1980.

1. Appeals to all states that have not yet adhered to the 1971 Convention on Psychotropic Substances to become parties promptly, and pending such time to apply the measures of control provided in the Convention to the extent they are able to do so;

2. Urges States parties to the Convention that have not yet done so to enact without delay implementing laws and regulations and to enforce them fully, especially with regard to prior authorization of imports and exports, as specified in article 12, paragraph 1, of the Convention;

3. Calls upon exporting countries to use the utmost care to verify the authenticity of each import authorization and, in case of doubt, to seek to ensure that the amounts of the substances requested are commensurate with the apparent legal requirements of manufacture or domestic consumption of the importing country, and to obtain confirmation of the import certificate's authenticity, using as appropriate the good offices of the international Narcotics Control Board to facilitate such verification;

4. Calls upon importing countries to exercise continuing vigilance to ensure that the quantities of substances requested in their import certificates are commensurate with their legal requirements for manufacture or domestic consumption and to co-operate with exporting countries and the International Narcotics Control Board with a view to guarding against diversion from licit manufacture and trade;

5. Invites Governments of countries manufacturing, exporting or importing substances listed in Schedule II of the Convention to provide voluntarily to the international Narcotics Control Board in a timely manner information enabling the Board to monitor more closely the manufacture, export and import of those substances, particularly where free trading zones are involved;

6. Invites all Governments to respond positively to the suggestion of the International Narcotics Control Board that they should assess from time to time their medical and scientific requirements for substances listed in Schedule II of the Convention as well as for other controlled substances and to communicate that information to the Board for publication with a view to providing guidance for manufacture and export;

7. Further invites all Governments to consider the Board's suggestion that they should voluntarily refrain from exporting substances listed in Schedule II of the Convention in amounts that exceed countries' assessments or that clearly exceed the countries' likely needs unless prior consultation with the importing country confirms that the amount in question is desired;

8. Requests States parties and the International Narcotics Control Board to study ways in which the Convention might be strengthened by formal amendment in the light of the experience gained in the voluntary application by Governments of measures recommended by the Board;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit the present resolution to all Governments and invite them to bring it to the attention of their competent authorities in order to ensure the implementation of its provisions.

UN Fund for Drug Abuse Control

In 1981, the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control (UNFDAC) devoted 75 per cent of its resources to 15 country programmes, comprising a total of 28 sectoral projects. Some three fourths of the 1981 programmes were concerned with socio-economic problems associated with the opium poppy and heroin, as exemplified by the multisectoral programmes, emphasizing crop substitution, in Burma, Pakistan and Thailand. The Fund's expenditure for the year was $8.2 million.

The Fund participated for the first time in the United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities (p. 426), in November, and received pledges totalling some $3.5 million..

New agreements UNFDAC entered into in 1981 included a five-year multisectoral agreement with Burma, a four-year agreement for a crop substitution programme with Pakistan, multiyear research projects with Malaysia and Thailand, a special trust-fund agreement with the Federal Republic of Germany to finance most of the Buner project in Pakistan, and multi-year agreements with both Egypt and Turkey for narcotics control.

In a 10 February resolution,<sup>(1)</sup> the Commission on Narcotic Drugs commended the Secretary-General for authorizing the participation of UNFDAC in the annual United Nations Pledging Conference. The Commission urged Governments to pledge greater financial support to UNFDAC and recommended that it strengthen its fund-raising activities, in particular by presenting planned projects to potential donors.

In a resolution on the International Drug Abuse Control Strategy, adopted on 16 December,<sup>(2)</sup> the General Assembly urged Member States to initiate or increase contributions to UNFDAC in order to ensure the Strategy's success and to give an impetus to the battle against international drug traffickers.

In the Assembly's Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, Afghanistan expressed concern over the suspension, for unknown reasons, of the Fund's assistance to that country.

In 1981, 39 countries and one Territory contributed $6.7 million to UNFDAC and 19 countries pledged $3.7 million for 1982 (see table below).

Commission on Narcotic Drugs

Future sessions

In recognition of the need for the Commission on Narcotic Drugs to examine specific topics related to the social and human problems created by drug abuse, in more detail than was possible in the course of its biennial sessions, the Economic and Social Council, on 6 May 1981, decided that the Commission should hold a special session of five days' duration in 1982 at a time to be determined.<sup>(1)</sup>

The Council adopted the resolution by 40 votes to none, with 10 abstentions. Its Second (Social) Committee approved the Commission's draft on 21 April, by 34 votes to none, with 11 abstentions. Canada, the USSR and the United States abstained in the Committee vote, as they considered holding a special session to be a departure from the Commission's mandate to meet biennially and were concerned about the financial implications.

Also on 6 May, the Council, by 41 votes to none, with 9 abstentions, approved the provisional agenda and documentation for the Commission's seventh special session (1982).<sup>(3)</sup> The decision, recommended by the Commission, was approved by the Second Committee on 21 April by 33 votes to none, with 11 abstentions. In another decision of the same date, the Council approved, without vote, the provisional agenda and documentation for the Commission's regular (thirtieth) session in 1983.<sup>(2)</sup> The Second Committee acted likewise on 21 April, on a draft recommended by the Commission.

The Division assisted Governments in carrying out multisectoral programmes financed by the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control (p. 1065) in areas of law enforcement, training, research and drug demand reduction. As the Fund's largest executing agency, the Division was responsible in 1981 for one third of the estimated $6.7 million Fund expenditures for projects at Headquarters and in Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, Malawi, Malaysia and Turkey.

Chapter XXIII

Statistics

The Economic and Social Council, in May 1981, adopted two resolutions on statistics, on the recommendation of the Statistical Commission which met in New York from 12 to 21 January (twenty-first session).<sup>(1)</sup>

In one resolution, the Council reconfirmed the importance of the 1983 World Programme of Industrial Statistics as a way to obtain reliable and timely information on the progress of developing countries in industrialization, and urged all countries to provide data on that subject for the year 1983.<sup>(2)</sup> In the other, the Council urged the developing countries to participate in the development of their energy statistics in accordance with international guidelines and to request technical assistance, if necessary, to carry out such plans.<sup>(3)</sup>

The Statistical Office of the United Nations continued to collect and publish a wide range of statistical data, including those on international trade, industry, transport, energy, national accounts and population.

In 1981, the United Nations Department of Technical Co-operation for Development, supported by the Statistical Office, implemented 176 country projects in statistics, of which 69 were in Africa (p. 1072). Requests for technical co-operation increased for data processing in statistics, and the adoption and distribution of software packages for editing and tabulating census and survey data continued. Micro-computer systems for processing population censuses were introduced in four countries.

Economic statistics

1983 World Programme of industrial Statistics

The Economic and Social Council, on 4 May 1981,<sup>(5)</sup> reconfirmed the importance of the principles of the 1983 World Programme of Industrial Statistics as a means of accelerating the development of industrial statistics programmes in developing countries to provide reliable and timely information on their progress in industrialization. The Council urged multilateral and bilateral agencies to provide resources to help developing countries implement their plans for the Programme, and urged all countries to compile basic data on industry for or close to 1983, taking into account the relevant international recommendations.

The Council adopted the resolution without vote, following its approval in like manner by the First (Economic) Committee on 23 April, on the recommendation of the Statistical Commission.

The 1983 World Programme aimed at obtaining an overall perspective of world-wide industrial activity within the framework of an organized statistics programme.

The Statistical Commission,<sup>(4)</sup> in January, adopted the final draft of Recommendations for the 1983 World Programme of Industrial Statistics,<sup>(1)</sup> and requested the Secretary-General to encourage regional commissions to organize training workshops to discuss the adaptation of the recommendations to regional conditions. The first such workshop was convened by the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific (Suzhou, China, 16 November-11 December).

The United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) issued in February A Statistical Review of the World Industrial Situation, 1980,<sup>(2)</sup> which its Industrial Development Board, in May, decided should be an annual publication.<sup>(3)</sup> UNIDO also completed a study on dynamic changes in comparative advantage, which included an analysis of 134 industries in over 40 developed and developing countries. Work continued on a handbook of industrial statistics, intended for publication in 1982.

An Expert Group Meeting to Review the Preliminary Draft of the Proposed Revision to the International Recommendations for Industrial Statistics met in New York from 5 to 9 October 1981. The draft revision, incorporating the experts' views, was to be submitted to the Statistical Commission in 1983.

1983 World Programme of Industrial Statistics

The Economic and Social Council,

Taking note of the report of the Statistical Commission on its twenty-first session with reference to its strong endorsement of the 1983 World Programme of Industrial Statistics and of the emphasis it placed on the need for the Statistical Office, the regional commissions and other interested organizations to take an active role in promoting the participation of the developing countries in the Programme,

Recalling that the Statistical Commission endorsed the concept of the Programme at its twentieth session, at which it also requested the Secretary-General to encourage regional commissions to organize working groups to consider the recommendations for the Programme as a means of advancing their implementation at the country level,

Recalling further that the Second General Conference of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, held at Lima from 12 to 26 March 1975, adopted the Lima Declaration and Plan of Action on Industrial Development and Co-operation, in which both developing and developed countries were called upon to take specific measures to create conditions conducive to the industrial growth of the developing countries in keeping with the spirit embodied in the new International economic order, and to provide periodic reports on the actions taken and progress achieved,

Noting that, in accordance with the Statistical Commission's endorsement, the Statistical Office is publishing and distributing to countries the final version of the recommendations for the Programme,

Noting that the limited success of past programmes in this field has been primarily attributed to the lack of technical assistance support services for the developing countries,

1. Reconfirms the value and importance of the principles of the 1983 World Programme of Industrial Statistics as a means of accelerating the development of industrial statistics programmes in developing countries to provide reliable and timely information on their progress in industrialization;

2. Recommends that provision should be made for technical assistance to permit developing countries to participate in the Programme and urges the multilateral and bilateral agencies to provide resources, within the framework of their technical co-operation activities, to help developing countries implement their plans for the Programme;

3. Strongly urges that all countries should compile basic data on industry for 1983 or a year close to 1983, taking into account as far as possible the international recommendations on this subject, and recommends that developing countries should avail themselves of technical co-operation wherever necessary in order to complete the Programme successfully;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, in close co-operation with the regional commission, the specialized agencies, the United Nations Industrial Development Organization and other multilateral and bilateral agencies, to co-ordinate technical co-operation activities in support of the Programme;

5. Further requests the Secretary-General, in collaboration with the above-mentioned organizations, to submit a progress report to the Statistical Commission at its twenty-second session.

Energy statistics

In a resolution on international energy statistics,<sup>(2)</sup> adopted without vote on 4 May 1981, the Economic and Social Council urged the Governments of developing countries to participate in a programme of development of national statistics according to international guidelines and to request technical assistance, if necessary, to carry out that undertaking. The Council requested the Secretary-General to accord priority to the development of new statistical series in fields where there was insufficient information and to improve the timeliness, level of detail and accuracy of the statistics currently collected and disseminated.

Originally proposed by the Statistical Commission, the text was orally amended in the Council's First Committee, before its approval without vote on 23 April, to delete a preambular paragraph which would have had the Council note that energy was perhaps the gravest challenge to the existing international order.

The Statistical Commission, in January, urged developing countries to take advantage of technical co-operation under the United Nations system by requesting the services of advisers on energy statistics, and hoped that national statistical offices would provide more timely and complete responses to the Statistical Office's energy questionnaire so that the quantity and quality of international energy statistics could be improved.<sup>(1)</sup> In 1981, the Office sent the questionnaire to 190 countries.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/2

Adopted without vote Meeting 13 4 May 1981

Approved by First Committee (E/1981/60) without vote. 23 April (meeting 4); draft by Statistical Commission (E/1981/12), orally amended following informal consultations: agenda item 13.

International energy statistics

The Economic and Social Council,

Recognizing the importance of energy in the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, adopted by the General Assembly on 5 December 1980.

Recalling paragraph 4 (f) of General Assembly resolution 33/148 of 20 December 1978, in which the Assembly stressed the importance of the promotion of adequate information flows regarding all aspects of new and renewable sources of energy, especially to the developing countries,

Recalling its resolution 2054(LXII) of 5 May 1977, by which it recognized the crucial role played by training in the overall development of statistical services of Member States which are developing countries and expressed concern that, because of the lack of necessary financial and personnel resources, many developing countries, particularly the least developed, are unable on their own to set up and maintain an effective vehicle to train all levels of statisticians.

Recalling also its resolution 1978/61 of 3 August 1978, in which it expressed cognizance of the importance of ensuring the availability of new and renewable sources of energy in order to meet requirements for continued economic and social development, particularly in the developing countries, and aware of the importance of a statistical base as an integral part of planning,

Recalling further that the Statistical Commission at its twentieth session recognized that energy statistics remained an important field that continued to require further urgent consideration, co-operation and harmonization by all central statistical offices and relevant agencies,

Bearing in mind that the Committee on Natural Resources has endorsed the suggestion for setting up clearing-houses of relevant energy-related information at the national, regional and international levels and for working out procedures for sharing the information from such clearing-houses,

Aware of important gaps in energy statistics, such as the lack of comprehensive data on non-commercial fuels, information on prices, costs, value added and investment data of energy commodities,

1. Strongly urges the Governments of developing countries to participate in a programme of development of national statistics according to international guidelines and to request technical assistance if and when necessary to carry out that important undertaking;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to accord priority to the development of new statistical series in fields where insufficient information is now available and to improve the timeliness, level of detail and accuracy of the statistics currently collected and disseminated;

3. Requests the Secretary-General, in close co-operation with the regional commissions, the specialized agencies, the United Nations Development Programme and other interested organs, to strengthen and co-ordinate activities in support of energy statistics;

4. Further requests the Secretary-General to submit a progress report to the Statistical Commission at its twenty-second session.

National accounts statistics

The Statistical Commission, in January 1981, <sup>(1)</sup>emphasized the role of the System of National Accounts (SNA) as a framework and point of reference in establishing standards for related statistics, and urged the United Nations Statistical Office to increase its co-ordination functions in achieving consistency or reconciliation of such standards with the System.

It urged the development of specific proposals on short-term clarification and updating of SNA, if possible for submission to the Commission in 1983, and recognized the need, within available resources, to initiate research studies over a longer period to meet the demands for new kinds of information. Further, the Commission endorsed the use of the Handbook of National Accounting series for dissemination of the results of future work on national accounts.

The Commission also welcomed the proposed co-operation of international agencies and countries in the conceptual development of SNA, and endorsed the need for formalization of such co-operative and consultative arrangements in order to avoid duplication of work.

Trade statistics

In January 1981, the Statistical Commission <sup>(1)</sup>approved revised concepts and definitions in the field of international trade statistics, including recommendations for the collection, preparation and dissemination of such statistics at the national level, and requested the Secretary-General to arrange publication of the revised version of International Trade Statistics: Concepts and Definitions.

The Commission acknowledged the need to consider, at its next (1983) session, a third revision of the Standard International Trade Classification in order to make it available for use as of 1 January 1985.

Transport statistics

The Statistical Commission, at its January 1981 session, <sup>(1)</sup>noted that a compilation by the Statistical Office of a comprehensive network of the flow of goods on world sea lanes for 1976-1978 would be completed later in 1981, and one for 1979-1980 was expected to be issued in 1982.

The Commission encouraged the Office to analyse the data on the flow of goods with reference to vessels' movements as recorded daily by Lloyd's of London Press. It requested the Secretary-General to call the attention of all Member States to the potential of the uniform system, utilized by the Statistical Office, as a tool for developing shipping statistics for their economic planning and development, and asked him to hold seminars and workshops to promote the system and to recruit technical advisers to assist the developing countries in its implementation.

Noting the need for additional funds beyond those available under a trust fund made possible through a grant from Norway for 1978-1981 for the development of shipping statistics, the Commission welcomed the Statistical Office's plan to initiate a fund-raising campaign in 1981.

Statistical methods

International Comparison Project. In its January 1981 discussion of the progress made on the International Comparison Project (ICP), which began in 1968 as a tool for better assessment of the relative economic development of countries, the Statistical Commission considered the main difficulties encountered in the 1975 survey (phase III of the Project) as well as the future directions of the work. <sup>(1)</sup>

The Commission stressed the need for a more clearly defined and understandable methodology and for a strong co-ordinating role for the Statistical Office in that regard, and supported the Office's efforts to raise more extrabudgetary resources for the Project's continuation and its extension to more countries.

An Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts on the Long-Term Organization of ICP (Geneva, 11-13 November) discussed the regionalization of ICP, training, technical co-operation and the establishment of priorities among the ICP elements.

Statistical classifications. The Statistical Commission, in January 1981, endorsed the continuation of work on the harmonization of international economic classifications as well as the continued participation by the Statistical Office in the construction of the Harmonized System of the Customs Co-operation Council. <sup>(1)</sup>

The Commission also urged the Statistical Office to keep all interested Member States informed of proposals being developed by the Working Group on World-Level Classifications of the United Nations Statistical Office and the Statistical Office of the European Communities, and to improve co-ordination within the Office and between groups providing it with advice and guidance.

Social and demographic statistics

In January 1981, the Statistical Commission <sup>(1)</sup> discussed the 1980 World Population and Housing Census Programme, welcomed the publication of Principles and Recommendations for Population and Housing Censuses, and agreed on the need for a continuing study of census staffing and cost requirements and on the convening of an inter-regional expert group on that subject in 1982. The Commission also expressed strong interest in a study on sex-based stereotypes and sex biases in national data systems.

It also considered national, regional and international activities carried out in connection with the World Programme for the Improvement of Vital Statistics, endorsed the Secretariat proposal to prepare a special version of Principles and Recommendations for a Vital Statistics System for policy-makers at the government level, and called for the early completion and publication of the revised Handbook of Vital Statistics Methods.

Further, the Commission confirmed the need for further work on harmonizing and standardizing definitions in housing statistics; endorsed proposals for methodological studies, multidisciplinary training programmes and seminars to assess user requirements; and agreed on the publication at five-year intervals of a Compendium Of Human Settlements Statistics to coincide more closely with national planning and housing census cycles.

Commending the Secretariat's activities aimed at improving comparability of international migration statistics, the Commission approved an international programme of collection and exchange of immigrant stock data obtained in the 1980 round of population censuses. At the request of the Commission, an Expert Group on Improvement of International Migration Statistics (New York, 21-25 September) considered technical issues.

In addition, the Commission agreed to give low priority to classifications of geographical units and to have the Provisional Guidelines on Standard International Age Classifications issued, and reaffirmed the goal of integrating social, demographic and economic data bases as a long-term objective.

Environmental statistics

Noting with satisfaction the progress being made in the environmental statistics programme, especially as regards the development of an overall framework for the organization of such statistics and the completion of a survey of country practices and plans, the Statistical Commission, in January 1981, <sup>(1)</sup> requested the Statistical Office to keep the directory of country practices up to date and to continue work on the development of statistics on specific areas of environmental concern.

The Commission also requested the Secretary-General to publish the directory of country practices and plans as well as the survey on frameworks-and publications in environmental statistics, and asked the Secretariat to revise the draft conceptual framework for the development and organization of such statistics. It strongly urged the United Nations Environment Programme, which provided the initial funding for the environmental statistics project, to continue its financial support.

National Household Survey Capability Programme

In 1981, 12 project formulation missions related to the National Household Survey Capability Programme took place, 12 project proposals were approved, and survey programmes began in Ethiopia, Kenya, Malawi, Sri Lanka, Thailand and Yemen.

The Statistical Commission, in January 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> reaffirmed the value and importance of the Programme as a means of obtaining, on a continuing basis, integrated and up-to-date socio-economic and demographic statistics which the developing countries needed for their development plans and programmes. The Commission stressed the importance of technical studies on survey methodology and of co-ordinating the Programme at all levels, and welcomed the arrangements for establishing communications with donor agencies and the participating countries in the formulation of country projects and in the Programme's implementation.

Technical co-operation

In 1981, the United Nations Department of Technical Co-operation for Development, supported by the Statistical Office, implemented 176 country projects in statistics, of which 69 were in Africa.<sup>(1)</sup> Technical support to Governments in conducting population censuses and processing results led to the completion of 15 such censuses in 1981. Requests for technical co-operation increased for data processing in statistics, and the adoption and distribution of software packages for editing and tabulating census and survey data continued. Micro-computer systems for processing population censuses were introduced in four countries in 1981, in addition to the six where such installations were made the previous year. The total value of technical co-operation projects in statistics in 1981 amounted to some $31 million.

The Statistical Commission, in January 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> stressed the importance of statistical training activities, including those in the use of data processing and computer-based tools, and considered that closer co-operation was needed between regional and national training centres.

It endorsed the development of statistical data-processing packages by the Statistical Office, suggested that consideration be given to developing a statistical data-processing handbook and organizing regional and subregional meetings on data processing, and requested its Working Group on International Statistical Programmes and Co-ordination to examine methods of presenting the global picture of technical co-operation activities to meet the Commission's needs.

Work programmes

International programmes

In a decision adopted without vote on 4 May 1981, the Economic and Social Council authorized the Working Group on International Statistical Programmes and Co-ordination of the Statistical Commission to hold its ninth session from 29 September to 2 October.<sup>(1)</sup> The Council's First (Economic) Committee approved it in like manner on 23 April, on the recommendation of the Statistical Commission.

When the Working Group met at Geneva,<sup>(3)</sup> it considered the use of administrative records for statistical purposes and ways to reduce the reporting burden on countries in supplying data to international organizations. It also reviewed the provisional agenda and documentation for the twenty-second (1983) session of the Statistical Commission, and discussed the special topics that the Commission might consider at other future sessions. The Group decided to focus at its next (1983) session on the status of the ongoing programmes of the Statistical Office, the regional commissions and the specialized agencies; long-term issues for the Commission's discussion; and co-ordination of the statistical data-collection activities of international organizations.

The Administrative Committee on Co-ordination's Sub-Committee on Statistical Activities (fifteenth session, Washington, D. C., 27 April-1 May)<sup>(2)</sup> examined a series of technical questions, including a number of statistical programmes dealing with specific subjects, policies on production and distribution of statistical publications and on dissemination of machine-readable data, long-term planning in the statistical field, and implications of technological changes for international statistical organizations.

Ninth session of the Working Group on International Statistical Programmes and Co-ordination

At Its 13th plenary meeting, on 4 May 1981, the Council decided that the ninth session of the Working Group on International Statistical Programmes and Co-ordination of the Statistical Commission would be held from 29 September to 2 October 1981.

Work Programme of the Statistical Office

The Economic and Social Council, in a decision of 4 May 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> approved the 1982-1983 work programme of the United Nations Statistical Office, as submitted to the Statistical Commission, and took note of the draft 1984-1989 medium-term plan for United Nations statistical activities.

Acting according to a new requirement of the programme-planning procedure laid down by the General Assembly,<sup>(3)</sup> the Commission examined, in January 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> the relative priority of activities within the work programme of the Statistical Office and identified sets of high-priority elements, but considered none of the rest to be obsolete or ineffective. It believed that statistics, which served as a basic tool for developing national and international policy in the economic and social fields, should rank high in the priority activities of the United Nations system.

Endorsing the provisional medium-term plan of the Statistical Office, the Commission gave priority to the development of concepts and methods, co-ordination, and the provision of technical co-operation in establishing and maintaining statistical and data-processing capabilities in developing countries. It believed that some activities in the subprogrammes on data collection, processing and publication might be more efficiently carried out with appropriate technology so as to release resources for other activities.

The decision also set out the provisional agenda and documentation for that session, as proposed by the Commission. The Council acted on the recommendation of its First Committee, which approved the decision without vote on 23 April.

Chapter XXIV

Organizational questions

The Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC) and the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination (CPC) paid particular attention in 1981 to improving communication with intergovernmental organizations and to restructuring the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system.

The Economic and Social Council adopted four resolutions on organizational issues. Membership of the Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs) was enlarged from 13 to 19 in July,<sup>(4)</sup> as a result of consultations which the Council in May had entrusted its President to undertake with the regional groups on the size, composition and allocation of seats of that body.<sup>(2)</sup> By another May resolution, the Council requested the Committee on NGOs to review current consultation arrangements between the United Nations and NGOs so as to increase their effectiveness.<sup>(3)</sup>

As requested by the Council in July,<sup>(5)</sup> its President held consultations on ways to revitalize the Council. He reported in November that no consensus existed and that consultations would have to continue in 1982.

In December 1981,<sup>(6)</sup> the General Assembly decided to transmit to the Council a report by the Secretary-General describing arrangements for streamlining the economic and social activities of the United Nations Secretariat, with special reference to the role of the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation.<sup>(1)</sup>

Co-ordination in the UN system

ACC ACTIVITIES In 1981, ACC reviewed inter-agency action in rural development, co-ordination of information systems in the United Nations system, and support activities for international conferences and years. It also carried out cross-organizational programme analyses for better co-ordination of activities, worked on a system-wide medium-term environment programme and approved arrangements intended to strengthen the system's capacity to respond to emergencies.

In its 1980-1984 overview report,<sup>(1)</sup> ACC reaffirmed the importance of improving its communication with intergovernmental bodies and considered that the CPC-ACC Joint Meetings should remain the main instrument for discussion of substantive rather than managerial issues. It also began consideration of possible measures to deal with more basic and long-standing deficiencies which limited its effectiveness.

The other two reports submitted by ACC to the Economic and Social Council in 1981 covered its Joint Meetings with CPC (p. 1076)<sup>(2)</sup> and co-ordination of information systems in the United Nations system (p. 1386).<sup>(3)</sup>

ACC adopted 24 decisions in the course of its three 1981 sessions: 10 at its first regular session (Geneva, 13 and 14 April); 2 at the second session (Geneva, 29 and 30 June); and 12 at the third session (New York, 29 and 30 October).<sup>(7)</sup>

The decisions concerned: development and international economic co-operation (p. 380), strengthening the capacity of the United Nations system to respond to emergencies (p. 473), the Inter-Organization Board for Information Systems (p. 1385), the functioning of ACC, terms of reference of the ACC Task Force on Long-Term Development Objectives (p. 382), science and technology for development, follow-up to the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy (p. 701), follow-up to the United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries (p. 408), information questions (p. 370), international co-operation on the environment (p. 841), and the outlook for financing multilateral co-operation for development (p. 420). Other decisions concerned administrative questions in the United Nations system: career development (p. 1325), the salary system (p. 1337), income tax (p. 1342), privileges and immunities (p. 1353), and enhancement of crisis management in the field (p. 1383).

The principal subsidiary bodies of ACC met as follows in 1981; <sup>(4)</sup> Consultative Committee on Administrative Questions (CCAQ) (Personnel and General Administrative Questions) (fifty-fourth session, part I, Geneva, 26 January-6 February, and part II, New York, 23 February-6 March; fifty-fifth session, Vienna, Austria, 6-23 July); CCAQ (Financial and Budgetary Questions) (London, 9-12 March; New York, 14-18 September); Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions (CCSQ) (Operational Activities) (first regular session, New York, 9 and 10 February; second regular session, Geneva, 7-9 July); CCSQ (Programme Matters) (first regular session, Geneva, 23-27 March; second regular session, New York, 12-16 October). The ACC Organizational Committee met in New York, 29 and 30 January; Geneva, 7, 8 and 15 April; and New York, 11 and 12 June, and 19 and 20 October).

Inter-agency consultations on the Comprehensive New Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries, Geneva, 12 and 13 January, 28 and 29 April, and 13 and 14 July (p. 405); ad hoc inter-agency meeting on security matters (crisis management in the field), Geneva, 26 and 27 January (p. 1384); Joint United Nations Information Committee, eighth session, Tokyo, 3-6 February (p. 369); Task Force on Rural Development, Rome, Italy, 5 and 6 February (p. 401); ad hoc inter-agency meeting on transport activities, New York, 12 and 13 February; inter-agency meeting on the International Year of Disabled Persons, Paris, 24 and 25 February, and Vienna, 27 and 28 October (p. 796); Sub-Committee on Nutrition and its Advisory Group on Nutrition, seventh session, Rome, 2-6 March; Task Force on Science and Technology for Development, Geneva, 10-13 March and 1-3 April (p. 749); Task Force on Long-Term Development Objectives, Geneva, 16-18 March (p. 382); inter-agency consultations on preparations for the Inter-

C., 27 April-1 May (p. 1072); Technical Energy Group of the Task Force on Long-Term Development Objectives, New York, 4-6 June and 12-14 October; ad hoc inter-agency meeting on the co-ordination of disarmament-related activities, Geneva, 11 and 12 June; inter-agency meeting on outer space activities, Vienna, 14-16 September (p. 118); Intersecretariat Group for Water Resources, second session, Geneva, 19-23 October (p. 687); Ad Hoc Working Group on Inter-agency Follow-up to the Nairobi Programme of Action for the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable 'Sources of Energy, first session, New York, 17 and 18 December (p. 702).

CPC ACTIVITIES. CPC met in organizational session on 6 April 1981 and held its twenty-first session in New York from 4 to 29 May and on 8 and 9 June.<sup>(5)</sup>

It dealt at length with the proposed programme budget for the 1982-1983 biennium, discussing general criteria and methods for setting programme priorities as well as examining the details of the programmes and making recommendations, including those for review or deletion (p. 1274). It suggested that the General Assembly adopt official rules governing programme planning, the programme aspects of the budget, performance monitoring and evaluation procedures, and recommended designating a central and independent monitoring unit within the Secretariat (p. 1305).

In addition, CPC made methodological recommendations for future cross-organizational programme analyses; defined the scope of such an analysis of marine affairs, projected for 1983 (p. 139), and examined the focus and approach to the youth activities of the United Nations system (p. 1016). It also discussed the work of ACC on rural development (p. 401), co-ordination of information systems (p. 1386) and enhancement of crisis management in the field (p. 1384). In addition, CPC agreed to review further in 1982 the mandates and activities of United Nations Headquarters and the regional commissions (p. 608) relating to environment and water.

Joint Meetings of CPC and ACC (sixteenth series, Geneva, 29 June-1 July) discussed implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade<sup>(6)</sup> (p. 381) and co-ordination of emergency assistance by the United Nations system (p. 474).

On 23 July, the Economic and Social Council, by a decision adopted without vote, took note of the CPC report on its 1981 session and endorsed its conclusions and recommendations, taking fully into account the reservations and comments concerning modifications expressed in the Committee and in the Council.<sup>(8)</sup> The draft decision was introduced and orally revised in the Council's Third (Programme and Co-ordination) Committee by the United Kingdom, also on behalf of India and Pakistan, and was approved on 17 July without vote. The revisions added the words "fully" and "concerning modifications" to the clause referring to reservations and comments.

Economic and Social Council

Proposed restructuring of the Council

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. The Economic and Social Council, in a resolution adopted without vote on 24 July 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> requested its President to hold consultations, including those with the President of the General Assembly, for an early resolution of the question of its revitalization, and to report back at its October/November session. The Council decided to convey its views, in the light of the President's report and of the discussions in October/November, to the 1981 Assembly session. It requested Governments to co-operate fully with its President in the pursuit of his consultations and to accord this matter their priority attention at a senior policy level. The draft resolution was submitted by the Council's officers.

The USSR, speaking on behalf of the socialist countries after the text's adoption, said the revitalization of the Council rested on the improved organization of work and on the extension of full support to that organ by all countries.

On 25 November, on an oral proposal by its President, the Council agreed to include the revitalization question in the agenda for its 1982 organizational session.<sup>(2)</sup> Before this decision was adopted without vote, the President said he concluded from his consultations with Member States that, despite general agreement on the need to revitalize the Council, no consensus existed on how to achieve that goal; consultations should, therefore, continue and the question should be considered again in 1982.

Argentina asserted that previous recommendations for restructuring the Council would not be implemented as long as the membership was not modified to allow for wider representation; what was perhaps lacking was the political will rather than proposals for reform. The United Kingdom, speaking also on behalf of the European Community countries, joined by the USSR, supported a proposal to postpone consideration of the question to an appropriate date.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. In a decision adopted on 17 December,<sup>(4)</sup> the General Assembly transmitted to its 1982 session, through the Economic and Social Council, the draft resolution annexed to its decision of 16 December 1980 on the restructuring of the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system.<sup>(3)</sup> The 1980 draft would have the Assembly call for the amendment of the Charter of the United Nations to equate the membership of the Council with that of the United Nations, discontinue several of the Council's subsidiary bodies and set up a schedule for consideration of certain questions by the Council. The Assembly, by its 1981 decision, invited the Council to consider the draft in the context of the latter's revitalization question and requested it to submit recommendations to the Assembly in 1982. The Assembly acted without vote, as did its Second (Economic and Financial) Committee on 7 December on a draft submitted by a Committee Vice-Chairman.

Revitalization of the Economic and Social Council

The Economic and Social Council,

Having heard statements by its President and by several of its members on the need to revitalize the Council as the principal organ of the United Nations under the Charter in the economic and social fields, Confirming Its resolution 1622(LI) of 30 July 1971.

Bearing in mind General Assembly resolution 32/197 of 20 December 1977 and the consultations being held pursuant to General Assembly decision 35/439 of 16 December 1980, concerning the restructuring of the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system,

1. Decides to accord primary importance to the subject of the revitalization of the Economic and Social Council;

2. Requests the President of the Economic and Social Council to hold the consultations he deems to be in the best interests of an early resolution of this Important Issue, including consultations with the President of the General Assembly, in the light of the opinions expressed in the Council at Its second regular session of 1981, and to report to the Council at its resumed second regular session of 1981;

3. Decides to convey the views of the Council, in the light of the report of the President of the Council and of the discussions at its resumed second regular session of 1981, to the General Assembly at Its thirty-sixth session;

Revitalization of the Economic and Social Council

At its 45th plenary meeting, on 25 November 1981, the Council decided to include the question of the revitalization of the Economic and Social Council in the agenda for its organizational session for 1982.

General Assembly decision 36/445

Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/36/695/Add.8) without vote. 7 December (meeting 46); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/36/L.134); agenda item 69 (I).

Implementation of section II of the annex to General

Assembly resolution 32/197 on the restructuring of the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system

At its 103rd plenary meeting, on 17 December 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee:

(a) Decided to transmit the draft resolution annexed to its decision 35/439 of 16 December 1980 to its thirty-seventh session through the Economic and Social Council;

(b) Invited the Economic and Social Council to consider it in the context of its deliberations on the question of the revitalization of the Council;

(c) Requested the Economic and Social Council to submit its recommendations to the General Assembly at Its thirty-seventh session.

Relations with NGOs

Consultative status

On 8 May 1981, the Economic and Social Council granted consultative status to 27 non-governmental organizations (NGOs).<sup>(4)</sup>

By that decision,<sup>(2)</sup> which was adopted without vote, the Council added eight NGOs to category

II and 19 to the Roster. In addition, it reclassified one NGO from category II to category I and three others from the Roster to category II. It also agreed to maintain on the Roster four NGOs which had applied for reclassification to category II. The Council acted on recommendations of its Committee on NGOs, which also submitted in an annex to its report<sup>(5)</sup> statements of reservations made by 11 of its members and one observer on the status of specific NGOs.

On the same date, the Council decided, also without vote, to refer back to the Committee a reclassification request submitted by the Minority Rights Group (MRG).<sup>(1)</sup> In so doing, the Council expressed hope that the Committee would continue to be guided in its work by a spirit of accommodation and consensus. The Committee had transmitted the MRG application to the Council for action after adopting, by 8 votes to 4, with 1 abstention, a motion by India not to act on a United States proposal that the Committee vote on the application.

The text, as adopted, was proposed by a Council Vice-President on the basis of informal consultations on a draft submitted by Yugoslavia. The Yugoslav text, which was later withdrawn, would have had the Council ask the Committee to consider the MRG application together with those of other NGOs, and to work in a spirit of accommodation and consensus, especially when considering those particular applications.<sup>(3)</sup>

As a result of the Council's action, there were a total of 646 NGOs with which it maintained consultative arrangements (see list below).<sup>(5)</sup> These were divided into three groups. In category I were 31 organizations broadly representative of major population segments in a large number of countries, closely involved with the economic and social life of the areas they represented, and which had marked and sustained contributions to make to United Nations achievements in social, cultural, educational, health, scientific, technological and human rights fields.

In category II were 215 internationally known organizations having special competence in, and specifically concerned with, only a few of the Council's fields of activity.

Of the 400 names on the Roster, nearly half were of organizations that the Council (150), or the Secretary-General in consultation with the Council or its Committee on NGOs (28), considered able to make occasional and useful contributions to the Council's work. The rest were 222 organizations (as at 31 May 1981) having consultative arrangements with one or more specialized agencies or United Nations bodies.

In the Council, the debate centred around the status of MRG, the Afro-Asian Peoples' Solidarity Organization (AAPSO) and the World Peace Council (WPC).

The United Kingdom and the United States considered that MRG met all criteria for category II status and that the opposition to its reclassification was political. The United Kingdom said rejection of the application would suggest that NGOs which offended certain Governments might be excluded from consultative status. Though preferring consensus, the United States believed the Council could be asked to act on the MRG request, a view shared by Kenya.

Yugoslavia considered it currently inappropriate and harmful to consider the MRG application as it would be impossible to achieve consensus. China supported the Yugoslav proposal, and the USSR suggested referring the MRG request to the Committee on NGOs.

Bulgaria, the German Democratic Republic and the USSR regretted that requests by AAPSO and WPC for reclassification to category I status had not been approved, for what the last two delegations considered to be political reasons. The USSR asserted that the imperialist countries resorted to obstructionism and levelled absurd accusations at the two NGOs. Pakistan, however, considered that AAPSO engaged in subversive activities and that the Committee on NGOs should remain vigilant so as to suspend or remove those organizations which abused their consultative status. Chile maintained reservations on applications by those two NGOs.

In 1981, the Secretary-General forwarded to the Committee information submitted, by 29 NGOs on their United Nations-related activities undertaken in the preceding four years.<sup>(6)</sup> The Committee, in February, reviewed 33 of 35 such quadrennial reports.

Hearings and statements

The Committee on NGOs, meeting in New York on 14 April 1981, heard requests from organizations in categories I and II consultative status wishing to address the Economic and Social Council or its committees in connection with items on the Council's agenda. The Committee recommended that seven of them should be heard on specific agenda items.<sup>(1)</sup> When it met again at Geneva on 1 July, the Committee considered requests from more organizations and recommended that eight be heard.<sup>(2)</sup>

The Secretary-General forwarded to the Council six written statements he had received from NGOs.<sup>(3)</sup>

Committee on NGOs

The Committee on NGOs, at its session at United Nations Headquarters from 9 to 20 February 1981, among other action approved its report to the Economic and Social Council on that session and a provisional agenda for its next session in 1983.<sup>(1)</sup>

Increase in membership. In a resolution adopted without vote on 20 July 1981, <sup>(4)</sup> the Economic and Social Council enlarged the membership of the Committee on NGOs from 13 to 19 and amended the Council's rules of procedure so that the Committee would include five members from African States, four members each from Asian, Latin American, and Western European and other States, and two members from East European States (see APPENDIX III).

This followed earlier action in which the Council, by a resolution sponsored by Ghana, Kenya, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Pakistan and Yugoslavia and adopted without vote on 8 May, <sup>(3)</sup> requested its President to hold consultations with the regional groups with a view to evolving an understanding on the size, composition and allocation of the Committee's seats, and to report on his findings to the Council at its second regular session. The Council also decided to consider at that time another draft resolution submitted by the same five States on the Committee's composition.<sup>(1)</sup> That five-nation text was identical to the one eventually adopted by the Council in July, except that it would have had the Council enlarge the Committee membership to 21 instead of 19, giving the African and Asian States one more seat each.

When the Council President informed the Bureau on 17 July of the results of his consultations, the Bureau, acting as a Council committee, recommended the adoption of the draft resolution in its final form. While not objecting to the report of the Bureau,<sup>(2)</sup> the USSR maintained that the adoption of the text should not be viewed as a precedent governing the distribution of seats among the various groups of countries in other Council bodies.

Meeting records: ESC, E/1981/SR.11, 12, 19, 20, 21, 31, 35, 38 (28 Apr.-8 May & 1-20 July).

Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/43

Adopted without vote Meeting 19 8 May 1981

5-nation draft (E/1981/L.40); agenda item 6.

Sponsors: Ghana, Kenya, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Pakistan, Yugoslavia.

Composition of the Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations

Recognizing the need to enlarge the composition of the Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations in order to bring it into line with the present membership of the United Nations and with the principle of equitable geographical representation,

1. Decides, in the light of the need to enlarge the membership of the Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations, to take action on this question at its second regular session of 1981 in accordance with rule 85 of the rules of procedure of the Economic and Social Council and in the light of the report of the President requested in paragraph 2 of the present resolution;

2. Requests the President of the Council to hold consultations with the regional groups with a view to evolving an understanding on the size, composition and allocation of seats of the Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations and to report thereon to the Council at its second regular session of 1981;

3. Decides to consider the draft resolution contained in document E/1981/L.26 at its second regular session of 1981 In the light of the report of the President.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/50

Adopted without vote Meeting 38 20 July 1981

Draft by Bureau (E/1981/104); agenda item 2.

Composition of the Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations

The Economic and Social Council,

Recognizing the need to enlarge the composition of the Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations in order to bring it into line with the present membership of the United Nations and with the principle of equitable geographical representation,

1. Decides to enlarge the membership of the Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations from thirteen to nineteen;

2. Approves the following amended text of paragraph 1 of rule 80 of the rules of procedure of the Economic and Social Council:

"1. The Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations shall consist of nineteen Members of the United Nations elected for four years on the basis of equitable geographical representation. Accordingly, the membership of the Committee shall include:

"Five members from African States;

"Four members from Asian States;

"Four members from Latin American States;

"Four members from Western European and other States;

"Two members from East European States."

Work programme. In order to increase the effectiveness of NGO contributions to the work of the United Nations, the Economic and Social Council, on 8 May 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> requested the Committee on NGOs to review current practice relating to the consultation arrangements with NGOs and to report its findings and recommendations to the Council in 1983. Further, it requested the Secretary-General to include in his proposed draft standard rules of procedure for special United Nations conferences a set of harmonized procedures for inviting NGOs (p. 1370).

The text, introduced by Pakistan, also on behalf of Chile, Ghana, Kenya and Sweden, was revised by the sponsors, before its adoption without vote, to have the Committee report to the Council at its first regular session of 1983 rather than at the second regular session of 1982, and to have the Secretary-General take action on NGO invitation procedures rather than have the Committee examine that question.

The Committee on NGOs, noting that more time was needed for consideration of its future activities, annexed to its report a summary of suggestions by its members.<sup>(1)</sup>

Meeting records: ESC, E/1981/SR.11, 12, 19 (28Apr.-8May).

Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/44

Adopted without vote Meeting 19 8 May 1981

5-nation draft (E/1981/L.27/Rev.1); agenda item 6.

Sponsors: Chile, Ghana, Kenya, Pakistan, Sweden.

Review of the future activities of the Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations

The Economic and Social Council,

Taking note of the report of the Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations, in particular annex II thereto, containing a summary of the suggestions made on item 5 of the Committee's agenda, entitled "Review of future activities",

Recognizing the growth in the number of non-governmental organizations, totalling over six hundred, which have been granted consultative status with the Council,

Acknowledging the variety of experience, professionalism and fields of activity represented by non-governmental organizations and their increasing contribution to the implementation of United Nations programmes in the economic and social fields,

Bearing in mind the fact that a large number of non-governmental organizations are making a valuable contribution to the development of developing countries through, inter alia, the mobilization of financial, technical and human resources and of public opinion,

Aware of the various ad hoc arrangements for the participation of non-governmental organizations in United Nations bodies and in major ad hoc conferences of the United Nations,

1. Requests the Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations to undertake a review of current practice related to the implementation of Council resolution 1296(XLIV) of 23 May 1968, bearing in mind paragraph 15 of the annex to General Assembly resolution 32/197 of 20 December 1977, in consultation with Member States, bodies and organizations of the United Nations system, the Secretariat staff concerned and representatives of non-governmental organizations, with a view to increasing the effectiveness of contributions by non-governmental organizations to the work of the Council, as well as to the relevant organs of the General Assembly and to ad hoc conferences of the United Nations in which non-governmental organizations are invited to participate;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to provide the necessary information and assistance required by the committee on Non-Governmental Organizations to undertake such a review;

3. Also requests the Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations to report its findings and recommendations to the Council at its first regular session of 1983;

4. Agrees that the review called for in paragraph 1 above will be conducted by the Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations after the Council has taken action at its second regular session of 1981 to give effect to paragraph 1 of its resolution 1981/43 of 8 May 1981;

5. Urges non-governmental organizations to schedule their activities in relation to preparations for various ad hoc conferences of the United Nations in a manner that will enable them to make timely and effective contributions to those conferences;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to include in his proposed draft standard rules of procedure for special conferences of the United Nations, called for in General Assembly resolution 35/10 C of 3 November 1980, a set of harmonized procedures for inviting non-governmental organizations to such conferences;

7. Requests the Secretary-General, pending the outcome of the review referred to in paragraph 1 above, to ensure full compliance with the provisions of Council resolution 1296(XLIV) of 23 May 1968, as well as with the relevant provisions of Council resolution 1297(XLIV) of 27 May 1968.

Agenda for the 1983 session. In a decision adopted without vote on 8 May 1981, the Economic and Social Council approved the provisional agenda and documentation for the 1983 session of the Committee on NGOs.<sup>(1)</sup> The seven-item agenda was recommended by the Committee.

Decision: <sup>(1)</sup>ESC, 1981/165, 8 May, text following.

Adopted without vote

Draft by Vice-President (E/1981/L.57): agenda Item 6.

Calendar of conferences and meetings

At its 41 st plenary meeting, on 24 July 1981, the Council:
(a) Decided, subject to the provisions of its resolution 1981/83 of 24 July 1981:

- (i) That in 1982 the Committee for Programme and Coordination should meet from 19 April to 28 May;
  - (ii) To approve the provisional calendar of conferences and meetings for 1982 and 1983;
- (b) Also decided to request the General Assembly to consider at its thirty-sixth session the feasibility of altering the dates of the sessions of the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme, so that its reports might be submitted in good time to the Economic and Social Council at its second regular sessions of 1982 and 1983.

Limitation of documentation

The Economic and Social Council, expressing deep regret at the extent to which its work at the 1981 second regular session was impeded by the late arrival or non-availability of documents, recommended that the General Assembly should conduct at its 1981 session a thorough examination of the overall problem of documentation in the United Nations (p. 1371).<sup>(1)</sup> The Council adopted the resolution without vote on 24 July, on a proposal made by a Vice-President on the basis of informal consultations.

At the same time, the Council decided to review in 1982 its agenda and work programme, the usefulness of the documentation requested under its biennial programme of work and the possibility of discontinuing for two years the provision of summary records for its sessional committees. The Council also requested the Secretary-General to inform its Bureau, eight weeks prior to the beginning of each regular session, of the state of preparedness of the documentation for that session.

Control and limitation of documentation

The Economic and Social Council,
Recalling its resolutions 1979/1 of 9 February 1979, 1979/41 of 10 May 1979 and 1979/69 of 2 August 1979, which set out, inter alia, a number of practical measures designed to reduce the volume of documentation, to ensure its timely circulation in all the working languages of the Council and to improve the format and presentation of Secretariat reports dealing with economic, social and related matters, and approved revised guidelines for the format and contents of the reports of the subsidiary bodies of the Council.

Taking into account General Assembly resolutions 33/56 of 14 December 1978 and 34/50 of 23 November 1979.

Deeply concerned that, despite the above-mentioned measures and the considerable progress made in reducing the length of each document submitted by the Secretariat to a maximum of thirty-two pages, there has been a marked increase in the total volume of documentation requested by intergovernmental and expert bodies, in addition to some extremely serious delays in the submission and circulation of documentation.

Conscious of the marginal progress made by both the Council and its subsidiary bodies in streamlining their agendas and programmes of work and in reducing requests for documentation,

Aware that the problems related to the control and limitation of documentation are closely linked to the establishment of a rational calendar of conferences and meetings.

Convinced that it is desirable to rationalize and improve the calendar, agenda and programme of work of bodies in the economic and social fields by, inter alia, considering some items or questions on a biennial or triennial basis, or by ensuring a better distribution of items or questions between the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council,

Reaffirming that intergovernmental and expert bodies should keep their requests for documents to the minimum compatible with the efficient conduct of their work and within the limits of the resources available to the Secretariat,

1. Expresses its deep regret at the extent to which its work at the second regular session of 1981 was impeded by the late arrival or non-availability of documents;

2. Reaffirms the provisions of its resolutions 1979/1, 1979/41 and 1979/69;

3. Decides to carry out a thorough review, at its organizational session for 1982, of its agenda and programme of work, with a view to rationalizing and improving them, as well as a review of the documentation requested under the existing legislative authority with respect to items in the biennial programme of work of the Council, in order to determine whether any of it is redundant, has lost its usefulness or could be issued at less frequent intervals;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to submit, together with the draft basic programme of work of the Council for 1982-1983, proposals for the consideration of some items or questions on a biennial or triennial basis and suggestions for ensuring a better distribution of some items or questions between the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, and to indicate the implications thereof, including desirable changes in the calendar of conferences, in order to ensure the timely availability of documentation;

5. Instructs the subsidiary bodies of the Council to take urgent measures to streamline their agendas and programmes of work and to bring about a substantial reduction in their requests for documents, bearing in mind the duration and the cycles of their meetings, and to report to the Council on measures adopted, taking strictly into account the guidelines set forth in the pertinent resolutions and decisions of the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to bring to the attention of Intergovernmental and expert bodies, before decisions are adopted, any request for documentation that exceeds the ability of the Secretariat to prepare and process on time and within its approved resources;

7. Also requests the Secretary-General to ensure the strict observance of the thirty-two page limit for documents and the reduction of their average length;

8. Reaffirms, for a further period of two years, the provision concerning the discontinuance of summary records for certain subsidiary bodies, contained in subparagraph (b) of its resolution 1979/69, as revised by its decision 1980/133 of 2 May 1980;

9. Decides to consider, at its organizational session for 1982, the possibility of discontinuing, for an experimental period of two years, the provision of summary records for its sessional committees and their replacement by reports reflecting the course of the discussion;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that documentation is effectively disseminated to the Economic and Social Council and its subsidiary bodies on time and simultaneously in all the working languages, in accordance with rule 13, paragraph 4, of the rules of procedure of the Council;

11. Also requests the Secretary-General to inform the Bureau of the Economic and Social Council, eight weeks prior to the beginning of each regular session, of the state of preparedness of the documentation for that session, in order to enable the Bureau to make appropriate recommendations to the Council on its agenda and organization of work;

12. Recommends that the General Assembly should undertake, on a priority basis at its thirty-sixth session, a thorough examination of the overall problem of documentation in the United Nations, under the item entitled "Pattern of conferences: report of the Committee on Conferences", and also recommends that it should entrust to the Committee on Conferences the question of a review of the calendar of conferences and meetings for the next biennium, with particular reference to the economic and social fields, with a view to adjusting the calendar to the servicing capacities within the Secretariat, taking into account the problems that are occurring with regard to the timely submission and dissemination of documentation, and should request the Committee to report thereon to the Economic and Social Council at its first regular session of 1982;

13. Invites the Secretary-General, in relation to the recommendations in paragraph 12 above, to submit to the General Assembly and the Committee on Conferences appropriate recommendations on the problem of documentation, with particular reference to the economic and social fields.

Work programme of the Council for 1981-1982

Restructuring the economic and social sectors of the UN system

Role of the Director-General for Development and

International Economic Co-operation

Arrangements put into effect during 1981 for streamlining the economic and social activities of the United Nations were discussed by the Secretary-General in a September report to the General Assembly.<sup>(2)</sup> He also reaffirmed the authority of the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation over all relevant Secretariat entities in ensuring co-ordination and efficient management.

As part of the new arrangements, the first annual meeting of senior officials, held at Geneva on 15 April under the Secretary-General's chairmanship, discussed the United Nations budgetary situation, with particular reference to the proposed programme budget for 1982-1983 as well as the future functioning of consultative arrangements.

The first meeting of the consultative arrangements on policy issues pertaining to economic and social activities and on planning, programming, budgeting and evaluation (Geneva, 2 July) considered issues affecting preparations for the launching of global negotiations on international economic co-operation for development and implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade.<sup>(3)</sup> The meeting also reviewed preparations and issues for the United Nations Conferences on New and Renewable Sources of Energy (p. 689) and on the Least Developed Countries (p. 404), and discussed the implications for the United Nations of the results of the High Level Conference on Economic Co-operation among Developing Countries, convened by the Group of 77 in May (p. 383). It also considered programme planning (p. 1305).

The Joint Inspection Unit (JIU), in a report transmitted to the Assembly by the Secretary-General on 1 September,<sup>(1)</sup> called for a greater clarification and specification of the authority of the Director-General and his relationships with relevant United Nations entities, particularly regarding the reporting procedure, consultative arrangements and clearance of documents. Among its 20 recommendations, JIU urged immediate publication of an official bulletin defining the Director-General's functions and authority, proposed periodic meetings between the Secretary-General and the Director-General, and suggested preparation by the latter of an annual work plan specifying priority activities for various entities. JIU also recommended that a post of Assistant Secretary-General be provided in the Director-General's Office.

In his comments on the JIU report, the Secretary-General acknowledged that experience over the previous three years confirmed the need for a clearer specification of authority and a selective articulation of methods and procedures to enable the Director-General to exercise his responsibilities and functions. Such arrangements, while recognizing the autonomy of various bodies established by the General Assembly and the responsibility of their heads to their intergovernmental bodies, must strengthen the Director-General's capacity to ensure efficient management and co-ordination of all United Nations economic and social activities and their responsiveness to policies set by the Assembly and the Economic and Social Council.

Acting without vote on 17 December, the General Assembly decided to transmit to the Economic and Social Council for its consideration in 1982 the report of the Secretary-General and his comments on that of JIU, and to take up the question again at its 1982 session, in the light of the Council's deliberations. <sup>(4)</sup> The Second (Economic and Financial) Committee approved in like manner on 10 December the text submitted by a Vice-Chairman following informal consultations.

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of General Assembly resolution 35/203, the comments of the Secretary-General on the report of the Joint Inspection Unit on the relationships between the Director-General for Development and international Economic Co-operation and entities of the United Nations Secretariat, and the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of section IV of the annex to Assembly resolution 32/197,

1. Decides to transmit to the Economic and Social Council for consideration at Its second regular session of 1982, the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of General Assembly resolution 35/203 and the comments of the Secretary-General on the report of the Joint Inspection Unit, and to return to the question of the relationships between the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation and entities of the United Nations Secretariat at its thirty-seventh session, in the light of the deliberations of the Council, in order to continue to implement fully section VIII of the annex to Assembly resolution 32/197;

2. Also decides to return, at Its thirty-seventh session, to the question of the implications of the restructuring process for the regional commissions, within the overall context of its resolution 32/197, as well as in the light of further observations of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination at its next session, to be held in 1982, and of the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session of 1982.

Structure of the Secretariat

The Secretary-General, in a report dated 29 September 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> informed the General Assembly that there were no new developments concerning the allocation of functions, posts and credits between the Department of International Economic and Social Affairs, the Department of Technical Co-operation for Development and the Office of Secretariat Services for Economic and Social Matters. However, continued efforts were being made to review the restructuring of the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system, including the strengthening of co-operative arrangements among those new entities. A Committee of Governmental Experts was to evaluate the structure of the Secretariat in the administrative, finance and personnel areas (p. 1376).

The Director-General of the United Nations Office at Geneva reported that no changes as a result of the restructuring process were required for the time being in that Office.

Report: ("S-G, A/36/477.

Other aspects of restructuring

Other aspects of the restructuring of the United Nations system concerned: proposed restructuring of the Economic and Social Council (p. 1076); the role of resident co-ordinators in development assistance (p. 430); and the strengthening of regional commissions (p. 607).

Trusteeship and decolonization

Chapter I

General questions relating to colonial countries

Two countries in the Caribbean area that had been Non-Self-Governing Territories—Antigua and Barbuda, and Belize—gained independence in 1981. About 20 Territories remained in some form of colonial status and continued to be the subject of United Nations consideration (p. 1179). Particular attention was devoted to Namibia (p. 1126) and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands (p. 1118).

Aside from the consideration given to individual Territories, the General Assembly took action in November and December on general matters relating to colonial countries. In a continuing effort to secure implementation of its 1960 Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,<sup>(3)</sup> the Assembly called on administering Powers to take steps to enable dependent peoples to exercise fully their right to self-determination and independence.<sup>(9)</sup> Both the Economic and Social Council<sup>(2)</sup> (in July) and the Assembly<sup>(6)</sup> called for increased activities by organizations of the United Nations system to assist colonial peoples and their national liberation movements in implementing the Declaration. The Assembly also condemned the activities of foreign economic and other interests impeding implementation of the Declaration.<sup>(5)</sup>

The Assembly called for greater dissemination to the public of information about decolonization<sup>(10)</sup> and requested administering Powers to transmit or continue to transmit to the United Nations information on conditions in the Territories under their administration.<sup>(4)</sup> To promote international programmes for the education of persons in these Territories, it called for greater financial and other support to the United Nations Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa,<sup>(7)</sup> which was financing studies by 1,140 students outside their countries; it also invited States to offer fellowships and scholarships bilaterally.<sup>(8)</sup>

The Assembly's Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples held two sessions at United Nations Headquarters—21 January to 25 June and 4 to 21 August—and also held extra-session meetings on 10 and 11 November to consider the reports of visiting missions to American Samoa and Tokelau. The Committee's subsidiary bodies, the Sub-Committee on Petitions, Information and Assistance and the Sub-Committee on Small Territories, met between 9 March and 21 August, and between 10 March and 7 August, respectively.

The Committee acted on general questions relating to colonial countries as well as on individual Territories, and reported on its actions to the Assembly.<sup>(1)</sup> On general questions it dealt with most of the topics also considered by the Assembly. In addition, it condemned military activities and arrangements by colonial Powers which denied to the peoples concerned their right to self-determination (p. 1110), called on administering Powers to permit access to Territories by United Nations visiting missions (p. 1116) and urged the United States to adopt measures for the transfer of all powers to the people of Puerto Rico (p. 1113).

Implementation of the Declaration on independence for colonial countries

General aspects

By a resolution of 1 December 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> the General Assembly called on administering Powers to enable dependent peoples to exercise their right to self-determination and independence, and reaffirmed its recognition of the legitimacy of the struggle of peoples under colonial and alien domination to exercise that right by all means at their disposal. Calling on States to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee on colonial countries, it requested the Committee to formulate proposals to eliminate colonialism, make suggestions to the Security Council with regard to likely threats to international peace and security in colonial Territories, continue to examine compliance by Member States with resolutions on decolonization, enlist world-wide support for implementation of such resolutions and recommend steps to enable the peoples of small Territories to attain self-determination and independence.

The Assembly also condemned the activities of foreign interests impeding decolonization (p. 1105), called for the withdrawal of military bases from colonial Territories (p. 1110), called for a halt to collaboration with South Africa (p. 183) and requested States to withhold assistance from that Government until Namibia exercised self-determination (p. 1145).

This resolution, sponsored by 28 nations and introduced by Sierra Leone, was adopted by a recorded vote of 130 to 3, with 10 abstentions.

An 11-nation amendment<sup>(1)</sup> with respect to the Committee's recommendation concerning Puerto Rico was introduced by the United States but not pressed to a vote, in view of a statement by the Assembly President on the intent of the resolution (p. 1113).

In addition to its resolution on implementation of the Declaration, the Assembly dealt with general decolonization issues in two resolutions concerned with peace and security, adopted on 9 December. In its Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention and Interference in the Internal Affairs of States,<sup>(4)</sup> it included, as one of the elements of the non-intervention principle, the duty of a State to refrain from any forcible action which deprived peoples under colonial domination or foreign occupation of their right to self-determination, freedom and independence. By a separate resolution on the strengthening of international security,<sup>(3)</sup> the Assembly reaffirmed the legitimacy of the struggle of peoples under colonial domination or foreign occupation, and urged Member States to increase their support for such peoples and for the final elimination of colonialism.

Austria, Finland (on behalf of the five Nordic States), Italy, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Portugal and the United States expressed reservations on the paragraph in the 1 December resolution concerning the legitimacy of the self-determination struggle by all means at the disposal of the peoples concerned; they stated that the United Nations should seek peaceful solutions and not promote violence. Lebanon said it supported the provision on the understanding that the struggle would be confined to the areas occupied by alien or colonial Powers.

Brazil, Ireland and Samoa said their vote for the resolution should not be interpreted as endorsement of all the Committee's conclusions and recommendations. Reservations on the action proposed by the Committee in regard to Puerto Rico were voiced by Australia, Austria, Bangladesh, Belgium, Bolivia, Botswana, Canada, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Fiji, Finland (for the Nordic States), France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Israel, Japan, Jordan, Lebanon, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Portugal, Somalia, Turkey and the United States.

The United States, which voted against the resolution, regretted that it contained no reference to the colonial policies of the USSR. The USSR responded that the formerly less developed peoples of that country had had the opportunity under Soviet rule of catching up with their more developed brothers.

Reservations on other points were expressed by the following: the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United States, on foreign interests impeding decolonization; Canada, Ireland, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Portugal, Samoa, Turkey and the United States, on military bases in colonial countries; Austria, France and the Netherlands, on collaboration with South Africa; the United States, on the Namibia question; Guatemala, on Belize (p. 1181); Indonesia, on East Timor (p. 1182); and Morocco, on Western Sahara (p. 1193).

In the debate preceding adoption of this resolution, most speakers expressed satisfaction at the significant advances towards decolonization during the past two decades but noted that this process had not taken place in Namibia and a number of small Territories. The Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Mongolia, the Ukrainian SSR and Viet Nam ascribed this situation to obstacles which colonial Powers placed in the way of independence, through the exercise of economic and military domination. Several of these speakers, together with Poland and the USSR, urged support for national liberation struggles; imperialist Powers were accused of attempting to discredit liberation movements and to plunder the wealth of dependent Territories. Viet Nam suggested that an independence timetable be prepared for the remaining Territories.

Many of these States and others, including Bulgaria and the Lao People's Democratic Republic, made the point that all Territories, regardless of size and population, geographic location or limited resources, deserved United Nations attention in ensuring that their peoples were accorded the right to determine their future. The United Republic of Tanzania called on the administering Powers to co-operate with the Committee to ensure that appropriate recommendations were made in this regard. Zambia stressed the need to make the economies of such Territories viable so that they could support themselves after independence.

The Syrian Arab Republic remarked that more than 4 million persons in over 20 countries did not enjoy autonomy and independence, 4 million Palestinians were deprived of their right to self-determination, and more than 20 million Africans in southern Africa were subject to discrimination and occupation. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya cautioned against situations in which an imperialist Power, compelled to withdraw from a Territory, sought to undermine liberation movements and impose solutions which resulted in the creation of regimes that served the interests of imperialism. For Tunisia, a corollary of decolonization was the safeguarding of independence already acquired.

Australia objected that many draft resolutions presented to the Assembly's Fourth Committee on individual Territories were directed more at scoring points and attacking some countries than at seeking constructive solutions. The United Kingdom described the resolution before the Assembly as a creature of the past, containing little more than rhetorical abstractions and polemical clichés at a time when decolonization, outside southern Africa, concerned a number of small island Territories with a combined population of under 200,000.

Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples

The General Assembly,

Having examined the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

Recalling its resolutions 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960, containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, 2621 (XXV) of 12 October 1970, containing the programme of action for the full implementation of the Declaration, and 35/118 of 11 December 1980, the annex to which contains the Plan of Action for the Full Implementation of the Declaration,

Recalling all its previous resolutions concerning the implementation of the Declaration, in particular resolution 35/119 of 11 December 1980, as well as the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

Recalling, in particular, its resolution ES-8/2 of 14 September 1981 concerning the question of Namibia and taking into account the relevant provisions of the Special Declaration on Namibia, adopted by the International Conference on Sanctions against South Africa, held in Paris from 20 to 27 May 1981,

Condemning the continued colonialist and racist repression of millions of Africans, particularly in Namibia, by the Government of South Africa through its persistent, illegal occupation of the international Territory and its intransigent attitude towards all efforts being made to bring about an internationally acceptable solution to the situation obtaining in the Territory,

Deeply conscious of the urgent need to take all necessary measures to eliminate forthwith the remaining vestiges of colonialism, particularly in respect of Namibia where desperate attempts by South Africa to perpetuate its illegal occupation have brought untold suffering and bloodshed to the People,

Strongly condemning the policies of those States which, in defiance of the relevant resolutions of the United Nations, have continued to collaborate with the Government of South Africa in its domination of the people of Namibia,

Conscious that the success of the national liberation struggle and the resultant international situation have provided the international community with a unique opportunity to make a decisive contribution towards the total elimination of colonialism in all its forms and manifestations in Africa,

Welcoming Warmly the achievement of independence by the peoples of Belize on 21 September 1981 and Antigua and Barbuda on 1 November 1981, Noting with satisfaction the work accomplished by the Special Committee with a view to securing the effective and complete implementation of the Declaration and the other relevant resolutions of the United Nations.

Noting also with satisfaction the co-operation and active participation of the administering Powers concerned in the relevant work of the Special Committee, as well as the continued readiness of the Governments concerned to receive United Nations visiting missions in the Territories under their administration,

Reiterating its conviction that the total eradication of racial discrimination, apartheid and violations of the basic human rights of the peoples of colonial Territories will be achieved most expeditiously by the faithful and complete implementation of the Declaration, particularly in Namibia, and by the speediest possible complete elimination of the presence of the illegal occupying régimes thereof,

1. Reaffirms its resolutions 1514(XV), 2621(XXV), 35/118 and 35/119 and all other resolutions on decolonization and calls upon the administering Powers, in accordance with those resolutions, to take all necessary steps to enable the dependent peoples of the Territories concerned to exercise fully and without further delay their inalienable right to self-determination and independence;

2. Affirms once again that the continuation of colonialism in all its forms and manifestations-including racism, apartheid, the exploitation by foreign and other interests of economic and human resources, and the waging of colonial wars to suppress national liberation movements-is incompatible with the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and poses a serious threat to international peace and security;

3. Reaffirms its determination to take all necessary steps with a view to the complete and speedy eradication of colonialism and to the faithful and strict observance by all States of the relevant provisions of the Charter, the Declaration on the Granting of independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and the guiding principles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;

4. Affirms once again its recognition of the legitimacy of the struggle of the peoples under colonial and alien domination to exercise their right to self-determination and independence by all the necessary means at their disposal;

5. Approves the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples covering its work during 1981, including the programme of work envisaged for 1982;

6. Calls upon all States, in particular the administering Powers, and the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system to give effect to the recommendations contained in the report of the Special Committee for the speedy implementation of the Declaration and the other relevant resolutions of the United Nations;

7. Condemns the continuing activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration with respect to the colonial Territories, particularly Namibia;

8. Strongly condemns all collaboration, particularly in the nuclear and military fields, with the Government of South Africa and calls upon the States concerned to cease forthwith all such collaboration;

9. Requests all States, directly and through their action in the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system, to withhold assistance of any kind from the Government of South Africa until the Inalienable right of the people of Namibia to self-determination and independence within a united and integrated Namibia, including Walvis Bay, has been restored, and to refrain from taking any action which might imply recognition of the legitimacy of the illegal occupation of Namibia by that régime;

10. Calls upon the colonial Powers to withdraw immediately and unconditionally their military bases and installations from colonial Territories and to refrain from establishing new ones;

11. Urges all States, directly and through their action in the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system, to provide all moral and material assistance to the oppressed people of Namibia and, in respect of the other Territories, requests the administering Powers, in consultation with the Governments of the Territories under their administration, to take steps to enlist and make effective use of all possible assistance, on both a bilateral and a multilateral basis, in the strengthening of the economies of those Territories;

12. Requests the Special Committee to continue to seek suitable means for the immediate and full Implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514(XV) in all Territories that have not yet attained Independence and, in particular:

(a) To formulate specific proposals for the elimination of the remaining manifestations of colonialism and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session;

(b) To make concrete suggestions which could assist the Security Council in considering appropriate measures under the Charter with regard to developments in colonial Territories that are likely to threaten International peace and security;

(c) To continue to examine the compliance of Member States with the Declaration and with other relevant resolutions on decolonization, particularly those relating to Namibia;

(d) To continue to pay particular attention to the small Territories, including the sending of visiting missions thereto, as appropriate, and to recommend to the General Assembly the most suitable steps to be taken to enable the populations of those Territories to exercise their right to self-determination, freedom and independence;

(e) To take all necessary steps to enlist world-wide support among Governments, as well as national and international organizations having a special interest in decolonization, in the achievement of the objectives of the Declaration and in the implementation of the relevant resolutions of the United Nations, particularly as concerns the oppressed people of Namibia;

13. Calls upon the administering Powers to continue to co-operate with the Special Committee in the discharge of its mandate and, in particular, to permit the access of visiting missions to the Territories to secure first-hand information and ascertain the wishes and aspirations of their inhabitants;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to provide the Special Committee with the facilities and services required for the implementation of the present resolution, as well as of the various resolutions and decisions on decolonization adopted by the General Assembly and the Special Committee.

Implementation by international organizations of the Declaration on colonial countries

A number of organizations in the United Nations system continued in 1981 to provide assistance to peoples of colonial countries and their national liberation movements, particularly in southern Africa. These activities were in response to a series of resolutions, the most recent in November 1981, by which the General Assembly called on international institutions to help implement the Declaration on colonial countries.

Most of these activities involved assistance to Namibians (p. 1178). In addition, several organizations completed training projects for Zimbabweans which had been in operation since before the independence of their country in April 1980.

Among other assistance rendered or planned in 1981 was the following: the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) had in operation five education and training projects benefiting several liberation movements, and organized an inter-agency meeting (Dar-es-Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania, 8-11 December) at which priority needs for development assistance to such movements during the 1982-1986 programming cycle were identified; the International Labour Organisation (ILO) sent a mission to consult with the Organization of African Unity (OAU), national liberation movements and the front-line States of southern Africa on a possible expansion of ILO technical co-operation in the area; the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization trained members of liberation movements and supplied educational material; the World Food Programme made new commitments in 1981 for seven projects totalling $12.9 million for emergency and project assistance to liberation-movement refugees and displaced persons in Angola, Zaire and Zambia; and the World Health Organization continued to provide health care for such refugees in the front-line States.

Outside Africa, the Universal Postal Union assisted several Caribbean Territories to improve their postal services.

Assistance activities in 1980/1981 were described in a report by the Secretary-General of 31 March 1981<sup>(3)</sup> (with later addenda), summarizing replies by 19 United Nations organizations to his request for information on action taken by them to implement the Declaration and other Assembly resolutions on decolonization. The report was made in response to an Assembly resolution of November 1980.<sup>(8)</sup> It included information on assistance to refugees and other persons from colonial Territories, rendered in consultation with OAU and with the active collaboration of liberation movements. Organizations also reported on steps they had taken to discontinue assistance to South Africa and to enable liberation movements to send observers to international meetings.

The President of the Economic and Social Council and the Chairman of the Committee on colonial countries reported to their respective bodies in June on their consultations with regard to the co-ordination of assistance by the United Nations system to colonial countries.<sup>(2)</sup> Continuation of these consultations, held annually in recent years, had been requested in 1980 by the Council<sup>(6)</sup> and the Assembly.<sup>(9)</sup>

Most of the report concerned assistance to Namibians (p. 1178). The two presiding officers also noted plans for increased UNDP assistance to Zimbabwe and pledges of aid to that country totalling $1.8 billion made by 31 Governments and 26 international agencies during the Zimbabwe Conference on Reconstruction and Development, held at Salisbury in March.

On 24 June, the UNDP Governing Council requested the UNDP Administrator to continue to assist national liberation movements recognized by OAU and to study the possibility of using the Programme's funds earmarked for such movements to enable their representatives to participate in UNDP meetings, including sessions of the Council.<sup>(13)</sup>

On 9 October, the Trade and Development Board of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) requested the Secretary-General of UNCTAD to assist OAU-recognized liberation movements in southern Africa on trade and development issues (p. 209).<sup>(12)</sup>

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION. On 22 July,<sup>(7)</sup> the Economic and Social Council endorsed the observations and suggestions in its President's report. Urging United Nations organizations to accelerate the implementation of decolonization resolutions, the Council recommended that they place the topic on the agenda of their governing bodies and urged their executive heads to submit concrete proposals. It requested continued consultations between its President and the Chairman of the Committee on colonial countries, as well as a follow-up report by the Secretary-General in 1982.

The Council also requested increased assistance for Namibians (p. 1175), membership of the United Nations Council for Namibia in United Nations organizations (p. 1160) and support for the national liberation movement of South Africa (p. 208), as well as aid for refugees in Africa (p. 1040).

This resolution was adopted by 44 votes to 1, with 6 abstentions, following its approval in the Third (Programme and Co-ordination) Committee on 10 July by 29 votes to 1, with 6 abstentions.

Introducing the 25-nation resolution, Nigeria observed that it was almost identical to the text which the Council had adopted in 1980.<sup>(5)</sup>

Explaining its vote against the resolution, the United States said it would continue to oppose direct assistance to national liberation movements; the United Nations should not engage in assistance or other activities which attempted to predetermine the self-determination process.

Among those which abstained, Belgium said it could not associate itself with some provisions. Canada favoured multilateral technical assistance to national liberation movements in response to legitimate humanitarian needs but could not agree to financing a number of the activities of those movements from the United Nations budget. The Federal Republic of Germany felt that calls for additional financial outlays were hardly consistent with the budget containment policy advocated by several major contributors. France said that, though it contributed to United Nations assistance programmes for apartheid victims, it had abstained because the text went beyond the Council's 1980 resolution. Italy concurred with the general aim of the resolution but considered that some paragraphs went beyond its humanitarian scope. The United Kingdom objected to provisions on Namibia, derogatory language used with regard to South Africa and the suggestion that that regime should be isolated.

In the discussion, Algeria called for a substantial increase in the assistance given by United Nations organizations to peoples struggling for liberation. Pakistan thought such aid should be brought into the framework of the main operational activities of the United Nations. In the view of the USSR, the active participation of United Nations agencies would be an important factor in the final phase of colonial oppression; none of them should remain indifferent. Other States which called for effective support by the United Nations system or otherwise endorsed such activities included Barbados, the Byelorussian SSR, China, Denmark (for the Nordic States), Ethiopia, Indonesia, Iraq, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Nigeria and Zaire.

Several States made the point that, while some organizations had given valuable assistance, others had failed to heed Assembly resolutions asking for such aid. In particular, concern was voiced by the Byelorussian SSR, Nigeria and Viet Nam about the position towards South Africa taken by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank (p. 165).

ACTION BY THE COMMITTEE ON COLONIAL COUNTRIES. On 17 August, the Committee on colonial countries adopted a resolution<sup>(1)</sup> by which it recommended that United Nations organizations continue to render moral and material assistance to colonial peoples struggling for liberation, and to newly independent and emerging States. It recommended that those organizations initiate or broaden contacts with colonial peoples and their liberation movements, and make their procedures more flexible in order to speed assistance. The Committee called on organizations that had not done so to allow representatives of national liberation movements recognized by OAU to participate fully as observers in proceedings concerning their countries.

The Committee also urged increased aid for Namibians (p. 1178) and to the front-line States neighbouring South Africa and Namibia (p. 214), called for an end to collaboration between IMF and South Africa (p. 166), and requested that all support to South Africa from the United Nations system be discontinued until Namibia exercised its right to self-determination (p. 1128).

Many of the provisions in the resolution incorporated recommendations contained in a report<sup>(4)</sup> submitted in July by the Committee's Sub-Committee on Petitions, Information and Assistance. The Sub-Committee consulted with representatives of several United Nations organizations, which provided information on their activities regarding colonial countries. The report, whose conclusions and recommendations were annexed to the Committee's report to the Assembly, also contained specific recommendations in regard to the relationship between IMF and South Africa.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 24 November, the General Assembly adopted a resolution<sup>(11)</sup> virtually identical in its operative paragraphs to the one adopted in August by the Committee on colonial countries. The Assembly added provisions by which it: requested the Secretary-General to continue to assist United Nations organizations in working out measures to implement United Nations resolutions; requested the Economic and Social Council to continue to consider, in consultation with the Committee, the co-ordination of activities in this sphere; and asked for reports from the Committee and the Secretary-General in 1982.

The Assembly adopted this resolution by a recorded vote of 124 to 6, with 23 abstentions, following a recommendation of the Fourth Committee, which had approved the 32-nation text on 9 November by a recorded vote of 115 to 6, with 22 abstentions.

The Assembly adopted by separate votes two paragraphs of this resolution concerning IMF and World Bank relations with South Africa (p. 167). Objections or reservations to these provisions were voiced by the United Kingdom, speaking for the member States of the European Community (EC), as well as by Canada, New Zealand, Portugal and Uruguay, which voted against them, and by Bolivia, Fiji, Lesotho, Mexico, Saint Lucia, Spain, Sri Lanka and Swaziland, which abstained on one or both paragraphs.

In a resolution on self-determination and human rights adopted on 28 October,<sup>(10)</sup> the Assembly called for maximizing material and other assistance by Governments and intergovernmental organizations to peoples under colonial and foreign rule, and urged States and United Nations organizations to do their utmost to ensure full implementation of the Declaration on colonial countries.

The resolution on implementation of the Declaration by United Nations organizations was introduced by Bulgaria, which stated that the needs of colonial peoples, especially those of Namibia, greatly exceeded the assistance that had been rendered by United Nations organizations.

The United States, which voted against the resolution, said it opposed aid by the specialized agencies to national liberation movements and it objected to the politicization of those agencies.

The United Kingdom, speaking for the EC member States, said they could not support the resolution because of its references to IMF and the World Bank and its attempts to politicize the work of United Nations organizations; the EC members reaffirmed their support for the principle of universality and their respect for the independence of those organizations. Denmark, speaking for the Nordic States, said that, while they recognized the specialized agencies' role in this area, they had had to abstain because of new elements added to the resolution in 1981; they believed the agencies should remain universal.

Among others which abstained, Austria said some provisions interfered with the independence of the specialized agencies, while Portugal remarked that some of the language would not serve the interests of aid recipients. Argentina, Denmark (for the Nordic States), Spain and Turkey expressed reservations on references to particular States or regions (p. 1145).

Brazil voted for the resolution but felt that the paragraph on membership for the Council for Namibia should not set a precedent.

In the Fourth Committee's debate on decolonization, a number of States called for increased assistance by United Nations organizations to colonial peoples. These included Cyprus, Egypt, Greece, Jordan, Mali, Uganda and Zaire. The Byelorussian SSR believed that such organizations should develop more effective co-operation with liberation movements and gear their aid programmes more closely to their needs. The Ukrainian SSR said some organizations had not taken the necessary measures to provide the assistance called for by the Assembly.

Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and assistance to the oppressed people of South Africa and their national liberation movement by the specialized agencies and the international institutions associated with the United Nations

Having examined the report of the Secretary-General and the reports of the President of the Economic and Social Council concerning the items entitled "Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples by the specialized agencies and the international institutions associated with the United Nations" and "Assistance to the oppressed people of South Africa and their national liberation movement by agencies and institutions within the United Nations system",

Having heard the statement of the Chairman of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, Recalling General Assembly resolution 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960, containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, and all other resolutions adopted by United Nations bodies on this subject, including in particular General Assembly resolution 35/29 of 11 November 1980 and Council resolution 1980/50 of 23 July 1980.

Reaffirming the responsibility of the specialized agencies and other organizations within the United Nations system to take all effective measures, within their respective spheres of competence, to ensure the full and speedy implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and other relevant resolutions of United Nations bodies,

Deeply conscious of the continuing critical need of the people of Namibia and their national liberation movement, the South West Africa People's Organization, for concrete assistance from the specialized agencies and the international institutions associated with the United Nations in their struggle for liberation from the illegal occupation of their country by the racist minority regime in South Africa,

Noting the positive results of the International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa, held at Geneva on 9 and 10 April 1981,

Deeply concerned that, while progress has been maintained through the continuing efforts of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in the extension of assistance to refugees from southern Africa, the action taken so far by the organizations and agencies concerned in the provision of assistance generally to the people of Namibia is still far from adequate to meet their urgent and growing needs,

Noting with satisfaction the continuing efforts of the United Nations Development Programme in the extension of assistance to the national liberation movements concerned and commending the initiative taken by that organization in establishing channels for closer, periodic contacts and consultations between the specialized agencies and United Nations institutions and the Organization of African Unity and the national liberation movements in the formulation of assistance programmes,

Noting also the support given by the organizations within the United Nations system to the implementation of the Nationhood Programme for Namibia, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 32/9 A of 4 November 1977,

Noting further with satisfaction the high-level meetings held at Geneva from 13 to 16 April 1981 between representatives of the General Secretariat of the Organization of African Unity and the secretariats of the United Nations and organizations within the United Nations system, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 35/117 of 10 December 1980, on the question of co-operation between the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity,

Mindful of the relevant conclusions and recommendations adopted by the International Conference on Sanctions against South Africa, held in Paris from 20 to 27 May 1981,

1. Takes note of the reports of the President of the Economic and Social Council and endorses the Observations and suggestions contained therein;

2. Reaffirms that the recognition by the General Assembly, the Security Council and other United Nations organs of the legitimacy of the struggle of colonial peoples to exercise their right to self-determination and independence entails, as a corollary, the extension by the United Nations system of organizations of all the necessary moral and material assistance to the peoples of the colonial territories and their national liberation movements;

3. Expresses its appreciation to those specialized agencies and organizations within the United Nations system which have continued to co-operate in varying degrees with the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity in the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and other relevant resolutions of United Nations bodies, and urges all the specialized agencies and other organizations within the United Nations system to accelerate the full and speedy implementation of the relevant provisions of those resolutions;

4. Requests the specialized agencies and other organizations within the United Nations system, in the light of the intensification of the liberation struggle in Namibia, to do everything possible as a matter of urgency to render, in consultation with the Organization of African Unity and the United Nations Council for Namibia, increased assistance to the people of Namibia, in particular in connection with the Nationhood Programme for Namibia;

5. Requests the specialized agencies and other organizations within the United Nations system, in accordance with the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council, to continue to take all necessary measures to withhold any financial, economic, technical or other assistance to the Government of South Africa until that Government restores to the people of Namibia their inalienable right to self-determination and independence, and to refrain from taking any action which might imply recognition of, or support for, the illegal occupation of Namibia by that régime;

6. Requests also the specialized agencies and other organizations within the United Nations system, in accordance with the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council on the apartheid policy of the Government of South Africa, to intensify their support for the oppressed people of South Africa and to take such measures as will isolate the apartheid régime and mobilize world public opinion against apartheid;

7. Urges the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system which have so far not granted full membership to the United Nations Council for Namibia to do so without delay;

8. Expresses its appreciation to the Governments and the organizations concerned for their pledges of contributions made at the International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa and urges all Governments and the organizations within the United Nations system to contribute generously to the funds earmarked for assistance to refugees in Africa, in particular those persons displaced as a result of the oppressive rule which the minority racist régime of South Africa imposes in both Namibia and South Africa;

9. Notes with satisfaction the arrangements made by several specialized agencies and United Nations Institutions which enable representatives of the national liberation movements recognized by the Organization of African Unity to participate fully as observers in the proceedings relating to matters concerning their respective countries, and calls upon those international institutions which have not yet done so to follow this example and make the necessary arrangements without delay, including arrangements to defray the cost of the participation of those representatives;

10. Recommends that all Governments should intensify their efforts in the specialized agencies and other organizations within the United Nations system of which they are members to ensure the full and effective implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and other relevant resolutions of United Nations bodies;

11. Urges those specialized agencies and organizations within the United Nations system which have not already done so to include in the agenda of the regular meetings of their governing bodies a separate item on the progress made by those organizations in their implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and other relevant resolutions of United Nations bodies;

12. Further urges the executive heads of the specialized agencies and other organizations within the United Nations system to formulate, with the active co-operation of the Organization of African Unity, and to submit, as a matter of priority, to their governing and legislative organs concrete proposals for the full implementation of the relevant United Nations decisions;

13. Draws the attention of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples to the present resolution and to the discussions on the subject at the second regular session of 1981 of the Council;

14. Requests the President of the Economic and Social Council to continue consultations on these matters with the Chairman of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and the Chairman of the Special Committee against Apartheid and to report thereon to the Council;

15. Requests the Secretary-General to follow the implementation of the present resolution and to report thereon to the Council at its second regular session of 1982;

16. Decides to keep these questions under continuous review.

implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples by the specialized agencies and the International institutions associated with the United Nations

The General Assembly,

Having considered the item entitled "Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples by the specialized agencies and the International institutions associated with the United Nations",

Recalling the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, contained in its resolution 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960, and the Plan of Action for the Full Implementation of the Declaration, contained in the annex to its resolution 35/118 of 11 December 1980, as well as all other relevant resolutions adopted by the General Assembly on this subject, in particular resolution 35/29 of 11 November 1980,

Recalling also its resolution ES-8/2 of 14 September 1981 on the question of Namibia,

Taking into account the relevant decisions adopted by the Conference of Ministers for Foreign Affairs of Non-Aligned Countries, held at New Delhi from 9 to 13 February 1981, by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its thirty-sixth ordinary session, held at Addis Ababa from 23 February to 1 March 1981, by the Extraordinary Ministerial Meeting of the Co-ordinating Bureau of Non-Aligned Countries on the Question of Namibia, held at Algiers from 16 to 18 April 1981, by the United Nations Council for Namibia at its extraordinary plenary meeting held at Panama City on 5 June 1981 and by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity at its eighteenth ordinary session, held at Nairobi from 24 to 27 June 1981,

Having examined the reports submitted on the item by the Secretary-General, the Economic and Social Council and the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

Aware that the struggle of the people of Namibia for self-determination and independence is in its most crucial stage and that after the failure of the pre-Implementation talks, held at Geneva from 7 to 14 January 1981, it has sharply intensified as a consequence of the defiant attitude and stepped-up aggression of the illegal colonialist régime of Pretoria against the Namibian people and the increased all-round support rendered to that régime by the United States of America and other Western States, and that it is therefore incumbent upon the entire international community decisively to intensify concerted action in support of the people of Namibia and their sole and authentic representative, the South West Africa People's Organization, for the attainment of their goal,

Deeply conscious of the critical need of the Namibian people and their national liberation movement, the South West Africa People's Organization, and of the peoples of other colonial Territories for concrete assistance from the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system in their struggle for liberation from colonial rule and in their efforts to achieve and consolidate their national independence,

Reaffirming the responsibility of the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system to take all necessary measures, within their respective spheres of competence, to ensure the full and speedy Implementation of the Declaration and other relevant resolutions of the United Nations, particularly those relating to the provision of moral and material assistance, on a priority basis, to the peoples of the colonial Territories and their national liberation movements,

Deeply concerned that, although there has been progress in the extension of assistance to refugees from Namibia, the actions taken hitherto by the organizations concerned in providing assistance to the people of the Territory through their national liberation movement, the South West Africa People's Organization, still remain inadequate to meet the urgent needs of the Namibian people,

Expressing its confident hope that closer contacts and consultations between the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system and the Organization of African Unity and the national liberation movement concerned will help to overcome procedural and other difficulties which have impeded or delayed the implementation of some assistance programmes,

Recalling its resolution 35/227 D of 6 March 1981, in which it requested all specialized agencies and other organizations and conferences of the United Nations system to grant full membership to the United Nations Council for Namibia as the legal Administering Authority for Namibia,

Expressing its appreciation to the General Secretariat of the Organization of African Unity for the continued co-operation and assistance extended by it to the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system in connection with the implementation of the relevant resolutions of the United Nations,

Expressing its appreciation also to the Governments of the front-line States for the steadfast support extended to the people of Namibia and their national liberation movement, the South West Africa People's Organization, in their just and legitimate struggle for the attainment of freedom and independence despite increased armed attacks by the forces of the racist régime of South Africa, and aware of the particular needs of those Governments for assistance in that connection,

Noting with satisfaction the intensified efforts of the United Nations Development Programme in the extension of assistance to the national liberation movements and commending its initiative in establishing channels for closer periodic contacts and consultations between the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system and the Organization of African Unity and the national liberation movements in the formulation of assistance programmes,

Noting also the support given by the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system to the implementation of the Nationhood Programme for Namibia, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 32/9 A of 4 November 1977,

Gravely concerned at the continued collaboration between the International Monetary Fund and the Government of South Africa in disregard of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly,

Noting with satisfaction the high-level meetings held at Geneva in April 1981 between representatives of the General Secretariat of the Organization of African Unity and the secretariats of the United Nations and other organizations of the United Nations system, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 35/117 of 10 December 1980, on the question of co-operation between the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity,

Mindful of the necessity of keeping under continuous review the activities of the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system in the implementation of the various United Nations decisions relating to decolonization,

1. Approves the chapter of the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples relating to the question:

2. Reaffirms that the specialized agencies and other organizations and institutions of the United Nations system should continue to be guided by the relevant resolutions of the United Nations in their efforts to contribute, within their spheres of competence, to the full and speedy implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, contained in General Assembly resolution 1514(XV);

3. Reaffirms also that recognition by the General Assembly, the Security Council and other United Nations organs of the legitimacy of the struggle of colonial peoples to exercise their right to self-determination and independence entails, as a corollary, the extension by the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system of all the necessary moral and material assistance to those peoples and their national liberation movements;

4. Expresses its appreciation to those specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system which have continued to co-operate in varying degrees with the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity in the implementation of the Declaration and other relevant resolutions of the United Nations, and urges all the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system to accelerate the full and speedy implementation of the relevant provisions of those resolutions;

5. Expresses its concern that the assistance extended thus far by certain specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system to the colonial peoples, particularly the people of Namibia and their national liberation movement, the South West Africa People's Organization, is far from adequate in relation to the actual needs of the peoples concerned;

6. Regrets that the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund continue to maintain links with the colonialist racist minority régime of South Africa, as exemplified by the continued membership of South Africa in both agencies, and that neither has taken the necessary measures towards the full implementation of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly;

7. Deeply deplores the persistent collaboration between the International Monetary Fund and South Africa, in disregard of repeated resolutions to the contrary by the General Assembly, and calls upon the International Monetary Fund to put an end to such collaboration;

8. Urges the executive heads of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund to draw the particular attention of their governing bodies to the present resolution with a view to formulating specific programmes beneficial to the peoples of the colonial Territories, particularly Namibia;

9. Requests the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system to render or continue to render, as a matter of urgency, all possible moral and material assistance to the colonial peoples struggling for liberation from colonial rule;

10. Requests once again the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system to continue to provide all moral and material assistance to the newly independent and emerging States;

11. Reiterates its recommendation that the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system should initiate or broaden contacts and co-operation with the colonial peoples and their national liberation movements, directly or, where appropriate, through the Organization of African Unity, and review and introduce greater flexibility in their procedures with respect to the formulation and preparation of assistance programmes and projects so as to be able to extend the necessary assistance without delay to help the colonial peoples and their national liberation movements in their struggle to exercise their inalienable right to self-determination and independence in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514(XV);

12. Notes with satisfaction that the South West Africa People's Organization continues to be the recipient of a number of programmes established within the framework of the United Nations Institute for Namibia at Lusaka and that the United Nations Council for Namibia, in co-operation with the South West Africa People's Organization, continues to represent the people of Namibia at meetings of the specialized agencies and other organizations and institutions of the United Nations system, and urges those agencies and organizations to increase their assistance to the South West Africa People's Organization, the United Nations Institute for Namibia and the Nathonhood Programme for Namibia;

13. Urges the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system which have not already done so to include in the agenda of the regular meetings of their governing bodies a separate item on the progress they have made in the implementation of the Declaration and other relevant resolutions of the United Nations;

14. Urges the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system, in accordance with the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council, to take all necessary measures to withhold any financial, economic, technical or other assistance from the Government of South Africa, to discontinue all support to that Government until it restores to the people of Namibia their inalienable right to self-determination and Independence and to refrain from taking any action which might imply recognition of, or support for, the legitimacy of the domination of the Territory by that régime;

15. Notes with satisfaction the arrangements made by several specialized agencies and organizations of the United Nations system which enable representatives of the national liberation movements recognized by the Organization of African Unity to participate fully as observers in the proceedings relating to matters concerning their respective countries, and calls upon those agencies and organizations which have not yet done so to follow this example and to make the necessary arrangements without delay;

16. Urges the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system which have so far not granted full membership to the United Nations Council for Namibia to do so without delay;

17. Urges the specialized agencies and other organizations and institutions of the United Nations system to extend, as a matter of priority, substantial material assistance to the Governments of the front-line States in order to enable them more effectively to support the struggle of the people of Namibia for freedom and independence and to resist the violation of their territorial integrity by the armed forces of the racist régime of South Africa, directly or, as in Angola, through puppet traitor groups in the service of Pretoria;

19. Recommends that all Governments should intensify their efforts in the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system of which they are members to ensure the full and effective implementation of the Declaration and other relevant resolutions of the United Nations and, in that connection, should accord priority to the question of providing assistance on an emergency basis to the peoples in the colonial Territories and their national liberation movements;

20. Proposes, under article III of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Monetary Fund, the urgent inclusion in the agenda of the Board of Governors of the International Monetary Fund of an item dealing with the relationship between the Fund and South Africa and further proposes that, in pursuance of article II of the Agreement, the relevant organs of the United Nations should participate in any meeting of the Board of Governors called by the Fund for the purpose of discussing the item;

21. Draws the attention of the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system to the Plan of Action for the Full Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, contained in the annex to General Assembly resolution 35/118, in particular to those provisions calling upon the agencies and organizations to render all possible moral and material assistance to the peoples of the colonial Territories and their national liberation movements;

22. Urges the executive heads of the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system, having regard to the recommendations contained in paragraph 11 above and the provisions of paragraph 21 above, to formulate, with the active co-operation of the Organization of African Unity where appropriate, and to submit, as a matter of priority, to their governing and legislative organs concrete proposals for the full implementation of the relevant United Nations decisions, in particular specific programmes of assistance to the peoples of the colonial Territories and their national liberation movements;

23. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to assist the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system in working out appropriate measures for implementing the relevant resolutions of the United Nations and to prepare for submission to the relevant bodies, with the assistance of those agencies and organizations, a report on the action taken since the circulation of his previous report in implementation of the relevant resolutions, including the present resolution;

24. Requests the Economic and Social Council to continue to consider, in consultation with the Special Committee, appropriate measures for co-ordination of the policies and activities of the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system in implementing the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly;

25. Requests the Special Committee to continue to consider this question and to report thereon to the General Assembly at Its thirty-seventh session.

Foreign interests impeding implementation of the Declaration on colonial countries

The Committee on colonial countries and the General Assembly adopted resolutions in 1981 seeking a halt to the activities of foreign economic and other interests impeding decolonization.

ACTION BY THE COMMITTEE ON COLONIAL COUNTRIES. By a resolution adopted on 14 August<sup>(1)</sup> by 20 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, the Committee on colonial countries reaffirmed the right of the peoples of dependent Territories to dispose of their natural resources in their best interests, and reiterated that any administering or occupying Power which subordinated those peoples' interests to foreign economic and financial interests violated its obligations under the Charter of the United Nations. Reaffirming that the activities of foreign interests exploiting the Territories' resources were a major obstacle to independence, it condemned such activities and the policies of Governments supporting or collaborating with them. It called on Governments to put an end to enterprises owned by their nationals that were detrimental to the interests of the Territories' inhabitants, and to prevent new investments counter to those interests. It invited Governments and United Nations organizations to ensure that the permanent sovereignty of colonial Territories over their natural resources was safeguarded, called for the abolition of discriminatory and unjust wage systems, and requested a United Nations information campaign on the pillaging of natural resources and exploitation of the population of those Territories.

Other provisions in the resolution were directed against nuclear and military collaboration with South Africa (p. 181), economic and trade agreements with that regime (p. 185) and the supply of petroleum (p. 175). The Committee also condemned South Africa for plundering Namibia's resources, and urged respect for the permanent sovereignty of the colonial Territories over their natural resources (p. 677).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 24 November, the General Assembly adopted a resolution on foreign interests in colonial countries<sup>(2)</sup> which included the provisions in the Committee's resolution (with some wording changes) and added several paragraphs. By these additional clauses, the Assembly requested the Committee to monitor the situation in Non-Self-Governing Territories (NSGTs) so as to ensure that economic activities there were aimed at strengthening and diversifying their economies in the interests of the indigenous peoples, and requested the United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations to prepare a register of the profits derived by transnational corporations from their activities in colonial Territories.

The Assembly also called on States to terminate all collaboration with South Africa (p. 167), and called on France and others to refrain from supplying that country with installations for producing nuclear materials and military equipment (p. 182). It called for an end to military activities and bases in Namibia and other Territories (p. 1110).

The resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 110 to 16, with 23 abstentions, following its approval in the Fourth Committee on 16 November by a recorded vote of 93 to 16, with 28 abstentions. The Assembly adopted by separate votes paragraph 9, condemning collaboration with South Africa in the nuclear field, and paragraph 10, calling for the termination of all collaboration with that country; both paragraphs mentioned individual Western States by name.

In a resolution of 1 December concerning implementation of the Declaration on colonial countries, the Assembly condemned the continuing activities of foreign economic and other interests which were impeding implementation of the Declaration with respect to colonial Territories, particularly Namibia.<sup>(3)</sup>

Introducing the 24 November resolution on behalf of its 30 sponsors, Angola said it was regrettable that certain Western countries, Israel and transnational corporations had intensified their activities in colonial Territories, thereby thwarting the legitimate aspirations of the peoples of those Territories.

Among those voting against the resolution, Australia said it risked having negative consequences for small NSGTs. Belgium, Finland, New Zealand and the United States challenged the idea that all foreign economic and other activities in such Territories were automatically detrimental to the interests of the inhabitants; the United States added that preparation of a register of transnational corporation profits from colonial Territories would be an inappropriate and time-consuming use of resources. France could not accept an automatic condemnation of foreign interests, stating that the real problem lay in the disarray of markets and the unbalanced relations between developing and industrialized countries. The Federal Republic of Germany said that to condemn all such interests as impeding decolonization was tantamount to saying that the Territories did not or should not benefit from facilities and economic capacities built up with the aid of foreign capital. Ireland agreed that not all foreign economic interests should be condemned out of hand. Israel regarded the text as unacceptable because of its broad generalizations.

The Netherlands, while agreeing that operations of transnational corporations harmful to decolonization should be exposed, said that, in general, investments and technology transfer benefited the inhabitants of dependent Territories. Portugal thought foreign investments could promote social and economic development, provided that they were properly controlled and used.

Canada stated that the call for Governments to put an end to certain activities by their nationals in colonial Territories contradicted the principle, to which Canada was firmly attached, that home Governments of transnational corporations must not exercise their national laws in an extraterritorial manner.

The United Kingdom, explaining why the EC member States could not support the resolution, said it confused the situations in small Territories, Namibia and South Africa, and took little account of the real needs of the people of dependent Territories for investment and economic development.

Among the States which abstained in the vote, Chile said the generalization that all foreign economic interests impeded decolonization conflicted with Assembly resolutions by which colonial Powers had been urged to ensure the economic viability of the Territories they administered. Liberia, Norway and Sweden supported the general objective of the resolution but did not consider all foreign economic and other activities in colonial Territories as necessarily detrimental. Fiji, which voted in favour, said such activities were not an obstacle to self-determination unless the people concerned decided that they were.

Objections or reservations to the paragraphs citing specific States for collaboration with South Africa were voiced by Argentina, the Bahamas, Bangladesh, Belgium, Botswana, Burma, Burundi, the Central African Republic, Chile, Denmark, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, the Federal Republic of Germany, Indonesia, Ireland, Israel, Japan, Liberia, Mali, Morocco, New Zealand, Norway, Peru, the Philippines, Saint Lucia, Senegal, Singapore, Somalia, Sri Lanka, the Sudan, Suriname, Sweden, Thailand, Togo, Turkey, the United Kingdom (for the EC members), the United Republic of Cameroon, the United States and Uruguay.

Provisions on military activities in colonial Territories were objected to by the United Kingdom, on behalf of the EC members.

During the general debate on the item in the Fourth Committee, most speakers, in particular Afghanistan, Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, the Congo, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Haiti, Hungary, Kenya, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Pakistan, Sierra Leone, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR, Venezuela, Viet Nam and Yugoslavia, condemned the activities of foreign economic and other interests which continued to follow selfish financial and economic policies in colonial Territories, particularly in Namibia.

Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Cuba, the German Democratic Republic, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR stated that foreign economic interests continued to dominate the economies of small island Territories and exploit their human and natural resources, thereby impeding the development of independent national economies and making it difficult for them to prepare themselves for independence. These States and others, including Hungary and Mongolia, held both transnational corporations and the States which supported them responsible for such activities.

The Congo rejected arguments that foreign economic interests did not necessarily impede decolonization; if felt that, to eliminate every vestige of colonialism, resolute action was needed against all foreign interests which gave significant material support to administering Powers.

Attempts to justify the activities of foreign interests as beneficial to the Territories, said Czechoslovakia, were a ploy to divert attention from their plunder of resources for profit and their exploitation of cheap labour. The Lao People's Democratic Republic stated that foreign interests had in all cases impeded decolonization and created only temporary employment and dependent economies. In the view of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, NSGTs had experienced serious economic recession because the administering Powers had neglected their economic and social development; those Powers must be made to repay their debt after the Territories achieved their independence. Madagascar considered that any attempt to retain a neo-colonialist structure under the guise of maintaining prosperity would only perpetuate injustice and exploitation.

Poland stated that economic motives had led to the rise of colonialism, and its vestiges also rested on economic interests. With rare exceptions, said Uganda, the activities of foreign interests had led to a prolongation of colonial status. In Yugoslavia's view, the activities of foreign interests were oriented towards their own profits rather than towards developing the Territories' self-reliance.

A number of States stressed the responsibility of the administering Powers and the need for other outside economic assistance. Afghanistan argued that administering Powers must make every effort to build a viable economy for NSGTs. India said the administering Powers should initiate education for self-reliance; they could no longer be permitted to treat a colony's resources and population as instruments to further their own ambitions. Indonesia, while holding administering Powers responsible for providing arrangements and infrastructure that would enable colonial peoples to stand on their own feet, recognized that transnational corporations could play a constructive role in the economic development of such Territories. Mauritania said those who administered colonial Territories must recognize the right of a people to control its own resources; but it also paid tribute to all efforts to help develop the economic infrastructures of dependent Territories. Sierra Leone saw the value of investments that contributed to the Territories' economic stability and viability, but warned that such activities would deter independence if they did not contribute to a people's political and economic preparedness.

Other countries, however, including Australia, Austria, New Zealand and the United States, were of the opinion that foreign economic interests could benefit colonial countries, which needed outside help. Taking issue with the assertion that all activities of foreign economic and other interests were detrimental to colonial peoples, Australia said that would be tantamount to arguing that no foreign investment or development assistance should be provided to dependent Territories. Austria remarked that, while transnational corporations were natural supporters of the status quo and did not feel the same responsibility for a Territory's political future as the inhabitants did, foreign economic interests could be vital to industrial development, under mechanisms and codes that set forth rules and rights. New Zealand believed that the activities in question should be judged by practical criteria and not simply be dismissed for doctrinaire reasons. The United States said many representatives had realized that, despite inequities and irregular patterns of investment, foreign participation in their own countries' economies had greatly benefited their peoples; it seemed inconsistent, therefore, to declare that such activities were automatically harmful to the people of a dependent Territory.

The Ivory Coast suggested that the Assembly appeal to the Governments of the countries whose corporations were involved in undesirable activities to use all political, legislative and administrative means to bring those corporations to reason.

Angola, Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Mongolia, among others, supported the proposal, first mentioned in the debate by the German Democratic Republic, that the Centre on Transnational Corporations compile a register of the profits derived by transnational corporations from colonial Territories. Such action, it was argued, would unmask foreign exploitation.

Much of the debate dealt with the impact of foreign economic and other assistance to South Africa, which the majority of speakers regarded as a principal means enabling that régime to maintain its illegal occupation of Namibia. This point was made by China, Egypt, Ethiopia, Guinea, Mexico, Nigeria, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Zaire and Zambia, among others.

Activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in Namibia and in all other Territories under colonial domination and efforts to eliminate colonialism, apartheid and racial discrimination in southern Africa

The General Assembly,

Having considered the item entitled "Activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in Namibia and in all other Territories under colonial domination and efforts to eliminate colonialism, apartheid and racial discrimination in southern Africa",

Having examined the chapter of the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples relating to this question.

Taking into consideration the chapters of the report of the United Nations Council for Namibia relating to the question,

Recalling its resolutions 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960, containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, 2621 (XXV) of 12 October 1970, containing the programme of action for the full implementation of the Declaration and 35/118 of 11 December 1980, the annex to which contains the Plan of Action for the Full Implementation of the Declaration, as well as all other resolutions of the United Nations relating to the item,

Taking into account the relevant provisions of the Maputo Declaration in Support of the Peoples of Zimbabwe and Namibia and the Programme of Action for the Liberation of Zimbabwe and Namibia, adopted by the International Conference in Support of the Peoples of Zimbabwe and Namibia, held at Maputo from 16 to 21 May 1977, as well as the Lagos Declaration for Action against Apartheid, adopted by the World Conference for Action against Apartheid,

Recalling the Declaration on Namibia and the Programme of Action in Support of Self-Determination and National Independence for Namibia, contained in General Assembly resolution S-9/2 of 3 May 1978,

Recalling also the Panama Declaration and Programme of Action on Namibia, adopted by the United Nations Council for Namibia at its extraordinary plenary meeting held at Panama City on 5 June 1981,

Bearing in mind the relevant resolutions adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its thirty-seventh ordinary session, held at Nairobi from 15 to 26 June 1981, and endorsed by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity at its eighteenth ordinary session, held at Nairobi from 24 to 27 June 1981,

Bearing in mind also the relevant provisions of the New Delhi Declaration, adopted by the Conference of Ministers for Foreign Affairs of Non-Aligned Countries, held at New Delhi from 9 to 13 February 1981, as well as the final communiqué of the Extraordinary Ministerial Meeting of the Co-ordinating Bureau of the Non-Aligned Countries on the Question of Namibia, held at Algiers from 16 to 18 April 1981,

Taking into account the relevant provisions of the Special Declaration on Namibia, adopted by the International Conference on Sanctions against South Africa, held in Paris from 20 to 27 May 1981,

Bearing in mind further the Declaration on Foreign Investment in South Africa, adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its thirty-fifth ordinary session, held at Freetown from 18 to 28 June 1980,

Reaffirming the solemn obligation of the administering Powers under the Charter of the United Nations to promote the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the inhabitants of the Territories under their administration and to protect the human and natural resources of those Territories against abuses,

Reaffirming that any economic or other activity which impedes the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and obstructs efforts aimed at the elimination of colonialism, apartheid and racial discrimination in southern Africa and other colonial Territories is in direct violation of the rights of the inhabitants and of the principles of the Charter and all relevant resolutions of the United Nations,

Reaffirming that the natural resources of all Territories under colonial and racist domination are the heritage of the peoples of those Territories and that the exploitation and depletion of those resources by foreign economic interests, in particular in southern Africa, in association with the illegal racist minority régime of South Africa, constitute a direct violation of the rights of the peoples and of the principles stated in the Charter and all relevant resolutions of the United Nations,

Noting with profound concern that the colonial Powers and certain States, through their activities in the colonial Territories, have continued to disregard United Nations decisions relating to the item and that they have failed to implement in particular the relevant provisions of General Assembly resolutions 2621 (XXV) of 12 October 1970 and 35/28 of 11 November 1980, by which the Assembly called upon the Governments which had not yet done so to take legislative, administrative or other measures in respect of their nationals and the bodies corporate under their jurisdiction that own and operate enterprises in colonial Territories, particularly in Africa, which are detrimental to the interests of the inhabitants of those Territories, in order to put an end to such enterprises and to prevent new investments which run counter to the interests of the inhabitants of those Territories.

Condemning the intensified activities of those foreign economic, financial and other interests which continue to exploit the natural and human resources of the colonial Territories and to accumulate and repatriate huge profits to the detriment of the interests of the inhabitants, particularly in southern Africa, thereby impeding the realization by the peoples of the Territories of their legitimate aspirations for self-determination and independence,

Strongly condemning the support which the racist minority régime of South Africa continues to receive from those foreign economic, financial and other interests which are collaborating with it in the exploitation of the natural and human resources of the international Territory of Namibia, in the further entrenchment of its illegal racist domination over the Territory and in the strengthening of its system of apartheid,

Taking into account the report of the United Nations Council for Namibia on the hearings on Namibian uranium held in New York from 7 to 11 July 1980,

Strongly condemning the investment of foreign capital in the production of uranium and the collaboration of certain Western countries and other States with the racist minority régime of South Africa in the nuclear field which, by providing that régime with nuclear equipment and technology, enables it to develop nuclear and military capabilities and to become a nuclear Power, thereby promoting South Africa's continued illegal occupation of Namibia,

Deploping that South Africa and the colonial Powers continue to engage in activities and dispositions of a military character and to establish and maintain bases and other military installations in Namibia and other colonial Territories in violation of the purposes and principles of the Charter and of General Assembly resolution 1514(XV),

Deeply concerned about the conditions in other colonial Territories, including those in the Caribbean region and certain Territories in the Pacific region, where foreign economic, financial and other interests continue to deprive the indigenous populations of their rights over the wealth of their countries, and where the indigenous peoples of those Territories continue to suffer from a loss of land ownership as a result of the failure of the administering Powers concerned to restrict the sale of land to foreigners, despite the repeated appeals of the General Assembly,

Conscious of the continuing need to mobilize world public opinion against the involvement of foreign economic, financial and other interests in the exploitation of natural and human resources, which impedes the independence of colonial Territories and the elimination of racism, particularly in southern Africa,

1. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the peoples of dependent Territories to self-determination and independence and to the enjoyment of the natural resources of their Territories, as well as their right to dispose of those resources in their best interests;

2. Reiterates that any administering or occupying Power which deprives the colonial peoples of the exercise of their legitimate rights over their natural resources or subordinates the rights and interests of those peoples to foreign economic and financial interests violates the solemn obligations it has assumed under the Charter of the United Nations;

3. Reaffirms that, by their depletive exploitation of natural resources, the continued accumulation and repatriation of huge profits and the use of those profits for the enrichment of foreign settlers and the entrenchment of colonial domination over the Territories, the activities of foreign economic, financial and other interests operating at present in the colonial Territories, particularly in southern Africa, constitute a major obstacle to political independence and to the enjoyment of the natural resources of those Territories by the indigenous inhabitants;

4. Condemns the activities of foreign economic and other interests in the colonial Territories as impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, as well as the efforts to eliminate colonialism, apartheid racial discrimination;

5. Condemns the policies of Governments that continue to support or collaborate with those foreign economic and other interests engaged in exploiting the natural and human resources of the Territories, including in particular illegally exploiting Namibia's marine resources, thus violating the political, economic and social rights and interests of the indigenous peoples and obstructing the full and speedy implementation of the Declaration in respect of those Territories;

6. Strongly condemns the continuing collaboration of certain Western countries and other States with South Africa in the nuclear field which, by providing the racist régime with nuclear equipment and technology, enables it to increase its nuclear capability, and calls upon all Governments to refrain from all such collaboration with that régime;

7. Requests the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples to continue to monitor closely the situation in other Non-Self-Governing Territories so as to ensure that all economic activities in those Territories are aimed at strengthening and diversifying their economies in the interests of the indigenous peoples and their speedy accession to Independence, and that those peoples are not exploited for political, military and other purposes detrimental to their interests;

8. Strongly condemns those Western countries and all other States, as well as the transnational corporations, which continue their investments in, and supply of armaments and oil and nuclear technology to, the racist régime of South Africa, thus buttressing it and aggravating the threat to world peace;

9. Strongly condemns the collusion by the Governments of certain western countries and other states, particularly those of the United States of America, the Federal Republic of Germany and Israel, with the racist régime of South Africa in the nuclear field and calls upon the Government of France and all other Governments to refrain from supplying the racist minority régime of South Africa, directly or indirectly, with installations that might enable it to produce uranium, plutonium and other nuclear materials, reactors or military equipment;

10. Calls upon all States, in particular the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the United States of America, the Federal Republic of Germany, France, Japan, Belgium, Israel and Italy, to take urgent, effective measures to terminate all collaboration with South Africa in the political, diplomatic, economic, trade, military and nuclear fields and to refrain from entering into other relations with the racist régime of South Africa in violation of the relevant resolutions of the United Nations and of the Organization of African Unity;

11. Calls once again upon all Governments that have not yet done so to take legislative, administrative or other measures in respect of their nationals and the bodies corporate under their jurisdiction that own and operate enterprises in colonial Territories, particularly in Africa, which are detrimental to the interests of the inhabitants of those Territories, in order to put an end to such enterprises and to prevent new investments which run counter to the interests of the inhabitants of those Territories;

12. Requests all States to refrain from making any investments to the benefit of, or extending loans to, the minority racist régime of South Africa and to refrain from any agreements or measures to promote trade or other economic relations with it;

13. Calls upon those oil-producing and oil-exporting countries that have not yet done so to take effective measures against the oil companies that supply crude oil and petroleum products to the racist régime of South Africa;

14. Requests all States that have not yet done so to take effective measures to end the supply of funds and other forms of assistance, including military supplies and equipment, to the régimes that use such assistance to repress the peoples of the colonial Territories and their national liberation movements;

15. Condemns all military activities and dispositions of a military character in Namibia and other colonial Territories which are prejudicial to the interests of the peoples of those Territories and to their right to self-determination and Independence;

16. Calls upon South Africa and the colonial Powers concerned to end the military activities and dispositions of a military character in Namibia and other colonial Territories and to eliminate the military bases in accordance with the provisions of the pertinent resolutions of the General Assembly, in particular paragraph 9 of the Plan of Action for the Full Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, adopted by the General Assembly in its resolution 35/118;

17. Reiterates that the exploitation and plundering of the natural resources of Namibia by South African and other foreign economic interests, in violation of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council and of Decree No. 1 for the Protection of the Natural Resources of Namibia, enacted by the United Nations Council for Namibia on 27 September 1974, are illegal and contribute to the maintenance of the illegal occupation régime;

18. Strongly condemns South Africa for its continued exploitation and plundering of the natural resources of Namibia, in complete disregard of the legitimate interests of the Namibian people, and for its illegal extension of the territorial sea and its proclamation of an economic zone off the coast of Namibia;

19. Calls once again upon all States to discontinue all economic, financial and trade relations with South Africa concerning Namibia and to refrain from entering into economic, financial or other relations with South Africa, acting on behalf of or concerning Namibia, which may lend support to its continued illegal occupation of that Territory;

20. Invites all Governments and organizations of the United Nations system, having regard to the relevant provisions of the Declaration on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order, contained in General Assembly resolution 3201(S-VI) of 1 May 1974, and of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, contained in Assembly resolution 3281(XXIX) of 12 December 1974, to ensure that the permanent sovereignty of the colonial Territories over their natural resources is fully respected and safeguarded;

21. Requests the United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations to prepare from available sources a register indicating the profits that transnational corporations derive from their activities in colonial Territories and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session;

22. Calls upon the administering Powers to abolish every discriminatory and unjust wage system prevailing in the Territories under their administration and to apply an equitable system of wages;

23. Requests the Secretary-General to continue, through the Department of Public Information of the Secretariat, a sustained and broad campaign with a view to informing world public opinion of the facts concerning the pillaging of natural resources in colonial Territories and the exploitation of their indigenous populations by foreign monopolies and the support they render to the colonialist and racist régimes;

24. Appeals to all non-governmental organizations to continue their campaign to mobilize international public opinion for the enforcement of economic and other sanctions against the Pretoria régime;

Military bases in colonial countries

Military activities and arrangements by colonial Powers in Territories under their administration which might impede implementation of the Declaration on colonial countries was the subject in 1981 of a consensus by the Committee on colonial countries and of paragraphs in four General Assembly resolutions on implementation of the Declaration on colonial countries.

ACTION BY THE COMMITTEE ON COLONIAL COUNTRIES. On 14 August, the Committee on colonial countries adopted a consensus<sup>(1)</sup> by which it deplored the fact that colonial Powers had taken no steps to implement past Assembly resolutions asking them to withdraw immediately and unconditionally their military bases and installations from colonial Territories and to refrain from establishing new ones. The Committee reiterated its conviction that, in a great number of instances, such activities and arrangements constituted a serious impediment to the full and speedy implementation of the Declaration. It condemned all military activities and arrangements which denied the peoples concerned their right to self-determination, and deplored the establishment and maintenance, by colonial Powers and their allies, of military bases and other installations in Territories under their administration which impeded implementation of the Declaration and were incompatible with the United Nations Charter.

The Committee deprecated the continued alienation of land in colonial Territories for military installations, stating that the large-scale utilization of local economic and manpower resources for such purposes diverted resources which could be more beneficially used for the Territories' economic development. It requested an intensified United Nations publicity campaign on military activities and arrangements in colonial Territories.

The Committee also condemned South Africa's use of armed force in Namibia and called for a halt to military and nuclear collaboration with South Africa (p. 181).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. In its resolution of 24 November on foreign interests impeding implementation of the Declaration on colonial countries,<sup>(2)</sup> the General Assembly condemned military activities and dispositions in Namibia and other colonial Territories prejudicial to the interests and the right to self-determination and independence of the peoples of those Territories. It called on South Africa and the colonial Powers concerned to end such military activities and eliminate military bases.

In its resolution of 1 December on implementation of the Declaration,<sup>(5)</sup> the Assembly called on colonial Powers to withdraw immediately and unconditionally their military bases and installations from colonial Territories and to refrain from establishing new ones.

In resolutions on Bermuda and the Turks and Caicos Islands<sup>(3)</sup> and on Guam,<sup>(4)</sup> adopted on 25 November, the Assembly recognized that the presence of military bases and other installations could impede implementation of the Declaration, and reaffirmed that their presence should not prevent the peoples of those Territories from exercising their right to self-determination and independence.

In the debates in the Fourth Committee and the Assembly preceding adoption of these resolutions, several States cited military activities which they saw as impeding decolonization. The Byelorussian SSR said military bases in Guam, Puerto Rico, Diego Garcia, Bermuda, the Turks and Caicos Islands, Micronesia and other colonial Territories ran counter to the interests of the peoples of those Territories and the aims of decolonization. The USSR stated that such bases were used for suppressing the national liberation struggle and for interfering in independent States.

Hungary expressed concern at the alienation of land for military bases, adding that such installations did irreparable harm to a Territory's economy besides heightening tension in the region. India regarded the military activities of administering Powers in small Territories, particularly the maintenance of bases, as ultimately detrimental to the interests of the local population, making them targets for attack by competing Powers. Others calling for the dismantling of military bases and condemning military activities in dependent Territories were Bulgaria, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mongolia, Poland, the Syrian Arab Republic and the Ukrainian SSR.

Samoa said it could not agree with the unconditional call for withdrawal of military bases, as it was not in accordance with the wishes of the people involved. Turkey thought the provision should have been formulated in the same way as the clauses on this subject in the Assembly's resolutions on Bermuda and the Turks and Caicos Islands and on Guam. The United States did not believe the presence of military bases in NSGTs necessarily interfered with the full exercise of the right to self-determination. Reservations were also voiced by the Netherlands and New Zealand.

The United Kingdom, on behalf of the EC member States, stated that they rejected the tendentious and inaccurate references to military activities and facilities contained in the resolution on foreign interests.

Information dissemination

ACTION BY THE COMMITTEE ON COLONIAL COUNTRIES. on 21 August, the Committee on colonial countries approved a series of conclusions and recommendations by its Sub-Committee on Petitions, Information and Assistance, for continued United Nations activities to publicize decolonization.<sup>(1)</sup> The activities were to include intensified work by United Nations information centres, particularly in certain countries of Western Europe and the Americas, as well as speaking engagements by United Nations officials and the wider dissemination of basic United Nations texts. Special emphasis was to be placed on Namibia (p. 1165). In light of what the Sub-Committee saw as the limited coverage given to decolonization in the mass media, particularly in Western Europe and the Americas, the United Nations Department of Public Information was asked to undertake a concerted effort to obtain wider coverage and to prepare in 1982 an analysis of the causes for the limited coverage.

A report by the Sub-Committee, also approved by the Committee on 21 August, referred to the important role played by non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in regard to decolonization. The Sub-Committee reiterated its appeal to those organizations to intensify their campaigns in support of all colonial peoples and their national liberation movements. It proposed steps to permit continued contacts between NGOs and the United Nations in this regard.

Other requests for dissemination of information were contained in decisions adopted by the Committee on 14 August relating to foreign activities impeding implementation of the Declaration (p. 1105), military bases in colonial countries (p. 1110) and Namibia.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution adopted on 1 December,<sup>(4)</sup> the General Assembly requested the Secretary-General to continue giving widespread and continuing publicity to United Nations work for decolonization through all available media, including publications, radio and television. States, United Nations organizations and NGOs were invited to help disseminate that information, which would cover the dangers of colonialism, the efforts of colonial peoples to achieve self-determination and the assistance being provided by the international community.

This resolution, sponsored by 19 nations and introduced by Sierra Leone, was adopted by a recorded vote of 138 to none, with 6 abstentions.

In a resolution on the right to self-determination,<sup>(2)</sup> adopted on 28 October, the Assembly requested the Secretary-General to give maximum publicity to the Declaration on colonial countries and the widest possible publicity to the struggle by oppressed peoples for self-determination and national independence.

On 10 December, the Assembly adopted a resolution on the dissemination of information on Namibia,<sup>(5)</sup> by which it decided to launch a campaign to expose and denounce the collusion of certain Western countries with the South African racists. Also, in its resolution of 24 November on foreign interests impeding implementation of the Declaration,<sup>(3)</sup> it requested a United Nations campaign on the pillaging of natural resources and exploitation of the populations of colonial Territories.

In the debate preceding adoption of the resolution on dissemination of information on decolonization, Viet Nam suggested that United Nations information centres in Western Europe and the Americas focus increased attention on such information. However, the United Kingdom, which abstained in the vote on the resolution, questioned whether it was logical for the United Nations to expand rather than contract its decolonization activities, given the dwindling number of Territories. Though voting for the text, Belgium regretted the lack of objectivity in United Nations publications on decolonization, while Japan doubted the need to intensify studies and information dissemination in this area.

Dissemination of information on decolonization

The General Assembly,

Having examined the chapter of the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples relating to the question of publicity for the work of the United Nations in the field of decolonization,

Recalling its resolution 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960, containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, and all other resolutions and decisions of the United Nations concerning the dissemination of information on decolonization, in particular General Assembly resolution 35/120 of 11 December 1980.

Reiterating the importance of publicity as an instrument for furthering the aims and purposes of the Declaration and mindful of the continuing pressing need for taking all possible steps to acquaint world public opinion with all aspects of the problems of decolonization with a view to assisting effectively the peoples of the colonial Territories to achieve self-determination, freedom and independence,

Aware of the increasingly important role being played in the widespread dissemination of relevant information by a number of non-governmental organizations having a special interest in decolonization.

1. 3. Requests the Secretary-General, having regard to the suggestions of the Special Committee, to continue to take concrete measures through all the media at his disposal, including publications, radio and television, to wide wide-spread and continuous publicity to the work of the United Nations in the field of decolonization and, inter alia:

Observance of the Week of Solidarity with the colonial peoples of southern Africa

The Week of Solidarity with the Colonial Peoples of Southern Africa Fighting for Freedom, Independence and Equal Rights, observed annually in the week beginning 25 May-Africa Liberation Day-was marked in 1981 by a special meeting on that date held at Paris during the International Conference on Sanctions against South Africa (p. 165). At that meeting, the Chairman of the Committee on colonial countries noted that nine African countries with a total population of 22 million had achieved independence in the nine years since the General Assembly called for the observance in 1972.<sup>(3)</sup> He added that the Namibia situation stood in sharp contrast to those successes and warranted a determined effort by the international community to overcome the barriers impeding a solution.

By a letter of 25 May, the USSR transmitted to the Secretary-General a message of congratulations addressed by the Chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR to the States and peoples of Africa on the occasion of Africa Liberation Day,<sup>(1)</sup> pledging to co-operate with the liberated countries and strengthen ties with the national liberation movement.

On 21 August, the Committee recommended that the Assembly consider changing the title of the observance to "Week of Solidarity with the Peoples of Namibia and All Other Colonial Territories, as well as those in South Africa, Fighting for Freedom, Independence and Equal Rights".<sup>(2)</sup> The Committee decided that its Chairman should consult on the matter with the presiding officers of the other United Nations bodies concerned. The Assembly took no action on the recommendation during 1981.

Puerto Rico

ACTION BY THE COMMITTEE ON COLONIAL COUNTRIES. In connection with its review of the list of Territories to which the Declaration on colonial countries was applicable, the Committee on colonial countries adopted on 20 August 1981 a resolution by which it reaffirmed the inalienable right of the people of Puerto Rico to self-determination and independence in accordance with the Declaration and its full applicability with respect to Puerto Rico.<sup>(2)</sup> Recalling five resolutions and a decision on the subject which it had adopted since 1972, the Committee once again urged the United States Government to adopt all necessary measures for the full transfer of all powers to the people of Puerto Rico, to assist the Committee in the application of its resolutions relating to Puerto Rico and, in particular, to co-operate in the sending of a fact-finding mission of the Committee to visit the territory. The Chairman was requested to hold consultations regarding that mission. The Committee also recommended that the General Assembly examine the question of Puerto Rico as a separate item at its thirty-seventh (1982) session.

The Committee commissioned its Rapporteur to prepare, with the Secretariat's assistance, a report updating information on Puerto Rico, including the opinions of its political parties, social, cultural and labour organizations and other institutions. The report would be presented to the Committee early in 1982 to facilitate consideration of the item by the Assembly at its 1982 session and to assist the work of the Committee with regard to Puerto Rico in future years. The Committee decided to keep the question of Puerto Rico under review.

This resolution was adopted by 11 votes to 2, with 11 abstentions. Before adopting it, the Committee heard 29 representatives of organizations in connection with the topic.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY CONSIDERATION. The subject of Puerto Rico was raised during the General Assembly debate leading to the adoption of its resolution of 1 December<sup>(4)</sup> on implementation of the Declaration on colonial countries.

By paragraph 5 of that resolution, the Assembly approved the 1981 report of the Committee on colonial countries, including its work programme for 1982. The United States introduced an 11-nation amendment<sup>(1)</sup> to add to the end of that paragraph: "but takes no decision on the recommendation contained in paragraph 3 of the Special Committee's resolution set forth in chapter I, paragraph 87, of its report" (the recommendation that the Assembly examine the Puerto Rico question in 1982).

Before the adoption of the resolution, the President stated that, after consultations with numerous delegations, he believed the accepted interpretation of the intent and implications of the draft resolution as it stood was as follows:

"Adoption of the draft resolution in its present form would have the effect of recognizing the fact that the Special Committee had recommended that the General Assembly should 'examine the question of Puerto Rico as a separate item at its thirty-seventh session', but it would not constitute a decision by the General Assembly to do so. It is my understanding that, on the basis of this formal interpretation of the significance of the Assembly's action, the sponsors no longer found it necessary to ask for a vote on their amendment."

During the debate on the resolution, the United States opposed the Committee's recommendation as unwarranted, politically motivated, and interference in the internal affairs of both the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico and the United States. The United States, as well as Australia and Japan, recalled that the Assembly had decided in 1953,<sup>(3)</sup> following a plebiscite approving the Commonwealth Constitution of 1952, that the people of Puerto Rico had effectively exercised their right to self-determination. Similar points were made by Canada and France. Supporting this position, the United Kingdom said the current elected government of Puerto Rico had no desire to proceed to separate independence.

Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Israel, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal and Turkey also opposed separate consideration of Puerto Rico in the Assembly, as did Finland on behalf of the five Nordic States. Reservations were also expressed by Austria, Bangladesh, Botswana, Fiji, Jordan, Lebanon, New Zealand and Somalia, while India recalled that it had abstained in the Committee's votes on the matter.

El Salvador, Guyana and Senegal were among those which supported the President's explanation that the Assembly action was not an endorsement of the Committee's recommendation to place Puerto Rico on the Assembly's agenda in 1982.

Bolivia reserved its position on the Committee's recommendation, stating that it was undesirable to alter without due consideration certain agreements on political procedures, at the risk of hampering decolonization. Costa Rica and Venezuela endorsed self-determination for Puerto Rico, Costa Rica adding that the Committee's resolution must not be used to impose any type of political organization; only the people could decide that matter. Guatemala also considered that only the people of Puerto Rico could exercise the right to determine its future, without coercion and without being made the object of the political designs of other States. Indonesia stated that the political status of Puerto Rico was a matter for the people to decide.

Favouring Assembly consideration of Puerto Rico, Cuba stated that the people of Puerto Rico had never had the right to decide its future, because sovereignty continued to be exercised by the United States Congress; its status was purely colonial. The Syrian Arab Republic said the United Nations must respond to the unanimous desire for Assembly consideration expressed by the large number of Puerto Ricans from all political, cultural and trade union groups who had addressed the Committee in August. Those representatives, said the USSR, had submitted unchallengeable evidence that the territory was in a full state of colonial dependence on the United States.

Support for the Committee's recommendation was also expressed by Bulgaria, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Mongolia. Algeria interpreted the Assembly resolution as acceptance of the recommendation that Puerto Rico be placed on the agenda of the 1982 session.

In the Fourth Committee's debate on implementation of the Declaration, Angola voiced solidarity with the liberation struggle of the Puerto Rican people. Czechoslovakia believed that the Declaration on colonial countries should be applied to Puerto Rico. Hungary thought the United Nations should pay more attention to the desire of many Puerto Ricans for independence, adding that military installations there did not promote the people's well-being. The Lao People's Democratic Republic, Nicaragua, the Ukrainian SSR and Viet Nam supported the right of Puerto Ricans to self-determination.

Other general questions concerning NSGTs

Informations to the United Nations

In accordance with Chapter XI, Article 73 e, of the Charter of the United Nations, Member States responsible for the administration of Territories which had not attained a full measure of self-government were obligated to send each year to the Secretary-General information on economic, social and educational conditions in those Territories, subject to security and constitutional limitations.

During 1981, information was transmitted to the Secretary-General with respect to the following Non-Self-Governing Territories (NSGTs):

Australia: Cocos (Keeling) Islands

New Zealand: Tokelau

United Kingdom: Bermuda, British Virgin Islands, Cayman Islands, Falkland Islands (Malvinas), Gibraltar, Montserrat, Pitcairn, St. Helena, Turks and Caicos Islands

United States: American Samoa, Guam, United States Virgin Islands

The Associated State of Antigua attained independence on 1 November as Antigua and Barbuda, and was admitted to the United Nations on 11 November (p. 348). Belize, on which the United Kingdom formerly reported, attained independence on 21 September and was admitted to the United Nations on 25 September (p. 349). General<sup>(3)</sup> report by the Secretary to the General Assembly on the subject of information from NSGTs indicated that he had received no information concerning Antigua, Brunei and St. Kitts-Nevis. The United Kingdom had previously informed the Assembly or the Secretary-General that these Territories had become self-governing and that information on them would no longer be sent to the United Nations. Nor had information been received on Western Sahara, Spain having informed the Secretary-General in 1976 that it had terminated its presence in the Territory and considered itself exempt from any international responsibility in connection with the administration of the Territory.<sup>(5)</sup>

With respect to East Timor, Portugal informed the Secretary-General in a note verbale of 26 March 1981<sup>(1)</sup> that it had nothing to add to the information it had provided in a 1979 note (stating that conditions in the Territory had prevented it from assuming its responsibilities for the administration of East Timor).<sup>(6)</sup>

Information on NSGTs supplied by the administering Powers was considered by the Committee on colonial countries in its examination of conditions in individual Territories (p. 1179).

On 4 August the Committee adopted a resolution on this subject,<sup>(2)</sup> provisions of which were incorporated by the General Assembly into a resolution it adopted on 24 November.<sup>(4)</sup> In this resolution, the Assembly reaffirmed that, in the absence of a decision by the Assembly that an NSGT had attained full self-government, the administering Power should continue to transmit information. The Assembly requested the administering Powers concerned to transmit or continue to transmit the information prescribed in Article 73 e of the Charter, as well as the fullest possible information on political and constitutional developments in the Territories, within a maximum period of six months following the expiration of the administrative year. The Committee was requested to continue to discharge its functions in this regard and to report in 1982.

This resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 149 to none, with 3 abstentions, on the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, which had approved the text, sponsored by 20 nations, on 17 November by a recorded vote of 122 to none, with 3 abstentions.

During the debate on the text in the Fourth Committee, most speakers supported the draft but some voiced reservations. The United Kingdom, which abstained in the vote, stated that it was not for the Assembly to decide if there was an obligation to transmit such information, although the United Kingdom would continue to transmit it when necessary. Japan voted for the text but said it did not accept the implications of the paragraph stating that information should continue to be transmitted in the absence of an Assembly decision to the contrary.

Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 1970(XVIII) of 16 December 1963, in which it requested the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples to study the information transmitted to the Secretary-General under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations and to take such information fully into account in examining the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration,

Recalling also its resolution 35/26 of 11 November 1980, in which it requested the Special Committee to continue to discharge the functions entrusted to it under resolution 1970(XVIII),

Having examined the chapter of the report of the Special Committee dealing with the transmittal of information under Article 73 e of the Charter and the action taken by the Committee in respect of that information,

Having also examined the report of the Secretary-General on the question.

Deplored the fact that some Member States having responsibilities for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories have ceased to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter,

1. Approves the chapter of the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples relating to the information from Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations;

2. Reaffirms that, in the absence of a decision by the General Assembly itself that a Non-Self-Governing Territory has attained a full measure of self-government in terms of Chapter XI of the Charter, the administering Power concerned should continue to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter with respect to that Territory;

3. Requests the administering Powers concerned to transmit, or continue to transmit, to the Secretary-General the Information prescribed in Article 73 e of the Charter, as well as the fullest possible information on political and constitutional developments in the Territories concerned, within a maximum period of six months following the expiration of the administrative year in those Territories;

4. Requests the Special Committee to continue to discharge the functions entrusted to it under General Assembly resolution 1970(XVIII), in accordance with established procedures, and to report thereon to the Assembly at its thirty-seventh session.

UN visiting missions

During 1981, the Committee on colonial countries, sent visiting missions to two NSGTS. One went to Tokelau in June at the invitation of New Zealand (p. 1190); the other went to American Samoa in July at the invitation of the United States (p. 1179).

The Committee adopted a resolution on the question of visiting missions on 4 August.<sup>(1)</sup> It stressed the need to continue to dispatch missions to colonial Territories, called on the administering Powers to permit access by those missions to Territories under their administration, and requested the Committee Chairman to consult with the administering Powers and report back as appropriate.

The Chairman reported in July on consultations about visiting missions he had held with administering Powers in response to a 1980 request by the Committee.<sup>(2)</sup> Noting with satisfaction the positive attitude of the Governments that had invited missions in 1981, he stressed the need to continue to dispatch them. His report was annexed to the Committee's report to the Assembly; an appendix listed the 25 visiting missions sent by the Committee or the Assembly since 1965.

The Secretary-General reported to the General Assembly in 1981<sup>(1)</sup> that, up to 30 September, the following 32 States had offered to make scholarships and fellowships available to persons from NSGTS for secondary, vocational and post-graduate studies: Austria, Brazil, Bulgaria, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Hungary, India, Iran, Israel, Italy, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malawi, Malta, Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, Romania, Sri Lanka, Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United States, Yugoslavia.

After considering the Secretary-General's report, the Assembly adopted on 24 November, without vote, a resolution<sup>(2)</sup> by which it expressed appreciation to the Member States that had made scholarships available and invited all States to make or continue to make generous offers of study and training facilities to inhabitants of NSGTS, providing travel funds whenever possible. The Assembly also urged the administering Powers to ensure widespread and continuous dissemination of such offers in the Territories under their administration, and to provide facilities to enable students to take advantage of them.

This resolution was approved without objection by the Fourth Committee on 17 November, on the basis of a proposal by 28 nations.

UN Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa

A total of 1,140 persons held scholarships under the United Nations Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa during the year ended 30 September 1981, according to a report by the Secretary-General to the General Assembly.<sup>(1)</sup> The largest number, 533, were from South Africa (p. 212). Another 431 were from Zimbabwe, under authorization given by the General Assembly in 1980<sup>(2)</sup> to continue such assistance for a one-year transitional period to students from the former Southern Rhodesia. Namibians held 135 scholarships under the Programme (p. 1178). The remainder of the recipients were from countries which had been under Portuguese administration prior to independence: 23 from Guinea-Bissau, 7 from Sao Tome and Principe, 6 from Angola, 4 from Cape Verde and 1 from Mozambique.

Ninety-seven new scholarship awards were made under the Programme during the 12-month period: 52 to South Africans, 25 to Namibians (of which 13 were financed by the United Nations Fund for Namibia) and 20 to Zimbabweans, the latter being the last given to nationals of that State. The number of new awards, the report stated, had been substantially less than in previous years because of decreased contributions and higher scholarship costs. The Programme had been unable to consider any new awards for the 1981/1982 academic year.

Forty-seven per cent of the scholarship holders attended institutions in Africa (Benin, Botswana, Congo, Egypt, Ethiopia, Ghana, Kenya, Lesotho, Liberia, Mauritius, Mozambique, Nigeria, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Swaziland, Uganda, United Republic of Tanzania, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe). Another 9 per cent studied in developing countries outside Africa (Grenada, India, Montserrat, Pakistan, Philippines). The remainder were in institutions in developed countries (Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, France, Ireland, Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, United Kingdom, United States).

Thirty-eight States contributed a total of $3,593,954 to the Programme in 1981, as shown in the following table. In addition, two pledged $96,639 for future years (Australia, $40,975; Switzerland, $55,664).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. In a resolution of 24 November,<sup>(3)</sup> the General Assembly noted with grave concern the significant decline in 1981 contributions over those of previous years and the consequent decrease in the number of scholarship holders, and requested that the Secretary-General and the Programme's Advisory Committee take all possible measures to promote contributions. The Assembly also appealed to States, institutions, organizations and individuals to offer greater financial and other support to the Programme to ensure its continuation and expansion.

United Nations Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions on the United Nations Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa, in particular resolution 35/30 of 11 November 1980,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the Programme for 1980/81, containing an account of the work of the Advisory Committee on the United Nations Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa and of the operation of the Programme during the year,

Noting with grave concern the significant decline in the level of contributions received in 1981 and the consequent sharp decrease in the number of new awards granted and the total number of scholarship holders,

Strongly convinced that the continuation and expansion of the Programme is essential in order to assist the peoples of South Africa and Namibia,

Recognizing that supplementary contributions are urgently required in order to enable the Programme to meet its current level of obligations and that increased contributions for the coming fiscal year are required to meet the growing needs for assistance,

Taking account of the desirability of providing educational opportunities and counselling to student refugees in a broad spectrum of professional, cultural, technical and linguistic disciplines suitable for their future functions, notably, in the fields of development and international co-operation,

1. Endorses the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa;

2. Takes note with grave concern of the deficit facing the Programme in the current financial year because of escalating costs and a decrease in contributions in both absolute and real terms;

3. Expresses its appreciation to all those who have supported the Programme by providing contributions, scholarships or places in their educational institutions;

4. Requests the Secretary-General and the Advisory Committee on the United Nations Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa to take all possible measures for the promotion of generous contributions to the Programme;

5. Appeals to all States, institutions, organizations and individuals, in view of the increasing demand for educational opportunities by the people of South Africa and Namibia and the rapidly increasing costs of higher education and training, to offer greater financial and other support to the Programme in order to ensure its continuation, effectiveness and expansion.

International Trusteeship System

The Trusteeship Council continued during 1981 to supervise, on behalf of the Security Council, the one Trust Territory remaining under the International Trusteeship System—the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, a strategic Territory administered by the United States (p. 1120). The Council examined the annual report submitted by the Administering Authority,<sup>(3)</sup> heard nine petitioners, and examined 18 written petitions and 17 communications concerning the Territory.<sup>(1)</sup> As in previous years, the Council heard and questioned Special Representatives of the Administering Authority and Advisers—representatives of the Territory attached to the Administering Authority's delegation. Following a general debate in which Council members gave their opinions on conditions in the Territory, the Council adopted a report to the Security Council containing its conclusions and recommendations.<sup>(2)</sup>

The Trusteeship Council held its forty-eighth session at United Nations Headquarters from 18 May to 11 June. Of the Council's five members (China, France, USSR, United Kingdom, United States), China did not participate in the session.

General aspects

Visiting Mission to the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands

On 10 June 1981, the Council decided to send a periodic visiting mission to the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands in 1982 or 1983.<sup>(1)</sup> Specific arrangements were to be decided by the Council not later than at its 1982 session.

Recalling that the last such mission had been in 1980,<sup>(2)</sup> the United States recommended that the customary three-year interval between missions be maintained. In the event of a plebiscite or other significant political development warranting the dispatch of a mission, the United States would consult Council members.

Also referring to the usual three-year interval, France said it would be premature to decide in 1981 on the mission which would normally go to the Territory in 1983. The United Kingdom said it too could agree to defer the decision until the Council's next session. The USSR, however, believed the Council should decide in 1981 that the mission should go in 1982, since the previous mission had originally been scheduled for 1979.

Co-operation with the Committee on colonial countries

At its 1981 session, the Trusteeship Council considered together the questions of attainment of self-government or independence and co-operation with the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. On 28 May,<sup>(1)</sup> the Council drew the Security Council's attention to the conclusions and recommendations adopted on the attainment of self-government or independence by the Territory and to the statements made by Trusteeship Council members on that question (p. 1121).

During the Council's discussions of these two items, the United States maintained that Article 85 of the Charter of the United Nations clearly limited the functions of the General Assembly to Trust Territories not designated as strategic; co-operation between the Council and an Assembly committee was not applicable to the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands. France and the United Kingdom were of a similar view, observing that, under the Charter, the Trusteeship Council reported only to the Security Council on matters regarding strategic areas. On the other hand, the USSR stated that the provisions of the Declaration on colonial countries<sup>(2)</sup> applied to the Trust Territory and that nothing in Article 83 of the Charter prohibited United Nations bodies, particularly the Committee on colonial countries, from monitoring the situation in the Territory.

Fellowships and scholarships

Under a programme initiated by the General Assembly in 1952,<sup>(3)</sup> offers of scholarships and fellowships to students from Trust Territories had been made in past years by 11 States: Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Indonesia, Italy, Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, Tunisia, USSR, Yugoslavia. In a report to the Trusteeship Council covering the period 25 May 1980 to 14 May 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the Secretary-General indicated that he had received no information from these States that the offers were being utilized by persons from the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

The United States told the Council that most Micronesian students pursuing higher education sought placement in the United States, though many were enrolled in Australia, Fiji, Papua New Guinea and other English-speaking countries in the Pacific region.

The Council took note of the Secretary-General's report on 27 May.<sup>(2)</sup>

Information dissemination

A report of the Secretary-General covering the period 1 May 1980 to 30 April 1981<sup>(1)</sup> described activities by the United Nations Department of Public Information (DPI) in distributing United Nations documents, official records and information materials to the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, by airmail to individual addresses as well as by bulk sea shipments.

The United States told the Trusteeship Council that since the advent of constitutional government in various areas of the Territory, United Nations information had been channelled directly to the authorities of the new constitutional Governments; also, tape recordings of the Council's debates were widely used by local radio stations. France favoured the continued distribution by the Territorial Government of the verbatim records of Council debates. The USSR suggested that DPI study the possibility of supplying more materials to the Territory, particularly such fundamental documents as the General

The Trusteeship Council took note of the Secretary-General's report on 27 May.<sup>(2)</sup>

Co-operation with CERD and the Decade against racial discrimination

At its 1981 session,<sup>(1)</sup> the Trusteeship Council considered together the questions of co-operation with the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) and the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination (1973-1983) (p. 864).

During the discussion, the United States said it was proud of the absence of racial discrimination and the strong protection of human rights which was guaranteed by law throughout the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands. It noted with pride that CERD had welcomed the information received on human rights in the Territory.

The USSR deplored what it saw as the Administering Authority's fundamental failure to respect the human rights of the islands' inhabitants, and called on the Trusteeship Council to activate its co-operation with CERD and to implement the Programme for the Decade.<sup>(2)</sup>

The Council decided on 28 May to take note of the statements made on this item.

On 11 June, the Council decided it was not in a position to accept an invitation to the Seminar on Effective Measures to Prevent Transnational Corporations and Other Established Interests from Collaborating with the Racist Régime of South Africa (Geneva, 29 June-3 July), organized by the Commission on Human Rights in co-operation with the Special Committee against Apartheid (p. 188). The USSR regretted that the invitation had not been accepted, since the Seminar fell within the framework of the Decade against racial discrimination. The United States said it could not support Council participation in the Seminar, whose subject was far removed from the Council's work.

Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands

The Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, administered by the United States in accordance with a Trusteeship Agreement approved by the Security Council in 1947,<sup>(7)</sup> included more than 2,100 islands and atolls scattered over an area of some 7.8 million square kilometres of the western Pacific Ocean, north of the Equator. The islands, with a total land area of about 1,850 square kilometres, form three major archipelagos- the Marianas, the Carolines and the Marshalls-collectively known as Micronesia. In 1980, the Territory's population totalled 132,632.

Ultimate executive and administrative authority for the Government of the Territory and responsibility for carrying out international obligations undertaken by the United States with respect to it were vested in a High Commissioner, appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the United States Senate.

There were four political entities within the boundaries of the Territory- the Federated States of Micronesia, the Marshall Islands, the Northern Mariana Islands and Palau. Each had its own constitution and popularly elected legislature and executive head.

In 1981, conditions in the Territory were considered by the Trusteeship Council, which adopted a report to the Security Council containing its conclusions and recommendations<sup>(4)</sup> after considering the annual report submitted by the United States as Administering Authority.<sup>(5)</sup> Conclusions and recommendations were also adopted by the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.<sup>(3)</sup> The General Assembly's Fourth Committee received a draft decision on the subject<sup>(1)</sup> but decided to adjourn debate on it.

TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL ACTION. On 11 June, by 2 votes to 1, with 1 abstention, the Trusteeship Council adopted the report of its Drafting Committee containing an outline of conditions in the Territory and conclusions and recommendations thereon, for inclusion in the Council's report to the Security Council.<sup>(4)</sup>

The conclusions and recommendations had been adopted separately by the same vote. They dealt with self-determination and independence (p. 1121), politics and government (p. 1123), economic conditions (p. 1123), social conditions (p. 1125), education (p. 1125), resettlement of the Bikini and Enewetak populations (p. 1125), and radioactive waste management and damage claims (p. 1126).

The United States explained that it had abstained in the voting inasmuch as the conclusions and recommendations were addressed to the Administering Authority; it would study them carefully and try to the extent possible to bring to fruition many of the Council's expressed wishes.

The USSR, explaining its negative vote, said much of the report was sharply at odds with the real state of affairs in the Territory and would encourage the United States in its policy to fragment and annex Micronesia, perpetuate United States domination, and transform it into a military beach-head threatening peace and security.

ACTION BY THE COMMITTEE ON COLONIAL COUNTRIES. On 20 August, the Committee on colonial countries adopted conclusions and recommendations on the Territory,<sup>(3)</sup> dealing with self-determination and independence as well as political and economic conditions. It expressed regret at the Administering Authority's refusal to co-operate with it by declining to participate in the Committee's examination of the Territory, and called on the United States to send a representative to keep the Committee informed. Noting that reports on the Territory were before the Security Council, the Committee called attention to Article 83 of the Charter of the United Nations, under which the Security Council exercised all United Nations functions relating to strategic areas, with the Trusteeship Council's assistance on political, economic, social and educational matters.

The Chairman transmitted the Committee's conclusions to the Security Council by a letter of 26 August.<sup>(2)</sup>

GENERAL ASSEMBLY CONSIDERATION. A draft decision on the Trust Territory,<sup>(1)</sup> repeating most of the recommendations in the consensus adopted by the Committee on colonial countries, was introduced in the Fourth Committee by the Syrian Arab Republic, with Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Cuba, Czechoslovakia and Ethiopia joining as sponsors. However, the Fourth Committee, by a recorded vote of 71 to 30, with 20 abstentions, adopted on 23 November a motion by Australia to adjourn consideration of the item. Australia pointed out that the Committee had not previously dealt with the question since, under the Charter and the Trusteeship Agreement, the Security Council, with the assistance of the Trusteeship Council, had fully exercised United Nations functions regarding the Territory.

The Niger supported the Australian proposal, remarking that the Administering Authority's co-operation was indispensable if the decisions approved by the Committee were to be implemented, and in this case there was no consensus in the Committee. Norway also favoured adjournment, stating that there was no reason to change the procedure under which the Territory was dealt with by the Trusteeship Council. The United States said the draft decision's sponsors sought to change the Committee's long-standing practice of not making pronouncements on the Territory, out of deference to the Security Council, the Trusteeship Council and the Charter.

The USSR opposed the Australian proposal, stating that discussion of the Territory in the Fourth Committee was relevant in view of the concern expressed by representatives of the Territory that the United States was attempting to annex it. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the Syrian Arab Republic believed the question was one of self-determination and independence under the Declaration on colonial countries,<sup>(6)</sup> and should be debated by the Assembly.

Before the adoption of the Australian motion, a number of delegations commented on the Territory during the Committee's discussion of individual colonial Territories. The comments related to self-determination and independence and to economic conditions.

Self-determination and independence

Reporting on the status of negotiations between United States and Micronesian representatives on future political status, the United States informed the Trusteeship Council in the Administering Authority's annual report that a compact of free association had been initialled on 31 October 1980 by representatives of the United States and of the Federated States and the Marshall Islands, and on 17 November by the President-elect of Palau. The compact defined the political status of the three areas and their relationship with the United States in the post-trusteeship period, recognizing their capacity to manage their own foreign affairs. Several subsidiary agreements remained to be negotiated.

TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL ACTION. In the conclusions and recommendations of its report (p. 1120), under the heading "Constitutional developments and progress towards self-government or independence", the Trusteeship Council reaffirmed the right of the Micronesian people to self-determination, including the right to independence. It noted that substantial progress had been made in the political status negotiations, and that the compact of free association had been initialled by the prospective parties. While appreciating the need for the Administering Authority to review its policy on the Trust Territory, the Council nevertheless noted that it had not been possible, during its 1981 session, to confirm the United States intention to seek to terminate the Trusteeship Agreement by 1981.

The Council trusted that the negotiations would lead to a mutually satisfactory outcome which respected the personality of every party. It noted with interest the statements by representatives of the constitutional governments emphasizing their desire to maintain preferential and close relations with the Administering Authority after termination of the Trusteeship Agreement. It noted the Administering Authority's stated intention to invite the international community to observe, through the appropriate United Nations organs, the referendum on the compact of free association, to be held in each of the affected areas once the compact was signed.

The Council said it did not wish to make precise recommendations on the future political status of the various Micronesian entities and reiterated its view that free association was not incompatible with the Trusteeship Agreement, provided the populations concerned freely accepted it. The Council favoured a political education programme (p. 1123).

The Council noted that the United States had reaffirmed its intention to proceed in a manner fully consistent with the United Nations Charter and to take up the matter of termination of the Agreement at the appropriate time with the Trusteeship Council and the Security Council. It again expressed hope that the Micronesians would establish, after termination of the Agreement, the all-Micronesian entity which they had agreed upon in 1977.

In the Council's debate, the United States said its new Administration was undertaking a review of its Micronesian policy with only one preconception- that the ultimate result of the political status negotiations must be fully and freely approved by the peoples and governments concerned. The United States had long and ardently supported the idea of the Territory's unity; the political separation that had occurred was a result of the peoples' will, expressed in open referenda observed by Council members.

France desired to see the Trusteeship Agreement terminated as soon as possible, in accordance with the wishes of the people and with the Charter; it considered that the United States had so far carried out virtually all its political commitments towards the Micronesians. The United Kingdom was pleased that the United States still sought to encourage co-operation among Micronesians to achieve an all-Micronesian entity, and hoped the Administering Authority's policy review would be completed as soon as possible so that progress could resume towards achieving the aims of trusteeship.

The USSR stated that, instead of leading the Territory towards decolonization, the United States was perpetuating its domination over the area, pursuing militarization and implementing a policy of dismemberment and annexation; any change in the Territory's status must be introduced only following a Security Council decision.

The representatives of the Federated States of Micronesia, the Marshall Islands and Palau indicated that the initialled compact of free association had the support of their respective peoples and urged the Administering Authority to expedite its policy review so that they could move forward to a prompt resumption of the negotiations on subsidiary agreements.

ACTION BY THE COMMITTEE ON COLONIAL COUNTRIES. In the conclusions and recommendations it adopted on 20 August (p. 1121), the Committee on colonial countries reaffirmed the right of the people of the Territory to self-determination and independence. Reiterating the Administering Authority's obligation to create conditions that would enable the people to exercise that right freely, it urged the United States to undertake a political education programme to that end. Noting the Administering Authority's intention to seek termination of the Trusteeship Agreement in the near future, the Committee said this should be done in strict conformity with the United Nations Charter. Recognizing that the people must decide their political destiny, it called on the United States to preserve the Territory's unity until the people had exercised their right to self-determination and independence.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY CONSIDERATION. During the Fourth Committee's debate on individual Territories, Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, the German Democratic Republic, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia and the Ukrainian SSR said that Micronesia was being fragmented and dismembered by the Administering Authority, which was attempting to annex some regions of the Territory. The USSR regarded such annexation as a violation of the United Nations Charter; although the Congress of the Federation of Micronesia had adopted many resolutions aimed at preserving the Territory's unity, the United States continued to ignore the legitimate interests of the Micronesians. Kuwait endorsed the view of the Committee on colonial countries that the United States should preserve the territorial integrity and unity of the Territory until its people were ready to exercise their right to self-determination.

Czechoslovakia, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the USSR and Viet Nam opposed the maintenance of military bases in the Territory by the Administering Authority and said they impeded the Territory's decolonization and endangered the region's security. Hungary stated that building military bases had done irreparable harm to the Territory's economy.

Politics and government

The United States reported to the Trusteeship Council that a new constitution for Palau had been endorsed in a referendum held on 9 July 1980, elections for a new government had taken place on 4 November 1980, and on 1 January 1981 the new government had assumed power and the new constitution had gone into effect. The referendum was observed by a Visiting Mission of the Council.<sup>(1)</sup>

TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL ACTION. In its report (p. 1120), under the heading "Political advancement", the Trusteeship Council said it was pleased to note that, with the achievement of constitutional government in Palau, there were constitutional governments throughout the Trust Territory. It noted that responsibility for administrative matters throughout the Territory was exercised by those governments and that the High Commissioner's power to suspend legislation had been invoked only rarely.

The Council welcomed the increasing contacts which the constitutional governments had made with nations in the region. It noted with particular interest that the Federated States of Micronesia, the Marshall Islands and the Northern Mariana Islands had achieved full membership in the South Pacific Commission, and that the Federated States had observer status in the South Pacific Forum.

The Council was seriously concerned at the slow pace of the political education programme in preparation for the future plebiscite. It insisted that the people of Micronesia must be made fully aware of their options and noted the Administering Authority's assurances that such a programme would be set in train, in co-operation with the constitutional governments.

The Council welcomed the reduction of the Administering Authority's staff at Trust Territory headquarters in Saipan, and noted the statement by the representative of the Administering Authority that his office would function in future as a technical and management assistance institution, handing over responsibility for direct administration to the new constitutional governments. At the same time, it said the size of the civil service throughout the Territory remained a cause for concern, burdening territorial budgets and absorbing a disproportionate share of trained personnel. It urged the Administering Authority to help create private sector jobs so that the civil service could be reduced without exacerbating unemployment.

In the Council's debate, the United States expressed the view that the evolution towards Self-government in the Territory might well emerge as the single most significant step away from trusteeship and dependency. Speaking of plans for a political education campaign, the United States reaffirmed its commitment, subject to Congressional approval, to finance the major expenses involved, but pointed out that the constitutional governments had generally assumed responsibility for public information with respect to self-government.

The United Kingdom stressed that voters must be fully aware of their choices and of the likely consequences of choosing one option over another. France, referring to difficulties that had arisen in the transfer of power from the Administering Authority to local governments, suggested that arrangements be made to avoid the later repudiation of freely adopted decisions and to prevent legal complications.

Economic conditions

TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL ACTION. Under the heading "Economic advancement", the Trusteeship Council, in its report (p. 1120), noted with regret that the Territory's economy did not generate sufficient funds to cover the administrative and social expenditure of the constitutional governments. In particular, structural imbalances seemed not to have been significantly reduced. It felt that since the Micronesians were on the verge of choosing their future status, economic assistance to the Territory should be maintained at least at its current level to enable the people to achieve a measure of economic independence.

The Council noted with satisfaction that the Administering Authority would provide the funds needed to attain the goals of the five-year capital improvement plan ending in 1981 and hoped that final contracts might be awarded speedily. It regretted that the second phase of the capital improvement programme, for development of the outer islands, was intended only for later implementation, and it hoped some parts of the programme would be implemented before the termination of the Trusteeship Agreement.

It noted that the Micronesian economy continued to be affected by inflation and energy price rises, though efforts had been made to find and develop alternative energy sources, particularly solar energy and wind power. Noting that water and electricity supplies remained erratic in certain places, it favoured modernization of diesel generators.

The Council noted that the Territory's exports amounted in value to only one fifth of its imports and that income from copra and tuna fish had declined in the past year. As there could be no rapid increase in funds derived from agriculture, handicrafts, fishing and tourism, the Council urged the Administering Authority to promote development of the kinds of production that could satisfy local needs, especially for food. It noted that the Administering Authority was assisting the constitutional governments to develop local products, thereby discouraging purchases of similar products abroad. It reiterated the view that taxes and duties should be designed to discourage imports of locally obtainable goods.

The Council strongly encouraged the Territory's leaders to develop relations with regional and international programmes.

It noted with satisfaction that the maritime authorities of the Federated States of Micronesia, the Marshall Islands and Palau were working to strengthen their legislation on the protection of the 200-mile oceanic zones. It took note of the Administering Authority's intention of extending assistance to ensure respect for the Micronesians' rights over those zones.

In the Council's view, transport and communications continued to be a serious problem. It hoped legal problems resulting from the transfer of ownership of ships and aircraft to the constitutional governments would be solved rapidly, and regretted that the road network remained inadequate in some places. It welcomed the expansion of the tourism industry but hoped local interests and social structures would be safeguarded and the environment preserved.

In the discussion, France said it appeared from the Administering Authority's report that the Territory's inhabitants were more than ever dependent on United States assistance, which provided more than 90 per cent of their financial resources; France was concerned that no major investment had been made, studies had not always been followed up and few projects had achieved results. The United Kingdom saw many areas of economic progress in the past 12 months and paid tribute to the urgency with which certain projects had been pursued; it urged that as much assistance as possible be given for infrastructural, educational and training programmes before the Trusteeship Agreement was terminated. The USSR stated that the economic and social situation remained stagnant; the United States paid no attention to developing viable economic conditions and ending the Territory's dependence on foreign financing.

The United States informed the Council that, out of the $238.7 million which the Administering Authority had committed to the Territory's capital improvement programme, $23.6 million was for 1980/1981.

The representatives of the Federated States of Micronesia, the Marshall Islands and Palau expressed concern about the lack of economic progress in the Territory and stressed the need for greater economic assistance.

ACTION BY THE COMMITTEE ON COLONIAL COUNTRIES. In its conclusions and recommendations of 20 August (p. 1121), the Committee on colonial countries expressed satisfaction with the Administering Authority's funding of the Territory's capital improvement plan, and noted that the Authority's role was increasingly restricted to overseeing that programme and the expenditure of funds appropriated by the United States Congress. The Committee urged the United States to continue taking measures to guarantee the right of the Micronesians to own and dispose of the Territory's natural resources and to establish and maintain control of their future development. It noted that the Territory's maritime authorities intended to strengthen existing legislation on the exploitation, management and conservation of a 200-mile exclusive economic zone, and hoped that the Micronesians' rights over that zone would be respected and that they would receive all benefits from it.

The Committee noted with satisfaction the assistance provided to the Territory by certain international and regional bodies, and encouraged the Territory's leadership to develop relations with such agencies, particularly those in the United Nations system.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY CONSIDERATION. Czechoslovakia, speaking in the Fourth Committee's debate on individual Territories, stated that the Territory had reached a pitiful economic state: agriculture had practically disappeared, the unemployment rate was 13 per cent, and there had been no development of the infrastructure or of transport and communications. In Hungary's view, the United States was not ensuring proper use of the Territory's natural resources. Mongolia said the United States had caused the economy and social system in Micronesia to worsen, its external dependence to increase and its agriculture to decay. The USSR saw the economic situation as evidence of the Administering Authority's indifference.

Social conditions

Under the heading "Social advancement", the Trusteeship Council, in its report (p. 1120), welcomed the establishment of a Health Manpower Training Program for the Trust Territory, which had already trained more than 100 Micronesians. However, it regretted that the health services had only two qualified Micronesian doctors. Commending the Administering Authority for its continuing efforts to improve health standards, the Council noted a marked reduction in major diseases due to vaccination programmes, as well as a decline in deaths from intestinal diseases. However, it urged attention to local outbreaks of tuberculosis and leprosy.

The Council continued to be deeply concerned by the serious unemployment problem and the imbalance between wage-earners in the public and private sectors. Stating that it was disturbed by communications it had received on youth problems such as unemployment and juvenile delinquency, it trusted that the Administering Authority would devote due attention to the consequences of the particularly young age structure.

In the debate, the USSR described the state of medical care as catastrophic and said the situation regarding training of medical personnel was not much better, as illustrated by the paucity of Micronesian physicians. The United Kingdom endorsed a suggestion for a study of the social effects of the Trusteeship System and said it had been disturbed by reports of social problems among youth.

Education

In the section of its report (p. 1120) dealing with "Educational advancement", the Trusteeship Council considered that the Administering Authority had served the Trust Territory well in providing a system of universal primary schooling throughout the islands. It welcomed the high rate of secondary school attendance and hoped that higher educational and vocational training schemes would be improved in preparation for termination of the Trusteeship Agreement.

Noting with concern what it called the precarious situation at the College of Micronesia, the Territory's principal institution for higher education, the Council urged the Administering Authority to ensure that its facilities were not allowed to deteriorate to the point that its accreditation in the United States educational system was jeopardized.

The Council welcomed vocational programmes and the recognition given to imparting technical skills; it urged the Administering Authority to expand such programmes. It noted the Authority's efforts to improve the general level of teacher qualification, including the new teacher certification requirement, and hoped sufficient incentives would be given to improve teachers' prospects in relation to the civil service.

Other questions

Resettlement of the Bikini and Enewetak populations

In the section of its report (p. 1120) entitled "Population movements", the Trusteeship Council dealt with the situation of the people of Bikini and Enewetak atolls in the Marshall Islands, who had had to relocate to other islands because of radioactive contamination from nuclear-weapon tests three decades earlier. It took note of a statement by the Acting Deputy High Commissioner and Special Representative of the Administering Authority that work would continue towards improving conditions for the displaced people and strengthening the health and food programmes in those and other areas in the Marshall Islands affected by nuclear problems.

The Council noted with regret that the health programme proposed under recent United States legislation had not been implemented. It noted that there was some doubt as to who would be covered by the plan and urged the parties to find a speedy solution.

The Council regretted that not all the people of Enewetak had been able to re-establish their homes on the atoll as they had hoped. However, it noted that interim measures had been taken, in close consultation with the people of Enewetak, for their resettlement. It reiterated its concern that any resettlement proposal should take fully into account any remaining health hazards.

It also noted that a master plan for the relocation of the Bikinians was currently under review. The Council welcomed the steps taken to improve the temporary conditions of the people of Bikini on Kili and Ejit Islands, while recognizing their ultimate intention to return to Bikini when it was safe to do so. It also welcomed the decision to construct an airstrip on Kili.

In the debate, the United States said it was aware of its continuing responsibility to mitigate the situation. The rehabilitation effort on Enewetak had resulted in the return of the people, and the population of Bikini had also received substantial assistance.

France said it was impressed by United States efforts to decontaminate and improve Enewetak but shared the concern about medical assistance to the islanders and hoped a speedy solution would be found to the problem of the Bikinians living on Kili. The USSR said the Administering Authority had taken no steps to meet the appeals of the affected people for eradication of the pernicious effects of the nuclear explosions and for guaranteed medical assistance; moreover, nothing in the Charter of the United Nations or the Trusteeship Agreement gave the United States the right to test weapons of mass destruction in the Territory. The United Kingdom, referring to a request from the Enewetak people to continue under United States trusteeship after the Trusteeship Agreement was terminated, hoped they would find a solution to their problems within the Marshall Islands, as it would be unfortunate if smaller units were to seek further trusteeship arrangements or even delay the end of the current Agreement.

Radioactive waste management

In the section of its report (p. 1120) devoted to "Land and people", the Trusteeship Council noted the concern expressed by Micronesian representatives about the possible dangers of dumping nuclear waste in the Pacific region. It noted in particular the appeal of Francisco C. Ada, Special Representative of the Administering Authority from the Northern Mariana Islands, who had stated to the Council his opposition to making the Pacific a storage area for nuclear waste.

The Council noted observations by the Administering Authority in response to a communication on this matter received in 1980. The observations were to the effect that the research vessel Vema, whose activities had been protested in a communication to the Council from the Governor of the Northern Mariana Islands, was engaged in a sea-bed sediments survey, outside the 200-mile limit, as part of a long-term international feasibility study for nuclear waste disposal, unrelated to a proposed Japan-United States feasibility (land-based) study on storage of spent fuel.

Claims

The Trusteeship Council dealt in its report (p. 1120) with the question of war damage claims brought against the Japanese Government, mainly for damages sustained by Micronesians during the Second World War, and of post-war claims against the United States Government. It reiterated its concern that the claims had not been fully settled as determined by the Micronesian Claims Commission and called on the parties to make further efforts to resolve the long-standing issue in the best interest of the innocent victims.

Chapter III

Namibia

Several United Nations organs were active in 1981 with respect to Namibia-the largest Territory still under colonial rule.

From 7 to 14 January, a meeting was held at Geneva among the parties directly concerned, under the auspices of the United Nations and chairmanship of the Secretary-General with the aim of facilitating agreement on a cease-fire and a date to begin implementing a Security Council-approved plan for elections leading to independence for the Territory. The so-called settlement plan, which the Council had endorsed in 1978,<sup>(20)</sup> provided for a cease-fire, the establishment in Namibia of a United Nations Transition Assistance Group (UNTAG) elections under United Nations supervision, the formulation and adoption of a constitution, and the achievement of independence.

Participating in the Geneva meeting were delegations from South Africa, whose occupation of Namibia had been declared illegal by the General Assembly and the Security Council, and the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO), recognized by the Assembly as the national liberation movement. Among the observers were the front-line States bordering Namibia and South Africa, and the members of the "Contact group", made up of the five Western States (Canada, France, Federal Republic of Germany, United Kingdom, United States) that had proposed the settlement plan. The Secretary-General reported to the Security Council afterwards<sup>(21)</sup> that the meeting had not achieved its objective; the South African Government was not currently prepared to sign a cease-fire agreement and proceed with implementation.

Following brief consideration by the Security Council late in January, the General Assembly took up the question in March at its resumed thirty-fifth session, after having postponed consideration in December 1980 in light of the upcoming Geneva meeting. Ten resolutions on Namibia were adopted at the resumed session. By one of them, the Assembly called on the Security Council to impose comprehensive mandatory sanctions against South Africa, and said it would consider necessary action if the Council failed to act.<sup>(12)</sup> Another resolution also contained a call for sanctions, along with a reaffirmation of Namibia's right to self-determination.<sup>(3)</sup> In addition, the Assembly urged States to break off economic relations with South Africa whenever they concerned Namibia.<sup>(4)</sup>

In April, the Security Council again considered the Namibia question but, because of negative votes by three permanent members (France, United Kingdom, United States), it did not adopt four draft resolutions sponsored by the African members of the Council, calling for the imposition of mandatory economic sanctions against South Africa.

The International Conference on Sanctions against South Africa, meeting in Paris in May, adopted a Special Declaration on Namibia in which it called for the urgent implementation of the settlement plan and emphasized the need for increased political and diplomatic pressure against South Africa, reinforced by sanctions. In August, a consensus text deploring the Security Council's failure to impose mandatory sanctions and endorsing a call for an emergency special session of the Assembly was adopted by the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

In light of the Council's failure to act, the eighth emergency special session of the General Assembly was convened from 3 to 14 September to deal with the question. The Assembly demanded unconditional implementation of the settlement plan without delay or modification, and again urged the Council to impose sanctions.<sup>(13)</sup>

In December, at its regular 1981 session, the Assembly adopted six more resolutions on Namibia. It called on all States to sever all diplomatic, consular and trade relations with South Africa, and detailed a number of economic measures to be taken by the international community.<sup>(15)</sup> As it had done in September, it rejected what it described as manœuvres by certain contact group members aimed at undermining the consensus behind the settlement plan.<sup>(14)</sup>

The United Nations Council for Namibia met at Panama City in June and adopted the Panama Declaration and Programme of Action on Namibia, calling on all United Nations Member States to act unilaterally and collectively to impose comprehensive sanctions against South Africa. The Council continued throughout the year its efforts to secure implementation of United Nations resolutions on Namibia, and its drafts served as the basis for most of the resolutions adopted by the Assembly on this question in 1981.

The Council's report<sup>(1)</sup> was sent to the Assembly, which established its work programme for 1981<sup>(5)</sup> and 1982.<sup>(16)</sup> The Assembly also repeated earlier requests that the Council be granted full membership in United Nations organizations as the Administering Authority for Namibia,<sup>(6)</sup> and authorized a co-operative programme between the Council and non-governmental organizations.<sup>(17)</sup>

The Assembly decided in March to launch a world campaign of information dissemination to support United Nations resolutions for a free and independent Namibia.<sup>(10)</sup> In this connection, it decided in December to expose and denounce the collusion of certain Western countries with South Africa.<sup>(18)</sup>

On economic issues, the Assembly, in March, requested Governments, particularly those of specified Western States, to prohibit their corporations from dealing in and prospecting for Namibian uranium.<sup>(11)</sup> The United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, meeting at Nairobi, Kenya, condemned the plunder and illegal exploitation of Namibian energy resources by South Africa and multinational corporations (p. 1171).

Namibians outside their country continued to receive assistance from several United Nations programmes. The main source of financing was the United Nations Fund for Namibia, which spent $7.7 million in 1981. The Assembly authorized a further appeal for contributions in March<sup>(9)</sup> and in December it allocated $1 million from the United Nations budget for the Fund's use in 1982.<sup>(19)</sup>

The Nationhood Programme for Namibia, financed largely from this Fund, had a programme of 46 projects for training of personnel and research in preparation for independence. In March, the Assembly expressed appreciation to Angola for having offered a site for a vocational training centre for Namibians under this Programme.<sup>(s)</sup>

At Lusaka, Zambia, the United Nations Institute for Namibia had 415 students and gave diplomas in management and development studies to 80 graduates. The Assembly commended its training and research work, and authorized a further fund appeal.<sup>(7)</sup>

Namibia question

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL. The Secretary-General reported to the Security Council on 19 January 1981<sup>(37)</sup> on implementation of two 1978 Council resolutions on the Namibia question. He informed the Council that a pre-implementation meeting under the auspices and chairmanship of the United Nations had been held at Geneva from 7 to 14 January, with the aim of facilitating agreement on a date for the cease-fire and the beginning of implementation in early 1981.

Delegations from South Africa and SWAPO had participated in the meeting, led respectively by the South African Administrator-General of Namibia, Danie Hough, and the President of SWAPO, Sam Nujoma. The front-line States and Nigeria, the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and the contact group of the five Western States had attended as observers. The Secretary-General had chaired the opening sessions, and the working sessions had been chaired by Brian E. Urquhart, United Nations Under-Secretary-General for Special Political Affairs.

Detailed presentations had been made to the meeting on behalf of the United Nations regarding the manner in which the Secretary-General's Special Representative for Namibia and UNTAG would fulfil their responsibilities.

The South African delegation had asserted that the United Nations had disqualified itself from supervising free and fair elections in Namibia, in particular by recognizing SWAPO as the sole representative of the people of Namibia, and that consequently a definite date for implementation would be acceptable only after an unspecified period in which the United Nations would express its impartiality. In response, the Chairman had pointed out that the matter of trust and confidence was a two-way street and that the key to entering a new phase was a definite agreement to proceed on a specific date with implementation.

The President of SWAPO had reiterated his organization's acceptance of the Council's settlement resolution and had stated that SWAPO was ready to sign a cease-fire, to agree to a target date for the arrival of UNTAG in Namibia, and to co-operate with its military and civilian components. However, since South Africa had not agreed, SWAPO had no alternative but to continue with the liberation struggle.

The Secretary-General reported that the meeting had not achieved its objective. It had become clear in the course of the meeting that the South African Government was not currently prepared to sign a cease-fire agreement and proceed with implementation. However, the meeting had been important in informing the participants in detail of the manner in which the United Nations would discharge its responsibilities during implementation, and in the contacts and exchanges it had facilitated. Expressing his belief that the outcome of the meeting must give rise to the most serious international concern, the Secretary-General appealed urgently to the Government of South Africa to review the implications of the meeting and to reconsider its position at the earliest possible time.

In a letter to the Secretary-General dated 28 January,<sup>(17)</sup> South Africa transmitted a letter of the same date from its Minister for Foreign Affairs and Information, expressing the view that the interests of the internal parties in Namibia had not been addressed at the Geneva meeting and enclosing statements made at the meeting by three of their representatives. The letter stated that the internal parties remained concerned at what they considered to be United Nations partiality towards SWAPO and the lack of equal treatment of the political parties. Consequently they did not have confidence in United Nations supervision and control of free and fair elections; in their view, the United Nations had failed at Geneva to rectify its bias in favour of SWAPO. It would therefore be premature to proceed with a discussion of setting a date for implementation.

SECURITY COUNCIL CONSIDERATION (JANUARY). In accordance with a request by Tunisia on behalf of the African Group, contained in a letter of 29 January,<sup>(21)</sup> the Security Council considered the Namibia question and the Secretary-General's report on 30 January.

The Secretary-General informed the Council that he had addressed a letter to the South African Foreign Minister on 22 January expressing hope that the Government would give serious attention to his appeal for a reconsideration of its position, and stating his concern over the effect of the stalemate on Namibia and the whole region. The Secretary-General hoped that efforts would not be relaxed to ensure the early attainment of independence for Namibia.

All 15 members of the Council participated in the debate, expressing appreciation to the Secretary-General and his staff for their efforts in preparing and conducting the Geneva meeting, and regret and disappointment that the meeting had not achieved its objectives. Most speakers paid tribute to the efforts by the front-line States and Nigeria, OAU and members of the contact group to bring about implementation of the Council's resolutions. Several representatives commended SWAPO for the sense of responsibility and constructive spirit with which it had supported efforts towards a settlement.

China, the German Democratic Republic, Japan, Mexico, the Niger, the Philippines, Tunisia, Uganda and the USSR attributed the meeting's failure to the intransigent attitude of South Africa and the obstacles it had raised to implementing the settlement plan. China said South Africa would never succeed in its scheme to put its puppets in power and stage a sham independence for Namibia. Japan joined in the Secretary-General's appeal to South Africa to reconsider its position. Mexico thought the result suggested that South Africa did not believe States had made a true commitment to comply with United Nations decisions. The Philippines viewed the result as a serious set-back to United Nations efforts. In Tunisia's view, the delegations at Geneva, particularly those of Western States, must have learned a lesson from South Africa's irresponsible and defiant attitude. Uganda stated that Africa had risen in the past to the challenges of armed struggle and of negotiated settlements, and would do so again in the case of Namibia.

The German Democratic Republic and the USSR asserted that, in light of South Africa's policy of obstruction, the Security Council should take decisive action under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations (on action with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression) to ensure that the Namibian people achieved genuine independence.

Ireland viewed the situation as serious and said it shared the concern of other delegations. Similar concern was voiced by Spain. The longer South Africa took to comply with the Council's decisions, said Panama, the worse the situation would become.

Among members of the contact group, France said it was certain that the parties would continue their efforts to bring about an internationally recognized peaceful solution. The United Kingdom quoted a statement by its Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs that agreement had proved impossible because the delegation led by the South African Administrator-General thought it premature to agree on an implementation date. The United States said it was reviewing the situation and would later share its assessment with its colleagues in the contact group and the interested parties.

ACTION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS (FEBRUARY-MARCH). Four resolutions dealing in whole or in part with the Namibia question were adopted by the Commission on Human Rights. On 23 February, in connection with the report of its Ad Hoc Working Group of Experts on Southern Africa (p. 943), the Commission requested the Security Council to consider imposing mandatory sanctions against South Africa<sup>(39)</sup> and condemned the increased South African military presence in Namibia.<sup>(40)</sup> Also on 23 February, on the subject of foreign support of South Africa (p. 945), it affirmed the right of the Namibian people to self-determination and independence, and requested States to end collaboration with South Africa.<sup>(41)</sup> On 6 March, dealing with self-determination of peoples, it condemned the sentencing to death of SWAPO freedom fighters by the South African courts (p. 944).<sup>(42)</sup>

The Economic and Social Council, on 8 May, decided to transmit the Commission's resolution of 23 February on sanctions to the General Assembly, the Security Council and the Special Committee against Apartheid.<sup>(63)</sup>

COMMUNICATION (MARCH). By a letter dated 1 March,<sup>(33)</sup> the United Republic of Cameroon transmitted, on behalf of the African Group, a resolution on Namibia adopted by the OAU Council of Ministers at its thirty-sixth session (Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, 23 February-1 March).

By this resolution, the Ministers: condemned South Africa for its violations of United Nations decisions, including its defiance of the United Nations plan on Namibia as manifested in its deliberate wrecking of the Geneva pre-implementation meeting; considered that the contact group members had responsibility to bring pressure on South Africa and deplored the group's apparent unwillingness to do so; endorsed a call by the Ministerial Conference of Non-Aligned Countries (New Delhi, India, 9-13 February) for the convening of the Security Council by mid-April with a view to adopting comprehensive mandatory sanctions against South Africa, and mandated several African Foreign Ministers to participate in those meetings; and, in the event of failure by the Security Council to adopt the appropriate measures, called for the convening of an emergency special session of the General Assembly.

resolutions on 6 March, three of them dealing with general aspects of the problem and the rest with specific aspects (p. 1126). Nine of the resolutions were based on texts recommended by the United Nations Council for Namibia in 1980.<sup>(70)</sup> The tenth, on the "Situation resulting from South Africa's refusal to comply with United Nations resolutions on Namibia", was adopted on the basis of a text recommended by the Council on 26 February 1981.

The first of the resolutions on general aspects concerned the situation in Namibia resulting from its illegal occupation by South Africa.<sup>(49)</sup> The Assembly called on the Security Council urgently to impose comprehensive mandatory sanctions against South Africa to ensure that country's compliance with United Nations decisions. Reiterating United Nations responsibility for Namibia, it reaffirmed the people's right to self-determination, freedom and national independence, and called for increased support to SWAPO as their sole and authentic representative. It strongly condemned South African repression in Namibia and its manœuvres to transfer power to illegitimate groups subservient to its interests. The Assembly declared null and void measures to enforce military conscription in the Territory, condemned South Africa's increasing military build-up there and demanded the release of political prisoners. It condemned Western and other States which had assisted South Africa in developing nuclear capability, and the activities of foreign economic interests illegally exploiting Namibia's resources.

This resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 114 to none, with 22 abstentions. Sponsored by 70 nations, it was introduced by Algeria, which stated that it dealt with all aspects of the Namibia question as it stood at the end of 1980, before the pre-implementation meeting.

The second of the general resolutions concerned the intensification and co-ordination of United Nations action in support of Namibia.<sup>(50)</sup> The Assembly urged States to break off economic relations with South Africa whenever they concerned Namibia and to take measures to compel South Africa to withdraw from the Territory immediately. It appealed to Governments to discourage their private investors from participating in business ventures in the Territory which helped finance the military costs of South Africa's repressive policies there. It requested the preparation of a United Nations handbook on transnational corporations operating in Namibia. The Assembly requested the Council for Namibia to urge corporations to cease supplying arms and ammunition to South Africa, to continue efforts to protect Namibia's natural resources, to notify Governments of States whose corporations operated in Namibia of the illegality of such operations, to warn those corporations that their operations were illegal, and to send missions aimed at discouraging foreign investments in Namibia. The Council was also requested to report on foreign exploitation of Namibian uranium (p. 1168).

This resolution, introduced by Nigeria and sponsored by 65 nations, was adopted by a recorded vote of 131 to none, with 5 abstentions.

The third resolution of a general nature<sup>(51)</sup> had been recommended by the Council for Namibia following the Geneva pre-implementation meeting. The Assembly determined that South Africa had acted deceitfully during the protracted talks for a negotiated settlement, to the detriment of the Namibians and SWAPO. It condemned South Africa for refusing to abide by United Nations resolutions, for intensifying repression against the Namibians, and for arresting and detaining SWAPO members. South Africa was also strongly condemned for its continued acts of aggression against independent African States (p. 214). The Assembly decided to increase United Nations financing for the SWAPO office in New York. Declaring South Africa's actions to be a serious threat to peace and security, the Assembly called on the Security Council to convene urgently to impose comprehensive mandatory sanctions. Should the Council be unable to adopt concrete measures, the Assembly would urgently consider necessary action.

This resolution, sponsored by 68 nations, was adopted by a recorded vote of 125 to none, with 13 abstentions. Introducing it, Algeria said the text drew a lesson from South Africa's latest act of defiance and proposed a new international approach to compel South African withdrawal. It was based on three main ideas: the flagrant illegality of the situation, the links between South Africa and certain Western countries that had not exerted enough pressure on it, and the support which the Namibians had earned through their political maturity.

On 2 March 1981, the Assembly decided without vote,<sup>(65)</sup> on an oral proposal of the President, to take note of a report by its Fourth Committee on hearings granted in November 1980 to 15 petitioners representing a number of non-governmental organizations.<sup>(70)</sup>

Also on 2 March, just prior to the debate on the Namibia question, the Assembly approved its Credentials Committee's decision to reject the credentials of the delegation of South Africa to the thirty-fifth session (p. 163).

In explanation of their abstentions on the first resolution, Austria, Belgium, Finland (on behalf of the five Nordic States), the Netherlands and New Zealand expressed reservations with respect to provisions recognizing SWAPO as the sole and authentic representative of the Namibian people. Belgium saw a contradiction between that clause and the principle of free and fair elections. Australia, Belgium, Finland (for the Nordic States), Japan, the Netherlands and New Zealand reserved their positions on provisions supporting armed struggle and calling for military assistance to the Namibians. Without referring to specific provisions, Portugal said the resolution contained references with which it could not agree and paragraphs which lacked balance.

Argentina, Fiji, Greece, Ireland and Uruguay said that they had voted for one or more of the resolutions despite their strong conviction that to support armed struggle was incompatible with the United Nations Charter, which was dedicated to the peaceful settlement of disputes. Among others voting in favour, reservations were voiced by Ireland and Peru on the provisions relating to military assistance to SWAPO, and by Greece and Uruguay on the recognition of SWAPO as the sole representative of the Namibians.

Several States had reservations regarding the call for enforcement measures against South Africa by the Security Council. Austria and Greece objected to any attempt to prejudice the Council, while Finland stated on behalf of the Nordic countries that only the Council could adopt decisions binding on Member States. In Australia's view, it was improper to upset the division of duties and responsibilities assigned by the Charter to different organs. Ireland considered that the Assembly could call on the Council to impose sanctions, but the Council must decide whether to act and what to do.

Belgium felt that sanctions would be difficult to apply and would harm African States. Botswana, Lesotho, Swaziland and Zimbabwe, alluding to their proximity to South Africa, reserved their positions on the call for sanctions.

The United States, explaining the abstention of the contact group members on all 10 resolutions on Namibia adopted by the Assembly in March, said their stand implied no judgement on the merits, but few of the resolutions contributed to the objective of securing a peaceful and internationally recognized settlement.

The President of the Council for Namibia, presenting the Council's report on its 1980 activities,<sup>(69)</sup> stated that South Africa must be held totally responsible for the collapse of the Geneva pre-implementation meeting. The five Western nations which had initiated the ideas that had culminated in the settlement plan should flex their economic muscles and pressure the South African regime to comply with United Nations resolutions.

In the general debate on the Namibia question, many speakers agreed that during the past year South Africa had continued its policy of impeding implementation of the United Nations settlement plan, intensified its terror and repression against Namibians, especially members of SWAPO, and adopted a course of expanding militarization of the Territory and aggressive behaviour towards neighbouring African States. In an effort to consolidate the powers of the illegal local administration, South Africa had established a so-called Council of Ministers and had instituted compulsory military conscription for Namibians. It appeared to be negotiating on the Namibia question largely to gain time to consolidate the power of its puppet regime, headed by the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance (DTA); it had no genuine desire to reach a peaceful settlement or allow free and fair elections under United Nations supervision and control. In particular, many speakers felt, South Africa appeared to fear that such elections would culminate in the legitimate victory of SWAPO.

It was obvious, said Brazil and Ecuador, that South Africa did not intend to relinquish control over Namibia or implement the United Nations plan. If South Africa was trying to buy time in order to consolidate the position of Namibia's so-called internal parties, stated Japan, chances for a peaceful solution would be diminished and the difficulties exacerbated.

The United Kingdom, on behalf of the contact group, stated that its members' object remained a peaceful and internationally recognized settlement in Namibia which, in their opinion, could be secured only through negotiations; few of the measures proposed in debate or in the draft resolutions seemed appropriate. Supporting this view, Australia, Austria, Finland and Norway commended the contact group for its persistence in keeping alive the prospects for a peaceful settlement.

Speaking for the European Community (EC) States, the Netherlands opposed any solution that was not internationally acceptable, considered that all parties must refrain from acts that might prejudice an agreement and declared that South Africa should not continue to deny independence to Namibia.

Some States, including Albania, Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia and the German Democratic Republic, considered that the Western Powers, because of strategic interests as well as their political, economic and military collaboration with South Africa, were a major obstacle to the elimination of the occupying forces in Namibia and were covertly collaborating with South Africa to perpetuate its illegal occupation of Namibia. South Africa, said the USSR, had been relying on the position of the Western countries which, in turn, had been trying to get away with empty talk.

Other States urged the members of the contact group to change their policies towards South Africa in view of the latest developments. Haiti said they must reconsider their unconditional support for the Pretoria regime. Honduras was dismayed at the lack of foresight and consistency in political action displayed by those who could influence South Africa. India hoped for a rapid reappraisal of policies by Governments which had indirectly encouraged South Africa, adding that they should be clear and forthright if their protestations about faith in human rights were genuine. Jamaica urged the Western States not to be guided by the politics of kith and kin or by short-term material interests. The authors of the independence plan, said Mexico, must prevent the latest failure from undermining the moderate voices in southern Africa.

The failure at Geneva, in the Niger's view, was a harsh snub to advocates of a dialogue with Pretoria; as efforts to persuade had not been enough, a good dose of coercion must be added. Senegal remarked that the credibility of the five Western States was at stake, now that South Africa had taken the risk of a racial war. Sri Lanka thought the five bore a special responsibility, while Sweden considered that, more than ever, they had a key role in making South Africa comply with the United Nations plan and terminate the illegal occupation. Expressing a similar view, Singapore stated that, if persuasion failed, the Western countries must be prepared to exert pressure, including sanctions.

Other States, including Botswana, Guinea, Mongolia, Uganda and Venezuela, supported the intensification of armed struggle as another way of compelling South Africa to withdraw from the Territory, as long as other means proved ineffective. No one wanted the battlefield, Angola stated, but if that was the only option the Namibians and their supporters would not flinch. Mongolia, citing a magazine article reporting a South African assertion that it had killed 3,343 SWAPO partisans over the past two years, observed that it was difficult for South African soldiers to distinguish such persons from local inhabitants. The Ukrainian SSR stated that there were over 70,000 South African troops in Namibia.

A number of speakers condemned what they regarded as the illegal exploitation of the natural resources of Namibia. Among those taking this view were Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Egypt, Indonesia, Iraq, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Philippines, Qatar, Uganda and Yugoslavia. Benin, citing information from the Council for Namibia, asserted that there were as many as 88 transnational corporations operating in Namibia.

With regard to sanctions against South Africa, many States expressed the opinion that new and concerted action should be taken to obtain South Africa's compliance, in view of its defiance of United Nations resolutions and of the 1971 advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice on the legal consequences for States of South Africa's continued presence in Namibia.<sup>(67)</sup> In Jordan's view, the Security Council's failure to take effective measures would herald further erosion of United Nations authority and give a green light for accentuated armed struggle against South Africa, thereby sparking a racial war.

Most States favoured the imposition of economic sanctions; many of these, including Afghanistan, Bahrain, Benin, Burundi, Cape Verde, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Ethiopia, Ghana, Guyana, Hungary, India, Iran, Jamaica, Kenya, Kuwait, Liberia, Malaysia, Mongolia, Nepal, Pakistan, the Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Senegal, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, the United Arab Emirates, the United Republic of Cameroon, Venezuela and Viet Nam, were of the opinion that only comprehensive and mandatory sanctions under Chapter VII of the Charter would compel South Africa to implement United Nations resolutions. Endorsing this idea, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya suggested that the Security Council meet in an African country to act on the matter.

New Zealand stated that although it had doubts about the effectiveness of sanctions, if South Africa persisted in its refusal to comply, the Council might have no alternative but to consider imposing them. Turkey urged that peace efforts be continued in parallel with Council action on sanctions at the proper time. Algeria, Benin, Bhutan, China, Ecuador, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Nicaragua and Panama, all of which supported the imposition of sanctions, endorsed the position of the New Delhi Ministerial Conference of Non-Aligned Countries, supported by OAU, that, if the Council was unable to implement the required enforcement measures, an emergency special session of the General Assembly should be convened at the foreign minister level in order to review the Namibia question and adopt appropriate measures in accordance with the Charter.

Spain, however, expressed reservations on any Assembly decision which would prejudice the Council's attitude on sanctions, while Austria and Norway were of the opinion that it was not the Assembly's proper function to call on the Council to take mandatory measures. Malta made the point that sanctions must be carefully planned and co-ordinated in advance, and that the contribution of influential countries was crucial.

The SWAPO observer stated that his organization had gone to the Geneva meeting with no pre-conditions or demands, except that it would not renegotiate any element of the United Nations plan. South Africa, however, had deliberately wrecked the meeting. The Assembly should again urge the Security Council to apply all economic sanctions against South Africa, including a total oil embargo, as recommended by OAU, the Non-Aligned Movement and the Council for Namibia. The challenge posed by South Africa to the international community was really a challenge to the contact group. If the members of that group had felt four years ago that demands for total economic sanctions were premature, they should now take the lead in calling for sanctions against the defiant regime.

The South African Minister for Foreign Affairs and Information, in a letter of 10 March to the Secretary-General,<sup>(18)</sup> rejected the Assembly's resolutions on Namibia as invalid because South Africa had been excluded from the session and the democratic parties of Namibia had been prevented from addressing it, although SWAPO had been afforded that opportunity. Those unwilling to associate themselves with the politically motivated and orchestrated campaign were responsible for approximately 80 per cent of all contributions to the United Nations. By reinforcing its bias, the Assembly had further jeopardized an internationally acceptable solution. The Assembly's approach to independence would lead Namibia into a rule of tyranny, oppression and economic retrogression which the people would never have the opportunity of changing by democratic processes. Threats of sanctions were inappropriate, as South Africa's trade with the rest of Africa in the past year had grown to well over $1.5 billion; what was needed was increased economic co-operation between South Africa and the rest of the continent.

SECURITY COUNCIL CONSIDERATION (APRIL). By a letter dated 10 April,<sup>(31)</sup> Uganda, as Chairman of the African Group, requested an urgent meeting of the Security Council to consider the Namibia question in light of South Africa's refusal to implement Council resolutions.

On 15 April, the Presidents of Angola, Botswana, Mozambique, the United Republic of Tanzania, and Zambia, convened at Luanda, Angola, in the Front-line States Summit Meeting, reaffirmed their total support for SWAPO, stressed the urgent need to implement the United Nations settlement plan without further delay or modification, emphasized the responsibility of the contact group to ensure implementation of the plan and underscored the special obligation of the Western five to exert pressure on South Africa to comply; the final communique of the Meeting was communicated to the Council President by a 24 April letter from Angola.<sup>(23)</sup>

At an Extraordinary Ministerial Meeting on the Namibia question (Algiers, Algeria, 16-18 April), the Co-ordinating Bureau of the Non-Aligned Countries appealed to the Council to impose global mandatory sanctions against South Africa, authorized the non-aligned countries to support the convening of an emergency special session of the General Assembly in the event that the Council failed to do so, and empowered several foreign ministers to participate in the Council meeting on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement; the final communique of this Meeting was transmitted to the Secretary-General by Algeria on 23 April.<sup>(14)</sup>

By a letter dated 23 April,<sup>(32)</sup> the United Kingdom, also on behalf of Canada, France and the Federal Republic of Germany, transmitted a statement from the Western contact group following its meeting in London on 22 and 23 April. The five, after receiving a report from a United States official on his visit to 12 African States, had reiterated their commitment to an internationally acceptable settlement in Namibia at the earliest possible date, had agreed that the 1978 Security Council resolution continued to provide a solid basis for transition to independence in Namibia, had considered possibilities for strengthening that plan and had decided to continue consultations among themselves to develop more specific proposals for discussion with the parties.

The Security Council considered the situation in Namibia at 11 meetings held from 21 to 30 April. Following a debate, it voted at the last of these meetings on four draft resolutions proposing the imposition of mandatory sanctions against South Africa. None of these was adopted due to the negative votes cast by three permanent members (France, United Kingdom, United States). A fifth draft, to establish an implementation committee, was not put to a vote in light of the results on the others.

Sponsors of the first draft, to impose arms and oil embargoes and other unspecified economic and political sanctions, were Mexico, the Niger, Panama, the Philippines, Tunisia and Uganda. The four other drafts, calling for the imposition of specific types of sanctions and for the creation of a committee, were sponsored by the Niger, Tunisia and Uganda. All five were introduced by Uganda.

By the first draft,<sup>(2)</sup> the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, would have determined that South Africa's persistent refusal to comply with United Nations resolutions on Namibia constituted a serious threat to international peace and security, that its illegal occupation of Namibia constituted a breach of peace and an act of aggression, and that its repeated armed attacks against independent States in southern Africa constituted grave acts of aggression. The Council would have decided to impose comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa, including economic and political sanctions, an oil embargo and an arms embargo. It would have called for implementation of those measures by all United Nations Member States and specialized agencies, and urged non-member States to act accordingly; and it would have decided to establish a committee to monitor implementation.

The vote on this draft was 9 to 3, with 3 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: China, German Democratic Republic, Mexico, Niger, Panama, Philippines, Tunisia, Uganda, USSR.

Against: France, United Kingdom, United States.
Abstaining: Ireland, Japan, Spain.

By the second draft,<sup>(3)</sup> the Council would have decided that States must sever all diplomatic, consular and trade relations with South Africa. The text specified a series of measures to that end, including prohibitions on imports of all commodities and products from South Africa and Namibia, dealings in or shipments of such products, and the sale and transport of goods to South Africa and Namibia, except for such items as medical supplies and educational material. Investments and other fund transfers would have been prohibited except for humanitarian purposes. Travel on a South African passport or a passport issued by South African authorities in Namibia would have been banned, as well as tourism and cultural or sports exchanges. The text also provided for action aimed at stopping emigration to South Africa. States would have had to withhold protection of investments in Namibia against the claims of a future Government of Namibia for compensation and reparation.

The vote on this draft was the same as for the preceding one.

The third text<sup>(4)</sup> would have had the Council decide to impose a mandatory embargo on the direct and indirect supply of petroleum and petroleum products to South Africa and occupied Namibia. This would have banned the sale or supply of such items, as well as sales promotion activities, shipments, investments and technical assistance to the petroleum industry, transit facilities and petroleum prospecting.

This draft received 11 votes to 3, with 1 abstention, as follows:

In favour: China, German Democratic Republic, Ireland, Mexico, Niger, Panama, Philippines, Spain, Tunisia, Uganda, USSR.

Against: France, United Kingdom, United States.
Abstaining: Japan.

By the fourth text,<sup>(5)</sup> the Council would have decided that all States should cease providing to South Africa arms and related matériel of all types, including weapons and ammunition, military vehicles and equipment, paramilitary police equipment and spare parts, as well as licences for their manufacture or maintenance. States would have been authorized to seize such items destined for or imported from South Africa. Also to have been prohibited were technology transfer to and investment in the country's arms industry, and the exchange of military personnel and weapons experts. States would have been called on to prevent the recruitment, financing, training and transit of mercenaries for service in South Africa and Namibia, as well as direct or indirect co-operation with South Africa in the development of a nuclear-weapon capability.

This draft received 12 votes to 3, as follows:

In favour: China, German Democratic Republic, Ireland, Japan, Mexico, Niger, Panama, Philippines, Spain, Tunisia, Uganda, USSR.

Against: France, United Kingdom, United States.

The fifth text,<sup>(1)</sup> not pressed to a vote, would have had the Council decide to establish a committee that would seek and examine information from any State relevant to the strict implementation of the sanctions resolutions, and report its observations to the Council.

Just before the vote, the sponsors orally inserted in the first four texts the date of 15 July as the deadline for reports by the Secretary-General on implementation of the resolutions.

Explaining its negative votes, France stated that the adoption of comprehensive mandatory sanctions would not promote progress and would run counter to the resumption and intensification of negotiations on Namibia. The United Kingdom said the imposition of sanctions could only hamper efforts to reach a negotiated settlement leading to an internationally accepted independence for Namibia, and would cause economic harm to many African and Western countries. The United States did not believe that economic sanctions were an effective means of influencing political policy, and reiterated its commitment to continue its efforts within the contact group for a peaceful negotiated solution; it saw no reason for a resolution on an arms embargo, since such an embargo was already in effect under a 1977 Council resolution.<sup>(61)</sup> embargo proposals but abstained on the two other draft resolutions proposing broader sanctions. Ireland stated that it did not think comprehensive sanctions would advance hopes for a settlement and it regarded proposals to terminate all diplomatic relations as inconsistent with diplomatic efforts to implement the settlement scheme; moreover, the Council could have indicated in advance its intention to honour its obligations to States that might face special economic problems resulting from sanctions. Spain did not think the severance of all diplomatic and trade relations or the interruption of communications would be the best way to pressure South Africa to comply with its obligations. Japan explained its abstentions on three of the drafts by stating that it doubted whether sanctions would be the most effective and expeditious means of achieving the desired end.

The USSR, regretting that the Council had been unable to adopt resolutions which would have promoted a settlement, considered that the Namibians were left with no alternative but to continue the armed struggle under SWAPO leadership. Uganda asserted that the negative votes had only strengthened the hand of South Africa, and reiterated the view that the settlement plan approved by the Council in 1978 was the only, non-negotiable basis for transition to independence in Namibia.

For the debate preceding the voting, the following Member States were invited, at their request, to participate without vote: Algeria, Angola, Bangladesh, Benin, Brazil, Burundi, Canada, Cuba, Democratic Yemen, Ethiopia, Federal Republic of Germany, Guinea, Guyana, India, Indonesia, Jamaica, Kenya, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mozambique, Nigeria, Pakistan, Romania, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, South Africa, Sri Lanka, Togo, United Republic of Tanzania, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

The Security Council also extended invitations under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure<sup>a</sup> to the following: the President and five Vice-Presidents of the Council for Namibia; the Chairman of the Committee on colonial countries; Peter Mueshihange, Secretary for Foreign Relations of SWAPO, as proposed by the Niger, Tunisia and Uganda in a letter of 20 April;<sup>(15)</sup> Johnstone F. Makatini, representative of the African National Congress of South Africa (ANC), as proposed by same three countries in a letter of 23 April;<sup>(16)</sup> and Clovis Maksoud, Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States to the United Nations, as proposed by Tunisia in a letter of 21 April.<sup>(22)</sup>

to 9 against (China, German Democratic Republic, Mexico, Niger, Panama, Philippines, Tunisia, Uganda, USSR), the Security Council rejected a request that an invitation under rule 39 be extended to Peter Kalangula, President of DTA, and others associated with his request. The proposal for this invitation was made in a letter of 20 April by France, the United Kingdom and the United States.<sup>(26)</sup>

Supporting this proposal, France, Japan, the United Kingdom and the United States argued that all interested parties should be heard by the Council as a matter of equity. Speaking for the sponsors of the proposal, France wondered whether the Council's decision to invite one Namibian group but not another did not reflect regrettable discrimination between parties which should participate in a Namibian settlement. Panama, asking that the proposal be put to a vote, objected to it on the ground that the legal status of DTA flowed from an administrative act of the South African Government, which did not have the authority to take decisions on electoral activities in Namibia. Also opposed were the German Democratic Republic, Uganda and the USSR, which stated that allowing a DTA representative to take part in the proceedings would be contrary to the Council's 1978 declaration that the results of the elections organized by South Africa that year in Namibia were null and void.<sup>(62)</sup>

Delegations of 48 States participated in the Council debate on the Namibia situation, 20 of them led by foreign ministers or other officials of ministerial rank mandated to represent the Non-Aligned Movement or OAU.

Opening the debate, Uganda asserted that the Geneva meeting in January had shown that the five Western States had failed to apply the necessary pressure on South Africa, whose actions constituted a clear breach of international peace and security, particularly its massive military presence in Namibia, its use of Namibian territory for repeated armed attacks against neighbouring countries, its organization of an elaborate machinery of repression and its annexation of Walvis Bay. Since the measures employed by the Council over many years had failed, the Council had a clear obligation to impose comprehensive mandatory sanctions against South Africa under Article 41 of the Charter, as requested by the Non-Aligned Movement and OAU.

These views were shared by most speakers from African, Asian, Eastern European and

Latin American States, who accused South Africa of deliberate prevarication, supported the position of SWAPO and called for implementation of the 1978 settlement plan without any amendment. Most of them also felt that the five members of the contact group must exert all possible pressure on South Africa to abide by the Council's decisions. Cuba, on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement, said the Namibians, under SWAPO, would not cease trying to attain independence by force of arms if other avenues were blocked.

Among the African front-line States whose delegations were led by ministers, Angola cited losses it said were due to South African attacks from Namibia-including 1,800 deaths and $7 billion in material damage-and asked how many more violations it would have to suffer before the Council shouldered its responsibilities by imposing sanctions. Mozambique said it would never accept the argument that Namibia would become independent if colonialism was given further guarantees; the guarantees enjoyed by colonialist settlers for 50 years had not brought about independence.

The United Republic of Tanzania expressed amazement that the African States were still being asked to display tolerance and realism, after years of patience and concessions on their part; the experience of Zimbabwe had shown that, as long as negotiations were blocked, a combination of internal and external pressures was essential. Zambia stressed the threat to peace and security constituted by the illegal occupation of Namibia, and spoke of a massive build-up of South African forces in the Territory, aimed at destabilizing African States. Zimbabwe said OAU was greatly disappointed at the apparent unwillingness and half-hearted effort of the Western contact group to exert concerted pressure on South Africa so that it would co-operate in implementing the United Nations plan.

Among other African States represented by ministers, Algeria stated that the impasse over Namibian independence weakened the credibility of the United Nations. The Niger's view was that South Africa would not begin to evaluate the price of future negotiations unless comprehensive mandatory sanctions were applied. Nigeria, together with a number of other States, said it would not accept any attempt to seek a solution of the Namibian question outside the United Nations framework. Senegal stated that, despite the failure of the Geneva talks, the non-aligned countries preferred a negotiated settlement-dialogue- to confrontation. Sierra Leone thought it would be disastrous, as a result of short-sighted and immediate interests, to allow South Africa to live in its cocoon of obduracy and defiance. Togo questioned the morality of States which had once respected their commitments to the peoples of dependent Territories under their administration but which now appeared ready to cast a veto against the will of Africans and all peace-loving peoples.

Similar points were made by other countries of the Non-Aligned Movement represented at the ministerial level. India stated that the temporary difficulties which sanctions might create for some African nations, and which the international community would have to find ways of alleviating, could not be used as a pretext to encourage defiance of the United Nations by a racist regime. Indonesia asserted that the failure of certain States to exert pressure on South Africa had contributed as much as South African intransigence to the collapse of the Geneva talks. Jamaica wondered whether South Africa sought to undermine the United Nations plan and convert it into a recycled version of an "internal settlement". Panama said there was every justification for measures of coercion in regard to the Namibia situation, and added that its position was basically a Latin American one. Unless the Council imposed coercive measures, stated Pakistan, South Africa would not desist from its illegal occupation of Namibia. Yugoslavia believed that further postponement of indispensable measures would only give South Africa more time to consolidate its internal solution.

Mexico, stating that the application of Chapter VII was justified in this case more than any other, said decolonization and liberation struggles must not be affected by rigid bipolar concepts of international society. Also urging the imposition of sanctions were Benin, Burundi, Democratic Yemen (on behalf of the Arab Group), Guinea, Guyana, Kenya, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Philippines and Zaire.

Bangladesh considered that any further delay in implementing the Council's resolutions would only bring more suffering to Namibia; serious consideration must be given to adopting other means, including comprehensive mandatory sanctions. Brazil stated that a long process of exhortation, persuasion and negotiation had been frustrated, and no other road seemed open but to consider measures under Chapter VII. Romania encouraged a political solution but said the Council was duty-bound to consider the most energetic measures to get South Africa to eliminate the obstacles to the exercise of Namibia's rights. Singapore argued that, as the Western five were advocates of peaceful change, it was in their interest to see that such a process succeeded in Namibia; if they did not put pressure on South Africa, that process would surely fail. Sri Lanka remarked that the question of sanctions would not have arisen if sufficient pressure had been brought to bear on South Africa.

China urged the imposition of sanctions and supported the African countries' view that, as authors of the United Nations plan on Namibia, the five Western Powers bore an unshirkable responsibility for ensuring its implementation. The German Democratic Republic stated that the application of sanctions would not contradict a solution through negotiation, since the purpose of sanctions was to compel South Africa to comply with United Nations decisions and to negotiate. The USSR asked whether the Western Powers were ready to agree to the adoption of genuine and effective sanctions against South Africa, or whether they would continue to try to procrastinate, invent subterfuges and undermine the settlement process.

Mr. Mueshihange of SWAPO, endorsing the call for sanctions, said the Western initiative on Namibia had turned out to be a contrived public relations exercise in the service of South Africa. Mr. Makatini of ANC warned against the danger of projecting the struggle to decolonize Namibia as part of the East-West conflict.

The members of the Western contact group said they understood the Council's frustration but reiterated their commitment to an internationally acceptable settlement. While they agreed that the 1978 Council resolution on implementation of a settlement continued to provide a solid basis for a transition to independence in Namibia, they were considering possibilities for strengthening the existing plan and giving greater confidence to all the parties on the future of an independent Namibia. The United Kingdom appealed to those advocating sanctions not to abandon the possibility of negotiation, as it did not believe sanctions would bring independence closer. The United States contended that sanctions did not solve problems and pledged its continued efforts, independently and within the contact group, to achieve an internationally acceptable, truly independent, stable and democratic Namibia. Canada, France and the Federal Republic of Germany expressed the conviction that there was no sound alternative to a negotiated settlement, and that recourse to force and enforcement measures would harm that effort.

Ireland stressed the need to avert a division in the Council so that a clear signal of unity and common determination could be sent to South Africa. Japan expressed support for the efforts of the Western five, welcomed their decision to continue consultations and mentioned its own contributions towards humanitarian assistance for Namibians. Spain considered that the application of indiscriminate drastic measures would not be the best course; it was not too late for a negotiated solution, so long as all parties, and fundamentally South Africa, renounced delaying tactics.

South Africa stated that the Council, by denying DTA an opportunity to speak, had stripped away any United Nations claim to be an impartial arbiter of Namibia's future and exposed the intentions of the majority to install a SWAPO government regardless of the people's wishes. South Africa would not take sanctions lying down but would exercise all its options and react appropriately to safeguard its interests.

FURTHER COMMUNICATIONS (MAY-JUNE). In a letter dated 5 May,<sup>(24)</sup> Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the United Kingdom and the United States transmitted a joint communique issued in Rome on 3 May by their Foreign Ministers in which they expressed regret over the outcome of the Council's consideration, reiterated their commitment to an internationally acceptable settlement on the basis of the 1978 Council resolution and agreed that ways to strengthen that plan should be considered. They instructed their officials to develop proposals encompassing measures, including constitutional arrangements, with the aim of enhancing prospects for a negotiated settlement.

On 16 June, Guyana transmitted the Georgetown Declaration of Solidarity and Support for the Liberation of Southern Africa adopted by the International Forum on the Liberation of Southern Africa (Georgetown, Guyana, 30 April-3 May).<sup>(28)</sup> Attended by 12 States and national liberation movement representatives, the Forum deplored the vetoes cast against the sanctions proposals in the Security Council and stated that there was no alternative but armed struggle.

ACTION BY THE CONFERENCE ON SANCTIONS AGAINST SOUTH AFRICA. The International Conference on Sanctions against South Africa (Paris, 20-27 May) (P. 165) adopted a Special Declaration on Namibia in which it called for the urgent implementation of the United Nations plan for Namibia approved by the Security Council in 1978. The Conference reaffirmed United Nations responsibility for Namibia and expressed support for the struggle of the Namibians under SWAPO as their sole and authentic representative.

The Conference described the South African regime as having increased its military attacks against independent African States, taken various measures to subvert the territorial integrity of Namibia, persisted in the systematic plunder of Namibia's natural resources in collusion with foreign economic interests, and persistently frustrated the implementation of Security Council resolutions for Namibian independence.

The Conference called on the Western contact group to exert pressure on the South African régime in order to enable Namibia to attain independence without further delay. Declaring the situation in Namibia to be a threat to international peace and security, it called on all Member States to impose comprehensive sanctions against South Africa so as to ensure that country's immediate compliance with United Nations decisions on Namibia. It emphasized the need for increased political and diplomatic pressure, reinforced by sanctions, and called for increased material, financial, political, diplomatic and moral assistance to the Namibian people and SWAPO.

This Declaration, together with the Conference's Paris Declaration on Sanctions against South Africa, were transmitted to the Secretary-General, for the attention of the General Assembly and the Security Council, by a letter of 11 June from the Chairman of the Special Committee against Apartheid.<sup>(6)</sup>

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION (JULY). In a resolution of 22 July<sup>(44)</sup> on implementation by United Nations organizations of the General Assembly's 1960 Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,<sup>(46)</sup> the Economic and Social Council requested organizations in the United Nations system to continue to withhold financial, economic, technical and other assistance to South Africa until that Government restored Namibia's right to self-determination and independence. They were also asked to refrain from action which might imply recognition of or support for the illegal occupation. In addition, the Council requested increased assistance to Namibians from United Nations organizations (p. 1178).

ACTION BY THE COMMITTEE ON COLONIAL COUNTRIES. On 14 August, the Committee on colonial countries adopted a consensus on the Namibia question<sup>(35)</sup> by which it noted with great concern that the situation had worsened as a consequence of South Africa's sabotage of the pre-implementation talks held at Geneva and its tactics and manœuvres to impose an "internal settlement". The Committee reiterated that Walvis Bay and the Penguin and other offshore islands were an integral part of Namibia, and reaffirmed that Namibia was the direct responsibility of the United Nations until national independence.

It reiterated that the only political solution for Namibia should be based on the termination of South Africa's illegal occupation and the withdrawal of its armed forces, and on the free and unfettered exercise by all Namibians of their right to self-determination and independence.

To that end, it reaffirmed the need for free elections under United Nations supervision and control in the whole of Namibia as one political entity, in accordance with the settlement plan. It regretted any attempt to revise and weaken that plan, which it called the only acceptable basis for independence.

The Committee commended SWAPO for its readiness to participate in free elections and for its flexibility in negotiations, reaffirmed support for its independence struggle by all available means and appealed for international assistance in that struggle. It demanded the release of political prisoners and the free return of political exiles.

The Committee condemned South Africa for its attempts to discredit SWAPO, its intensified military build-up in Namibia, its recruitment of Namibians into a "South West Africa Territorial Force", its forcible removal of Namibians from the Territory's northern border for military purposes and its establishment of new military bases. It called on States to prevent the recruitment, training and transit of mercenaries for service in Namibia. It also condemned military collaboration between South Africa and certain Western and other States, and called for the termination of their collaboration in the nuclear field (p. 181). It also condemned the use of Namibian territory to launch attacks against neighbouring States (p. 214).

The Committee condemned South Africa's illegal exploitation of Namibian resources, including its illegal extension of the territorial sea, its proclamation of an economic zone off the coast of Namibia and its illegal exploitation of the Territory's marine resources. It also demanded that those States whose transnational corporations continued to operate in Namibia withdraw all investments from the Territory and put an end to their co-operation with the illegal administration.

The Committee deplored the failure of the Security Council, due to the negative votes of the Western permanent members, to impose mandatory sanctions against South Africa, and endorsed the call for the early convening of an emergency special session of the General Assembly to take appropriate measures.

Referring to what it called South Africa's massive publicity campaign to perpetuate its occupation of Namibia, the Committee reiterated its request for intensified efforts by the United Nations Secretariat to mobilize public opinion against that policy and to disseminate information on the liberation struggle in the Territory (p. 1166).

The consensus was transmitted to the Security Council<sup>(8)</sup> and the General Assembly<sup>(7)</sup> in letters of 17 August from the Committee Chairman.

FURTHER COMMUNICATION (AUGUST). By a letter dated 27 August,<sup>(19)</sup> the South African Minister for Foreign Affairs and Information charged that SWAPO, aided by Cuba and the USSR, had intensified its premeditated attacks against Namibian civilians. Asserting that United Nations silence in respect of SWAPO actions was prejudicial to a peaceful solution, he invited all members of the Security Council to visit Namibia for personal observation.

ACTIVITIES OF THE UN COUNCIL FOR NAMIBIA. Throughout 1981, the United Nations Council for Namibia continued to act both as a policy-making organ of the United Nations and as the legal Administering Authority for Namibia prior to independence, the role assigned to it by the General Assembly in 1967.<sup>(48)</sup> It also consulted with Governments on the implementation of United Nations resolutions on Namibia and participated in international meetings, in many of which it represented Namibia.

The Council supervised the provision of material assistance to Namibians through the United Nations Fund for Namibia (p. 1171), of which it was trustee. The Fund provided financing for the Nationhood Programme for Namibia (p. 1174) and the United Nations Institute for Namibia (p. 1176), a training institute at Lusaka, as well as for educational, social and relief assistance. In addition, the Council oversaw a public information programme on Namibia (p. 1165).

The Council also reviewed the activities of the United Nations Commissioner for Namibia. The Commissioner's Office collected and analysed information on Namibia, co-ordinated and managed relief programmes, raised funds and acted as co-ordinating authority for the Nationhood Programme. The Commissioner's Regional Office at Lusaka also co-ordinated activities under that Programme and issued or renewed about 900 travel and identity documents under the Council's authority. His Regional Office at Gaborone, Botswana, continued a survey of training opportunities for Namibians and kept the New York Office apprised of developments in southern Africa.

Governments to which the Council sent missions of consultation were those of Argentina, Colombia, Finland, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, India, Ireland, the Netherlands, Peru, Romania, Spain and Viet Nam. Joint communiques between these missions and the Governments of India and Viet Nam, issued at New Delhi on 5 August and Hanoi on 12 August, were transmitted to the General Assembly and the Security Council by letters from the Acting President of the Council for Namibia dated 11 August<sup>(10)</sup> and 17 August,<sup>(11)</sup> respec-

The Council organized a Seminar on Legal Issues concerning the Question of Namibia, held at The Hague, Netherlands, from 22 to 24 June. The Seminar was aimed at identifying possible initiatives to exert further pressure on South Africa and on foreign interests that contributed to the maintenance of South Africa's illegal occupation of the Territory. It also examined ways to ensure implementation of the Council's 1974 Decree No. I for the Protection of the Natural Resources of Namibia<sup>(68)</sup> and the preservation of the territorial integrity of Namibia. Sixteen legal experts, jurists and researchers in international law participated.

The Seminar emphasized the binding character of the Decree, which provided that no person or entity was permitted to explore for, extract or export any natural resource of Namibia without the Council's consent. It recommended that extensive publicity be given to the Decree, that means be devised to identify goods of Namibian origin-including uranium (p. 1169) - and that States provide for mandatory seizure and forfeiture of goods covered by the Decree. The Seminar supported the development of programmes to enforce the obligation of the international community to bring to an end South Africa's illegal occupation of the Territory. Among its other recommendations was that action in domestic courts be considered against persons alleged to have committed gross violations of the human rights of Namibians.

As requested by the General Assembly on 6 March,<sup>(52)</sup> the Council held a series of extraordinary plenary meetings at Panama City from 2 to 5 June in order to assess the situation in and concerning the Territory and to consider measures to press for implementation of United Nations resolutions. On 5 June, the Council adopted the Panama Declaration and Programme of Action on Namibia, which was transmitted to the General Assembly and the Security Council by a letter of 12 June from the Acting President of the Council for Namibia.<sup>(9)</sup>

In the Programme of Action, the Council called on all Member States to take immediate unilateral and collective action to impose comprehensive sanctions against South Africa in order to ensure South Africa's immediate compliance with United Nations decisions relating to Namibia. It called for the early convening of an emergency special session of the General Assembly, at the foreign minister level, to take appropriate measures. The Council called on States not to recognize any "internal settlement", reiterated the need for United Nations-supervised elections and called for increased support to SWAPO so that it could pursue its military, political and diplomatic strategies.

The Council condemned the illegal exploitation of Namibian resources and pledged to expose their plunder by South African and foreign economic interests. It decided to counter South Africa's attempts to extend the territorial sea of Namibia and proclaim an exclusive economic zone for the Territory, and reiterated its intention to act with respect to those areas under its own authority. It requested the General Assembly to instruct the Secretary-General and the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) to end all contracts between the United Nations and corporations which supported South Africa's illegal occupation of Namibia.

The Council called for voluntary measures by States to supplement the Security Council arms embargo of 1977, including cessation of trade with South Africa in weapons, ammunition, military vehicles and equipment, paramilitary police equipment and spare parts, as well as seizure of prohibited items, a ban on exchanges of military personnel and weapons experts, and national penalties for violations. It also called for an oil embargo and a series of other economic sanctions, including a ban on imports of goods originating in South Africa or Namibia and on the sale of products to those areas, except for certain items of a humanitarian nature. Other measures recommended in the Programme included a ban on investments and most other financial transfers to South Africa and Namibia, exclusion of persons travelling on South African passports, prohibition of tourist and other travel, and a halt to airline traffic.

The Programme of Action was adopted by acclamation, but with reservations by Australia, Belgium and Finland in regard to certain provisions.

The Council held a solemn meeting commemorating Namibia Day (26 August). From 26 to 30 October, it observed a Week of Solidarity with the People of Namibia and its Liberation Movement, SWAPO; the Council held two special meetings on 26 October, at which messages from Governments, specialized agencies and support groups were read.

The Council reported to the General Assembly at its 1981 regular session on developments concerning the Territory and on the Council's activities from 1 August 1980 to 31 August 1981.<sup>(36)</sup> The text of the Programme of Action was included in the report. The Assembly approved the 1980 and 1981 reports of the Council in its resolutions on the Council's work programme (p. 1159), as well as in its general resolutions on the Namibia question adopted in March and December. Also in those general resolutions, it supported the Council's efforts as the legal

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (SEPTEMBER). The eighth emergency special session of the General Assembly, devoted to the Namibia question, met at United Nations Headquarters from 3 to 14 September. It was convened after a majority of Member States concurred in a request for the session made by Zimbabwe. In the letter containing this request, dated 12 August,<sup>(34)</sup> Zimbabwe noted that the Security Council, because of the negative votes of several permanent members, had failed to adopt the four draft resolutions on sanctions placed before it in April, and that subsequent negotiations had failed to advance towards a resolution of the issues.

In a letter of 28 August,<sup>(20)</sup> the South African Minister for Foreign Affairs and Information strongly opposed the convening of the session, pointing out that it was to begin shortly before the regular session, which already had the Namibia question on its agenda. The "emergency" character of the session had been decided upon several months previously. Instead of wasting money on the session, those convening it should pay attention to the plight of millions throughout Africa who lacked basic necessities.

In a letter of 2 September,<sup>(12)</sup> the President of the Council for Namibia transmitted a memorandum approved by the Council on that date. After reviewing the lengthy efforts to secure Namibia's independence, the Council called on the Assembly to adopt effective and comprehensive measures to ensure the complete isolation of South Africa and to compel it to withdraw from Namibia. South Africa, said the memorandum, had deliberately caused the failure of negotiations on independence, had continued its oppression, had continued to seek international recognition for illegitimate groups it had installed in Namibia, and had committed a manifest breach of peace and security.

Also on 2 September,<sup>(29)</sup> Madagascar transmitted a telegram from its President dated 30 August, proposing that the Assembly decide to apply immediately the United Nations settlement plan or that the Council for Namibia unilaterally proclaim the independence of Namibia under the auspices of SWAPO. On 3 September,<sup>(27)</sup> the German Democratic Republic transmitted a message from the General Secretary of the Central Committee of the Socialist Unity Party and Chairman of the Council of State, expressing the expectation that the Assembly would strongly reaffirm and actively support the right of the Namibian people to independence, self-determination and territorial integrity. On 9 September,<sup>(25)</sup> Egypt transmitted a press release issued on 8 September by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs affirming that South Africa's aggressive policies would have a negative impact on efforts to achieve Namibian independence.

On 9 September,<sup>(30)</sup> Saint Vincent and the Grenadines transmitted a telegram of the same date from its Minister for Foreign Affairs urging renewed efforts to fix a new date for the holding of a supervised election in Namibia, a diplomatic offensive to convince South Africa that it would be isolated if the question was not resolved and, should that approach fail, the appointment of an Assembly committee to consider further options. Lastly, on 17 September,<sup>(13)</sup> Algeria, on behalf of the African Group, transmitted a communiqué, issued at the end of an emergency summit of the front-line States and Nigeria (Lagos, Nigeria, 11 September), condemning 'South Africa's aggression against Angola (p. 217) and rejecting any attempt to revise the 1978 Security Council resolution on a Namibian settlement.

On 14 September, the General Assembly adopted a resolution on the Namibia question<sup>(53)</sup> by which it reaffirmed that the 1978 Security Council resolution was the only basis for a settlement, rejected manœuvres by certain members of the Western contact group aimed at undermining the international consensus embodied in that resolution and demanded the immediate commencement of its unconditional implementation without prevarication, qualification or modification, not later than December 1981. The Assembly urged the Security Council to impose comprehensive mandatory sanctions against South Africa, and called on States to do likewise and to cease all dealings with that country. It requested the Council for Namibia to monitor the boycott and bring instances of contact between South Africa and Member States to the Assembly's attention. It called for increased international assistance to SWAPO and to the front-line States (p. 214).

This resolution, sponsored by 70 nations, was adopted by a recorded vote of 117 to none, with 25 abstentions. Introducing it, Algeria said it reflected the legitimate frustration felt at the Security Council's inability to exercise its prerogatives in the case of breaches of the peace. The United Nations could not shirk its duty just because the Council was blocked.

On 4 September, before starting its debate on the Namibia question, the Assembly approved its Credentials Committee's decision to reject the credentials of the South African delegation to the emergency special session (p. 164).

Explaining the abstentions of the five contact group members on the resolution on the Namibia question, Canada said they were not taking a substantive position on the resolution and did not regard it as affecting the course of the negotiations. They did not believe it contributed to their objective of a peaceful, internationally recognized settlement. Moreover, the Assembly could not arrogate to itself powers it did not have.

Among the others which abstained in the vote, Portugal, as well as the United Kingdom speaking for the EC members, said they could not support the paragraphs attacking individual States. The United Kingdom also disassociated the EC members from any endorsement of armed struggle, as well as from the description of any group as the sole and authentic representative of the Namibian people, and said they remained committed to the division of competences between the Security Council and the Assembly. Ireland did not want to be associated with any implication of bad faith on the part of contact group members; also, it favoured selective rather than comprehensive sanctions, and thought unco-ordinated or ineffective measures could be damaging to the ends sought. Norway, on behalf of the Nordic States, said that, under the Charter, only the Security Council had the authority to impose mandatory sanctions, while Australia and Japan cited difficulties with the paragraphs on SWAPO and sanctions. Austria mentioned the negotiating process as its reason for abstaining. Chile said some paragraphs might be invoked as an excuse to evade negotiations.

Though voting in favour, Argentina said it could not accept requests for comprehensive mandatory sanctions, which only the Security Council was competent to apply; it also had reservations on the paragraphs on SWAPO, support for armed struggle, mention of certain countries and monitoring of sanctions. Bolivia believed some ideas with regard to the sovereign decisions of States could have been omitted, while Brazil thought some provisions might give rise to technical inconsistencies and deserved closer study. Fiji and Honduras voiced reservations on the references to armed struggle; they, together with Turkey, had difficulties with the paragraph criticizing members of the contact group. Lesotho, referring to its geopolitical situation, reserved its position on sanctions, as did Botswana. Uruguay said it could not accept the institutionalization of the armed struggle; it also had reservations about sanctions and thought States could not have limitations or monitoring imposed on their conduct of international relations.

During the general debate a majority of speakers, including most African States, agreed that South Africa's continued refusal to implement the settlement plan had resulted in a serious threat to international peace and security. As evidenced by its recent aggression against Angola, South Africa was seeking not only to maintain its illegal grip on Namibia but also to destabilize neighbouring countries. The already critical situation had been aggravated by the failure of the Security Council to adopt mandatory economic sanctions against South Africa; lest the Council's inaction be construed by South Africa as a sign that it could continue to act with impunity, the Assembly must endorse the application of such sanctions as well as other measures to isolate South Africa and ensure its compliance.

Some States, commenting on the stated intention of the contact group to strengthen the 1978 settlement plan, were of the view that the group was in fact trying to weaken and undermine the plan by revising its terms to make them more acceptable to South Africa.

On this point, Kenya, representing the OAU Chairman, objected to the notion that South Africa might be empowered to write a constitution for Namibia before the plan was implemented; the right to draw up a constitution belonged to the Namibian people alone, Kenya stated. Ethiopia saw the Western Powers as attempting to subvert the very plan they had drafted, thereby acknowledging that they attached greater importance to their imperialist interests in southern Africa than to Namibia's emancipation. Guinea said there was irrefutable evidence of a scheme to undermine the prospects for success of the United Nations plan and to impose a neo-colonialist solution on the Namibians. Zambia considered that any attempt to sidetrack the provisions of the plan as already accepted by both sides would only aggravate a dangerous situation, and that it should be implemented without delay. Zimbabwe said the Western initiative to devise so-called confidence-building measures that would allay the fears of the minority in Namibia had created a state of expectancy which had delayed implementation of the independence plan.

Brazil wondered whether the proposed revisions were intended to deny SWAPO a fair chance to participate in future elections and to deprive the Government of an independent Namibia of any power to run the country in a sovereign manner. The German Democratic Republic said the Western representatives had been shamefacedly silent about the nature of the new proposals, but from press reports they appeared to be aimed at imposing on the Namibians obligations running counter to their right to self-determination and at satisfying South African interests. Gabon, Hungary and Jamaica insisted that the 1978 Security Council resolution not be modified, but be implemented in its original form, while Sweden said it should be made clear that the United Nations, in its settlement plan, had a firm basis of principles which must not be compromised. China thought the efforts of one country to revise the resolution were unwise.

On behalf of the contact group members, the Federal Republic of Germany stated that, although many countries were tempted to abandon negotiations, the group was working actively to revive them in the belief that a peaceful solution was possible on the basis of the 1978 resolution. To that end, proposals were being formulated concerning the implementation of the United Nations plan which would provide the added assurances the group thought essential in order to gain the confidence of all parties and obtain their agreement.

The United Kingdom, speaking for the EC members, expressed grave concern at the consequences of the continuing delay in agreeing on implementation of the settlement plan, and reiterated that South Africa must abide by its declared willingness to let Namibia gain independence in accordance with that plan; the EC members urged everyone concerned, especially South Africa, not to throw away the progress that had been achieved and to examine all possibilities that might help bring about agreement on implementation without delay.

The efforts of the contact group were supported by Belgium and Japan; Japan added that it was ready to consider all constructive proposals for an early and internationally acceptable solution. Australia considered it strange that the contact group should be singled out for criticism because of the intransigence of South Africa, which had prevented implementation of the plan.

Many States, including Egypt, Gabon, Haiti, Nepal, Rwanda and Singapore, believed that, as the authors of the settlement plan, the five Western Powers of the contact group bore a special responsibility to use their leverage with South Africa to ensure the immediate implementation of the plan. Costa Rica made a similar appeal and added that the collective use of force should be among the actions taken by the United Nations. Spain appealed to South Africa to accept the plan, stating that there was little use in exerting pressure on that country unless its Government took steps towards a just and lasting solution. Thailand urged the contact group to spare no effort in completing its task and to avoid giving South Africa any ground for delay.

Some countries criticized the United States for seeking to link the attainment of a Namibian settlement to the withdrawal of foreign troops from Angola. Guyana stated that elements unrelated to the nature of the struggle in Namibia were being introduced as a red herring intended to serve as a pretext for delaying and placing limitations on Namibia's independence. The USSR said events in Angola were completely unconnected to the problem of Namibia and fell within the exclusive purview of the Angolan Government.

Jordan, Kuwait, Suriname and others objected to placing the question in the context of East-West rivalry. In Bhutan's view, the objective must be to decolonize Namibia quickly and not to settle or bring in other differences which did not contribute to the solution. Botswana, while acknowledging the danger to peace and security in Africa inherent in the involvement of extra-continental Powers in African political life, supported the sovereign right of any State to identify its enemies and choose its friends, especially in situations of armed conflict. The Congo said the struggle was not between communism and capitalism but between oppression and freedom. Togo stated that the issue had been skilfully distorted; whereas the Namibian problem was a simple one of decolonization, it had been turned into a complex ideological issue involving East-West rivalry and the security of the Western world.

Albania stated that the problem would be solved only if the South African racists were made to withdraw and if super-Power interference and intrigues were halted. The Central African Republic said South Africa's refusal to recognize the international status of Namibia had worsened the Namibia situation and opened Africa to the struggle between hegemonistic influences.

Many States, including Bahrain, Brazil, the Comoros, Guyana, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Sierra Leone and the United Republic of Cameroon, criticized the three Western permanent members of the Security Council which had voted in April against enforcement action by the Council. Cape Verde said that, if South Africa persisted in its arrogance, its partners should refrain from blocking the operation of Chapter VII of the Charter. Equatorial Guinea considered that South Africa's intransigence had been buttressed by the statements made by some countries in the Council. Uganda described the vetoes as manifestations of naked power divorced from responsibility, and expressed concern at what it saw as a tendency by some Powers to demobilize the Council with regard to situations that threatened peace and security.

A number of States, including Cuba, India, Indonesia, Liberia, Madagascar, the United Republic of Tanzania, and Yemen, strongly urged the Assembly, in view of the immobilization of the Council, to take concerted collective international action by continuing to urge the Council to invoke the sanctions envisaged under Chapter VII and, at the same time, calling on States to impose such measures individually and collectively. The imposition of coercive measures or a boycott was also urged by Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Benin, Bulgaria, Burundi, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Ghana, Mali, Mauritania, Mexico, Mongolia, Mozambique, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Pakistan, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Sao Tome and Principe, Senegal, Seychelles, Sri Lanka, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Turkey, the Ukrainian SSR, the United Arab Emirates, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yugoslavia and Zaire.

Fiji thought consideration should be given to whether measures going beyond the existing arms embargo were necessary. Others, including Malaysia and Panama, spoke in more general terms of the need to intensify international pressure against South Africa, and Cyprus said the United Nations must take steps to compel South Africa to end its occupation. In Colombia's view, the failure to achieve a settlement for Namibia indicated the need for the United Nations to make use of the instruments provided for in the Charter to prevent continuation of the conflict. It was imperative for the credibility of the United Nations, said the Gambia, that measures to ensure South Africa's early compliance be applied without delay. Trinidad and Tobago believed that South Africa's continued failure to implement the independence plan must lead to the full and effective application of measures under Chapter VII.

Iraq asked the Assembly to call for maximum assistance to SWAPO and the front-line States, to overthrow the Pretoria regime. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya said it would continue to provide material and moral support to the Namibians.

Norway and Sweden expressed support for the efforts of the contact group to reach a settlement, but considered that the negotiation process should be fortified by additional pressure on South Africa in the form of mandatory economic sanctions. Morocco took a similar position on sanctions while expressing its conviction that the contact group was still in a position to play a positive role. Argentina appealed for new efforts by the contact group members to achieve internationally acceptable independence for Namibia, and Peru said the Powers with direct access to the parties should compel South Africa to implement the plan.

Austria's view was that negotiations should continue but with a commitment that, if persuasion and argument failed, carefully devised coercive measures should be employed. The Bahamas and Finland favoured the continuation of negotiations combined with increased pressure on South Africa. In Ecuador's view, the Assembly should demand the unconditional implementation of the independence plan and, failing that, sanctions should be imposed. Madagascar repeated its proposal to have the Council for Namibia proclaim the Territory's independence (p. 1140), stating that independence would have to be achieved without South Africa's co-operation and, if necessary, against its wishes. Further efforts must be made to deal with the remaining obstacles, said Malta, but it must be made clear to South Africa that it would not be allowed to disregard the provisions it had professed to accept in principle.

Commenting on South Africa's complaint that the United Nations was partial on the Namibia question, Angola said the Organization was enjoined by the Charter to be biased on the side of peace, security, freedom, independence, liberation, decolonization and justice; no one had the right to ask it to go against its principles.

The SWAPO observer stated that his organization had been recognized even before elections as the sole and authentic representative of the Namibian people because it was the only indigenous liberation movement with the organizational sophistication, military capability, human resources, political programme and international standing to resist South Africa's colonial domination in Namibia. It remained ready to sign a cease-fire agreement with South Africa once the latter agreed to follow that example, in order to open the way for implementation of the United Nations plan. However, it had no interest in reopening negotiations on the plan, a compromise formula accepted by the two principal protagonists-SWAPO and South Africa-which should be implemented without further delay or dilution.

As requested by the General Assembly in its resolution of 14 September, the Secretary-General submitted a report on 17 November, with later addenda,<sup>(38)</sup> transmitting replies from 18 States and two international institutions associated with the United Nations, providing information on action taken or envisaged by them to implement the resolution.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION (NOVEMBER). On 2 November, the Economic and Social Council, in a resolution on the activities of transnational corporations in South Africa and Namibia,<sup>(45)</sup> called on the home countries of those corporations to bring about an immediate withdrawal of all existing investments in Namibia, and reaffirmed the Security Council's 1971 resolution<sup>(60)</sup> calling on States to abstain from entering into economic relations with South Africa in respect of Namibia.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (DECEMBER). The General Assembly considered the Namibia question during its regular session at meetings between 19 November and 11 December. On 10 December, the Assembly adopted six resolutions on the question (p. 1127), two of which were on general aspects. The texts were recommended by the Council for Namibia in its 1981 report.

The first of these resolutions, on the situation in Namibia resulting from the illegal occupation of the Territory,<sup>(58)</sup> included a number of provisions from the Assembly's resolution of 6 March on this aspect.<sup>(49)</sup> Other provisions were repeated from the resolution of 14 September,<sup>(53)</sup> including the call for international assistance to the front-line States (p. 214), reaffirmation of the 1978 Security Council resolution as the only basis for a peaceful settlement, rejection of manœuvres by certain contact group members aimed at undermining the consensus embodied in that resolution and the demand that implementation of that resolution commence immediately. By three provisions that had not been in the earlier resolutions on the Namibia question, the Assembly condemned collusion with South Africa in the nuclear field by Governments of certain Western and other States (p. 182), urged the Security Council to act decisively against dilatory manœuvres and fraudulent schemes of the illegal occupation regime aimed at frustrating the liberation struggle, and declared South Africa liable to compensate the victims and their families in cases of disappearance of Namibians.

This resolution, introduced by Nigeria and sponsored by 52 nations, was adopted by a recorded vote of 120 to none, with 27 abstentions.

The other resolution on general aspects concerned action by Member States in support of Namibia.<sup>(59)</sup> The Assembly called on all States to sever all diplomatic, consular and trade relations with South Africa, and requested them specifically to prevent or prohibit imports and exports, the international sale of goods, including petroleum and uranium (p. 1169), arms traffic, investments and other financial transfers, travel by their nationals and persons bearing South African passports, airline operations, and the recruitment and training of mercenaries. States were asked to renounce those elements of bilateral or multilateral treaties in which South Africa had claimed to represent Namibia. The Assembly requested the Secretary-General to prepare a comprehensive programme of assistance to States neighbouring South Africa and Namibia (p. 215), and requested the Council for Namibia to continue to monitor the boycott of South Africa.

This resolution, introduced by Algeria and sponsored by 61 nations, was adopted by a recorded vote of 118 to none, with 29 abstentions.

The Namibia question was also dealt with in several Assembly resolutions adopted under other agenda items.

In a resolution of 28 October on the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination (1973-1983),<sup>(54)</sup> recommended by the Economic and Social Council on 6 May,<sup>(43)</sup> the Assembly reaffirmed the inalienable right of the Namibian people to self-determination and independence.

The Assembly adopted a resolution on 24 November on foreign interests impeding decolonization<sup>(55)</sup> in which it reiterated that exploitation of Namibia's natural resources by South African and other foreign interests was illegal and contributed to the maintenance of the occupation regime. The Assembly condemned South Africa for its continued exploitation of those resources, and called on States to discontinue all economic, financial and trade relations with South Africa concerning Namibia.

In another resolution of the same date,<sup>(56)</sup> on implementation by international organizations of the Declaration on colonial countries, the Assembly urged increased assistance to United Nations programmes aiding the Namibians and SWAPO (p. 1171). It also urged organizations of the United Nations system to withhold assistance from South Africa, to discontinue all support to that Government until it restored Namibia's right to self-determination, and to refrain from action that might imply recognition or support for the legitimacy of South Africa's domination of the Territory.

In a resolution of 1 December<sup>(57)</sup> on implementation of the Declaration, the Assembly requested States to withhold assistance from South Africa until a united Namibia achieved independence.

The Assembly decided on 18 December,<sup>(66)</sup> when suspending its thirty-sixth session, that the appointment of the United Nations Commissioner for Namibia would be one of the items on the agenda when the session resumed in 1982.

Argentina and Fiji, explaining their reservations while voting in favour of the first of the two general resolutions on the Namibia question, and Australia, Austria, Iceland (for the five Nordic States), Ireland, Japan, Portugal and the United Kingdom (for the EC States), explaining their abstention in the voting, objected to the provisions reaffirming the legitimacy of armed struggle and calling for military assistance. Some of these States argued that armed struggle should not be endorsed as a legitimate means of achieving goals, especially when efforts to achieve Namibia's independence by peaceful means were under way, that military support for armed struggles should not be encouraged, and that the United Nations had a responsibility to seek peaceful solutions. Canada said the contact group considered armed struggle to be the least likely avenue to Namibian independence.

On the provision recognizing SWAPO as the sole and authentic representative of the Namibian people, reservations were voiced by Argentina, Austria, Iceland (for the Nordic countries), Japan and the United Kingdom (for the EC States). It was stated that although SWAPO had an important role to play in the independence process, free elections and not the General Assembly should determine the ultimate representatives of the Namibian people.

Objections to provisions singling out individual States or criticizing manoeuvres by certain members of the contact group were voiced by Australia, Belgium, Chile, Iceland (for the Nordic States), Ireland, Japan, Nepal, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom (for the EC States), which abstained. Belgium thought they could jeopardize the successful outcome of the dialogue on Namibia. Iceland said some wording seemed to cast doubt on the negotiating effort, which the Nordic countries supported. Ireland said it did not wish to be associated with implications of bad faith on the part of some contact group members; moreover, the condemnation of collusion with South Africa by specified States seemed unwarranted and unnecessarily divisive. For the contact group, Canada stated that the reference to manoeuvres by certain members of the group to undermine the settlement plan was an ill-informed misinterpretation.

Among those voting for this resolution, Indonesia, Liberia and Suriname said they would have abstained on the paragraphs singling out certain States if they had been voted on separately. In Argentina's view, such references detracted from support for the resolution and therefore from its effectiveness. Samoa had doubts about the usefulness of selective accusations, and Sri Lanka said it would have been happier if such references had been avoided. Botswana, Burma, Costa Rica, Fiji, the Gambia, Morocco, Peru, Saint Lucia, Senegal and Turkey also voted in favour with reservations on this point.

Canada said the contact group members would abstain on all of the resolutions on the Namibia question, so as not to compromise their role as negotiators; however, they regarded the texts as vituperative, unjust, inaccurate, unrealistic and unhelpful in the search for a settlement. Also abstaining on the two resolutions on general aspects, New Zealand stated that they did not seem calculated to assist the contact group's efforts, and could have the opposite effect.

A number of States explained their abstentions on the resolution concerning sanctions against South Africa. For the contact group, Canada stated that the consequence of breaking off all contacts with South Africa would be the end of negotiations on implementation of the independence plan. Costa Rica said that, if it had voted in favour, it would have been obliged to impose on its citizens sanctions and restrictions forbidden by its constitutional system and by the International Covenants on Human Rights.<sup>(47)</sup> Ireland favoured sanctions chosen by the Security Council but regarded those proposed in the resolution as excessive and thought they would be ineffective if adopted only by the Assembly. Japan doubted that comprehensive mandatory sanctions would be the most effective and expeditious means of achieving the desired end. New Zealand thought the resolution was at odds with efforts to build a climate of confidence between the parties. Portugal said that total isolation of South Africa would make it impossible to hold the dialogue with that country on which a peaceful solution to the Namibia question could be based. Spain did not believe that imposing indiscriminate drastic measures was the best course and thought that breaking diplomatic relations, political and cultural discrimination, and the interruption of communications could be counter-productive.

Lesotho mentioned its geographical location with respect to South Africa in explaining why it had abstained. Swaziland observed that the States of southern Africa would be highly vulnerable to sanctions. Reservations were also voiced by Botswana.

Among those voting for the sanctions resolution with reservations, Brazil believed it went beyond the scope of an Assembly resolution, Fiji had difficulties with the provision to prohibit travel to South Africa and Namibia, while Samoa said the exercise of governmental power must not unreasonably infringe on the rights and freedoms of the individual.

Argentina, Australia and Chile said only the Security Council and not the General Assembly could impose or extend sanctions. Austria and Spain had reservations on provisions which might prejudice the Council's attitude in this regard.

In explanation of vote on the resolution on foreign interests in colonial countries, France said that, although it did not recognize the validity of Decree No. 1 of the Council for Namibia, its Government discouraged French investments in and trade with Namibia.

During the general debate on the Namibia question, Canada, speaking for the five members of the contact group, stated that only a negotiated settlement accepted by the Namibians, South Africa, the front-line States and the United Nations could achieve independence for Namibia. The Foreign Ministers of the group, meeting in New York on 24 September, had decided to relaunch their negotiations on Namibia, suspended since the break-up of the Geneva meeting in January. The group proposed three phases of negotiations. First, the parties would commit themselves to a set of constitutional principles designed to build confidence in the electoral process and in the future of an independent Namibia; to that end the five States were suggesting guidelines for the constituent assembly and broad principles for the constitution, without attempting to write a constitution themselves. The second phase would deal with arrangements for transition to independence; the group would make suggestions to ensure a fair and impartial transition. The third phase would begin with a public commitment by all parties to a date for beginning implementation of the Security Council's independence plan.

Most speakers reiterated the view that the 1978 settlement plan should be implemented immediately and without alteration. Brazil would not support any arrangements implying partial implementation, while Mali stated that any attempt to limit the scope of the plan or deviate from its fundamental goals would be a denial of international commitments and an infringement on the right of peoples to self-determination. Mexico, arguing that the agreement on a settlement plan could not be changed, said no political expediency or confrontation between Powers could violate the right of the Namibians to independence. Flexibility and negotiation were praiseworthy, said Nicaragua, but only when they were shared by all parties and not dictated by outside interests. Yugoslavia feared that attempts to introduce changes in the plan so as to induce South Africa to implement what was left of it might lead to circumvention of the plan and irreparably damage the international consensus on Namibia. Liberia said no effort should be spared to prevent breaking that consensus. Poland urged implementation without further delay.

Angola stated that it did not wish to prejudice the outcome of the contact group's latest initiative, but its cynicism and right to reserve judgement were understandable in light of South Africa's past performance. Botswana said the front-line States were always ready to listen to constructive suggestions, provided no attempt was made to subvert the United Nations plan. The United Republic of Tanzania, though acknowledging that certain measures of confidence were necessary in any negotiation, said disproportionate attention had been given to South Africa, which had demanded concession after concession. Zambia offered assurances of its co-operation as long as there was no attempt to compromise Namibia's independence.

Guyana, Malaysia, Mauritania, Singapore and Venezuela expressed concern that the renewed negotiations carried out by the contact group might undermine the settlement plan. Among African States, Algeria sought assurances that the new initiative was not a plan to impose on the Namibians a regime they had not chosen or a formula to conceal South Africa's new demands. Benin, the Congo and the Sudan stated that the constitutional guarantees sought by South Africa for the white minority would serve to consolidate and perpetuate a social, political and economic regime based on inequality. Egypt noted that the constitutional proposals introduced by the contact group had been rejected by the front-line States on the ground that the Namibians had the right to draft their own constitution and to choose the form of government they wished. No one could dictate to the Namibians the terms of their future constitution, stated Madagascar; the sovereignty of the constituent assembly to be elected under the United Nations plan could not be restricted. The United Republic of Cameroon was of the view that if constitutional guarantees were the last price to be paid by Namibia for independence, they should not be rejected a priori.

Chad said it deplored the decision of the contact group to take up the question of Walvis Bay-claimed by South Africa-only after Namibia's independence. Kenya opposed the linkage of the settlement of Namibia's independence to the domestic affairs of any of the neighbouring sovereign States.

The German Democratic Republic said the aim of the contact group and South Africa was to place the future legislative assembly under tutelage and create a neo-colonialist status for Namibia. The Lao People's Democratic Republic, referring to what it described as a false announcement by certain Western agencies that an agreement had been reached between the contact group and the front-line States, said it had become almost a habit for some new event to occur just before the Assembly took up the Namibia question, designed to influence or mislead that consideration. Mongolia said even the Western press had acknowledged that the real purpose of the contact group's new initiative was to delay free elections indefinitely, while the Ukrainian SSR maintained that the purpose was to prevent SWAPO from coming to power.

The Congo, Finland, Japan, Mauritania, Morocco, New Zealand, Norway, Singapore, Sri

Lanka, Togo, Turkey, the United Kingdom (on behalf of the EC members) and Zaire supported the new efforts by the contact group to reach a peaceful and internationally recognized settlement or expressed hope that those efforts would succeed. Australia, while deploring the delays in implementing the settlement plan, stated that the only constructive and realistic efforts to resolve the question were being made by the contact group and that rejection of those efforts was inappropriate. Austria maintained that the 1978 Security Council resolution was a declaration of principle; flexibility must be allowed in implementing it by accommodating new proposals if they were designed to promote independence and met the approval of the parties. Sweden noted that the Nordic Foreign Ministers had appealed to the Governments of the contact group to act for the earliest implementation of the United Nations plan.

Many speakers condemned the exploitation of the natural resources of Namibia and the non-compliance of States with the 1974 Decree No. 1 of the Council for Namibia. Commenting on foreign interests operating in Namibia, Czechoslovakia observed that the value of United States investments in Namibia exceeded $2 billion, while the USSR cited the report of the Council for Namibia to the effect that, of 88 transnational corporations operating in Namibia, 53 were based in countries of the contact group-25 in the United Kingdom, 15 in the United States, 8 in the Federal Republic of Germany, 3 in France and 2 in Canada.

Many States, including Cyprus, India, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Nepal, Pakistan, Romania, Sierra Leone and Venezuela, continued to insist that the situation in southern Africa constituted a clear threat to international peace and security, making it incumbent on the Security Council to act. Support for such action, especially the imposition of comprehensive mandatory sanctions, as the surest way to assure South Africa's compliance with United Nations resolutions was expressed by many States, including Bangladesh, Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, China, Czechoslovakia, Djibouti, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Kenya, Mexico, Mongolia, Nigeria, the Philippines, the Ukrainian SSR, the United Arab Emirates, Venezuela, Viet Nam and Yemen. Iraq stated that, since the Security Council was not acting, the Assembly should take the necessary steps against South Africa.

Ireland, Portugal and Spain stated that isolating South Africa further would not be conducive to resolving the problem. Senegal and Sierra Leone, while encouraging the approach of the contact group, believed that if the new initiatives failed the Assembly should consider measures to isolate South Africa. Kuwait mentioned measures taken in May by the Organization of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries to strengthen the prohibition against the sale of Arab petroleum to South Africa. The Syrian Arab Republic stated that the imposition of comprehensive mandatory sanctions was the last peaceful method available for exerting pressure on South Africa.

Peru, Uganda and others urged States which had an influence on South Africa to put pressure on it to speed the cessation of Namibia's occupation. In Tunisia's view, either the five Western States obliged South Africa to respect legality or the Security Council would have to act.

Regarding the argument advanced by South Africa that the United Nations was not impartial with regard to Namibia, India said that, although the Organization had been partial towards the just cause of the Namibian people, it would no longer have to take sides once the stage had been set for fair elections, since it had no reason to prefer one Namibian to another.

Some countries, including Bulgaria, Ethiopia and Togo, were of the opinion that there seemed no alternative but to intensify armed struggle under the leadership of SWAPO. Since South Africa had rejected dialogue, said Burundi, SWAPO had every reason to envisage the most appropriate methods for re-establishing its rights. Pakistan thought that appeals to SWAPO to forswear the armed struggle sounded more and more hollow as South Africa got away with breaking up the peaceful negotiating process on specious grounds. If a peaceful solution on an agreed basis was further delayed, said Thailand, the alternative of an intensified armed struggle would gain credibility as the only viable solution.

A number of States, including Bahrain, Benin, Bulgaria, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Ethiopia, Guinea, Hungary, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mongolia, Nigeria, Qatar, the USSR and Viet Nam, maintained that South Africa was encouraged in its defiance of United Nations resolutions by its Western allies. Albania stated that super-Power rivalry in Africa encouraged South Africa to pursue its policies. China said South Africa's extreme truculence since the beginning of 1981 had been brought about by the support it had received from a super-Power which had twice used the veto to block a condemnation of that regime; the effect was to provide the other super-Power with opportunities for infiltration and expansion in southern Africa under the pretext of supporting the national liberation struggle.

A number of countries deplored the increasing militarization of Namibia. The Byelorussian SSR stated that South Africa had placed 40 military bases along the border with Angola and 35 in the so-called police zone, while military expenditures in South Africa during 1981-1982 were to increase threefold compared with 1974. The USSR criticized assistance to South Africa by Western Powers, stating that, relying on such aid, the Pretoria regime had placed more than 100,000 South African soldiers in Namibia, amounting to more than a tenth of the Territory's population.

The observer for SWAPO stated that the Pretoria regime was trying to dictate the entrenchment of certain constitutional guarantees for the white racists and exploiters in Namibia. It was not planning to leave Namibia; the bottom line of its strategy was no SWAPO government in any circumstances. However, SWAPO was destined to score victory through the bullet or the ballot; until a cease-fire agreement was signed, the armed struggle would continue unabated.

Situation resulting from South Africa's refusal to comply with United Nations resolutions on Namibia

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960 containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

Recalling its resolutions relating to the question of Namibia, in particular resolutions 2145(XXI) of 27 October 1966 and 2248(S-V) of 19 May 1967, and Security Council resolutions 385(1976) of 30 January 1976, 432(1978) of 27 July 1978, 435(1978) of 29 September 1978 and 439(1978) of 13 November 1978,

Strongly condemning the South African racist régime for its continued refusal to implement Security Council resolutions 432(1978), 435(1978) and 439(1978),

Indignant at the blatant manner in which South Africa deliberately caused the collapse of the pre-implementation meeting held at Geneva from 7 to 14 January 1981,

Deplored the fact that South Africa has not accepted the principle of independence for Namibia, Highly commending the sense of responsibility, statesmanship and positive approach demonstrated by the South West Africa People's Organization to ensure the implementation of the resolutions of the United Nations on Namibia, particularly at the pre-implementation meeting.

Cognizant of the heavy involvement in the exploitation of the natural resources and in other illegal economic activities in Namibia of some members of the Western contact group stated to be engaged in the promotion of the implementation of Security Council resolutions 35/(1976) and 435(1978),

Taking into consideration the relevant resolution adopted by the Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa at the meeting held at Arusha, United Republic of Tanzania from 19 to 23 January 1981.

Noting the relevant parts of the New Delhi Declaration adopted by the Conference of Ministers for Foreign Affairs of Non-Aligned Countries, held at New Delhi from 9 to 13 February 1981,

Deeply concerned about the present critical situation in Namibia, which constitutes a serious threat to international peace and security,

1. Declares the urgent need to ensure the early attainment of the inalienable rights of the Namibian people to genuine self-determination, freedom and national independence in a united Namibia;

2. Solemnly reaffirms that Namibia is the direct responsibility of the United Nations until genuine self-determination, freedom and national independence are achieved in the Territory and renews its determination to ensure the effective and complete discharge of this responsibility;

3. Declares that it is incumbent upon all States to exercise fully their responsibilities in the effort to obtain genuine independence for Namibia;

4. Strongly condemns the persistent refusal of the South African racist régime to comply with the resolutions of the United Nations on Namibia, in particular its rejection of Security Council resolutions 432(1978), 435(1978) and 439(1978);

5. Determines once again that the South African racist régime acted deceitfully through unilateral measures and sinister schemes within Namibia during the protracted period of talks for a negotiated settlement in Namibia to the detriment of the Namibian people and the South West Africa People's Organization, their sole and authentic representative, and in contravention of resolutions of the Security Council, in particular resolutions 385(1976) of 30 January 1976, 431(1978) of 27 July 1978, 432(1978) of 27 July 1978, 435(1978) of 29 September 1978 and 439(1978) of 13 November 1978, and relevant resolutions of the General Assembly;

6. Solemnly reaffirms that the parties to the conflict in Namibia are, on the one hand, South Africa, which is illegally occupying the Territory and committing aggression against the people, and, on the other, the Namibian people, under the leadership of their sole and authentic representative, the South West Africa People's Organization, supported by the United Nations, which has direct responsibility for the Territory until genuine independence;

7. Reiterates its unflinching support for the South West Africa People's Organization, the sole and authentic representative of the people of Namibia, in its heroic struggle for the liberation of the Territory and renews its call to the international community to render all material, financial, military, political and diplomatic assistance to that organization for the immediate termination of South Africa's illegal and racist colonial occupation of the Territory;

6. Strongly condemns South Africa for its intensification of the repression against the Namibian people and for its increasing arrests and detentions of leaders and members of the South West Africa People's Organization;

9. Strongly condemns the colonialist and racist régime of Pretoria for its continued acts of aggression against Independent African States, in particular Angola, Botswana, Mozambique, Zambia and Zimbabwe;

10. Decides to increase the financial provision in the budget of the United Nations Council for Namibia to finance the Office of the South West Africa People's Organization in New York in order to ensure the expanded representation of the people of Namibia through the South West Africa People's Organization at the United Nations;

11. Requests the United Nations Council for Namibia, in the discharge of its responsibilities as the legal Administering Authority for Namibia, to hold a series of plenary meetings outside United Nations Headquarters during 1981 and to recommend appropriate action to the General Assembly in the light of the refusal by South Africa to implement Security Council resolution 435(1978) and requests the Secretary-General to defray the cost of these meetings and to provide the necessary staff and services for them;

12. Solemnly declares that South Africa's illegal occupation of the Territory of Namibia, its persistent defiance of the United Nations, its war of repression being waged against the Namibians, its repeated acts of aggression launched from bases in Namibia against independent African States, its colonialist expansion and its policy of apartheid constitute a serious threat to international peace and security;

13. Solemnly calls upon the Security Council to convene urgently to impose comprehensive mandatory sanctions against South Africa, as provided for under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, in order to ensure South Africa's immediate compliance with the resolutions and decisions of the United Nations relating to Namibia;

14. Decides that, in the event of the Security Council's inability to adopt concrete measures to compel South Africa to end its illegal occupation by withdrawing from Namibia, it will urgently consider necessary action in accordance with the Charter, cognizant of the fact that this is a unique instance in which the United Nations has assumed direct responsibility for promoting self-determination, freedom and national independence for Namibia.

32. Demands the immediate commencement of the unconditional implementation of Security Council resolution 435(1978) without any prevarication, qualification or modification and not later than December 1981;

33. Strongly urges the Security Council to act decisively against any dilatory manoeuvres and fraudulent schemes of the illegal occupation regime aimed at frustrating the legitimate struggle of the Namibian people, under the leadership of the South West Africa People's Organization, for self-determination and national liberation, as well as at negating the achievements of their Just struggle;

34. Strongly urges the Security Council, in the light of the serious threat to international peace and security posed by South Africa, to respond positively to the overwhelming demand of the International community by immediately imposing against that country comprehensive mandatory sanctions, as provided for in Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations.

Work programme of the UN Council for Namibia

The General Assembly adopted resolutions in March and December 1981 on the programme of work of the United Nations Council for Namibia and on the Council's representation of Namibia in international organizations. All four texts were based on the Council's recommendations. (For the 1981 activities of the Council, see p. 1139.)

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (MARCH). The first of the resolutions on the work programme, adopted on 6 March,<sup>(3)</sup> outlined the tasks set for the Council in 1981. Among the activities was formulation of a programme of co-operation with non-governmental organizations (NGOs) engaged in supporting the liberation struggle. Other tasks were defined in regard to information dissemination (p. 1166) and the conduct of hearings on South African exploitation of Namibia's natural resources. The Council was also given functions in respect of the United Nations

Fund for Namibia (p. 1171), the Nationhood Programme for Namibia (p. 1174) and the United Nations Institute for Namibia (p. 1177). The Assembly allocated $200,000 for the Council's use in promoting the liberation struggle and decided to finance the New York office of SWAPO.

This resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 132 to none, with 5 abstentions, and was sponsored by 67 nations. India stated, in introducing the text, that the activities it outlined charted a new course of action which would lead to early independence for Namibia if pursued with support from the entire United Nations membership.

In another resolution of the same date, on action by intergovernmental or organizations and NGOs with respect to Namibia,<sup>(4)</sup> the Assembly requested specialized agencies and other organizations and conferences of the United Nations system to grant the Council full membership as the Administering Authority for Namibia, and asked them to waive the assessment of Namibia during the period in which it was represented by the Council. It requested all organizations and conferences to invite the Council to participate as a full member whenever Namibian rights and interests were involved. Finally, it asked United Nations organizations to give priority to the allocation of funds for assistance to Namibians (p. 1178).

This resolution, introduced by Nigeria, was adopted by a recorded vote of 133 to none, with 5 abstentions. The draft was sponsored by 65 nations.

Explaining its vote in favour of these resolutions, Ireland stated that, while generally supporting the activities of the Council, it maintained some reservations about the extent of the Council's competence.

During the debate, most, speakers supported the Council's activities. Guyana stated that its work continued to complement the efforts of SWAPO on the battlefield. India said the Council had been handicapped by inadequate appreciation of its responsibilities, by deliberately ambivalent attitudes and at times even by total hostility; suggestions in the Council that it should condone South African actions or remain patient were inadmissible. Indonesia said the Council's special missions to various States had played a role in sharpening the international focus on the Namibia question. The Lao People's Democratic Republic stated that Governments, particularly those of Western countries, that had not yet recognized the Council as the sole Administering Authority for Namibia must change their attitude by accepting the mandate entrusted to the Council by the Assembly.

The Niger asked why the international community did not give the Council the means and powers it needed to set itself up at Windhoek, organize a State there, and cause justice and democracy to flower. Panama stated that the Council must promote and strengthen its co-operation with NGOs supporting the liberation struggle. Senegal saw a need to strengthen the Council's powers. Tunisia also urged support for the Council as the most effective body for putting an end to South Africa's presence in Namibia.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (DECEMBER). The General Assembly adopted a further resolution on the Council's work programme on 10 December.<sup>(9)</sup> In addition to most of the functions assigned to it in March, the Assembly decided that the Council should review the political, military and social aspects of the liberation struggle and, through contacts with Governments and corporations, counter the support given by foreign economic interests to the South African administration in Namibia. It was also asked to pursue its study of the uranium trade (p. 1169). The Secretary-General was requested to prepare a reference book on transnational corporations operating in Namibia. The Council was requested to accede to conventions against apartheid and racial discrimination, and Assembly committees were requested to invite a Council representative to participate on matters affecting Namibian rights and interests. An office of the United Nations Commissioner for Namibia was authorized in Luanda, and financial support for the SWAPO office in New York was to continue. The Secretary-General was asked, in consultation with the Council, to prepare for a conference at an appropriate time in support of the Namibian independence struggle.

This resolution, introduced by India, was adopted by a recorded vote of 137 to none, with 10 abstentions, and was sponsored by 69 nations.

Also on 10 December, in a resolution on action by intergovernmental organizations and NGOs with respect to Namibia,<sup>(10)</sup> the Assembly repeated the provisions of its March resolution on the subject and also requested full membership of Namibia in the International Atomic Energy Agency and the Executive Committee of the Programme of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, as well as the end of all contracts between the United Nations, UNDP and the specialized agencies, and corporations supporting South Africa's illegal occupation. The Assembly asked the Council to undertake a co-operative programme with NGOs and support groups engaged in supporting the struggle of the Namibian people, and decided to allocate $200,000 to the Council for that and related purposes.

This resolution, sponsored by 69 nations, was adopted by a recorded vote of 127 to none, with 20 abstentions. Turkey, which introduced it, observed that the Council was already a full member of the International Labour Organisation, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the United Nations Industrial Development Organization and the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, and an associate member of the World Health Organization.

The Assembly dealt with the Council's role in two resolutions on general aspects of the Namibia question, also adopted on 10 December. In one of these, on the situation in Namibia resulting from its illegal occupation by South Africa,<sup>(7)</sup> the Assembly requested States to co-operate with the Council and supported its efforts as a policy-making organ and the legal Administering Authority for Namibia until independence. In the other resolution, on action by Member States in support of Namibia,(s) the Assembly requested States to co-operate with the Council in the implementation of the Assembly's resolution of 14 September<sup>(5)</sup> and to supply information sought by the Council.

In its resolution of 24 November,<sup>(6)</sup> on implementation by United Nations organizations of the Declaration on colonial countries,<sup>(2)</sup> the Assembly urged specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system to grant full membership to the Council. A similar provision was included in an Economic and Social Council resolution of 22 July on the same subject.<sup>(1)</sup>

Several States which voted for the resolution on the Council's work programme made comments in explaining their vote. Brazil stated that granting full membership to the Council by United Nations organizations should not set a precedent for other intergovernmental bodies, given the sui generis character of the Namibia question. Ireland, though generally supporting the Council's activities, had difficulties about certain of its recommendations and reservations about its powers in regard to certain issues. Japan, too, had reservations about parts of the Council's report and work programme. Portugal reserved its position on the question of enlarging the Council's mandate. Samoa questioned the appropriateness of mandating the Council to concern itself with military aspects of the armed struggle.

Australia and New Zealand, which abstained on both of the 10 December resolutions, expressed concern about the financial implications of some of the proposed activities, including $400,000 for Council meetings away from New York and $200,000 for co-operation with NGOs. Ireland, abstaining on the resolution on action by organizations, did not think it was wise to end all dealings between the United Nations and unnamed corporations or to interfere with the competences of specialized agencies regarding contracts.

In the debate on the Namibia question, Czechoslovakia stated that the Council could long since have solved the Namibian independence problem if South Africa had not put up desperate resistance, and if it had not enjoyed all-round support by world imperialism and reactionary forces. Peru supported full participation of the Council in specialized agencies and United Nations conferences. The Sudan was pleased by the spirit of co-operation between the Council and SWAPO. The United Republic of Tanzania commended the Council for its role in preparing Namibia for eventual independence and said it should continue to serve as the nerve centre of United Nations activities regarding the Territory.

Information dissemination

The General Assembly decided on 6 March 1981 to launch a world campaign to support United Nations resolutions for a free and independent Namibia. During the year, the Council for Namibia and the United Nations Department of Public Information (DPI) continued their efforts to acquaint world public opinion with the Namibia question by means of publications, films, radio programmes and the provision of speakers.

DPI covered the work of the Council by issuing releases to the press, delegations and NGOs, arranging press briefings and including articles on Namibia in United Nations publications. A booklet was prepared on the Council's 1981 meetings at Panama City,<sup>(1)</sup> and the DPI periodical Objective: Justice also republished the Panama Declaration and Programme of Action (p. 1139).

Radio coverage relating to Namibia was in the form of short-wave broadcasts of meetings, newscasts, and weekly and monthly programmes in over 20 languages. There was also extensive film, television and photo coverage. A short feature film entitled "Freedom for All", edited from "Namibia: A Trust Betrayed", was produced as part of the 1980-1981 "Vignette" series. A poster was produced with the slogan "Stop the plunder of Namibia's natural resources".

The Office of the United Nations Commissioner for Namibia prepared the substantive parts of the periodical Namibia Bulletin<sup>(2)</sup> and published Namibia in the News,<sup>(3)</sup> a newsletter distributed to Member States and NGOs.

The Council organized on 26 October the annual commemoration of the Week of Solidarity with the People of Namibia, and its Liberation Movement, SWAPO, holding two special meetings at United Nations Headquarters that were addressed by United Nations officials and representatives of regional groups and organizations.

On 14 April, the Council<sup>(5)</sup> amended the terms of reference of its Standing Committee III, instructing it to consider ways of informing the public on all aspects of the Namibia question in light of South Africa's defiance of United Nations resolutions. The Committee was to entrust DPI and other Secretariat units with specific tasks under the Committee's programme.

In its consensus on the Namibia question adopted on 14 August (p. 1138), the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples requested the Secretary-General, in view of the massive publicity campaign by the Government of South Africa designed to perpetuate its illegal occupation of Namibia, to intensify his efforts, through all available media, in order to mobilize world public opinion against South Africa's Namibia policies and intensify dissemination of information about the liberation struggle.<sup>(4)</sup>

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (MARCH). In a resolution of 6 March 1981,<sup>(6)</sup> adopted on the basis of a text recommended by the Council for Namibia in 1980, the General Assembly decided to launch a world campaign to support United Nations resolutions for a free and independent Namibia, and asked the Council to formulate a programme that would include publications on the political, economic, military and social consequences of the illegal occupation of Namibia, as well as radio programmes, advertisements, films, posters, press releases and briefings. The Assembly requested the Secretary-General to direct DPI to assist the Council in disseminating information with a view to mobilizing public support for the independence of Namibia. Organizations in the United Nations system were requested to intensify the dissemination of information on Namibia in consultation with the Council. The Secretary-General was requested urgently to prepare a comprehensive economic map of Namibia.

This resolution, sponsored by 68 nations, was adopted by a recorded vote of 133 to none, with 5 abstentions. Introducing it, Bulgaria said there was a need to expose the assistance rendered by certain Western States to South Africa.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (DECEMBER). In a further resolution on this subject, adopted on 10 December,<sup>(7)</sup> the General Assembly requested the Council for Namibia to consider ways of increasing the dissemination of information on Namibia. The Assembly decided to expose and denounce the collusion of certain Western countries with South Africa. The campaign was to include the following, in addition to elements mentioned in the March resolution: publications on legal matters and on the territorial integrity of Namibia; film-strips and slide sets; booklets containing Council declarations, communiqués and press releases by missions of the Council, and United Nations resolutions; and a booklet on protection of Namibia's natural resources. Statistics on Namibia were to be included in United Nations publications. Opinion makers, media leaders, NGOs and support groups were to be informed about the Council's objectives and functions. Member States were requested to broadcast programmes and publish material in their official news media, to commemorate Namibia Day and to issue special postage stamps for the occasion.

This resolution, sponsored by 57 nations and based on a text from the Council,<sup>(5)</sup> was adopted by a recorded vote of 125 to none, with 23 abstentions. Introducing the draft, Yugoslavia stated that the public in some countries was still not sufficiently aware of the Namibian problem and the media of certain countries either did not publicize sufficient information or the publicized information was biased.

Explaining its abstention in the vote on the resolution, Japan stated that the information to be disseminated must be accurate, fair and balanced. Spain said it could not support the decision to launch an international campaign to denounce some countries, since that would presuppose imposing directives on information media. Greece and Ireland also expressed reservations on the reference to certain Western countries. New Zealand said it was not enthusiastic about the request for an additional 1982 appropriation of $381,000 for the information activities called for in the resolution.

Costa Rica, Fiji, Liberia, Nepal, Portugal, Samoa, Thailand and Turkey, which voted for the resolution, expressed reservations against enumerating specific countries for criticism in respect of their relations with South Africa (p. 170).

Economic and social conditions

Uranium exploitation

In its 1981 report,<sup>(1)</sup> the Council for Namibia stated that the significant uranium deposits in Namibia had been the target of massive exploitation by foreign economic interests in collaboration with South Africa. The Council cited information obtained during its July 1980 hearings on Namibian uranium<sup>(6)</sup> that companies from France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, the United Kingdom and the United States had been exploiting Namibian uranium in violation of Decree No. 1 for the Protection of the Natural Resources of Namibia, adopted by the Council in 1974.<sup>(5)</sup>

In its Panama Declaration and Programme of Action on Namibia, adopted on 5 June 1981 (p. 1139), the Council condemned the illegal exploitation of Namibian natural resources, particularly uranium, by South African and other foreign economic interests. It pledged follow-up action on the results of the uranium hearings in order to mobilize the international community to ensure compliance with General Assembly decisions and to prepare the legal framework for future compensation due to the Namibian people after independence.

The Council's Seminar on Legal Issues concerning the Question of Namibia (The Hague, Netherlands, 22-24 June), in proposing measures to enforce the repeated calls by the Assembly for action against exploiters of Namibia's natural resources (p. 11939), recommended that it should become standard practice for all uranium to display a certificate of origin before enrichment, given the difficulty of ascertaining its origin once it had been processed.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (MARCH). By a resolution of 6 March 1981 on the subject of Namibian uranium,<sup>(2)</sup> based on a draft recommended in 1980 by the Council for Namibia, the Assembly drew the Security Council's attention to the threat to peace and security caused by South Africa's development of a nuclear capability using Namibian uranium, and requested the Council to ensure that South Africa did not continue to acquire foreign nuclear technology. It requested the Governments of States whose corporations were involved, particularly those of Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States, to prohibit their corporations from dealing in and prospecting for Namibian uranium. Condemning the collusion of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Israel and the United States with South Africa in the nuclear field, it called on all States to refrain from supplying the régime with installations that might enable it to produce nuclear materials, reactors or military equipment (p. 181).

This resolution, sponsored by 44 nations, was adopted by a recorded vote of 108 to none, with 26 abstentions. Introducing the draft, Yugoslavia said it was based on the findings of the 1980 hearings on Namibian uranium, which had found that the continuing exploitation of Namibian uranium by South Africa and foreign economic interests constituted one of the main obstacles to the independence of Namibia.

In explanation of vote, Austria, Ireland, the Netherlands, New Zealand and Portugal, which abstained, and Fiji, Panama, Togo and Turkey, which voted for the resolution, expressed reservations concerning the selective criticism of specific States. Suriname and Uruguay, which voted in favour, stated that, had there been a separate vote on the paragraph singling out certain countries for criticism, they would have abstained.

Japan, abstaining, stated that references to it in the resolution were unjustified because it was not purchasing Namibian uranium.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (DECEMBER). In its resolution of 10 December on action by Member States in support of Namibia,<sup>(3)</sup> the General Assembly requested States to prohibit the carriage of Namibian uranium in flights above their territory. It also requested the Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, which operated the Ureenco uranium-enrichment plant, to have Namibian uranium specifically excluded from the Treaty of Almelo, which regulated the activities of Ureenco.

(The recommendation on Ureenco originated in the Council for Namibia in 1980, as a result of its hearings on Namibian. The Treaty of Almelo, named for the place in the Netherlands where one of the two operational Ureenco plants was located, was due for renewal in 1981.)

In another resolution of 10 December,<sup>(4)</sup> on the work programme of the Council for Namibia, the Assembly decided that the Council should continue to examine the exploitation of and trade in Namibian uranium by foreign economic interests and report to the Assembly in 1982 on its findings.

Question of Namibian uranium

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 2145(XXI) of 27 October 1966 and 2248(S-V) of 19 May 1967.

Recalling Security Council resolutions 264(1969) of 20 March 1969, 269(1969) of 12 August 1969, 276(1970) of 30 January 1970, 283(1970) of 29 July 1970 and 301 (1971) of 20 October 1971.

Recalling the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice of 21 June 1971.

Recalling the enactment of the United Nations Council for Namibia, on 27 September 1974, of Decree No. 1 for the Protection of the Natural Resources of Namibia, Recalling its request, contained in its resolution 3295 (XXIX) of 13 December 1974, that all States should comply with Decree No. 1,

Taking into consideration the Algiers Declaration and Programme of Action on Namibia, adopted by the United Nations Council for Namibia at its extraordinary plenary meeting held at Algiers from 28 May to 1 June 1980.

Having examined the report of the United Nations Council for Namibia on the hearings on Namibian uranium conducted by the Council from 7 to 11 July 1980.

Recalling its resolution 35/28 of 11 November 1980 on the activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in Namibia and in all other Territories under colonial domination and efforts to eliminate colonialism, apartheid and racial discrimination in southern Africa,

1. Approves the report of the United Nations Council for Namibia on the hearings on Namibian uranium and the conclusions and recommendations contained therein;

2. Reaffirms that the natural resources of Namibia are the inviolable heritage of the Namibian people and that the rapid depletion of the natural resources of the Territory as a result of the systematic plunder by foreign economic interests, in collusion with the illegal South African administration, is a grave threat to the integrity and prosperity of an independent Namibia;

3. Declares that any State which deprives the Namibian people of the exercise of their legitimate rights over their natural resources or subordinates the right and interests of that people to foreign economic and financial interests violates the solemn obligations it has assumed under the Charter of the United Nations;

4. Declares that, by their depletive exploitation of natural resources and the continued accumulation and repatriation of huge profits, the activities of foreign economic, financial and other interests operating at present in Namibia constitute a major obstacle to its political independence;

5. Calls once again upon all Governments which have not yet done so to take legislative, administrative or other measures in respect of their nationals and the bodies corporate under their jurisdiction that own and operate enterprises in Namibia to put an end to such enterprises and to prevent new investments or prospecting in the Territory;

6. Draws the attention of the Security Council to the fact that the hearings on Namibian uranium have shown serious violations of Council resolutions 276(1970), 283(1970) and 301 (1971) and requests the Council to take appropriate action;

7. Also draws the attention of the Security Council to the increased threat to international peace and security caused by the development by South Africa of a nuclear capability using Namibian uranium and the dangers of nuclear proliferation arising from the sale of Namibian uranium without safeguards by South Africa, and requests the Council to take action to ensure that South Africa does not continue to acquire nuclear technology from other countries;

8. Requests the Governments of States whose corporations are involved in Namibian uranium, in particular the Governments of Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, Switzerland, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America, to take measures to prohibit their State-owned corporations and other corporations, together with their subsidiaries, from dealings in Namibian uranium and all prospecting activities in Namibia;

9. Notes that the exploitation of Namibian uranium by Western countries, in particular the members of the European Atomic Energy Community, the nature of South Africa's policies regarding Namibian uranium, the collaboration with South Africa by certain Western countries, the transfer of nuclear technology to South Africa and South Africa's large-scale participation in the export of natural and enriched uranium seriously impede the early attainment of independence by Namibia;

10. Notes with grave concern the participation of foreign Governments and State-controlled corporations in the extraction and processing of Namibian uranium and their collaboration with South Africa in the nuclear field, which contributes directly to the development of South Africa's nuclear capability, thus hindering international efforts to secure South Africa's withdrawal from the Territory;

11. Condemns all activities regarding Namibian uranium being carried out in the Territory by State-owned or State-controlled corporations, activities which constitute a clear violation by the Governments concerned of binding resolutions of the Security Council and are thus violations of Article 25 of the Charter of the United Nations;

12. Strongly condemns the collusion of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Israel and the United States of America with South Africa in the nuclear field, and calls upon all States to refrain from supplying the South African régime, directly or indirectly, with installations that might enable it to produce uranium, plutonium and other nuclear materials, reactors or military equipment;

13. Requests the United Nations Council for Namibia to continue to gather information on Namibian uranium and to take action as appropriate.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

Economic and social surveys

The Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), on 24 June 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> welcomed the UNDP Administrator's intention to prepare, in co-operation with the United Nations Commissioner for Namibia, a comprehensive report on development problems of an independent Namibia, taking also into account the activities under the Nationhood Programme (p. 1174).

The Trade and Development Board of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD), on 9 October,<sup>(2)</sup> requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General to consult and prepare with other United Nations agencies and bodies, in collaboration with the South West Africa People's Organization, a comprehensive and in-depth social and economic survey of Namibia.

A review of economic conditions, covering both Namibia and South Africa, was prepared by a consultant for UNCTAD and was issued in August 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> in accordance with a request made by UNCTAD in 1979.<sup>(4)</sup>

Energy resources

In a resolution on new and renewable energy sources in Namibia,<sup>(1)</sup> adopted on 21 August 1981, the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy (Nairobi, Kenya, 10-21 August) (p. 690) strongly condemned the plunder and illegal exploitation of Namibian energy resources by South Africa and multinational corporations, and deplored South African military activities in Namibia and Angola which were having serious ecological consequences, thereby limiting the future potential of new and renewable energy sources.

The resolution was adopted by 77 votes to none, with 24 abstentions. Explaining their abstentions in the vote Australia, Austria, Canada, Colombia, Iceland (for the five Nordic States), the United Kingdom (for the European Community States), the United States and Uruguay said the subject-matter of the draft was not within the concern of the Conference.

International assistance

United Nations assistance to Namibia, rendered to Namibians outside the Territory, continued in 1981 through the United Nations Institute for Namibia (p. 1176) and the Nationhood Programme for Namibia (p. 1174). These two programmes received financing mainly from the United Nations Fund for Namibia (see below) and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), supported by voluntary contributions.

By a resolution of 24 November calling for continued implementation by United Nations organizations of decolonization resolutions,<sup>(1)</sup> the General Assembly expressed concern that assistance to colonial peoples, particularly those of Namibia, was far from adequate. It urged United Nations organizations to increase their assistance to the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO), the Institute for Namibia and the Nationhood Programme. In a preambular paragraph, the Assembly stated that the Namibian struggle had intensified as a consequence of the defiant attitude and stepped-up aggression of the Pretoria régime and the increased all-round support to that régime rendered by the United States and other Western States, and that intensified action in support of the Namibians and SWAPO was therefore necessary.

In explanation of vote on this resolution, the United States, which voted against it, said it rejected the unfounded charge of all-round support for South Africa. Among those which abstained, Argentina, Spain and Turkey, as well as Denmark, speaking for the Nordic States, expressed reservations on the reference to particular States or regions.

UN Fund for Namibia

The United Nations Council for Namibia reported<sup>(1)</sup> that the United Nations Fund for Namibia, which became operative in 1972<sup>(5)</sup> and for which the Council was trustee, continued to serve in 1981 as the main vehicle through which the Council channelled its assistance. The Fund financed three main programmes: the Institute for Namibia, the Nationhood Programme, and educational, social and relief assistance to Namibians.

While the Institute and the Nationhood Programme were set up with particular reference to the future attainment of independence, including the establishment of State machinery and the assumption of administrative responsibilities by Namibians, the third programme emphasized the immediate needs and welfare of Namibians. This programme was administered by the Office of the United Nations Commissioner for Namibia and financed from the General Account of the Fund.

Under this programme, 109 Namibians were studying on scholarships in nine countries. In addition, training was given in radio broadcasting, teaching and the English language. Among the beneficiaries were 14 graduates of the Institute for Namibia. Medical assistance was provided to Namibian refugees in Angola to help combat an outbreak of meningitis and assistance was provided to individual Namibians in need of emergency medical or dental treatment.

The Fund received income from all sources amounting to $6,930,550 in 1981 and spent $7,745,017. Included in these amounts were $2,196,766 in income to the General Account and $1,178,570 in expenditures, financed from that Account, for educational, social and relief assistance. The rest went to either the Institute or the Nationhood Programme.

Contributions from States and the public to the General Account received during 1981 totalled $874,901 and were made by 28 countries (see table below). Other funding came from UNDP and a $500,000 allocation from the United Nations budget, authorized by the General Assembly in December 1980.<sup>(4)</sup>

On 16 December 1981, the Council for Namibia decided to streamline the Fund's administration by authorizing the Committee on the United Nations Fund for Namibia to approve new projects under the Nationhood Programme and the General Account, unless the Committee decided to refer the decisions to the Council.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION By a resolution on the Fund adopted on 6 March,<sup>(2)</sup> the General Assembly expressed appreciation to the States, organizations and individuals that had contributed, and requested the Secretary-General and the President of the Council for Namibia to intensify appeals for further contributions. Governments were invited to appeal to their national organizations for voluntary contributions.

This resolution, introduced by Venezuela and sponsored by 69 nations, was adopted by a recorded vote of 133 to none, with 5 abstentions.

By a further resolution on the Fund adopted on 10 December,<sup>(3)</sup> the Assembly decided to allocate to it, as a temporary measure, $1 million from the United Nations budget for 1982. It requested the organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to plan and initiate new measures of assistance to Namibians in the context of the Nationhood Programme and the Institute. It decided that the Council for Namibia should continue to formulate policies of assistance to Namibians, co-ordinate assistance for Namibia provided by the United Nations system, administer and manage the Fund, and consult with SWAPO on assistance to Namibians. The Assembly repeated its appeal for contributions to the Fund. Other provisions of the resolution dealt with the Institute (p. 1177) and the Nationhood Programme (p. 1174).

This resolution, introduced by Venezuela and sponsored by 69 nations, was adopted by a recorded vote of 142 to none, with 5 abstentions.

Nationhood Programme

The Nationhood Programme for Namibia, launched by the General Assembly in 1976<sup>(4)</sup> to assist Namibians during the critical pre-independence period and the initial years of independence, continued in 1981 to finance training programmes and surveys of the Namibian economy in preparation for independence.

Forty-six projects were approved as of mid-1981, 44 per cent of which were devoted to training of personnel, 28 per cent to research, and 27 per cent to a combination of research and training. The total cost of these projects was $9.4 million.

Approximately 150 individual fellowships were provided, as well as group training abroad for about 60 participants. Largest among the training projects was a vocational training centre under construction in Angola, where preparatory training began in December in English, mathematics and basic sciences. In May, 25 students in Zambia began courses in radio programme production and equipment maintenance.

In the area of research, several sectoral surveys and analyses were completed-including a survey on air, sea and ground transport-and others were under way. A workshop on transport and communications, third in a series of four to plan the development of the Programme in major economic sectors, was held at Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, in April. To assist in implementation, SWAPO, in June, established a Committee on the Nationhood Programme to streamline procedures and review current projects.

The projects were being implemented by organizations and institutions of the United Nations system, including the Institute for Namibia, which was responsible for nine projects. An information brochure on the Programme was published in September.<sup>(1)</sup>

Contributions for the Nationhood Programme received during 1981 by the Fund for Namibia amounted to $873,377 as of 31 December, coming from seven countries and the public (see table, p. 1172). UNDP provided about a quarter of the Programme's income; it was executing five projects concerned with manpower and skills development, and administered several projects financed by the Programme. The total expenditure under the Programme in 1981 was $3,154,780, including remittances to the agencies executing its projects. A balance of $1,851,188 was available as of 31 December, including unspent income from prior years.

By a resolution of 22 July<sup>(2)</sup> on implementation by United Nations organizations of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,<sup>(3)</sup> the Economic and Social Council requested organizations in the United Nations system to render, in consultation with the Organization of African Unity and the Council for Namibia, 'increased assistance to the people of Namibia, particularly in connection with the Nationhood Programme.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution of 6 March on the Nationhood Programme,<sup>(5)</sup> the General Assembly requested the Council for Namibia to continue to direct and co-ordinate, in consultation with SWAPO, the planning and implementation of the Programme, and to elaborate policies and contingency plans for its transitional and post-independence phases. The Assembly called on organizations and bodies in the United Nations system to continue participating in the Programme by implementing projects approved by the Council, preparing new project proposals at the Council's request and allocating funds for approved projects. It expressed appreciation to Angola for having offered a site for a vocational training centre for Namibians. The Assembly asked the Secretary-General and the Council President to appeal for funds from Governments, organizations and individuals.

This resolution, introduced by Finland and sponsored by 70 nations, was adopted by a recorded vote of 133 to none, with 5 abstentions.

Taking note of the annual report submitted by the Senate of the Institute to the United Nations Council for Namibia in conformity with the provisions of the Charter of the Institute,

UN Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa

During 1981, the United Nations Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa (p. 1117) continued to provide scholarships for Namibians.. During the 1980-1981 academic year, according to a report by the Secretary-General to the General Assembly,<sup>(1)</sup> the Programme granted 25 new awards to Namibians and extended 110, making a total of 135 scholarship holders studying in 14 foreign countries. Thirteen of the new awards were financed by the Fund for Namibia.

By a resolution of 24 November,<sup>(2)</sup> the Assembly appealed for additional funding for the voluntarily financed Programme.

Other assistance by the UN system

A number of organizations of the United Nations system rendered technical co-operation and other assistance to Namibians and to the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO) during 1981, in addition to their participation in the special programmes for Namibia described in the previous sections. Examples of such activities included the following:

Six projects of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) helped to educate Namibians outside their country and two agricultural production projects provided on-the-job training; all were conducted in co-operation with SWAPO. A further 36 projects, financed by the Fund for Namibia, were administered by UNDP.

The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees allocated $4 million to aid the growing number of Namibian refugees in Angola, and also assisted Namibian refugees in Botswana, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zambia (p. 1032). The United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) provided fellowships to five graduates of the United Nations Institute for Namibia in the field of industrial management and international industrial administration.

Among specialized agencies, the International Telecommunication Union completed in June a UNDP-financed project at Ndola, Zambia, which had been training Namibians since 1977 in various telecommunication fields. The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization paid teachers and supporting staff, made study grants, and sent equipment and supplies to the Namibian Health and Education Centre, as part of its assistance to SWAPO. The United Nations Children's Fund and the World Health Organization supplied emergency medical supplies to SWAPO after the bombing of Namibian refugee settlements in southern Angola.

Information on these activities was furnished in reports by the Secretary-General and by the President of the Economic and Social Council on the implementation by international organizations of United Nations resolutions pertaining to independence for colonial countries (p. 1099).

On 6 March, in its resolutions on action by intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations on Namibia<sup>(2)</sup> and on the Fund for Namibia,<sup>(3)</sup> the General Assembly requested organizations of the United Nations system to give priority to the allocation of funds for assistance to Namibians.

On 29 May, the Industrial Development Board of UNIDO,<sup>(1)</sup> after considering a report by the UNIDO Executive Director on the organizations' technical assistance to the Namibian people, expressed regret at the slow progress in the delivery of such assistance to Namibia due to South Africa's illegal occupation. The Board called on the UNIDO secretariat to intensify its technical assistance to the Namibians, in co-operation with the United Nations Council for Namibia and SWAPO.

Chapter IV

Other colonial Territories

The extent of progress towards self-determination and independence in individual Non-Self-Governing Territories was again examined in 1981 by the General Assembly and its Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

For most of the Territories, the United Nations Secretariat prepared working papers for the Committee, outlining recent developments. The Committee, and usually its Sub-Committee on Small Territories, examined the situation in each Territory, hearing further information in most cases from a representative of the administering Power. A set of conclusions and recommendations was approved for each Territory, and these were set out in the Committee's report to the Assembly,<sup>(1)</sup> where the situation in the Territories was discussed mainly in the Fourth Committee.

On 24 and 25 November, the Assembly adopted a series of resolutions and decisions concerning the Territories.

On the question of East Timor, the Assembly called on Portugal, the East Timorese people's representatives and Indonesia to co-operate with the United Nations and guarantee self-determination.<sup>(5)</sup> On the question of Western Sahara, the Assembly welcomed efforts by the Organization of African Unity to bring about a cease-fire and organize a referendum on self-determination, and appealed for negotiations between Morocco and the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguia el-Hamra y de Río de Oro (POLISARIO) on a cease-fire and a referendum.<sup>(2)</sup>

Resolutions were adopted by the Assembly on the following Territories: American Samoa,<sup>(4)</sup> Guam<sup>(7)</sup> and the United States Virgin Islands,<sup>(4)</sup> under United States administration, and Bermuda, the British Virgin Islands, the Cayman Islands, Montserrat and the Turks and Caicos Islands,<sup>(6)</sup> under United Kingdom administration.

The Assembly adopted decisions on the Cocos (Keeling) Islands (p. 1182), under Australian administration, and Tokelau (p. 1190), under New Zealand administration, and Gibraltar (p. 1186) and St. Helena (p. 1189), under United Kingdom administration. As in the case of the resolutions, these suggested measures of political, economic, social and educational advancement. In other decisions, the Assembly recommended that the Committee on colonial countries continue to review developments regarding Brunei (p. 1182), the Falkland Islands (Malvinas) (p. 1186) and Pitcairn (p. 1189).. It deferred consideration of Anguilla (p. 1181) and St. Kitts-Nevis (p. 1190) until 1982.

In addition to the small Territories dealt with in this chapter, several United Nations bodies took action on the Namibia question (p. 1126), while the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands was considered by the Trusteeship Council and the Committee on colonial countries (p. 1118). The Committee also adopted a resolution on Puerto Rico (p. 1113).

American Samoa

At the invitation of the United States- the administering Power-a United Nations Visiting Mission, composed of India, Sierra Leone, and Trinidad and Tobago, visited American Samoa from 12 to 21 July 1981.

In its report to the Committee on colonial countries,<sup>(2)</sup> the Mission noted that the Territory enjoyed a degree of internal self-government and had a constitution which provided for an elected governor and lieutenant-governor, a judiciary and a bicameral legislature, with the House of Representatives elected by adult suffrage and the Senate elected by custom to represent the traditional counties. The government leaders, members of both legislative chambers and traditional leaders had expressed satisfaction with the Territory's political status and a desire to maintain the relationship with the United States. The Mission sensed that that view had resulted from the heavy dependence of the Territory on economic and financial support from the United States and from the traditional social structure of the society.

The Mission recommended that the United States take steps to develop and diversify the economy of the Territory. It urged financial assistance for port development, greater efforts to improve food production and urgent attention to energy supply in light of the high cost of imported fuel. It concluded that efforts should be made to improve the level and quality of education and that the administering Power should ensure that adequate funds were available continuously for that purpose.

On the Committee's recommendation, the General Assembly, on 24 November, adopted without vote a resolution<sup>(3)</sup> by which it endorsed the Mission's conclusions and recommendations. It called on the United States to expedite decolonization of the Territory, to ensure that its people were kept fully informed of their right to self-determination and independence, to strengthen and diversify the economy of the Territory, and to work out concrete assistance and economic development programmes. It urged the administering Power to continue to foster close relations with neighbouring islands and, in co-operation with the freely elected representatives of American Samoa, to safeguard the people's right to enjoy their natural resources by taking measures to guarantee their right to own and dispose of those resources and control their future development.

This resolution was approved by the Committee on colonial countries on 11 November<sup>(1)</sup> and by the Fourth Committee on 17 November, without objection.

In the Fourth Committee, the United States said it had already begun to implement a number of the Visiting Mission's recommendations and was encouraging political, economic and social development in American Samoa. The United States remained dedicated to the achievement of self-government and self-determination for the people of the Territory.

Question of American Samoa

The General Assembly,

Having considered the question of American Samoa,

Having examined the relevant chapters of the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

10. Urges the administering Power to continue to foster close relations and co-operation between the people of the Territory and the neighbouring island communities;

11. Urges the administering Power, in co-operation with the freely elected representatives of American Samoa, to safeguard the inalienable right of the people of the Territory to the enjoyment of their natural resources by taking effective measures which guarantee the right of the people to own and dispose of those resources and to establish and maintain control over their future development;

12. Requests the Special Committee to continue the consideration of this question at its next session. Including the possible dispatch of a further visiting mission to American Samoa at an appropriate time and in consultation with the administering Power, and to report to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Antigua

On 21 August 1981, the Committee on colonial countries, through its Chairman, congratulated Antigua on its decision to attain independence as the State of Antigua and Barbuda.<sup>(1)</sup> Following its independence on 1 November, the former United Kingdom-administered Territory was admitted to the United Nations as a Member State on 11 November (p. 348).

Belize

Prior to its attainment of independence on 21 September 1981 and its admission as a Member State of the United Nations on 25 September (p. 349), Belize, as a Territory administered by the United Kingdom, was the subject of several letters to the Security Council and the Secretary-General.

In a letter dated 24 March,<sup>(1)</sup> Barbados, Grenada, Guyana, Jamaica, Saint Lucia, and Trinidad and Tobago transmitted to the Secretary-General the "Declaration of Belmopan", signed by their representatives at Belmopan, Belize, on 18 March. The signatories of that document pledged their support for the agreement reached in London on 11 March by the Governments of the United Kingdom, Guatemala and Belize, setting out a basis for settling the controversy over the Territory between Guatemala and the United Kingdom.

In a letter to the Secretary-General dated 17 July,<sup>(2)</sup> Guatemala stated that its latest talks with the United Kingdom (New York, 6-10 July) had not yielded satisfactory results; if no agreement was reached and the United Kingdom granted independence to Belize unilaterally, Guatemala would not recognize the new State and would not regard the lines between itself and Belize as frontiers.

In a letter to the Secretary-General dated 4 August,<sup>(6)</sup> the United Kingdom regretted that it had not been possible to reach agreement with Guatemala and announced that it would proceed with preparations to grant independence to Belize.

Guatemala, in a letter of 10 September to the Security Council President,<sup>(3)</sup> requested the Council to investigate the dispute with the United Kingdom over Belize and to consider whether it should make recommendations for peaceful settlement prior to the Territory's independence. In a letter of 18 September,<sup>(5)</sup> Guatemala complained of the Council's negative response to its request for a public meeting on the dispute; it added that it would refuse to recognize Belize's unilateral independence, since it considered Belize part of Guatemala.

A Guatemalan letter to the Secretary-General dated 17 September<sup>(4)</sup> conveyed the text of a note of the previous day from its Ministry of Foreign Affairs, protesting the violation of its airspace on 10 September by a British reconnaissance aircraft. The United Kingdom, on 22 September,<sup>(7)</sup> transmitted its reply rejecting the Guatemalan protest and stating that no such incursion had taken place.

On 19 August, the Committee on colonial countries, through its Chairman, congratulated Belize on its independence and welcomed its intention to apply for United Nations membership.<sup>(8)</sup>

In a preambular paragraph of its resolution of 1 December<sup>(10)</sup> on implementation of the 1960 Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,<sup>(9)</sup> the General Assembly welcomed the independence of Belize. Explaining its vote against the resolution, Guatemala opposed this paragraph and reiterated its non-recognition of the State of Belize and its borders with Guatemala.

Brunei

The Committee on colonial countries decided on 19 August 1981 to consider the question of Brunei in 1982, subject to any directives from the General Assembly.<sup>(2)</sup> On the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, approved without vote on 23 November 1981 on an oral proposal by its Chairman, the Assembly decided without vote on 25 November to defer consideration of the question until 1982 and to request the Committee on colonial countries to review and report to the Assembly on the situation in the Territory.<sup>(1)</sup>

Question of Brunei

At its 73rd plenary meeting, on 25 November 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, decided to defer until its thirty-seventh session consideration of the question of Brunei and requested the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples to continue to keep the situation in the Territory under review and to report thereon to the Assembly.

Cocos (Keeling) Islands

On 4 August 1981, the Committee on colonial countries adopted a consensus on the Cocos (Keeling) Islands<sup>(2)</sup> by which it reaffirmed the responsibility of Australia- the administering Power- to create conditions for self-determination, and noted Australia's continued commitment to the advancement of the islanders. The Committee also welcomed Australia's willingness to receive United Nations visiting missions in the Territory and reaffirmed that the need for further missions should be kept under review.

A decision in similar terms was adopted without vote by the General Assembly on 24 November,<sup>(1)</sup> as recommended by the Fourth Committee without objection on 17 November, on the basis of a consensus text submitted by its Chairman. By this decision, the Assembly also requested the Committee on colonial countries to report again on the Territory in 1982.

In the Fourth Committee, Australia outlined steps taken to benefit the Territory's economic and social development, and said it had maintained its commitment to the advancement of the population towards their rights, including self-determination. Australia believed that the people of the islands should determine their future political status and decide when they wished an act of self-determination to take place.

Question of the Cocos (Keeling) Islands

At its 70th plenary meeting, on 24 November 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, adopted the following text as representing the consensus of the members of the Assembly:

"The General Assembly, having examined the relevant chapters of the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and having heard the statement of the representative of Australia relating to the Cocos (Keeling) Islands, notes with appreciation the continuing co-operation of the Government of Australia, as the administering Power, with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, contained in Assembly resolution 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960. The Assembly notes with interest the continuing commitment of the administering Power to ensure the political, social, economic and educational advancement of the people of the Territory so that they may be able, as quickly as possible, to exercise fully their inalienable rights. The Assembly reaffirms that it is the responsibility of the administering Power to create conditions under which the people of the Territory will be able freely to determine their own future in conformity with resolution 1514(XV) and other relevant resolutions of the Assembly. The Assembly welcomes the continuing willingness of the administering Power to receive visiting missions in the Cocos (Keeling) Islands and requests the Special Committee, in co-operation with the administering Power, to continue to work towards the implementation of the Declaration with respect to the Territory and to report thereon to the Assembly at its thirty-seventh session."

East Timor question

CONSIDERATION BY THE COMMITTEE ON COLONIAL COUNTRIES. The question of East Timor was considered by the Committee on colonial countries on 13 August 1981. After hearing statements by Portugal as administering Power, Indonesia and the Frente Revolucionária de Timor Leste Independente (FRETILIN), the Committee decided to consider the question in 1982, subject to any directives by the General Assembly.<sup>(5)</sup>

REPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS. Responding to a 1980 Assembly request for a report on the East Timor situation,<sup>(10)</sup> the Secretary-General, in a report of 16 October 1981,<sup>(6)</sup> informed the Assembly that three letters had been received. By letter of 16 April 1981, Indonesia explained its position on the Territory; by letter of 23 December 1980, the Executive Director of the World Food Programme informed the Secretary-General that it would consider any request for food assistance in East Timor; and by letter of 9 October 1981, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees stated that it had entered into an agreement at the beginning of 1981 with the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) to assist in repatriating persons from East Timor to Portugal to reunite families.

In connection with the requirement under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations that administering Powers submit information to the United Nations on Non-Self-Governing Territories (NSGTS) (p. 1114), Portugal stated in a note to the Secretary-General dated 26 March<sup>(3)</sup> that it had nothing to add to information it had provided in 1979 (to the effect that circumstances prevented it from assuming its responsibilities for administering East Timor and that it was therefore unable to supply information).<sup>(13)</sup>

In a note to the Secretary-General dated 11 August,<sup>(1)</sup> Cape Verde transmitted a document of the Permanent People's Tribunal on East Timor, which had met from 19 to 21 June at Lisbon, Portugal, declaring that the entry and presence of Indonesian troops in the Territory was an act of aggression and that Indonesia was guilty of war crimes and genocide.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. ON 24 November, the General Assembly adopted, by a recorded vote of 54 to 42, with 46 abstentions, a resolution<sup>(11)</sup> by which it reaffirmed East Timor's right to self-determination and independence, and called on Portugal, representatives of the Timorese people and Indonesia to co-operate with the United Nations to guarantee the full exercise of that right. Recalling Portugal's September 1980 pledge to undertake broad initiatives for the decolonization of the Territory,<sup>(14)</sup> the Assembly invited Portugal to continue its efforts to that end. It also expressed concern at reports of famine in the Territory, and called on United Nations organizations and States to assist the Timorese people. The Committee on colonial countries and the Secretary-General were asked to follow implementation of the resolution. The resolution was recommended by the Fourth Committee, which approved it on 9 November by a recorded vote of 58 to 40, with 42 abstentions.

Introducing the resolution on behalf of its 23 sponsors, Zimbabwe urged the international community to encourage Portugal in expediting East Timor's decolonization, and called on Indonesia to join Portugal in ensuring the exercise of the Timorese people's right to self-determination and independence. The sponsors were disturbed at reports of recent military activities in the Territory and of possible famine there if the international community did not immediately provide humanitarian assistance.

Indonesia stated its categorical rejection of the resolution, describing it as interference in its internal affairs. Indonesia reaffirmed that the people of East Timor had exercised their right to self-determination by deciding in 1976 to become independent through integration with Indonesia. FRETILIN had ceased to exist in the Territory, since it had no support among the people. The only legal authority in East Timor was Indonesia, and references to Portugal as the administering Power were tantamount to reintroducing colonialism. Whatever discussions might take place between Indonesia and Portugal, the status of East Timor as an integral part of Indonesia was not negotiable. References to famine in East Timor were a complete fabrication; food crops had been good during the past two years and improved roads had allowed surplus food to reach storage facilities.

Portugal acknowledged its historical responsibility to protect the people's rights and identity, and said it would do its utmost to carry out that responsibility. Its efforts to establish an international commission to consider East Timor's sovereignty and self-determination had failed because of Indonesia's resistance. Human rights continued to be systematically violated in the Territory and, despite efforts by ICRC, another serious famine was expected there. Appealing to the international community to solve the East Timor problem, Portugal stated its willingness to collaborate fully with international institutions to guarantee the Territory's people a peaceful future.

Portugal's initiative regarding East Timor was endorsed by Brazil and the Central African Republic, among others,

The right of the people of East Timor to self-determination and independence was supported by a number of States, including Afghanistan, Angola, Brazil, Cape Verde, the Central African Republic, Chad, Cuba, Cyprus, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Mozambique, Nicaragua, Sao Tome and Principe, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Trinidad and Tobago, Uganda and Zimbabwe.

Angola appealed to Indonesia to withdraw its troops from East Timor and to Portugal not to abdicate its involvement in the Territory's independence. Cape Verde stated that FRETILIN was the only movement representing the true desire for self-determination of the Maubere people in the Territory. Sao Tome and Principe said Indonesia's fight for independence did not justify its neo-colonial course in East Timor.

Seychelles stated that, since Indonesia refused to comply with United Nations appeals to withdraw from the Territory, the Assembly should continue to consider the question until East Timor, under FRETILIN leadership, had achieved independence. Sierra Leone thought Indonesia might well be asked whether it had complied with the principles approved by the Assembly in 1960 for integration of an NSGT with an independent State,<sup>(9)</sup> including such factors as equal rights and opportunities to participate in government, prior attainment of advanced self-government, and a decision based on the freely and democratically expressed wishes of the people. In Zimbabwe's view, it was tragic that a third world country claimed the right to intervene in and annex another country.

The international community should not remain mute and impassive when confronted with genocide, said Guinea-Bissau. Chad also expressed the view that the Timorese had been victims of genocide. Mozambique stated that some Western countries did not care that an entire people was being massacred, so long as their economic and strategic interests were preserved and they could rely on a continuous supply of petroleum and raw materials.

In Afghanistan's view, a people's right to self-determination could not be realized through the integration of a Territory by force. Cyprus expressed concern that the non-implementation of United Nations resolutions on East Timor could set a dangerous precedent for other powerful countries with expansionist aims against their neighbours.

Haiti urged the parties to hold negotiations which would serve the interests of the East Timor people and enable them to realize their aspirations. Nicaragua hoped that Indonesia would comply with United Nations resolutions in the search for a just solution. Senegal considered that the people of East Timor should be enabled to express freely their views on their future, whereupon the parties could consult and reach an acceptable settlement.

Trinidad and Tobago expressed concern about reports of impending famine in the Territory and urged early relief efforts.

Among those which abstained on the resolution, the Federal Republic of Germany welcomed Indonesia's declaration of readiness to negotiate with Portugal on outstanding problems, including humanitarian ones. Finland and Sweden offered to provide humanitarian assistance to East Timor, and Sweden appealed to Indonesia to keep assistance channels open.

The FRETILIN representative stated that a new Indonesian military offensive was under way, similar to those launched against his organization in 1976 and 1977. The assault would provoke a serious famine, as had happened in 1978-1979. ICRC had departed abruptly in April 1981, leaving no foreign doctors or nurses, and there was not a single foreign presence in East Timor to restrain the Indonesians. The people had endured a brutal war of aggression for the past six years, carried on by 300,000 Indonesian troops. FRETILIN would continue to fight until Indonesia acknowledged the right of East Timor to be free and independent.

States expressing support for the Indonesian position- that decolonization had already taken place in the Territory and that United Nations consideration was interference in Indonesia's internal affairs-included Bangladesh, India, Japan, Jordan, Malaysia, Oman, the Philippines, Singapore and Thailand.

India thought it was time for the Assembly to take realities into account and remove the question of East Timor from its agenda. Jordan observed that Indonesia had exercised its right to unity, while Malaysia remarked that decolonization need not conform to a rigid pattern so long as the people's right to self-determination was not prejudiced. Thailand stated that diplomats in Jakarta had several times been invited to observe self-determination in East Timor, and a Thai representative had participated in such visits.

Bangladesh and Japan acknowledged Indonesian efforts to promote the welfare and development of East Timor. The Philippines said Indonesia had devoted considerable effort to developing education, agriculture, health, and other social and economic programmes in East Timor, as well as to alleviating the suffering caused when Portugal had abandoned it. Singapore stated that integrating the Territory into Indonesia had brought political stability and that Indonesia had devoted a considerable portion of its provincial budget to East Timor.

During the debate in the Fourth Committee, the following petitioners made statements: Michael A. Chamberlain, East Timor Human Rights Committee; Roger S. Clark, International League for Human Rights; Richard Falk, professor at Princeton University, United States; Sister Blaise Lupo, Clergy and Laity Concerned; Sue Nichterlein, Minority Rights Group; Margo Picken, Amnesty International; Paulo Pires, Partido do Centro Social Cristão/ União Democrática Timorense; José Ramos-Horta, FRETILIN; Michael Robert, Ligue internationale pour les droits et la libération des peuples; William R. Roff, professor at Columbia University, United States; David Scott, Australian Council for Overseas Aid, Community Aid Abroad and Human Rights Council of Australia; and Jacob Xavier, Movimento Nacional para a Libertação e Independência de Timor-Dili (MNLITD).<sup>(7)</sup>

The Chairman of the Fourth Committee received three letters in October from Indonesia expressing its strong opposition to the participation of these petitioners in the Committee's deliberations.<sup>(2)</sup> Portugal sent a letter to the Committee Chairman dated 10 October,<sup>(4)</sup> stating that its Government had no representative in East Timor and that the attribution of such status to M. Pereira Coutinho, listed as a member of the MNLITD delegation in its request for a hearing, had no foundation.

Indonesia, explaining its vote for the Assembly's resolution of 1 December<sup>(12)</sup> on implementation of the 1960 Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,<sup>(8)</sup> said in regard to the provision whereby the Assembly approved the 1982 work programme of the Committee on colonial countries that it opposed the discussion of East Timor in the Committee.

Question of East Timor

The General Assembly,

Recognizing the inalienable right of all peoples to self-determination and independence in accordance with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, contained in its resolution 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960.

Bearing in mind that the Fifth and Sixth Conferences of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at Colombo and Havana in 1976 and 1979, respectively, reaffirmed the right of the people of East Timor to self-determination and independence,

Having examined the chapter of the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples relating to East Timor and other relevant documents,

Deeply concerned at the suffering of the people of East Timor and at reports of the critical situation resulting from the new outbreak of famine in the Territory,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the question of East Timor,

Recalling the communiqué of the Council of Ministers of Portugal, issued on 12 September 1980, in which the administering Power pledged to undertake broad initiatives with a view to ensuring the full and speedy decolonization of East Timor,

5. Expresses its deepest concern at the reports of the critical situation resulting from the new outbreak of famine in East Timor and calls upon all specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system, in particular the World Food Programme, the United Nations Children's Fund and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, immediately to assist, within their respective fields of competence, the people of the Territory;

6. Notes with satisfaction the humanitarian aid given by some Member States and relief organizations to the people of East Timor and calls upon all Governments concerned to continue this aid with a view to alleviating the suffering of the people of the Territory;

7. Requests the Special Committee to keep the situation in the Territory under active consideration and to follow the implementation of the present resolution;

Falkland Islands (Malvinas)

On 19 August 1981, the Committee on colonial countries decided to consider the question of the Falkland Islands (Malvinas) in 1982 subject to any General Assembly directives.<sup>(6)</sup> On the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, approved without vote on 23 November 1981, the Assembly decided without vote on 25 November to defer consideration of the question until 1982 and requested the Committee on colonial countries to keep the situation under review.<sup>(1)</sup> In proposing this action, the Fourth Committee Chairman observed that negotiations were in progress between Argentina and the United Kingdom in relation to the Territory.

The course of these negotiations was the subject of letters from the two Governments to the Secretary-General. In identical letters dated 23 March, Argentina<sup>(2)</sup> and the United Kingdom<sup>(5)</sup> said they had held ministerial-level talks in New York on 23 and 24 February and had agreed to hold further negotiations at an early date; the Argentine letter used the phrase "at the earliest possible date".

By a letter of 29 July,<sup>(3)</sup> Argentina transmitted a press declaration of 27 July announcing that it had invited the United Kingdom to expedite negotiations aimed at settling Argentina's claim to the Malvinas Islands, South Georgia and the South Sandwich Islands, on which it said no substantial progress had been made since 1965. Argentina reaffirmed its sovereignty over the islands as a basis for negotiations, promised to respect the islanders' interests and said it was prepared to agree to United Nations guarantees for those interests if necessary. On 17 September,<sup>(4)</sup> Argentina sent a press announcement of 14 September announcing its decision to provide free air transport of 24 tons of food to the islands, in accordance with its policy of giving special importance to the Malvinas islanders and in view of food shortages there.

Question of the Falkland Islands (Malvinas)

At its 73rd plenary meeting, on 25 November 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, decided to defer until its thirty-seventh session consideration of the question of the Falkland Islands (Malvinas) and requested the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples to continue to keep the situation in the Territory under review and to report thereon to the Assembly.

Gibraltar

On 19 August 1981, the Committee on colonial countries, taking account of continuing negotiations between the parties on the question of Gibraltar, decided to consider the question at its 1982 session, subject to any General Assembly directives.<sup>(2)</sup>

On the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, approved without objection on 17 November 1981 on the basis of a consensus text submitted by its Chairman, the Assembly adopted, without vote, a consensus statement on 24 November.<sup>(1)</sup> The Assembly noted that Spain and the United Kingdom had signed a declaration in 1980 intended to resolve the problem of Gibraltar by agreeing to start negotiations on their differences and to re-establish direct communications in the region. It urged both Governments to make it possible to initiate negotiations.

Question of Gibraltar

At its 70th plenary meeting, on 24 November 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, adopted the following text as representing the consensus of the members of the Assembly:

"The General Assembly, noting that the Governments of Spain and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland signed a declaration on 10 April 1980 at Lisbon, intending, in accordance with the relevant resolutions of the United Nations, to resolve the problem of Gibraltar, agreeing to that end to start negotiations aimed at overcoming all the differences between them on Gibraltar, agreeing also to the re-establishment of direct communications in the region, the Government of Spain having decided to suspend the application of the measures at present in force, and both Governments agreeing to base future co-operation on reciprocity and full equality of rights, urges both Governments to make possible the initiation of the negotiations as envisaged in the consensus adopted by the Assembly on 14 December 1973, with the object of reaching a lasting solution to the problem of Gibraltar in the light of the relevant resolutions of the Assembly and in the spirit of the Charter of the United Nations."

Guam

ACTION BY THE COMMITTEE ON COLONIAL COUNTRIES. On 13 August 1981, the Committee on colonial countries adopted conclusions and recommendations on Guam<sup>(1)</sup> that had been prepared by its Sub-Committee on Small Territories. In this text, the Committee noted with appreciation the continued active participation in its work by the administering Power (United States), enabling it to conduct a more informed and meaningful examination. It reiterated the administering Power's responsibility to ensure that the people were kept informed of their right to self-determination and independence, and to create conditions in the Territory which would enable the people to exercise that right freely. It reaffirmed that the people should not be prevented by the factor of military bases from exercising that right. Referring to United Nations visiting missions, it considered that the possibility of sending one to Guam should be kept under review.

On economic and social conditions in the Territory, the Committee called for steps by the administering Power to diversify the economy, facilitate the transfer of land to the people, work towards removing growth constraints in fishing, agriculture and transportation, guarantee the people's rights to their natural resources and protect their property rights. It urged continued efforts to promote the language and culture of the Chamorro people, who made up some 55 per cent of the population according to the 1979 census.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 25 November, the General Assembly adopted a resolution on Guam<sup>(2)</sup> by 119 votes to none, following its approval in the Fourth Committee on 23 November by a recorded vote of 128 to none. The resolution incorporated most of the provisions contained in the text approved by the Committee on colonial countries (see above) concerning the right to self-determination, a diversified economy, land transfer, property rights, natural resources and the Chamorros. In addition, the Assembly called on the administering Power to enable the people to regain possession of unutilized land held by the federal authorities and the military, and requested the Committee, in its continuing consideration of Guam, to consider the possible dispatch of a visiting mission at an appropriate time and in consultation with the administering Power.

With regard to military bases, the Assembly recognized that their presence could constitute a factor impeding decolonization and reaffirmed its strong conviction that their presence should not prevent the people from exercising their right to self-determination and independence. This provision was the result of an amendment that replaced a paragraph in the original draft resolution by which the Assembly would have recalled past resolutions maintaining that the presence of military bases "constitutes" a factor impeding decolonization, and would have reaffirmed that the people "should not be prevented by this factor" from exercising their right to self-determination and independence.

The resolution was sponsored by Afghanistan, Angola, Bulgaria, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ethiopia and the Syrian Arab Republic. The amendment had 13 sponsors and was adopted in Committee by a recorded vote of 66 to 41, with 16 abstentions. It was introduced by Samoa, which stated that its purpose was to restore the consensus language used in previous resolutions. Samoa added that military bases did not necessarily constitute an impediment to self-determination and that such an assertion was completely unjustified in Guam, whose people had expressed themselves through their representatives to the United States House of Representatives.

A sub-amendment submitted by Democratic Yemen<sup>(3)</sup> was not put to the vote. It would have replaced most of the la-nation amendment by a provision endorsing the conclusions and recommendations on military bases in Guam by the Committee on colonial countries. On the advice of the United Nations Legal Counsel, the Fourth Committee Chairman ruled that the proposal by Democratic Yemen should be considered as a sub-amendment to be put to the vote first. However, the Committee sustained an appeal by Samoa against this ruling, by a recorded vote of 50 to 44, with 20 abstentions.

In the debate, the United States said the Government of Guam had endeavoured to reduce the Territory's economic dependence, improve living standards and develop better relations with its Pacific neighbours. More diversified industries had been established, port facilities had been developed and efforts had been made to ensure the productive civilian use of federal land no longer needed for military purposes. A plebiscite had been scheduled for January 1982 on the Territory's future status. As to military bases, the people of Guam had repeatedly reaffirmed their views, most recently in 1981 when both the elected Governor and the elected legislature had reaffirmed the policy of encouraging Guam's use as a home port for United States Navy personnel.

Voting for the resolution but expressing reservations on the 13-nation amendment were Afghanistan, the Byelorussian SSR, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, the German Democratic Republic, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Madagascar, Mongolia, Poland, the Syrian Arab Republic, the USSR and Viet Nam.

Bulgaria stated that Guam had been annexed de facto by the United States, which was expanding military installations that already occupied a third of the island. Cuba observed that the administering Power's reports did not mention that Guam was one of the world's largest military bases nor that the United States intended to keep it that way to the detriment of the people's interests. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya considered the bases a threat to the peace and security of States in the region. In the view of the USSR, Guam was a typical example of a Territory where the presence of military bases impeded economic and political development and where the administering Power was trying by every possible means to perpetuate dependency. Viet Nam stated that the size of the bases was irrelevant, as there was no guarantee they would not be used for aggression.

Supporting the amendment, Australia regretted that the draft resolution had been submitted by a small number of countries without proper consultation, introducing a divisive element. Denmark, on behalf of the five Nordic States, said that if the Committee was to continue approving draft resolutions by consensus it would have to keep to the balanced drafts of previous years on military bases. Fiji stated that the presence of bases did not necessarily impede decolonization unless the people concerned decided otherwise. Indonesia thought Guam should continue to be regarded as a decolonization issue and not in the context of great-Power rivalry. Japan considered that the original text, stating that the presence of military bases impeded decolonization, was too sweeping and contrary to historical fact, while New Zealand found it unjustified. Senegal thought the amendment, of which it was a sponsor, would reduce confrontation.

Venezuela, which abstained in the vote on the amendment, said that, while military bases could impede decolonization, it could not agree with inappropriate observations where the adverse effects of bases had not been established.

Question of Guam

The General Assembly,

Having considered the question of Guam,

Having examined the relevant chapters of the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

Recalling its resolution 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960, containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, and all other resolutions and decisions of the United Nations relating to Guam,

Noting that the administering Power continues to maintain military installations in the Territory,

Considering that the policy of maintaining military bases and installations in Non-Self-Governing Territories which inhibit the right of self-determination of peoples is incompatible with the relevant resolutions of the United Nations,

Having heard statement of the administering Power,

Welcoming the active participation of the administering Power in the work of the Special Committee and expressing the hope that this co-operation will be strengthened further so as to accelerate progress towards the full implementation of the Declaration in respect of Guam,

Bearing in mind the special circumstances of the geographical location and economic conditions of Guam and the necessity of diversifying the economy of the Territory as a matter of priority,

1. Approves the chapter of the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples relating to Guam;

2. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of Guam to self-determination and independence in accordance with the Declaration on the Granting of independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples;

3. Reaffirms its conviction that questions of territorial size, geographical location, size of population and limited natural resources should in no way delay the implementation of the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514(XV) in respect of the Territory;

4. Recalls that the United States of America, as the administering Power, has the responsibility to ensure that the people of the Territory are kept fully informed of their inalienable right to self-determination and independence, in accordance with the Declaration;

5. Reiterates that it is the responsibility of the administering Power to create such conditions in the Territory as will enable the people of Guam to exercise freely and without any interference their inalienable right to self-determination and independence in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514(XV);

6. Calls upon the administering Power to take all necessary steps, taking into account the freely expressed wishes of the people of Guam, to expedite the process of decolonization of the Territory in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations and the Declaration and other appropriate resolutions of the General Assembly;

7. Reaffirms its relevant resolutions concerning military bases in colonial and Non-Self-Governing Territories, recognizes that the presence of military bases could constitute a factor impeding the implementation of the Declaration and reaffirms its strong conviction that the presence of military bases in Guam should not prevent the people of the Territory from exercising their inalienable right to self-determination and independence in accordance with the Declaration and the purposes and principles of the Charter;

8. Reaffirms the responsibility of the administering Power, under the Charter, for the economic and social development of Guam, including the adoption of all possible measures to strengthen and diversify the economy of the Territory;

9. Calls upon the administering Power, in co-operation with the territorial Government and bearing in mind that an obstacle to economic development has been the uncertainty concerning land held by the federal authorities, to facilitate the transfer of land to the people of the Territory and to protect their property rights;

10. Urges the administering Power, in co-operation with the territorial Government, to continue to take effective measures to safeguard and guarantee the right of the people of Guam to their natural resources and to establish and maintain control over their future development;

11. Urges the administering Power to continue its efforts to develop and promote the language and culture of the Chamorro people;

12. Calls upon the administering Power to take the necessary action to enable the people of Guam to regain possession of unutilized land held at present by the federal authorities and by the military;

13. Requests the Special Committee to continue the consideration of this question at its next session, including the possible dispatch of a further visiting mission to Guam at an appropriate time and in consultation with the administering Power, and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session.

Pitcairn

The Committee on colonial countries adopted a consensus statement concerning Pitcairn on 4 August 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> as recommended by its Sub-Committee on Small Territories. It noted the affirmation by the United Kingdom—the administering Power—to encourage local initiative and enterprise, and its willingness to discuss constitutional status change with the Pitcairners whenever they desired. The Committee recognized that the size of the Territory's population (61 people at the beginning of 1981) raised the question of the islanders' capacity to maintain the essential services of education, medical welfare and the launching of long-boats, on which their trade with passing ships depended. It called on the administering Power to safeguard their interests.

On the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, approved without vote on 23 November on the basis of an oral proposal by its Chairman, the General Assembly decided without vote on 25 November to defer consideration of the question until 1982 and to request the Committee on colonial countries to review and report to the Assembly on the situation in the Territory.<sup>(1)</sup>

Question of Pitcairn

At its 73rd plenary meeting, on 25 November 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, decided to defer until its thirty-seventh session consideration of the question of Pitcairn and requested the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples to continue to keep the situation in the Territory under review and to report thereon to the Assembly.

St. Helena

On the recommendation of its Sub-Committee on Small Territories, the Committee on colonial countries approved a consensus statement on 4 August 1981 on the question of St. Helena.<sup>(1)</sup> On the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, approved without objection on 17 November on the basis of a consensus text submitted by its Chairman, the General Assembly adopted a consensus statement without vote on 24 November,<sup>(3)</sup> couched in language similar to that used by the Committee.

In its decision, the Assembly reaffirmed the right of the people of St. Helena to self-determination and independence. It noted the commitment of the United Kingdom, as administering Power, to respect the people's wishes in advancing towards self-determination and urged that Power, in consultation with the people's elected representatives, to take steps to ensure the speedy implementation of the 1960 Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.<sup>(2)</sup> The Assembly reaffirmed the importance of development assistance from the administering Power and the international community. It noted the continuance of infrastructure and community projects to improve community welfare, including the administering Power's encouragement of local initiative, and called on the administering Power to support such activities. Noting the administering Power's positive attitude towards United Nations visiting missions, the Assembly requested the Chairman of the Committee on colonial countries to continue his consultations in that regard. It requested the Committee to report to the Assembly in 1982.

Question of St. Helens

At its 70th plenary meeting, on 24 November 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, adopted the following text as representing the consensus of the members of the Assembly:

"The General Assembly, having examined the relevant chapters of the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and having heard the statement of the representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, as the administering Power, reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of St. Helena to self-determination and independence in conformity with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, contained in Assembly resolution 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960. The Assembly notes the commitment of the Government of the United Kingdom to respect the wishes of the people of the Territory in relation to their advance towards self-determination and, in this regard, urges the administering Power to continue to take all necessary steps to ensure, in consultation with the freely elected representatives of the people of St. Helena, the speedy implementation of the Declaration in respect of this Territory. The Assembly further notes the commitment of the Government of the United Kingdom to carry out a policy aimed at implementing Assembly decision 35/409 of 11 November 1980 and reaffirms that continued development assistance from the administering Power, in conjunction with any assistance that the international community might be able to provide, constitutes an important means of developing the social and economic potential of the Territory. In this connection, the Assembly notes that a number of infrastructure and community projects aimed at improving the general welfare of the community are continuing and that the administering Power is encouraging local initiative and enterprise. The Assembly calls upon the administering Power to continue to provide full support for such activities. The Assembly further notes the positive attitude of the administering Power with respect to the question of receiving visiting missions and requests the Chairman of the Special Committee to continue his consultations in this regard with a view to dispatching such a mission to St. Helena, as appropriate. The Assembly requests the Special Committee, in continued co-operation with the administering Power, to examine this question at its next session and to report thereon to the Assembly at its thirty-seventh session."

St. Kitts-Nevis

The Committee on colonial countries decided on 19 August 1981 to consider the question of St. Kitts-Nevis at its 1982 session, subject to any directives by the General Assembly.<sup>(2)</sup> On the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, approved without vote on 23 November on an oral proposal by its Chairman, the Assembly decided without vote on 25 November to defer consideration of the question until 1982.<sup>(1)</sup>

Tokelau

VISITING MISSION REPORT. At the invitation of New Zealand- the administering Power-a United Nations Visiting Mission, composed of Fiji, the Ivory Coast and Yugoslavia, visited Tokelau from 28 June to 3 July 1981.

In its report to the Committee on colonial countries,<sup>(3)</sup> the Mission stated that the Tokelauans had made it clear they did not wish under current circumstances to reconsider their existing ties with New Zealand. That opinion had also been expressed by the Tokelauan communities at Wellington and Rotorua, New Zealand. In Auckland, however, some members of the community had expressed the view that the time had perhaps come for Tokelau to be given the opportunity to make effective preparations for internal self-government.

The Mission noted that the political organization of the Territory, based on the traditions of the people, was firmly established on each of the three atolls. The authority of the elders, expressed through the village fono (council), was not questioned. But the Mission thought it would be in the overall interest of the people if the General Fono were more institutionalized and organized on a permanent basis. The Mission was also impressed by the level of political awareness of the whole population.

The Mission stressed the need for economic and social improvements-in agriculture, fisheries, handicrafts, housing, employment opportunities and communications. It favoured greater social and cultural contacts between the Territory's people and those of neighbouring islands. It requested the administering Power to improve primary education, to provide secondary education, to supply more training in modern methods, especially for local leaders and to educate young Tokelauans in matters that would enable them to run their own affairs.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On the recommendation of the Committee on colonial countries, approved on 11 November,<sup>(2)</sup> the General Assembly, on 24 November, adopted without vote a consensus decision<sup>(1)</sup> by which it commended the Mission's conclusions and recommendations to New Zealand and the Tokelauans, and reaffirmed New Zealand's responsibility to keep the people informed of their right to self-determination. The Assembly welcomed New Zealand's assurances that it would continue to be guided solely by the people's wishes as to the Territory's future status, and called on New Zealand to continue its political education programme. It noted New Zealand's efforts to promote economic development and measures to guarantee the people's rights to their natural resources, and favoured more budgetary support and development aid by New Zealand.

The consensus decision was approved without objection by the Fourth Committee on 17 November. In the Committee, New Zealand said the Visiting Mission's recommendations would assist it in carrying out its responsibilities as administering Power. Tokelau was internally self-governing and functioned as a single political and economic entity, and the political education programme supported by New Zealand had given Tokelauan leaders a greater understanding of economic problems and political options. The people of the Territory had said they did not want to change their relationship with New Zealand, a view which the latter respected whatever the people might decide in future.

Question of Tokelau

At its 70th plenary meeting, on 24 November 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, adopted the following text as representing the consensus of the members of the Assembly:

"The General Assembly, having examined the relevant chapters of the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, as well as the report of the United Nations Visiting Mission which was dispatched to the Territory in June 1981, and having heard the statement of the representative of New Zealand with regard to Tokelau, notes with appreciation the constructive work accomplished by the members of the Visiting Mission, as well as the close co-operation extended to the Mission by the administering Power, the fonos (councils) and the people of Tokelau. In this regard, the Assembly commends the conclusions and recommendations of the Visiting Mission to the Government of New Zealand, as the administering Power, and to the people of Tokelau for their consideration. The Assembly reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of Tokelau to self-determination in conformity with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, contained in Assembly resolution 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960, and reaffirms further that it is the responsibility of the administering Power to keep the people of Tokelau fully informed of this right. In this regard, the Assembly notes that the people of the Territory have expressed the view that, at the present time, they do not wish to review the nature of the existing relationship between Tokelau and New Zealand. The Assembly welcomes the administering Power's assurances that it will continue to be guided solely by the wishes of the people of Tokelau as to the future status of the Territory. The Assembly also notes that the administering Power has assured the people of Tokelau of its continuing assistance in the event that they should desire to change their status. The Assembly calls upon the administering Power to continue its programme of political education within the context of its efforts to ensure the preservation of the identity and cultural heritage of the people of Tokelau. The Assembly recognizes that the economic development of Tokelau is an important element in the process of self-determination. The Assembly notes the continuing efforts of the administering Power to promote the economic development of the Territory and the measures it has taken to safeguard and guarantee the right of the people of Tokelau to all their natural resources and the benefits derived therefrom. In this regard, the Assembly notes that, in accordance with the wishes of the people of Tokelau, legislation came into force on 1 April 1980 establishing a 200-mile exclusive economic zone for the Territory. The Assembly is of the opinion that the administering Power should continue to expand its programme of budgetary support and development aid to the Territory. The Assembly requests the Special Committee to continue to examine this question at its next session in the light of the findings of the Visiting Mission, including the possible dispatch of a further visiting mission to Tokelau, as appropriate and in consultation with the administering Power, and to report thereon to the Assembly at its thirty-seventh session."

United States Virgin Islands

On 13 August 1981, the Committee on colonial countries endorsed the conclusions and recommendations of its Sub-Committee on Small Territories regarding the United States Virgin Islands.<sup>(1)</sup>

In addition to provisions later incorporated into the resolution adopted by the General Assembly (see below), the Committee noted that a constitution for the Territory drafted by a local constitutional convention had been approved by the United States President in July and would be presented in a territorial referendum on 3 November. Noting that positive measures had been taken to resolve the problem of aliens in the Territory, the Committee urged the administering Power to assist the territorial Government in adjusting the status of aliens. It also noted government efforts to attract investments in manufacturing. Referring to a request by the territorial Government that the United States should not proceed with legislation to extend its federal tax system to the Territory, the Committee called on the administering Power to reconsider its intention in that regard. It noted with appreciation the continued participation of the United States in the Committee's discussions on the Territory.

On the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, approved without objection on 17 November, the General Assembly adopted without vote on 24 November a 12-nation resolution<sup>(2)</sup> by which it reaffirmed the right of the people of the United States Virgin Islands to self-determination and independence, and requested the United States to expedite decolonization of the Territory. The Assembly also reaffirmed the administering Power's responsibility for ensuring the people's identity and cultural heritage, and urged it to guarantee the people's right to own and dispose of their natural resources. In addition, the Assembly urged more measures to strengthen and diversify the economy of the United States Virgin Islands. By a provision not included in the text adopted by the Committee on colonial countries, the Assembly requested the administering Power to continue to enlist the assistance of the United Nations system in the Territory's development. It requested the Committee to consider the question again in 1982, including the possible dispatch of a visiting mission.

In the Fourth Committee, the United States said that under the new draft constitution to go before the Territory's voters in November, the Virgin Islanders would assume greater responsibility for local self-government. The United States Government would assist the Virgin Islands Government in financing investigations into charges of white-collar crime and public corruption, since that was a high priority concern of the territorial Government.

Question of the United States Virgin Islands

The General Assembly.

Having considered the question of the United States Virgin Islands.

Having examined the relevant chapters of the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

Recalling its resolution 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960, containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, and all other resolutions and decisions of the United Nations relating to the United States Virgin Islands,

Noting the active co-operation given by the administering Power, both through its participation in the work of the Special Committee and through its willingness to receive visiting missions to small Territories under its administration,

Having heard the statement of the administering Power,

1. Approves the chapter of the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples relating to the United States Virgin Islands;

2. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the people of the United States Virgin Islands to self-determination and independence in accordance with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples;

3. Reaffirms its conviction that questions of territorial size, geographical location, size of population and limited natural resources should in no way delay the speedy implementation of the Declaration with regard to the Territory;

4. Requests the Government of the United States of America, as the administering Power, to take all necessary measures, in consultation with the freely elected representatives of the people of the United States Virgin Islands, to expedite the process of the decolonization of the Territory in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations and the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514(XV);

5. Reaffirms that it is the obligation of the administering Power, in consultation with the freely elected representatives of the people of the Territory, to inform the local people of the possibilities open to them in the exercise of their inalienable right to self-determination and independence and to enable them to exercise that right freely and without interference in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514(XV);

6. Reaffirms that the administering Power has the responsibility for taking such measures as will ensure the preservation of the identity and cultural heritage of the people of the Territory;

7. Urges the administering Power, in consultation with the freely elected representatives of the people of the United States Virgin Islands, to safeguard the inalienable right of the people of the Territory to the enjoyment of their natural resources by taking effective measures which guarantee the right of the people to own and dispose of those resources and to establish and maintain control over their future development;

8. Reaffirms the responsibility of the administering Power, under the Charter, for the economic and social development of the United States Virgin Islands and in this regard notes that, although steady economic progress has continued in the Territory, especially in the area of service industries, there are still problems which need to be resolved, including those relating to unemployment and the infrastructure;

9. Notes the sustained efforts undertaken by the territorial Government to diversify the economy and urges the administering Power, acting in co-operation with the Government of the United States Virgin Islands, to strengthen the economy of the Territory by, wherever possible, taking additional measures of diversification in all fields;

10. Requests the administering Power to continue to enlist the assistance of the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system in the development and strengthening of the economy of the United States Virgin Islands;

11. Requests the Special Committee to continue the examination of this question at its next session, including the possible dispatch of a further visiting mission to the United States Virgin Islands at an appropriate time and in consultation with the administering Power, and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session.

Western Sahara question

The General Assembly, in November 1981, authorized United Nations co-operation with the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in organizing a referendum on self-determination for the people of Western Sahara. Agreement on this course was reached in June at the OAU Assembly of Heads of State and Government, which established an Implementation Committee to work out details.

CONSIDERATION BY THE COMMITTEE ON COLONIAL COUNTRIES. The question of Western Sahara was considered by the Committee on colonial countries on 14 August. After hearing statements, the Committee decided on that date to continue its consideration in 1982, subject to any directives by the General Assembly.<sup>(12)</sup>

REPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS. Responding to a 1980 General Assembly request<sup>(16)</sup> for a report on the Western Sahara situation, the Secretary-General, in a report<sup>(13)</sup> of 16 October 1981, informed the Assembly that he had received letters transmitting two OAU decisions, sent by that organization's Secretary-General on 23 September and by Kenya, as Chairman of OAU, on 14 September. Both texts were annexed to the report, and the letter from Kenya was also issued separately.<sup>(4)</sup>

By the first of these decisions, the OAU Assembly of Heads of State and Government, meeting at Nairobi, Kenya, from 24 to 27 June, welcomed a commitment by King Hassan II of Morocco to accept the organization of a referendum in Western Sahara, and established an Implementation Committee which, with United Nations participation; was to work out details and guarantee the exercise of the right to self-determination through a general and free referendum. The second decision, taken by the Implementation Committee at a meeting in Nairobi from 24 to 26 August, set forth the general principles and conditions of a referendum and cease-fire; the referendum would be held under an impartial interim administration assisted by an OAU or United Nations peace-keeping force, and the population would be asked to choose between independence and integration with Morocco.

In a letter to the Secretary-General dated 9 September,<sup>(5)</sup> Madagascar transmitted a 25 July memorandum from the General Secretary of the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguia el-Hamra y de Río de Oro (Frente POLISARIO) submitting its conditions for a referendum in the Territory; these included withdrawal of Moroccan forces and administration, installation of a provisional administration set up by the United Nations and OAU with the collaboration of the Saharan Arab Democratic Republic, and the presence of a United Nations peace-keeping force.

By letter to the President of the Security Council dated 13 October,<sup>(9)</sup> Morocco transmitted a letter from King Hassan II stating that Moroccan troops had been attacked on that date at Guelta Zemmour, in the territory of Sahara, and two Moroccan aircraft had been shot down by advanced missiles operated by non-Africans on Moroccan territory. In letters dated 16 October to the Council President<sup>(7)</sup> and the Assembly President,<sup>(6)</sup> Mauritania transmitted a 13 October communique from the Military Committee of National Recovery denying all accusations by Morocco against Mauritania and stating that it was not involved in the alleged military operations. In a letter of 20 October to the Council President,<sup>(10)</sup> Morocco transmitted a 19 October message from King Hassan to the President of Mauritania, stating that the attack had been launched from Mauritania and seeking clarification of that country's role. In a letter of 21 October,<sup>(8)</sup> Mauritania transmitted a message of the previous day from its President assuring the Secretary-General that attacks on Morocco had not originated in Mauritania.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 24 November, the General Assembly adopted, by a recorded vote of 76 to 9, with 57 abstentions, a resolution sponsored by 43 African and other States<sup>(18)</sup> by which it reaffirmed the right of the people of Western Sahara to self-determination and independence, and welcomed the efforts of OAU and its Implementation Committee, including steps towards a referendum on self-determination. It urged Morocco and POLISARIO, as the two parties to the conflict, to negotiate a cease-fire and a peace agreement permitting conduct of the referendum. The Assembly reaffirmed United Nations determination to co-operate with OAU in organizing the referendum, requested the United Nations Secretary-General to co-operate closely with the OAU Secretary-General to implement the decisions of OAU and its Implementation Committee, and requested the Committee on colonial countries to give priority to the Western Sahara question and to report in 1982. The resolution was recommended by the Fourth Committee, which approved it on 9 November by a recorded vote of 73 to 7, with 54 abstentions.

Also on 24 November, the Assembly adopted without vote a decision<sup>(20)</sup> by which it requested the Secretary-General to assist the Implementation Committee in discharging its mandate on Western Sahara and to report to the Assembly and the Security Council, as appropriate. The decision, sponsored by Kenya, was approved without objection on 9 November by the Fourth Committee.

A provision by which the Assembly noted with satisfaction the OAU resolution establishing the Implementation Committee, as well as that Committee's decision to conduct a referendum in Western Sahara, was included in a resolution on self-determination of peoples adopted on 28 October.<sup>(17)</sup>

A draft resolution proposed in the Fourth Committee by Morocco, Senegal and Zaire<sup>(2)</sup> was withdrawn by the sponsors. It would have had the Assembly welcome the OAU decision on a referendum and the readiness of all parties to co-operate fully with the Implementation Committee, authorize the Secretary-General to assist the Committee, and invite the Secretary-General to report to the Assembly and the Security Council.

Amendments to this draft were submitted by Algeria, Angola, Burundi, Cape Verde, Madagascar, Mozambique, Nicaragua, Sao Tome and Principe, and Seychelles.<sup>(1)</sup> One of the amendments would have added, to a preambular paragraph referring to the broad support in the Assembly for the OAU decisions, a phrase mentioning in particular the statements of Morocco and POLISARIO. Another amendment would have added an Assembly reaffirmation of the right of the people of Western Sahara to self-determination. Further, a mention of "a self-determination referendum in Western Sahara" would have been replaced by "a general and free self-determination referendum of the people of Western Sahara". A paragraph authorizing the Secretary-General to give all necessary assistance to the Implementation Committee would have been replaced by a request that the Secretary-General co-operate fully with OAU in carrying out the Committee's decisions. Finally, the amendments would have added a request to the Committee on colonial countries to continue to consider the Western Sahara situation as a priority matter and report to the Assembly in 1982.

The three-nation draft resolution was withdrawn following a 29 October request from the OAU Chairman to King Hassan, appealing to Morocco to withdraw its Assembly proposal and thus enable the Implementation Committee to carry out its mandate. The King responded affirmatively on 6 November; the exchange of messages was transmitted by a letter of that date from Morocco to the Secretary-General.<sup>(11)</sup> The President of Algeria responded to a similar appeal from the OAU Chairman, dated 30 October, by stating that the 43-nation resolution of which it was a co-sponsor provided a legal and political basis for the United Nations to participate with OAU in the implementation of its decisions, emphasized negotiation between the parties and contained no substantive elements that might not win the occupying Power's agreement; the President's letter was transmitted to the Secretary-General by an Algerian letter of 6 November.<sup>(3)</sup>

The resolution adopted by the Assembly was introduced in the Fourth Committee by Mexico, which stated that it differed from the Assembly's 1980 resolution on the subject<sup>(16)</sup> in that it contained no specific condemnation of Morocco or call for troop withdrawal; its purpose was to seek consensus. The sponsors agreed that peace in north-west Africa was linked to the free and democratic expression of the will of the Western Sahara people concerning their future.

Kenya, introducing the decision on United Nations assistance to the Implementation Committee, said it was designed to make possible the co-operation envisaged by that Committee between the United Nations and OAU in organizing a referendum. Kenya added that the text was not controversial and had been accepted by the parties to the dispute.

Morocco reaffirmed its commitment to the organization of a self-determination referendum and its adherence to the conditions stipulated by the Implementation Committee for the referendum and the cease-fire. But it voted against the Assembly resolution, stating that the text would pre-empt the free and democratic choice of the people as well as the responsibility and mandate of OAU and its Implementation Committee. It would be anti-democratic to dictate in advance a particular attitude on the part of a people whose will was to be consulted in a referendum. The United Nations should observe strict neutrality; all that was needed was the decision proposed by Kenya. Morocco had no doubt about the validity of the process already completed in the Sahara in conformity with international rules on decolonization.

Those opposing the resolution, including Gabon, Senegal and the United States, argued that it did not correspond to the agreements reached by OAU in Nairobi, while Zaire thought it contained elements of discord. The United States considered that the text had precluded the desired consensus by attempting to prejudge the situation.

Explaining its abstention on the resolution, Austria regretted that OAU had not submitted its own resolution, including all agreed points; the resolution went beyond the agreement reached at Nairobi and introduced elements jeopardizing that consensus. Finland, France, the Sudan and Sweden also regarded the language as departing from OAU decisions. Norway said the resolution prejudged the peace process, and Nigeria expressed reservations because it did not reflect OAU decisions that the Implementation Committee was to conduct the referendum and that the cease-fire was to be held under its auspices.

Also abstaining, the Central African Republic thought the resolution would not facilitate the work of the Implementation Committee. Kenya cited its chairmanship of OAU and of the Implementation Committee as its reason for abstaining; it appealed for continued efforts at reconciliation between the parties. Jordan mentioned the appeal by the OAU Chairman in explaining its abstention. Tunisia abstained in order to safeguard the success of the Implementation Committee's initiatives.

Papua New Guinea announced it would not participate in the vote, stating that regional unity on Western Sahara should be encouraged.

Argentina and Fiji voted for the resolution, seeing no incompatibility between it and the decision introduced by Kenya.

Among the countries supporting that decision, France said it conformed to the OAU decision, which enjoyed the support of the parties. The United Kingdom, speaking on behalf of the European Community, supported the OAU decision since it paved the way for a peaceful solution enabling the people to exercise their right to self-determination through a referendum.

In the debate, Algeria contended that the cause of the conflict in Western Sahara was Morocco's refusal to grant self-determination to the people, under the direction of POLISARIO, their true representative; to propose a referendum organized by the occupying Power made a mockery of popular consultation and offended the honour of Africa. In Afghanistan's view, the people of Western Sahara, under the leadership of POLISARIO, were struggling to free themselves from colonialism and to end military occupation of their territory. Sao Tome and Principe said POLISARIO had been fighting for the self-determination of the Saharan people and their liberation from Moroccan colonial occupation. The right of the people of Western Sahara to self-determination was also supported by Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Fiji, India, Jordan, the USSR, Viet Nam and Yugoslavia.

Several of the speakers which supported the position of POLISARIO specifically endorsed the establishment (in 1976) of the Saharan Arab Democratic Republic, and some, including Angola, Chad and Viet Nam, announced that they had granted it diplomatic recognition.

Cape Verde stated that the first step towards a settlement should be an agreement between POLISARIO and Morocco to define cease-fire conditions. Cyprus appealed for a cease-fire, and deplored the non-implementation of the principle of self-determination and of United Nations and OAU resolutions. The Lao People's Democratic Republic favoured immediate talks on a cease-fire, in accordance with the wishes of OAU and POLISARIO. Zimbabwe called for negotiations without pre-conditions to bring about an immediate cease-fire; it added that independence under POLISARIO leadership was the only logical and realistic solution.

Afghanistan, Angola, Botswana, Cape Verde, Chad, Democratic Yemen, Mauritania, Mozambique and Seychelles were among those favouring negotiations between Morocco and POLISARIO. Madagascar regretted that Morocco refused to negotiate with POLISARIO, whose legitimacy was beyond question. Uganda appealed to the parties to co-operate fully with the Implementation Committee and to initiate negotiations.

Angola, Botswana, Democratic Yemen and Nicaragua urged Morocco to withdraw its troops from Saharan territory. Democratic Yemen regretted that some Arab States were pursuing regional hegemonism by occupying other Arab territories with the intention of building empires.

A number of States supported the holding of a referendum. The Comoros considered that Morocco's commitments to OAU on a referendum constituted an important step towards a solution. Mozambique said the referendum was not, as Morocco had claimed, a simple act of allegiance; it had to be organized by the Implementation Committee in co-operation with the United Nations and not by the Moroccan authorities. Zambia opposed Morocco's territorial expansionism and believed it was only through an internationally supervised referendum that Western Sahara could freely determine its destiny.

General support for the OAU initiatives on Western Sahara was voiced by a number of speakers, most of whom also favoured United Nations co-operation in measures to implement them. Among those making this point were Bangladesh, the Congo, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Guyana, India, Jamaica, Jordan, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malaysia, Mali, the Niger, Senegal, the Sudan, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunsia, Yugoslavia and Zaire. The Sudan added that the Assembly should not take any action which might undermine OAU efforts. The United States fully supported the OAU efforts to resolve the conflict on the basis of a cease-fire and a referendum, and said the United Nations should lend its full support to OAU and should recognize and endorse the agreement between the parties. In Gabon's view, since OAU efforts were under way to define the modalities for the referendum, the United Nations should simply furnish technical assistance.

Madagascar expressed particular satisfaction at the Implementation Committee's decision to establish an interim administration to organize the referendum and welcomed its decision on identifying eligible participants in the referendum (all Saharawis listed in the 1974 census who had attained the age of 18). Mauritania reiterated its absolute neutrality towards its Moroccan and Saharan brothers, while supporting the right of the Saharan people to self-determination; it added that the United Nations should reaffirm the OAU principles and that the Security Council should make recommendations to implement the Implementation Committee's decision.

The Fourth Committee heard two petitioners on Western Sahara, namely, Brahim Mokhtar of POLISARIO and Thomas Jallaud of the Association des Amis de la République Arabe Sahraouie Démocratique.<sup>(14)</sup> Morocco objected to hearing the petitioners on the ground that the Western Sahara question was in the process of solution by the Implementation Committee.

The POLISARIO representative stated that crimes committed by Moroccan occupying forces had forced tens of thousands of Saharan citizens into exile in Algeria, while others had been deported to Morocco. However, those forces were in control of only 10 per cent of the Territory, leaving the POLISARIO army in control of the rest. More than 50 countries had recognized the Saharan Arab Democratic Republic, including 26 African States—a majority of the members of OAU. Morocco had resorted to delaying tactics, seeking to apply a policy of military fait accompli. Negotiations between POLISARIO and Morocco were the means to peace but, until a cease-fire agreement was reached, the Western Sahara people had no choice but to fight in self-defence against Moroccan aggression.

Morocco, explaining its vote for the Assembly's resolution of 1 December<sup>(19)</sup> implementation of the 1960 Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,<sup>(15)</sup> said in regard to the provision whereby the Assembly approved the 1982 work programme of the Committee on colonial countries that Western Sahara did not fall within the Committee's competence.

Question of Western Sahara

At its 70th plenary meeting, on 24 November 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, decided, taking account of the resolution adopted by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity at its eighteenth ordinary session, held at Nairobi from 24 to 27 June 1981, by which it was decided, inter alia, to establish an Implementation Committee on Western Sahara, and the decision adopted by the Implementation Committee at its first ordinary session, held at Nairobi from 24 to 26 August 1981, to request the Secretary-General to give assistance, in consultation and co-operation with the Organization of African Unity, to the Implementation Committee in the discharge of its mandate regarding the question of Western Sahara arising from the above resolution and decision and to report thereon to the Assembly and the Security Council as appropriate.

Other United Kingdom-administered Territories in the Americas

ACTION BY THE COMMITTEE ON COLONIAL COUNTRIES. On 4 August 1981, the Committee on colonial countries adopted decisions on the British Virgin Islands, the Cayman Islands and Montserrat.<sup>(2)</sup> It took similar action with regard to Bermuda and the Turks and Caicos Islands on 13 August. These decisions, recommended by the Sub-Committee on Small Territories, contained provisions reaffirming the right of self-determination of peoples; reiterating that exercise of this right should not be delayed by circumstances such as size or location; urging the United Kingdom, as administering Power, to take measures to guarantee the people's right to own and dispose of their natural resources and control their development; welcoming the co-operation extended to the Committee by the United Kingdom; and calling on it to receive United Nations visiting missions at an appropriate time.

The decisions also included recommendations specific to each Territory, including the following:

Bermuda: Expressing hope that measures would be taken to foster national unity and identity, the Committee welcomed the proposal to establish a human rights commission. It reaffirmed its strong conviction that the presence of military bases in the Territory should not prevent the people from exercising their right to self-determination and independence. It urged greater efforts to diversify the economy, heavily dependent on tourism and international company business, and continued efforts at "bermudianization".

British Virgin Islands: The Committee welcomed the progressive "localization" of the public service and urged the administering Power to help implement the Territory's new development plan for 1980-1983.

Cayman Islands: Noting growth in tourism, property development and international finance, the Committee urged greater economic diversification, with the aim of self-sufficiency. It welcomed efforts to hasten the replacement of foreign personnel by Caymanians in local government, and noted that imminent constitutional changes had not been an issue in the election held in November 1980.

Montserrat: The Committee noted that the territorial Government was keeping economic and social development under periodic review in order to determine the timing for any changes in constitutional status. It noted also that efforts to expand and improve the economic infrastructure had continued and that the Territory no longer needed a grant-in-aid. At the same time, it called on the United Kingdom to mobilize financial, technical and material assistance.

Turks and Caicos Islands: The Committee endorsed the observations and conclusions of its Visiting Mission to observe the November 1980 elections.<sup>(5)</sup> It called on the administering Power to promote economic and social development and the training of personnel, and particularly to intensify its assistance programme, as well as to work with regional and international bodies to diversify the economy. It reaffirmed its strong conviction that the presence of military bases in the Territory should not prevent the people from exercising their right to self-determination and independence.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 25 November, the General Assembly adopted a resolution on the five Territories<sup>(4)</sup> by which it reaffirmed their right to self-determination and independence. It called on the United Kingdom, in consultation with the peoples' elected representatives, to diversify and strengthen the Territories' economies, work out concrete assistance programmes, safeguard the peoples' right to their natural resources, and continue to enlist assistance from the United Nations system in accelerating economic and social progress. Welcoming the positive attitude of the administering Power towards receiving visiting missions, it requested the Chairman of the Committee on colonial countries to continue consultations regarding the dispatch of future missions. The Assembly also recognized that the presence of military bases could constitute an impediment to decolonization, and reaffirmed that the presence of foreign military bases in Bermuda and the Turks and Caicos Islands should not prevent their peoples from exercising the right to self-determination and independence.

The resolution was adopted by 117 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, following its approval by the Fourth Committee on 23 November by a recorded vote of 131 to none. The sponsors were Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ethiopia and the Syrian Arab Republic.

The provision on military bases was incorporated into the text by a 12-nation amendment, which the Committee adopted by a recorded vote of 73 to 39, with 15 abstentions. It replaced a paragraph by which the Assembly would have recalled United Nations resolutions on military bases in Non-Self-Governing Territories (NSGTS), including those which maintained that the presence of such bases constituted a factor impeding decolonization, and would have reaffirmed the Assembly's strong conviction that the people of Bermuda and the Turks and Caicos Islands should not be prevented by that factor from exercising their right to self-determination and independence.

Madagascar proposed an amendment on military bases<sup>(1)</sup> which would have replaced the paragraph in the six-nation text with a paragraph recalling resolutions on military bases in NSGTS and endorsing the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on colonial countries. This was not put to the vote, however, after the Chairman ruled that the 12-nation amendment must be voted on first because it was farthest removed in substance from the original draft. Democratic Yemen and Madagascar appealed against the Chairman's ruling, but it was upheld by a vote of 66 to 37, with 10 abstentions.

Introducing the resolution, the Syrian Arab Republic said it reflected the consensus reached in the Committee on colonial countries and contained broad principles generally accepted by all Member States. Fiji, which introduced the 12-nation amendment, said the wording it sought to replace introduced an element of controversy; moreover, the documentation before the Fourth Committee did not suggest that the facilities in question were standing in the way of self-determination.

Much of the discussion on the military-bases clause reflected arguments in the Fourth Committee's general discussion of military bases in colonial Territories (p.1111), and with regard to a similar clause in an amendment to a draft resolution on Guam (p.1187).

Opposing the 12-nation amendment and supporting the original text, Cuba said the draft resolution used balanced language which the Committee on colonial countries had adopted after months of consultations. Czechoslovakia, India and Yugoslavia said the amendment did not correspond to the consensus in that Committee. Military bases in the Caribbean and elsewhere could pave the way for the launching of attacks, said the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. Nigeria thought the amendment tried to create the impression that foreign military bases might not constitute an impediment to independence; however, the original text was also defective because it created the impression that bases would have that effect in all cases. The USSR stated that military bases should be removed to allow the peoples of colonial Territories to exercise self-determination freely. Viet Nam said the bases existed solely to benefit the administering Powers that had installed them. Others opposing or expressing reservations on the 12-nation amendment were Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, the German Democratic Republic, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia, Sao Tome and Principe, and the Syrian Arab Republic.

Trinidad and Tobago, which abstained in the vote on the amendment, said it could not go back on the decision it had supported in the Committee on colonial countries.

Supporting the amendment were Australia and Denmark, the latter on behalf of the five Nordic States; they said it was important to maintain the Fourth Committee's normal procedure of approving resolutions on small NSGTs by consensus, and no consensus could be reached without the amendment. Jordan considered that the administering Power had been remarkably co-operative with the Committee on colonial countries regarding the Caribbean Territories; it also felt that the principle of consensus must be safeguarded. New Zealand stated that there was no evidence to suggest that the presence of military bases in Bermuda or the Turks and Caicos Islands was impeding progress towards self-determination, nor had the people in those Territories expressed any concerns in that regard. Sri Lanka was dissatisfied with the original text since it implied that military bases in NSGTs constituted in themselves an impediment to decolonization; the presence of British military installations in Sri Lanka had not impeded its accession to independence.

The United Kingdom said there were very small facilities in Bermuda and the Turks and Caicos Islands which existed at the wish of the territorial Governments; it was ridiculous to suggest that they stood in the way of self-determination. The United States said its base and telemetry station in the Turks and Caicos Islands was operated primarily by civilian personnel and had only one air force officer; in Bermuda, the United States maintained two small naval air stations which made a major contribution to the local economy in payments for services, employment and improvements in the local airfield, also used for commercial flights.

Bulgaria said the United States military bases in the Turks and Caicos Islands had been established pursuant to a decision taken by the United Kingdom, not by the people of the islands. Czechoslovakia called for the immediate dismantling of the bases in Bermuda and the Turks and Caicos Islands, while the German Democratic Republic affirmed that those bases prevented the peoples from exercising their rights.

Favouring the Madagascar amendment, Democratic Yemen said it had not really attained independence until the last British soldier in a military base on its territory had been withdrawn. Senegal, however, felt that the amendment might cause confusion, since the decisions taken by the Committee on colonial countries in 1980 and 1981 seemed contradictory on the question of military bases.

Speaking generally of the Territories under its administration, the United Kingdom stated that it would encourage them to accede to independence if that was their wish, but they would not be forced into any constitutional status which did not satisfy their right to self-determination. The United Kingdom agreed with the Committee on colonial countries that the most helpful way of achieving a first-hand awareness of the situation was to send visiting missions to dependent Territories, such as the 1980 mission to observe general elections in the Turks and Caicos Islands.

Trinidad and Tobago saw a pressing need for more action to increase the islands' viability and to combat problems caused by scarce natural resources, unfavourable trade terms, inadequate development finance, high unemployment and under-developed infrastructure.

The Fourth Committee granted a request for a hearing to W. G. Brown of the Bermuda Constitutional Conference,<sup>(3)</sup> but the petitioner did not appear.

Question of Bermuda, the British Virgin Islands, the Cayman Islands, Montserrat and the Turks and Caicos Islands

The General Assembly,

Having considered the question of Bermuda, the British Virgin Islands, the Cayman Islands, Montserrat and the Turks and Caicos Islands.

Having examined the relevant chapters of the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

Recalling its resolution 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960, containing the Declaration on the Granting of independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, and all other resolution and decisions of the United Nations relating to the Territories listed above,

Taking into account the statement of the administering Power relating to the Territories listed above,

Noting that the administering Power has expressed its willingness to respect the wishes of the peoples of the Territories under its administration regarding their future constitutional status and reiterating that it is the obligation of the administering Power to create such conditions in those territories as will enable the peoples thereof to exercise freely and without interference their inalienable right to self-determination and independence, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514(XV) as well as other relevant resolutions of the Assembly,

Conscious of the need to ensure the full and speedy implementation of the Declaration in respect of the Territories concerned,

Aware of the special circumstances of the geographical location and economic conditions of the Territories concerned and bearing in mind the necessity of diversifying and strengthening further their economies as a matter of priority in order to promote economic stability,

1. Approves the chapters of the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples relating to Bermuda, the British Virgin Islands, the Cayman Islands, Montserrat and the Turks and Caicos Islands;

4. Calls upon the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, as the administering Power, in consultation with the freely elected representatives of the peoples of the Territories concerned, to continue to take all the necessary steps to ensure the full and speedy attainment of the goals set forth in the Charter of the United Nations and in the Declaration in respect of the Territories;

5. Recognizes that the presence of military bases and other Installations could constitute an impediment to the implementation of the Declaration and reaffirms its conviction that the presence of foreign military bases and installations in Bermuda and the Turks and Caicos Islands should not prevent the peoples of those Territories from exercising their right to self-determination and independence in accordance with the Declaration and the purposes and principles of the Charter;

6. Calls upon the administering Power, in consultation with the freely elected representatives of the peoples of the Territories concerned, to take all possible steps to diversify and strengthen further the economies of those Territories and to work out concrete programmes of assistance and economic development;

7. Further calls upon the administering Power, in cooperation with the freely elected representatives of the peoples of the Territories concerned, to safeguard the inalienable right of the peoples of those Territories to the enjoyment of their natural resources by taking effective measures which ensure the right of the peoples to own and dispose of those resources and to establish and maintain control over their future development;

8. Requests the administering Power to continue to enlist the assistance of the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system in accelerating progress in all sectors of the social and economic life of the Territories concerned;

Chapter I

International Court of Justice

Three contentious cases and a request for an advisory opinion were before the International Court of Justice in 1981.

The Court held public sittings in September and October on the Continental Shelf (Tunisia/Libyan Arab Jamahiriya), after deciding in April not to grant a request by Malta to intervene in the case (see below). In May, it recorded the discontinuance of the case on United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (United States of America v. Iran), following an agreement between the parties (p. 1202). In November, Canada and the United States notified the Court that they had agreed to place before it a case on Delimitation of the Maritime Boundary in the Gulf of Maine Area (p. 1202). An advisory opinion was requested in July on an Application for Review of Judgement No. 273 of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal, concerning the payment of a repatriation grant to a United Nations staff member on separation from service (p. 1202).

Two Judges were re-elected and three new ones elected to the Court for terms beginning in February 1982 (p. 1203). The Court's President, Sir Humphrey Waldock (United Kingdom), was one of two Judges who died during the year.

Judicial work of the Court

Continental shelf delimitation between the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Tunisia

At a meeting with the President of the International Court of Justice on 2 February 1981, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Tunisia exchanged Counter-Memorials in the case concerning the delimitation of the continental shelf between them. The dispute had been referred to the Court under the terms of a Special Agreement drawn up by the disputing parties in 1977 and submitted to the Court in 1978<sup>(3)</sup> and 1979.<sup>(4)</sup> Memorials (initial written pleadings) submitted by each State were filed with the Court and exchanged between the parties in May 1980.<sup>(5)</sup>

At public sittings from 19 to 23 March 1981, arguments were presented on behalf of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malta and Tunisia regarding a request by Malta, made on 30 January, for permission to intervene in the two-party dispute. Malta made this request under Article 62 of the Court's Statute (see APPENDIX II), which states that the Court may decide on a request submitted by a State which considers that it has an interest of a legal nature that may be affected by the decision in the case. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Tunisia objected to the request.

On 14 April, the Court delivered a Judgment<sup>(1)</sup> by which it decided unanimously that Malta's request to intervene could not be granted. It noted that Malta's interest of a legal nature related essentially to any findings of the Court that might identify and assess the physical factors relevant to the delimitation of the continental shelf and to any pronouncements the Court might make regarding this, such as the significance of special circumstances. Malta's emphasis that it was not concerned with the choice of a particular line of delimitation or the establishment of general principles between the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Tunisia implied that the legal interest in question would concern matters that might be directly at issue between the parties, yet Malta had plainly stated that it did not intend to submit its own interest in matters to be decided between itself and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya or Tunisia.

The Court found, therefore, that the character of the intervention sought showed that Malta's interest of a legal nature could not be considered as one that might be affected by the decision in the case. To allow such intervention would leave the parties uncertain as to how far they should consider their own separate interests vis-à-vis Malta's involvement. In the view of the Court, a State seeking to intervene under Article 62 of the Statute was not entitled to place the parties to the case in such a position.

Judges Platon D. Morozov (USSR), Shigeru Oda (Japan) and Stephen M. Schwebel (United States appended separate opinions to the Judgment.

On 16 April, in response to the requests of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Tunisia to submit additional pleadings as envisaged in their Special Agreement, the President of the Court fixed 15 July as the final date for the filing of replies.<sup>(2)</sup> After the filing of these replies within the specified time-limit, the Court held 24 sittings, from 16 September to 21 October, at which oral arguments were presented on behalf of the two parties.

United States diplomats in Iran (United States v. Iran)

By an Order of 12 May 1981, the President of the International Court of Justice recorded the discontinuance of the case of the United States diplomatic and consular staff in Teheran (United States v. Iran), following an agreement between the parties, and directed that the case be removed from the Court's list.<sup>(1)</sup>

Proceedings against Iran had been instituted by the United States in 1979 following the seizure of the United States Embassy in the Iranian capital, and the Court made an Order indicating preliminary measures, including the release of United States nationals detained in Iran.<sup>(2)</sup> In a Judgment of May 1980, the Court reserved its decision on the form and amount of reparation to be made by Iran.<sup>(3)</sup> By letters of 6 April and 1 May 1981, the United States informed the Court that, in view of commitments entered into by the two States at Algiers, Algeria, on 19 January, it wished all pending proceedings relating to its claims for reparation to be discontinued. The Government of Iran made no observation on the letters.

Following the release of the detained personnel, the United States informed the Secretary-General, by a letter of 19 January, that it considered that Iran had complied fully with the Court's 1980 Judgment (p. 239).

Maritime boundary delimitation between Canada and the United States

On 25 November 1981, Canada and the United States notified the Court of a Special Agreement, concluded by them on 29 March 1979 and in force as at 20 November 1981, by which they had decided to submit to the Court a question on delimitation of the maritime boundary in the Gulf of Maine area dividing their fisheries zones and continental shelves. According to the Agreement, a five-member chamber was to be constituted after consultation with the two States in accordance with Article 26 of the Court's Statute (see APPENDIX II). In a letter from both parties accompanying the submission of the case, the Court was also notified that Canada intended to choose a judge ad hoc to sit in the case, in accordance with Article 31 of the Statute.

In a letter of 18 December, the President requested the parties to provide further explanations or clarifications on several points.

Review of a judgement by the UN Administrative Tribunal

On 13 July 1981, the General Assembly's Committee on Applications for Review of Administrative Tribunal Judgements decided<sup>(4)</sup> to request the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion in regard to Judgement No. 273, delivered by the Tribunal in Geneva on 15 May in the case of Ivor Peter Mortished v. the Secretary-General.

By its judgement,<sup>(1)</sup> the Tribunal determined that the applicant in the case, Mr. Mortished, was entitled, by invoking an acquired right, to receive a repatriation grant under a provision of the Staff Rules which was no longer in force on the date of his separation from the United Nations Secretariat. The former rule provided for payment of a repatriation grant to all qualifying staff members, without requiring evidence of where they planned to settle following completion of United Nations service. This had been revised effective 1 January 1980 by a provision in a 1979 General Assembly resolution that no staff member would be entitled to any part of the grant unless evidence was provided of relocation away from the country of the last duty station.<sup>(5)</sup> The Tribunal ordered payment of compensation in the amount of the repatriation grant to which Mr. Mortished would have been entitled without evidence of relocation.

The question put to the Court by the Committee, on an application by the United States, was whether the Tribunal's judgement was warranted in determining that the Assembly resolution could not be given immediate effect in requiring, for the payment of repatriation grants, evidence of relocation to a country other than the country of the staff member's last duty station.

After the Court received the Committee's request on 28 July, the President, by an Order of 6 August,<sup>(2)</sup> fixed a time-limit of 30 October for the submission of written statements by the United Nations and its Member States. The time-limit was extended to 30 November by an Order of 8 October.<sup>(3)</sup> Statements were received from France and the United States, as well as from the United Nations on behalf of Mr. Mortished.

Election of Judges

On 15 January 1981, the General Assembly and the Security Council held elections to fill vacancies in the International Court of Justice created by the deaths in 1980 of Judges Richard R. Baxter (United States) and Salah El Dine Tarazi (Syrian Arab Republic). Voting independently, they elected Stephen M. Schwebel (United States) to complete Judge Baxter's term of office, due to expire on 5 February 1988, and Abdallah Fikri El-Khani (Syrian Arab Republic) to complete Judge Tarazi's term, due to expire on 5 February 1985.<sup>(6)</sup>

The President of the Court, Sir Humphrey Waldock (United Kingdom), died on 15 August 1981. Following consultations among Security Council members, the Council President informed the Secretary-General, by a note verbale of 25 August,<sup>(4)</sup> that the Council saw no purpose in holding a special election to fill the resulting vacancy, as Sir Humphrey's seat was one of the five to be filled in the triennial elections to be held during the Assembly's 1981 regular session.

On 5 November, the Assembly and the Council, voting independently, elected five Judges for a nine-year term of office to replace the five whose terms were due to expire on 5 February 1982. On the basis of a list of 14 candidates nominated by national groups,<sup>(1)</sup> together with their curricula vitae,<sup>(2)</sup> Judges Nagendra Singh (India) and José Maria Ruda (Argentina) were re-elected, and Sir Robert Y. Jennings (United Kingdom), Guy Ladreit de Lacharrière (France) and Kéba M'Baye (Senegal) were elected to replace Sir Humphrey Waldock, André Gros (France) and Isaac Forster (Senegal).<sup>(7)</sup>

Judge Abdullah Ali El-Erian (Egypt) died on 12 December.<sup>(3)</sup> The Security Council, by a resolution prepared in consultations among Council members and adopted unanimously on 21 December, decided that elections to fill the vacancy would take place at meetings of the Council and of the resumed thirty-sixth session of the Assembly.<sup>(5)</sup> When suspending its thirty-sixth session on 18 December, the Assembly included this matter in the list of items to be considered at the resumed session.

The Security Council,

Noting with regret the death of Judge Abdullah El-Erian on 12 December 1981.

Noting further that a vacancy in the international Court of Justice for the remainder of the term of office of the deceased judge has thus occurred and must be filled in accordance with the terms of the Statute of the Court,

Noting that, in accordance with Article 14 of the Statute, the date of the elections to fill this vacancy shall be fixed by the Security Council, Decides that elections to fill the vacancy shall take place at a meeting of the Security Council and at a meeting of the General Assembly at its resumed thirty-sixth session.

Report of the International Court of Justice

At its 103rd plenary meeting, on 17 December 1981, the General Assembly took note of the report of the International Court of Justice.

Chapter II

Legal aspects of international political relations

During 1981, the General Assembly acted to ensure that work would progress on a number of legal texts designed to improve various aspects of international political relations. It decided that work should continue towards drafting a world treaty on the non-use of force in international relations;<sup>(1)</sup> requested finalization of the text known as the draft Manila declaration on the peaceful settlement of disputes;<sup>(5)</sup> invited the International Law Commission (ILC) to resume work on the 1954 draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind;<sup>(3)</sup> decided that the drafting of an international convention against mercenaries should continue;<sup>(2)</sup> and recommended that ILC carry on drafting articles on the law of the non-navigational uses of international watercourses (p. 1222).<sup>(6)</sup>

The ongoing issue of international terrorism was also addressed by the Assembly when it re-endorsed recommendations to eliminate the problem.<sup>(4)</sup>

Other aspects of international peace and security were also dealt with by the Assembly in 1981. It adopted a Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention and Interference in the Internal Affairs of States; considered the implementation of the 1970 Declaration on international security and the 1978 Declaration on societies and peace; sought to develop good-neighbourliness between States; and reviewed the Organization's peace-keeping operations (p. 140).

Non-use of force

In 1981, the General Assembly decided that its Special Committee on Enhancing the Effectiveness of the Principle of Non-Use of Force in International Relations should continue drafting a world treaty on that principle. However, opinions remained divided among Member States regarding the treaty's desirability and on the Committee's mandate.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION. Responding to a 1980 General Assembly resolution,<sup>(5)</sup> the 35-member Special Committee on Enhancing the Effectiveness of the Principle of Non-Use of Force in International Relations-established in 1977<sup>(4)</sup> to consider suggestions towards drafting a world treaty on that principle-met at United Nations Headquarters from 23 March to 17 April 1981 and submitted a report on its work to the Assembly.<sup>(1)</sup>

The Committee had before it a draft world treaty on the non-use of force submitted in 1976 by the USSR;<sup>(8)</sup> a working paper put forward in 1979 by Belgium, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy and the United Kingdom;<sup>(9)</sup> and a 1980 working paper from 10 non-aligned countries (Benin, Cyprus, Egypt, India, Iraq, Morocco, Nepal, Nicaragua, Senegal, Uganda).<sup>(10)</sup> Also before the Committee were comments by Algeria, Brazil, Mexico, Romania, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, and Suriname, submitted in reply to a renewed invitation by the Assembly in 1980 for States' observations.<sup>(5)</sup> These comments, as well as those of Czechoslovakia, were forwarded to the Assembly by the Secretary-General in September 1981.<sup>(2)</sup>

The Committee re-established a Working Group open to all Committee members-which held 12 meetings between 1 and 13 April-to resume consideration of the working paper submitted by the non-aligned States. The Group, which had the same officers as the Committee, discussed the paper and, on 13 April, received a revised text from the same States; many delegations refrained from comment due to time constraints.

The revised text defined the use or threat of force, prohibited its use or threat, listed its various forms and set forth the principle of non-recognition of the consequences that ensued from the use or threat of force. The text also elaborated the responsibilities of the United Nations for the maintenance of peace and security and the duty of States to assist the Organization; dealt with exceptions where force was justified; and covered the principles needed to create an atmosphere of trust.

According to the sponsors, the revised text dealt with the substance of the issue and left aside, for the time being, the question of the form of the instrument to be prepared. The text was not final, nor intended to replace the two other proposals, but was designed to aid the process of dialogue.

The Committee approved the Working Group's report on 17 April but, since the Committee had not completed its work, it generally recognized the desirability of further consideration of the questions before it. While the majority favoured renewing the Committee's mandate, some members did not; others thought that it should be reviewed.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 13 November, the General Assembly adopted a resolution<sup>(6)</sup> on the Special Committee's report, by which it decided that the Committee should continue work on drafting, as soon as possible, a world treaty on the non-use of force in international relations as well as the peaceful settlement of disputes or any other recommendations as it deemed appropriate. The Committee was requested to consider thoroughly all proposals submitted to it for that purpose and invited to report to the Assembly in 1982. The Assembly also invited other comments from Governments.

The resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 113 to 15, with 10 abstentions. On 21 October, the Sixth (Legal) Committee had approved the draft, sponsored by 31 States and introduced by Mongolia, by a recorded vote of 87 to 15, with 9 abstentions.

The non-use of force in international relations was also among the duties of States defined in the Assembly's Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention and Interference in the Internal Affairs of States, adopted on 9 December.<sup>(7)</sup> It was defined as the duty of States to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any form to violate another State's boundaries, disrupt its political, social or economic order, overthrow or change its political system, cause international tension or deprive peoples of their national identity and cultural heritage.

The Special Committee Chairman, introducing that body's report in the Sixth Committee, said some progress had been achieved in 1981 although the philosophical approaches to the topic had not changed. Some States felt it unnecessary to add to the Charter of the United Nations, since Article 2, paragraph 4, prohibited the use of force in international relations. Others believed that the Charter required further elaboration and that a world treaty on the non-use of force was necessary. Many States had urged focusing on the problem of enhancing the effectiveness of the principle of non-use of force, without deciding for the time being on the nature of the document to be finalized. In that spirit, a number of non-aligned States had submitted useful proposals in 1980 and 1981 to clarify and develop the Charter's provisions on the subject, the Chairman said.

A number of States explained their opposition to the proposed treaty, with several, including France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States, pointing out that the prohibition of the use of force already figured in Article 2 (4) of the Charter. These States, together with China, generally saw the revised text submitted by the non-aligned countries as a basis for the Special Committee's future work but were unable to accept all the principles enunciated.

For Canada, the solution to violations of the non-use of force did not lie in restating principles, but in a study of means that could be used to strengthen United Nations machinery for maintenance of peace and security. The Netherlands said Assembly declarations contained sufficient guidance on the non-use of force; it favoured other approaches such as more active United Nations work to reduce tensions. Japan said that, since not all Member States would become parties to the treaty, discrepancies would arise relating to obligations, thereby leading to conflicts. France cautioned that a smaller number of parties would restrict the scope of a Charter rule which it regarded as an obligation valid for all States in all circumstances. Italy said that the text of the proposed treaty overlooked the indissoluble link between the principle of non-use of force and that of peaceful settlement of disputes—a point also stressed by the Federal Republic of Germany and Japan. The United States felt that, if a treaty reproduced Charter provisions, it would undermine the binding nature of existing Charter obligations; if it departed from those provisions, the treaty would create differences of interpretation; and if it differed materially from the Charter, it would be an improper attempt to circumvent provisions relating to Charter amendments. Japan and Sweden spoke in like manner. Sweden added that, although it could support a text on ways to improve collective security and promote peaceful settlement of disputes, it could not accept legalizing armed struggle.

China rejected the 1976 USSR draft as an attempt to cover up that country's illegal use of force.

Those which spoke in favour of elaborating a treaty, including the Eastern European States and several of the draft resolution's sponsors, said the USSR draft and a number of provisions contained in the non-aligned countries' revised working paper provided sufficient basis for preparing a document in accordance with the will of the majority. The USSR said recent developments in international relations, including increased armed conflicts, had rendered more obvious the need to prepare a world treaty based on its draft, taking account of the other papers.

Algeria, Bangladesh, the Congo, Democratic Yemen, Ghana, Nigeria, Suriname, Tunisia,

Yemen, Zaire and Zambia were among those which saw the revised working paper as the foundation for future work in the Special Committee. The Syrian Arab Republic said that paper's definition of the non-use of force was clearer than that contained in the Charter.

Afghanistan, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Hungary, Nicaragua, Peru, Viet Nam, Yemen and Zambia believed that a treaty would be a step towards improving the universal political climate and maintaining international peace and security. Uruguay said it supported any initiative which reaffirmed the principles of peaceful coexistence. Argentina and Chile spoke in like manner.

Hungary, Mexico, Suriname, Venezuela and Zaire favoured elaborating Charter Article 2 (4) through codification of the principle of non-use of force in a treaty. Kuwait spoke in similar vein. Somalia said that principle was the corner-stone of international relations which could not, however, stand isolated. Guyana believed a world treaty would not only be a definitive elaboration of Article 2 (4), but would also clarify the application of Article 51 on the right of self-defence. Afghanistan pointed out that Article 13 envisaged progressive development of international law and its codification. The Ukrainian SSR spoke in like manner. Romania believed the principle of peaceful settlement of disputes was closely linked to the non-use of force but, since the two were distinct, they should be codified separately. Bulgaria said it was time for the Special Committee to elaborate a legal instrument. Chile said it would support any such instrument the Committee might adopt provided it was not used as propaganda to achieve contrary objectives. Algeria, Bangladesh and Uganda said a treaty would supplement, not infringe on, Charter provisions. Tunisia believed a treaty would help ensure compliance with Charter principles, while Ecuador said the Charter's effectiveness would be enhanced. Jamaica pointed out that, in the event of a treaty conflicting with the Charter, Article 103 of the latter document stipulated that the Charter would prevail. Madagascar said it was essential, in elaborating a treaty, not to disregard the contribution of the non-aligned countries, which had produced a corpus of the norms and rules of conduct on international relations based on peaceful coexistence.

Mexico, although not opposed to an international treaty, favoured exploring other possibilities, such as a declaration by the General Assembly, a suggestion also supported by Jamaica. For the Congo, a declaration would not be satisfactory since there already existed a Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.

Egypt, joined by Cyprus, India and Morocco in stressing that the working paper was not final, hoped that a synthesis of the other papers would be made. The Bahamas also felt points commanding general agreement should be identified. Brazil believed it would be useful to compile a comparative table showing all papers and Governments' written comments. Such a comparison was also suggested by the Byelorussian SSR, the Ukrainian SSR and Yugoslavia. Cuba thought the USSR text and that of the non-aligned countries should be analysed and combined. Pakistan called for a study of the replies received from Member States before any decision was taken on whether to finalize a draft treaty. Sierra Leone proposed that all instruments regulating the use of force in international relations should be compiled and examined in the light of contemporary relations.

Several States, including Algeria, Iraq and the Ukrainian SSR, said they could not understand arguments against the proposed instrument and believed that the real problem was a lack of political will.

Opposition to the Special Committee's mandate was expressed by a number of delegations. The member States of the European Community (EC) thought it was not clear. The United Kingdom said it gave too much prominence to a world treaty. Australia and Japan felt the mandate should be changed and the latter suggested deleting the reference to drafting a treaty and limiting the Committee to making recommendations. Albania, speaking in the Assembly and not participating in either vote, said it was against renewing the mandate since no satisfactory results could be achieved because the Special Committee's activities were being hindered by the super-Powers.

Iraq expressed surprise that the Special Committee's mandate continued to be questioned when it represented a compromise, sufficiently flexible to allow the Committee to continue its substantive work. Thailand believed the mandate should be broader and not necessarily limited to culminating in a world treaty. Finland thought it appropriate that the Committee had considered ways of promoting peaceful settlement of disputes. Algeria and Brazil felt the mandate should be more specific. Egypt, the German Democratic Republic and the Syrian Arab Republic also urged its extension so that the draft treaty might be concluded as soon as possible. Speaking similarly, Mongolia pointed out that the majority of Committee members were genuinely interested in fulfilling the mandate. Turkey, not sharing some positions in the non-aligned countries' paper, felt the mandate should be extended in order to explore the reasons for the frequent use of force in international relations—a point also voiced by Sierra Leone. Argentina, though not opposed to an extension, said it would be surprising if a draft were to be accepted since many Special Committee members lacked the will to accept a text they had not sponsored. Ecuador and Romania said the Committee should be careful not to overlap the work of others.

A large number of States supported extension of the mandate of the Special Committee and efforts to secure observance of the principle of non-use of force but stressed the need to concentrate on substantive work, leaving a decision on the nature of the instrument to be prepared to the future. Such a view was expressed by, among others, Brazil, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Morocco, Nepal, Peru, the Syrian Arab Republic, Turkey, Yugoslavia and Zaire.

A number of States explained their votes in the Sixth Committee.

Speaking for the 10 members of EC, which had either voted negatively or abstained, the United Kingdom said they could not support the draft because it emphasized the treaty's early conclusion, which would weaken fundamental Charter provisions—a position also voiced by Norway<sup>1</sup> and Spain to explain their negative votes. Israel and Japan, voting against, said that, since there had been no changes of substance in the text, there was no reason to modify their previous positions. The United States saw the draft as of little use and harmful.

China abstained since the text did not sufficiently reflect the need for the Special Committee to base its work on the non-aligned countries' revised working paper. Australia, also abstaining, pointed out that the draft had not changed the Special Committee's mandate.

Tunisia stressed that its vote in favour did not imply support for any political position. Brazil, voting likewise, said the text gave hope that the Committee might attend to positive work.

Dispute settlement

Work continued in 1981 on a draft declaration on the peaceful settlement of disputes, with first the General Assembly's Special Committee on the Charter of the United Nations and on the Strengthening of the Role of the Organization and then its Sixth Committee formulating parts of the text, elements of which were not finally agreed upon. The Assembly, therefore, requested the Special Committee to finalize the draft and submit it to the Assembly in 1982.

CONSIDERATION BY THE COMMITTEE ON THE CHARTER. The peaceful settlement of international disputes was one of two main questions considered by the 47-member Committee on the Charter at its 1981 session, held at United Nations Headquarters from 17 February to 14 March. The other topic was a list of proposals regarding the maintenance of international peace and security (p. 1235). In May, the Committee submitted its report on these questions to the General Assembly.<sup>(1)</sup>

A Working Group, open to all Committee members and established to consider both questions, had before it several papers which had been submitted to the Committee's 1980 (Manila, Philippines) session but were not examined due to lack of time.<sup>(9)</sup> These documents were: a second revised draft declaration on the peaceful settlement of disputes-known as the draft Manila declaration-presented by Egypt, El Salvador, Ghana, Indonesia, Nigeria, the Philippines, Romania, Sierra Leone and Tunisia; a United States working paper containing a questionnaire to Member States on why they were not fully using existing machinery for peaceful settlement; and a proposed outline, by France, of a handbook on the peaceful settlement of disputes which covered a definition of various settlement methods, legal instruments containing commitments to such settlement, advance and ad hoc commitments, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, the enforcement of the award and recourse procedures.

In elaborating the draft Manila declaration, the Working Group based its deliberations on: the 1980 second revised version, taking into account oral suggestions made at the Manila session; the report of the Working Group on the Peaceful Settlement of Disputes, established by the Assembly's Sixth Committee in 1980 to work towards a declaration; and proposals made in that Committee's 1980 debate.

The Group reached general agreement on the paragraphs on peaceful settlement by regional arrangements or agencies, on the duty to refrain from any action which might aggravate the situation and make peaceful settlement more difficult, and on prohibiting the use or threat of force by parties to a dispute.

Other paragraphs generally agreed upon in principle included those on the duty to settle international disputes by peaceful means, on the principle of free choice of means of peaceful settlement and its relationship with the sovereign equality of States, on the means of such settlement, on referral of the dispute to the Security Council in case of failure of previous peaceful means, and on special agreements or treaty provisions for peaceful settlement.

Although general agreement was also reached on the paragraph on implementing in good faith all aspects of agreed terms of settlement, alternative formulations were proposed.

No agreement was reached on three paragraphs referring to principles to be observed, international tribunals, and liberation movements.

Concerning the principles to be observed in dispute settlement, some States considered it imprudent and irrelevant to list them in a paragraph, while others considered such a paragraph indispensable and called for its improvement by devising appropriate wording for each principle. Still others felt it preferable to replace entirely the enunciation of principles by a reference to those in the 1970 Declaration on friendly relations,<sup>(4)</sup> a reference which, in the view of yet others, should be supplemented by a phrase, "and other pertinent resolutions of the General Assembly".

As to the paragraph stressing the importance of international tribunals as a means of peaceful settlement, some States supported its retention while others maintained that it was incorrect and at odds with the principle of free choice of means. Among those States defending the paragraph, there were also differing views. One proposed new wording to limit its scope to States parties to treaties establishing such tribunals while others proposed drafting changes.

On the applicability of the declaration to certain peoples exercising their right to self-determination and independence, some States opposed this paragraph; they felt its subject-matter was unrelated to the declaration's purposes since the status of liberation movements and States differed entirely. Others, citing recent history, supported inclusion of the paragraph on the ground that such movements could be involved in a dispute threatening international peace and security; nevertheless, the text should be reworded so as to refer to peoples subjected to colonial or racist domination or apartheid and mentioned in the 1970 Declaration on friendly relations rather than to authentic representatives of a people recognized by the respective regional organization and by the United Nations. It was also proposed that the paragraph cover hegemonism as well as peoples subjected to any other form of alien domination, that it clearly state with regard to the aforementioned category of peoples their inalienable right to participate fully and equally in any process of peaceful settlement of disputes to which they were parties, and that it be drafted in a negative form and refer first to peoples generally and then particularly to those subjected to colonial or racist domination or apartheid.

No general agreement was reached on a proposal aimed at encouraging States to use direct negotiations more frequently to settle disputes peacefully.

In the section on the role of the United Nations, two paragraphs were generally agreed upon in principle: that stressing States' duty to make use of United Nations Charter provisions on pacific settlement of disputes, and that dealing with the attitude of States vis-à-vis recommendations of the General Assembly and the Security Council concerning such settlement.

Although there was also general agreement on retaining the paragraph on the Assembly's role in the peaceful settlement of disputes, broad differences existed as to the paragraph's exact scope. One view maintained that the original text was not fully in line with the Charter's general structure, particularly the relationship between the Assembly and the Council in peaceful dispute settlement. It was held that the text was a political appeal to increase the Assembly's role in settling disputes and should be reformulated in strict accordance with the Charter. Another view was that this paragraph accurately reflected the balance between the powers of the two bodies since the draft declaration followed the Charter's order of reference, which enunciated first in Articles 11, 12 and 14 the Assembly's role and only afterwards, in Chapter VI, explained the Council's role; changing that order would disregard the Charter's structure. A further viewpoint was that, although the Assembly had residual power or secondary responsibility in peaceful settlement if the Council failed to exercise responsibility, it was not for the Assembly to act.

The remaining paragraphs on the United Nations role were not considered by the Working Group for lack of time. Neither were the preamble and provisions of the section on final clauses, although proposals were presented on those provisions. However, there was general agreement that the text of the paragraph on the principle of exhaustion of local remedies should be included in the preamble and that safeguard clauses on the lawful uses of force in accordance with the Charter and on the rights and duties of States and the functions and powers of United Nations organs under the Charter should be put in the final clauses section.

In view of the progress made on the draft Manila declaration, the Special Committee suggested that the Assembly establish a Working Group to finalize the text.

SIXTH COMMITTEE WORKING GROUP CONSIDERATION. Acting on the Special Committee's suggestion, the Assembly's Sixth Committee established a Working Group which held 15 meetings between 1 October and 27 November.<sup>(3)</sup> The Group started where the Special Committee's Working Group had left off.

Concerning the section on the United Nations role, the Group worked out three paragraphs. There was general agreement on the role of the Security Council in dispute settlement. This text stated that Member States should strengthen the Council's role and be fully aware of their obligation to refer to it disputes not settled by other means. It invited them to encourage the Council to review situations likely to endanger international peace and security and to hold informal consultations; to consider making greater use of the Council's fact-finding capacity; to encourage the Council to consider the increased use of observer and other missions with the consent of the State concerned; to bear in mind the Council's power to recommend appropriate procedures or methods of adjustment; and to encourage it to act without delay, particularly in cases where disputes developed into armed conflicts.

Regarding the paragraph dealing with the role of the International Court of Justice, only two subparagraphs were worked out. General agreement was reached on a reference to States' adding to treaties clauses providing for the submission to the Court of disputes arising from the interpretation or application of such treaties. It was agreed that legal disputes should as a general rule be referred to the Court since it was the United Nations' Principal judicial organ.

In the paragraph dealing with the role of the Secretary-General, the Group agreed on wording referring to his right to bring to the Security Council's attention any matter which, in his opinion, might threaten international peace and security. However, no agreement was reached on language to encourage the Secretary-General to make full use of his office's authority, acquire information, ascertain facts, visit States with their consent and report to the Council or the Assembly on measures thus taken.

On the section on final provisions, the Group worked out and generally agreed on five paragraphs: compliance in good faith with the declaration's provisions, safeguards on Charter provisions and States' rights and duties, safeguards on the rights of peoples under colonial and racist domination, the desirability of a general treaty on peaceful settlement, and the need for further efforts on peaceful settlement codification.

The Group also worked out the declaration's preamble, consisting of 12 paragraphs, three of which were not agreed upon.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 10 December, the General Assembly adopted a resolution<sup>(a)</sup> by which it called again on States to settle their international disputes by peaceful means and requested the Special Committee to finalize the draft Manila declaration for the Assembly's consideration and adoption, and to submit it to the Assembly's 1982 regular session.

The resolution was adopted without vote. On 1 December, the Sixth Committee had approved the draft, sponsored by 41 States and introduced by Romania, in the same manner.

The Assembly reiterated its request to the Special Committee in an 11 December resolution on that body's work<sup>(7)</sup> and also asked the Committee to continue considering proposals it had listed in 1979.<sup>(8)</sup>

The question of dispute settlement was considered by the Sixth Committee concurrently with the Special Committee's report. The Sixth Committee also had before it Venezuela's views on a declaration on the topic,<sup>(2)</sup> submitted in response to a 1980 Assembly request.<sup>(5)</sup> Supporting the concept, Venezuela believed in incorporating "co-operation among States" in the declaration, stressed the Assembly's role as the main United Nations organ in dispute settlement and urged that any reference to the International Court of Justice should be in broad, clear terms if it were to be accepted by countries having constitutional difficulties in agreeing to compulsory submission of disputes to that body.

During the Sixth Committee debate, a number of States, including Algeria, Brazil, Chile, China, Colombia, Italy, Japan, Romania, Sierra Leone, Yugoslavia and Zaire, lamented the Special Committee's slow progress on the draft declaration, with several asserting that the Committee had encountered diversionary tactics and artificial difficulties. Ecuador and the Philippines noted the slow progress despite the draft's being little more than a restatement of Charter principles; the latter added it was contemplating, in conjunction with others, introducing a proposal for more adequate machinery for voluntary use in peaceful dispute settlement.

The United Kingdom felt slow progress was inevitable as there were deep-seated differences of view as to the scope and interpretation of the Charter. The United States said rivalry between those wishing to devote time to dispute settlement and those wishing to study the question of maintenance of international peace and security had hampered progress; a useful declaration could be achieved only if the draft were confined to the subject of peaceful settlement. Italy said the Special Committee's following session should be the final deadline for completion of the draft. However, Argentina cautioned against establishing a time-frame, since the text had to be prepared carefully in order to stand the test of time. Greece shared this viewpoint.

Some States felt there had been progress in the Committee's work. They included Australia, the Bahamas, Ethiopia, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mali, Mongolia, New Zealand, the Niger, Nigeria, Pakistan, Rwanda, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Tunisia and Uganda.

Afghanistan, Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia, Poland, the USSR and Viet Nam stressed that a declaration should be based on the principle of sovereign equality of States and the free choice of the means of settlement. Depriving States of the right to choose a particular means of dispute settlement was incompatible with Charter provisions, they said. They were also against imposing compulsory means, particularly third-party settlement such as arbitration or jurisdiction by the International Court of Justice. Poland said international arbitrators or judges, despite their commitment to impartiality, were often unable to dissociate themselves from political or other prejudices. Viet Nam said it did not rule out a possible third-party role, however, particularly if it was to be a respected international organization. For those States and Democratic Yemen, direct negotiations between the parties afforded the most important, effective and flexible means of settlement. Peru pointed out that legislation of the Latin American countries opposed mandatory submission to tribunals outside national jurisdiction.

On the other hand, a number of States favoured referring disputes to other bodies and felt that the principle of free choice of means was secondary and subordinate to the fundamental principle of peaceful settlement.

Greece pointed out that direct negotiation had frequently not resolved international disputes and sometimes had been accompanied by pressures favouring the stronger party; submitting disputes to a third party did not violate the sovereignty of States, since that act was often voluntary. Australia said that, while it attached particular importance to third-party settlement, it was not always the best method. Tunisia recalled one of the first Court judgments in which it was stated that the capacity to enter into international commitments was precisely one of the attributes of State sovereignty. Turkey pointed out that, according to the Court, the obligation to negotiate was simply one particular application of a basic principle in all international relations. Jamaica said those not ready to resort to arbitration or to the Court should be urged to use one of the other means specified in Charter Article 33.

Some delegations, among them Egypt, Romania and Sierra Leone, pointed out that one basic element of the declaration was the commitment to enhance the role of the principal organs of the United Nations, such as the General Assembly, the Security Council and the Secretary-General, in the peaceful settlement of disputes.

Others, including the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, said they were opposed to altering the delicate balance of power between the Organization's main organs, in violation of the Charter, since the Security Council was the only organ empowered to investigate disputes and to recommend methods of adjustment or terms of settlement.

Romania believed that the declaration should be only the first step towards the elaboration and adoption of a treaty that would oblige all States to settle their disputes by peaceful means, codify the principles and norms regarding the peaceful settlement of disputes and lay down specific modalities to that end. Ecuador saw the declaration as not only contributing to interpretation of Charter principles, but also as a positive expression of the progressive development of international law. Uruguay said that only those lacking confidence in their own cause feared the rule of international law. New Zealand cautioned that any commentary on Charter provisions should take into account their subtlety, seek to enrich them and enhance the effectiveness of their practical implementation by United Nations organs; it must avoid the danger of having a restrictive effect.

Several States drew attention to particular provisions in the draft text. Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen and the German Democratic Republic were among those which felt that reference should be made to the right of peoples living under foreign, colonial or racial domination to participate in peaceful settlement of disputes. That view was shared by China which said the principle of equality and mutual benefit, which it saw as indivisible, should be included in that part referring to settling disputes on the basis of sovereign equality and in accordance with free choice of means. Morocco felt the principle of self-defence should be reaffirmed in the substantive part of the declaration. Somalia said the text should take sufficiently into account that dispute settlement between two or more States must necessarily be accepted by all concerned parties if it was to be considered a real peaceful settlement, and should also stipulate the obligation to resort to peaceful means. The United Arab Emirates endorsed the view that the Charter be seen as an obligation.

France announced that it had agreed to postponing discussion on its proposed handbook only in order that the draft Manila declaration could be given priority. However, the idea of a handbook was welcomed by Egypt, Guyana, India, Israel and Sierra Leone. Israel also suggested that consideration be given to combining the handbook with earlier Secretariat surveys on treaty provisions for pacific dispute settlement. Egypt and France were among those also expressing support for the United States proposal on a questionnaire.

Peaceful settlement of disputes between States

The General Assembly,

Having examined the item entitled "Peaceful settlement of disputes between States",

Deeply concerned about the continuation of conflict situations and the emergence of new sources of disputes and tensions in international life, and especially about the growing tendency to resort to force or the threat of force and to intervention in internal affairs, and about the escalation of the arms race, which gravely endanger the independence and security of States, as well as international peace and security,

Taking into account the need to exert utmost efforts in order to settle any situations and disputes between States exclusively by peaceful means and to avoid any military action and hostilities, which can only make more difficult the solution of existing problems.

Also taking into account the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations concerning the peaceful settlement of disputes between States.

Considering that the adoption of a declaration on the peaceful settlement of disputes between States could contribute to the elimination of the danger of recourse to force or the threat of force and, therefore, to the strengthening of international peace and security,

Taking note of the reports of the Special Committee on the Charter of the United Nations and on the Strengthening of the Role of the Organization and of the Working Group on the Peaceful Settlement of Disputes,

Taking note also of the progress made in the Special Committee and in the Working Group in the elaboration of the draft Manila declaration on the peaceful settlement of international disputes;

Taking into account the opinions expressed during the examination at its thirty-sixth session of the question of the peaceful settlement of disputes between States,

1. Calls again upon all States to adhere strictly in their international relations to the principle that States shall settle their international disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security and justice are not endangered;

2. Considers that the question of the peaceful settlement of disputes should represent one of the central concerns for States and that, to this end, the efforts for examining and further developing the principle of peaceful settlement of disputes between States and the means of consolidating its full observance by all States in their international relations should be continued;

3. Considers also that the elaboration, as soon as possible, of a declaration of the General Assembly on the peaceful settlement of international disputes is likely to enhance the observance of the principle of peaceful settlement of disputes and to contribute to the strengthening of the role of the United Nations in preventing conflicts and settling them peacefully;

4. Requests the Special Committee on the Charter of the United Nations and on the Strengthening of the Role of the Organization to finalize the draft Manila declaration on the peaceful settlement of international disputes with a view to its consideration and adoption by the General Assembly, and to submit it to the Assembly at its thirty-seventh session;

5. Refers to the Special Committee the report of its Working Group on the Peaceful Settlement of Disputes, as well as the views expressed at the thirty-sixth session of the General Assembly on the contents of the declaration;

6. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-seventh session the item entitled "Peaceful settlement of disputes between States".

Draft code of offences against peace and security

In 1981, the General Assembly invited the International Law Commission (ILC) to resume work on the draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind. Prepared by ILC in 1954<sup>(9)</sup> in response to a 1947 Assembly resolution,<sup>(3)</sup> the draft Code defined offences which were crimes under international law and for which the responsible individual was to be punished. By the same 1947 resolution, ILC had also been directed to formulate the principles of international law recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the judgment of the Tribunal, before which the Nazi war crimes trials were held after the Second World War.

While the majority of Member States favoured resuming work on the Code, differing opinions were expressed as to which forum should be utilized for that purpose, on the priority to be given the topic, on the question of responsibility for offences and on the prospects for agreement on a code.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 10 December 1981, the General Assembly adopted a resolution<sup>(8)</sup> by which it invited ILC to resume its work with a view to elaborating the 1954 draft Code and to examine it with the required priority in order to review it, taking into account the results achieved by the progressive development of international law. The Commission was requested to consider the draft Code and to report to the Assembly in 1982 on the priority it accorded the draft and on a possible preliminary report to the Assembly in 1983 bearing, inter alia, on the draft's scope and structure. The Assembly decided to consider the subject in 1982 and requested the Secretary-General to reiterate an invitation to Member States and international intergovernmental organizations to present or update their comments on the draft and report in 1982.

The resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 129 to none, with 17 abstentions. On 4 December, the Sixth Committee had approved the draft, sponsored by 19 countries and introduced by Zaire, by a recorded vote of 89 to none, with 17 abstentions.

The Committee had before it a report by the Secretary-General<sup>(2)</sup> containing the comments of nine Member States and the Council of Europe, received in reply to a request in a 1980 Assembly resolution,<sup>(7)</sup> and an analytical paper, prepared by the Secretary-General<sup>(1)</sup> pursuant to the same resolution, reflecting the oral and written views of States and the comments of international organizations.

Explaining their votes in the Sixth Committee, the Federal Republic of Germany and the United Kingdom (both abstaining), Bangladesh and Sweden, the latter on behalf of the Nordic States (all in favour), said ILC should not be invited to give the topic priority over its other work. Mexico (in favour) would have preferred such a reference deleted since it felt it more logical to determine whether the Commission's work programme would be adversely affected. Brazil (in favour) said it was somewhat cryptic to invite ILC to resume work on elaborating the draft Code, while requesting it to consider the question.

Turkey and the United States (both abstaining), together with Bangladesh and Mexico, could not see the purpose of including in the Assembly's 1982 agenda an item already referred to ILC. The United Kingdom also saw no justification for that action, while Italy (abstaining) wondered whether the sponsors' real intention was to upset the Commission's order of priority.

The Netherlands (abstaining) and the United Kingdom saw little prospect for agreement on a draft code since views on its political and legal aspects were too divergent; the former said it was inappropriate to continue legal studies on the question. Italy, questioning the advisability of considering a controversial draft whose purpose was not clearly defined, was joined by Turkey in pointing to the heavy work-load of ILC. In view of that work-load, said Mexico, it would have been better to entrust the subject to a working group at the Assembly's 1982 session.

During the debate in the Sixth Committee, the majority of States favoured resuming substantive work on the draft Code and said the Commission's 1954 text constituted a good basis for this.

Nevertheless, Afghanistan, Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, the German Democratic Republic, Greece, Hungary, Mongolia, Pakistan, Poland and the USSR considered that the 1954 draft needed to be updated and supplemented in the light of the progressive development of international law since then. They felt that in the final stage of the draft's preparation account should be taken of such documents, among others, as the Assembly's 1970 Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations,<sup>(4)</sup> the 1973 International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid,<sup>(5)</sup> the Assembly's 1974 Definition of Aggression<sup>(6)</sup> and the 1977 Additional Protocols to the 1949 Geneva Conventions concerning respect for human rights in armed conflicts. The USSR urged that the part dealing with breaches of obligations of States concerning disarmament should also reflect provisions of relevant international legal instruments.

The German Democratic Republic and Hungary said a USSR proposal to declare the first use of nuclear weapons the gravest crime against humanity (p. 42) was of capital importance to future work on the text. This position was also voiced by Bulgaria.

Portugal, expressing doubts about the definition of acts of aggression contained in the draft Code, said it was essential that the nature of offences envisaged be clearly defined. Algeria pointed out that the Code should not be a mere compilation of offences and should be applicable only to internationally unlawful acts of exceptional seriousness causing substantial damage; such as genocide, apartheid aggression and colonialism. Bangladesh hoped the Code would cover hijacking and grave offences against diplomats. Bulgaria and the German Democratic Republic said it should prohibit propaganda for war and hatred against other nationalities and races. The Byelorussian SSR stressed that the Code should not impinge on the right of peoples to struggle for their independence against colonialism, aggression, racism and apartheid—a view shared by Yugoslavia, which emphasized that it should prevent the use of force, interference in States' internal affairs and international terrorism, as well as threats to world peace caused by uncontrolled use of scientific and technological advances, particularly for military purposes.

Argentina, Bangladesh, Finland, Greece, Japan, Jordan, Pakistan, Sweden and Uruguay were among those which felt that the Code should provide for its effective enforcement. Pakistan, Uruguay and Venezuela were particularly concerned that it made no reference to the penalties to which offenders would be liable—a position also voiced by Portugal—or to the judicial authority applying its provisions. Some States, including Argentina, Jordan, Sweden, the United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay and Venezuela, favoured establishing an international tribunal, while others, such as Finland and Poland, thought that enforcement should be left to national courts. Cuba held that violations of international law and the corresponding penalties embodied in the future Code could be incorporated in States' internal penal codes, with a view to international co-operation and legislative uniformity.

Difficult conceptual problems were mentioned concerning the responsibility for offences embodied in the future Code. Czechoslovakia felt it should be based on the concept of individual criminal responsibility and proceed from the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal. The USSR spoke similarly. Holding individuals responsible should not, however, in the view of the German Democratic Republic, replace the responsibility under international law of a State which organized, committed or supported such crimes. The Byelorussian SSR agreed but said it was regrettable that some delegations sought to hold States exclusively responsible. Finland pointed out that, whereas it was clear that individuals committing offences should be held responsible and duly convicted for their acts, it was much more difficult to establish State responsibility; in its view, a parallel should be drawn between the draft Code and the Commission's work on State responsibility, especially with regard to attributing to a State an act committed by an individual. Poland felt that, while it was true that acts of aggression, genocide and apartheid were committed by States rather than by individuals, international practice had established the link between State and individual criminal responsibility; awareness of direct criminal responsibility of the individual acting on behalf of the State might prove to be an effective deterrent.

Japan felt that confusion might arise if the Assembly were to begin consideration of individual responsibility before ILC had completed or made further progress on that of States. Argentina said such action might be dangerous. Jordan said there was need for work on the draft to proceed hand in hand with the Commission's work on State responsibility. Pakistan said it might be desirable to know ILC's viewpoint on that topic before considering the draft Code. Zaire, questioning the reluctance to define States' criminal responsibility, said this might indicate that those concerned were contemplating attacking the peace and security of mankind and were reluctant to support a legal instrument condemning such acts. The United Republic of Tanzania saw a close interrelationship between State responsibility and offences against peace and security.

With regard to future procedure, Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Poland and the USSR considered that, in preparing such important legal instruments, all Member States should participate; consequently the Sixth Committee was the appropriate forum for preparing the final text based on the 1954 ILC draft. The Byelorussian SSR, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR suggested establishing an open-ended working group of the Committee to this end. Mongolia favoured exchanging views in the Committee to formulate guidelines and then referring the topic back to ILC. Bulgaria said that body should be asked if it could accord the subject the necessary priority. The German Democratic Republic spoke similarly.

On the other hand, Algeria, Argentina, Bangladesh, Egypt, Finland, Greece, Jordan, Pakistan, Portugal, Sweden, the United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia and Zaire thought the need for progressive development of international law justified resubmission of the draft Code to ILC. Yugoslavia, however, felt that that body's work should be constantly reviewed by the Committee. Zaire was against a working group, since all States would wish to participate.

Doubts were expressed on the advisability of considering the substance of the draft Code in the near future. Japan, while understanding the particular need for such a code after the Second World War, doubted whether the same need still existed and believed the drafting of a comprehensive code might call into question principles contained in existing instruments, thus disturbing the carefully achieved balance of interests. The United Kingdom also wondered whether the time was ripe for trying to solve the huge legal and political problems inherent in elaborating the Code, particularly in view of the substantial differences on the means of implementation at the international level.

Draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind

The General Assembly,

Mindful of Article 13, paragraph 1 a. of the Charter of the United Nations, which provides that the General Assembly shall initiate studies and make recommendations for the purpose of encouraging the progressive development of international law and its codification,

Recalling its resolution 177(II) of 21 November 1947, by which it requested the International Law Commission to prepare a draft code of offences against the peace and security of mankind, Having considered the draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind prepared by the international Law Commission and submitted to the General Assembly in 1954.

Recalling its belief that the elaboration of a code of offences against the peace and security of mankind could contribute to strengthening international peace and security and thus to promoting and implementing the purposes and principles set forth in the Charter of the United Nations,

Bearing in mind its resolution 33/97 of 16 December 1978, by which it decided to accord priority and the fullest consideration to the item entitled "Draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind".

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General submitted pursuant to General Assembly resolution 35/49 of 4 December 1980,

Considering that the International Law Commission has just accomplished an important part of its work devoted to the succession of States in respect of State property, archives and debts and that the programme of work is thus at present lightened,

Taking into consideration that the membership of the International Law Commission was increased during the thirty-sixth session of the General Assembly and that it has at its disposal a new mandate of five years to organize its future work,

Taking into account the views expressed during the debate on this item at the current session,

Taking note of paragraph 4 of General Assembly resolution 36/114 of 10 December 1981 on the report of the international Law Commission,

1. Invites the International Law Commission to resume its work with a view to elaborating the draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind and to examine it with the required priority in order to review it, taking duly into account the results achieved by the process of the progressive development of international law;

2. Requests the International Law Commission to consider at its thirty-fourth session the question of the draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind in the context of its five-year programme and to report to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session on the priority it deems advisable to accord to the draft Code, and the possibility of presenting a preliminary report to the Assembly at its thirty-eighth session bearing, inter alia, on the scope and the structure of the draft Code;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to reiterate his invitation to Member States and relevant international intergovernmental organizations to present or update their comments and observations on the draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind, and to submit a report to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the International Law Commission all the necessary documentation, comments and observations presented by Member States and relevant international intergovernmental organizations on the item entitled "Draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind";

5. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-seventh session the item entitled "Draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind" and to accord it priority and the fullest possible consideration.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Bulgaria, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Cameroon, United Republic of Tanzania, Upper Volta, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia.

Draft convention against mercenaries

In 1981, the General Assembly decided that its Ad Hoc Committee on the Drafting of an International Convention against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries should continue its work towards that goal. Member States had differing views on the future convention's scope, the definition of the terms "mercenary" and "mercenarism", the responsibilities of individuals and States, and the legal status of mercenaries.

WORK OF THE COMMITTEE AGAINST MERCENARIES. The Committee against mercenaries, established by the General Assembly in 1980 to elaborate a convention against their recruitment, use, financing and training,<sup>(4)</sup> held its first session at United Nations Headquarters from 20 January to 13 February 1981. The Committee, to be composed of 35 States but of which only 33 were appointed for the 1981 session (see APPENDIX III), created a Working Group of the Whole to draft the text. The Group held eight meetings between 6 and 13 February. The Committee submitted a report to the Assembly.<sup>(2)</sup>

All States taking part in the general debate condemned the use of mercenaries whether on private initiative or with the tacit consent or active support of Governments. Attention was drawn to a 1977 Security Council resolution, adopted by consensus, condemning all forms of external interference in the internal affairs of Member States,<sup>(8)</sup> as well as to the consensus reached on the treatment and status to be accorded mercenaries, at the 1977 session of the Diplomatic Conference on the Reaffirmation and Development of International Humanitarian Law Applicable in Armed Conflicts.<sup>(9)</sup> It was noted that the use of mercenaries could be a threat to the self-determination, stability and independence of States and that interventions by soldiers of fortune should be treated as attacks on the territorial integrity or political independence of any sovereign State in violation of the fundamental principles of the United Nations.

Two approaches were suggested for the Committee's work. The first was to draft an international convention immediately, based on a draft by Nigeria, that would be applied universally and would impose concrete obligations on States, including eradicating activities of mercenaries. The second approach was to make individual mercenaries criminally liable under national legislation through a penal law convention aimed at strengthening international cooperation among judicial authorities and denying alleged offenders a safe haven.

Aspects of the envisaged convention discussed in either the Committee or the Working Group included the convention's scope, the definition of the term "mercenary", the concept of "mercenarism", individual versus State responsibility and the legal status of mercenaries.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 4 December, the General Assembly adopted without vote a resolution<sup>(6)</sup> by which it decided that the Committee against mercenaries should continue its work to draft as soon as possible an international convention against them and report on its progress to the 1982 Assembly session.

On 24 November, the Sixth Committee had approved the text, sponsored by 59 States and introduced by Nigeria, by consensus.

A number of other actions concerning mercenaries were taken by both the Assembly and the Commission on Human Rights.

The Commission on Human Rights, in a resolution of 6 March on the self-determination of peoples (p. 891),<sup>(3)</sup> and the Assembly, in its 28 October resolution on the same subject,<sup>(5)</sup> reaffirmed that using mercenaries against national liberation movements and sovereign States constituted a criminal act and that the mercenaries themselves were criminals. They called on all Governments to enact legislation declaring the recruitment, financing and training of mercenaries in their territories and the transit of mercenaries through their territories to be punishable offences and prohibiting their nationals from serving as mercenaries, and to report on such legislation to the Secretary-General.

In its Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention and Interference in the Internal Affairs of States, adopted on 9 December,<sup>(7)</sup> the Assembly listed among the duties of States, under the principle of non-intervention, the duty to prevent on their territory the training, financing and recruitment of mercenaries, or the sending of them into the territory of another State, and to deny facilities, including financing, for the equipping and transit of mercenaries.

On 17 August, Mongolia addressed a note verbale to the Secretary-General<sup>(1)</sup> containing its comments on drafting a convention and urging the international community to codify the principles and norms of conduct of States concerning mercenaries and "mercenarism",

In the Sixth Committee, following approval of the draft resolution on the Ad Hoc Committee's future work, a number of delegations expressed reservations on the text. Speaking for the members of the European Community (EC), the United Kingdom said they felt that the preamble paragraph asserting that the activities of mercenaries were contrary to fundamental principles of international law was too broad; individual acts could not automatically be imputed to States and should be dealt with through national criminal law according to a new convention, supplemented by increased international co-operation to suppress activities generally agreed to be harmful and unacceptable. Norway (on behalf of the Nordic States) believed such principles applied exclusively to inter-State relations. Austria and Spain held similar views. The United States felt the text would have been more accurate if it had referred to some activities of mercenaries, such as violations of laws governing armed conflicts and the use of mercenaries by States to interfere in the internal affairs of others, and if it had stated that Security Council resolutions condemned the use of mercenaries to destabilize States or to violate their territorial integrity, sovereignty or independence. The EC members also believed that in accomplishing its mandate the Ad Hoc Committee should continue to work by consensus.

During the debate in the Sixth Committee, African States and others, including the Bahamas, Indonesia, Jamaica and Venezuela, said they felt that the text submitted by Nigeria provided a general basis for the Ad Hoc Committee's work. The Bahamas, China, Czechoslovakia, Jamaica, Kenya, Mongolia, Morocco, Somalia, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Uganda, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Zaire and Zambia believed the convention should be applied both against mercenaries and against States recruiting, financing, training and using them. Afghanistan, Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR and the USSR were among those which felt that a distinction should be made between individual and State responsibility.

Other States favoured making it a criminal offence for individuals to recruit, use, finance and train mercenaries, and harmonizing national penal law of States parties to the convention. The EC members felt a future convention should accent individual responsibility, without denying that questions of State responsibility could arise under international law if State obligations were not fulfilled. Similar views were expressed by Portugal and the United States. Sweden said principles of international law applied only to States and not to individuals; hence, it did not consider that mercenaries' activities could ipso facto give rise to State responsibility. New Zealand held that agreement should be reached on what specific activities constituted operations relating to mercenaries and that incorporating such activities into the criminal law of States would generate an international obligation strengthening existing international law.

Numerous references were made to the term "mercenary" contained in article 47 of Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, adopted at the 1977 Diplomatic Conference on international humanitarian law, on which the definition contained in the Nigerian draft was based.

A number of States saw the Nigerian definition as not fully satisfactory or too restrictive. It was viewed by Liberia, Paraguay, Portugal and Zaire as over-emphasizing the element of pecuniary motivation. Although that motivation was basic, said China, mercenaries were dispatched for political ends—a position shared by Bulgaria and Zaire. Burundi was concerned that, if the definition were limited to the provisions of article 47, it would be tantamount to exonerating mercenaries fighting against national liberation movements. Mexico said any definition should take into account that providing assistance to a country during an internal conflict could turn that conflict into one which was subject to international law. Mongolia pointed out that mercenaries had been used when there was no armed conflict to destabilize African States. Bulgaria and Yugoslavia stressed that mercenaries could also be used in peace-time. Ghana, too, was concerned about defining a mercenary as one who fights in an armed conflict. Indonesia, Kenya, Somalia and Zambia felt the definition should be amplified to cover other situations. For Venezuela, it should not be confined to nationals of a State but cover all persons; it was also necessary to cover the possibility that a mercenary might be an agent of a country or group of interests. The Syrian Arab Republic believed that a comprehensive definition should also take account of the 1977 Convention for the Elimination of Mercenaries in Africa adopted by the Organization of African Unity, General Assembly and Security Council resolutions and any new proposals by delegations. This viewpoint was shared by Somalia and the Sudan.

Algeria, Australia, Jamaica, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Suriname were among those pointing out that the definition in article 47 was based on an approach appropriate for humanitarian law but inappropriate for a general instrument. Tunisia said it should be remembered that Additional Protocol I related only to international armed conflicts, whereas the convention under consideration was also intended to apply to operations carried out in times of peace. Australia and Jamaica said the Nigerian draft did not define the linkage between mercenary and "mercenarism", Iraq said a convention would not be functional unless it recognized a degree of such interconnection. Viet Nam felt the term "mercenary" should be expanded to encompass all types of mercenaries, such as those who were citizens or residents of countries in which they were operating. The Lao People's Democratic Republic pointed out that a new category of mercenary had recently emerged, recruited among unemployed refugees, trained, equipped by foreign agents and sent back to their country of origin to stir up the people against the legal authorities.

Other States, including Afghanistan, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Ethiopia, India, Japan, Pakistan, Poland, Sweden, the Sudan and the EC members, considered that article 47 provided a good basis for defining a mercenary. Italy, sharing this view, said two contemporary definitions of the same term would be undesirable. However, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Ethiopia and India also stressed that the definition should not be construed in such a way that it could be used against national liberation movements.

The concept of "mercenarism" was viewed by several States as basic to the future convention and correctly highlighted in the Nigerian draft. The Sudan felt it essential to ensure that institutions, States and organizations of States assisting mercenaries did not go unpunished. Jamaica observed that, even if a State or corporate body could not be made criminally liable, it was at least clear that identifiable individuals in the corporate body or the State administration could. Iraq said that, unless certain types of activity were banned, some facets of the use of mercenaries would continue. Morocco thought it would be difficult to characterize as similar crimes the organizing of armed mercenaries and publishing or tolerating the publication of information on that subject.

Others also expressed reservations on the concept of "mercenarism". Australia said the Nigerian definition covered a variety of actions, some more serious than others, and that different actions should not be branded as the same offence. For Australia and Japan the term was a neologism, unlikely to be accepted. The latter believed it unwise to introduce it into a new convention.

On the related question of State responsibility, the German Democratic Republic noted that organizing or encouraging the organizing of bands of mercenaries and their use by or on behalf of a State in order to intrude into another's territory or to use armed force against it—denounced by international law—as well as States permitting their territory to be used for the activities of mercenaries and allowing their nationals to engage in such activities should be covered by the future convention, obliging States not to tolerate them. Similar views were voiced by China, Mongolia, Nicaragua, Paraguay, Poland, Sierra Leone and Zambia. Togo also felt there should be an appropriate reference to State responsibility. The Ukrainian SSR said that any State failing to adopt measures to end mercenary activities must bear international responsibility. Romania spoke similarly. China added that mercenary activities should be an extraditable crime, while Sierra Leone felt passports should be denied to any national or resident openly engaged in taking human lives or overthrowing a foreign Government.

Many delegations, including China, Cuba, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Morocco, Paraguay, Yugoslavia and Zaire, shared Tunisia's view that a State could not fulfil all its obligations by merely refraining from being involved in mercenary activities; it was the duty of every State to prevent such activities based in its territory, entailing exercising vigilance and being aware of acts directed from its territory against others, taking into account that it was unlikely that bands of mercenaries, requiring sizeable human and financial resources, could remain unknown to the authorities.

However, some States, such as the EC members, felt that a future convention should accent individual responsibility. The United States similarly believed that trying to deal with State responsibility would complicate the Ad Hoc Committee's work, and cautioned against hasty drafting to cover areas not universally accepted. Italy maintained that the problem of the treatment of mercenaries and that of State responsibility were legally different and should not be dealt with in the same instrument;

On the issue of the legal status of mercenaries, Uganda, Yugoslavia and Zambia were among those welcoming the fact that article 47 of Additional Protocol I had stripped mercenaries of their right to treatment as combatants. Algeria, Burundi, China, Egypt, Ghana, Jamaica, Kenya, Liberia, Mexico, Morocco, Paraguay, Togo and Tunisia, while agreeing that mercenaries should not be accorded prisoner-of-war status, none the less felt that they should be treated humanely and have judicial guarantees ordinarily granted to alleged offenders in the same circumstances. Portugal cautioned that, if the principle embodied in that article were accepted, a crime committed by a mercenary would be considered more condemnable than that of any other participant in an armed conflict. Italy and Spain drew attention to article 75 of Additional Protocol I, which mentioned fundamental guarantees to be granted to all persons, including criminals. Jamaica, Liberia and Zaire stressed that the convention should state that mercenaries were international criminals.

Many States, including Algeria, China, Cuba, Egypt, Ethiopia, India, Jamaica, Kuwait, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Liberia, Mongolia, Mozambique, Nicaragua, the Syrian Arab Republic, Uganda, the Ukrainian SSR, Venezuela, Viet Nam and Yugoslavia, insisted on distinguishing between mercenaries and freedom fighters and emphasized that a future convention must not impair the effectiveness of international volunteers participating in the struggle of peoples against colonialism, racism, apartheid and other forms of foreign domination.

Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Drafting of an International Convention against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries

The General Assembly,

Bearing in mind the need for strict observance of the principles of sovereign equality, political independence, territorial integrity of States and self-determination of peoples, as enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations and developed in the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling its resolutions, particularly resolutions 2395 (XXIII) of 29 November 1968, 2465(XXIII) of 20 December 1968, 2548(XXIV) of 11 December 1969, 2708(XXV) of 14 December 1970, 3103(XXVIII) of 12 December 1973 and its resolution 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960, as well as Security Council resolutions 405(1977) of 14 April 1977 and 419(1977) of 24 November 1977, in which the United Nations denounced the practice of using mercenaries against developing countries and national liberation movements,

Recalling, in particular, its resolution 35/48 of 4 December 1980, by which it established an Ad Hoc Committee on the Drafting of an International Convention against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries, composed of thirty-five Member States, Having considered the report of the Ad Hoc Committee.

Recognizing that the activities of mercenaries are contrary to fundamental principles of international law, such as noninterference in the internal affairs of States, territorial integrity and independence, and seriously impede the process of self-determination of peoples struggling against colonialism, racism and apartheid and all forms of foreign domination.

Bearing in mind the pernicious impact that the activities of mercenaries have on International peace and security,

Considering that the progressive development and codification of the rules of international law on mercenaries would contribute immensely to the implementation of the purposes and principles of the Charter,

Taking account of the fact that the Ad Hoc Committee has not completed the mandate entrusted to it.

Reaffirming the need for the elaboration at the earliest possible date of an international convention against the recruitment, use, financing and training of mercenaries,

1. Takes note of the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Drafting of an International Convention against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries;

2. Decides that the Ad Hoc Committee shall continue its work with the goal of drafting at the earliest possible date an international convention against the recruitment, use, financing and training of mercenaries;

3. Requests the Ad Hoc Committee, in the fulfilment of its mandate, to consider the suggestions and proposals of Member States, bearing in mind the views and comments submitted to the Secretary-General and those expressed at the thirty-sixth session of the General Assembly during the debate in the Sixth Committee devoted to the consideration of the report of the Ad Hoc Committee;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to make available to the Ad Hoc Committee at its next session the texts of the conventions drafted by international and regional organizations on mercenaries, as well as any other relevant documentation;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to provide the Ad Hoc Committee with any assistance and facilities it may require for the performance of its work;

6. Requests the Ad Hoc Committee to submit its report to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session;

7. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-seventh session the item entitled "Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Drafting of an International Convention against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries".

Prevention of terrorism

Deep concern about continuing acts of international terrorism was expressed by the General Assembly when, in 1981, it re-endorsed recommendations to eliminate the problem.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 10 December, the General Assembly adopted a resolution on the prevention of terrorism,<sup>(8)</sup> in which it re-endorsed the 1979 recommendations of the Ad Hoc Committee on International Terrorism concerning measures for speedily eliminating such terrorism.<sup>(9)</sup> The Assembly called on all States to observe and implement the recommendations, and requested the Secretary-General to follow this up and report to it in 1983. The Assembly reaffirmed the inalienable right to self-determination and independence of all peoples under colonial and racist régimes and upheld the legitimacy of their struggle, particularly that of national liberation movements.

The resolution was adopted without vote. On 4 December, the Sixth Committee had approved by consensus the draft sponsored by Cuba, Egypt, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Niger, Togo, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia and Zimbabwe.

In its Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention and Interference in the Internal Affairs of States, adopted on 9 December,<sup>(7)</sup> the Assembly listed among the duties of States, under the principle of non-intervention, the duty to refrain from using terrorist practices as State policy against another State or against peoples under colonial domination, foreign occupation or racist régimes, and to prevent assistance to or use or tolerance of terrorist groups, saboteurs or subversive agents against third States.

In considering the prevention of terrorism, the Sixth Committee had before it a September report compiled by the Secretary-General<sup>(2)</sup> in response to a 1979 Assembly resolution,<sup>(5)</sup> containing Government observations, material on national legislation dealing with the combating of international terrorism, and, information and other material submitted by international inter-governmental organizations. Annexed to the report was information on the state of signatures, ratifications or accessions, as at 5 August 1981, to international conventions relating to various aspects of the problem.

On 4 December, the Committee was informed that the sponsors of another draft on the subject,<sup>(*)</sup> Cuba and Mongolia, had decided not to press it to a vote. By this text, the Assembly would also have: condemned continuing repressive and terrorist acts by colonial, racist and alien régimes in denying peoples their right to self-determination; reaffirmed the legitimacy of assisting oppressed peoples, including national liberation movements, to eliminate all such domination; urged all States to seek peaceful solutions to causes underlying such violent acts and to contribute to eliminating the causes, and called on them to fulfil their international obligations to refrain from participating in acts of civil strife in another State, or acquiescing in activities within their territory directed towards that end; appealed to all States that had not done so to become parties to international conventions on terrorism, invited them to eliminate terrorism speedily, and urged them to co-operate more closely by exchanging information, concluding special treaties and incorporating special clauses into bilateral treaties, particularly regarding extradition or prosecution of international terrorists; invited Governments' comments, particularly on the need for additional conventions; and recognized that, in order to eliminate the problem, both the Assembly and the Security Council should pay special attention to all situations, including colonialism, racism and alien occupation, that might give rise to terrorism and endanger international peace and security.

Introducing the nine-nation draft in the Sixth Committee, Yugoslavia said that the absence of an operative paragraph on national liberation movements did not affect the sponsors' view that the struggle of such movements came within the purview of the 1949 Geneva Conventions and the 1977 Additional Protocols thereto, and that that struggle could not be identified with terrorist acts.

A number of delegations explained their positions on the draft text. Most, while condemning all acts of terrorism, irrespective of the motives, voiced reservations on the two preambular paragraphs concerning the right to self-determination. The United Kingdom said references to self-determination were over-emphasized, since the 1970 Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations<sup>(3)</sup> included that right as only one of seven principles. France and the United States saw no need for such references, while Canada said they were superfluous. The Netherlands said the paragraphs were out of place. Mexico understood that they should be read together—that all peoples had the right to self-determination through democratic process where the rule of law prevailed or, where oppressive terrorist régimes were violating the right, through revolutionary armed struggle respecting the humanitarian principles applying to armed conflict. Colombia also felt the two paragraphs should have been linked.

Spain said it had doubts about introducing extraneous elements in the preamble, while the United States stressed that all the rights and duties referred to, and the draft itself, should be understood in the context of the Charter.

Israel objected to the sixth preambular paragraph which, it felt, distorted the nature of the right to self-determination, even within the framework of the Charter. Australia, Canada, the Federal Republic of Germany, Sweden and the United Kingdom understood that the paragraph did not legitimize terrorist acts. Colombia, Italy and the United States stressed that certain forms of terrorism were so brutal that no cause could justify them. Argentina, Chile, Colombia, Indonesia, Thailand and Uruguay understood that the national liberation movements referred to were only those recognized by the United Nations or regional organizations and which acted in conformity with the Charter.

Argentina regretted that there was no call to States to refrain from protecting or training terrorists. Turkey would have preferred a call for more specific measures against international terrorism, as it felt such measures should not be postponed until the advent of a hypothetical international order which did not give rise to terrorism. France and Spain had reservations about some aspects of the Ad Hoc Committee's recommendations. Israel could not accept that conventions or protocols, subject to ratification and to which a State had not given its assent, should be binding on that State. Viet Nam said it would have preferred the text submitted by Cuba and Mongolia, which it regarded as a better reflection of the current international situation.

Introducing the Secretary-General's report,<sup>(2)</sup> the United Nations Legal Counsel pointed out that it had taken eight years for one third of the Member States to become parties to the 1973 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents,<sup>(4)</sup> and as at 1 December only 16 Member States had become parties to the 1979 International Convention against the Taking of Hostages.<sup>(6)</sup> (The number of States parties to the latter convention stood at 17 as at 31 December 1981.)

The discussion in the Sixth Committee focused on a general approach to the question and on the definition and scope of the concept of terrorism, its underlying causes and the preventive steps to be taken. Most States agreed that the United Nations should continue its work on the topic.

Examining the definition and scope of the concept of terrorism, Albania, Cuba, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the USSR and Viet Nam described State terrorism as one of its gravest forms. Mongolia cited the support given to anti-popular and dictatorial régimes. Czechoslovakia said some States had raised terrorism to the level of national policy. Viet Nam believed that, although progress had been made in preventing individual terrorist acts, not enough attention had been paid to those committed by States. Albania considered that the rhetoric of the United States and the USSR, which endeavoured to prove that their opponents were the main source of international terrorism, was aimed at misleading public opinion by concealing the role they themselves played. Yugoslavia, defining State terrorism as including aggression, various types of force, reprisals, using subversive agents and occupying the territory of other States, suggested that such terrorism be considered at another time and in another forum. The latter view was shared by the United States. Peru said international terrorism could be any violent act endangering or taking innocent lives, threatening fundamental freedoms or affecting more than one State, and was aimed at using coercion to achieve a particular end. Afghanistan said a definition should encompass offences against diplomats and foreigners. Algeria urged that State terrorism be defined, while Cuba said priority should be given to defining international terrorism.

Opposition to equating terrorism with the right to self-determination through such means as national liberation movements was voiced by the Eastern European socialist States, Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, China, Cuba, Egypt, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mongolia, Pakistan, Turkey, Viet Nam and Yugoslavia. China contended that the movements were an effective means of eliminating the root causes of international terrorism. Algeria said failure to distinguish between the two would undermine progress made in international law with regard to the legitimacy of armed struggle in the cause of national self-determination. Yugoslavia pointed out that the Additional Protocols to the 1949 Geneva Conventions stated that liberation movements were covered by the international laws of warfare, and that identifying those movements with international terrorism was not justified. Mongolia noted that some States questioned the legitimacy of support rendered to national liberation movements.

The United States supported the right to self-determination but stressed that that did not require it to condone terrorism; there were acts so barbarous nothing could justify them. Chile and Uruguay also condemned all violent terrorist acts regardless of the circumstances. Paraguay, while not opposed to legitimate liberation movements, felt terrorism could not contribute to advancing their causes and could even be an impediment to recognition by world opinion of a just cause.

As to the causes of terrorist acts, Algeria, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, the German Democratic Republic, Mongolia, Nigeria, Uganda, the USSR and Viet Nam attributed them to injustice and despair created through colonialism, racism, imperialism, aggression, foreign occupation and other forms of oppression. China shared this view and also cited hegemonism—as did the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya—as a further cause. However, Pakistan felt terrorist acts were primarily based on political motives and, together with Uganda, also blamed the current injustices on the international order. Albania also felt economic problems were a cause. For Argentina, the causes were too varied to explain.

Concerning steps for preventing terrorism, the need for wider adherence to existing international instruments was stressed by Afghanistan, the German Democratic Republic, Pakistan, Uganda, the USSR, the United States, Viet Nam and Yugoslavia. Nigeria said the United Nations should encourage ratification of conventions. Peru felt that such instruments should be strengthened or additional ones concluded. Paraguay favoured adopting a general convention—a view shared by China—but the German Democratic Republic said that was neither appropriate nor feasible; States should continue identifying and eliminating the causes of international terrorism. Rather than a single all-embracing convention, Pakistan urged a step-by-step approach, each category of violence being prevented by specific, separate treaties. Paraguay and Uruguay were among those supporting any instrument designed to strengthen international co-operation. Argentina supported an instrument explicitly condemning use of terrorist methods as a form of political action, while Chile and Egypt declared that terrorist acts should never be regarded as political crimes. Egypt thought terrorism should be included as a crime in the proposed draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind (p. 1212). Algeria, Argentina and Mongolia believed an in-depth study was needed. Mongolia also suggested that States and the media should not publicize acts of terrorism and not glorify the perpetrators. A similar position was taken by Yugoslavia.

Draft articles on non-navigational uses of international watercourses

The International Law Commission (ILC), reporting<sup>(1)</sup> on its May-July 1981 session (p. 1264), informed General Assembly that the Special Rapporteur on the law of the non-navigational uses of international watercourses, Stephen M. Schwebel (United States), had resigned upon his election to the International Court of Justice. Consequently, ILC had been unable to take up the topic, as recommended by the Assembly,<sup>(2)</sup> but would proceed to elaborate draft articles based on a future report of a new Special Rapporteur.

In its 10 December resolution on the work of ILC,<sup>(3)</sup> the Assembly, stressing that a new Special Rapporteur should be appointed at the beginning of the Commission's 1982 session to ensure continuity, recommended that it continue preparing draft articles on the law of the non-navigational uses of international watercourses.

Explaining its position on the text in the Sixth Committee, the USSR questioned the advisability of mentioning the appointment of a new Special Rapporteur, as it felt such emphasis might give the impression of arbitrarily assigning greater or lesser importance to a particular question.

Addressing the Committee, the ILC Chairman explained that the Commission, whose members' terms of office were due to expire at the end of 1981, had decided to wait until its new membership had been established before appointing a new Special Rapporteur.

During the Committee's discussion of the ILC report, general disappointment was voiced over the fact that it had not dealt with such an important and urgent item.

Afghanistan, Australia, Austria, the Bahamas, Canada, Colombia, Finland, India, Indonesia, Japan, Kenya, Nigeria, Pakistan, Spain, Sri Lanka, the United States, Venezuela and Yugoslavia said the subject required priority treatment. New Zealand feared that the difficult topic had not been easily accepted by ILC, while Hungary said there was a lack of interest in that body. The Netherlands felt some progress should have been made based on the reports of earlier Special Rapporteurs and those articles already provisionally adopted. The Sudan suggested that ILC appoint deputies for each Special Rapporteur in order to avoid repetition of the delay.

Hungary said that, inasmuch as 96 per cent of its river water came from its neighbours, it was deeply interested in the progressive development and codification of the legal provisions of the topic. Bangladesh, urging ILC to sort out the question's legal ambiguities, said it regarded as unsound and self-contradictory the tentative interpretation of the term "international watercourse system" given by ILC in 1980—that the system became international or not according to whether the waters in one State were affected by or affected users of waters in another State; most legal authorities spoke of an "international river basin" as an indivisible unit, regardless of whether it embraced two or more States, and as a basic norm governing international rivers generally. New Zealand regarded these comments as cogent, particularly on the concept of the river basin. India hoped that any differences it had with Bangladesh would be solved peacefully within the framework of a law fair to both.

Pakistan proposed that ILC consider several principles concerning riparian States: equitable apportioning of international river waters; exercising rights within its territory by one not causing ecological or physical changes or damage in another; each taking care to prevent water pollution; obtaining prior consent where water use would affect others; an aggrieved party being compensated for loss or misuse of waters by another; and being legally bound to settle disputes peacefully.

Chapter III

States and international law

Efforts continued in 1981 to codify aspects of international law governing diplomatic relations, State succession and State immunities.

Concerned about the safety of diplomatic and consular missions and representatives, the General Assembly, in November,<sup>(1)</sup> urged States to ensure their protection, prohibit illegal activities against them by persons and groups, and co-operate closely on protective measures. It also expanded the Organization's reporting system for serious violations to cover situations where an alleged offender sought refuge in another country.

The International Law Commission (ILC), at its May-July session (p. 1264), adopted a 39-article final draft on State succession in respect of State property, archives and debts, setting out rules to be followed in regard to these items when a State is created or when one State replaces another in responsibility for the international relations of a territory. Acting on an ILC recommendation, the Assembly, in December, decided to convene in 1983 an international conference of plenipotentiaries to consider the draft articles and to conclude a convention the subject.<sup>(2)</sup>

Further progress was made by ILC on draft articles on the status of the diplomatic courier and the diplomatic bag not accompanied by diplomatic courier (p. 1225), jurisdictional immunities of States and their property (p. 1230), international liability for injurious consequences arising out of acts not prohibited by international law (p. 1231) and State responsibility for internationally wrongful acts (p. 1232).

Also in 1981, ILC commenced its second reading of draft articles on treaties concluded between States and international organizations or between two or more international organizations (p. 1248).

Diplomatic relations

Protection of diplomats

Responding to a 1980 General Assembly resolution,<sup>(3)</sup> the Secretary-General submitted to that body in 1981 a report<sup>(1)</sup> containing details, received from States, of serious violations of the protection, security and safety of diplomatic and consular missions and representatives. The report, submitted in September with later addenda, contained notes verbales: from Turkey about attacks on its diplomats between December 1980 and June 1981 in Australia, Denmark, France, Iran and Switzerland; from Australia, Denmark and France on action taken in connection with those attacks; and from Sweden, concerning an August 1981 occupation of the Iranian Embassy near Stockholm by Iranian students. The report also contained the views of 16 States-Byelorussian SSR, Denmark, Finland, Federal Republic of Germany, Iceland, Italy, Norway, Romania, Senegal, Sweden, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela-on measures needed to enhance the protection, security and safety of diplomatic and consular missions and representatives.

As at 31 December 1981, 137 States had become parties to the 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations,<sup>(6)</sup> 101 States were parties to the 1963 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations<sup>(7)</sup> and 54 States were parties to the 1973 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents.<sup>(2)</sup>

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 13 November,<sup>(4)</sup> the General Assembly urged States to observe international law governing diplomatic and consular relations, and called on States which had not done so to become parties to such instruments as the 1961, 1963 and 1973 Conventions. Recommending that States co-operate closely to protect missions and diplomats and settle disputes peacefully, the Assembly invited all of them to report serious violations to the Secretary-General; States in which a violation occurred or where an alleged offender was present were invited to report on measures taken to bring about justice and to prevent a repetition. The Secretary-General was requested, on receiving a report of a serious violation, to draw the attention of the State where it took place or where the offender was present to the reporting procedures established in 1980.<sup>(3)</sup>

The resolution was adopted without vote. On 5 November, the Sixth (Legal) Committee had similarly approved the 19-nation draft.

Also, in a resolution of 10 December, the Assembly condemned terrorist acts against diplomatic missions accredited to the United Nations and their personnel, and endorsed recommendations made by the Committee on Relations with the Host Country concerning such acts.<sup>(5)</sup>

Introducing the 19-nation draft in the Sixth Committee, Sweden said the text elaborated the importance of local-level co-operation-stressed by many Governments-and expanded the reporting system to cover situations where an alleged offender, having committed a violation in one country, took refuge in another.

Finland, on behalf of the five Nordic countries which had initiated the topic's consideration in 1980,<sup>(8)</sup> hoped the notification system would be maintained since, it said, publishing information on violent acts provided an incentive for States to adopt preventive measures. Many delegations, including Pakistan, Spain and the United Kingdom (for the member States of the European Community (EC)), stressed the value of the reporting procedure. Japan hoped it would be strengthened. Egypt expressed satisfaction that some States had communicated in that regard. Although not enough experience had been acquired, Iraq said, monitoring serious violations should prove effective eventually. Turkey said such reports would show to what extent States, where violations had occurred, had fulfilled their international obligations. The USSR felt the Assembly should continue monitoring compliance with the 1961 and 1963 Vienna Conventions.

For the United States, involving the Secretary-General in monitoring and seeking a solution was a partial answer; a co-ordinated international response should be made involving a reaction against the offending State. The EC States said that when diplomatic or consular personnel were attacked or threatened and another State, especially a host country, aided such acts, that became the concern of all.

Some States were concerned that existing international legislation was not enough to protect diplomats. Chile stated that, instead of elaborating or adapting applicable norms and striving for their acceptance, machinery should be devised for preventing, bringing to trial and punishing those committing terrorist acts against diplomats, through binding law. Egypt, Uruguay and Yugoslavia also felt new international legislation was needed. Iraq thought further measures might be necessary if violations continued. Turkey suggested that a new organ for diplomatic protection be established and that the Secretary-General be authorized to urge States where violations occurred to take punitive and preventive action. However, the EC States said there was no need for new conventions or treaties as existing instruments contained clear rules on the question. Spain observed that conventions were not enough; political will to comply with them and the co-operation of all were also needed. Nigeria urged that States disseminate knowledge of the relevant conventions in their territories.

Afghanistan, Australia, the Byelorussian SSR, Chile, Ecuador and the Philippines stressed that national measures should be taken to protect diplomatic personnel and property. To that end, the Philippines said, the receiving State should adopt domestic legislation to supplement international law. Argentina and the USSR also stressed the responsibility of the receiving State, as did Czechoslovakia, which said it was particularly important in States where international organizations were headquartered. The Lao People's Democratic Republic said it was the receiver's duty to punish those violating international law and that applied especially to States granting asylum to activists known to be hostile to certain States. Sri Lanka and Uruguay pointed out that the receiving State had an obligation under international law. Equatorial Guinea spoke similarly. Afghanistan and the USSR said most rules in international agreements were derived from customary law, which meant that States must observe them even if they were not party to them.

Spain urged co-operation between receiving and sending States, while Chile said both shared responsibility for fulfilling diplomatic obligations. Pakistan agreed and, with the Lao People's Democratic Republic, stressed that the sender was obliged to respect the laws of the host country and not interfere in its internal affairs, as stated in the Vienna Conventions.

For New Zealand, it was important that States met their duties in the area of prevention; it was the record of sensible precautions which tested compliance with international obligations.

Turkey, citing five attacks in less than a year on its diplomats in France, said France had not complied fully with the 1980 Assembly resolution<sup>(3)</sup> by failing to report on measures taken to prevent repetition; it also regretted the issuing of ministerial statements based on propaganda or groundless preconceptions resulting from distortions of history. Condemning the attacks, France said it would do everything possible to prevent a repetition; the statement in question, however, had been a personal opinion, rather than that of the French Government.

The Byelorussian SSR, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR felt the United States had shown excessive tolerance towards those committing crimes against diplomats and had failed to end hostile campaigns against particular States or their representatives (p. 1241). The United States said it hoped those States would take the problem seriously enough to allow their diplomats to testify in its courts. The USSR said that, if diplomatic missions allowed their officials to appear in court whenever their privileges and immunities were violated, they would be unable to protect properly their States' interests in the United Nations.

Consideration of effective measures to enhance the protection, security and safety of diplomatic and consular missions and representatives

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General submitted under this item,

Reaffirming its resolution 35/168 of 15 December 1980,

Emphasizing the duty of States to take all appropriate steps to protect the premises of diplomatic and consular missions and prevent any attacks on diplomatic and consular representatives.

Recognizing the necessity to ensure the protection, security and safety of missions and of representatives to international intergovernmental organizations, as well as of officials of such organizations,

Deeply concerned about the continued large number of violations of, and failures to respect, the inviolability of diplomatic and consular missions and representatives,

Noting that only a small number of States have so far, in response to the call by the General Assembly at its thirty-fifth session, become parties to the relevant conventions concerning the inviolability of diplomatic and consular missions and representatives,

Convinced that the reporting procedures established under resolution 35/168 are an important step in the efforts to enhance the protection, security and safety of diplomatic and consular missions and representatives,

Desiring to maintain and strengthen those reporting procedures,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Strongly condemns acts of violence against diplomatic and consular missions and representatives as well as against missions and representatives to international intergovernmental organizations and officials of such organizations;

3. Urges States to observe and to implement the principles and rules of international law governing diplomatic and consular relations and, in particular, to take all necessary measures in conformity with their international obligations to ensure effectively the protection, security and safety of all diplomatic and consular missions and representatives officially present in territory under their jurisdiction, including practicable measures to prohibit in their territories illegal activities of persons, groups and organizations that encourage, instigate, organize or engage in the perpetration of acts against the security and safety of such missions and representatives;

4. Recommends that States co-operate closely, inter alia, through contacts between the diplomatic and consular mission and the receiving State, with regard to practical measures designed to enhance the protection, security and safety of diplomatic and consular missions and representatives;

5. Calls anew upon States that have not yet done so to consider becoming parties to the instruments relevant to the protection, security and safety of diplomatic and consular missions and representatives, inter alia, the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations of 1961, the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations of 1963, and the respective optional protocols thereto, as well as the Convention of 1973 on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents;

6. Calls upon States, in cases where a dispute arises in connection with a violation of the principles and rules of international law concerning the inviolability of diplomatic and consular missions and representatives, to make use of the means for peaceful settlement of disputes, including the good offices of the Secretary-General;

7. Invites all States to report to the Secretary-General serious violations of the protection, security and safety of diplomatic and consular missions and representatives, invites the State in which the violation took place and, where applicable, the State where the alleged offender is present to report also on measures taken to bring the offender to justice and eventually to communicate, in accordance with its laws, the final outcome of the proceedings against the offender, and further invites the State in which the violation took place to report also on the measures aimed at preventing a repetition of such violations;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to circulate to all States upon receipt the reports received by him pursuant to paragraph 7 above, unless requested otherwise by the reporting State;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to invite States to inform him of their views with respect to any measures needed to enhance the protection, security and safety of diplomatic and consular missions and representatives;

10. Requests the Secretary-General, when a serious violation has been reported to him pursuant to paragraph 7 above, to draw the attention, when appropriate, of the State where the violation occurred and, when applicable, of the State where the alleged offender is present to the reporting procedures established in resolution 35/168 and reaffirmed in paragraph 7 above;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session a report on the state of ratification of, and accessions to, the instruments referred to in paragraph 5 above, as well as the reports received and views expressed pursuant to paragraphs 7 and 9 above, and invites him to submit any views he may wish to express on these matters;

12. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-seventh session the item entitled "Consideration of effective measures to enhance the protection, security and safety of diplomatic and consular missions and representatives: report of the Secretary-General".

Status of diplomatic bags and couriers

Responding to a 1980 General Assembly recommendation,<sup>(3)</sup> the International Law Commission (ILC), at its May-July 1981 session, continued considering the status of the diplomatic courier and the diplomatic bag not accompanied by diplomatic courier,<sup>(1)</sup> with a view to elaborating a legal instrument on the subject. It examined a second report<sup>(2)</sup> by the Special Rapport-

teur, Alexander Yankov (Bulgaria), containing six proposed draft articles which constituted part I (general provisions). The articles dealt with: the scope of the articles (article 1); couriers and bags not within such scope (article 2); use of terms (article 3); freedom of communication for all official purposes effected through diplomatic couriers and bags (article 4); duty to respect international laws and those of receiving and transit States (article 5); and non-discrimination and reciprocity (article 6).

ILC requested the Secretariat to update the compilation of provisions of multilateral and bilateral treaties on diplomatic and consular law, and to solicit from States information on national practice regarding treatment of the diplomatic courier and bag. The draft articles were referred to the ILC Drafting Committee which was, however, unable to consider them due to lack of time.

In its 10 December resolution on the work of ILC, the Assembly recommended that the Commission continue preparing the draft articles.<sup>(4)</sup>

Aspects of the subject discussed in the Sixth Committee included whether or not a new set of rules on the subject was needed, the scope of application of the draft articles being considered by ILC and the abuse of privileges.

A number of States, including Austria, Israel, Japan and Venezuela, felt the existing legal framework dealt adequately with the topic and there was no need for a separate convention. The United States asserted that there had been no fundamental problems with existing rules except for some abusive uses of the bag. Australia said developing the subject further would be a waste of the limited time of ILC. The United Kingdom agreed, adding that the envisaged structure of the draft articles was too complex; an empirical study was needed leading to rules dealing with such problems as the abuse of bag privileges. The Federal Republic of Germany felt that existing law should be strengthened but was concerned that one set of rules covering all official communications might detract from protection currently accorded. Yugoslavia thought ILC should concentrate on recent State practice. Nigeria believed an examination of the existing treaties and State practice would enable ILC to decide whether further codification was necessary.

A number of States welcomed the Commission's progress and expressed support for a single convention to incorporate and consolidate the norms of international law, which they viewed as widely dispersed. In that regard, Brazil pointed out that four conventions applied different regimes to communications. Cyprus viewed existing law as inadequate. The Ukrainian SSR believed a single convention would make it possible to ascertain more accurately the need for new rules. Supporting a single text, the Bahamas stressed that it should not detract from existing law. Afghanistan said a new instrument would close legal loopholes, promote State co-operation and end abuses relating to diplomatic couriers and bags, thereby reducing the risk of conflict. Algeria, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Iraq and Thailand were among those welcoming the Special Rapporteur's report as a basis for further work. The Sudan held a similar view, and Mexico thought the work of ILC was proceeding along the right lines. The Byelorussian SSR and Chile hoped ILC would accord the topic priority. For Egypt, it was important to treat the topic in detail. Bulgaria favoured incorporating into the draft articles the fundamentals of existing international agreements. In drafting the articles, Czechoslovakia observed, account should be taken of experience gained since existing treaties had entered into force.

Comments were made on the scope of the draft articles. Czechoslovakia favoured limiting them to diplomatic couriers used by States. Brazil said it should not apply to communications between different States and between States and international organizations view shared by Mexico. Bulgaria and the United Kingdom said communications of such organizations should not be included. Israel said ILC should keep in mind that those bodies could not guarantee reciprocity. Jamaica found it strange that the scope should be defined in terms of State communications. Bulgaria said communications between missions and delegations situated abroad should be included.

Zaire thought the scope should cover communications between States and international organizations and between such organizations. Algeria and Egypt agreed with the latter point and also favoured including those of national liberation movements. Brazil thought the possibility of including international organizations merited further study, while Mexico said they should not be excluded until the question had been studied in depth. Iraq stressed that such organizations played an increasing role in international relations.

Iraq, Jamaica and Romania believed a balance should be established between the rights and obligations of sending and receiving States, through a specific article. Austria, Brazil and Japan held similar views. Poland and Zaire were among those stressing the importance of preventing abuses of the diplomatic bag and courier. Morocco thought codification of the topic would limit such abuse. Austria suggested that ILC base its work on existing law, providing for the bag to be opened in certain circumstances. Ethiopia said that any proposed article should not contradict that right. Jamaica, too, was concerned that the draft articles should be consistent with existing law.

On the privileges and immunities of the courier, Mexico said they should cease on re-entering the sending State, unless the return journey was private and included countries other than the receiving or transit State. Israel thought it desirable to strengthen the protection granted to the courier and his bag. The German Democratic Republic and Poland felt that coverage should be given others entrusted with a diplomatic bag, such as the captain of an aircraft or ship.

State succession in respect of property, archives and debts

In 1981, the General Assembly decided to convene an international conference of plenipotentiaries early in 1983 to consider draft articles on State succession in respect of property, archives and debts and to conclude an international convention on the subject.<sup>(5)</sup> The 39-article draft on this aspect of State succession-the replacement of one State by another in the responsibility for the international relations of a territory- had been finalized by ILC at its May-July session.

ILC CONSIDERATION. At its May-July session, ILC completed its work on the succession of States in respect of matters other than treaties by adopting a final set of draft articles on succession of States in respect of State property, archives and debts. This feature of State succession had been the subject, since 1968, of 13 reports by the Special Rapporteur, Mohammed Bedjaoui (Algeria)-the last of which was submitted in 1981.<sup>(2)</sup> In its report to the Assembly,<sup>(1)</sup> ILC pointed out that the draft articles could be regarded as a complement to the 1978 Vienna Convention on Succession of States in respect of Treaties<sup>(6)</sup> and it would be appropriate to give them the same status.

As recommended by the Assembly in 1980,<sup>(4)</sup> ILC finished, in the light of government comments, its second reading of those draft articles it had provisionally adopted in 1979<sup>(7)</sup> and 1980<sup>(8)</sup> and forwarded the complete set to the Assembly, along with commentaries, with the recommendation that it convene an international conference of plenipotentiaries to study the draft text and conclude a convention. In drafting the articles, ILC emphasized that it had used the principle of equity not only as a supplementary element throughout, but as part of the material content of specific provisions.

The 39 draft articles were divided into four parts-general provisions, State property, State archives and State debts-with a detailed commentary on each article.

Part I (articles 1 to 6) contained general provisions applicable to the whole text and dealt with the scope of the articles, use of terms, cases of State succession covered, temporal application, succession in respect of other matters, and rights and obligations of natural or juridical persons.

Parts II (articles 7 to 17), III (articles 18 to 29) and IV (articles 30 to 39) dealt with State property, archives and debts, respectively, with each part divided into two sections-an introduction and provisions concerning specific categories of State succession. The articles of the corresponding sections in each of these parts largely paralleled one another.

The first section (introduction) of each part determined the scope, defined the terminology, and dealt with the effects of the passing and date of passing. Further articles in this section of part II corresponded with part III: one on the passing of State property (or archives) without compensation; and another relating to the absence of effect of a succession of States on the property (or archives) of a third State. In addition, the first section of part III contained an article on the preservation of the unity of State archives, while the same section of part IV had an article on the effects of the passing of State debts with regard to creditors.

The second section (provisions concerning specific categories of State succession) of parts II, III and IV covered the transfer of part of a State's territory, newly independent States, uniting of States, separation of part or parts of a State's territory and dissolution of a State.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 10 December,<sup>(5)</sup> the General Assembly decided that an international conference of plenipotentiaries should be convened to consider the draft articles and to embody the results of its work in an international convention and such other instruments as it might deem appropriate. The Secretary-General was requested to convene the United Nations Conference on Succession of States in respect of State Property, Archives and Debts early in 1983 at a place to be determined by the Assembly in 1982 and Member States were invited to submit, before 1 July 1982, their written comments on the draft articles.

The resolution was adopted without vote. On

1 December, the Sixth Committee had approved by consensus the 36-nation draft, introduced by Sierra Leone.

Explaining its position on the draft, the United States said that, had there been a vote, it would have abstained since it did not feel it was justified to agree to a conference merely because other topics had been so handled in the past; the matter could have been considered by the Committee in 1982. The United Kingdom agreed and pointed out that there was a precedent for written comments by Governments on the articles. Israel thought there was not enough time for Governments to reach a decision on a conference. Although in favour of the draft, the USSR felt the envisaged costs were excessive.

Many speakers supported convening a conference of plenipotentiaries, asserting that the draft articles generally provided a sound basis for a convention. A number also welcomed the ILC decision limiting the scope of the text and amending the title (formerly State succession in matters other than treaties). The Bahamas said a convention would consolidate opinio juris on the matter. Iraq believed it would provide newly independent States with guiding norms and practical solutions in areas of doubt. India saw a convention as of great practical value, whatever the likelihood of its entering into force. France agreed and thought it could lead to developments in customary law. Italy suggested a final clause be adopted to allow States to accede either to the convention as a whole or to any part, so as to encourage broader participation. Colombia, Hungary, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Venezuela commended including the principle of equity in the draft articles. Spain, however, felt that principle needed defining. Afghanistan, Sri Lanka and Tunisia welcomed the priority given to agreement between predecessor and successor States. Indonesia suggested the draft articles should be an additional protocol to the 1978 Vienna Convention.

However, some delegations, questioning whether a convention was the most effective means of promoting the progressive development and codification of international law on the topic, urged further study. Australia said sensitive economic and political issues as well as complex legal problems were raised. Canada felt that Governments should have the opportunity to submit written comments on the text for the Sixth Committee discussion in 1982. The Federal Republic of Germany spoke similarly. The USSR also favoured such discussion, although it considered that ILC had arrived at an acceptable basis for a convention. Japan stressed that there were several issues on which ILC had not concluded its debate.

Pointing out that decolonization had been substantially completed, the United States said it was disturbed that the draft looked to the past for a model when the future was likely to raise different problems. However, New Zealand thought the text would vindicate United Nations doctrine on decolonization and be a statement of belief in the continuity of State obligation and law and order in a changing international society. Similarly, Czechoslovakia thought a future instrument would facilitate settlement of complex financial issues connected with colonial heritage and safeguard the interests of new States. India considered those interests were protected by provisions contained in the draft and deserved global support.

Canada favoured including a general provision giving preponderance to the relationship between the effects of State succession at the time of succession and special agreements concluded subsequently. The Bahamas, Cyprus, Iraq and Kenya believed there was a need to provide for the settlement of disputes. Hungary felt that ILC should have given a more detailed commentary on the possibility of forms of State succession in matters other than treaties which were of primary importance in State practice.

Several developing countries expressed support for the inclusion of articles confirming the principle of permanent sovereignty of every people over its wealth and natural resources. Romania thought it necessary to exclude from the scope territorial changes resulting from the use or threat of force or from interference in the affairs of other States. China considered that the draft articles effectively denied the legitimacy of a succession occurring as a result of foreign aggression or military occupation.

The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Nigeria, Papua New Guinea and Sri Lanka were among those questioning the appropriateness of defining State property on the basis of the predecessor State's internal law. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya also questioned the definition as applied to State archives. Jamaica and Kenya felt parties should be free not to utilize such law. Egypt thought it more appropriate to consider the general principles of the world's main legal systems so that the successor's rights would not be infringed upon. Sierra Leone thought too much latitude was being accorded to the predecessor State.

Many speakers believed that the transfer of State property and archives should take place by right and without compensation. Egypt said this should be without prejudice to the right of the successor to demand compensation for the exploitation of its wealth and services. Kenya said the predecessor should give full information on the nature of property or archives; sanctions should be taken against predecessors failing to meet such obligations. Madagascar held a similar view. China remarked that, inasmuch as archives affected the security and vital interests of newly independent States, the draft should stipulate that the predecessor State could not arbitrarily duplicate, damage or destroy archives and must return them promptly to the successor. Ethiopia, Sierra Leone, Sri Lanka and Zaïre stressed that archives should be returned to the newly independent State even if they had been removed from its territory.

Concerning State debts, a number of delegations expressed misgivings about the draft articles on this topic. Several regretted that ILC had decided not to include in the definition of State debt a reference to any financial obligation chargeable to a State other than those owed to another State, an international organization or any other subject of international law. Australia, Austria, the Federal Republic of Germany, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia viewed the definition as too narrow. The Bahamas said that, since an article under general provisions stipulated that debts owed by a State to private creditors, whether natural or juridical persons, were not prejudiced by State succession, an effort must be made to produce a convergence of views. The United States found the omission a puzzling political gesture with no practical application. The Netherlands considered the rules seriously imbalanced since they dealt with only a fraction of State debt; whatever criterion was applied to distinguish between transferable and non-transferable debts, the person or status of the creditor was always irrelevant. Jamaica cautioned that excluding private creditors might make them reluctant to provide credit to developing countries. In Canada's view, debts were defined in such a restrictive manner that a predecessor State could remain a debtor after having signed over the reason for the debt. The Federal Republic of Germany spoke similarly.

Italy said the fact that such questions raised problems increased the need for their codification; safeguarding individual legal relationships had been a basic trend in the international community since adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948.<sup>(3)</sup> While New Zealand believed debts owed to a private creditor must be subject to governing municipal law and to rules of State responsibility, Finland pointed out that including private debts in the scope would, by extending it, involve amending other provisions; further consideration should be given by the conference to controversial questions. In China's opinion, the draft retained the notion of "any other subject of international law" which it felt unnecessary, ambiguous and controversial. Iraq and Zaïre also felt a clarification of that point was needed. Tunisia and Zaïre were among those supporting the non-transferability of State debts. Nigeria felt it should be made clear that the debt of the predecessor State passing to the successor was governed by the internal law of the latter.

A number of speakers, including Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, the German Democratic Republic and Mongolia, declared that the draft articles on debts should not extend privileges to the private creditors of the predecessor State. Bulgaria and the Byelorussian SSR claimed that State debts owed to individual natural and juridical persons did not fall into the category of obligations under international law. The USSR opposed protecting the interests of individual creditors at the risk of undermining the basic principles of such law. Argentina, Bulgaria and Madagascar said that the rights and obligations of private creditors were preserved elsewhere in the draft, and the Ukrainian SSR said the text established that State succession could not in itself affect those rights. Argentina said the ILC commentaries justified the solution opted for as well as the rejection of the broader definition. Afghanistan saw the articles as an improvement over the previous text.

China pointed out that the draft lacked a specific provision on non-transferability of odious debts—a principle of importance to developing countries. The German Democratic Republic also saw this as a shortcoming, while Bulgaria cautioned that excluding such a provision and one concerning war debts might have a negative political impact. Brazil felt further consideration should be given to mentioning odious debts. Egypt endorsed excluding such debts and régime debts which, it said, might be defined as debts involving special political interests. The Federal Republic of Germany warned against including a specific rule on odious debts, noting that the rules formulated for each type of succession might settle the issues raised.

United Nations Conference on Succession of States In respect of State Property, Archives and Debts
The General Assembly,

Having considered chapter II of the report of the International Law Commission on the work of its thirty-third session which contains final draft articles and commentaries on succession of States in respect of State property, archives and debts,

Noting that the International Law Commission at its first session in 1949 listed succession of States and Governments among the topics of international law selected for codification, that at its fourteenth session in 1962, pursuant to General Assembly resolution 1686(XVI) of 18 December 1961, it included the topic on its priority list and that at its fifteenth session in 1963 the Commission endorsed the objective of preparing draft articles on the topic,

Recalling that in its resolutions 1765(XVII) of 20 November 1962, 1902(XVIII) of 18 November 1963, 2045(XX) of 8 December 1965, 2167(XXI) of 5 December 1966, 2272(XXII) of 1 December 1967, 2400(XXIII) of 11 December 1968 and 2501 (XXIV) of 12 December 1969, the General Assembly recommended that the International Law Commission should continue the work of codification and progressive development of succession of States and Governments, taking into account the views expressed in the General Assembly and the comments submitted by Governments with appropriate reference to the views of States which have achieved independence since the Second World War,

Recalling further that, by its resolution 3496(XXX) of 15 December 1975, the General Assembly decided to convene a conference of plenipotentiaries to consider the International Law Commission's draft articles on succession of States in respect of treaties and to embody the results of its work in an international convention and such other instruments as it might deem appropriate,

Noting also that the Vienna Convention on Succession of States in respect of Treaties was adopted on 23 August 1978,

Noting further that, subsequent to the adoption of General Assembly resolutions 2634(XXV) of 12 November 1970, 2780(XXVI) of 3 December 1971, 2926(XXVII) of 28 November 1972, 3071 (XXVIII) of 30 November 1973, 3315(XXIX) of 14 December 1974, 3495(XXX) of 15 December 1975, 31/97 of 15 December 1976 and 32/151 of 19 December 1977, the International Law Commission, pursuant to General Assembly resolutions 33/139 of 19 December 1978, 34/141 of 17 December 1979 and 35/163 of 15 December 1980, completed at its thirty-third session its draft articles on succession of States in respect of State property, archives and debts,

Recalling that, as stated in paragraph 86 of the report of the International Law Commission on the work of its thirty-third session, the Commission decided to recommend that the General Assembly should convene an international conference of plenipotentiaries to study the Commission's draft articles on succession of States in respect of State property, archives and debts and to conclude a convention on the subject,

Mindful of Article 13, paragraph 1 a, of the Charter of the United Nations, which provides that the General Assembly shall initiate studies and make recommendations for the purpose of encouraging the progressive development of international law and its codification,

Believing that the successful codification and progressive development of the rules of international law governing succession of States in respect of State property, archives and debts would contribute to the development of friendly relations and co-operation among States, irrespective of their differing constitutional and social systems, and would assist in promoting and implementing the purposes and principles set forth in Articles 1 and 2 of the Charter,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the International Law Commission for its valuable work on the question of succession of States in respect of State property, archives and debts, and to the Special Rapporteur on the topic for his contribution to this work;

2. Decides that an international conference of plenipotentiaries shall be convened to consider the draft articles on succession of States in respect of State property, archives and debts, and to embody the results of its work in an international convention and such other instruments as it may deem appropriate;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to convene the United Nations Conference on Succession of States in respect of State Property, Archives and Debts early in 1983 at a place to be determined by the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session;

4. Invites Member States to submit, not later than 1 July 1982, their written comments and observations on the final draft articles on succession of States in respect of State property, archives and debts, prepared by the International Law Commission;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to circulate such comments so as to facilitate the discussion on the subject at the thirty-seventh session of the General Assembly;

6. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-seventh session an item entitled "United Nations Conference on Succession of States in respect of State Property, Archives and Debts".

State immunities, liability and responsibility

At its May-July 1981 session, ILC continued work on three other aspects of international law concerning States: jurisdictional immunities of States and their property (see below); international liability for injurious consequences arising from acts not prohibited by international law (p. 1231); and State responsibility for internationally wrongful acts (p. 1232).

State immunities

In 1981, ILC proceeded to prepare draft articles on jurisdictional immunities of States and their property,<sup>(1)</sup> in response to a 1980 General Assembly recommendation.<sup>(3)</sup> The Commission based its work on a third report by the Special Rapporteur, Sompong Sucharitkul (Thailand),<sup>(2)</sup> containing five proposed draft articles, and on material on State practice submitted by Governments in response to a 1979 questionnaire.<sup>(6)</sup> After ILC had discussed the proposed draft articles, the Special Rapporteur revised and reduced them to four—obligation to give effect to State immunity (article 7), consent of State (article 8), expression of consent (article 9) and counter-claims (article 10)—and placed them in part II of the draft dealing with general principles, together with the text on State immunity (article 6) provisionally approved by ILC in 1980.<sup>(7)</sup> The draft articles were referred to the ILC Drafting Committee, which was unable to consider them due to lack of time.

In its 10 December resolution on the work of ILC, the General Assembly recommended that ILC, continue preparing the draft articles.<sup>(4)</sup>

In the Assembly's Sixth (Legal) Committee, a number of States noted with satisfaction the progress made by ILC. Others reserved judgement, with several indicating that they were awaiting submission by the Special Rapporteur of part III of the draft articles, intended to deal with exceptions to or limitations upon the general principles of State immunity.

Most speakers considered the topic one of the most important in the current work programme of ILC and generally endorsed the inductive approach it had adopted. Opinions differed, however, on the nature and scope of the subject. One view was that the main legal basis for jurisdictional immunities of States was the important principle of respect for national sovereignty, while another held that ILC was faced with a conflict of sovereignties which could, however, be resolved through one giving in to another through consent.

India said ILC had approached the problem practically, but the Byelorussian SSR termed the draft articles unsatisfactory, because of their failure to address the substance or define the scope of jurisdictional immunity, and called on ILC to draw up norms applicable by all States without prejudice to their interests and sovereign rights. Romania felt greater account should have been taken of State practice, of the experience of developed and developing countries, and of trends in treaties on the subject.

Asserting that no State could exercise its sovereignty or jurisdiction against another State without the latter's consent, Sierra Leone suggested that consent be explicitly stated rather than implied. The United Kingdom said the concept that the exercise of jurisdiction in legal proceedings with respect to a foreign State required the consent of that State was unacceptable as a basis for further consideration. The United States asserted that too much importance had been given to the notion of State consent. Spain agreed and said that, when a State decided to grant another immunity, or when it claimed such immunity for itself, it did so not on the basis of consensus but out of its obligation to admit such immunity.

China, Czechoslovakia, Egypt and the German Democratic Republic considered the main legal basis for jurisdictional immunity to be respect for national sovereignty and sovereign equality of States. Nigeria noted that, since many developed countries had not opted for that theory but had chosen a more restrictive one and wanted to ensure the protection and promotion of friendly relations among States, many developing countries would have to review their State practice and decide whether or not to amend such practices to reflect only the restrictive theory or to allow room for reciprocal treatment between States. Mexico said ILC should view very warily the attempt by certain national courts to extend their jurisdiction, thereby violating other States' sovereignty. Japan believed it important that the text on exceptions to or limitations on the general principles be made available quickly, since it was on this that the division of opinion was greatest.

The Netherlands questioned whether it was possible to draft a complete set of rules suitable for inclusion in a world-wide convention and suggested that ILC formulate reasonably precise rules relating to cases in which every State was ready to recognize the immunity of another, while at the same time trying to formulate similar rules under which every State was prepared not to enjoy immunity.

The Federal Republic of Germany, which viewed business activities of foreign States as falling within the competence of domestic courts, considered unacceptable an approach based on the principle of absolute immunity and from which deviations were possible only with the consent of the State concerned. Iraq believed it important that the draft indicate that it did not seek to enunciate a general exemption for foreign States from the laws of the territorial State. Australia and Venezuela believed a draft entertaining the outmoded notion of absolute and unlimited immunity should be amended or, Venezuela said, refer instead to complete immunity.

Bulgaria and the German Democratic Republic had misgivings about the provision on possible counter-claims. Bulgaria said that, although the 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations<sup>(5)</sup> provided for counter-claims against a diplomatic agent, applying the same legal régime to States was not warranted.

State liability

Responding to a 1980 General Assembly recommendation,<sup>(3)</sup> ILC continued its work in 1981 on international liability for injurious consequences arising out of acts not prohibited by international law,<sup>(1)</sup> on the basis of a second report by its Special Rapporteur, Robert Q. Quentin-Baxter (New Zealand).<sup>(2)</sup> The report dealt with the topic's relationship with the régime of State responsibility, the intersection of harm and wrong and the importance of striking a balance of interests in regulating a trans-boundary harm, and proposed a draft article on the scope of the topic.

In its 10 December resolution on the work of ILC, the Assembly recommended that ILC continue preparing draft articles on the subject.<sup>(4)</sup>

During the debate in the Sixth Committee, although most speakers recognized the importance of the topic, some found the content unclear while a few were concerned that it was too close to that of State responsibility for internationally wrongful acts (see below).

India, Italy, Tunisia and the United States considered the two subjects to be distinct and said they needed to be studied independently without overlapping. The United Kingdom felt they were related and thought ILC should not reach a final conclusion on the scope of the topic until further progress had been made on State responsibility. The Federal Republic of Germany urged ILC to continue its cautious approach. Japan regretted the lack of agreement in ILC on its future approach to the work. Brazil spoke similarly and said that, if no prospects existed for developing satisfactory provisions, such work should be discontinued. Pakistan called for caution in considering the topic, as the principle of whether a State could incur liability for an act that was not wrongful remained unresolved in customary international law. Thailand felt the notion of liability was elusive because of the constant evolution of such law, pointing out that an act not prohibited at one time, such as a nuclear test explosion, could be prohibited subsequently. Venezuela did not think it possible to regulate the consequences of lawful activities carried out by a State within its own jurisdiction.

Bulgaria favoured emphasizing reparation rather than theoretical aspects of the origin of responsibility. The United States hoped the rules would combine the need to provide reparation with the need to take preventive measures. That, said Morocco, should not weaken the concept of direct liability and it pointed out that the traditional concept of liability had not kept pace with progress in science and technology. Poland said the draft articles should not only regulate compensation in connection with so-called "liability for risk", but also play a positive role in determining responsibility for damage to the environment.

While the concept of duty of care was found by some States to be insufficiently precise to be capable of general application, others supported its usefulness and felt it an appropriate starting point to formulate rules. Finland considered it inadvisable to use the concept in the context of liability. While not questioning the concept's existence, Brazil did not see how it could be developed into rules of a general nature. The United States observed that, whether the international duty of due care was a substantive obligation or a function of an existing obligation, it could provide a basis for notification and negotiation. New Zealand said it would be wrong to claim, that States had an absolute duty of care; no State could offer absolute guarantees regarding the consequences of its acts in such matters as protecting diplomatic agents. The Byelorussian SSR remarked that duty of care was without foundation in law and not applicable as a norm of international law. The Ukrainian SSR and the USSR spoke in like terms. The latter added that if it did exist it would be a primary rule whose infringement would imply the usual international responsibility. For Venezuela, the concept had moral but not legal value.

Austria said the duty of care and the duty to minimize injurious consequences corresponded to general rules of international law, which had been elaborated progressively. Argentina welcomed the attention given to the concept, as did the Bahamas and Nigeria. Algeria remarked that, in order to ensure a fair balance between the interests involved, responsibility should be grounded both on the concept of duty of care, in a more defined and subtle form, and on the obligation of reparation. One method of balancing interests, Mexico said, was by means of civil liability conventions and compensation funds.

Egypt considered the liability in question as objective or no-fault; criteria such as due diligence and the balancing of interests of States concerned should be applicable only when negligence could be proved.

State responsibility

In response to a 1980 General Assembly recommendation,<sup>(3)</sup> ILC continued its work on part II of a set of draft articles on State responsibility for internationally wrongful acts,<sup>(1)</sup> having completed in 1980 its first reading of part I on the origin of international responsibility.<sup>(5)</sup>

The Commission's work on part II was based on a second report by the Special Rapporteur, Willem Riphagen (Netherlands),<sup>(2)</sup> containing five draft articles-on the content, form and degrees of State responsibility-divided into two chapters. Chapter I dealt with general principles (articles 1 to 3), while chapter II described the obligations of a State guilty of an internationally wrongful act (articles 4 and 5). The five draft articles were referred to the ILC Drafting Committee, which was unable to consider them due to lack of time.

In its 10 December resolution on the work of ILC, the Assembly recommended that ILC continue preparing the draft articles of part II, bearing in mind the need for a second reading of part I.<sup>(4)</sup>

Most delegations speaking in the Sixth Committee felt the topic was the most important under consideration in ILC.

Several speakers, including the Federal Republic of Germany and Thailand, believed that the draft articles were a basis for further work. Spain and the United States were among those which felt it was difficult to consider the draft articles until it was clear how they would relate to one another.

Tunisia said that work done by ILC was an important step forward in codifying the topic. Chile agreed, and was joined by Japan in adding that ILC should complete the draft articles on responsibility for internationally wrongful acts, before drafting those on liability for non-wrongful acts (p. 1231).

A number of speakers emphasized that, in preparing part II of the draft articles, ILC should take due account of the provisions of part I. The Netherlands and the United Kingdom stated that, while in part I it had been possible to formulate abstract secondary rules applying irrespective of the nature of the international obligation breached, 'in part II it would be necessary to have regard to those factors. The German Democratic Republic said that, once an internationally wrongful act had been defined, the point was to define the content of the legal situation generated by such an act. Egypt and Venezuela favoured linking the parts with a statement that an internationally wrongful act of a State gave rise to obligations of that State and to rights of others. Bangladesh thought it might be necessary to re-examine part I in the context of the work on part II. Nigeria said efforts should be made to review the abstract nature of part I.

The Byelorussian SSR said the articles lacked clarity and required extensive redrafting. Yugoslavia believed ILC had yet to establish an appropriate legal framework and basic principles for the topic's future elaboration. Egypt would have preferred an approach basing responsibility on three elements-the author of the injury, the injury and degree of causality-with compensation based on differentiating between contractual and delictual responsibility.

For the USSR, the correct approach was to affirm the rights of the injured State, rather than to establish new forms of responsibility of the State committing an internationally wrongful act (the author State). The German Democratic Republic and the Ukrainian SSR said ILC should concentrate on international responsibility for international crimes. Zaire believed the draft should contain specific rules on implementation.

Algeria, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Ethiopia and Poland were among those expressing misgivings about draft articles 1 and 3 which, they felt, gave the impression of safeguarding the rights of the author State and granting it, rather than the injured State, the right of option with regard to the forms of compensation. Brazil, Iraq, Morocco and Romania suggested that the articles be combined, and Venezuela pointed to possibilities for their re-examination and adjustment. Disagreeing, Mexico said international law should protect the author State, so as to prevent counter-measures from becoming reprisals. India said the provisions were not intended to protect the author, but to introduce the element of proportionality between a wrongful act and the response thereto.

Differing reservations were voiced on draft articles 4 and 5. The Byelorussian SSR said the obligations of a State committing a wrongful act should be seen from the standpoint of the rights of the injured State and those of all others, rather than from the perspective of the rights of the author State. Australia was concerned that some provisions gave the impression that the internal law of a State influenced the extent of its obligations under international law. In Brazil's view, draft article 5 would authorize a State to breach an international obligation for the price of compensation and that State, having failed to perform its obligation, could free itself from that duty through payment to the injured State. Mexico wondered rhetorically if, in the case of a breach involving the wrongful occupation of a territory, the author State might be allowed to choose between withdrawing or paying a sum of money, as implied by the option recognized in the article. The Federal Republic of Germany hoped the article's wording could be clarified. Poland could not support extending the scope of State responsibility to include relations with alien natural or juridical persons, while Iraq questioned the value of a special regime for that subject. Nigeria felt the provisions of both articles required further review, while the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya felt they should also specify the measures which could be taken by an injured State.

China said that, since an internationally wrongful State act did not necessarily create a new legal relationship with a third State, it was important to stipulate the specific circumstances under which the wrongful act affected a third State, in order to prevent countries from deliberately seeking pretexts for unlawful interference in the disputes of others. Finland said the system of responsibility should be made sufficiently effective to eliminate the need for the injured State to resort to actions endangering the maintenance of peace; sanctions or punitive measures should not be left to the discretion of injured States, and applying such measures should, unless otherwise agreed, be the international community's responsibility. Although opposed to approaches leading to conflicts and disregard for international law in settling disputes, Bulgaria did not reject all legitimate State countermeasures and, with Egypt and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, believed the sanction should always be in proportion to the violation. China spoke similarly. Pakistan held that the articles should embody the general principle of law and equity and that a State could not be held liable for the acts of its enemies. Poland shared the view of ILC that eliminating or limiting wrongfulness did not prejudice the question of proper compensation; thus a State causing damage was properly held to be liable, even when it had acted out of distress or necessity.

Chapter IV

International organizations and international law

The role of the United Nations in the contemporary world continued to be the focus during 1981 of work by the Special Committee on the Charter of the United Nations and on the Strengthening of the Role of the Organization. At its February/March session, the Committee studied proposals on ways to maintain and consolidate international peace and security. (1) The General Assembly, in December, decided that the Committee should accord priority to such proposals in 1982, including suggestions relating to the functioning of the Security Council.(4) The Committee also began considering ways to rationalize United Nations procedures.

In December, the Assembly asked the Secretary-General to give high priority to preparing and publishing supplements updating the Repertoire of the Practice of the Security Council and the Repertory of Practice of United Nations Organs.(5)

The Committee on Relations with the Host Country, in November, made a number of recommendations<sup>(2)</sup>—endorsed by the Assembly in December<sup>(3)</sup>—aimed mainly at improving the security and safety of missions accredited to the United Nations in New York. The Assembly also dealt with the protection of diplomatic and consular missions generally (p. 1223).

During the year, China, Cuba and Uruguay extended their application of the 1947 Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies to several additional organizations (p. 1243).

Strengthening the role of the United Nations

In 1981, the Committee on the Charter continued working on a list of proposals concerning the maintenance of peace and security and the Assembly decided that the Committee should give priority to that work in 1982. Although a large majority of Member States favoured this course of action, differing views were expressed on several aspects of the Committee's work, including whether it should be empowered to make recommendations involving amendments to the Charter, its consideration of proposals concerning the functioning of the Security Council and its use of consensus in making decisions. Opinions also differed over a possible increase in the Council's membership and on reviewing or revising the Charter. In related action, the Committee began studying rationalization of the Organization's procedures.

Concern at delays in publishing the Repertory of Practice of United Nations Organs—voiced by both the Committee and the Assembly and the latter requested that the Repertory and the Repertoire of the Practice of the Security Council be speedily updated (p. 1239).

CONSIDERATION BY THE COMMITTEE ON THE CHARTER. The 47-member Committee on the Charter held its 1981 session at United Nations Headquarters from 17 February to 14 March.<sup>(2)</sup> In accordance with a 1980 Assembly decision,<sup>(3)</sup> the Committee continued studying Member States' proposals on maintaining peace and security. This aspect of the Committee's work was one of two main items considered by it in 1981 -the other being a draft declaration on the peaceful settlement of disputes (p. 1208). To consider both items, the Committee established an open-ended Working Group with the same officers as the Committee. Meeting from 20 February to 13 March, the Group based its work on a 1980 informal compilation of 74 proposals, divided into seven sections-submitted by Member States at annual Committee sessions from 1976 to 1980.<sup>(7)</sup> In addition, the Group had before it two draft recommendations: the first proposed by Egypt; and the second presented by Egypt on behalf of Committee members belonging to the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries. Both drafts would have had the Committee recommend that urgent efforts be made to enhance the Security Council's effectiveness. However, due to lack of time, no action was taken on the texts.

In the Working Group there were diverging views on the weight to be attached to the informal compilation as well as on how best to organize its discussion. Because of time constraints, examination of sections V to VII was not completed. On 13 March, the Chairman presented a document reflecting his assessment of the degree of progress made in the Working Group. He summarized the proposals on which general agreement was possible, those awakening special interest but needing further examination, and those on which agreement did not seem possible.

Also in accordance with a 1980 Assembly request<sup>(4)</sup> by which the Committee on the Charter was to consider Member States' proposals concerning the rationalization of existing United Nations procedures, the Group heard William B. Buffum, Under-Secretary-General for Political and General Assembly Affairs, review the Assembly's activities in that regard. He pointed to the work of the Committee on Conferences in investigating ways of reducing the volume of United Nations documentation (p. 1371) and to the continuous increase in the number of agenda items as an area requiring study. Various suggestions were made in the Working Group on the need to avoid having different aspects of the same item discussed in different committees, the role of the Assembly's General Committee in streamlining the agenda, the involvement of the Sixth (Legal) Committee in drafting treaties and conventions (p. 1245), the need to ensure absolute equality among working languages, computerization, control of documentation, and the burden placed on United Nations facilities by meetings of bodies not directly connected with the Organization or its work.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 11 December, the General Assembly adopted a resolution<sup>(5)</sup> by which it decided that the Committee on the Charter at its 1982 session should continue examining current and future proposals with a view to according priority to those on which agreement seemed possible, and make recommendations thereon. The Committee was asked to give priority to proposals on maintaining international peace and security, including those relating to the functioning of the Security Council, and to consider suggestions by Member States on the rationalization of existing United Nations procedures. The Assembly reminded the Committee of the importance of reaching general agreement whenever that had significance for the outcome of its work, and decided that it should allow observers of Member States to participate in its meetings. The Secretary-General was asked to prepare for the 1982 session of the Committee an informal analysis of statements made in 1981 in the Assembly's Sixth Committee.

The resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 122 to 15, with 3 abstentions. On 1 December, the Sixth Committee had approved the 40-nation draft by a recorded vote, requested by the Philippines, of 100 to none, with 14 abstentions. This action was preceded by two separate Committee votes, also requested by the Philippines, on the draft's wording: by a recorded vote of 89 to 15, with 6 abstentions, the words "and to make recommendations thereon" contained in paragraph 2 (b) were retained; and by a recorded vote of 81 to 16, with 14 abstentions, paragraph 4 (a) was retained.

Another draft resolution was submitted to the Sixth Committee by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Mauritania.<sup>(1)</sup> By this draft, the Committee on the Charter would have been asked to examine what the sponsors called abuse of the unanimity rule by the Security Council's permanent members in adopting non-procedural decisions, namely, those on the inalienable rights of peoples struggling against racism, including apartheid, and other forms of foreign domination. This draft was approved by the Sixth Committee on 1 December by a recorded vote, requested by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, of 34 to 33, with 43 abstentions. On 11 December, however, the Assembly, at Finland's suggestion, decided by a recorded vote of 62 to 32, with 35 abstentions, to take no decision on the matter.

Speaking in the Assembly, Finland, pointing out that the majority of the Sixth Committee had been unable to support the two-nation draft, said the text's adoption would contradict the mandate of the Special Committee on the Charter and would jeopardize its work. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya said some States were threatening to withdraw from that body if the draft were adopted; the permanent members of the Council—all but China—preferred to maintain the Committee in its current form so that it would be unable to take any positive action. Sierra Leone, which voted in favour of the draft in the Sixth Committee and abstained on the Assembly's decision, said it hoped the Council, particularly the permanent members, would be put on notice that using the veto would no longer be accepted with equanimity.

A number of States explained their votes in the Sixth Committee on the 40-nation draft. Several explained their negative votes on the words "and to make recommendations thereon". The USSR feared their inclusion would upset the balance of the Committee on the Charter's terms of reference and adversely affect its work. The United States characterized the words as provocative and unjustified. The German Democratic Republic said attempts had been made in that Committee to secure adoption of what it viewed as one-sided recommendations. France pointed out that those words and paragraph 4 (a) ran counter to the spirit underlying the Committee's work as reflected in the Assembly's reminder about the importance of reaching general agreement, and urged that all proposals be dealt with equally.

Several other States also explained their negative positions on paragraph 4 (a). The USSR saw that text as an attempt to create an atmosphere of confrontation in the Committee on the Charter and to undermine Charter principles, especially the unanimity rule among the Security Council's permanent members (Article 27 of the Charter). The German Democratic Republic spoke likewise and pointed out that the text was incompatible with paragraph 2 (b) according to which priority should be accorded to proposals on which agreement seemed possible; experience had shown that the question of the functioning of the Council was not one on which agreement seemed possible. The United States said the provision relating to the Council was unnecessary, since the Committee on the Charter would be failing to fulfil its mandate if it did not examine all proposals.

Reasons for abstaining on the draft as a whole were explained by several delegations. Poland felt it would adversely affect the work of the Committee on the Charter. France and the USSR said their lack of support was because the provisions to which they had objected had been retained. The German Democratic Republic stated that, while it did not believe the draft would hamper the Committee's work, it did not contain sufficient guarantees against renewed attacks on the Charter.

The United States, although voting for the draft as a whole, considered the provisions on observers unwise and felt the financial estimates for the Committee's 1982 session needed re-examination—a view shared by the USSR. France regretted the proliferation of documentation inherent in the requests in paragraphs 11 and 12, while Sierra Leone, though voting in favour, questioned the usefulness of the proposed analysis since the Sixth Committee summary records met the needs of the Committee on the Charter.

The question of strengthening the role of the United Nations was discussed in the Sixth Committee concurrently with that of the peaceful settlement of international disputes (p. 1208).

Introducing the 40-nation draft, the Philippines stressed that the request for the analytical summary was intended to be an informal guide with special attention given to proposals made at the current Assembly session; and that the Committee on the Charter was to give priority to recommendations submitted during its 1981 session or thereafter, particularly those presented on behalf of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries and the Committee Chairman's paper.

A large number of developing countries objected to the unanimity rule, or right of veto, in the Security Council, which they saw as contradicting the principle of sovereign equality of States. Several believed world peace no longer depended on the Council's permanent members and that the large number of emerging countries and the expanding United Nations membership should be taken into account. Some, including Kenya, Uganda and Venezuela, asserted that the veto had been used to further national interests rather than to maintain international peace and security. Burundi felt it had introduced an element of rigidity which raised doubts about the Council's ability to act in complex international situations. The Congo and Zaire believed nothing could justify maintaining privileges originating in a bipolarized world emerging after the Second World War. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya termed the Council a dictatorial body where resolutions were adopted by the permanent members, with the presence of other members used to lend a democratic facade. Costa Rica considered the veto dictatorial and contrary to moral standards and international law. Bahrain said it should apply only to substantive Council resolutions, while Mali, the Niger, Nigeria and Sierra Leone called for limiting its use. Guyana and Somalia supported examining areas not requiring unanimity.

Mexico pointed out that all the permanent members had at some time, for transitory reasons of national interest, been in favour of amending the unanimity rule, and hence most Member States held little sympathy for the claim that Council procedures were sacrosanct. Egypt stressed the need for amendments to the Council's rules of procedure. Nepal attributed the Council's ineffectiveness to the complex relationship of its permanent members. Morocco called the proposal a theoretical exercise, since those empowered under Charter Article 108 to change the right of veto were the very ones who enjoyed it.

Upholding the unanimity rule as the cornerstone of the Organization, several Eastern European States and others, including the Byelorussian SSR, Democratic Yemen, the German Democratic Republic, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, claimed that, given the differing socio-economic systems in the world, the principle of unanimity reflected political realities and guaranteed fulfilment by the Council of collective goals. Czechoslovakia was among those which said the veto did not violate States' sovereign equality. Hungary added that Member States had voluntarily conferred powers on the Council and its permanent members by accepting the Charter. Mongolia said the veto had been used against the will of the majority of States not because its existence was contrary to that will, but because of misuse in self-interest.

France stressed that Council decisions must be agreed to by those having special Charter responsibilities if such decisions were not to be dangerous or ineffective. The Netherlands said proposals to abolish or limit the right of veto entailed risking confrontation between the Organization and one or more major Powers. Poland feared its curtailment might lead to the settlement outside the United Nations of important matters relating to international peace and security, thus weakening the Organization. While not insensitive to reviewing the unanimity rule, the United Kingdom felt a more cautious approach should be adopted, as it had suggested previously.<sup>(6)</sup>

Several developing countries, Guyana and Venezuela among them, favoured increasing the Council's membership because of the increase in United Nations membership and the principle of equitable geographical distribution. For Nigeria and Togo, it was unjust that the African continent had no permanent Council member.

Some Eastern European countries, such as Czechoslovakia and the Ukrainian SSR, considered change unwise, asserting that the membership was sufficiently balanced and reflected the world power structure, and that an enlargement would destroy that balance. If that were done, argued the Byelorussian SSR and Poland, the Council's efficiency and ability to act quickly would be reduced. However, a number of States, including Austria, Hungary, Iraq, Mongolia, Pakistan, the USSR and Venezuela, supported holding either a special session or periodic high-level meetings of the Council to review the international situation.

Among those advocating review or revision of the Charter, many developing countries, such as Algeria, Bahrain, Colombia, the Congo, the Syrian Arab Republic and Venezuela, believed the Organization could no longer remain impervious to changes in international relations or be unwilling to adapt to current realities. Burundi said the crisis could be resolved only by substantial readjustments. Tunisia called for greater democratization. The Bahamas said it was complacent and cynical to see the Charter in its current form as perfectly balanced and reflecting the international political situation. Rwanda felt it was not a sacrosanct document. Zaire said opposition to modification was part of the great Powers' policy of exploitation. China asserted that strengthening the Organization would require overcoming obstacles created by those Powers. For Bangladesh and Uganda, any amendment should include making Member States fully committed to resolutions adopted unanimously or by consensus. Yugoslavia spoke similarly. While supporting Charter revision, Chile and Pakistan cautioned against changing its basic principles. Morocco believed in reviving the collective spirit, rather than revising texts or improving procedures.

Among those opposing revision of the Charter, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Finland and Hungary asserted that it had fully withstood the test of time and had proved its ability to respond to changing circumstances. That there had been no world war since the United Nations began, said Afghanistan, attested to the Charter's value. The Netherlands also felt the Organization had an impressive record on peace-keeping. For Austria, the Charter adequately took into account the legitimate interests of all. Belgium stressed that its provisions formed a balanced whole; any change would have to be prepared carefully to harmonize with that whole. Czechoslovakia and Mongolia also advised caution in introducing changes, while Poland urged fuller utilization of existing capacities. Many States, including Afghanistan, Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Ethiopia, Hungary, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia, Turkey, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR and Viet Nam, believed the Organization's ineffectiveness stemmed not from Charter defects but from lack of political will to abide by its provisions. Though not rejecting amendment, Cyprus, the Federal Republic of Germany and the United Arab Emirates spoke in like manner.

In relation to rationalizing existing United Nations procedures, Colombia emphasized the need to ensure absolute equality among the working languages. Some States also called for a review of the Charter. The Syrian Arab Republic said such a review could achieve a fairer balance among United Nations organs. Yugoslavia favoured making the Assembly a democratic negotiating mechanism. The Congo, Kenya and the Niger supported enhancing its role in maintaining international peace. Bangladesh suggested conferring secondary responsibility on the Assembly where threats to peace were apparent. Austria supported enlarging the Assembly's role provided such enlargement remained within the Charter's framework. Sierra Leone said involving all States in dispute settlement should be seen as a general effort to make international relations democratic rather than as an attempt to increase the Assembly's competence at the expense of the Council. Jamaica favoured making Assembly decisions on peace and security binding on States. Spain observed that the Charter did not give the Security Council primary responsibility for settling disputes, but provided that it should take the necessary action to safeguard international peace. Argentina stressed the need to leave the door open for change.

Indonesia saw merit in rationalizing structures and procedures, as did Austria, which suggested that each main organ undertake such a process for its own field of responsibility. The Netherlands and the United Kingdom said institutional development was best achieved by evolutionary processes preserving the integrity of particular institutions while gradually adapting them to meet new challenges.

A number of States, including Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, France, the Lao People's Democratic Republic and Poland, stressed the importance of not upsetting the balance between the powers of the Assembly and the Council. Similarly, Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR and the USSR did not agree with broadening-at the Council's expense-the roles of the Assembly, the International Court of Justice or the Secretary-General for settling disputes between States.

Differing views were voiced about the Committee on the Charter's practice of using consensus in its decision-making process. Austria, Bulgaria, France, the German Democratic Republic and Hungary favoured continuing that practice.

Czechoslovakia said it was ideal for achieving positive results while safeguarding the interests of all. New Zealand said consensus encouraged moderation. However, Burundi feared it had disadvantages when used akin to a right of veto. The Philippines said consensus was the major stumbling-block, while Zaire saw it as an artificial measure turning into a veiled veto.

Sierra Leone blamed the Committee's lack of progress on rigidity. Algeria said that body gave a semblance of normalcy to the Organization's shortcomings by conducting sterile academic discussions. Romania said the Committee, in its six years of existence, had not produced any recommendation aimed at strengthening the United Nations. Belgium and Italy urged the Committee to concentrate on improving United Nations procedures, not on Charter amendments. The USSR said the Committee's efforts should be based on strict adherence to that document.

Among those urging renewal of the mandate of the Committee on the Charter were: Afghanistan, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Belgium, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, Finland, Greece, Guyana, Iraq, Jamaica, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mali, Mongolia, Nepal, New Zealand, Nigeria, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Rwanda, Syrian Arab Republic, Togo, Turkey, Uganda, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Zaire.

Romania said the mandate should be clarified and the Committee should become a permanent Assembly organ, examining and making recommendations on all Charter questions. Cyprus hoped the mandate would become more action-oriented, particularly with regard to peace and security. That topic should be given priority, China urged. Argentina said the Committee should have sufficient latitude to work without undue pressure. The Federal Republic of Germany felt rationalization of procedures should be excluded from the mandate so that the Committee could concentrate on its principal task. Kenya hoped the Committee's future recommendations on maintaining peace and security would allow the views of the majority to be registered.

Updating Repertories of Practice

Concerned about delays in preparing and publishing the Repertory of Practice of United Nations

Organs, a number of members of the Committee on the Charter, at its February/March 1981 session,<sup>11</sup> called on the Office of Legal Affairs to update the Repertory quickly, as requested by the General Assembly in 1980,<sup>12</sup> and to publish existing volumes or reprint out-of-stock issues in appropriate languages.

Responding to the same Assembly request, the Secretary-General, in an October 1981 report<sup>13</sup> on both the Repertory and the Repertoire of the Practice of the Security Council, noted that with regard to the latter publication the seventh supplement, covering 1972-1974, had been published in English and that work on the eighth, covering 1975-1978, had begun. As to the Repertory, the report indicated that the original English version had been completely reprinted in 1980; a reprint of Supplement No. 1 was expected in 1982; and reprints in French and Spanish of the original and Supplement No. 1 were also projected for 1982. French and Spanish versions of Supplement No. 3 were scheduled for 1982 and 1983, but work had not started on the table of contents and subject index. The English version of volume I (Charter Articles 1-54) of Supplement No. 4 (covering 1 September 1966 to 31 December 1969) was being printed and volume II (Articles 55-111) was anticipated in late 1982 or early 1983. Work had also started on Supplement No. 5 (estimated at three volumes, covering 1 January 1970 to 31 December 1978).

The report stated that, since most Secretariat departments responsible for preparatory work lacked specialized research staff, work was periodically postponed in favour of more urgent tasks and, being residual in nature, was being done by personnel released from other duties. Annexed to the report were complete tabulations of the published volumes of the Repertoire and Repertory, as well as their supplements and translations.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 11 December 1981, the General Assembly adopted without vote a resolution<sup>14</sup> requesting the Secretary-General to give high priority to preparing and publishing the supplements updating both publications and to report on progress in 1982.

On 1 December, the Sixth Committee had similarly approved the draft, sponsored by 15 nations and introduced by Mexico.

Most speakers in the Committee, including Brazil, France, India, Japan, Pakistan, Spain and the Ukrainian SSR, supported updating the publications. Austria, Finland and Iraq urged that resources be allocated for that purpose, while Egypt believed a separate specialized unit should be established. Argentina spoke similarly.

Support for updating the Repertory was voiced by the Bahamas, Bulgaria, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Guyana, Morocco and Sierra Leone. Bangladesh, Colombia, Nigeria and the United Kingdom felt the Office of Legal Affairs should continue co-ordinating its publication. Belgium said documentation should be kept within reasonable proportions. Israel and Italy were concerned that the work was characterized as residual, thus increasing delays. New Zealand stressed that the updating was directly related to the work of the Committee on the Charter and was no less important than any of its other tasks. The United States was dissatisfied with the Secretariat's response.

Recalling also its resolution 2482(XXIII) of 21 December 1968 on the budget for the financial year 1969 which provided new posts for the continuing work on the repertoires relating to the Charter of the United Nations, the practice of United Nations organs and the rules of procedure of the General Assembly, to be undertaken by the General Legal Division of the Office of Legal Affairs of the Secretariat,

Recalling further its resolution 35/164 of 15 December 1980 concerning the preparation and publication of the supplements to the Repertoire and the Repertory,

Taking note of paragraph 13 of the report of the Special Committee on the Charter of the United Nations and on the Strengthening of the Role of the Organization on the work of the session it held in 1981,

Taking note also of the report of the Secretary-General on the status of the preparation and publication of the Repertoire and the Repertory,

Recognizing the importance and usefulness of the Repertoire and the Repertory as the principal sources of records for the analytical studies of the application and interpretation of the provisions of the Charter and of the rules of procedure made thereunder,

Requests the Secretary-General to give high priority to the preparation and publication of the supplements to the Repertoire of the Practice of the Security Council and the Repertory of Practice of United Nations Organs in order to bring those publications up to date as quickly as possible and to submit a progress report on the matter to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session.

Host country relations

Concern over acts of violence against certain missions accredited to the United Nations and their personnel was expressed during 1981 in the Committee on Relations with the Host Country, and the General Assembly endorsed that body's recommendations to improve the situation and other aspects of relations with the host country-the United States.

CONSIDERATION BY THE COMMITTEE ON HOST COUNTRY RELATIONS. The Committee on host country relations held six meetings in 1981.<sup>(4)</sup> At its first, on 28 January, the 15-member Committee abolished the Working Group established in 1972 and decided that matters within the Group's mandate would be considered by the Bureau-Chairman, Rapporteur, three Vice-Chairmen and ex-officio representatives of the host country.

On the security of Member States' missions and the safety of their personnel, the Committee considered a number of complaints, summarized in its report, by the USSR and one by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.

The USSR informed the Committee that on 14 November shots had been fired at the residence of its Permanent Representative at Glen Cove, New York, while diplomats and their families were inside. The USSR said it expected full information from the host country on the prosecution and punishment of the culprits. Expressing its sincere regret over the incident, the United States stated that two persons had been arrested and charged; additional security precautions had been taken to prevent recurrence of such terrorist acts.

The USSR also advised the Committee of the discovery in May of an incendiary device within its Mission's housing complex at Riverdale, New York, and of three others near the Mission's summer house at Oyster Bay, New York. In September, explosive devices had been found beneath two vehicles belonging to the Byelorussian SSR and USSR Missions. The United States assured that effective preventive police measures had been instituted and stated that attempts to fire-bomb cars had ceased since the arrest of an individual charged with a similar incident involving another Member State.

The Committee was also informed by the USSR of numerous acts of violence and harassment, including provocative telephone calls containing threats, gross abuse and insults-310 of which were received during a 24-hour period on 24 March-and of demonstrations impeding the Mission's normal functioning. Stating that the campaign emanated from Zionist organizations, the USSR called the host country's security measures inadequate. The United States said it condemned irresponsible acts by its citizens against USSR personnel and their families, adding that it had reinforced the protection of the Mission and related establishments and that investigations had been undertaken. It rejected suggestions that the conduct of United States authorities was inadequate and stressed the need for timely reporting of incidents as well as the importance of full co-operation with law enforcement authorities in investigating crimes and prosecuting those responsible.

Annexed to the Committee's report were a 20 November press release by the USSR listing what it said were the most outrageous attacks against its Mission since 1971, and the response thereto by the United States, dated 30 November.

The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya informed the Committee that on 30 July an intrusion into its Mission had taken place and accused the host country authorities of collusion with the perpetrators.<sup>(1)</sup> Reaffirming its strong condemnation of all such acts, the United States denied the allegation and said the authorities had ended the occupation quickly.

Among other matters considered by the Committee were diplomatic status and traffic and parking regulations, as well as visa questions.

Several members complained about the policy of the City of New York concerning the towing away of diplomatic vehicles, which had been instituted in December 1980 before consulting the United States Mission. Bulgaria, Costa Rica, France, Honduras, Spain and the USSR maintained that the practice conflicted with the 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations,<sup>(7)</sup> prohibiting towing except in emergencies. The United Kingdom suggested that the host country justify each instance. The United States considered the practice compatible with the Convention and defended towing in cases where there were safety hazards; it assured that it would continue assisting all missions to conduct their business without disruption and that additional parking spaces had been requested.

The Committee also discussed requirements for issuing visas to private servants and to service staff employed in the United States by diplomatic and consular staff and by staff of international organizations; and listed in its report a compilation of treaties, local laws and regulations in force in the host country and of particular interest to the United Nations diplomatic community in New York, prepared by the United States at Mongolia's request.<sup>(3)</sup>

The Committee also had before it a letter from Morocco on behalf of the Arab Group,<sup>(2)</sup> protesting at slanderous and insulting comments made by Edward Koch, New York City Mayor, during a Middle East trip, and calling on him to apologize and retract remarks approving the annexation of Jerusalem and establishment of Israeli settlements, and his charge that the United Nations yielded to blackmail.

By recommendations approved on 30 November, the Committee:

- expressed concern over terrorist acts against diplomatic missions, condemned all such acts and called on the host country to ensure that urgent measures were taken to apprehend and punish those responsible;

- noted assurances given and actions taken by the host country and urged it to continue taking measures to prevent acts violating the security of missions and the safety of their personnel or the inviolability of their property, and to ensure normal conditions for their functioning;

- called on missions to co-operate fully with Federal and local United States authorities in cases affecting mission security;

- expressed the hope that the host country's international obligations relating to Member States' privileges and immunities would continue to be met effectively;

- appealed to the host country to review measures regarding the parking of diplomatic vehicles and to consider terminating the serving of summonses on diplomats;

- welcomed the diplomatic community's readiness to co-operate in solving traffic problems;

- expressed the hope that efforts would be continued to acquaint the people of New York City with the importance of the international functions performed by mission personnel and their corresponding privileges and immunities;

- suggested that the Secretariat and others work together to solve difficulties concerning the unpaid bills of certain missions and diplomats;

- expressed appreciation to the New York City Commission for the United Nations and the Consular Corps and those contributing to its efforts to help the diplomatic community, provide hospitality and promote mutual understanding between that community and the local population; and

- considered that its meetings should be organized both at the request of Member States and as necessary to fulfil its mandate.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 10 December, the General Assembly adopted without vote a resolution<sup>(6)</sup> endorsing the Committee's recommendations and requesting it to continue its work. The Assembly strongly condemned acts of terrorism against missions accredited to the United Nations and their personnel and requested the Secretary-General to remain active in all aspects of relations with the host country and to continue stressing to it the importance of effective measures to avoid such violent acts.

On 4 December, the Sixth Committee had approved by consensus the draft sponsored by 10 nations and introduced by Czechoslovakia.

In the Sixth Committee, several States, including Afghanistan, Mongolia and the USSR, considered that the host country had not taken sufficient measures to ensure the protection of missions and their personnel. The Byelorussian SSR spoke similarly. Cuba added that there had been no arrests or punishment of criminals involved in more than 40 violations against its mission since 1962, including the murder of a diplomat, and contended that the 1947 Agreement between the United Nations and the United States of America regarding the Headquarters of the United Nations<sup>(5)</sup> was applied by the host country to suit its own interests, including when issuing visas to officials travelling to United Nations meetings.

Nigeria commended the host country for coping well with the problems of missions, but urged that measures be taken to strengthen their protection and that of their personnel. Egypt also welcomed the host country's efforts to prevent affronts and humiliation.

Condemning all terrorist acts, the United States noted that, considering the prevalence of world-wide violence, living conditions for almost all the diplomatic community in such a large cosmopolitan city as New York were as calm as possible.

Chapter V

Treaties and agreements

Questions related to treaties and other international agreements continued to be studied by several United Nations bodies during 1981 and were the subject of decisions by the General Assembly.

In December,<sup>(2)</sup> the Assembly decided to establish in 1982 a working group of the Sixth (Legal) Committee to assess the multilateral treaty-making process and requested the updating of two publications related to that process: the Handbook of Final Clauses and the Summary of the Practice of the Secretary-General as Depositary of Multilateral Agreements.

Also in December, the Assembly recommended that the International Law Commission complete in 1982 its second reading- begun in 1981<sup>(1)</sup>-of draft articles on treaties concluded between States and international organizations or between two or more such organizations.

Throughout the year, international agreements and information about adherence to them continued to be received by the Secretariat for registration or filing and recording, and there were a number of ex-officio registrations (p. 1250). Multilateral treaties were also concluded under United Nations auspices and a number, for which the Secretary-General acts as depositary, came into force (p. 1250).

Drafting process of multilateral treaties

Responding to a 1980 General Assembly resolution,<sup>(2)</sup> the Secretary-General submitted to the Assembly in October 1981 a report, with later addenda,<sup>(1)</sup> containing the observations of 12 Governments and 7 international organizations on his 1980 report<sup>(5)</sup> which had set out a series of questions to be considered in examining the multilateral treaty-making process within the United Nations and other intergovernmental organizations. The 1981 report summarized the Sixth Committee's 1980 discussion of the topic, suggested questions that the Committee might address and contained information about material received pursuant to the review of the multilateral treaty-making process, with a view to its possible publication. The report suggested that the material be published as a volume of the United Nations Legislative Series, proposed an outline of its contents and estimated the cost at $33,132. In response to a 1980 Assembly request<sup>(3)</sup> for new editions of the 1957 Handbook of Final Clauses and the 1959 Summary of the Practice of the Secretary-General as Depositary of Multilateral Agreements, it was pointed out that additional temporary staff at a cost of $36,000 would be required to make possible their publication.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 10 December 1981, the General Assembly adopted a resolution<sup>(4)</sup> inviting Governments and international organizations to submit by 30 June 1982 their observations on the Secretary-General's two reports, taking into account the specific questions contained in that of 1981, as well as their comments on any other aspect of the subject. The Secretary-General was requested to submit the replies to the Assembly in 1982, and to prepare and publish as soon as possible new editions of the Handbook and the Summary. The Assembly decided to establish at its 1982 session a Sixth Committee working group to consider the questions raised in the 1981 report, to assess the efficiency, economy and effectiveness of the United Nations multilateral treaty-making process and to make recommendations. The Secretary-General was further asked to prepare for 1982 a provisional volume of the Legislative Series containing the material listed in his 1981 report, as well as an analysis of the observations received.

The resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 128 to none, with 18 abstentions. On 1 December, the Sixth Committee had approved the draft, sponsored by 17 nations, by 94 votes to none, with 17 abstentions.

Several delegations explained their votes in the Committee. Brazil, the German Democratic Republic and the USSR abstained, questioning the need for the subject's further analysis and for establishing a working group. The USSR added that the sponsors had failed to carry out consultations and had rejected a compromise to incorporate the majority view.

Although voting in favour, Algeria and Zaire doubted that a working group was the best method for dealing with the topic. Bahrain voted positively but withdrew its sponsorship as it had hoped the text would be approved by consensus.

Introducing the draft, Australia said closer study of the multilateral treaty-making process was urgently needed and would benefit all

Member States, particularly those developing countries lacking resources to participate effectively; the proposed open-ended working group should make speedy progress in view of the subject's politically non-controversial nature.

In addition to those sponsors who spoke in the Committee, support for establishing the group was voiced by Chile, France, Ireland, Italy, New Zealand, Pakistan and the United Kingdom. The Netherlands envisaged a small group also including international organizations, and Indonesia favoured limiting its size. Egypt preferred the group to be open-ended to allow participation of all Member States wishing to do so. Israel said the group's terms of reference should not be too broad and theoretical considerations should be avoided. Trinidad and Tobago, however, favoured establishing a special committee, while Sweden felt an inter-sessional committee, meeting for a few weeks, was preferable. Irrespective of the forum, the United States said, the need to examine the matter was evident. Although supporting the group's establishment, Greece cautioned that the work was likely to be of limited value apart from its academic interest.

A number of States saw no justification for the working group, as they saw no need to continue discussing the question. Afghanistan said it had been considered exhaustively. The Byelorussian SSR and Czechoslovakia agreed, citing the small number of replies received from Governments over a four-year period as indicating lack of interest. The German Democratic Republic and the Ukrainian SSR thought the group would distract the Sixth Committee from more pressing matters. Brazil and Spain also doubted the group's usefulness, while the USSR pointed out that its establishment would involve additional expenditure.

Concern over the problems caused by the abundance of multilateral treaties was expressed by several delegations. For Australia and Bangladesh, this factor and decentralizing the treaty-making process had led to lack of comprehensive and accessible information about legal provisions in particular subject areas. The United Kingdom wondered whether the United Nations system was generating treaties at a pace which strained States' capacity to cope with them. China, which considered the quality of some treaties to be questionable, was joined by France and Trinidad and Tobago in stating that it was essential to assess actual needs before drafting began. Argentina felt the need for a new treaty should be considered in the Sixth Committee, irrespective of the treaty's origin or the drafting agency's relationship to the United Nations.

According to Canada, Egypt and Sri Lanka, rationalizing the multilateral treaty-making process would be time well spent. Yugoslavia spoke in like manner, while Spain pointed out that improving the process would particularly benefit developing countries. Nigeria said machinery to reduce the diversity of practice was urgently needed in view of the Organization's increased membership.

Afghanistan, China, Czechoslovakia, France, the German Democratic Republic, Italy, New Zealand, Pakistan, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR and Yugoslavia were among those which considered it neither feasible nor appropriate to devise uniform and universally applicable multilateral treaty-making procedures, contending that such a move would restrict the flexibility necessary to meet the particular needs of the envisaged treaty. The USSR doubted that the effectiveness of the process could be improved by artificially limiting the number of instruments elaborated. The Byelorussian SSR considered such attempts as an affront to the sovereign right of States to solve questions regarding their treaty obligations. Afghanistan, the German Democratic Republic and the Ukrainian SSR saw no need to establish an international treaty-drafting bureau, and the USSR considered it unrealistic to establish rigid and universal rules determining the body responsible for preparation, or limiting the number of such bodies or the selection of procedures.

Zaire supported existing procedures. Uruguay thought they had proved effective, although improvement was possible. For Greece, the increased number of treaties indicated the diversity of the treaty-making process, and hence less likelihood of agreement on procedures. Argentina said the major difficulty in rationalization lay in the diversity of treaty-making methods; States and international organizations should be free to choose the methods most suited to their needs.

China, Greece, Italy, Trinidad and Tobago, and the USSR felt no one had the right to intervene in the ratification or accession process. Spain and the Ukrainian SSR said States should not be required to explain their non-accession, and the latter added that no attempt should be made to ensure a treaty's automatic entry into force. Romania rejected as contravening national sovereignty the idea of restricting the right to make reservations to particular treaty provisions. Nevertheless, Zaire felt the Assembly should encourage ratification or accession. Jamaica believed regional associations could help to accelerate ratification by urging States to ratify. For the United States, a request to consider ratification or to give reasons for not doing so did not violate a right. Trinidad and Tobago spoke similarly.

Regarding the United Nations role, Mexico said the General Assembly could co-ordinate and formulate recommendations on suitable topics for codification, while Zaire thought it should supervise the conclusion of treaties, including regional ones. Yugoslavia said the Assembly should influence the process through decisions and recommendations. Canada and France opposed making the Assembly responsible for the treaty-making activities of the entire United Nations system. Trinidad and Tobago and the Ukrainian SSR felt its role concerning treaties elaborated in other intergovernmental organizations should be limited to collecting and disseminating information.

Afghanistan, the German Democratic Republic and the USSR were among those which considered that the Sixth Committee could, in some cases, complete draft treaties elaborated by such bodies as the International Law Commission for subsequent Assembly adoption, thereby rendering it unnecessary to spend money on an international conference. Similarly, the Byelorussian SSR, the Ukrainian SSR and Zaire said final elaboration and adoption should take place in the Assembly or through one of its Main Committees, with a plenipotentiary conference reserved for exceptional cases. France, however, believed that such conferences should take care of all final negotiations.

Sweden suggested that thought be given to whether decisions should be taken by consensus or by majority vote, as a treaty adopted by consensus risked being deprived of substance. Zaire opposed making consensus the sole basis for decision-making, lest that should lead to use of a veto. Spain did not believe that adoption by consensus guaranteed a convention's success.

Stressing the usefulness of travaux préparatoires in ensuring better understanding of a treaty, China, Romania and Sweden suggested that records be kept. Canada added that a manual of drafting guidelines should be prepared—a view supported by Argentina and Zaire.

Updating the Handbook of Final Clauses and the Summary of the Practice of the Secretary-General as Depositary of Multilateral Agreements was urged by Argentina, Egypt, Greece, Italy, Mexico, New Zealand, Nigeria, Pakistan, Spain, the United Kingdom and Zaire. Israel also considered that new classified bibliographies on the law of treaties would be helpful. Trinidad and Tobago said a special committee could update the Handbook and also prepare a manual on treaty-making techniques.

While not opposing updating the Handbook, the USSR doubted that the results would justify the expenditure and effort. The Byelorussian SSR and the Ukrainian SSR said the update could be worth while if paid for from existing appropriations.

On other matters, Israel saw possibilities for a more detailed study of the technical problems connected with multilingual drafting, especially the practice of drafting conventions in six authentic texts. Chile warned against including provisions in an international instrument that were not relevant to its purpose.

Review of the multilateral treaty-making process

The General Assembly,
Bearing in mind that multilateral treaties are an important primary source of international law,

Conscious, therefore, that the process of elaboration of multilateral treaties, directed towards the progressive development of international law and its codification, forms an important part of the work of the United Nations and of the international community in general,

Recalling its resolution 35/162 of 15 December 1980, in which it invited Governments and international organizations to submit their observations on the report of the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly at its thirty-fifth session, as well as their comments on any other aspect of the subject,

Aware of the heavy burden which active involvement in the process of multilateral treaty-making places upon Governments,

Convinced that the most rational use should be made of the finite resources available for the elaboration of multilateral treaties,

Taking into account statements made at the current session during the debate on this item in the Sixth Committee,

1. Takes note of the reports of the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly at its thirty-fifth and thirty-sixth sessions, including the replies and observations made by Governments and international organizations on the review of the multilateral treaty-making process;

2. Decides, in the light of statements made on this item at the thirty-sixth session of the General Assembly, to establish at the thirty-seventh session a working group of the Sixth Committee:

(a) To consider the questions raised in annex I of the report of the Secretary-General to the General Assembly at its thirty-sixth session and any other relevant material submitted by Governments and International organizations;

(b) To assess the methods of multilateral treaty-making used in the United Nations and in conferences convened under its auspices to determine whether the current methods of multilateral treaty-making are as efficient, economical and effective as they could be to meet the needs of the Member States;

(c) To make recommendations on the basis of the above-mentioned assessment;

3. Invites Governments and international organizations to submit by 30 June 1982 their observations on the reports submitted by the Secretary-General, taking into account the specific questions contained in annex I of the report submitted to the General Assembly at its thirty-sixth session, as well as their comments on any other aspect of the subject, as they consider desirable;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session a report containing the observations and comments received pursuant to paragraph 3 above;

5. Also requests the Secretary-General to prepare documentation containing the material and information listed in annex II of the report of the Secretary-General to the General Assembly at its thirty-sixth session, in the form of a provisional version of a volume in the Legislative Series, as well as a topical analysis of the observations and replies received, in time for use by the working group referred to in paragraph 2 above;

6. Further requests the Secretary-General to prepare and publish as soon as possible new editions of the Handbook of Final Clauses and the Summary of the Practice of the Secretary-General as Depositary of Multilateral Agreements, taking into account relevant new developments and practices in that respect;

7. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-seventh session the item entitled "Review of the multilateral treaty-making process".

Recorded vote In Assembly as follows:

Treaties involving international organizations

As recommended by the General Assembly in 1980,<sup>(3)</sup> the International Law Commission (ILC), at its May-July 1981 session (p. 1264), commenced its second reading of 80 draft articles on treaties concluded between States and international organizations or between two or more international organizations.<sup>(1)</sup> The Commission based its work on the tenth report of its Special Rapporteur, Paul Reuter (France),<sup>(2)</sup> containing observations by Governments and a review of articles 1 to 41, provisionally adopted by ILC in first reading between 1974 and 1979. These articles were referred in 1981 to the Commission's Drafting Committee, which completed consideration of articles 1 to 26 except for a subparagraph of article 2, on use of terms. Thereafter, ILC gave its final approval to draft articles 1 to 26 (excluding the subparagraph), together with commentaries.

The adopted articles comprised: part I (articles 1 to 5), constituting an introduction; part II, divided into three sections—section 1 (articles 6 to 18), on the conclusion of treaties, section 2 (articles 19 to 23), dealing with reservations, and section 3 (articles 24 and 25), on entry into force and provisional application; and article 26 in section 1, on observance, of part III.

Stressing the relationship with the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties,<sup>(5)</sup> concerning treaties between States, ILC pointed out that the new draft dealt with the same questions but from the standpoint of their applicability to international organizations. At the same time, the text could stand on its own, independent of that Convention.

The Commission also pointed out that it had tried to simplify the draft's wording, retaining terms such as "ratification" and "full powers" for use in connection with States and "act of formal confirmation" and "powers" for international organizations. It also retained the rule that the capacity of an organization to conclude treaties was governed by its own rules, and that every treaty in force was binding on the contracting parties and must be performed by them in good faith. Changes of substance introduced in second reading included a provision concerning treaties constituting international organizations and treaties adopted within such an organization, and articles assimilating them to States in respect of their capacity to formulate reservations to treaty provisions.

In its 10 December resolution on the work of ILC,<sup>(4)</sup> the General Assembly recommended that ILC complete in 1982 the second reading of the draft articles, taking into account the written comments of principal international organizations.

During the Sixth Committee's debate, many delegations expressed satisfaction that ILC had started the second reading of the draft articles and, while others voiced regret that it had not completed the first 60 articles, most said that those which it had approved were largely acceptable and an improvement over the first reading.

Many States, including Algeria, Bangladesh, Chile, the Federal Republic of Germany, Indonesia, Iraq, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Morocco, New Zealand and Uruguay, supported the approach of ILC in maintaining a close parallel between the draft articles and the 1969 Vienna Convention, while making the draft articles stand on their own. Poland and Romania believed that the new rules should be the subject of an autonomous instrument, rather than mere reiteration of the provisions of that Convention.

Spain, however, considered that desirable simplification had been inhibited by drafting certain articles without reference to the Convention. The United Kingdom, referring to its suggestion that the draft articles be simplified by using the technique of renvoi (reference) to the articles of the Vienna Convention, did not regard as decisive the ILC argument that that technique had not been used previously in codifying conventions; it thought the legal difficulties hinted at by ILC seemed exaggerated.

A number of States stressed that international organizations could not be equated with States. Afghanistan, China, Colombia and Egypt pointed out that the capacity of organizations to conclude treaties differed since they were limited by their statutes and by their member States' decisions. Czechoslovakia and Mongolia said a sovereign State was the sole original subject of international public law. The Ukrainian SSR and Zaire felt different rules should apply concerning reservations while, for Romania, the draft limited States' rights in that respect. Uruguay considered ILC right in removing from the draft powers which the Vienna Convention accorded to States and in defining rules whose flexibility was in order for them only.

Spain considered that international organizations and States should be equated as far as possible, since they were equal subjects of international law. The United States questioned the need for some of the distinctions drawn by ILC between organizations and States. The Netherlands, however, cited a number of problems that could arise in applying the Vienna Convention's rules to organizations, such as the question of whether a treaty could create rights and obligations for an organization in respect of only some of its member States.

The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Pakistan and Romania believed there was a need for a more precise definition of international organizations in order to determine their specific legal personality. Argentina endorsed the ILC definition, which it felt accorded with that of the Vienna Convention, and urged ILC to tackle the question of so-called international public institutions. Nigeria suggested that differentiation be made among international organizations which, unlike States, were not all equal under international law. Algeria was surprised that national liberation movements had not been identified as entities capable of entering into obligations.

On the matter of time-limits within which parties to an agreement could object to reservations made by an organization to individual provisions, many States, including Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR and Czechoslovakia, opposed a clause in the draft text which envisaged tacit acceptance of reservations made by an international organization in the absence of objection within 12 months. The Ukrainian SSR and the USSR added that the competent bodies of the organizations met at different intervals and, therefore, no uniform time-limit would apply; together with the Byelorussian SSR, they suggested that the issue was best resolved by the parties to a treaty. Poland voiced similar doubts, while Tunisia urged that the question be considered more closely.

Welcoming the ILC decision to retain the wording of the Vienna Convention on reservations, the United Kingdom, for the European Community members, said the question of whether international organizations should be granted a longer time period than States could be resolved by evolving practice. Argentina and Spain welcomed the Commission's solution to the question, which for Uruguay was simple and legally viable. Jamaica believed the same rule should govern both States and organizations. The Federal Republic of Germany said the provisions no longer discriminated against organizations. Brazil favoured prohibiting organizations from formulating reservations when their participation was considered essential to the objectives of a treaty.

Morocco thought the draft provided only a partial response to the possible incompatibility of commitments made on the same subject by States as such and by an international organization on behalf of its member States. India was among those believing that the draft articles might need to be modified to ensure that changes in an organization's capacity and competence after the conclusion of a treaty did not affect the scope of the treaty relations between parties without their express consent. Canada suggested that international organizations wishing to become parties to treaties should submit either extracts of their statutes or a statement describing the established practice regarding their competence and procedures.

Uruguay pointed out that the draft did not include a provision on the invalidity of treaties. The Philippines urged ILC to reassess the use or definition of certain terms in the draft articles, adding that the progressive development of international law should not imply violating existing precepts.

While acknowledging that the draft articles had provided useful reference material for decision makers at both the national and international levels, France expressed the view that little progress had been made and prospects remained uncertain for a diplomatic conference for adoption of a convention despite the priority accorded to the topic by the General Assembly since 1969. Israel thought that, rather than incorporating the ILC work in a convention which might have an unwelcome impact on the Vienna Convention by changes in wording or interpretation, the articles should be reduced to general guidelines for the process by which organizations could become parties to multilateral treaties.

Registration and publication of treaties by the United Nations

During 1981, some 1,452 international agreements and 607 subsequent actions were received by the Secretariat for registration or filing and recording. In addition, there were 265 registrations for agreements and certified statements for which the Secretary-General performed depositary functions.

The texts of international agreements registered or filed and recorded are published in the United Nations Treaty Series in the original languages with translations into English and French where necessary. In 1981, 27 volumes of the Treaty Series covering treaties registered or filed and recorded in 1973 and 1974 were issued.<sup>(1)</sup>

In his October report, on registration and publication of treaties and international agreements carried out under Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations,<sup>(3)</sup> the Secretary-General reviewed the results achieved during the biennium 1980-1981 towards eliminating the backlog in publishing the Treaty Series. The report indicated that the backlog in registration, which had been steadily increasing until 1978, would be practically eliminated by the end of 1981, and that in the case of the monthly statements of treaties and international agreements registered or filed and recorded with the Secretariat,<sup>(2)</sup> the backlog was expected to be eliminated in 1982. A plan to eliminate the backlog in publication of the Treaty Series had been implemented only partially, due to recruiting and training difficulties.

To ensure gradual elimination of delays in issuing cumulative indexes to the Treaty Series, responsibility for them, which since 1956 had been entrusted to the Dag Hammarskjöld Library, had been taken over by the Treaty Section of the Office of Legal Affairs.

In addition, the report indicated that, as at 31 August 1981, 23 States, 8 specialized agencies and 5 intergovernmental organizations had replied to a 1979 questionnaire concerning activities in the matter of international agreements,<sup>(4)</sup> with a view to a possible modification of General Assembly regulations. Taking into account various factors such as the lack of response from Governments which were depositaries of important multilateral agreements, the Secretary-General felt it premature to submit a detailed report in 1981.

On 4 December, in a decision adopted without vote,<sup>(5)</sup> the Assembly took note of the report. On 19 November, the Sixth Committee had likewise approved the draft, as orally proposed by its Chairman.

Chapter VI

International economic law

The United Nations Commission on International Trade Law (UNCITRAL), composed of 36 Member States, at its annual session held at Vienna, Austria, from 19 to 26 June 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> considered a number of items on its work programme, including international commercial arbitration (p. 1253), international payments (p. 1254), uniform rules on liquidated damages and penalty clauses (p. 1256), the legal aspects of the new international economic order

(p. 1260) and co-ordination of trade law activities (p. 1257). The Commission's Working Group on International Negotiable Instruments adopted the complete texts of a draft Convention on International Cheques and a draft Convention on International Bills of Exchange and International Promissory Notes (p. 1254).

The 1981 report of UNCITRAL was considered and taken note of, on 29 September, by the Trade and Development Board of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development<sup>(2)</sup> as the Secretary-General informed the General Assembly on 2 November.<sup>(1)</sup>

By a resolution of 13 November,<sup>(4)</sup> the Assembly took note of the UNCITRAL report, welcomed its decision to draft a legal guide on contracts for the construction of large factories (p. 1260), reaffirmed its mandate to co-ordinate legal activities relating to international trade law, and stressed the importance of bringing into effect the conventions emanating from its work for the global unification and harmonization of international trade law. The Assembly also reaffirmed the importance, in particular for the developing countries, of training and assistance in international trade law (p. 1259). The resolution was adopted without vote, following its approval by consensus by the Sixth (Legal) Committee on 6 November. Introducing the 35-nation text, Austria expressed the hope that the work of UNCITRAL would continue as fruitfully as it had in the past.

On 10 December, the Assembly requested the United Nations Institute for Training and Research to prepare and complete by the 1982 Assembly session an analytical study on the progressive development of the principles and norms of international law relating to the new international economic order.<sup>(5)</sup>

Under another resolution of the same date, the Assembly invited Member States, United Nations organs and intergovernmental organizations to comment on the draft articles on most-favoured-nation clauses, as adopted by the International Law Commission.<sup>(6)</sup>

International trade law

Unification of trade law

International commercial arbitration

Draft model law

On 24 June 1981,(1) UNCITRAL decided to prepare a model law on international commercial arbitration, taking into account the Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards (New York, 1958) and the UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules (p. 1254), and entrusted the work to its Working Group on International Contract Practices.

In the UNCITRAL debate, the drafting of a model law was deemed desirable in view of the manifold problems encountered in current arbitration practice and of the need for a legal framework for equitable and rational settlement procedures for disputes arising out of international trade transactions. It was also stated that a model law could be of great value to all States, irrespective of their legal or economic system.

During the discussion of the UNCITRAL report in the General Assembly's Sixth Committee, a number of speakers, among them Austria, the Bahamas, Brazil, China, Colombia, Israel, Italy, the Netherlands, Pakistan, the Philippines, Spain, Sri Lanka, Venezuela and Zaire, expressed support for the drafting of a model law.

The Bahamas and Brazil believed that a model law would be of greatest assistance to Governments and could only advance the application of commercial arbitration. In Sri Lanka's opinion, a model law would constitute an indispensable guide to policy-makers, particularly in developing countries. Japan thought a model law would be useful in modernizing the arbitration laws of some States. Pakistan and Venezuela believed it would reduce legal obstacles, and Austria said it could contribute greatly to overcoming the difficulties of current arbitration practice. The Philippines hoped UNCITRAL would give priority to the preparation of the model law.

France considered it essential that, in preparing the model law, the Working Group adhere strictly to its term of reference and confine itself to the commercial sphere. The United States expressed confidence that, in preparing the studies and drafts for the model law, the United Nations Secretariat would follow the suggestions of UNCITRAL.

Italy said the preparatory studies should be conducted carefully and with the assistance of experts from countries representing the broadest spectrum of legal systems so as to avoid taking a single system of law as a model; therefore, the composition of the Working Group should be re-examined and enlarged to make it more representative. The view that the model law should take account of the different legal systems was endorsed by others, among them China, Colombia and Venezuela. China said the model law should be based on principles of mutual respect for sovereignty, equality and mutual benefit, and Spain stated that account must be taken of the principle of equity between the parties. In order to become a useful international instrument, China thought the model law should avoid imposing restrictions on the arbitration institutions in the various States.

Japan said the model law must be of a practical nature and sufficient attention should be paid to the use of terms.

UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules

By a decision of 23 June 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> UNCITRAL agreed on the desirability of issuing guidelines in the form of recommendations to arbitral institutions and other relevant bodies, such as chambers of commerce, in order to assist them in adopting procedures for their acting as appointing authority or providing administrative services in cases to be conducted under the 1976 UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules.<sup>(2)</sup> In this light, it requested the Secretary-General to submit in 1982 a revised text of the draft guidelines prepared by the Commission's secretariat.

The discussion in UNCITRAL revealed a divergence of opinion regarding efforts to discourage institutions from adopting administrative procedures which could modify the Arbitration Rules. Under one view, the guidelines should attempt to ensure, for the sake of uniform application and certainty of parties, that the Rules be left unchanged to the extent possible; under another, the guidelines should not prevent institutions from adopting procedures which modified the Rules according to their specific needs. It was agreed that the guidelines, whatever their final stand on the issue of modifications, should contain a recommendation to identify clearly any such modification by way of a reference to the modified provision of the Rules.

During the Sixth Committee debate on the UNCITRAL report, several countries, including Italy, Nigeria, Pakistan, the Philippines, Sri Lanka and Zaire, endorsed the preparation of guidelines. The United States held it important in drafting them to ensure some uniformity, so that parties would know precisely what procedure would be applied to them when they accepted arbitration.

The Bahamas and Spain believed that the guidelines should be sufficiently flexible, and Brazil cautioned against the risk of producing guidelines that were too stringent. Though supporting the publication of guidelines, France stated that arbitral authorities should continue to be free to use the Rules as they saw fit. Zaire felt that the guidelines should not prevent arbitral institutions from adopting subsidiary procedures modifying the Rules, should the need arise. Sri Lanka saw the guidelines as a supplement to those used by Governments and chambers of commerce.

Expressing regret that the guidelines had not been completed, Japan hoped the secretariat would re-examine the draft carefully in the light of the various points raised at the 1981 UNCITRAL session.

International payments

Draft Conventions on bills of exchange and promissory notes, and on international cheques

On 19 June 1981, UNCITRAL decided that its Working Group on International Negotiable Instruments should draw up as separate texts the draft Convention on International Bills of Exchange and International Promissory Notes, and the Uniform Rules on International Cheques.<sup>(1)</sup> It also requested the Secretary-General to circulate the texts, upon completion, to all Governments and interested international organizations for comments.

The decision was based on a recommendation made by the Working Group at the first of its two sessions held in 1981 (Vienna, Austria, 5-16 January; New York, 3-14 August). At that time, the Group noted that, despite considerable similarity between the law governing bills of exchange and promissory notes on the one hand and cheques on the other, there were inherent in the use of cheques special features which distinguished those instruments from bills of exchange and promissory notes.<sup>(2)</sup> One important feature was that the bill of exchange and the promissory note were primarily credit instruments, while the cheque was essentially a payment instrument. Further, in civil law countries the bill of exchange and the promissory note were seen as different from the cheque, and thus governed by separate legal texts.

When the Working Group met again in August, it decided to change the title of the draft Uniform Rules to 'Draft Convention on International Cheques' and adopted, with some modifications, the complete texts of both draft Conventions.<sup>(3)</sup>

During the Sixth Committee discussion of the UNCITRAL report, Austria, Italy, the Netherlands, the Niger, Pakistan, the Philippines, Sierra Leone, the United States and others noted with satisfaction the progress made in drawing up the two instruments. Canada said it had followed their elaboration with interest.

Austria believed agreement on the two draft Conventions would be an important step towards the unification of international law. Italy said the drafts should not be underestimated, for their aim was to replace the 1930 Geneva Convention providing a Uniform Law for Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes and the 1931 Geneva Convention providing a Uniform Law for Cheques, and to reconcile civil law and common law systems.

The UNCITRAL decision to prepare two separate texts was endorsed by a number of States, among them the Bahamas, Cyprus, France, Israel, the Niger, Nigeria, Pakistan, the Philippines, Spain, the Sudan, Venezuela and Zaire. Sierra Leone said it would wait for the final result before deciding whether there should be a single convention or two separate texts.

Different opinions were voiced on the procedure to be followed for adoption of the draft Conventions. Some countries, such as Cyprus, the Niger and the Sudan, favoured their adoption at a conference of plenipotentiaries, as suggested by UNCITRAL; others, including Brazil and Nigeria, thought the final texts should be submitted to the General Assembly.

Electronic funds transfer

On 22 June 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> UNCITRAL took note of a note by the Secretary-General,<sup>(1)</sup> where it was stated that the Study Group on International Payments—entrusted by UNCITRAL in 1979 with consideration of the legal problems arising out of electronic funds transfer, an item included by UNCITRAL in its programme for the first time in 1978<sup>(3)</sup>—had not met between the Commission's 1980 and 1981 sessions. Therefore, the secretariat was unable to submit any new information that would aid UNCITRAL in giving directives on the scope of further work; it would request the Study Group to recommend, in time for the Commission's 1982 session, whether UNCITRAL should undertake substantive work in the field at the current time and, if so, what the nature of the work might be.

Universal unit of account

At its 1981 session,<sup>(2)</sup> UNCITRAL again discussed a proposal to determine a universal unit of account of constant value, which would serve as a point of reference in international conventions for expressing amounts in monetary terms. Divergent views were expressed on the nature of such an automatic adjustment mechanism which might be used to solve the problem, generally recognized to be serious, of the erosion of the purchasing value of the maximum compensation recoverable under conventions which specified a limit of liability.

The Commission also considered a report of the Secretary-General, reflecting the view of the UNCITRAL Study Group on International Payments that the most desirable approach was to combine the use of the special drawing right (SDR)—the SDR being a unit of account whose value, calculated daily, was based on a "basket" of international currency—with a suitable index which would preserve over time the purchasing power of the monetary values set forth in international conventions.<sup>(1)</sup>

UNCITRAL agreed to request its Working Group on International Negotiable Instruments to consider various possibilities with regard to the formulation of a unit of account and to prepare a text, if possible. The Secretary-General was asked to conduct such studies as deemed desirable in the light of the Commission's 1981 discussion, and to submit them to the Working Group.

During the debate on the UNCITRAL report in the General Assembly's Sixth (Legal) Committee, several speakers, including the Netherlands and Pakistan, expressed interest in and welcomed the idea of establishing a universal unit of account, which was regarded as very important by others, among them Sierra Leone and the United States.

A number of countries, however, voiced reservations or called for further studies. Italy said the question was of less importance and it shared the doubts expressed by others concerning the usefulness of such an endeavour. Stating that consideration of the question was still at a preliminary stage, Brazil welcomed the caution shown by UNCITRAL in that regard. Venezuela preferred to wait for the Working Group's report and the Secretary-General's studies before giving its view. Zaire reserved its final position until sufficient progress was made.

The Philippines held it desirable that the Working Group prepare a text that would enable UNCITRAL to consider the question in more depth in 1982. Expressing keen interest in the studies, France said while the financial interests of the parties to a convention should be protected, it was desirable not to open the way to an excessive indexing which would have inflationary effects, thereby aggravating the financial situation of those States to be protected; further, the idea that the unit, designed to serve as a reference in international conventions, would also be used in certain international contracts raised some difficulties.

International trade contracts

Draft uniform rules

The UNCITRAL Working Group on International Contract Practices, meeting in New York from 13 to 17 April 1981, completed preparation of a set of draft uniform rules on liquidated damages and penalty clauses.<sup>(2)</sup> The five draft rules, on which the Group began work in 1979,<sup>(3)</sup> specified the circumstances and conditions under which a party to an international contract was entitled to recover or forfeit an agreed sum of money in the event of failure to perform or delay in performance. The rules would apply to both liquidated damages (where a contract sought to pre-estimate compensation payable on its breach) and penalty clauses.

When the Commission took up the question in June 1981, discussion focused on the possible form of the draft rules, with the greatest support expressed for a model law. Some support was also expressed for a convention or a recommendation. The Commission deferred a decision on this aspect to a later session.

On 19 June,<sup>(1)</sup> UNCITRAL requested the Secretary-General: to incorporate in the draft uniform rules such supplementary provisions as might be required if the rules took the form of a convention or a model law; to prepare a commentary on the draft rules; and to circulate them to Governments and international organizations for comments. The Commission also decided that, if those procedures were completed in time, it would consider the draft rules in 1982.

During the Sixth Committee discussion on UNCITRAL, several States, including Brazil, France and Spain, welcomed the Commission's decision to defer consideration of the draft rules.

With regard to the form the rules should take, Austria, Nigeria and Zaire favoured a convention, while others, including Italy, the Niger and Pakistan, supported a model law. Italy thought the scope of the draft rules seemed too limited to be the subject of a convention. The form of recommendations was preferred by Sierra Leone, which added that if they proved useful they could later be embodied in a convention.

Others declared they could not yet decide on the final form of the rules. France believed that the question of form had not come to maturity. Japan was not in a position to state whether it preferred a model law or recommendations; the question of form posed problems because of its possible relation to the peremptory norms of each State. Cyprus and Venezuela said they would give their views when the draft rules were circulated to Governments; Spain believed that the replies of Governments and international organizations should shed light on the advantages and drawbacks of different forms. China felt it would be difficult to decide without study of the rules by Governments. The Bahamas thought it appropriate that the Sixth Committee consider the draft rules as well as their final form.

Draft clauses against effects of currency fluctuations

Also in 1981, UNCITRAL continued consideration of protection clauses against the effects of currency fluctuations and agreed that its secretariat should continue to study the question and report at a future session.<sup>(1)</sup>

The importance of such draft clauses to protect parties to international trade contracts was stressed in the Sixth Committee by a number of States, in particular developing countries, among them the Bahamas, Nigeria, Pakistan, the Sudan, Venezuela and Zaire. Venezuela believed that their study should be pursued in greater depth, and Pakistan said they should be given priority at the Commission's 1982 session. Nigeria wondered whether it would be possible to regulate their content on a world-wide basis in order to eliminate the monetary risks involved in long-term contracts.

Trade law conventions

UNCITRAL continued in 1981 to stress the importance for the unification of international trade law of the entry into force at an early date, and the wide acceptance, of the Convention on the Limitation Period in the International Sale of Goods (New York, 1974);<sup>(3)</sup> the Protocol amending that Convention (Vienna, Austria, 1980);<sup>(6)</sup> the United Nations Convention on the Carriage of Goods by Sea, 1978 (Hamburg, Federal Republic of Germany);<sup>(4)</sup> and the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (Vienna, 1980).<sup>(5)</sup>

Acting on a 22 June decision of the Commission,<sup>(1)</sup> the General Assembly, in its 13 November resolution on UNCITRAL, requested the Secretary-General to bring those Conventions to the notice of all States that had not ratified or acceded to them, along with information on the mode of their entry into force and the status of ratifications and accessions.<sup>(2)</sup>

UNCITRAL had also recommended that the Secretary-General be authorized to invite States to supply information on steps taken with regard to ratification or accession.

Reservations on the UNCITRAL recommendations were voiced by several speakers in the Sixth Committee. Brazil, Colombia and Pakistan considered them outside the Commission's terms of reference and said they gave the Secretary-General powers not in conformity with his normal functions. France also expressed doubts, while the United States and Venezuela declared their support.

Co-ordination of trade law activities

During the UNCITRAL debate in 1981 on co-ordination of international trade law activities,<sup>(2)</sup> it was suggested that further efforts be made to strengthen co-operation with other competent bodies so as to avoid a duplication of work and the adoption of conflicting regional conventions. Noting the usefulness in ascertaining developments in the field of a report by the Secretary-General on current activities of other organizations,<sup>(1)</sup> UNCITRAL considered that its secretariat might select a particular legal area for intensive consideration, including the identification of specific parts of that area which had been or could be the subject of unification and the most suitable body to undertake that unification.

Reaffirming the Commission's mandate to co-ordinate legal activities in the field of international trade law, the General Assembly<sup>(3)</sup> recommended on 13 November that UNCITRAL maintain close collaboration with the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the International Law Commission (ILC), the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) and the Commission on Transnational Corporations, and continue to collaborate with other international organizations active in the field of international trade law. The Assembly also welcomed the invitations to UNCITRAL members by the Hague Conference on Private International Law and by the International Institute for the Unification of Private Law (UNIDROIT) to participate in their work.

By the same resolution, the Assembly expressed its appreciation to all bodies that had responded to the Commission's request for information on their activities in international trade law; endorsed the methods suggested by UNCITRAL to implement further its co-ordinating role; and called on Governments to ensure co-ordination of the work programmes of the various international organizations in which they were represented.

The importance of the Commission's co-ordinating role was stressed by a number of speakers in the Sixth Committee, among them the Bahamas, Colombia, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, the Niger, the United States and Yugoslavia. The importance of its co-operation with various bodies and organizations, such as the Hague Conference, UNIDROIT and UNIDO, was noted in particular by the Bahamas, Colombia, Italy, the Netherlands, Venezuela and Yugoslavia. With regard to the unification and harmonization of international trade law, Yugoslavia called for greater authority to be accorded to UNCITRAL, to encompass all activities connected with international trade law, including international private law; alternatively, serious consideration should be given to other means of ensuring efficient co-ordination of the growing number of activities in that sphere.

France expressed regret at the inadequate co-ordination between activities of UNCITRAL and other bodies, welcomed efforts to remedy the situation and considered it useful to increase contacts between the secretariats of various bodies dealing with international trade law. Chile, supported by Colombia, suggested that UNCITRAL co-ordinate its work with international or regional bodies outside the United Nations system, such as the Inter-American Juridical Committee. Israel also called for the strengthening of formal contacts between UNCITRAL and international regional organizations in the field. Zaïre suggested that the exchange of information and reports be strengthened.

Most-favoured-nation clauses

On 10 December 1981,<sup>(4)</sup> the General Assembly decided to seek comments on a set of draft articles on the scope and application of most-favoured-nation clauses in international agreements, adopted by ILC in 1978.<sup>(5)</sup> By a resolution adopted without vote, the Assembly requested the Secretary-General again to invite Member States, such United Nations organs as the regional commissions and UNCITRAL, as well as intergovernmental organizations, to submit or update comments and observations. States were also requested to comment on the ILC recommendation that the draft articles be recommended to Member States with a view to the conclusion of a convention. The Assembly decided to consider the substance of the draft articles, together with any amendments, at its 1983 session with a view to taking a decision. The Sixth Committee approved the resolution by consensus on 1 December 1981.

In connection with the Assembly's consideration of the question, the Secretary-General submitted in September a report containing comments and observations received from Governments, United Nations organs and intergovernmental organizations,<sup>(2)</sup> as well as a note containing an updated analytical compilation of those comments and observations.<sup>(1)</sup>

Introducing in the Committee the resolution co-sponsored by Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Mongolia and the USSR, Hungary said the sponsors had taken into account the views expressed in the Committee debate and decided not to insist that UNCITRAL alone examine the draft articles. However, the text contained explicit reference to UNCITRAL and the regional commissions in view of the particular competence of those bodies. Further, the text left open the option for either convening a diplomatic conference for the conclusion of a convention or having the Assembly finalize the draft articles. In reply to those who felt that UNCITRAL was not the proper place to deal with the question, Hungary asserted that nothing in the 1966 Assembly resolution which had established UNCITRAL and its mandate<sup>(3)</sup> restricted that body's competence to matters of private international law; further, the traditional distinction between public and private international law was becoming increasingly blurred both in State practice and in theory.

In explanation of position on behalf of the 10 member States of the Economic Community (EC), the United Kingdom expressed reservations regarding the competence accorded to UNCITRAL in paragraph 1 of the resolution, which invited that body to submit observations on most-favoured-nation clauses. The United States, which maintained that UNCITRAL was devoted exclusively to private law and not to trade policy or public law, joined the consensus because the wording of that paragraph allowed the recipients of the request to decline to reply, for instance for lack of competence.

During the debate, some countries, including Afghanistan, the German Democratic Republic and Romania, considered the proposed agreement on the most-favoured-nation clauses to be aimed at combating protectionism and constituting an important part of the legal foundations for a new international economic order. In a similar vein, Pakistan declared that the final text should fully accommodate the claim of the developing countries for preferential treatment in the field of international trade and economic relations. China asserted that the draft articles should define more clearly the links between most-favoured-nation clauses and the principles of equality and mutual advantage. The Ukrainian SSR considered that some States were trying to place unacceptable conditions, particularly political conditions, on the granting of most-favoured-nation treatment to other States.

The United States, on the other hand, said most-favoured-nation clauses should not be considered a means of solving the problems of developing countries or of making progress in the North-South dialogue. In Argentina's view, the question of the clauses was no longer of prime importance in economic relations.

While several Eastern European and other countries, including Afghanistan, Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Mongolia, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, believed the draft articles should be submitted to UNCITRAL for consideration, the EC members, Spain and the United States questioned the value or appropriateness of such action.

The elaboration and adoption of an international convention was favoured by Afghanistan, Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Portugal, Romania, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR and Zaire; the EC members and the United States considered it more appropriate to adopt the text in the form of guidelines annexed to an Assembly resolution. The United Kingdom, on behalf of the EC members, asserted that articles 28 and 29 (according to which the convention would apply only to treaties concluded after the convention's entry into force and would be subject to the terms of each particular treaty) indicated that the draft articles as a whole were intended to serve more as guidelines than as inflexible rules.

China had no preconceived opinion as to the final form the draft should take; however, in view of the existing difference of opinions on legal and political issues involved, it suggested giving the question more time. Chile and Portugal also considered that the subject required more thorough study, and Argentina, Nigeria and the United States supported inviting Member States to submit or update comments on the subject.

Commenting on individual articles, Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Hungary, Romania, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR expressed fear that articles 12 and 13, dealing with the "conditions of compensation" and the "conditions of reciprocity", were inconducive to the favourable development of international trade relations and might even promote protectionism or constitute a serious obstacle to implementation of the principle of most-favoured-nation treatment. Afghanistan, Czechoslovakia, Mongolia and Poland suggested deletion of these articles.

Portugal asserted the need for inclusion of effective provisions for the settlement of disputes. Need for precision in definition of terms was pointed out by some, and Spain believed the scope of articles 23, 24 and 25 on exceptions to the application of most-favoured-nation clauses should be more clearly defined. In addition, Argentina, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, the last on behalf of the EC members, were of the view that the draft should contain a further exception meeting the needs of customs unions, free trade areas and similar arrangements of economic integration, as provided for under article XXIV of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

Consideration of the draft articles on most-favoured-nation clauses

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 33/139 of 19 December 1978 relating to the report of the international Law Commission on the work of its thirtieth session, in particular section II of the resolution, Recalling also its resolution 35/161 of 15 December 1980, entitled "Consideration of the draft articles on most-favoured-nation clauses".

Reaffirming its appreciation of the high quality of the work done by the international Law Commission in elaborating a series of draft articles on most-favoured-nation clauses,

Bearing in mind the importance of facilitating international trade and development of economic co-operation among all States on the basis of equality, mutual advantage and non-discrimination in the establishment of the new international economic order,

Having considered the item entitled "Consideration of the draft articles on most-favoured-nation clauses", including the report of the Secretary-General and the analytical compilation of comments and observations from Governments, organs of the United Nations which have competence in the subject-matter and interested intergovernmental organizations, submitted pursuant to paragraphs 3 and 4 of General Assembly resolution 35/161,

Taking note of the comments and observations submitted, in particular those relating to outstanding issues,

Aware of the fact that more replies from States and interested intergovernmental agencies are needed,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to reiterate his invitation to Member States, relevant organs of the United Nations, such as the regional commissions and the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law, as well as interested intergovernmental organizations, to submit or bring up to date, not later than 30 June 1983, any written comments and observations which they deem appropriate on chapter II of the report of the international Law Commission on the work of its thirtieth session, in particular on:

(a) The draft articles on most-favoured-nation clauses adopted by the International Law Commission;

(b) Those provisions relating to such clauses on which the International Law Commission was unable to take a decision; and also requests States to comment on the recommendation of the international Law Commission that those draft articles should be recommended to Member States with a view to the conclusion of a convention on the subject;

2. Decides to consider the substance of the draft articles on most-favoured-nation clauses, together with any amendments thereto, at its thirty-eighth session with a view to taking a decision thereon;

3. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-eighth session the item entitled "Consideration of the draft articles on most-favoured-nation clauses" and to consider it as a matter of priority.

Training programmes in trade law

The Second UNCITRAL Symposium on International Trade Law was held at Vienna, Austria, from 22 to 26 June 1981, on the occasion of the Commission's annual session.<sup>(1)</sup> It drew a total of 58 participants, 15 of whom were awarded fellowships provided by contributions from nine Governments.

The Symposium dealt with issues on the past or current work programme of UNCITRAL—the international sale of goods, international payments (p. 1254), carriage of goods by sea, international commercial arbitration (p. 1253) and legal aspects of the new international economic order (p. 1260).

In UNCITRAL, there was agreement that it should continue to support symposia and seminars; that it was desirable for those events to be organized on a regional basis, possibly under joint sponsorship with regional organizations; and that its secretariat should make such arrangements as it found desirable in that regard. However, UNCITRAL noted the serious problems caused by uncertainty in regard to the programme's funding.

In its resolution of 13 November on the work of UNCITRAL,<sup>(2)</sup> the General Assembly reaffirmed the importance of training and assistance in international trade law; welcomed regional initiatives; and invited Governments, United Nations organs, organizations, institutions and individuals to assist in financing and organizing symposia and seminars.

In the Assembly's Sixth Committee, a number of speakers, including Argentina, the Bahamas, Italy, Kenya, the Netherlands, Nigeria, Sierra Leone and Yugoslavia, expressed satisfaction at the success of the Vienna Symposium and hoped that a third symposium could be held as soon as possible. Some States, among them the Netherlands and Yugoslavia, thought such symposia should become a regular activity. Cyprus and Nigeria regarded them as very useful and important for young jurists, and the Bahamas hoped that an increasing number of individuals from developing countries would participate. Pakistan, the Philippines and Sri Lanka regarded the UNCITRAL training and assistance programme as vitally important to developing countries.

The suggestion that regional seminars be organized found the support of several countries, including Canada, the Niger, Pakistan, the Sudan and Zaire.

Legal aspects of the new international economic order

Consideration of legal aspects of the new international economic order continued in 1981 in UNCITRAL<sup>(3)</sup> and in the General Assembly's Sixth Committee.

UNCITRAL WORKING GROUP ACTION. Meeting at Vienna from 9 to 18 June, the UNCITRAL Working Group on the New International Economic Order<sup>(4)</sup> considered 12 out of the 18 chapters of a study prepared by the Secretary-General on clauses related to contracts for the supply and construction of large industrial works, and noted that some 30 clauses remained to be studied by the Commission's secretariat. There was general agreement that the formulation of a detailed legal guide covering turnkey and semi-turnkey contracts (involving the provision of factories and equipment ready for operation) as well as their variants would be a first practical step in the direction of assisting developing countries in meeting their needs and aspirations.

On 24 June, UNCITRAL, at the suggestion of its Working Group, requested the Secretary-General to continue and complete the study, and entrusted him with the drafting of a legal guide identifying the legal issues involved and suggesting possible solutions to assist parties, particularly from developing countries, in their negotiations. It also requested him to submit, after preparation of the legal guide, a preliminary study on specific features of industrial co-operation contracts (p. 590).

The Commission's decision was welcomed by the General Assembly in its 13 November resolution on the UNCITRAL report.<sup>(8)</sup> The Assembly also called on the Commission and its Working Group to continue to take account of the relevant provisions of Assembly resolutions on the new international economic order.

During the debate on the UNCITRAL report in the Sixth Committee, a number of speakers, including France, Italy, Sierra Leone, Sri Lanka, Venezuela and Yugoslavia, welcomed the preparation of a legal guide. Several countries, among them Argentina, the Bahamas, Indonesia, the Philippines and the United States, regarded the guide as of great help especially to developing countries and as a contribution to the development of international trade by facilitating trade relations between States.

Sierra Leone suggested that UNCITRAL seek the co-operation of other organizations engaged in similar projects. In the view of the USSR, it was very important to co-ordinate UNCITRAL activities in the field with those of other competent bodies and organizations, in particular the United Nations Industrial Development Organization. Cyprus, Indonesia and Sri Lanka urged that the guide be completed as soon as possible. Zaire held it essential for the Secretariat to submit to UNCITRAL, if possible in 1982, a preliminary study on specific features of industrial co-operation contracts; it would be naive to think that the new international economic order could be established without intergovernmental agreements closely connected to it. The Netherlands, on the other hand, reiterated its position that UNCITRAL should limit itself to the private international law aspects of industrial and technological co-operation; issues of public international law and trade policy should be left to other United Nations bodies which were more qualified to deal with them.

Most countries, among them Canada and Indonesia, agreed that the drafting of clauses be postponed until the legal guide had been prepared. The Netherlands hoped that, based on the legal guide, the Working Group would eventually draft the clauses.

Italy and Japan were pleased that the Working Group had concentrated on a concrete study rather than on futile theoretical debate. A similar view was expressed by the United States. China, however, cautioned that the drafting of a legal guide should not exclude further steps towards the realization of the new international economic order. Pakistan felt that little concrete work had been done with regard to the establishment of the new international economic order; UNCITRAL should keep abreast of the latest trends in international negotiations without restricting its activities to the consideration of trade issues of a technical nature.

While agreeing with UNCITRAL that it would be too ambitious to attempt to deal immediately with all aspects of international trade law related to the new international economic order, Brazil expressed disappointment that so little progress had been made. Spain said the Commission's wish for more time to study all relevant questions must be granted. Venezuela called for further studies of topics related to the establishment of the new international economic order, while France held it inadvisable to entrust the Working Group with new studies before it completed its current task. Canada believed that the Working Group should avoid questions concerning international public law and should limit its efforts to the realm of international private law.

UNITAR STUDY. The General Assembly considered in 1981 a report of the Secretary-General containing a list, prepared by the United Nations Institute for Training and Research (UNITAR), of the existing and evolving principles and norms of international law relating to the new international economic order concerning the economic relations among States, international organizations and other entities of public international law, and the activities of transnational corporations.<sup>(2)</sup> The report also contained information received from Member States with respect to a UNITAR study in that field.

The UNITAR compendium,<sup>(1)</sup> a list of references to provisions of international conventions and resolutions of international bodies, organized by topic, covered international trade and monetary issues, international development assistance, debt, technology, foreign direct investment and transnational corporations, and global commons. UNITAR considered this to represent the first stage of the study, requested by the Assembly in 1980,<sup>(7)</sup> and declared that no attempt had been made to evaluate the extent to which principles and norms contained in various instruments had been implemented in the actual practice of States. According to UNITAR, what had been prepared in phase I constituted the first systematic attempt to draw together the dispersed mass of international sources into a schematic compendium; phase II would deal with the progressive development of the principles and norms of international law by examining the decisions actually taken by competent bodies and organs. UNITAR had learned that, while States might agree on the fundamental objectives of the new international economic order, there were definite and serious differences as to implementation which could not be ignored; it remained convinced, however, that political differences could be narrowed, or that the negotiation of differences could be expedited, by more complete data presented in usable form.

Taking note of the compendium, the Assembly, by a resolution of 10 December on the progressive development of the principles and norms of international law relating to the new international economic order,<sup>(9)</sup> requested UNITAR to prepare an analytical study on the subject for Assembly consideration in 1982. Member States were urged to submit relevant information, and United Nations organs as well as intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations active in the field were requested to co-operate.

The Assembly adopted the resolution by a recorded vote of 113 to none, with 32 abstentions. It was approved by the Sixth Committee on 2 December, by a recorded vote of 77 to 1 (Cuba), with 32 abstentions. Cuba ascribed its negative vote to technical error and requested that the summary record of the meeting reflect its support of the resolution.

Introducing the lo-nation text and stating that it dealt essentially with procedural matters, the Philippines made a few oral revisions. In the final preambular paragraph, the word "urgent" was deleted so that the Assembly simply recognized the need for the development of the principles of international law relating to the new international economic order. In operative paragraph 1, the Assembly took note of, rather than welcomed, the UNITAR study. The original paragraph 5, which would have had the Assembly request the Secretary-General to waive control and limitation of documentation rules on the study, was later deleted at the suggestion of the Secretariat, which said it was preferable not to raise the question of document control in the substantive part of the resolution.

Only those States abstaining in the vote explained their positions in the Committee.

Speaking also on behalf of Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Poland and the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR said the most appropriate body to carry out the study was UNCITRAL, not UNITAR, as the latter was not composed of State representatives and was therefore not empowered to make value judgements on matters which required consultations among States; the UNITAR report, however, contained such judgements. Further, the text would create an unusual situation in that UNITAR, financed from voluntary contributions, would be entrusted with a study financed from the United Nations regular budget; it would be more appropriate to entrust that study to UNCITRAL, which would have the added advantage of involving no financial implications. Also, the instruments mentioned in the second preambular paragraph-such as the 1974 Declaration on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order<sup>(5)</sup> and the 1974 Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States<sup>(6)</sup>—were only recommendations, and the question of deciding whether those should become binding rules could be settled only after a complete analysis of their application.

Spain abstained because of the reference in the second and third preambular paragraphs to Assembly resolutions on which it had abstained.

In the view of the United States, the level of political agreement on the nature of a new international economic order was not high enough to permit useful discussion of the so-called progressive development of the relevant principles and norms. The Federal Republic of Germany considered it unwise to try to establish a new international economic order by drafting rules not based on general practice accepted as law. Although concerned by the lack of a legal instrument to promote the establishment of a new international economic order, Argentina felt that such a shortcoming was preferable to an unsatisfactory text. Italy believed that legal evolution should follow and not precede socio-economic evolution and, since the socio-economic framework of the new international economic order was not currently very clear, the UNITAR study was premature.

France considered it untimely and premature to fix and crystallize negotiations that were taking place in other United Nations committees and bodies, while Belgium believed that codification and progressive development of the principles and norms of international economic law should be based on the principle of interdependence, rather than those benefiting chiefly the developing countries.

Chile and Uruguay had reservations on certain aspects of the UNITAR study, and the Federal Republic of Germany considered that the study had failed to make distinctions between existing norms and principles and those that were evolving; when there was neither a generally recognized law nor a practice accepted as law, there was a risk of politicizing the matter. The United Kingdom voiced reservations related to the list of subjects dealt with in the completed portion of the study; it hoped UNITAR would continue to use rigorous scientific criteria in completing its study and would show the utmost sobriety and realism.

Belgium and Italy also expressed doubts as to whether UNITAR could carry out within the brief deadlines such a difficult and ambitious study.

In the Committee debate, the USSR charged the imperialist countries with seeking to delay the advent of the new international economic order. Emphasizing the importance it attached to the establishment of such an order, Romania declared its support of the recommendations contained in the resolution.

Zaire asserted that the new international economic order presupposed the abolition of all forms of domination resulting from colonialism, hegemonism, neo-colonialism or racism, including Zionism; the drafting of a legal instrument within the context of the new order would have the advantage of laying down uniform standards to which States could refer in concluding trade agreements. Tunisia remarked that the unpredictable nature of international trade necessitated the identification and codification of principles and norms in the field, and that the fulfilment of the needs and aspirations of developing countries should be regarded as a legal obligation.

In Sri Lanka's view, no one had contended that the new international economic order represented legal norms; at the current stage, it represented the common goal of the rich and the poor nations in an increasingly interdependent world. Austria considered that a review of the progressive development of new principles and norms should not be interpreted as a preparation for codification, since those principles and norms existed primarily at the level of soft law.

Austria and the Netherlands felt the UNITAR compendium provided a useful basis 'for the future analytical study; the latter welcomed the Institute's intention to seek guidance from experts from various geographical regions representing the main legal systems. In Egypt's view, the study should not be too ample, should leave nothing vague and should elicit general principles on such topics as the protection of sources of natural wealth, the transfer of technology, co-ordination of economic operation and the law of the financing of development. Sri Lanka suggested that the study focus on the various principles and norms contained in international legal instruments that did not fully conform to' the principles and norms underlying the new international economic order.

While Nigeria and the Sudan regretted the availability of the UNITAR study in only one language, Egypt defended the situation for economic reasons.

Chapter VII

Other legal questions

Recognizing the substantial increase in United Nations membership since that of the International Law Commission (ILC) was previously expanded in 1961, the General Assembly in November 1981 enlarged the ILC membership from 25 to 34.<sup>(2)</sup> In December, the Assembly endorsed the Commission's intention to establish in 1982 objectives and priorities to guide its work programme within the five-year term of its members.<sup>(4)</sup>

During the year, activities under the United Nations Programme of Assistance in the Teaching, Study, Dissemination and Wider Appreciation of International Law included the granting of fellowships and the holding of seminars, lectures and training and refresher courses. In December, the Assembly authorized further activities for 1982 and 1983.<sup>(3)</sup>

The Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee, celebrating its twenty-fifth anniversary in 1981, was congratulated by the Assembly in November for its work in support of inter-regional and international co-operation.<sup>(1)</sup>

International Law Commission

The thirty-third session of the International Law Commission (ILC) was held at Geneva from 4 May to 24 July 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> during which further progress was made in developing and codifying international law. Draft articles were finalized on State succession in respect of property, archives and debts (p. 1227) and ILC started its second reading of draft articles on treaties concluded between States and international organizations or between two or more international organizations (p. 1248); both drafts were transmitted to the General Assembly by the Secretary-General.<sup>(1)</sup> Work also continued on draft articles on: the status of the diplomatic courier and diplomatic bag not accompanied by courier (p. 1225); jurisdictional immunities of States and their property (p. 1230); international liability for injurious consequences arising out of acts not prohibited by international law (p. 1231); and State responsibility for internationally wrongful acts (p. 1232). To ensure continuity of its future work, ILC arrived at several conclusions (see below).

ILC work programme

At its 1981 session,<sup>(1)</sup> ILC reached several conclusions concerning its 1982 work programme to ensure the programme's continuity, taking into account that the 1981 session was the last within the five-year term of the ILC members. The Commission stated its intention to give primary attention, in 1982, to treaties concluded between States and international organizations or between two or more such organizations, aimed at completing the second reading of the remaining articles of the draft and the annex. Concerning other topics, ILC intended to pursue work on State responsibility; and to continue studying State liability, State immunity, and the status of the diplomatic courier and bag, elaborating draft articles on each topic. At future sessions, ILC would work out draft articles on the law of non-navigational uses of international watercourses (p. 1222) and consider the second part of relations between States and international organizations. As to its long-term work programme, ILC anticipated that at its 1982 session- the first within the term of office of its new members-it would consider establishing general objectives and priorities to guide its study of topics on its 1981 programme for future sessions during a term of membership or longer.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 10 December, the General Assembly adopted a resolution<sup>(2)</sup> on the work of ILC endorsing its intentions regarding the work programme. The Assembly recommended that ILC complete in 1982 the second reading of draft articles on treaties involving States and international organizations; continue preparing draft articles on State responsibility, State liability, State immunity, the status of diplomatic bags and couriers, and the law of non-navigational uses of international watercourses; and continue studying relations between States and international organizations.

The resolution was adopted without vote. On 2 December, the Sixth (Legal) Committee had approved the 34-nation draft, introduced by Venezuela, by consensus.

During the Committee's discussion, many States, including Colombia, Iraq, the Sudan, Tunisia and Yugoslavia, saw the need for ILC to plan its work based on the five-year term of its members. Egypt called for a phased, cohesive programme, while the Bahamas and Cyprus urged realistic targets. The United Kingdom said the programme should leave room for new, narrowly framed items to be completed at one or two sessions. The German Democratic Republic felt provision should be made for the short-term treatment of topical political subjects. Australia, Bulgaria, Canada and Iraq believed that the number of topics at any one session should be limited. Israel, the United States and Zaire stressed that ILC should determine its own work methods freely.

The need for ILC to receive a clear mandate was voiced by many, among them Australia, Hungary, Indonesia, Israel, the Philippines, the Sudan and the United Kingdom.

A number of States, including the Bahamas, Brazil, the Byelorussian SSR, China, Cyprus, Iraq, Sierra Leone, the United Kingdom and the USSR, urged ILC to be more responsive to the current needs of the international community. New areas of activity should be addressed, said Australia and the Federal Republic of Germany. Romania hoped to see a contribution towards establishing a new economic order. Afghanistan, Algeria and Egypt called on ILC to adapt international law to contemporary realities, and the Philippines considered it appropriate to reassess every five years the role ILC played in that regard. New Zealand favoured regular reviews of ILC topics in the light of current requirements.

Hungary believed ILC should concentrate on general multilateral treaty-making. The Ukrainian SSR hoped it would continue promoting the progressive development and codification of international law. To that end, the Federal Republic of Germany, urging that the basic approach developed by ILC be retained, thought it should study important accessible topics and avoid intruding into speculative definitions of new rules. Sierra Leone hoped for reversal of what it saw as an ILC trend-encouraging the impression that certain topics were too political for its consideration.

Ethiopia and the German Democratic Republic were among those expressing general support for the conclusions reached by ILC on its future work. Asserting that it had responded efficiently to the international community's increased demands, Greece said that, if ILC was not working on new topics, the fault lay with the Assembly, the Sixth Committee and Member States. For Venezuela, the work of ILC had proved effective and no changes were necessary. The Philippines felt it had exceeded expectations, considering that it was not in session throughout the year, its members were not full time and it considered several questions simultaneously. Australia spoke similarly and said making ILC a full-time body would be counter-productive. Egypt thought it should continue meeting part of the year, with the special rapporteurs working full time. Thailand said the growing number of substantive items assigned to ILC and the Committee reflected the Assembly's confidence in those bodies. Morocco saw the Commission's work as satisfactory despite the many pressing, and not always mutually compatible, Assembly recommendations. The Sudan suggested that ILC continue its work on all agenda items under all circumstances, even in the absence of a special rapporteur.

Report of the International Law Commission

The General Assembly.

Having considered the report of the International Law Commission on the work of its thirty-third session.

Emphasizing the need for the progressive development of international law and its codification in order to make it a more effective means of implementing the purposes and principles set forth in the Charter of the United Nations and in the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and to give increased importance to its role in relations among States,

Noting with appreciation that at its thirty-third session the International Law Commission, pursuant to General Assembly resolutions 34/141 of 17 December 1979 and 35/163 of 15 December 1980, completed the second reading of the draft articles on succession of States in respect of State property, archives and debts, and commenced the second reading of the draft articles on treaties concluded between States and international organizations or between international organizations,

Noting further with appreciation the progress made at that session by the International Law Commission on State responsibility, international liability for injurious consequences arising out of acts not prohibited by international law, jurisdictional immunities of States and their property and the status of the diplomatic courier and the diplomatic bag not accompanied by diplomatic courier,

Taking note of the intention of the International Law Commission to appoint a new Special Rapporteur on the topic "The law of the non-navigational uses of international watercourses" and stressing the desirability of the Commission doing so at the commencement of its thirty-fourth session, thus ensuring continuity of its work on the topic,

Recognizing the importance of referring legal and drafting questions to the Sixth Committee, including topics which might be submitted to the International Law Commission, thus enabling the Commission further to enhance its contribution to the progressive development of international law and its codification,

1. Takes note of the report of the International Law Commission on the work of its thirty-third session;

2. Expresses its appreciation to the International Law Commission for the work accomplished at that session;

3. Recommends that, taking into account the written comments of Governments as well as views expressed in debates in the General Assembly, the International Law Commission should:

(a) Complete at its thirty-fourth session the second reading of the draft articles on treaties concluded between States and international organizations or between international organizations, adopted at its twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh and twenty-ninth to thirty-second sessions, also taking into account the written comments of principal international organizations;

(b) Continue its work aimed at the preparation of draft articles on:

(i) Part two of the draft on responsibility of States for internationally wrongful acts, bearing in mind the need for a second reading of the draft articles constituting part one of the draft;

(ii) International liability for injurious consequences arising out of acts not prohibited by international law;

(iii) The law of the non-navigational uses of international watercourses;

(iv) Jurisdictional immunities of States and their property;

(v) The status of the diplomatic courier and the diplomatic bag not accompanied by diplomatic courier;

(c) Continue its study of the second part of the topic of relations between States and international organizations;

4. Endorses the conclusion reached by the International Law Commission regarding the establishment, at its thirty-fourth session, of general objectives and priorities which would guide its study of the topics on its programme of work within the term of office of Commission members elected at the current session of the General Assembly;

5. Expresses its satisfaction with the conclusion of the International Law Commission that it will continue to keep under review the possibility of improving further its present procedures and methods with a view to the timely and effective fulfilment of the tasks entrusted to it;

6. Reaffirms its previous decisions concerning research projects and studies required by the work of the International Law Commission and the increased role of the Codification Division of the Office of Legal Affairs of the Secretariat, as well as those concerning the need for continuing provision of summary records of the Commission's meetings;

7. Urges Governments to respond as fully and expeditiously as possible to the requests of the International Law Commission for comments and observations on its draft articles and questionnaires and for materials on topics on its programme of work;

8. Reaffirms its wish that the International Law Commission will continue to enhance its co-operation with the legal organs of intergovernmental organizations whose work is of interest for the progressive development of international law and its codification;

9. Expresses the wish that seminars will continue to be held in conjunction with sessions of the International Law Commission and that an increasing number of participants from developing countries will be given the opportunity to attend those seminars;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to forward to the International Law Commission, for its attention, the records of the debate on the report of the Commission at the thirty-sixth session of the General Assembly and to prepare and distribute a topical summary of the debate.

Increase in ILC membership

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 18 November, the General Assembly adopted a resolution<sup>(7)</sup> enlarging the ILC membership to 34 and amending articles 2 and 9 of that body's Statute.<sup>(5)</sup> The Assembly also established a pattern of seat distribution, specifying the number of members to be elected from each of five regional groups, including two seats to be allocated among four groups on a rotational basis.

The resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 122 to 21, with 2 abstentions. The text was sponsored by Benin, Mexico and Pakistan in their capacity as the November 1981 Chairmen of the African, Latin American and Asian Groups, respectively.

Introducing the text, Pakistan, pointing out that the membership had last been increased to 25—in 1961,<sup>(6)</sup> stressed that since then the Organization had expanded considerably and that there was growing interest in the work of ILC, particularly by the third world; the proposed increase would ensure a balanced and equitable representation of different juridical systems.

Explaining the negative votes of the Group of Western European and other States, Finland (November Chairman) said the Group had agreed to a consensus designed to enlarge ILC to 32 with a view to providing equitable representation and eliminating so-called shared or floating seats, but further negotiations had disregarded that understanding, expanded the figure to 34 and increased the number of floating seats; and the draft had been submitted without the Group's knowledge. Also objecting to floating seats, Israel, which abstained, said membership could not be proscribed simply by virtue of membership in one or other of the existing regional groups, and added that those groups should try to include among their candidates qualified women jurists.

Subsequently, on 23 November, the Assembly elected 34 ILC members for a five-year term beginning on 1 January 1982 (see APPENDIX III).

Enlargement of the International Law Commission: amendments to articles 2 and 9 of the Statute of the Commission

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the importance of the International Law Commission as the main permanent subsidiary organ of the General Assembly entrusted with the promotion of the progressive development of international law and its codification,

Recalling its resolution 1647(XVI) of 6 November 1961, by which the membership of the International Law Commission was established at twenty-five members,

Noting that the membership of the United Nations has grown substantially since the adoption of that resolution,

Conscious of the increased interest shown by Member States, particularly those admitted to membership in the Organization since 1961, in the Commission's work on the progressive development of international law and its codification,

1. Decides to amend article 2, paragraph 1, of the Statute of the International Law Commission to read as follows:

"The Commission shall consist of thirty-four members who shall be persons of recognized competence in international law";

2. Also decides to amend article 9, paragraph 1, of the said Statute to read as follows:

"Those candidates, up to the maximum number prescribed for each regional group, who obtain the greatest number of votes and not less than a majority of the votes of the Members present and voting shall be elected";

3. Decides further that the thirty-four members of the International Law Commission shall be elected according to the following pattern:

- (a) Eight nationals from African States;
- (b) Seven nationals from Asian States;
- (c) Three nationals from Eastern European States;
- (d) Six nationals from Latin American States;
- (e) Eight nationals from Western European or other States;
- (f) One national from African States or Eastern European States in rotation, with the seat being allocated to a national of an African State in the first election held after the adoption of the present resolution;

(g) One national from Asian States or Latin American States in rotation, with the seat being allocated to a national of an Asian State in the first election held after the adoption of the present resolution:

4. Decides, by way of exception and in consequence of the enlargement of the Commission, to request the Secretary-General to include in the list of candidates for the election to be held at the current session, in addition to the nominations already received, such names as shall have been communicated to him in writing before 21 November 1981.

Recorded vote In Assembly as follows:

UN Programme for the teaching and study of international law

The 1981 activities of the United Nations Programme of Assistance in the Teaching, Study, Dissemination and Wider Appreciation of International Law were outlined by the Secretary-General in a report<sup>(1)</sup> submitted to the General Assembly in accordance with its 1979 request.<sup>(2)</sup> Among its contributions to the Programme, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization developed teaching materials for universities, held expert seminars and meetings, granted fellowships, trained young lawyers, conducted feasibility studies and assisted non-governmental organizations.

Fellowships

In 1981, the joint fellowship programme of the United Nations and the United Nations Institute for Training and Research (UNITAR) continued to be administered by UNITAR. Under the 1981 scheme,<sup>(1)</sup> aimed at middle-grade government legal officers and young teachers of international law, 17 fellows participated. They were from Angola, Barbados, Cuba, Egypt, Guatemala, Indonesia, Lesotho, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malta, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, the Republic of Korea, Senegal, Viet Nam, Yemen and Yugoslavia. The fellows attended law courses at the Hague Academy of International Law (The Hague, Netherlands); participated in lectures, seminars and courses organized by UNITAR; and some received practical training at legal offices of the United Nations and related organizations.

In its 9 December resolution on the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, the General Assembly invited States, universities, philanthropic foundations and other organizations to contribute to the Hamilton Shirley Amerasinghe Fellowship on the Law of the Sea (p. 139).

Seminars

The seventeenth session of the International Law Seminar was held at Geneva between 1 and 19 June 1981 with 23 advanced students or junior government officials participating.<sup>(*)</sup> Austria, Denmark, Finland, the Netherlands and Norway gave fellowships to participants from developing countries, and a private body, the Dana Fund for International and Comparative Legal Studies (United States), also made funds available.

In its 10 December resolution on the work of the International Law Commission (ILC),<sup>(2)</sup> the General Assembly expressed the wish that seminars would continue to be held in conjunction with ILC sessions and that an increasing number of participants from developing countries would be given the opportunity to attend.

Training in international economic law also continued to be offered in 1981 with the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law holding its Second Symposium on International Trade Law in June (p. 1259).

Report: <sup>(1)</sup>ILC, A/36/10.

Other activities

Under the assistance Programme for the teaching and study of international law,<sup>(1)</sup> the Secretary-General and the International Court of Justice continued in 1981 to provide copies of their respective legal publications to requesting institutions in developing countries, or to those institutions serving as library depository for United Nations publications.

The United Nations Institute for Training and Research (UNITAR) organized and financed a regional training and refresher course in international law for Africa from 28 February to 13 March at Cairo, Egypt, with 20 participants from: Burundi, Central African Republic, Chad, Ethiopia, Gabon, Ghana, Guinea, Kenya, Liberia, Mali, Mauritania, Mauritius, Morocco, Nigeria, Somalia, Swaziland, United Republic of Cameroon, Upper Volta, Zaire. Also attending were 15 persons from various ministries of the Egyptian Government.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION. The Advisory Committee on the United Nations Programme of Assistance in the Teaching, Study, Dissemination and Wider Appreciation of International Law met twice in 1981—on 13 January and 26 October—and discussed various aspects of Programme implementation in 1980-1981 and the Secretary-General's recommendations for 1982-1983, including the possibility of increasing the number of annual scholarships awarded to United Nations/UNITAR fellows, the selection of lecturers at joint seminars and financing.<sup>(1)</sup> The Committee also endorsed the Secretary-General's recommendation to establish the Hamilton Shirley Amerasinghe memorial fellowship (p. 139).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 10 December, the General Assembly adopted a resolution<sup>(2)</sup> authorizing the Secretary-General to carry out, in 1982 and 1983, the activities he had specified, including the provision of a minimum of 15 fellowships each year, a minimum of one scholarship each year under the Hamilton Shirley Amerasinghe memorial fellowship, and a travel grant for one participant from each developing country to be invited to regional courses during the period. The Assembly thanked all contributors to the Programme and requested the Secretary-General to continue publicizing it and asking for voluntary financing.

The resolution was adopted without vote. On 4 December, the Sixth (Legal) Committee had approved by consensus the draft introduced by Ghana on behalf also of the Bahamas, Cyprus, Egypt, Madagascar, the Netherlands, Sierra Leone, Somalia and the Upper Volta.

Proposal for a UN Day for International Law

In December 1981, a draft resolution,<sup>(1)</sup> sponsored by 10 States, proposing a United Nations Day for International Law was circulated in the General Assembly's Sixth (Legal) Committee.

The text would have had the Assembly: proclaim 8 April 1983 as the Day; invite all States to give special attention on that day, or any that month, to the role of international law; and call on world organizations to develop in 1983 special programmes relating to the role of such law in realizing the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

Speaking in the Sixth Committee, the Netherlands pointed out that April 1983 marked the four hundredth anniversary of the birth of Hugo Grotius, the Dutch statesman and jurist, whose legal thinking had left an impact on the teaching, study, dissemination and wider appreciation of international law; although the draft had been supported by delegations of various regional groups, it was being withdrawn in view of the need for further consultation on its specific wording.

Administrative and budgetary questions

Chapter I

United Nations finances

In December 1981, the General Assembly voted gross appropriations in the amount of $1,506,241,800 to meet the expenses of the United Nations under the regular budget for the biennium 1982-1983.<sup>(15)</sup> It also approved income estimates totalling $284,553,000, largely derived from staff assessment on salaries and wages.<sup>(16)</sup> The difference between the two figures resulted in a net budget of $1,221,688,800. After adjustments, Member States were to be assessed a net total of $604,916,600 for 1982.<sup>(17)</sup>

The budget was based on initial expenditure estimates proposed by the Secretary-General totalling $1,535,989,000 (p. 1272). In the foreword to his budget presentation,<sup>(4)</sup> the Secretary-General noted that, for the first time since 1954, the proposed budget did not provide for any growth in real terms. Largely on the recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ),<sup>(1)</sup> the Assembly's Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee approved expenditure estimates that were $29,747,200 less than the Secretary-General had originally requested. The final appropriation figure included $25,455,600 covering the financial implications of decisions taken by the Assembly and other organs in 1981, partly offset by revised estimates that showed a $10,262,500 reduction due to favourable currency exchange rates (p. 1273). The resulting budget reflected a real growth rate of 1.8 per cent in United Nations programmes, as calculated by the Secretariat in the final budget document<sup>(5)</sup> to eliminate the effects of inflation and currency rate changes.

The Assembly also gave its customary authorization to the Secretary-General to meet unforeseen and extraordinary expenses during 1982-1983<sup>(18)</sup>—including, for the first time, up to $300,000 for interorganizational security measures (p. 1383).

Also in December 1981, the General Assembly approved final appropriations totalling $1,341,704,300 for 1980-1981,<sup>(13)</sup> together with income estimates of $246,814,000.<sup>(14)</sup> This represented a $2,553,100 increase in appropriations (p. 1283) over the sum approved for this period in December 1980, more than offset by an $8,480,900 rise in estimates of income other than assessments on Member States (p. 1285).

The Fifth Committee received a proposal to provide new guidelines for budget formulation, presentation, review and approval, and obtained Assembly authorization to continue its consideration of the question during a resumed Assembly session in 1982 (p. 1286).

After considering a report by the Committee on Contributions concerning the budgetary assessment of Member States,<sup>(3)</sup> the Assembly decided in December to modify some of the criteria used for calculating assessment rates, with the aim of benefiting the less affluent States.<sup>(11)</sup> On the Committee's recommendation, the rates of the two States admitted to United Nations membership in 1980, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, and Zimbabwe, were set at 0.01 and 0.02 per cent, respectively.<sup>(12)</sup> At the end of 1981, $145 million in assessments for the regular budget remained unpaid (p. 1293).

In another December action, the Assembly decided to put aside in a special account the balance of the assessed contributions due from China for peace-keeping operations since 1971, and welcomed China's announced intention to begin contributing to the two Middle East peace-keeping forces as from 1 January 1982.<sup>(8)</sup>

After receiving a report from the Secretary-General stating that the United Nations deficit was expected to rise to $274.8 million by 31 December 1981,<sup>(6)</sup> the Assembly decided in December to increase the level of the Working Capital Fund (a reserve account) from $40 million to $100 million<sup>(19)</sup> and to suspend financial regulations providing for the return of unspent appropriations to Member States.<sup>(9)</sup>

Expressing concern at the persistence of inflation and monetary instability, the Assembly requested in December a study of their impact on the United Nations budget.<sup>(10)</sup>

In November, the Assembly accepted the 1980 financial reports and accounts of six United Nations programmes dependent on voluntary financing, as well as related reports of the Board of Auditors,<sup>(2)</sup> and requested remedial action required by the Board's comments.<sup>(7)</sup> It also decided to keep under review the question of the Board's organization and practices (p. 1302).

UN regular budget

Programme budget for 1982-1983

The approved 1982-1983 appropriations amounting to $1,506,241,800 for expenditures (p. 1275) and income estimates of $284,553,000 (p. 1279) were the final result of a budget process that began with the Secretary-General's submission in mid-1981 of a proposed programme budget calling for gross expenditures of $1,535,989,000 and income estimates of $284,606,900 (see below), or a net requirement of $1,251,382,100.<sup>(1)</sup> Prior to the General Assembly session, these initial requests were reviewed by ACABQ which recommended reductions totalling $45,853,700 in expenditures and $2,145,900 in income estimates.<sup>(3)</sup>

Following a general debate in October 1981 on the budget and related matters, the Fifth Committee examined these initial requests and recommendations section by section in a first reading of the proposed programme budget.<sup>(5)</sup> The result of the first reading was to reduce the Secretary-General's initial expenditure estimates by $44,940,300 and his income estimates by $1,988,000, leaving both figures slightly above the levels recommended by ACABQ.

During a second reading, the Committee added $25,455,600 in appropriations and $2,277,400 to the income estimates to cover the financial implications of 1981 decisions by the Assembly and other organs, partially offset by a $10,262,500 reduction in appropriations and a $343,300 reduction in income estimates as a consequence of revised estimates for items not included in the initial estimates (p. 1273).<sup>(2)</sup>

The following table shows expenditure and income figures at various stages of the budget process.

	Expenditures	Income
Secretary-General's Initial estimates	1,535,969,000	264,606,900
Secretary-General's revised estimates	225,500	965,500
Financial Implications estimates	29,701,400	2,793,500
Subtotal estimates	1,565,915,900	286,365,900
Initial ACABQ recommendations	(45,653,700)	(2,145,900)
Items reinstated by Fifth Committee	913,400	157,900
Revised estimates not approved	(10,488,000)	(1,306,600)
Financial implications not approved	(4,245,600)	(516,100)
Subtotal net reductions	(59,674,100)	(3,612,900)
Total approved budget	1,506,241,800	264,553,000

Recommendations concerning programme aspects of the 1982-1983 budget, made by the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination at its May/June 1981 session,<sup>(4)</sup> were taken into account by the General Assembly in the context of revised budget estimates (p. 1273).

Programme budget: S-G: <sup>(1)</sup>proposed, A/36/6, vols. I, II & Corr.1; approved, A/36/6/Add.1.

Budget estimates and policy

In the foreword to his proposed programme budget for 1982-1983,<sup>(1)</sup> the Secretary-General outlined his general budget policy and the main features of the proposed budget. His proposals entailed gross expenditures of $1,535,989,000; with income estimated at $284,606,900 from sources other than assessments on Member States, net requirements were estimated at $1,251,382,100.

The Secretary-General noted that, for the first time since 1954, the proposed budget did not provide for any growth in real terms, taking account of the efforts of Member States to contain their own public spending. In preparing the budget, emphasis had been given to the need to enhance the coherence and to achieve greater harmonization of the planning, programming and budgetary process.

In terms of real growth, the Secretary-General stated, the recurrent expenditures proposed for 1982-1983 (for activities likely to be carried forward into future budgets) involved a reduction of $3,450,500. Non-recurrent expenditures—mainly special conferences and construction projects—showed a decline from $78,798,000 in 1980-1981 to $38,684,800 proposed for 1982-1983.

The overall budgetary effect of inflation forecasts was an increase of somewhat under 12 per cent over the 1982-1983 estimates costed at 1981 rates, averaging approximately 8 per cent for each of the years 1982 and 1983. The Secretary-General's proposed appropriations included $161,165,900 in respect of anticipated inflation in 1982 and 1983.

In its first report to the General Assembly on the proposed programme budget for 1982-1983,<sup>(2)</sup> ACABQ recommended reductions totalling $45,853,700 in the initial expenditure estimates and a net reduction of $2,145,900 in the income estimates. Of the proposed expenditure reductions, ACABQ said that $32,876,700 was accounted for by provisional deletions pending the Secretary-General's submission of more up-to-date estimates; $5,870,300 was due to a recalculation of staff costs in units that had experienced above-average vacancy rates, on the assumption that more than the usual number of posts would go unfilled; and the remaining $7,106,700 was the result of "real" reductions. Of the 61 new posts requested by the Secretary-General, ACABQ recommended approval of 55.

Revised estimates and financial implications

Revised estimates submitted by the Secretary-General subsequent to his initial budget presentation for 1982-1983 called for a net addition of $225,500 to expenditures. This figure was composed of additional expenditures estimated at $36,700,700, largely offset by a $36,475,200 reduction resulting from adjustments in foreign exchange rates. The additions were presented in 14 reports detailing the costs of specific activities not provided for in the initial estimates. The reduction was due to the higher value of the United States dollar-the currency used for budget calculations-in relation to several other currencies in which the United Nations makes its expenditures.<sup>(9)</sup>

Mainly on the recommendations of ACABQ the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee<sup>(2)</sup> approved revised estimates that were $10,488,000 below the Secretary-General's proposals, resulting in a $10,262,500 net reduction in the budget. Of this reduction, $9,700,000 was due to the ACABQ recommendation, accepted by the Fifth Committee, that the most recent exchange rates-more favourable than those used in the Secretary-General's revised estimates- be used in calculating 1982-1983 costs.

Among the 14 items for which additional funds were appropriated, four exceeded $1 million (gross) each: construction of United Nations premises at Nairobi, Kenya (p. 1380), $19,135,800;<sup>(8)</sup> Arabic language services (p. 1369), $11,633,400 (partly offset by income of $1,667,900);<sup>(10)</sup> preparations for the Common Fund for Commodities (p. 550), $1,271,000 (offset by reimbursements of $1,847,000);<sup>(11)</sup> and the regional work programme of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) (p. 845), $1,225,800.<sup>(12)</sup> The Fifth Committee reduced the Secretary-General's estimates for Arabic language services by $231,600 to the amount shown above and approved the three other items as proposed.

Included in the revised estimates was a $31,100 reduction resulting from a recommendation of the Committee for Programme and Coordination (CPC) relating to a meeting on shared natural resources (p. 1274).

In addition to these revised estimates, the financial implications of decisions taken by the General Assembly and other major bodies during 1981, not included in the initial budget estimates, added $25,455,600 to the 1982-1983 gross appropriations. This was $4,245,800 less than the Secretary-General had estimated, the difference being due largely to reductions recommended by ACABQ and accepted by the Fifth Committee.

Among the 40 items on which the Secretary-General submitted financial implications papers, six resulted in appropriations exceeding $1 million (gross) each: conference-servicing costs for meetings added to the 1982-1983 calendar (p. 1368), $11,300,000 (less $1,300,000 in income, mainly from staff assessment); activities relating to Namibia, including a $1 million subvention to the United Nations Fund for Namibia (p. 1172), $2,747,100; the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea (p. 130), $2,324,700; implementation of the Substantial New Programme of Action for the 1980s for the Least Developed Countries (p. 408), $1,645,500; the Palestine question, mainly for strengthening the Special Unit on Palestinian Rights (p. 272), $1,086,600; and United Nations public information activities (p. 362), $1,011,200.

The approved amounts for these six items were those proposed by the Secretary-General except in two cases: the Fifth Committee cut conference-servicing costs by $2,384,800 and funds relating to the Namibia question by $126,000. In approving the sum for public information activities, the Committee decided not to follow an ACABQ recommendation for a $365,600 reduction.

Voting on these items took place as follows: The financial implications of an Assembly resolution of 10 December 1981 on the Palestine question,<sup>(3)</sup> involving additional resources for the Special Unit on Palestinian Rights in the amount of $1,031,600 ($998,000 net), were approved on 8 December by a recorded vote of 75 to 4, with 18 abstentions. The financial implications ($2,747,100 gross, $2,681,100 net) of six resolutions on the Namibia question, also adopted on 10 December,<sup>(4)</sup> were approved by the Committee on 9 December by a recorded vote of 87 to 5, with 8 abstentions, after the Committee approved $1 million for the United Nations Fund for Namibia by a recorded vote of 92 to 5, with 4 abstentions. The financial implications ($1,011,200 gross, $912,600 net) of a 16 December resolution on United Nations public information activities<sup>(5)</sup> were approved on 14 December by 74 votes to 22, with 8 abstentions.

Also among the financial implications was an addition of $296,400 gross ($283,800 net) to implement resolutions and decisions of the Economic and Social Council adopted during 1981 (p. 1092).

CPC ACTION. At its May/June 1981 session,<sup>(*)</sup> in addition to proposals on programme planning and budgeting procedures (p. 1304), CPC made a number of recommendations relating to 17 of the 32 sections in the proposed programme budget for 1982-1983. Most of them called for consolidation or elimination of specific programme activities.

Endorsing the conclusions and recommendations of CPC while taking account of reservations and comments by Council members, the Economic and Social Council, on 23 July 1981, decided to transmit the CPC report to the Assembly.<sup>(7)</sup>

In a resolution of 18 December on questions relating to the 1982-1983 budget,<sup>(6)</sup> the Assembly decided not to endorse four CPC recommendations, which would have involved the deletion of programme elements on conventional disarmament, welfare of migrant workers, corrupt practices of transnational corporations (TNCs) and substantive servicing of meetings on codification of international law. The Assembly also decided that the programme element on environmental law should be retained.

The Assembly adopted this section of the resolution, without vote, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee, which approved it on 16 and 17 December without objection. The text was based on oral proposals by the Chairman, made following consultations.

A CPC recommendation to delete an allocation for an ad hoc expert group on shared natural resources, which had already completed its work, resulted in a $31,100 reduction in the 1982-1983 budget.

In the Fifth Committee's discussion of the proposal not to endorse four CPC recommendations, the United Republic of Cameroon said it would have abstained if there had been a vote, as it thought it highly unorthodox for part of the CPC report to be amended in negotiations among Fifth Committee members.

The proposal not to endorse the CPC recommendation for deletion of the programme element on corrupt practices of TNCs was made by Egypt, supported by New Zealand, and was approved by the Fifth Committee without objection, with reservations by Japan. Deletion of the programme element on welfare of migrant workers, as recommended by CPC, was favoured by the United States and Yugoslavia, while Algeria and Pakistan spoke against its elimination. Retention of the programme element on environmental law was favoured by Canada, Kenya, Sweden and the United States, while Brazil and Yugoslavia spoke for the CPC recommendation to delete it.

Appropriations

In a resolution of 18 December 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> the General Assembly set out $1,506,241,800 as the gross total of appropriations for 1982-1983, divided into 32 budget sections. As in previous appropriation resolutions, the Secretary-General was authorized to transfer credits between sections with the concurrence of ACABQ all contractual (external) printing costs were to be administered as a unit under the direction of the United Nations Publications Board, and certain financial obligations in connection with the regular programme of technical co-operation were to remain valid beyond the budget period.

The resolution was adopted, by a recorded vote of 120 to 15, with 6 abstentions, following the recommendation of the Fifth Committee, which approved the appropriations on the same day by a recorded vote, requested by the USSR, of 85 to 14, with 5 abstentions.

The budget total was $164,537,500, or 12.3 per cent, above the revised appropriations for 1980-1981, approved on the same day (p. 1283). According to calculations by the United Nations Secretariat, contained in the 1982-1983 programme budget document,<sup>(1)</sup> the real growth rate between the two budgets-discounting the effects of inflation and non-recurrent costs-was 1.8 per cent.

Among States which voted against the appropriations, the Federal Republic of Germany felt that the budget was not a fair reflection of the world's financial and economic problems. Japan said the fact that the approved expenditure estimates remained within the original estimates was due primarily to favourable exchange rates rather than to a concern for economy, absorption, greater productivity and rationalization.

Also voting against, the USSR stated that the financial contributions of Member States continued to be spent ineffectively, uneconomically and, very often, for purposes inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations, as exemplified by the financing of the 1961 United Nations bond issue<sup>(3)</sup> and the inclusion of technical co-operation activities in the regular budget; the budgetary growth rate far exceeded the growth rates of Member States.

Explaining why it was voting against a new United Nations budget for the first time, the United Kingdom expressed profound dissatisfaction at the Assembly's failure to redeploy resources so as to avoid new appropriations; it added that a period of rational and controlled slimming would greatly improve United Nations efficiency. The United States, also casting a first-time negative vote, reiterated its support for the concept of zero net-programme growth and said the international community must learn to live with shrinking resources; the United States particularly opposed appropriations for activities of national liberation movements and the Palestine Liberation Organization, and did not believe that technical assistance programmes belonged in the regular budget.

Belgium voiced disapproval of several Assembly decisions which had increased appropriations and regretted that there would be almost no transfer of resources between programmes during 1982-1983; however, in recognition of efforts by ACABQ the Secretary-General and the Office of Financial Services to contain budgetary growth, it would abstain rather than vote against. France, which also abstained, said the budgetary growth rate, although well below that for the two previous budgets, was still much too high; it also stated reservations concerning the failure of the Assembly's other Main Committees to take sufficient account of the financial implications of their recommendations. Italy said it would abstain in the vote to encourage the Secretariat's efforts to keep the budget within the limits of low growth; new activities should be financed from resources released by redeployment.

Among those voting for the budget, Algeria, speaking on behalf of the Group of 77 developing countries, said the Group regarded the concept of zero real growth to be arbitrarily imposed and as having no legal basis; the debate had become frozen in positions of principle, even though the Group had made many efforts to co-operate with other delegations.

Though sceptical about the allowance made in the budget for inflation, and concerned about certain aspects of the budget and the Committee's review of it, Australia said it would vote in favour to show support for the Secretary-General's efforts for a budget approaching zero real growth, in the hope that that policy would be reinforced by maximum fiscal restraint. Canada said its positive vote showed willingness to support programmes for the developing countries; in turn, it looked to them for co-operation in holding down expenditures. New Zealand endorsed Australia's and Canada's comments as well as the appeal for efficiency and economy.

Denmark, speaking for the Nordic States, said they continued to support a policy of financial restraint as the starting-point for the budget but felt that the administration and financing of United Nations activities should be seen in a wider context; nevertheless, greater effort should be made to cover new activities by funds released from obsolete, marginally useful or ineffective ones. Ireland hoped that future budgets would tend towards the elimination of obsolete or marginal activities in order to focus on truly important programmes. The Netherlands explained that it had voted for the budget only in appreciation of the Secretary-General's efforts to present a zero-growth budget and on the understanding that the Secretariat would continue to make strenuous efforts to establish priorities and evaluate programme activities in the light of that principle.

The United Republic of Cameroon remarked that, if all Member States demonstrated the will to initiate global negotiations on economic co-operation, bring about disarmament and reduce tension, the budget could be reduced in those areas.

The view that too little attention had been paid to ACABQ recommendations was expressed by Australia, France, Italy, Japan, the United Kingdom and the United States. Algeria, on the other hand, said some countries had taken shelter behind ACABQ in order to cut the budget.

The resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 124 to 14, with 3 abstentions. The Fifth Committee approved the draft on 18 December by a recorded vote, requested by the USSR, of 89 to 13, with 2 abstentions.

Income estimates

On 18 December 1981, the General Assembly approved revised estimates of income for 1982-1983-other than assessments on Member States-in the amount of $284,553,000, including $233,396,800 to be derived from staff assessment (a kind of internal income tax paid by United Nations staff members on salaries and wages).<sup>(4)</sup>

The resolution was adopted without vote, following its approval without objection by the Fifth Committee on the same day.

Income estimates submitted by the Secretary-General in his proposed programme budget amounted to $284,606,900.<sup>(1)</sup> The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) recommended a net reduction of $2,145,900, consisting mainly of a $3.2 million cut in income from staff assessment—the effect of recommended staff reductions—partly offset by a $1.8 million increase in estimates of income from revenue-producing activities.<sup>(2)</sup> Approving more staff posts than had been recommended by ACABQ the Fifth Committee, consequently, approved slightly higher income estimates of $282,618,900 on first reading.<sup>(3)</sup>

Subsequent to his initial estimates, the Secretary-General submitted revised estimates which would have added $965,500 to the income side, and estimates of financial implications of 1981 Assembly decisions involving additional income of $2,793,500. The total income estimates approved by the Fifth Committee and the Assembly were $3,812,900 less than the Secretary-General had proposed (see table on p. 1272).

Resolves that for the biennium 1982-1983:

1. Estimates of income other than assessments on Member States totalling $US 284,553,000 are approved as follows:

Income section	(US dollars)
PART I. Income from staff assessment
1. Income from staff assessment	233,396,800
Total, PART I	233,396,800
PART II. Other income
2. General income	33,871,600
3. Revenue-producing activities	17,284,600
Total, PART II	51,156,200
GRAND TOTAL	284,553,000

2. The income from staff assessment shall be credited to the Tax Equalization Fund in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 973(X) of 15 December 1955;

3. Direct expenses of the United Nations Postal Administration, services to visitors, catering and related services, garage operations, television services and the sale of publications, not provided for under the budget appropriations, shall be charged against the income derived from those activities.

Unforeseen and extraordinary expenses

The General Assembly, on 18 December 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> authorized the Secretary-General to enter into commitments to meet unforeseen and extraordinary expenses during 1982-1983. Such commitments would require the prior concurrence of ACABQ except for three categories of items on which the Secretary-General would only have to report to that Committee: commitments not exceeding $2 million per year for the maintenance of peace and security, certain expenses of the International Court of Justice up to $638,000 for the biennium and commitments up to $300,000 for interorganizational security measures (p. 1383). As in previous years, the Assembly decided that, if a Security Council decision resulted while the Assembly was not in session in commitments exceeding $10 million for the maintenance of peace and security, a special session would be convened.

The resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 127 to 9, with 2 abstentions, following its approval by the Fifth Committee on 18 December by a recorded vote, requested by the USSR, of 89 to 10, with 1 abstention.

Explaining its negative vote, the USSR said expenditures for international peace and security came exclusively within the purview of the Security Council, and it was a violation of the Charter of the United Nations to accord the Secretariat authority in such matters.

Working Capital Fund

In December 1981, the General Assembly decided to increase from $40 million to $100 million the level of the Working Capital Fund, established in 1946 as a source of liquidity to enable the Secretary-General to advance sums necessary to finance budget appropriations pending the receipt of contributions from Member States. The last previous increase had been authorized by the Assembly in 1962, with effect from 1963.<sup>(3)</sup> A 1975 proposal by the Secretary-

General to raise the Fund to $80 million was not approved.<sup>(7)</sup>

The decision to establish the Fund for 1982-1983 in the amount of $100 million was initially taken by the Assembly on 10 December 1981 as one of two measures to alleviate the United Nations financial situation.<sup>(4)</sup> The action had been proposed by the Secretary-General and endorsed by ACABQ.

Arrangements for the enlarged Fund were fixed in a resolution of 18 December.<sup>(6)</sup> As in the past, the Fund was to be financed by advances from Member States in accordance with their assessments for the regular budget (p. 1287). In addition to advances for budgetary appropriations, the Fund could be used to finance unforeseen and extraordinary expenses (p. 1280), miscellaneous self-liquidating purchases and activities under a $200,000 revolving fund, advance insurance premiums, and sums necessary to enable the Tax Equalization Fund to meet current commitments. Should the $100 million be inadequate, the Secretary-General was authorized to utilize cash from special funds and accounts in his custody, or the proceeds of loans if the Assembly were to authorize them.

The Assembly adopted this resolution by a recorded vote of 117 to 19, with 4 abstentions, after the Fifth Committee approved it on 18 December by a recorded vote, requested by the USSR, of 81 to 18, with 3 abstentions.

In a resolution of the same date on the assessment of new Member States, the Assembly decided that the advances to the Working Capital Fund of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines and of Zimbabwe, admitted to the United Nations in 1980, should be calculated by applying their respective rates of assessment of 0.01 and 0.02 per cent.<sup>(5)</sup>

The increase in the Fund to $100 million—corresponding to two months of net expenditure—had been suggested by the Secretary-General in a report<sup>(2)</sup> on the financial situation (p. 1295). To avoid the risk of having the Organization drift into insolvency, the Secretary-General held it necessary to increase the Fund even further over the following few years, to between $150 million and $200 million. ACABQ concurred with the proposal for a $100-million Fund on the ground that its level had remained unchanged since 1963, when the Fund was equal to 43.1 per cent of the annual budget, whereas in 1981 it corresponded to only 6 per cent.<sup>(1)</sup>

Opposing the increase in the Fifth Committee, the United States said the action condoned the withholding of contributions, which it regarded as the basic cause of the financial emergency; if those countries withholding significant portions of their contributions ceased to do so, there would be no need to increase the Fund. Making a similar point, Japan objected to the measure as a palliative intended to make up for withholdings and reserved its position on the additional payments required for the Fund. Disapproval of the increase was also voiced by France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, the USSR and the United Kingdom.

Voting in favour, Ireland said it regarded the increase as unavoidable. Yugoslavia supported the increase on the understanding that the Fund's resources would be used solely for current Secretariat expenses.

During the Fifth Committee debate on the financial situation, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya expressed the view that the Fund should be increased to $100 million as an absolute minimum and should preferably be restored to a level equal to four months of net disbursements. Pakistan contended that the request to raise the level of the Fund was justified on purely technical grounds, since the current level of $40 million had been established at a time when the budget had amounted to $92.8 million.

The General Assembly

Resolves that:

1. The Working Capital Fund shall be established for the biennium 1982-1983 in the amount of $US 100 million;

2. Member States shall make advances to the Working Capital Fund in accordance with the scale adopted by the General Assembly for contributions of Member States to the budget for the year 1982;

3. There shall be set off against this allocation of advances:

4. Should the credits and advances paid by any Member State to the Working Capital Fund for the biennium 1980-1981 exceed the amount of that Member State's advance under the provisions of paragraph 2 above, the excess shall be set off against the amount of the contributions payable by the Member State in respect of the biennium 1982-1983;

5. The Secretary-General is authorized to advance from the Working Capital Fund:

(a) Such sums as may be necessary to finance budgetary appropriations pending the receipt of contributions: sums so advanced shall be reimbursed as soon as receipts from contributions are available for the purpose;

(b) Such sums as may be necessary to finance commitments which may be duly authorized under the provisions of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly, in particular resolution 36/241 of 18 December 1981 relating to unforeseen and extraordinary expenses; the Secretary-General shall make provision in the budget estimates for reimbursing the Working Capital Fund;

(c) Such sums as, together with net sums outstanding for the same purpose, do not exceed $200,000, to continue the revolving fund to finance miscellaneous self-liquidating purchases and activities: advances in excess of the total of $200,000 may be made with the prior concurrence of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

(d) With the prior concurrence of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, such sums as may be required to finance payments of advance insurance premiums where the period of insurance extends beyond the end of the biennium in which payment is made; the Secretary-General shall make provision in the budget estimates of each biennium, during the life of the related policies, to cover the charges applicable to each biennium;

(e) Such sums as may be necessary to enable the Tax Equalization Fund to meet current commitments pending the accumulation of credits; such advances shall be repaid as soon as credits are available in the Tax Equalization Fund;

6. Should the provision in paragraph 1 above prove inadequate to meet the purposes normally related to the Working Capital Fund, the Secretary-General is authorized to utilize, in the biennium 1982-1983, cash from special funds and accounts in his custody, under the conditions approved in General Assembly resolution 1341 (XIII) of 13 December 1958, or the proceeds of loans authorized by the Assembly.

Programme budget for 1980-1981

On 18 December 1981, the General Assembly approved the second and final revision of the programme budget for 1980-1981, originally adopted in 1979 and initially revised in December 1980. The resulting net budget, totalling $1,094,890,300, was $68,440,300 above the initial level but $5,927,800 below the 1980 revision. Appropriations rose by $2,553,100 compared to the total approved in 1980 (see below) while income estimates rose by $8,480,900 (p. 1285).

Final appropriations

By the adoption on 18 December 1981 of final budget appropriations for 1980-1981 in the amount of $1,341,704,300,<sup>(5)</sup> the General Assembly increased by $2,553,100 the sum of $1,339,151,200 appropriated in December 1980<sup>(4)</sup> under the United Nations programme budget for the biennium.

The resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 120 to 16, with 4 abstentions. The Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee recommended this action on 17 December by a recorded vote, requested by the USSR, of 64 to 14, with 5 abstentions.

The increase was based largely on a December 1981 report by the Secretary-General on programme budget performance, estimating that appropriations would have to be raised by $2,944,400 to meet higher costs due to inflation and other unanticipated factors.<sup>(2)</sup> To this amount, which had the concurrence of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ),<sup>(1)</sup> the Assembly added a $352,600 grant, approved by the Fifth Committee on 9 December by a recorded vote, to cover the estimated deficit of the United Nations Institute for Training and Research in 1981 (p. 807). In accordance with a Fifth Committee decision of 9 December not to approve funds for a proposed salary increase for General Service staff at Geneva (p. 1340), the sum of $743,900 was deleted from the Secretary-General's estimates.

The action on the final appropriations was the second increase approved for the 1980-1981 budget, initially fixed in 1979 at a level of $1,247,793,200.<sup>(3)</sup>

The final net budget-essentially the amount met by assessments on Member States- totalled $1,094,890,300. This was $5,927,800, or 0.5 per cent, less than the net amount approved in 1980. The decrease was due to the fact that, although appropriations were increased by $2,553,100, or 0.2 per cent, estimated income rose by $8,480,900, or 3.6 per cent (p. 1285).

The expenditure increase was attributed mainly to inflation, other changes and decisions of policy-making organs; however, these were largely offset by variations in currency exchange rates and by above-average staff vacancy rates for the Secretariat as a whole. Inflation accounted for additional expenditures of $26,403,400, other changes were responsible for a $12,526,200 increase and decisions of policy-making organs for $1,008,200, while savings due to depreciation against the United States dollar of currencies used by major United Nations offices away from Headquarters allowed for a saving of $37,384,700. The net effect of these four factors resulted in the $2,553,100 increase in appropriations.

The $12.5-million figure for "other changes" was a net amount that included increases of $11 million for conference and library services at Geneva and at Vienna, Austria; $4.3 million for administration, finance and management, due largely to higher consumption of utilities; $2.9 million for political affairs and peace-keeping activities, notably higher staff and travel costs for the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization in Palestine; and $1.4 million for the United Nations Industrial Development Organization. These and other increases were partly offset by decreases of $2.1 million for the Economic Commission for Latin America, $1.7 million for the Economic Commission for Western Asia, $1.4 million for the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, $1.3 million for the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, and $1.3 million for the Department of International Economic and Social Affairs-all attributed in part to an above-average staff vacancy rate in those units.

Casting a negative vote, the USSR said the budget surplus reported for 1980-1981 was in fact illusory; the revised expenditure estimates were more than $2 million above the revised budget approved in 1980. The United States voted against in view of cost increases due to inflation and programme growth, and because it had voted against the revised budget in 1980.

Though voting in favour, Chile expressed reservations concerning the appropriations for human rights activities.

Final income estimates

On the recommendation of the Secretary-General<sup>(2)</sup> and ACABQ,<sup>(1)</sup> the General Assembly, by a resolution of 18 December 1981, decided that the estimates of income for 1980-1981 other than assessments on Member States, approved in December 1980,<sup>(4)</sup> should be increased by $8,480,900, from $238,333,100 to $246,814,000.<sup>(5)</sup> This was the second increase since the initial income estimates for the biennium were fixed in 1979 at $221,343,200.<sup>(3)</sup>

The Assembly adopted the income estimates, by a recorded vote of 127 to 1, with 1 abstention, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee, which approved them on 17 December together with the final appropriations for 1980-1981 (p. 1283).

The Secretary-General, in his report on programme budget performance for 1980-1981, had proposed that the income estimates be increased by $8,470,000.<sup>(2)</sup> Those estimates were raised by a further $10,900, following a decision by the Fifth Committee on 9 December not to approve funds for an intended salary increase for General Service staff members at Geneva (p. 1340).

Of the estimated increase, $2,578,400 was attributed to general income and $5,686,100 to revenue-producing activities. The increased income from revenue-producing activities resulted from greatly improved sales of postage stamps, which were expected to generate net income $7.6 million higher than the $13.1 million previously projected. At the same time, other revenue estimates fell, notably that from food and beverage catering services at United Nations Headquarters, for which expenses were $1 million more than had been anticipated, reducing net revenue from that source. Factors involved in the increase of general income included rises of $1.6 million in anticipated bank interest and $1.1 million in miscellaneous income.

Budget formulation, presentation, review and approval

On 17 December 1981, the General Assembly's Fifth Committee received a draft resolution by Algeria, on behalf of the Group of 77 developing countries, on the formulation, presentation, review and approval of programme budgets.<sup>(1)</sup>

The eight-section draft, as orally revised by its sponsors, would have the Assembly reaffirm directives and guidelines on the preparation of future budgets, including the following: the medium-term plan should be the framework for formulation of the programme budget; budgeted activities, including administrative and support activities, should be programmed, with clear descriptions and completion dates of expected outputs; and no arbitrary ceiling or floor would be applied to the budget as a whole but administrative costs and outlays on non-substantive activities should not grow in real terms.

With regard to administrative practices affecting the budget, the Secretary-General would be requested to ensure close co-operation and co-ordination among Secretariat units in the preparation of budget proposals, and to limit upgradings of posts by redeploying staff wherever possible and desirable. The draft suggested steps to bring about closer co-operation between the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination (CPC) and ACABQ in reviewing statements of financial implications and programme budget proposals within their respective spheres of competence. Finally, several Secretariat studies would be called for, including one on the relationship between regular budget and extrabudgetary resources.

The oral revisions to this draft included addition of the phrase "unless the General Assembly decides otherwise" to the provision stating that all budgeted activities should be programmed, and addition of the predictability of extrabudgetary resources to the list of matters on which the Secretary-General would be requested to submit studies. The revised draft resolution was based on an earlier text by Algeria, the Bahamas, Egypt, India and Yugoslavia.

The Assembly, by a section of its resolution on miscellaneous matters relating to the proposed programme budget for 1982-1983, adopted on 18 December, decided without vote to authorize the Fifth Committee to continue consideration of the question in the event that the Assembly resumed its 1981 session in 1982.<sup>(2)</sup> Later that day the Assembly decided to hold a resumed session in 1982 and listed the question of budget formulation, presentation, review and approval among the items for consideration.<sup>(3)</sup>

The Assembly acted on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee, which on 17 December approved the text, proposed orally by the Chairman on Algeria's suggestion, by consensus.

Introducing the revised draft in the Committee, Algeria explained that its basis was the concept of zero budgetary growth, since the Group of 77 rejected in principle the imposition of any particular growth rate in advance. Particular attention should be paid to the last preambular paragraph, which referred to the need to ensure coherence, co-ordination and efficient management of all activities financed by the regular budget and by extrabudgetary resources.

Recommendations on priority setting in relation to the programme and budget process were made by CPC at its May/June 1981 session (p. 1304).

Assessment of contributions

The Committee on Contributions, at its forty-first session, held in New York from 16 June to 2 July 1981, explored issues affecting the measurement of Member States' capacity to pay but recommended no changes in the existing system.<sup>(1)</sup> After considering the Committee's report, the Assembly, in December, modified some of the criteria used for calculating assessment rates with the aim of benefiting the less affluent countries (p. 1288).

Also in December, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines and Zimbabwe, admitted to United Nations membership in 1980, had their assessment rates set at 0.01 and 0.02 per cent, respectively (p. 1292).

The total of contributions Member States were to pay in 1981 was $710,594,836, of which $595,883,631 was assessed for 1981 in accordance with the scale of assessments adopted in 1979 for the years 1980-1982<sup>(2)</sup> and $114,711,205 was payable for prior years (p. 1293). Of this total, $564,979,129 was collected and $145,615,703 remained outstanding as at 31 December 1981 (see table on p. 1294). Nine non-member States were assessed a total of $1,522,942 for 1981 expenses of United Nations activities and organizations in which they participated (see table on p. 1295).

Under a General Assembly resolution of 18 December on the financing of appropriations for 1982, Member States were to be assessed $721,642,946, less their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund, for their 1982 contributions to the United Nations regular budget.<sup>(3)</sup> After $29,266,029 was set aside from that Fund to meet charges for tax refunds to staff members paying national income taxes on their United Nations earnings, an estimated $87,648,771 was to be available for credit to Member States. Thus, the net assessment payable by Member States for 1982 totalled $633,994,175. Member States were assessed an extra $60 million for the enlarged Working Capital Fund (p. 1281).

Scale of assessments

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE COMMITTEE ON CONTRIBUTIONS. In response to a 1979 General Assembly resolution,<sup>(2)</sup> the Committee on Contributions, at its June/July 1981 session,<sup>(1)</sup> explored issues affecting the measurement of Member States' capacity to pay towards the United Nations budget, in anticipation of the next revision of the scale in 1982. It examined: methods to avoid excessive variations of individual assessment rates between two successive scales; economic and social indicators, including national wealth, which might supplement national income as measures of capacity to pay; application of the low per capita income allowance formula, used to reduce the rates of the poorest States; comparability of the two systems of national accounts used by the market-economy and the centrally planned countries; price changes and their effects on the comparability of national income statistics; and the effects of altering the statistical base period (range of calendar years) used in calculating the scale of assessments.

The Committee considered again the possible application of percentage limits or percentage point limits to the scale of assessments as a method for avoiding excessive variations of individual rates between two successive scales. Two distinct schools of thought continued to be expressed. Most members believed that setting a percentage limit would be too mechanistic and arbitrary and would depart from the principle of capacity to pay. Others were of the opinion that the introduction of limits would lead to greater fairness and equity in the scale of assessments, since national income would still be used as the sole indicator of relative capacity to pay. As the Committee was unable to agree on criteria for defining excessive or extreme variations in rates of assessment between successive scales, it decided to review the question further in 1982.

With respect to economic and social indicators, the Committee reviewed seven leading indicators—share of manufacturing output in gross domestic product, share of manufactures in total exports, economically active population outside agriculture, per capita energy consumption, number of telephones in use in relation to population, literacy ratio and life expectancy—selected by the Committee for Development Planning to supplement per capita national income for purposes of identifying the least developed countries (p. 411). The Committee noted that certain indicators were not available for certain countries or were not comparable between countries because of differing statistical systems, concepts, scopes, coverages or definitions. It further noted that the comparison of the countries' relative rankings based on per capita national income or on a composite indicator of all eight indicators revealed that the rankings were remarkably consistent for most countries. While those indicators could be useful in the review of individual cases, the Committee concluded that, currently, they could not systematically be used to measure capacity to pay.

The Committee studied the effects of applying different variants of the low per capita income allowance formula, which under the current scale reduced the rates of countries with per capita annual incomes below $1,800 by amounts of up to 75 per cent. Some members observed that an upward adjustment of the formula—by raising the dollar limit so that it would apply to more countries or by increasing the reduction percentage—would lessen the assessment burden of middle-income countries, whereas the benefit should go more heavily to low-income countries. Other members favoured an adjustment of the formula, stating that the upper limit of $1,800 fixed in 1976 no longer reflected the situation. As members were divided on this issue, the Committee deferred a decision to 1982, when it would undertake a general review of the scale of assessments.

Another matter of concern was the effect of widely varying changes in prices and exchange rates on the relative level of assessment of individual countries. The Committee noted that domestic inflation, uncompensated by exchange rate adjustments, could produce misleading national income data. However, in view of the complexities involved, it reaffirmed its previous conclusion that currently no systematic method could be developed to take those changes into consideration in determining the scale of assessments.

The Committee recalled its previously expressed view that a nation's accumulated wealth as well as its current national income could be viewed as influencing its capacity to pay. However, an analysis of data on national wealth and its components, covering 60 countries, had revealed that, owing to discrepancies in coverage, meaningful comparable national wealth estimates would not be available for some time.

The Committee studied the effects of altering the statistical base period for the national income figures used in formulating the scale of assessments. Divergent views were expressed with respect to the appropriate base period, currently seven years. Several members continued to believe that a shorter period would best reflect economic realities and observed that sharp deteriorations in the economic situation of countries could not be reflected if extended base periods were used. Others contended that a base period of 11 to 15 years would lead to greater fairness and equity, particularly while national and per capita income remained the only measures of capacity to pay.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution of 18 December 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> the General Assembly listed seven factors other than national and per capita income to be taken into account in measuring capacity to pay: particular consideration to least developed countries, economic disparities between developed and developing countries, conditions adversely affecting capacity to pay, heavy dependence on one or a few products, ability to secure foreign currency, accumulated national wealth, and different methods of national accounting. The Committee on Contributions was requested to study alternative methods to assess capacity to pay. Pending completion of that study, the statistical base period was to be increased from 7 to 10 years, the upper limit of the low per capita income allowance formula was to be raised from $1,800 to $2,100 and the maximum percentage reduction from 75 to 85 per cent, efforts were to be made to limit to a reasonable level the increase of individual rates, and the rates of the least developed countries were not to exceed the current level.

The Assembly adopted the resolution, by a recorded vote of 118 to 22, on the recommendation of the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee, which approved on 10 December, by a recorded vote of 79 to 19, the draft submitted by Algeria for the Group of 77.

Indonesia, as Chairman of an informal contact group on the subject which met over the course of five weeks, stated that agreement had been reached on all provisions except paragraph 4, specifying revised criteria for reviewing the scale of assessments.

Introducing the text, Algeria said the provision that efforts be made to limit the increase of individual rates of assessment to a reasonable level and that special measures be taken in favour of countries whose rates had already been increased (paragraph 4 (c)) had not been completely satisfactory to the Group of 77; a number of Group members had noted that their rates had shown successive increases and had considered that a more just and equitable basis should be found.

Explaining its negative vote, Australia objected in principle to the extension of the statistical base period, the increase in the low per capita income allowance formula and measures to limit excessive variations of rates between scales. A lengthening of the base period was also opposed by Canada, which also believed that mitigation of increases in individual rates should be permitted only when a country was genuinely in economic difficulties and might not be able to pay its assessment.

Expressing procedural and substantive reservations, Japan considered the changes in the low per capita income formula to be excessive and had reservations on the call for limiting the increase of individual rates, which it viewed as a departure from the long-standing concept of establishing a range of variations between scales, positive and negative; however, it favoured the extension of the base period to 10 years as a transitional measure until a new formula was established. Similar reservations, as well as reservations on the paragraph stating that rates of least developed countries should not exceed the current level, were voiced by Spain, which also felt that the text did not reflect the need to prevent extreme and excessive increases between scales.

Sweden voted against the text on the ground that the specific criteria for reviewing the scale of assessments, as set out in paragraph 4, encroached on the prerogatives of the Committee on Contributions; also, it was not convinced that the least developed countries would benefit from the proposed changes and said it would have preferred a mechanism which took greater account of their capacity to pay. Austria cast a negative vote for the same reasons.

On behalf of the European Community (EC) members, the United Kingdom declared opposition to any resolution laying down criteria and parameters on which the Committee on Contributions had not submitted advice, and reaffirmed strong opposition to any further lengthening of the statistical base period and to any limit on variations in assessment rates between successive scales. France, joined by the Federal Republic of Germany and Italy, added that a longer statistical period would heighten the feeling of injustice of some States whose assessments might be increased because of past economic success even though their economies had since suffered a recession. Emphasizing the need for a reasonable and realistic statistical base period, the United States said the Committee on Contributions should act as arbiter in regard to the scale of assessments.

Though voting in favour, Poland said it was not happy with the extension of the statistical base period but supported the higher per capita income limit. The USSR voted for the resolution with several reservations: it regarded abrupt changes in the statistical base period as undesirable; it did not agree with the idea of regular increases in relief to countries with low per capita income; it considered the imposition of a limit on variations in individual rates incompatible with the principle of relative capacity to pay and a serious financial burden on some States; and it found paragraph 1 (setting out elements for measuring capacity to pay) unsatisfactory and said the established method based on national income was both rational and fair. The German Democratic Republic voted in favour on the understanding that the 10-year base period was to be an absolute ceiling; any further extension could jeopardize the principle of relative capacity to pay.

During the debate in the Fifth Committee, several countries, among them Brazil, Iraq and Venezuela, expressed disappointment at the inability of the Committee on Contributions to reach conclusions and to come up with definitive recommendations for changes in the system of assessing capacity to pay. They considered that the methodology currently used tended to penalize developing countries for their efforts to achieve greater economic and social well-being, and they called on the Fifth Committee to lay down precise criteria for drawing up the next scale of assessments.

Others, such as Uganda and the United States, regarded the criticism of the Committee on Contributions unjustified. Canada and the United States felt that the current framework was reasonably adequate for assessing contributions and that it was not appropriate or productive for the Fifth Committee to place technical limitations on the work of an expert group or to establish specific criteria for a new assessment formula. Stating that the establishment of the scale of assessments should remain the responsibility of the Committee on Contributions, Australia added that the contributions mechanism was not designed to be a means of redistributing wealth but rather a procedural means of determining Member States' financial obligations; the developed countries were already shouldering some 90 per cent of the Organization's budget, and the real issue was whether part of the burden could be shifted to the developing countries.

A number of industrialized countries as well as those with centrally planned economies were of the view that national income remained the only internationally acceptable and objective statistical indicator of relative capacity to pay, especially as other economic and social data were neither comparable nor comprehensive on a global scale. A similar point was also made by Sierra Leone, which said it was unlikely to be able to provide the necessary statistics in the foreseeable future.

On the other hand, developing countries, among them Algeria, the Bahamas, India, Indonesia, Jordan, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Sudan, Uganda and Yugoslavia, stated that socio-economic indicators, the disparities between developing and developed countries marked in particular by the accumulated wealth of the latter, and other conditions or circumstances which adversely affected Member States' capacity to pay should be taken into account in determining a country's rate of assessment. In the view of Trinidad and Tobago, the fact that many developing countries were unable to develop statistical data owing to other priorities was no justification for indefinitely deferring the use of such indicators.

Countries with centrally planned economies felt that special consideration should be given to such problems as difficulties in obtaining convertible currencies, changes in terms of trade, and dependence on a small number of export commodities and on imports for all essential commodities, all of which had an important bearing on capacity to pay. Emphasizing accumulated wealth as an important element in the calculation of real ability to contribute, Japan believed that, if enough data were available to compare the accumulated wealth of a substantial number of States, such indicators ought to be introduced as supplements, even if not immediately for all countries, to rectify the existing system.

Ethiopia believed that, while special consideration should be given to countries whose external debt burden had become intolerable as a result of continuing balance-of-payments deficits, a high degree of indebtedness did not necessarily indicate lack of capacity to pay.

Australia, Canada, New Zealand, the United Kingdom (for the EC members) and the countries of Eastern Europe felt that the establishment of percentage limits as a means of avoiding excessive variations of individual assessment rates between successive scales would distort the principle of capacity to pay. They argued that such a mechanistic device would undermine the scale's objectivity by ignoring the dynamic nature of national income and would lead to an over-assessment of some States while others would pay less than their fair share. The German Democratic Republic pointed out that the imposition of a ceiling on variations in individual rates would result in relatively higher contributions by States which had made little economic progress during the base period as compared to those which had made extraordinary economic advances. Similarly, the United States suggested that the device might initially benefit nations that had experienced economic growth but would do little to alleviate the burden of those affected by economic decline.

Other States, among them Argentina, Brazil, Indonesia, Iraq, Japan, Kuwait, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mauritania, Mexico, Nigeria and the Syrian Arab Republic, favoured the setting of some restrictions on excessive increases in assessed contributions from one scale to the next. They regretted that the Committee on Contributions had failed to reach an agreement and they disputed the contention that setting a limit would be arbitrary and would distort the capacity to pay. Several countries favoured setting a percentage limit on increases, and Nigeria thought that 13 per cent would be fair. Also in this context, Spain remarked that the ceiling and floor rates for the highest and lowest contributors (0.01 and 25 per cent) were no less arbitrary as they represented rigid constraints in construction of the scale and departed from the capacity-to-pay principle.

Uganda thought that a sudden increase in a country's rate of assessment was not necessarily excessive if it was based on an equivalent percentage increase in national income.

With regard to the low per capita income allowance formula used to reduce the rates of the poorest nations, middle-income countries, such as Algeria, Argentina, Brazil, Hungary, India, Iraq, Jordan, Mauritania, Morocco, Poland, Romania, Trinidad and Tobago, and Yugoslavia, considered that the $1,800 per capita income limit (below which the rate reduction formula takes effect) was no longer valid in view of the substantial depreciation of purchasing power due to inflation. They felt that, although the upper limit and the formula had been revised a number of times, the revisions had been too modest and had not kept pace with inflation. They suggested various revisions of the limit, ranging from $2,000 to $2,800. Brazil argued that, if developing countries were to be divided into artificial categories based on differing capacity to pay, the same should be done for developed countries by establishing a reserve of percentage points in the scale, to be distributed among the wealthiest.

The German Democratic Republic and the USSR opposed an increase in the low per capita income limit, stating that the way to reduce the financial obligations of Member States was not to shift the burden from one group of States to another but to reduce excessive budget increases. Other developed countries, such as Australia, Canada, Japan, New Zealand and the United Kingdom, the last on behalf of the EC members, as well as Afghanistan, declared that any modifications in the low per capita income allowance formula should seek to reduce the burden of low-income rather than middle-income countries; several of them favoured granting further relief to countries with per capita income below $900 by increasing the maximum relief from 75 to 90 per cent. The United States said an increase in the limit could require fewer States to finance a greater share of the budget, divorcing responsibility for voting for programmes from the necessity of paying for them.

Referring to the length of the base period for the national income and other statistics used to calculate ability to pay, Canada, Nigeria and Poland believed that a three- or five-year period would produce a more realistic and equitable scale of assessments. New Zealand, the United Kingdom (on behalf of EC members) and countries with centrally planned economies, such as Cuba, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Romania and the Ukrainian SSR, considered that the seven-year base period currently employed should be sufficient warranty against sharp changes in individual assessment rates, and Australia regarded the period as a fair compromise. For the EC members, the United Kingdom doubted that a longer base period would be in the long-term interest of countries whose assessments would remain high while their income from the export of certain non-renewable commodities was falling.

Others, among them Algeria, Brazil, Ghana, Iraq, Japan, Jordan, Kuwait, Mauritania and Spain, contended that a further extension of the base period—some suggested up to 12 or 15 years—would reflect more accurately the level of economic and social development of Member States.

Japan found it unfair to determine capacity to pay in the same way for countries with different national accounts systems, and Spain wondered whether the decrease in the assessments of the centrally planned economies had anything to do with the differences between the two systems of national accounts; both felt that a better methodology for comparing the two systems should be worked out.

Referring to the assessed contributions of the five permanent members of the Security Council, a number of States, among them Iraq, Japan, Jordan, Kuwait, Morocco and Spain, questioned whether countries which derived great advantage from their status should be allowed any further reduction in their individual rates of assessment. Spain suggested that thought be given to recommending a minimum assessment commensurate with their importance and responsibilities under the Charter of the United Nations.

Ethiopia, Nigeria, the Syrian Arab Republic and others favoured continuation of the practice of enabling States to contribute in currencies other than the United States dollar when the United Nations could make use of them.

The Eastern European countries reiterated their view that Article 19 of the Charter (stating that Member States in arrears in payment of financial contributions should have no vote in the Assembly) was not applicable to contributions for peace-keeping activities. Japan, on the other hand, considered that the interpretation of Article 19 should be as strict as possible.

Some countries reiterated reservations about their assessment rates as contained in the current scale. Poland recalled its objection to the method used to convert its national income data into United States dollars and expressed hope that the Committee on Contributions, in 1982, would take account of Poland's current socioeconomic situation, which adversely affected its capacity to pay. This position was supported by the USSR.

118-22 (recorded vote) Meeting 105 18 December 1981

Approved by Fifth Committee (A/36/833) by recorded vote (79-19), 10 December (meeting 70); draft by Algeria, for Group of 77 (A/C.5/36/L.33); agenda item 106.

The General Assembly,

Having examined the report of the Committee on Contributions,

Recalling its resolutions 14(I) of 13 February 1946, 1927(XVIII) of 11 December 1963, 2118(XX) of 21 December 1965, 2961 C and D (XXVII) of 13 December 1972, 31/95 A and B of 14 December 1976 and 34/6 B of 25 October 1979,

Bearing in mind that the real capacity of Member States to pay is the fundamental criterion on which the scales of assessments are based,

Taking into account the difficult and even critical economic and financial situation of developing countries,

Mindful of the obligations of each Member State towards the Organization,

Recognizing once again the need for an improved methodology to assess the real capacity of Member States to pay, In order to increase the fairness and equity of the scale of assessments,

Considering the need to prevent extreme and excessive variations of individual rates of assessments between two successive scales,

Noting the views expressed in the Fifth Committee during the debate on the report of the Committee on Contributions,

1. Reaffirms its previous decisions that, in the measurement of the capacity of Member States to pay, the following elements should be taken into account, in order to prevent anomalous assessments resulting from the sole use of estimates of national income:

(a) Due consideration to developing countries, in general, and to the countries with the lowest per capita income, including the least developed countries, in particular, in view of their special economic and financial problems;

(b) The continuing disparities between the economies of developed and developing countries;

(c) Conditions or circumstances which adversely affect the capacity of Member States to pay;

(d) The particular situation of Member States whose earnings depend heavily on one or a few products;

(e) The ability of Member States to secure foreign currency;

(f) The concept of accumulated national wealth;

(g) The existence of different methods of national accounting of Member States, including the level of different inflation rates and their effects on the comparability of national income statistics;

2. Requests the Committee on Contributions to prepare a set of guidelines for the collection and presentation of data by Member States, in order to ensure that adequate data and statistical information are submitted to the Committee on a uniform and comparable basis;

3. Requests the Committee on Contributions to submit to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session a thorough study on alternative methods to assess the real capacity of Member States to pay that takes fully into account Assembly resolution 34/6 B, all the elements listed in paragraph 1 above, including a new statistical base period, a revised upper limit of the low per capita income allowance formula and a limit for increases between two successive scales of assessments;

4. Decides that, pending fulfilment by the Committee on Contributions of the directives set out in paragraph 3 above, the following criteria will be observed in the subsequent review of the scale of assessments:

(a) The statistical base period should be ten years;

(b) The upper limit of the low per capita income allowance formula will be raised from $US 1,800 to $US 2,100 and the gradient of the relief granted will be raised from 75 per cent to 85 per cent, so as to compensate at least partially for the effects of world inflation since the last revision of the values of the formula;

(c) Efforts should be made to limit the increase of individual rates of assessments to a reasonable level, and, in this context, special measures should be taken in favour of countries whose rates of assessments have already been increased at the previous review of the scale of assessments;

(d) In view of the extremely serious economic situation of the least developed countries, their individual rates of assessment should not in any way exceed the present level.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Brazil, Bulgaria, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Cameroon, United Republic of Tanzania, Upper Volta, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia,

Assessment of new Member States

On the recommendation of the Committee on Contributions,<sup>(1)</sup> the General Assembly, by a resolution adopted without vote on 18 December 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> decided that the two States admitted to United Nations membership in 1980—Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, and Zimbabwe—would be assessed at the rates of 0.01 and 0.02 per cent, respectively, of the total assessed budget, beginning in 1981. For the year of their admission, the rates were to be one ninth of the regular rates. The new Members were also subject to assessments for the financing of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force and the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (p. 295), as well as for the Working Capital Fund (p. 1281).

The Assembly action was recommended by the Fifth Committee on 10 December, also without vote.

Adopted without vote Meeting 105 18 December 1981

Approved by Fifth Committee (A/36/833) without vote, 10 December (meeting 70); draft by Committee on Contributions (A/36/11); agenda item 106.

The General Assembly

Resolves that:

1. The rates of assessment for the following States, admitted to membership in the United Nations on 25 August and 16 September 1980, respectively, shall be as follows:

Member State	Per cent
Zimbabwe	0.02
Saint Vincent and the Grenadines	0.01

For 1982, these rates shall be added to the scale of assessments established under General Assembly resolution 34/6 A of 25 October 1979;

2. For the year 1980, Zimbabwe and Saint Vincent and the Grenadines shall contribute at the rate of one ninth of 0.02 and 0.01 per cent, respectively, such contributions to be taken into account as miscellaneous income under regulation 5.2 (c) of the Financial Regulations of the United Nations;

3. For the year 1981, Zimbabwe and Saint Vincent and the Grenadines shall contribute at the rate of 0.02 and .001 per cent, respectively, such contributions also to be taken into account as miscellaneous income under regulation 5.2 (c) of the Financial Regulations of the United Nations;

4. The contributions of Zimbabwe and Saint Vincent and the Grenadines for 1980 and 1981 shall be applied to the same basis of assessment as for other Member States, except that in the case of appropriations or apportionments approved under General Assembly resolutions 34/7 C of 3 December 1979 and 35/45 A of 1 December 1980 for the financing of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force, and resolution 35/115 A of 10 December 1980 for the financing of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, the contributions of those States, as determined by the group of contributors to which they may be assigned by the Assembly, shall be calculated in proportion to the calendar year;

5. The advances of Zimbabwe and Saint Vincent and the Grenadines to the Working Capital Fund, under regulation 5.8 of the Financial Regulations of the United Nations, shall be calculated by the application of the rates of assessment of 0.02 and 0.01 per cent, respectively, to the authorized level of the Fund, such advances to be added to the Fund pending the incorporation of the new Members' rates of assessment in a 100 per cent scale.

Status of contributions

Of the $710.6 million in contributions to the United Nations regular budget payable by Member States as at 1 January 1981, $565 million was collected during the year, leaving $145.6 million in amounts outstanding as at the end of 1981 (see table on p. 1294).<sup>(13)</sup> Net assessments for 1982 due at the start of the year, totalled $634 million.<sup>(1)</sup> In addition, nine non-member States were assessed a total of $1.5 million for their share of United Nations activities in which they participated (see table on p. 1295).<sup>(2)</sup> Assessments of Members and non-members were in accordance with scales for 1980-1982 approved by the General Assembly in 1979.<sup>(11)</sup>

At various times during 1981, several Member States were more than two years in arrears in the payment of their financial contributions to the regular United Nations budget. Under Article 19 of the Charter of the United Nations, a Member in arrears to the extent of contributions due for the preceding two full years shall have no vote in the Assembly but the Assembly can permit such a Member to vote if it is satisfied that failure to pay was due to conditions beyond the State's control.

By a letter of 15 January 1981 to the Assembly President, as the Assembly was about to resume its 1980 session, the Secretary-General announced that eight Member States were in arrears.<sup>(3)</sup> Four of them- the Dominican Republic, Grenada, Mauritania and Senegal-made the necessary payments the following day to reduce their arrears below the two-year level.<sup>(4)</sup> Chad and the Comoros did likewise prior to 2 March.<sup>(5)</sup> The two remaining countries were the Central African Republic and South Africa.

By a letter of 26 February, transmitted to the President by the Secretary-General on 2 March, the Central African Republic, citing its economic difficulties (p. 502), requested that an exception be made to permit it to participate in Assembly voting throughout 1981.<sup>(6)</sup> This request was referred to the Committee on Contributions, which, at its June/July session, stated that, taking into account similar economic situations faced by several States in Africa and Central America in recent years and in view of the relatively small amount the Central African Republic was required to pay, it could not support the contention that the non-payment of arrears below the two-year limit could be considered as due to conditions beyond the country's control.<sup>(9)</sup>

By a letter of 3 September, the Secretary-General informed the Assembly President that the Central African Republic and South Africa remained in arrears.<sup>(7)</sup> However, by a letter of 15 September, he informed the President that only South Africa remained in arrears, to the extent of $9,230,000 for 1979 and 1980.<sup>(8)</sup>

During debate in the Fifth Committee on the scale of assessments, the Central African Republic said its arrears problem should be regarded as on the way to settlement, since the Government established in September 1981 had undertaken to continue, to the best of its ability, to pay its United Nations contributions.

The Secretary-General, in an October report to the Assembly<sup>(10)</sup> on the United Nations financial situation (p. 1295), stressed the importance of prompt and full payment of assessed contributions. He noted that, in spite of appeals to Member States, not only did contributions continue to be paid late but there was also a disquieting trend to pay them later each year. He suggested that the Assembly consider requiring payment of interest on outstanding contributions after a set date each year, such as 31 March.

In a 10 December resolution on the financial situation, the Assembly urged Member States to review their pattern of payment of contributions with a view to paying future contributions in good time.<sup>(12)</sup>

UN financial situation

The Secretary-General reported to the General Assembly in October 1981 that, during much of the year, the financial situation of the United Nations had been particularly precarious. The estimated deficit, projected to 31 December 1981, was $274.8 million. The Secretary-General submitted several proposals to alleviate the situation, two of which—an increase in the Working Capital Fund to $100 million and the suspension of certain financial regulations to permit the retention of unspent appropriations—were approved by the Assembly in December (p. 1296).

In another December action, the Assembly welcomed China's decision to pay its share of assessments for the two Middle East peace-keeping operations beginning in 1982 and decided that its unpaid assessments for that purpose since October 1971 would not be counted as arrears (p. 1298). The Assembly also requested a study on the impact of inflation and monetary instability on the United Nations budget (p. 1300).

Financial emergency

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL. As requested by the General Assembly in December 1980,<sup>(6)</sup> the Secretary-General presented in October 1981 to the Assembly's Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee a progress report on the issuance of special revenue-producing postage stamps (p. 1387) and details on the extent, rate of increase and composition of the Organization's deficit.<sup>(2)</sup>

The Secretary-General stated that, during much of 1981, the financial situation had been particularly precarious. The Organization's deficit, projected to 31 December, was estimated at $274.8 million, roughly a third of net annual expenditures under the regular budget and for peace-keeping operations. During the year, the total would have increased by $36.1 million, or more than 15 per cent, over 1980, due principally to non-payment of contributions for the two Middle East peace-keeping operations currently financed by assessments—the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) and the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force (UNDOF) (p. 294).

The $40-million Working Capital Fund, as well as a special account established to receive voluntary contributions called for by the Assembly in 1965<sup>(3)</sup> and 1972,<sup>(4)</sup> had been almost entirely depleted to meet the deficit caused by withholdings of contributions (see table on p. 1296) and delays in payment. Whereas the $95.6-million deficit under the regular budget had been met by using those accounts, the $235.2 million in liabilities for peace-keeping operations represented unpaid debts to States which had participated in the operations without receiving the reimbursement for services provided for in their agreements with the United Nations. No additional voluntary contributions had been received in 1981.

The Secretary-General set out seven options of varying cost and effectiveness to alleviate the situation. First, prompt payment of assessed contributions would result in the lowest cost to Member States, but repeated appeals to that end had not met with much success. Next in order of cost to Members would be an increase in the Working Capital Fund (p. 1281) or the issuance of long-term bonds, either of which would preserve the equity of States in the funds contributed. Borrowing in the open market or from Member States would be an emergency solution at best and repayment terms might be costly. The suspension of certain provisions of the Financial Regulations of the United Nations, which currently required that unspent appropriations be returned to Member States, could be of immediate assistance but would constitute only a partial solution, since the amounts involved were minor compared to the deficit. A final option, authorizing the United Nations to withhold such credits due to Member States until their assessments were fully paid, would also be of limited help.

In conclusion, the Secretary-General suggested three steps: an increase in the Working Capital Fund, the imposition of interest charges on late payments, and suspension of the financial regulations on the return of unobligated funds to Member States.

ACABQ RECOMMENDATIONS. Commenting on the Secretary-General's report, the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ)<sup>(1)</sup> stated that it was not in favour of borrowings or the issuance of long-term bonds because, apart from difficulties that might arise owing to considerations of principle held by certain States, the payment of interest could be substantial, thereby imposing 'additional burdens on all Members.

With regard to the option of prompt payment of contributions, ACABQ recommended that the General Assembly invite Members to re-examine their payment arrangements so as to ensure more timely payments. However, it expressed reservations about the suggestion to charge interest on outstanding contributions, stating that this would be onerous for States which delayed their payment because of genuine financial or administrative difficulties. To ease the cash flow problem, ACABQ recommended the suspension through 1983 of the financial regulations requiring the return of unspent appropriations to Member States and an increase in the level of the Working Capital Fund from $40 million to $100 million as from 1982, equivalent to about two months of expenditures.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. By a resolution of 10 December 1981 on the financial emergency of the United Nations,<sup>(7)</sup> the General Assembly accepted the ACABQ recommendations for a $100-million Working Capital Fund for 1982-1983 and for suspension of financial regulations in respect of unspent appropriations arising at the end of 1980-1981 and 1982-1983. The Assembly urged Member States to review their pattern of payment with a view to paying in good time and requested the Negotiating Committee on the Financial Emergency of the United Nations (established in 1975<sup>(5)</sup>) but inactive since it last NOTES: Estimated withholdings from the regular budget, projected to 31 December 1981, consisted of $40,002,500 relating to the 1961 United Nations bond issue, $18,406,900 relating to the regular programme of technical assistance and $20,411,400 relating to other budget items. Estimated withholdings in regard to the Middle East peace-keeping forces, declared by the States concerned to be for reasons of principle, related to (1) the second United Nations Emergency Force (UNEF) from its inception in 1973 through its liquidation in 1979 and the inception of UNDOF in 1974 to 30 November 1981; and (2) the inception of UNIFIL in 1978 to 18 December 1981.

met in 1976<sup>(9)</sup>) to keep the financial situation under review and to report to the Assembly in 1982. The Secretary-General was requested to submit in 1982 a progress report on the status of the issuance of special postage stamps, as well as details on the extent, rate of increase and composition of the deficit and on voluntary contributions.

The Assembly adopted the resolution by a recorded vote of 103 to 23, with 5 abstentions, following its approval by the Fifth Committee on 4 December by a recorded vote of 69 to 19, with 6 abstentions. The sponsors were Ecuador, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mauritania, Pakistan, Panama and Peru.

Introducing the text in the Committee, Panama explained that it was intended to lay the foundations for a solution to the financial problem. It would enable the United Nations to continue its work of maintaining international peace and security and at the same time ensure that no Charter provision was violated. The Assembly must rapidly find a solution to the cash flow problem, which otherwise threatened to paralyse the Organization.

Explaining its negative vote, France said the resolution meant that all Members would pay for the withholding or late payment of contributions by certain countries; suspension of the financial regulations on the return of unspent appropriations would not solve the question and would amount to giving a blank cheque to the Secretariat. The Federal Republic of Germany and Japan objected to the proposed increase of the Working Capital Fund, though the former endorsed the suspension of the financial regulations while the latter said it would have abstained if there had been a separate vote on the regulations since the implication was that the budgetary surplus which would normally accrue to Member States would be used to make up the deficit.

The United Kingdom thought the situation could be resolved if all contributions were paid early in the year and if States which had withheld contributions paid them. The United States objected to the increase of the Working Capital Fund, stating that the financial emergency was basically caused by the withholding of contributions to the regular budget and in respect of peace-keeping operations; however, it agreed to the suspension of financial regulations.

Australia abstained on the ground that it could not support an increase in the Fund and that Member States which discharged their obligations should not be expected to shoulder the resulting burden. Also abstaining, the Netherlands felt that the solution proposed would not solve the problem; nor was it right for all

Member States to pay for the illegitimate actions of some. Romania said some of the items included in the budget, such as financing for the 1961 United Nations bond issue,<sup>(8)</sup> were not in accordance with the Charter.

Canada declared that it would have voted against had the question been solely one of principle, since there was no reason why States which met their obligations should pay for those which did not; but it had voted in favour, as a sound financial and administrative case had been made for the measures proposed. Denmark, also speaking for Finland, Norway and Sweden, said they had voted in favour as they attached importance to the collective responsibility of Member States for financing the budget and peace-keeping operations. Although voting in favour, New Zealand regretted the need to increase the Fund and stated that withheld contributions should be paid and all Members should forward their contributions on time.

Egypt said the draft represented an attempt to solve the Organization's financial problems and appealed to States which had withheld contributions to cease doing so, regardless of political considerations. Tunisia regarded as valid the steps proposed in the resolution to deal with the deteriorating financial situation, pending a more permanent solution. A similar position was taken by Algeria and Morocco. India said it had voted in favour for pragmatic reasons.

Speaking during the Committee debate, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya agreed with the reservations of ACABQ about certain of the proposed options for dealing with the financial emergency and said it did not believe that peace-keeping forces should be financed by assessment. Pakistan observed that, if all Members paid their contributions in full each February, the United Nations could earn up to $30 million a year in interest, enough to pay the interest and repay the principal on the 1961 bond issue.

Ghana hoped that States which had refused to contribute to peace-keeping operations on political grounds would review their position. Rwanda, while respecting the positions of principle taken by those States, believed they should co-operate so as to spare the United Nations from financial disaster.

Ireland stated that the proposed measures would only temporarily alleviate the financial problems; withholding undermined the United Nations peace-keeping role, by placing a disproportionate burden on other Members, especially those participating in such operations. Sweden, speaking also for Denmark, Finland, Iceland and Norway, endorsed the ACABQ recommendations and said the problem stemmed from the unwillingness of some States to meet their collective responsibility for sharing the financial burden of all United Nations activities.

Czechoslovakia and the USSR reiterated their position that the principal causes of the financial difficulties were not late payment of contributions but the inclusion of illegitimate items in the budget, outlays occasioned by Israeli aggression against Lebanon, the financing of technical co-operation through the regular budget rather than by voluntary contributions, and rapid budgetary growth. Also, the USSR could not agree to the suspension of the financial regulations governing repayments to Member States.

Ghana and Rwanda objected to the suggestion that interest be charged on late contributions, stating that some Members delayed their payments because of genuine administrative and financial difficulties; however, the Netherlands hoped ACABQ would consider the idea further.

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the analysis of the financial situation of the United Nations, as well as the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Recalling its resolutions 3049 (XXVII) of 19 December 1972, 3538 (XXX) of 17 December 1975, 32/104 of 14 December 1977 and 35/113 of 10 December 1980,

Noting with concern the continuing increase in the short-term deficit of the Organization,

Bearing in mind that a partial or interim solution of parts of the problem could enhance the liquidity of the Organization and might facilitate the achievement of further progress towards a comprehensive settlement, which is desired by all Member States,

Concerned that delays in the payment of assessed contributions by Member States exacerbate the financial difficulties of the Organization,

Reaffirming the resolve of Member States to achieve a comprehensive and lasting solution to the financial problems of the Organization,

Convinced that in the circumstances an appropriate increase in the level of the Working Capital Fund is required to assure the Organization's ability to meet on a current basis the expenditure needs of the regular budget,

1. Decides to accept the recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions that:

(a) The Working Capital Fund for the biennium 1982-1983 be established in the amount of $100 million:

(b) The provisions of regulations 5.2 (d), 4.3 and 4.4 of the Financial Regulations of the United Nations be suspended in respect of the surpluses arising at the end of the 1980-1981 and 1982-1983 bienniums;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to give effect to the decision in paragraph 1 above in the formulation of the relevant draft resolutions to be submitted under the agenda item on the programme budget;

3. Urges all Member States to review their pattern of payment of contributions to the regular budget of the United Nations with a view to paying future contributions in good time in accordance with regulation 5.4 of the Financial Regulations of the United Nations;

4. Requests the Negotiating Committee on the Financial Emergency of the United Nations to keep the financial situation of the Organization under review and to report, as appropriate, to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session;

5. Further requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session:

(a) A progress report on the status of the project on the issuance of the special postage stamps;

(b) Detailed information relating to the extent, rate of increase and composition of the deficit of the Organization and to voluntary contributions received from Member States and other sources;

6. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its thirty-seventh session the item entitled Financial emergency of the United Nations: report of the Negotiating Committee on the Financial Emergency of the United Nations".

Abstaining: Australia, Congo, Dominican Republic, Portugal, Romania.

Assessed contributions of China

The General Assembly, by a resolution of 10 December 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> requested the Secretary-General to transfer to a special account the balance of the assessed contributions due from China for peace-keeping operations between 25 October 1971 (when the Assembly decided to seat representatives of the People's Republic of China<sup>(1)</sup>) and 31 December 1981. The Assembly welcomed the understanding that China would contribute to UNDOF and UNIFIL as from 1 January 1982, and noted that its assessment rate between 1971 and 1979 had been more than twice that established from 1980 after national income and other data had become available. The Assembly decided that, in the light of the special circumstances, the applicability of Article 19 of the Charter of the United Nations (determining that United Nations Members more than two years in arrears in the payment of their financial contributions should have no vote in the Assembly) would not be raised.

The resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 115 to 13, following approval of the 14-nation draft by the Fifth Committee on 30 November by a recorded vote of 94 to 12, with 2 abstentions.

(Prior to this action, the Secretary-General's October 1981 report on the financial situation of the United Nations (p. 1295) listed unpaid assessments of China for peace-keeping operations in a total amount of $55.4 million, projected to the end of 1981.)

Introducing the resolution, Pakistan expressed the conviction that China's decision to pay in future its share of expenses for the peace-keeping operations was a major development in favour of international peace and security, and it was hoped that other countries withholding their share might emulate China's example. Since 1971 China had been assessed at a rate substantially in excess of its relative capacity to pay. If its rate had been at the current level of 1.62 per cent all along, it would have paid to the regular budget $88 million less, which far exceeded the $55 million it had withheld from peace-keeping operations.

China said it had always fulfilled its obligations towards the United Nations and had long contributed far beyond its real capacity to pay. In view of changes in the international situation and the evolution of the role of United Nations peace-keeping operations, it was prepared henceforth to adopt a flexible attitude, on a case-by-case basis, and would support future operations established in strict conformity with Charter purposes and principles. As a developing country, it could not extend as much financial support to the Organization as it might wish; however, as its economic development gathered momentum, it would be able to increase its contribution.

Czechoslovakia, Hungary and the USSR expressed strong opposition to the draft, saying it established an unwarranted connection between arrears in contributions for peace-keeping operations and the application of Article 19, and would legitimize attempts to impose a financial burden on Member States for illegal expenditures.

Though welcoming China's decision to make a voluntary contribution, Spain abstained in the Committee vote (though voting affirmatively in the Assembly) on the ground that Article 19 had been waived for the first time.

India explained that its affirmative vote had been cast on the understanding that the resolution did not affect the application of Article 19 and that it would not be cited as a precedent for waiving that Article. In New Zealand's view, the special circumstances pertaining to China justified the measures contained in the resolution, which in no way established a precedent regarding the arrears of other countries. The United States said the resolution could not be construed as amending the Charter; the arrangement with China was unique and did not modify the principle of collective financial responsibility. A similar view was expressed by Canada and the United Kingdom, the latter speaking for the European Community (EC) members.

Voting in favour, Canada, Ghana, New Zealand and the United Kingdom, the last on behalf of the EC members, welcomed China's decision to contribute to the cost of peace-keeping operations and reaffirmed that financial responsibility for those operations should be borne by all Members as apportioned by the Assembly. Brazil said it had voted in favour in appreciation of China's efforts to help solve the difficulties facing UNDOF and UNIFIL.

Support for the resolution was also expressed by several others, among them Morocco, Uganda, Yugoslavia and Zaire.

Stating that special political circumstances had made peace-keeping forces necessary and special political means must be found for dealing with the growing deficit, Peru expressed hope that other States withholding their contributions would follow China's example. Australia, the Federal Republic of Germany, Ireland, Japan, Sweden (speaking for the Nordic States) and the United Republic of Cameroon also hoped the resolution would provide an incentive to other States.

Though supporting the text, Indonesia expressed concern over paragraph 1, noting China's over-assessment; in Indonesia's opinion, China's rate of assessment had been determined in accordance with its own will, so that there had been no question of over-assessment.

The General Assembly,

Recalling the consensus of the Special Committee on Peace-keeping Operations adopted by the General Assembly on 1 September 1965.

Reaffirming the collective responsibility of Member States for the financial security of the United Nations,

1. Notes that the rate of assessment of China for the period from 25 October 1971 to 31 December 1973 had been established at 4 per cent and for the period 1974 to 1979 inclusive at 5.5 per cent, whereas after national income and related data became available, the rate was established at 1.62 per cent for 1980-1982;

Impact of inflation and monetary instability

Expressing concern at the persistence of inflation and monetary instability, the General Assembly, by a resolution of 18 December 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> requested the Secretary-General to prepare for it in 1982 a detailed study on their impact on the United Nations budget. The study was to include amounts which, over the last three budget bienniums, had resulted from inflation and monetary instability in the developed countries where United Nations organizations had their headquarters.

The Assembly adopted the text by 97 votes to 21, with 18 abstentions. The Fifth Committee approved the Cuban-sponsored draft on 9 December by 44 votes to 19, with 25 abstentions.

Amendments by the United Kingdom on behalf of EC member States<sup>(1)</sup> were rejected by 42 votes to 20, with 27 abstentions, after the Committee rejected, by 42 votes to 23, with 17 abstentions, a United Kingdom motion, opposed by Cuba, to vote on the amendments paragraph by paragraph. The amendments proposed the deletion of the second and third preambular paragraphs (expressing concern at the persistence of inflation and monetary instability in those developed countries in which the United Nations made its expenditures, and stating the need for an additional procedure to help meet the resulting budgetary costs) and of operative paragraph 2 (requesting that the Secretary-General's study include the amounts resulting from those factors). The United Kingdom characterized those paragraphs as divisive and based on confused economic theory.

Introducing the resolution, Cuba said the result of the failure to curb inflation in capitalist countries had been to oblige Member States to pay increased contributions to the United Nations to correct a situation for which they were not responsible. Extensive consultations had been held to produce a text which would be more acceptable than the one which Cuba had proposed in 1978<sup>(3)</sup> but its purpose remained the same-to foster a clearer understanding of the unfair burden which inflation placed on so many countries. Rejecting the amendments, Cuba said its proposal simply asked for a technical study, without going into political considerations and without involving commitments by any country.

In support of the resolution, the USSR said international organizations had a right to expect that host countries where their offices were located would bear a special responsibility for the increasing United Nations expenditure caused by inflation and currency fluctuations.

Several States, including Algeria, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, the United Republic of Tanzania and Yugoslavia, expressed support for the idea of a study. Others, such as Austria, the Bahamas, Egypt, Greece, Japan, Morocco, Pakistan and Sri Lanka, stated that, while they did not object to a study, they felt that the text lacked objectivity and appeared to prejudge the results. Uruguay remarked that the causes of inflation must not be attributed to the economic systems of particular countries.

Expressing support for the amendments, Australia could not accept the implication that States in which United Nations organizations had their headquarters were primarily responsible for inflation. Austria stated that it could not accept the one-sided, simplistic view of the causes of inflation; the resolution also ignored the considerable efforts that host countries made in providing facilities for the United Nations. Canada and the United States rejected the notion that the developed countries bore exclusive responsibility for inflation.

Abstaining on both the amendments and the resolution, the United Republic of Cameroon thought that some paragraphs were obscure or had connotations outside the Committee's competence.

Algeria, supported by Iraq, opposed the amendments, stating that inflation was essentially a phenomenon of developed countries and that the developing countries experienced imported inflation.

97-21-18 Meeting 105 18 December 1981

Approved by Fifth Committee (A/36/838) by vote (44-19-25). 9 December (meeting 69); draft by Cuba (A/C.5/36/L.24); agenda item 103 (c).

Impact of inflation and monetary instability

The General Assembly,

Deeply concerned at the increased cost of inflation, which is seriously affecting the budget of the United Nations and the budget of the United Nations system as a whole,

Concerned also at the persistence of inflation and monetary instability in those developed countries in which the United Nations makes its expenditures, which affects Member States that are not responsible for the losses experienced,

Considering that, in order to cover the substantial losses caused by inflation and monetary instability, there is a need for an additional procedure that would help meet the costs they account for in the regular budget of the United Nations,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare a detailed study on the impact of inflation and monetary instability on the regular budget of the United Nations and to submit it to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session;

2. Also requests that the above-mentioned study should include the amounts which, over the last three bienniums, have resulted from inflation and monetary instability in the developed countries where United Nations organizations have their headquarters.

Accounts and auditing

Accounts for 1980

By a resolution of 30 November 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> the General Assembly accepted the financial reports and accounts for the year ended 31 December 1980, as well as the audit opinions of the Board of Auditors,<sup>(1)</sup> for the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) (p. 450), the United Nations Children's Fund (p. 1008), the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (p. 331), the United Nations Institute for Training and Research (p. 808), the voluntary funds administered by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (p. 1038) and the United Nations Fund for Population Activities (p. 785). The Assembly concurred with observations and comments by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ),<sup>(2)</sup> and requested the Board of Auditors as well as ACABQ to continue to give greater attention to areas on which they had made observations and comments. The executive heads of the organizations and programmes concerned were requested to take remedial action in areas within their competence as might be required by the Board's comments.

The resolution was adopted without vote, following similar approval by the Fifth Committee on 7 October. The draft, submitted by the Committee Chairman, was orally amended following consultations to add two elements: a preambular paragraph by which the Assembly took into account the views expressed during the Committee's debate, and the phrase "in areas falling within their competence" in the request for remedial action by heads of organizations and programmes.

Explaining its position in the Committee, the USSR said it considered the latter addition to be important, since in some instances the Board had exceeded its mandate, as when it had overlooked the fact that payment of contributions to UNDP in non-convertible currencies (p. 456) was consistent with the Financial Rules and Regulations of the United Nations. Though accepting the amendments, the United States said it would have been prepared to adopt the original text; the resolution protected the independent character of the Board and implied that it should continue to make factual suggestions to the Assembly and to organization heads.

General comments on the Board's practices were made by several countries. Ghana and Nigeria said the Board had contributed towards efficient and effective administration of United Nations programmes and control of resources; nevertheless, there was room for improvement in such areas as cash management, procurement systems and budgetary control. In the opinion of the Philippines, there appeared to be both overlapping and gaps between the systems-based auditing by the Board and the coverage by the Secretariat's Internal Audit Division; it wondered whether the Board might instead favour a comprehensive audit covering not only economy and efficiency but also programme results. The United States held the Board's work essential in the effort to ensure that limited resources were used effectively and in full compliance with the Financial Rules and Regulations.

The USSR supported efforts to enhance the Board's role in promoting financial discipline and sound management but remarked that the lack of uniformity in the presentation of accounts for the various organizations made it virtually impossible to assess accurately their financial situation and activities. A representative of the Board responded by describing steps being taken to harmonize financial statements and said the Board was pleased with the progress achieved.

Financial reports and accounts, and reports of the Board of Auditors

The General Assembly.

Having considered the financial reports and accounts for the year ended 31 December 1980 of the United Nations Development Programme, the United Nations Children's Fund, the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, the United Nations Institute for Training and Research, the voluntary funds administered by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and the United Nations Fund for Population Activities, the audit opinions of the Board of Auditors and the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions.

Taking into account the views expressed by delegations during the debate in the Fifth Committee,

1. Accepts the financial reports and accounts and the audit opinions of the Board of Auditors;
2. Concurs with the observations and comments made by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions in its report;
3. Requests the Board of Auditors and the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions to continue to give greater attention to areas regarding which they have made observations and comments;
4. Requests the executive heads of the organizations and programmes concerned to take such remedial action in areas failing within their competence as may be required by the comments and observations made by the Board of Auditors in its reports.

Organization and practices of the Board of Auditors

In 1981, the General Assembly again considered a proposal, initially submitted by Canada in 1979,<sup>(8)</sup> to improve the organization and practices of the Board of Auditors. The proposal called for the appointment by the Assembly of a United Nations Auditor-General, whose staff would be responsible for the external audit of all United Nations accounts; also, the Board of Auditors would be expanded and made responsible for reviewing the audit and audit procedures.

In accordance with a 1979 Assembly decision,<sup>(1)</sup> the Board of Auditors, the Panel of External Auditors, the Secretary-General and ACABQ submitted their views on the subject to the Assembly. The Assembly decided in November 1981 to keep the question under review.

REPORTS TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY. In April, the Secretary-General transmitted a report on the organization and professional practices of the Board of Auditors prepared by the Panel of External Auditors of the United Nations, the Specialized Agencies and the International Atomic Energy Agency.<sup>(5)</sup>

After reviewing the 1979 Canadian proposal, the Panel observed that the consultants' report which had led to it contained only limited evidence of the Board's recent practices. There had been considerable improvement in the audit standard since 1976 (when the Board had decided to set up an Audit Operations Committee to plan the audit work on a unified and integrated basis and to review all audits, prepare reports and establish common auditing standards<sup>(7)</sup>). On the assumption that the Board would continue to consist of experienced auditors-general with adequate staff support, the Panel saw no reason why further progress should not be made along the lines begun in 1976; on the other hand, most Panel members thought the Canadian proposal would provide a unified and continuing audit organization, although undue emphasis on the training of auditors from developing countries might detract from its effectiveness.

The Panel set out several factors for the Assembly's consideration: The rules and regulations did not appear to restrict further development of the existing system; it was important to avoid too many changes in Board membership within a short period; any arrangements for establishing an Auditor-General would need to ensure his independence; the appointment of a permanent Auditor-General would depart from the practice of entrusting the audit of most United Nations organizations to national auditors of member States; and the probable cost of the proposed system should be evaluated, along with the implications for other United Nations committees, such as ACABQ of establishing an audit committee.

In June, the Secretary-General transmitted a report of the Board of Auditors which reviewed the improvements in the Board's organizational structure and arrangements for auditing, as well as the changes proposed by Canada.<sup>(4)</sup>

Finding nothing fundamentally lacking in its current organization or professional practices, the Board concluded that the current arrangement for external audit should remain unchanged; however, it did not want to preclude future self-evaluation by the Board, if necessary. In the Board's opinion, the appointment of a permanent Auditor-General would deprive the United Nations of the freshness and impartiality which the Board members had brought to their work over the past 34 years. The Board also expressed the view that the cost of external audit would increase considerably if the proposed changes were implemented and that ACABQ rather than the audit committee envisaged by Canada should continue to review the Board's reports to the Assembly.

In a September report,<sup>(6)</sup> the Secretary-General reviewed the changes introduced by the Board during the past several years, including the extension of audit from the traditional approach, concerned with accounts and financial statements, to a systems-based approach that examined management and administrative areas of the audited organizations. In addition, a degree of rotation and continuity in composition had been achieved. In view of those improvements, the Secretary-General concluded that there did not appear to be any sufficiently demonstrated need for fundamental change in the Board's organizational and professional practices. The Canadian proposal was annexed to the report.

In a report submitted in October,<sup>(3)</sup> ACABQ expressed agreement with the premise underlying the Canadian proposal, namely that the United Nations needed an effective external audit in which both the Member States and the Secretariat had confidence. However, it concluded that the Board could provide such an audit without far-reaching and potentially expensive reforms. It was confident that the Board would continue to give particular attention to ways of adapting the audit to changing requirements.

Noting that the Panel of External Auditors, the Board and the Secretary-General agreed on the value of the systems-based audit, ACABQ believed it could be extended, as needed, in the context of current arrangements.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 30 November, the General Assembly took note with appreciation of the four reports and decided to keep under review the question of the organization and professional practices of the Board of Auditors.<sup>(2)</sup> The Assembly took this decision without vote, following similar approval by the Fifth Committee on 13 October of a draft by Canada and New Zealand.

Introducing the draft in the Committee, Canada said it would serve simply to recognize the possibility for future consideration of the Board's organization and professional practices.

Canada would not press its original proposal in view of indications that the suggested changes would be premature for the time being, but it continued to believe they had merit.

Commending the draft, Australia said the Canadian initiative had led to an important self-examination by those most concerned with United Nations audit practices; it was vital that those proposals, perhaps in an amended form, be looked at again in conjunction with a re-examination of the adequacy of the audit system. Also in favour of the decision, Ghana said it supported all measures to enhance the Board's capacity to conduct audits worthy of confidence. Endorsing the decision as well as the original Canadian proposals, Sweden said the question was important enough to warrant constant review.

Japan endorsed the ACABQ conclusions and thought the time had not come to adopt the Canadian proposals.

(a) Took note with appreciation of the reports of the Panel of External Auditors, the Board of Auditors, the Secretary-General and the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions concerning the proposal by Canada for changes in the institutional arrangements for auditing in the United Nations;

(b) Decided to keep the question of the organization and professional practices of the Board of Auditors under review.

Chapter II

United Nations programmes

In 1981, three United Nations bodies and the Secretary-General dealt extensively with issues concerning the Organization's programmes, such as planning methods, review and evaluation, priority setting, identifying non-essential activities, and programme aspects of the budget. These bodies-the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination (CPC), the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) and the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ)-and the Secretary-General issued reports and made recommendations. In December, the General Assembly adopted four resolutions on these subjects.

In a comprehensive resolution on programme planning,<sup>(4)</sup> the Assembly endorsed CPC recommendations<sup>(2)</sup> on guidelines for establishing an order of priority among programmes and urged that a central Secretariat unit monitor programme implementation. In a related action, the Assembly suggested ways in which the United Nations could strengthen its system for internal evaluation of the effectiveness of its activities.

Taking note of a special Secretariat review of the United Nations work programme, completed during 1981 and identifying obsolete and low-priority activities,<sup>(3)</sup> the Assembly requested CPC to consider its programme implications and ACABQ to examine the administrative and financial implications.<sup>(7)</sup>

During 1981, JIU issued 15 reports on various matters related to the efficiency of operations in the United Nations system, with continued emphasis on management and administration (p. 1312).

An ACABQ report on administrative and budgetary co-ordination in the United Nations system put the total contributions by member States to these organizations at $3.8 billion in 1980.<sup>(1)</sup> The Assembly asked that the comments and observations in this report be referred to those organizations.<sup>(6)</sup>

Programme planning

Measures and guidelines for determining an order of priority among United Nations programmes were adopted in December 1981 by the General Assembly. This action, based on recommendations by CPC, took into account a report of JIU on the setting of priorities and the identification of obsolete activities in the United Nations and a report of the Secretary-General on setting explicit priorities among United Nations programmes. The key United Nations planning document, its medium-term plan for 1984-1989, was under preparation during 1981.

REPORTS. The March report of JIU on priority setting and the identification of obsolete activities,<sup>(2)</sup> prepared by Inspector Maurice Bertrand, discussed conceivable types of solutions and focused on two aspects where current practices were found wanting: machinery for diagnosis culminating in recommendations for the transfer of resources, and intergovernmental decision-making to ensure that recommendations on priorities were carried out. In the view of JIU, what was at stake in setting priorities was finding out whether resources could be transferred, by eliminating obsolete or marginal activities, to activities that were useful and effective.

In order to supplement the progress already made in setting up structures and in the methodology of planning, programming, budgeting and evaluation, JIU made 16 recommendations. It proposed that regulations on planning and programming be made official by having them adopted by the General Assembly and that certain changes be studied, including a division of authority according to which the Secretariat would be given certain flexibility in deviating from the programme up to a certain point, beyond which intergovernmental approval would be needed. Several new procedures and methods were recommended, including: transmittal of the medium-term plan to all the Assembly's Main Committees so that they might consider and approve the parts which concerned them, as well as procedures for reducing appropriations for inadequately implemented sub-programmes, for rejecting portions of sub-programmes during reviews of the medium-term plan, and for systematic and regular review of on-going activities. Three criteria were suggested for classifying priorities: importance of objective, capacity of the Organization and effectiveness of Secretariat units.

In order to carry out priority setting, JIU proposed several new functions and mechanisms, including a priorities-analysis function in the Secretariat, diagnostic teams of outside consultants to submit comments on programmes to Member States and a Secretariat committee to draw conclusions on evaluation reports. Two other possibilities were suggested: a single intergovernmental committee to review plans, programmes and budgets, and a special session of the Economic and Social Council or the General Assembly on the problem of priorities.

Commenting on the JIU report in October, the Secretary-General agreed in general with the substance of its recommendations but raised several points concerning methods of implementation, mentioned similar steps already initiated by the Secretariat and discussed possible technical complications. He also drew attention to two issues raised by regional commission secretariats, namely: (a) the report's analyses did not take sufficiently into account the commissions' responsibilities in setting regional priorities and the need to introduce regional dimensions in the central priority-setting process; and (b) in certain programme areas, extrabudgetary resources made up a high proportion of overall resources and the rate of programme implementation was closely linked to the availability of those resources. In addition, the Secretary-General commented on a CPC proposal for the establishment of a monitoring unit (p. 1306).

The Secretary-General's April report to the Assembly's Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee on setting explicit priorities among United Nations programmes,<sup>(4)</sup> after describing the background and current situation, dealt with the conceptual issues of purposes, scope and level of explicit priority setting as well as the criteria to be followed, and drew conclusions and made recommendations. A set of possible criteria was annexed.

Reiterating that the purpose of priority setting was to ensure that high-priority activities received proportionately larger resources, the report suggested that long-term priorities could be determined by the appropriate committee of the General Assembly. In substantive areas, the determination would be based on CPC proposals as to which programmes and subprogrammes should be given high and low priority, taking into account any recommendations of specialized intergovernmental bodies. Priority setting for conference and administrative services would be done by the Fifth Committee, on recommendations of the Committee on Conferences and ACABQ and based on a report of the Secretary-General that would propose alternative levels of high- and low-priority services. The Assembly's long-term priorities would be used by the Secretary-General to formulate, in his proposed programme budget, suggestions for a more adequate proportion of resources for high-priority programmes and for financing any additional resource requirements from redeployment within the Secretariat.

The report proposed a phased introduction of the priority-setting system over two and a half years.

A September report by the Secretary-General<sup>(5)</sup> on Secretariat arrangements in regard to the ongoing restructuring of the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system (p. 1092) included a summary of the results of the first meeting of the consultative arrangements on policy issues pertaining to economic and social activities and on planning, programming, budgeting and evaluation, held at Geneva on 2 July under the chairmanship of the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation and with the participation of the heads of departments, organs and programmes. In regard to programme planning, the meeting recognized that the introduction to the 1984-1989 medium-term plan should be a key integral element of the planning process, highlight the main policy orientation of the United Nations, and indicate medium-term objectives, strategies and trends responding to the priorities set by intergovernmental organs. The meeting also reviewed the progress of a special review of the Organization's work programme (p. 1309).

The Secretary-General emphasized the importance he attached to the effective functioning of these arrangements, which he believed would prove useful in identifying objectives common to various Secretariat units and in maximizing the Organization's responsiveness to the agreed policy directives of Member States, particularly the developing countries.

CPC ACTION. In considering the proposed programme budget for 1982-1983 (p. 1274) at its twenty-first session, held in New York from 4 to 29 May and on 8 and 9 June 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> CPC made recommendations on criteria and methods in setting programme priorities. It agreed that there was no necessary relationship between the priority of activities and the amount of resources required to conduct them, but stated that the practical purpose of establishing priorities was to indicate which activities should have first claim on resources and which could be curtailed or terminated.

The Committee recommended that priorities be set at three levels. At the broadest level, the introduction to the medium-term plan- to be approved by the General Assembly-would highlight objectives and policy orientations and indicate trends. In addition, subprogrammes would be reviewed for acceptability, after which priorities could be set among the acceptable subprogrammes. Obsolete and marginal activities would continue to be eliminated, and the budget document should continue to identify the highest- and lowest-priority elements in each subprogramme.

The Committee agreed that priority setting should apply to all substantive and service activities covered by budgetary procedures. Activities that could be eliminated, as well as funds to be redistributed to high-priority activities, would be identified. Priorities established by the General Assembly should, in principle, guide the allocation of all United Nations resources, including extrabudgetary (voluntary) funds, although the formulation of individual country programmes, such as those of the United Nations Development Programme, would remain the prerogative of individual recipient countries.

The Committee recommended that the Assembly adopt official rules and regulations governing programme planning, programme aspects of the budget, performance monitoring and evaluation procedures. It requested the Secretary-General to submit proposals for these in 1982, through CPC. It recommended that a central and independent Secretariat unit monitor and report on actual programme delivery in all activities covered by the programme budget. At the same time, units responsible for implementing programmes should have limited discretion to modify programme elements where necessary, reporting changes to intergovernmental bodies.

It was agreed that programme review of proposed budgets by CPC must precede administrative and financial review by ACABQ and that the Secretary-General would study the timing and other practical problems that might arise in implementing such arrangements. CPC also recommended that each chapter of the proposed medium-term plan be submitted to the appropriate Main Committee of the General Assembly before the plan as a whole was adopted by the Assembly, and that a report on the operation of the new system of setting priorities should be submitted to the Assembly, through CPC, in 1984.

CPC also concluded that: the Assembly should renew its instruction that the highest- and lowest-priority elements be identified within each programme; the Assembly should be given a statement of the programme implications of proposed new activities along with the traditional statement of financial implications; in future proposed budgets, each section should show a detailed publications programme; and the foreword to the budget document should include a table showing resource distribution in both dollar and percentage terms.

On other programme matters, CPC made recommendations on United Nations activities to promote regional economic and social co-operation (p. 608). The remainder of its 1981 session was taken up with questions of co-ordination in the 'United Nations system (p. 1076).

The Economic and Social Council, on 23 July, endorsed the conclusions and recommendations of CPC, taking into account reservations and comments concerning modifications by members of CPC and of the Council.<sup>(7)</sup>

The CPC recommendation for a programme monitoring unit in the Secretariat was discussed by the Secretary-General in his October comments to the General Assembly on priority setting and the identification of obsolete activities (p. 1304). While agreeing in principle with the need to augment the monitoring function, he believed that more consideration of the proposal was needed, since such functions were being carried out by two existing Secretariat units in the Office of Financial Services and the Office for Programme Planning and Co-ordination.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 18 December, the General Assembly adopted a resolution setting out measures and guidelines for determining an order of priority among programmes, as a guide for preparing the programme budget and allocating all budgetary and extrabudgetary resources.<sup>(6)</sup> Priority setting, it said, should be based mainly on the importance of an objective to Member States, the Organization's capacity to achieve it, and the effectiveness and usefulness of the results. On activities that had been completed or were obsolete, of marginal usefulness or ineffective, the Assembly reaffirmed the need to integrate their identification into planning, programming, budget evaluation and management. It requested proposals from the Secretary-General enabling the Assembly to adopt rules and regulations on programme planning, programme aspects of the budget, monitoring of implementation and methods of evaluation. It urged that a central Secretariat unit monitor programme implementation, and it called for improved evaluation (p. 1312).

The resolution was adopted, without vote, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee, which similarly approved it on 7 December. The text was sponsored by Algeria, Ethiopia, Ghana, India, Indonesia, Morocco, Romania, the United Republic of Cameroon and Yugoslavia, and was approved with minor oral revisions. This was the first of two resolutions on programme planning adopted on 18 December, the other being concerned with evaluation.

Addressing the Fifth Committee, the Assistant Secretary-General for Programme Planning and Co-ordination explained that the new priority-setting system would replace the former system, which provided for the setting of relative priorities among major programmes.

The United Republic of Cameroon, introducing the draft resolution, expressed hope that its recommendations could serve as guidelines in the preparation of the next programme budget.

Ethiopia, supported by Guinea and Yugoslavia, proposed orally that regional plans that were integral parts of global strategies be listed among the instruments to be taken into account in setting overall priorities. However, it withdrew the proposal after the United States objected that such plans were adopted by regional organizations in which not all United Nations Members were represented.

The United States also expressed reservations about the other instruments listed in this provision, on the ground that neither the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade<sup>(5)</sup> nor resolutions on a new international economic order could be defined as authoritative for the purpose of priority setting. Japan and the United Kingdom voiced similar reservations.

In the Committee's debate, a number of speakers stressed the importance of priority setting as a means of enabling Member States to direct United Nations activities into areas of their choice. Iraq said priority setting should involve States and intergovernmental, regional and sectoral organizations, and medium-term planning should be co-ordinated with international, regional and national plans. Japan suggested several steps to improve programming, including an overall review of existing programmes by intergovernmental bodies, convening CPC to examine the programme implications of draft resolutions before they were adopted, and the imposition of time-limits on mandates for Secretariat activity so that they would cease to be operative unless renewed by an intergovernmental body. Tunisia said the formulation of the medium-term plan would provide an opportunity for extensive debate by the main United Nations bodies, resulting in swifter and more effective establishment of priorities.

Speaking on behalf of the Nordic States, Norway identified three requirements for programme planning: better information, improved administrative and management performance, and changes in machinery and structures to accommodate the new planning system. Speaking on behalf of the European Community countries, the United Kingdom said the primary purpose of programme planning should be to allow Member States and the Secretariat to decide how the objectives laid down in resolutions should be translated into programmes for maximum effect on the problems they were designed to solve; the major gap in programme planning was the absence of a precise priority-setting system and the new procedures would represent a major advance towards completion of a comprehensive planning system. Yugoslavia stressed the importance of setting time-limited objectives for the accomplishment of programmed tasks, so that both the progress and quality of work could be measured.

Several States were critical of current programme planning practices. Australia said there was considerable evidence that sections of the Secretariat were reluctant to set priorities or to take planning seriously. Expressing support for the CPC recommendations on priority setting, Austria pointed out that there was no overall document giving a general view of expenditures, the budget or the medium-term plan. The Byelorussian SSR said that the only practical effect of current medium-term planning was to confirm the lack of a clear planning system; the quickest way to arrive at clear planning would be for both legislative and executive bodies to recognize the limited nature of the Organization's resources. The USSR believed a strict order of priorities should be observed and that all activities unrelated to the principal objectives of the United Nations should be financed from resources released by changes in programmes and increased productivity.

India said it was hard to accept the notion that programmes should be constrained by a predetermined and arbitrary limit on budgetary growth. The United Republic of Cameroon said that, unlike JIU, it viewed priority setting not as a transfer of resources but as a way to rationalize activities; identification of low-priority items must not lead to their systematic elimination.

Many speakers stressed the need to identify obsolete or marginal activities so that they could be eliminated and the resources used for higher-priority work. In the view of the Ukrainian SSR, new programmes not relating directly to the Organization's main mission should be financed from resources released by the identification of such activities. However, Indonesia opposed the concept that new or high-priority programmes and activities were conditional upon elimination of completed or marginal ones. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya observed that, since any activity was subject to review and approval at a number of levels before introduction, the termination of an activity on the grounds of ineffectiveness or marginal utility should be subject to the same scrutiny.

Argentina, Japan and Tunisia supported the CPC recommendation for a central Secretariat unit to monitor programme implementation, while Brazil said such a unit was not advisable. The Bahamas thought the two existing units employed for this purpose should be combined and should report to the highest possible authority, such as the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation. Belgium suggested that it would be better for the resolution on programme planning to urge that monitoring be entrusted to the central Secretariat rather than to a central unit in the Secretariat, so as to give the Secretary-General flexibility in assigning the function. Canada felt that the decision on the proposed unit might best be postponed pending preparation of the programming regulations suggested by CPC and a JIU study on structural changes.

Speaking for the Nordic States, Norway said the establishment of such a unit raised the problem of the autonomy of the units responsible for programme execution and the links which they should have with a central unit. The United Republic of Cameroon believed the unit would help improve efficiency in programme implementation but it should not serve as a means for programme managers to question the priorities set by Member States. Reiterating its support for evaluation, the United States noted the JIU emphasis on the need to ensure that evaluation became a part of organizational structure and not merely a facade giving an illusion of activity.

Algeria, Austria, the Bahamas and the Netherlands endorsed the JIU suggestion for a single intergovernmental body to replace CPC and ACABQ and to deal with all aspects of programmes and budgets. India also favoured this approach, along with a transfer of the budgeting function from the Office of Financial Services to the Office for Programme Planning and Co-ordination. However, Brazil and the United Republic of Cameroon regarded the idea of replacing the two committees by a single body as premature. Several speakers favoured closer co-ordination between the two bodies.

Algeria, the Bahamas and Indonesia endorsed in principle the JIU suggestion for a special session of the Economic and Social Council or the General Assembly on priorities. However, Australia, Brazil and the United States did not favour such a session. Austria thought it would be enough to have a one- or two-week discussion of the programme at plenary meetings during the 1982 Assembly session, while Canada preferred a special session of CPC or a Fifth Committee working group to make proposals on priorities. Morocco believed that a conference of national planners would be less costly and more useful.

The Netherlands thought that discussion of the medium-term plan by the Assembly's Main Committees should be instituted as soon as possible. However, most other speakers mentioning this JIU recommendation did not favour it.

Canada and India favoured the inclusion of extrabudgetary resources in the priority-setting process.

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 32/197 of 20 December 1977 on the restructuring of the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system,

Recalling also its resolutions 34/224 and 34/225 of 20 December 1979 relating, respectively, to medium-term planning in the United Nations and to the identification of activities that have been completed or are obsolete, of marginal usefulness or ineffective,

Recalling further its resolution 34/164 of 17 December 1979, particularly paragraphs 2, 3 and 6 thereof, in which it approved the Glossary of Evaluation Terms, took note of the document entitled Initial guidelines for internal evaluation systems of the United Nations organizations and urged the Joint Inspection Unit to continue its efforts in the area of evaluation, both internal and external,

Recalling Economic and Social Council resolution 2008(LX) of 14 May 1976, the annex to which contains the terms of reference of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination whereby the Committee shall, inter alia, recommend an order of priorities among United Nations programmes as defined in the medium-term plan,

Recalling also its resolution 35/9 of 3 November 1980, in which it requested the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination to determine new criteria and methods to be employed in setting programme priorities,

Having considered in detail the report of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination on the work of its twenty-first session, the report of the Secretary-General on setting explicit priorities among United Nations programmes and the reports of the Joint Inspection Unit on the setting of priorities and the identification of obsolete activities in the United Nations and on evaluation in the United Nations system,

Taking note of Economic and Social Council decision 1981/180 of 23 July 1981, in which the Council endorsed the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination.

Considering that the determination of priorities among programmes, the identification of obsolete activities, and evaluation should be fully integrated into the general process of planning, programming and management,

Overall conclusions and recommendations

1. Notes with satisfaction the conclusions and recommendations contained in the above-mentioned reports of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination, the Secretary-General and the Joint Inspection Unit;

2. Endorses the conclusions and recommendations set forth in the report of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination concerning an order of priorities among programmes and, in particular:

(a) Requests the Secretary-General to present to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session, through the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination at its twenty-second session, proposals enabling it to adopt official rules and regulations governing programme planning, the programme aspects of the budget, the monitoring of implementation and the methods of evaluation, such proposals to take into account all decisions so far taken with respect to planning, programming and evaluation;

(b) Urges that the monitoring of the implementation of programme commitment should be entrusted to a central unit within the Secretariat, noting that, as the work of the unit should include determination of actual programme delivery and a role in the making of decisions that involves their possible modification, that work should be defined in the context of the above-mentioned official rules and regulations, bearing in mind the comments and suggestions made in the reports of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination and the Joint Inspection Unit, as well as by delegations in the Fifth Committee;

(c) Decides that the length of the sessions of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination should depend on its programme of work and on problems of scheduling, and emphasizes in this connection the need to grant the Committee, for its session in 1982, sufficient time to enable it to make a complete and detailed examination of the draft medium-term plan for the period 1984-1989;

(d) Reaffirms the need for close co-ordination between the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination and the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and, for this purpose, requests the Advisory Committee to study the statements submitted by the Secretary-General on the administrative and financial implications of the recommendations made by the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination, as endorsed by the Economic and Social Council, and to include its recommendations in a separate chapter of its report or in an addendum thereto for consideration by the General Assembly together with the recommendations of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination;

3. Recommends that the organizations concerned should increase the effectiveness of their evaluation system and take the necessary steps to implement the recommendations contained in the reports of the Joint Inspection Unit, and in particular those concerning self-evaluation and the integration of evaluation in the planning and management process;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to improve the evaluation services of the United Nations in accordance with the recommendations contained in the reports of the Joint Inspection Unit;

Order of priority among programmes

Decides to adopt the measures and guidelines set out below for the determination of an order of priority among programmes:

1. The principal purpose of establishing priorities among programmes that form an integral part of the general planning and management process is to rationalize and order the activities and provide a guide for the preparation of the programme budget.

2. The order of priority should be established as follows:

(a) At the highest level, it should be established by as precise an indication as possible of the problems and of the overall orientation and trends deriving from authoritative instruments such as the Charter of the United Nations, the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade and the resolutions on the new international economic order. The introduction to the medium-term plan should, accordingly, analyse the trends that reflect the overall priorities.

(b) At the subprogramme level in the draft medium-term plan or the proposed programme budget, it should be established by a decision of the General Assembly to accept, curtail, reformulate or reject subprogrammes on the basis of the budget and programme performance reports, the detailed evaluation reports and the recommendations of the competent intergovernmental bodies. It being understood that the priorities established at the subprogramme level should contribute to the achievement of the overall priorities determined at the highest level.

3. Without prejudice to arrangements and procedures now in force and to the specific character of the common services, the establishment of an order of priority should apply to all the substantive activities of the Organization and to the common services and serve as a guide for the allocation of all its budgetary and extrabudgetary resources. For that purpose the decisions on priorities should be brought to the attention of Member States and the governing boards of the voluntary funds.

4. The establishment of an order of priority should be based principally on the importance of the objective to Member States, the capacity of the Organization to achieve it and the real effectiveness and usefulness of the results.

5. The timetable and the procedures for the introduction of the new system for setting priorities should extend over a period of two and a half years, as indicated in the report of the Secretary-General.

6. A report on the operation of this new system for setting priorities should be submitted to the General Assembly at its thirty-ninth session, through the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination. That critical report should reveal the difficulties encountered, make suggestions for dealing with them and indicate whether further changes must be made in structures and procedures including, inter alia, those proposed by the Joint Inspection Unit and by delegations during the debate on priorities in the Fifth Committee at the thirty-sixth session;

III

Activities that have been completed or are obsolete, of marginal usefulness or ineffective

1. Reaffirms the need to integrate the identification of activities that have been completed or are obsolete, of marginal usefulness or ineffective in the general process of planning, programming, budgeting evaluation and management;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to provide the General Assembly, in the context of the preparation of the proposed programme budget and through the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination, with a list of the activities considered obsolete, of marginal usefulness or ineffective, in order to facilitate decision-making;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to achieve better implementation of General Assembly resolutions 3534(XXX) of 17 December 1975, 31/93 of 14 December 1976, 32/201 of 21 December 1977, 33/204 of 29 January 1979, 34/225 of 20 December 1979 and 35/209 of 17 December 1980, concerning activities that have been completed or are obsolete, of marginal usefulness or ineffective and for this purpose requests him to continue to refine further, if necessary, the criteria for the determination of those activities.

Special review of the work programme

The results of a special review of the ongoing work programme of the United Nations were presented to the General Assembly in a December 1981 report by the Secretary-General,<sup>(1)</sup> submitted in conjunction with the Assembly's examination of the proposed programme budget for 1982-1983 (p. 1272). This review was conducted by an ad hoc group composed of the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation, as Chairman; the Under-Secretary-General for Administration, Finance and Management; and the Assistant Secretaries-General for Financial Services and for Programme Planning and Co-ordination. The report set out conclusions in three annexes which listed activities identified for termination in the proposed 1982-1983 budget as obsolete, marginally useful or ineffective; activities required by legislative mandates and therefore included in the proposed budget but which might be considered of low priority; and high-priority activities that could contribute to the strengthening of ongoing programmes.

The report estimated the cost of the low-priority activities as approximately $20 million to $25 million and said that, if the General Assembly agreed, those resources would become available for redeployment towards financing high-priority activities. The report also suggested that the Assembly might refer certain proposals to CPC for further review.

The Assembly, in a resolution adopted without vote on 18 December 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> took note of the report and requested CPC to report on the programme implications of the Secretary-General's proposals. It asked the Committee on Conferences to examine and report on those recommendations which related to the limitation of documentation (p. 1370). Furthermore, it requested ACABQ to report on the administrative and financial implications, including those arising out of any recommendations by CPC and the Committee on Conferences. All the reports were to be submitted in 1982.

This resolution was recommended by consensus by the Fifth Committee on 16 December 1981, on a draft proposed by the Chairman after consultations.

The Under-Secretary-General for Administration, Finance and Management, who presented the Secretary-General's report to the Fifth Committee, observed that any curtailment or modification of programmes covered by existing mandates would have to be predicated on decisions of intergovernmental bodies. Nevertheless, all areas of programmes and activities had been reviewed to assess areas of low priority as well as those where strengthening might seem desirable.

In the Committee's discussion, France, Japan, Trinidad and Tobago, the USSR and the United States expressed regret that the report had reached the Fifth Committee too late for it to take action on low-priority activities. Algeria, Egypt and India said they had joined in the consensus because of the lateness of the report, which deserved more careful study.

The General Assembly

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General;
2. Requests the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination to consider, at its twenty-second session, the programme implications of the proposals contained in the report of the Secretary-General and to report thereon to the General Assembly, at its thirty-seventh session, through the Economic and Social Council;
3. Requests the Committee on Conferences to examine those recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General which relate to conference servicing and to the control and limitation of documentation and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session;
4. Requests the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions to examine the administrative and financial implications of the Secretary-General's proposals, including those arising out of the considerations and recommendations, if any, of the intergovernmental bodies referred to in paragraphs 2 and 3 above, and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session.

Programme objectives

On 23 July 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> the Economic and Social Council, acting without vote, endorsed proposals by the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC) for an overview of the objectives and plans of the organizations of the United Nations system, called for by the General Assembly in 1978.<sup>(2)</sup> The Council requested ACC to submit the overview report to it in 1983, through CPC, utilizing existing resources.

The draft of this decision was proposed orally by the Chairman of the Council's Third (Programme and Co-ordination) Committee following a suggestion by Pakistan, and was approved by the Committee without vote on 17 July 1981.

In an annex to its annual report to the Council, submitted in May,<sup>(1)</sup> ACC proposed that the overview consist of a narrative describing the major world problems being confronted by the system, and current and future objectives, plans and activities to respond to them. It was envisaged that such an overview report could be presented in 1983.

Economic and Social Council decision 1981/181

Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee E/1981/96 (Part III) without vote, 17 July (meeting 17); draft orally proposed by Chairman on suggestion by Pakistan; agenda item 18.

Overview of the objectives and plans of the United Nations system

At its 40th plenary meeting, on 23 July 1981, the Council decided to endorse the proposals of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination for an overview of the objectives and plans of the organizations of the United Nations system, called for by the General Assembly in its resolution 33/118 of 19 December 1978, and to request the Committee to submit the overview report to the Council at its second regular session of 1983, through the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination, on the understanding that this would be carried out within existing resources.

Programme evaluation

After receiving two reports by the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) on progress made in evaluating United Nations programmes, the General Assembly, in December 1981, requested a strengthening of the Secretariat's evaluation system.

REPORTS. JIU submitted two reports on programme evaluation during 1981, both prepared by Inspector Earl D. Sohm.

The first, on the status of internal evaluation in United Nations organizations, submitted in February,<sup>(2)</sup> noted that internal evaluation systems were set up to help maximize the effectiveness of activities by providing analytical information on results to secretariats and intergovernmental bodies and to provide accountability for effective use of resources. The report summarized the status of evaluation in the United Nations and 22 specialized agencies and programmes, with recommendations addressed to a number of them. In regard to the United Nations, the report urged a strengthening of the Evaluation Unit in the Department of International Economic and Social Affairs, and close ties with the Programme Analysis and Evaluation Unit of the Department of Administration, Finance and Management. In a general comment, JIU found that a major concern was the small amount of resources devoted to evaluation unit staffing, a problem that could seriously hamper the realization of benefits.

The second JIU report on this subject, submitted in March,<sup>(3)</sup> was a follow-up to the Unit's initial report on evaluation, prepared in 1977.<sup>(7)</sup>

On the problem of staffing evaluation units, it suggested that persons be reassigned from elsewhere in the organization where current staffing was inadequate to meet expanding responsibilities. JIU concluded that internal evaluation systems were entering a critical stage of widespread implementation, in which organizations were faced with the challenge of strengthening and using them effectively. Besides the need for more staff, the report recommended that the organizations consider five areas: the merits of built-in self-evaluation, conducted by the units performing the activity; evaluation system coverage and development plans, guidelines on integrated management system relationships and development, and basic evaluation standards; specific evaluation analysis, follow-up and reporting mechanisms and procedures; current and future actions to assist developing country evaluation activities; and effective training programmes to support evaluation system development.

Commenting in October on the JIU reports, ACC<sup>(4)</sup> strongly supported the JIU thesis that evaluation should be integral to policy formulation, programme planning, budgeting and implementation management. It also concurred on the need for adequate resources for evaluation, remarking that evaluation skills and institutional capability were critical pre-conditions if evaluation was to give effective support to key policy, programme, budget and other management processes. Noting that some organizations faced a zero-growth situation for the next biennium, the report concluded that, if resources could not be augmented, shifts in emphasis and priority might permit their redeployment. In general, ACC believed that a modest level of resources spent on evaluation could yield greater programme benefits, in the form of either savings or increased effectiveness.

While generally supporting the trend towards built-in self-evaluation, ACC believed that it should be complemented by a control mechanism such as a central evaluation unit. It also noted that evaluation methodology had not been formulated for certain kinds of non-programmable activity such as support for negotiations leading to international agreements. In general, ACC agreed with the JIU conclusions and recommendations as guidelines for future evaluation system development, but it suggested that the reports might be somewhat over-optimistic about the degree of acceptance and understanding of the purposes and limitations of evaluation. It also commented on specific JIU recommendations.

Among the proposals on programme planning made by CPC at its May/June session<sup>(1)</sup> was a recommendation that a central Secretariat unit, independent from the units responsible for substantive activities, should monitor and report on programme delivery in all activities covered by the programme budget (p. 1306).

In a related area of evaluation, CPC made three recommendations on methodology for future cross-organizational programme analyses (inter-agency studies on the activities of the United Nations system in specific programme areas). It proposed that the challenge or main problems as defined by legislative mandates should be set out; programmes aimed at overcoming the problems should be described and analysed critically in relation to mandates; and gaps, duplication and the effectiveness or otherwise of co-ordination arrangements should be identified. CPC also examined the most recent of these analyses, concerning youth activities (p. 1016).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. In the second of two resolutions on programme planning (p. 1304) adopted without vote on 18 December,<sup>(6)</sup> the General Assembly, confirming its support for the development of programme evaluation systems and units in each agency, requested the Secretary-General to strengthen the United Nations evaluation system by the following five means: specifying the responsibilities and tasks of evaluation units; preparing for the Assembly precise evaluation plans linked to medium-term planning and the budget cycle; developing guidelines for the planning and design of programmes and projects to make them more susceptible to evaluation; designing basic standards for the conduct, content and process of evaluation, and assuring that the quality of the evaluation products was continually assessed; and ensuring that evaluation findings were promptly and systematically utilized in management decision-making and that follow-up evaluation recommendations were carried out. The Assembly also requested the Secretary-General to report in 1983, through CPC, on the implementation of these measures.

In its principal resolution on programme planning,<sup>(5)</sup> the Assembly urged that the monitoring of programme implementation be entrusted to a central unit in the Secretariat. It also recommended that United Nations organizations implement the JIU recommendations on evaluation and requested the Secretary-General to improve United Nations evaluation services.

The revised resolution on evaluation was sponsored by the United States in the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee, which approved it without vote on 8 December. The text incorporated two oral amendments, accepted by the sponsor. The first, proposed by Sweden and Yugoslavia, provided for submission of the Secretary-General's report to the Assembly in 1983 instead of 1982. The second, by India, called for submission of the report through CPC.

Austria, supporting all of the JIU recommendations on evaluation, found progress in this area to have been slow and suggested that a general evaluation of the results obtained by the United Nations in the economic and social spheres be submitted to CPC. The Bahamas hoped that imbalances handicapping the internal evaluation machinery would be rectified, preferably through an overall monitoring and evaluation unit. Reiterating its support for evaluation, the United States noted the JIU emphasis on the need to ensure that evaluation became a part of organizational structure and not merely a façade giving an illusion of activity.

General Assembly resolution 36/228 B

Adopted without vote Meeting 105 18 December 1981

Approved by Fifth Committee (A/36/806) without vote, 8 December (meeting 67): draft by United States (A/C.5/36/L.31/Rev.1), orally amended by India and by Sweden and Yugoslavia, and orally revised: agenda item 101.

The General Assembly,

Confirming its continued support for the development of evaluation systems and evaluation units within each agency,

Emphasizing its support for the reports of the Joint Inspection Unit on evaluation in the United Nations system,

Encouraging all agencies to co-operate with the Joint Inspection Unit in assuring their own evaluation capacity, in order to make evaluation an integral part of the agency's programming and development process,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to strengthen the United Nations evaluation systems and evaluation units by:

(a) Specifying the responsibilities and tasks of the United Nations evaluation units;

(b) Preparing for the General Assembly precise evaluation plans linked to the medium-term planning process and the budget cycle:

(c) Developing guidelines for the planning and design of programmes and projects to make them more susceptible to evaluation;

(d) Designing and issuing basic standards for the conduct, content and process of evaluation and assuring that the quality of the evaluation products is continually assessed;

(e) Taking appropriate measures to ensure that evaluation findings shall be promptly and systematically utilized in the management decision-making process and that follow-up evaluation findings and recommendations shall be carried out;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its thirty-eighth session, through the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination, on the implementation of paragraph 1 above.

Joint Inspection Unit

JIU ACTIVITIES. As requested by CPC and endorsed by the General Assembly in 1980,<sup>(27)</sup> the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) adjusted its work programme for 1981 and the following few years to enable it to participate in the Assembly's appraisal of the extent to which the process of restructuring the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system had begun to meet the requirements of the new international economic order. In this area, JIU completed in July a report on relationships between the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation and other Secretariat entities (p. 1093). It planned to prepare 10 more studies between 1982 and 1984, after which it would submit a report that would discuss the impact of restructuring on the secretariats of United Nations organizations.

During 1981, JIU issued 15 reports on various topics which were submitted to the General Assembly. Ten of these related to management and administration, including the one on intra-Secretariat relationships with the Director-General.<sup>(16)</sup> The others concerned: setting priorities and identifying obsolete activities<sup>(8)</sup> (p. 1304); programme evaluation (two reports)<sup>(9,10)</sup> (p. 1310); application of the principle of equitable geographical distribution of Secretariat staff<sup>(14)</sup> (p. 1317); methods of determining staff requirements<sup>(7)</sup> (p. 1362); personnel policy options-career development and types of appointment<sup>(17)</sup> (p. 1325); control and limitation of documentation<sup>(6)</sup> (p. 1370); management services in the United Nations system<sup>(12)</sup> (p. 1378); and building construction procedures of United Nations organizations<sup>(13)</sup> (p. 1382).

An account of JIU activities from 1 July 1980 to 30 June 1981 was submitted to the General Assembly in the Unit's thirteenth annual report.<sup>(1)</sup> Its work during the second half of 1981 was covered in its 1982 report.<sup>(2)</sup>

In his annual report on implementation of JIU recommendations, submitted to the Fifth Committee in November 1981,<sup>(18)</sup> the Secretary-General discussed the status of implementation of recommendations contained in four earlier JIU reports on: the United Nations Institute for Training and Research (p. 804), the status of women staff members in the Professional category and above (p. 1321), personnel policy reforms (p. 1322) and evaluation of document translation in the United Nations system (p. 1370).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. In a decision adopted without vote on 18 December,<sup>(26)</sup> the General Assembly took note of the 1981 report of JIU and its reports on methods of determining staff requirements, management services in the United Nations system and building construction procedures. The Assembly requested the Secretary-General to include in his future comments on JIU reports an indication of which recommendations he considered should or should not be implemented.

The draft decision was approved by the Fifth Committee by consensus on 15 December as orally revised by its sponsors-Australia, Barbados, Guyana, Indonesia and Suriname- to omit a reference to the JIU report on the subregional offices of ECLA. The Byelorussian SSR, which suggested this deletion, noted that the Committee had not discussed the report. (The Economic and Social Council took note on 23 July of the report on ECLA.<sup>(24)</sup>)

Barbados, which introduced the draft decision, said the request to the Secretary-General should help clarify a situation in which he found it difficult to determine when he had a clear mandate to act on JIU recommendations.

The Assembly took action on other JIU reports as follows: on 10 December, it referred the report on control of documentation to the Committee on Conferences;<sup>(19)</sup> on 16 December, it requested a study of ways to enhance the role of United Nations information centres, drawing on the findings of the report on public information activities;<sup>(20)</sup> on 17 December, it transmitted to the Economic and Social Council the Secretary-General's comments on the report on intra-Secretariat relationships in connection with restructuring the economic and social sectors,<sup>(21)</sup> endorsed the approaches taken by the Secretary-General in his comments on the report on UNDRO<sup>(22)</sup> and took note of the report on assistance to regional intercountry technical co-operation institutions; and on 18 December it noted with satisfaction the conclusions and recommendations of reports on programme evaluation and priority setting, and requested the Secretary-General to improve evaluation services in accordance with those reports.<sup>(23)</sup>

Speaking in the Fifth Committee, Australia said the JIU recommendations on programme planning and evaluation had led to major progress, but in other areas there had been no follow-up; it might therefore be necessary to undertake an evaluation of JIU, especially since the Unit was overburdened with a wide diversity of demands going far beyond its original terms of reference. Praising the high quality of the JIU reports, Morocco said the Unit should not take over the role of the various organs and specialized agencies, but work in close co-operation with them to produce the best results. The Netherlands expressed support for the JIU recommendations. The USSR observed that the quality of JIU reports had improved recently, and added that it should go beyond producing reports and ensure that its recommendations were implemented by legislative bodies. Reiterating its support for JIU, the United States said its impartial, informative and useful work was a means of achieving more efficient management and thereby increasing the percentage of funds available to those for whom they were really intended.

Reports of the Joint Inspection Unit

At its 105th plenary meeting, on 18 December 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee:

- (a) Took note of the following documents:
  - (i) Annual report of the Joint Inspection Unit;
  - (ii) Reports of the Joint Inspection Unit on methods of determining Staff requirements, management Services in the United Nations system and building construction procedures of United Nations organizations;
- (b) Requested the Secretary-General, starting from 1 January 1982, to include in his comments on the reports of the Joint Inspection Unit a summary indicating which recommendations he considered should or should not be implemented.

Administrative and budgetary co-ordination in the UN system

The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) issued in November 1981 its annual report<sup>(1)</sup> reviewing and comparing the finances of the following organizations whose agreements with the United Nations provided for a review by the General Assembly: the International Labour Organisation, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the International Civil Aviation Organization, the Universal Postal Union, the World Health Organization (WHO), the International Telecommunication Union, the World Meteorological Organization, the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization, the World Intellectual Property Organization, the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD) and the International Atomic Energy Agency.

According to the 1982 budget figures given in the report, the regular budgets of the organizations covered, excluding IFAD, would amount to $1.6 billion, of which $1.5 billion would be covered by assessed contributions. This represented a 9.6 per cent increase over 1981 for the approved budgets and 6.5 per cent for assessed contributions. Member States contributed over $2.4 billion in 1980 to various voluntary funds and programmes out of a total of $3.8 billion in all contributions to United Nations organizations—regular budgets, peace-keeping operations and voluntary donations, according to statistics compiled by the Committee on Contributions and cited in the ACABQ report.

The report stated that the number of established posts authorized or requested for 1982 under the regular budgets of the covered agencies (excluding IFAD) totalled 12,297, or 85 more than the 1981 total, with the entire increase accounted for by WHO. The grand total of established posts in these agencies and the United Nations in 1982 was 23,764. The total number of participants in the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund, which covered all staff members with contracts of at least one year, was 41,020 as at 31 December 1980.

Referring to figures showing that total unpaid contributions as at 30 September 1981 equalled 50 per cent of the amounts payable by member States for 1981, ACABQ pointed out that the organizations had expressed concern at the impact on their cash flow caused by delays in the receipt of contributions. ACABQ also expressed the opinion that organizations which kept funds in non-interest-bearing bank accounts should review their cash management practices with a view to increasing their interest income.

Due to the fact that many agencies no longer had annual budgets, ACABQ recommended that its detailed co-ordination reports be submitted once every two years beginning in 1982, supplemented by brief reports in odd-numbered years.

This recommendation was approved by the General Assembly on 18 December in a resolution<sup>(2)</sup> by which it concurred with the observations and comments in the ACABQ report and referred them to the organizations concerned, along with those made in the Fifth Committee. The resolution was adopted without vote, after the Fifth Committee, on 9 December, approved it by consensus on a draft by Australia and Poland, introduced by Poland.

Also in connection with administrative and budgetary co-ordination, the Assembly adopted a resolution on the impact of inflation on the budgets of United Nations organizations (p. 1300) and a procedural decision on a proposal for a single administrative tribunal (p. 1360).

Commenting in the Fifth Committee on the ACABQ report, Romania suggested that it should have included conclusions on significant trends in budgetary matters and recommendations for increasing the efficiency of administrative and budgetary activities. In the view of the USSR, little had been done to bring about administrative and budgetary co-ordination; the most pressing problem was to reduce the budgetary growth rates of the United Nations and the specialized agencies. The United States stressed the need for co-ordination within Governments, whose representatives often spoke with different voices in different organizations. Yugoslavia suggested that a bank be established in which United Nations organizations could deposit their funds, currently placed in different banks.

Administrative and budgetary co-ordination of the United Nations with the specialized agencies and the International Atomic Energy Agency

The General Assembly,

Concerned with the need for effective administrative and budgetary co-ordination within the framework of the United Nations system,

Recalling its decision of 15 December 1975 to consider in depth the item entitled "Administrative and budgetary co-ordination of the United Nations with the specialized agencies and the International Atomic Energy Agency" normally in off-budget years.

Recalling also its resolutions 33/142 A of 20 December 1978 and 35/114 of 10 December 1980,

Taking note with appreciation of the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions on the administrative and budgetary co-ordination of the United Nations with the specialized agencies and the International Atomic Energy Agency,

1. Concurs with the observations and comments of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions as contained in its report;

2. Refers to the organizations concerned the observations and comments contained in the above-mentioned report, as well as the comments and observations made in the course of the debate in the Fifth Committee;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to refer to the executive heads of the organizations of the United Nations system, through the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination, matters arising out of the report of the Advisory Committee and of the related debate in the Fifth Committee that call for their attention and necessary action;

4. Transmits the report of the Advisory Committee to the Board of Auditors, the Panel of External Auditors, the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination and the Joint Inspection Unit for their information;

5. Decides that the Advisory Committee shall report on administrative and budgetary co-ordination in the following way:

(a) Once every two years, beginning in 1982, the reports shall contain detailed analyses of the budgets of the specialized agencies and the International Atomic Energy Agency;

(b) In intervening years, the reports shall be confined to tabular material and, as necessary, to special studies dealing with administrative and budgetary problems common to the United Nations system.

Chapter III

United Nations officials

The United Nations system had a staff of 50,547 as at 31 December 1981. These members of the international civil service were employed by the United Nations Secretariat (26,281 with contracts of a year or more) and specialized agencies and the International Atomic Energy Agency participating in the United Nations common system of salaries, allowances and other conditions of service. The common system encompassed the organizations of the United Nations system except for the intergovernmental financial agencies with headquarters in Washington, D. C. (For a breakdown of established posts in the United Nations Secretariat financed under the regular budget, see table on p. 1276.)

Elements of the common system continued to be regulated by the International Civil Service Commission (ICSC), which held two sessions at United Nations Headquarters in 1981 (p. 1322). Its report<sup>(1)</sup> was reviewed by the General Assembly, which took action in December on several issues affecting the staff of intergovernmental organizations. Also in December, the Assembly acted on several personnel questions related specifically to the United Nations Secretariat. For the first time, the Assembly's Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee heard repre-

Following up on its 1980 call to improve the nationality and regional balance and personnel practices of the Secretariat, the Assembly requested an updated report on the situation (p. 1316) and decided to continue discussing the geographical distribution of posts in 1982 (p. 1317). The Secretary-General, in his annual report on the composition of the Secretariat,<sup>(2)</sup> informed the Assembly that the proportion of women in Professional and higher-level posts subject to guidelines for equitable geographical distribution had reached 21.6 per cent and that further steps were being taken to reach the 25 per cent target set by the Assembly in 1978 (p. 1321).

Acting on the 1981 report of ICSC, the Assembly adopted a resolution<sup>(11)</sup> in which it urged United Nations organizations to implement Commission decisions and act on its findings. Expressing regret at an International Labour Organisation (ILO) decision to raise salaries of its General Service staff at Geneva above levels recommended by ICSC, the Assembly reaffirmed the importance of common salary scales. It requested ICSC to give high priority to studies in four areas. Two of these concerned salaries of Professional and higher-category staff: comparison of total compensation between the international and United States civil services, and the post adjustment system of cost-of-living allowances (p. 1337). The other two areas were career development (p. 1325) and a projected index for adjusting pension payments in high-cost areas (p. 1347). New studies on staff training were also requested (p. 1329).

Also with regard to General Service salaries at Geneva, the Assembly decided not to approve expenditures for a 3 per cent raise which the Secretary-General had intended to give United Nations staff there to match the ILO increase (p. 1340).

In developments affecting fringe benefits for the international civil service, additional benefits were authorized for field personnel serving in localities where living and working conditions were especially difficult (p. 1336) and the Assembly approved an ICSC recommendation to maintain a previous formula linking the amounts of certain payments given on separation from service to salary levels earned while on duty (p. 1342).

The United Nations and several specialized agencies put into effect an ICSC-approved Master Standard of job classification, the first of a three-part scheme to apply common standards in the grading of posts (p. 1327).

The Assembly endorsed recommendations by the Secretary-General to improve the language training programme for Secretariat staff (p. 1330). It also decided to allow staff of the permanent missions of Governments to the United Nations to participate without charge in the programme at Headquarters (p. 1331). Requesting additional information and an ICSC study, the Assembly postponed action on the contractual status of Headquarters language teachers until 1982 (p. 1332).

After considering a proposal for a child-care centre at Headquarters to provide day-care services for the children of staff and others associated with the United Nations, the Assembly endorsed a recommendation that other alternatives be explored (p. 1333).

The Assembly took action on aspects of international civil service pensions. After considering a finding that current contribution rates to the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund would be insufficient in the long run to meet the Fund's obligations to pensioners, the Assembly requested the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board to consider alternatives to improve the Fund's actuarial balance.<sup>51</sup> Following recommendations by the Board,<sup>52</sup> the Assembly approved supplementary measures for certain older pensioners, again authorized the Board to supplement voluntary contributions to the Emergency Fund for pensioners facing hardships and approved the Fund's administrative expenses.<sup>53</sup> The Board was asked to recommend measures with respect to the financial obligations of pensioners to spouses or former spouses.<sup>54</sup>

On the Fund's investment policy, the Assembly endorsed diversifying investments in developing countries in accordance with certain financial criteria,<sup>55</sup> requested increased investments in States members of the Organization of African Unity<sup>56</sup> and asked that resources held in shares of transnational corporations be reinvested in developing countries.<sup>(9)</sup>

Concerning respect for the privileges and immunities of officials of the United Nations system, the Assembly appealed to Member States arresting or detaining such officials to abide by certain principles, including the right of the Secretary-General or organization head to visit the staff member and help arrange for legal counsel.<sup>101</sup>

Consultations continued between ILO and the United Nations on the feasibility of establishing a single administrative tribunal and harmonizing arrangements pertaining to the two existing ones in the United Nations system (p. 1360).

After receiving information that the Secretary-General was about to issue new instructions establishing policies for hiring experts, consultants and other personnel, the Assembly requested updated information on the use of such persons by the United Nations (p. 1361).

In other developments relating to the Secretariat, the Committee of Governmental Experts to Evaluate the Present Structure of the Secretariat in the Administrative, Finance and Personnel Areas continued its work (p. 1376), and the Assembly authorized a new fund for interorganizational security measures, particularly at field offices (p. 1383).

Composition of the Secretariat

In his annual report on the composition of the United Nations Secretariat, issued in September 1981,<sup>11</sup> the Secretary-General reviewed progress towards a more equitable geographical distribution of Professional staff by nationality and region (p. 1317), employment of women (p. 1321), Professional staff recruitment (p. 1335), and various matters concerning staff administration, including career development

(p. 1326), job classification (p. 1327), training (p. 1329), staff-management relations (p. 1334) and retirement age (p. 1352).

The report showed that, as at 30 June, the total number of staff in the central Secretariat was 15,318. This figure included all staff members with appointments for a year or more, and covered staff in the Professional and higher categories, technical co-operation project personnel, and General Service and related categories. In addition, staff assigned to the secretariats of other United Nations organs numbered: United Nations Development Programme, 5,841; United Nations Children's Fund, 2,378; Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, 1,065; International Trade Centre, 246; United Nations University, 89; United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA), 76; United Nations Institute for Training and Research, 40; ICSC, 37; and International Court of Justice, 31. The grand total of staff members was thus 25,121, excluding approximately 16,700 area personnel of UNRWA.

On 18 December,<sup>(3)</sup> the General Assembly took note of the report and requested the Secretary-General to submit in 1982 an updated report on implementation of its December 1980 resolution aimed at improving the geographical composition and personnel practices of the Secretariat.<sup>(2)</sup> The decision was adopted without vote. On 15 December, the draft had been approved in like manner by the Fifth Committee, as proposed and orally revised by its Chairman. The revision deleted the words "with appreciation" from the clause in which the Assembly took note of the report.

Composition of the Secretariat

At its 105th plenary meeting, on 18 December 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee:

(a) Took note of the report of the Secretary-General on the composition of the Secretariat;

(b) Requested the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session an updated report on the implementation of Assembly resolution 35/210 of 17 December 1980.

Geographical distribution

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL. In accordance with a December 1980 request by the General Assembly,<sup>(8)</sup> the Secretary-General calculated, and applied from 1 January 1981, new "desirable ranges" for Secretariat posts, showing the numbers of Professional and higher-level posts that should ideally be held by nationals of each Member State. This system of ranges had been established by the Assembly as a guideline for achieving an equitable balance among nationalities in those posts in the Professional category and above defined as subject to geographical distribution. Among staff excluded from the system were those appointed for language requirements (mainly translators and interpreters), field missions and the United Nations Environment Programme.

The Secretary-General's September 1981 report on the composition of the Secretariat<sup>(5)</sup> noted that, on 30 June 1980, 18 Member States were not represented in the Secretariat and, at 30 June 1981, this figure was 19 (Albania, Bahrain, Bhutan, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Guinea-Bissau, Kuwait, Maldives, Mongolia, Papua New Guinea, Qatar, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Solomon Islands, Suriname). Figures for under-represented Member States (those whose nationals in geographical posts numbered fewer than the lower limit of their desirable range) were 21 at the earlier date and 26 at the later (in 1981: Brazil, Byelorussian SSR, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Czechoslovakia, Dominica, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Luxembourg, Mauritania, Mozambique, Netherlands, Norway, Oman, Saudi Arabia, South Africa, Spain, Swaziland, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, Venezuela). Because of the introduction of new ranges, the representation of certain States had changed half-way through the reporting year and it was, therefore, difficult to give meaningful figures on recruitment of under- and over-represented and within-range States, the report said.

Of 2,894 staff members in geographical posts holding appointments for a year or more as at 30 June 1981, 682 were Western Europeans, 642 were from North America and the Caribbean, 456 were from Asia and the Pacific, 400 were Africans, 296 were Eastern Europeans, 239 were Latin Americans, 143 were from the Middle East and there were 36 others, including stateless persons. There were 1,127 Professional and higher-level staff with similar appointments in non-geographic posts.

At senior levels-D-1 (Principal Officer) and above-developing countries in Africa and Asia, as a group, had been above the mid-point of their desirable ranges from 1977 to 1981, developed market-economy countries and developing countries of Latin America and the Caribbean had fallen from above to below that level, and the Eastern European socialist countries had remained below.

JIU REPORT. Citing the concern expressed by many States, three members of the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU), Alexander S. Bryntsev, Joseph Adolph Sawe and Zakaria Sibahi, prepared a report on application of the principle of equitable geographical distribution of Secretariat staff, transmitted to the General Assembly by the Secretary-General in August 1981.<sup>(1)</sup> The report concluded that equitable geographical distribution had not been observed by most entities of the Organization, although developing countries' representation had improved. The percentage of nationals from Eastern European countries had declined from 11.8 in 1963 to 10.2 in December 1980. While representation of developing countries in senior posts had improved, Eastern Europe continued to be greatly under-represented at that level.

To reduce these imbalances JIU recommended the following measures, in summary:

(1) The General Assembly should be given annual reports on what each Secretariat entity had done to conform to the Assembly target for appointments from unrepresented and under-represented States and to provide for equitable regional distribution.

(2) During 1982-1984, three out of five candidates for geographic posts should be appointed from unrepresented or under-represented States and appointments from over-represented States should be permitted only exceptionally.

(3) The proportion of permanent contracts should be reduced so that in future a majority of staff would hold fixed-term contracts, to be achieved by not granting probationary contracts on initial appointment and, until geographical distribution was equitable, by limiting the number of new permanent contracts to 50 per cent of those held by departing staff, or such other percentage as the Assembly decided.

new type of interruptible fixed-term contract should be introduced, permitting rotation of persons seconded from their national service and others holding fixed-term contracts.

(5) The search for replacements to fill vacant posts should take place simultaneously among internal and external candidates.

(6) The numbers of unrepresented and under-represented States in senior posts should be improved by setting targets for each region and paying attention to desirable ranges weighted according to post levels.

(7) Technical advisers, regional and interregional advisers, and project personnel of United Nations institutes should be included among geographic posts.

(8) Extension beyond retirement age (60 years) should be limited to three months and should be granted only when time was needed to find a replacement.

(9) The recruitment and appointment process should be shortened and simplified.

(10) Preparation of an annual recruitment plan should be expedited.

Commenting in November 1981<sup>(2)</sup> on these recommendations, the Secretary-General pointed out that the population of over-represented countries was more than half that of all Member States combined and those countries were a source of many qualified candidates. The difficulty in locating qualified nationals of unrepresented and under-represented States prevented greater progress in improving geographical distribution. Other problems cited were uncompetitive Secretariat salaries, unwillingness to work at some duty stations and to accept junior posts, and language and cultural considerations.

Regarding specific JIU recommendations, the Secretary-General made the following points, in summary:

(1) Although care must be taken to see that no country or group of countries predominated in any unit, to require regional distribution -of posts in every unit would remove the Secretary-General's flexibility in the operation of Secretariat services and create difficulties in staff assignment.

(2) To appoint three out of five candidates from unrepresented and under-represented States would bring in many more than those countries needed to reach the mid-point of their desirable ranges, and in any event the Secretary-General must retain authority to appoint nationals of over-represented countries when others were not available.

(3) A ratio of 25 per cent fixed-term contracts to 75 per cent career appointments had been favoured by the Secretary-General as far back as 1962—a position noted by the Assembly in 1966<sup>(6)</sup>—and the 50:50 ratio recommended by JIU would make it difficult to use the power of career appointment to attract young candidates whose appointment the Assembly had repeatedly urged.

(4) The proposed rotation of persons between United Nations and government service would interrupt the continuity of Secretariat work and result in increased difficulties for career development and staff administration.

(5) In filling vacancies, preference over outside candidates must be maintained for staff already in the Secretariat in order to provide incentive for outstanding effort or performance.

(6) The proposal to apply weighted desirable ranges to senior posts would reduce recruitment to a search for persons statistically appropriate but whose occurrence might be so rare that it was unlikely they would ever be found in combination with the appropriate qualifications for the occupations in which they were to function.

(7) Technical advisers, regional and interregional advisers and staff of United Nations institutes dependent on technical co-operation funding should continue to be excluded from the system of desirable ranges, but it might be appropriate for the staff of the United Nations Social Defence Research Institute and the United Nations Research Institute for Social Development to be placed in geographic posts.

(8) Reducing to three months the current six-month limit on extensions beyond retirement age would be an unnecessary restriction on the Secretary-General's authority to extend the limit in exceptional circumstances.

(9) The Secretary-General endorsed the JIU objective to shorten and simplify the recruitment and appointment process.

(10) He had reported separately on recruitment planning (p. 1335).

The staff organizations of the United Nations Secretariat also commented on the JIU conclusions and recommendations in a document transmitted to the Fifth Committee in October.<sup>(3)</sup> They stated that, while supporting the concept of geographical distribution as fundamental to a truly international civil service, they believed the recommendations were inimical to an independent and impartial career service as called for by Articles 100 and 101 of the Charter of the United Nations. Therefore, they requested the General Assembly to consider reinforcing the career concept by improving the ratio between fixed-term and career appointments in favour of the latter, and urged that the small advantage given to serving staff in the issuance of vacancy notices be maintained.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 18 December, acting without vote, the General Assembly took note of the JIU report and the Secretary-General's comments, and decided to continue discussion of the subject in 1982.<sup>(10)</sup>

On 15 December, the draft had been similarly approved by the Fifth Committee, as proposed by the Chairman and with oral revisions and amendments by Canada, Egypt and India. When introducing the text, the Chairman proposed to revise it by adding a phrase that would have had the Assembly take fully into account the limited progress made in implementing the principle of geographical distribution. At the suggestion of India, this was changed to state that the JIU report and the Secretary-General's comments took into account the level of progress in implementing that principle, incorporating suggestions by Egypt, supported by the United States, to replace "limited progress" by "level of progress", and by Canada, supported by Egypt, to delete "fully".

In a resolution of 9 December on co-operation between the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity (OAU),<sup>(9)</sup> the General Assembly called on United Nations organizations to ensure just and equitable representation of Africa at all levels, at both their headquarters and field offices. It also called on them to consider suggestions and proposals made at a meeting between representatives of the General Secretariat of OAU and secretariats of the United Nations system (Geneva, 13-16 April) (p. 228). According to the report on this meeting,<sup>(4)</sup> Africans in the secretariats were fewer in number and lower in seniority than might be expected. OAU expressed the wish that quotas and ranges would be established at the policy-making levels of P-5 to D-2 so as to achieve an equitable representation among regions.

During the Fifth Committee's discussion of the composition of the Secretariat, a number of delegations, including the Byelorussian SSR, Hungary, Liberia and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, emphasized that strict compliance with the Charter would ensure proper representation of inadequately represented Member States, both unrepresented and under-represented. They referred in particular to Article 101, paragraph 3, which cites the need for the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity, with due regard to recruitment on as wide a geographical basis as possible. Guyana said little attention was paid to the Article when it came to recruitment; appointments were often made on the basis of considerations other than quality, competence or geographical representation. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya thought the principle of high standards had been applied at the expense of the complementary principle of equitable geographical representation.

Several States, including Austria, Bangladesh, Kuwait, Madagascar, Mauritania, Mexico, Romania, Sierra Leone, Uganda, the USSR and the United Republic of Cameroon, noted some progress in carrying out the provisions of the 1980 resolution<sup>(7)</sup> and some commended the Secretary-General on his efforts to follow the directives therein, particularly with regard to geographical distribution. A number of States, however, stated that progress towards eliminating under-representation was too slow. Thus, Romania said it was wrong to concentrate high-level posts in the hands of a few countries, yet quantitative and qualitative imbalances in the representation of States in the Secretariat were widening. Suriname remarked that, while the position of certain over-represented countries had remained unchanged or had even been strengthened, unrepresented countries did not even receive answers to their applications.

The number of inadequately represented Member States was a matter of concern to Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Brazil, the Byelorussian SSR, the Central African Republic, Czechoslovakia, Japan, Madagascar, Malawi, Mauritania, Mongolia and Suriname, among others. Brazil suggested that consideration be given to earmarking 40 per cent of available vacancies for inadequately represented nationalities. Bulgaria said that, while gaps should be bridged as soon as possible, this should not serve as an excuse for unnecessary staff increases. The USSR believed that no more candidates should be recruited from over-represented countries.

India, on the other hand, said it could not accept a proposal that recruitment be limited to inadequately represented nationalities; although some major contributors to the United Nations budget were under-represented in raw figures, they were heavily over-represented in terms of influence.

Some countries referred to the need to increase their own representation in the Secretariat. Morocco, for example, observed that States which had joined the United Nations more recently than it had were better represented.

Various suggestions were made to improve the situation. Japan called for periodic competitive examinations for its nationals and the dispatch of recruitment missions, and was joined by the Federal Republic of Germany in supporting the idea of earmarking 50 per cent of post vacancies for inadequately represented countries. Liberia said the practice of appointing increasing numbers of nationals from non-member States should cease until all Member States were represented in the Secretariat. Spain agreed with the JIU recommendation to set up national targets for each geographic region. However, Romania thought it essential to respect the principle of equitable representation of States, not of regions, as the latter would virtually sanction inequities by disregarding individual cases.

Kuwait, Liberia, Nigeria, Sierra Leone and Uganda called for redressing the imbalance between developed and developing countries and improving the representation of the latter in senior, policy-formulating posts. This view was shared by the United Republic of Cameroon, which was also concerned that the average age of staff at the P-1 and P-2 (entry) levels had risen in 1981.

Brazil said that Latin America and the Caribbean were under-represented in senior and policy-formulating posts when compared with developed market economies and Asian and African countries. India was disturbed to note that the percentage of senior appointments from developed countries from July 1980 to June 1981 was higher than the percentage of all appointments for that group of States. Madagascar stressed that the unrepresented States were principally developing countries, and particularly African countries. Somalia, remarking that the greatest anomalies in geographical composition were in the regional commissions, suggested that the Committee consider corrective guidelines. Suriname felt that the quality of posts was more important than their quantity. Uganda remarked that several developing countries categorized as over-represented were grossly under-represented or not represented at all at senior levels.

The United States observed that, according to the Secretary-General's report, developing countries, far from being under-represented, were above the mid-points of their targeted ranges and had an even higher proportion of senior positions; developed market-economy countries, while slightly over-represented in terms of total staff, were under-represented at senior levels.

Several States stressed that the Eastern European countries had always been under-represented. Poland pointed out that the number from that region in geographical posts had declined from 317 in 1977 to 296 in 1981. According to the USSR, staff in the Office of General Services and in the Electronic Data Processing and Information Systems Division of the Department of Administration, Finance and Management were mainly United States nationals and the legal and financial services were staffed entirely from North America and Western Europe:

Bangladesh was concerned that nearly half of the posts were not subject to geographical distribution and suggested that the Secretariat review posts which might be included in that group; it also urged efforts to restore geographical balance in the General Service category. Romania remarked that the continued imbalance was due in part to the maintenance of a large number of posts not subject to geographical distribution.

Hungary, Mongolia and the Ukrainian SSR argued that one means of achieving equitable geographical distribution would be to reduce the number of permanent contracts and increase the number of fixed-term contracts. The Ukrainian SSR hoped that permanent contracts would be eliminated and said that, until they were, they should not be offered to nationals of over-represented countries. Afghanistan saw permanent contracts as an impediment to recruiting highly qualified professional staff. Bulgaria remarked that, if Member States lost the training and experience of the specialists they supplied to the United Nations, that would represent a new form of brain drain affecting developing countries in particular. The system of permanent appointments perpetuated the under-representation of Eastern Europe, the Byelorussian SSR and Romania said. Czechoslovakia did not believe that reducing the number of permanent contracts would necessarily lead to a decline in the professional competence of the Secretariat.

Bangladesh, the Syrian Arab Republic and Uganda were also among those favouring fixed-term appointments. Algeria believed that systematic application of a given ratio between permanent and fixed-term contracts might have the effect of excluding certain countries or groups of countries.

On the other hand, Austria believed the majority of contracts should be permanent in view of the need to ensure career development and staff independence. Liberia favoured a balance between the two types of contract so as to ensure responsiveness to changes in priorities and an equitable geographical distribution. Spain said reducing the number of permanent contracts and increasing fixed-term ones would be a blow to the independence of the international civil service and an obstacle to career development.

The Netherlands, opposing discussion of geographical distribution in bodies such as the Committee on Information (p. 366), said it should be considered in relation to the United Nations as a whole and not individual departments.

A number of speakers also commented on recruitment policies and practices (p. 1335) and retirement age (p. 1353) in relation to geographical distribution.

Application of the principle of equitable geographical distribution

At its 105th plenary meeting, on 18 December 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee, took note of the report of the Joint Inspection Unit on the application of the principle of equitable geographical distribution of the staff of the United Nations Secretariat and the comments of the Secretary-General on that report, which took into account the level of progress in implementing that principle, and decided to continue discussion of the subject at its thirty-seventh session.

Employment of women

REPORTS. The Secretary-General, in his September 1981 report on the composition of the Secretariat,<sup>(3)</sup> described the recruitment of women as a major objective of the Secretariat. Heads of departments and offices had been informed of the need to increase the proportion of women and to offer them equal opportunity in assignments. In addition, efforts had been directed towards increasing the proportion of women in personnel, advisory and administrative boards, while staff rules governing maternity leave and the employment of spouses had been amended to facilitate the employment of female staff.

The proportion of women from Member States in posts subject to geographical distribution rose from 17.7 per cent (473 out of 2,674) on 30 June 1978 to 21.6 per cent (617 out of 2,858) on 30 June 1981. During the reporting year (1 July 1980-30 June 1981), of 294 appointments to posts subject to geographical distribution, 71 (24.4 per cent) were women, as compared with 1979/1980 when, of 269 such appointments, 58 (21.6 per cent) were women. Appointments of women during 1980/1981 included 1 at the Assistant Secretary-General level, 1 at the Principal Officer (D-1) level, 3 at the Senior Officer (P-5) level and 7 at the First Officer (P-4) level.

In a report on integration of women in development (p. 986), transmitted to the General Assembly by the Secretary-General in September,<sup>(4)</sup> the Executive Director of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) pointed out that the number of women in UNIDO Professional posts was 63 (more than 15 per cent of all Professional staff) by the end of 1980 compared with 50 (less than 13 per cent) at the end of 1979. By the end of 1981, the figure had risen to 66 (15.7 per cent). In May 1981, the Industrial Development Board noted the 1980 percentage increase and stressed the need to accelerate the recruitment of women, particularly at the higher levels and for field activities, taking into account qualifications and equitable geographical distribution.<sup>(2)</sup>

In comments on personnel questions submitted to the Fifth Committee in October,<sup>(1)</sup> the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations (FICSA) called for increased efforts to recruit women to the Professional category and specific measures to enhance their upward mobility.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 14 December, the General Assembly, in a resolution on equal rights to work,<sup>(6)</sup> expressed concern that women continued to be under-represented in the professional staffs of international organizations, including the United Nations and the specialized agencies, and were not always exempt from discrimination when recruited. The Assembly invited Governments to consider granting work permits for spouses of diplomats and international civil servants. This resolution arose from consideration by the Assembly's Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee of matters pertaining to the United Nations Decade for Women (1976-1985).

During the Fifth Committee's discussion of the composition of the Secretariat, many States, including Brazil, Guyana, Kuwait, Liberia, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Mongolia, Spain, Suriname, the United Republic of Cameroon, Uruguay and Yugoslavia, welcomed the increase in the number of women at all levels in posts subject to geographical distribution and called for more measures to attain the target set by the Assembly in 1978—to have women occupy 25 per cent of all such posts.<sup>(5)</sup> Afghanistan, Czechoslovakia and the Ukrainian SSR added that such appointments should be in accordance with the principle of geographical distribution, while Japan and Madagascar stressed that, in recruiting more women, particular attention should be paid to under-represented and unrepresented States. Mauritania believed that recruitment of women from over-represented developed countries should be avoided. Morocco said the fact that some States were inadequately represented should take precedence over the recruitment of women.

Brazil considered recruitment of women at the senior level to be unsatisfactory, and Somalia asked that the proportion of female staff in senior posts be sharply increased. Yugoslavia considered that 40 per cent of Professional and higher-level posts should be held by women.

The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya said no significant progress had been made to eliminate discrimination against women in the Secretariat. Malawi urged that due regard be paid to equal pay for equal work and equality of opportunity. Spain stressed the need to facilitate the promotion of women. Sweden, on behalf of the Nordic States, expressed disappointment that the Secretary-General had not submitted a more comprehensive report on the topic. Welcoming the progress made in recruiting women, the United States said there would be even more progress if the Secretary-General and agency heads designated senior officials as co-ordinators to establish policies for the careers of women in the international civil service.

Personnel questions

Several documents were submitted to the General Assembly during 1981 on a variety of personnel questions affecting United Nations staff as well as others in organizations participating in the common system of salaries, allowances and other conditions of service followed by the United Nations and most specialized agencies.

The annual report of the International Civil Service Commission (ICSC)<sup>(1)</sup> (p. 1322) dealt with various issues affecting the secretariats of the United Nations system of organizations, including remuneration (p. 1337) and such questions as career development (p. 1325), job classification (p. 1327) and training (p. 1329). A September report of the Secretary-General<sup>(4)</sup> dealt with the composition of the United Nations Secretariat (p. 1316) and described action taken to implement personnel reforms called for by the Assembly in previous years.

Two documents from staff organizations—FICSA<sup>(2)</sup> and the Staff Unions and Associations of the United Nations Secretariat<sup>(3)</sup>—were transmitted to the Fifth Committee by the Secretary-General in October 1981 (p. 1334) in accordance with a December 1980 resolution by which the Assembly reiterated its readiness to receive and consider staff views.<sup>(5)</sup> As provided for under that resolution, FICSA submitted comments in connection with the ICSC report, while the other report dealt with personnel questions affecting the Secretariat. Both documents dealt with career development, remuneration, and the security and independence of the international civil service (p. 1354); the FICSA document also discussed the status of women in the secretariats (p. 1321), while the Secretariat staff paper discussed job classification, promotion from General Service to the Professional category by competitive examination (p. 1328), staff training and staff-management relations (p. 1334).

The Assembly, on 18 December 1981, adopted a resolution on matters arising out of the ICSC report, took procedural decisions on career development and the job classification of language staff (p. 1329), and took action on the United Nations language training programme (p. 1330).

International Civil Service Commission

ICSC ACTIVITIES. The International Civil Service Commission (ICSC), established to regulate and co-ordinate conditions of service in the United Nations system and operating under a statute approved by the General Assembly in 1974,<sup>(6)</sup> held two sessions in 1981, at United Nations Headquarters: its thirteenth from 23 February to 13 March and its fourteenth from 6 to 31 July.

Much of the Commission's work, detailed in its report,<sup>(4)</sup> concerned the salaries and allowances of the international civil service (p. 1337). With regard to other personnel issues, it made recommendations to the Assembly and the policy-making bodies of other United Nations organizations concerning career development (p. 1325) - on which it submitted a special study-job classification standards (p. 1327) and staff training (p. 1329). It also reviewed conditions of service of field personnel (p. 1336). At both of its sessions, ICSC continued reviewing its statute and rules of procedure.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 18 December, the General Assembly adopted a three-part resolution<sup>(7)</sup> on the ICSC report. By section I, the Assembly urged all organizations concerned to implement ICSC decisions and act on its recommendations, urged organization heads to report to their governing bodies such proposals as would modify those recommendations and reaffirmed the importance of applying common salary scales for staff in the General Service category (p. 1340). By section II, the Assembly noted the progress made by ICSC in job classification matters and its consideration of staff training. By section III, it requested ICSC to give high priority to the completion of four studies on career development and related questions as well as certain salary and related issues, and listed six other topics for study in regard to salaries and allowances and training.

The resolution was adopted without vote after an orally revised draft, introduced by Barbados and also sponsored by Australia, Belgium and the United Kingdom, had been similarly approved by the Fifth Administrative and Budgetary Committee on 17 December. By one of the revisions, section I, paragraph 1, was changed to urge organizations to act positively on ICSC recommendations in accordance with its statute rather than to respond positively to ICSC recommendations addressed to executive heads of organizations. Another change affected the request for a continued study of comparative compensation (p. 1337). The remaining revisions were drafting changes.

On 7 December, while considering the proposed United Nations programme budget for 1982-1983,<sup>(3)</sup> the Committee approved an additional appropriation of $427,800 (gross) for ICSC, of which agencies other than the United Nations which shared ICSC expenses were to pay $220,300. This, added to the initial budget request submitted by the Secretary-General on the Commission's behalf, raised the 1982-1983 budget of ICSC to $5,770,400 (net).

The addition was requested mainly to add four posts and otherwise strengthen the Cost-of-Living Section of the ICSC secretariat so that it could improve the methodology of cost-of-living measurements, used in establishing post adjustments. This strengthening had been proposed by ICSC and submitted by the Secretary-General in November as revised budget estimates<sup>(5)</sup> which were endorsed by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ). The approved sum also included the cost of a recruitment and training post in the Personnel Policies Division, omitted from the Secretary-General's revised estimates and added at the request of the ICSC Chairman in a letter of 24 November.<sup>(1)</sup> The Fifth Committee approved establishment of this post on an oral proposal by Peru, adopted by 59 votes to 23, with 8 abstentions.

Report of the International Civil Service Commission
The General Assembly,

Having considered the seventh annual report of the International Civil Service Commission.

Recalling that it established the Commission for the regulation and co-ordination of the conditions of service of the United Nations common system as set forth in article 1 of the statute of the Commission.

Reaffirming the central role of the Commission within the common system in the development of a single unified international civil service through the application of common personnel standards and arrangements,

1

1. Urges all organizations concerned to implement the decisions of the International Civil Service Commission and to act positively on the recommendations of the Commission in accordance with its statute;

2. Urges the executive heads of organizations, after consultation with the Commission, to report to their respective governing bodies such decisions or proposals as would modify the recommendations of the Commission;

3. Supports the efforts of the Commission to promote uniform and co-ordinated action in the common system and calls upon the Secretary-General, in his capacity as Chairman of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination, to ensure that adequate measures are taken to this end;

4. Regrets the decision of the International Labour Organisation to adopt only for General Service staff recruited after January 1979 the salary scales recommended by the Commission and to increase from 1 March 1981 by 3 per cent the net salary scale in force for General Service staff in service in 1978 or earlier;

5. Reaffirms the importance of the application of common salary scales, as recommended by the Commission under article 12 of its statute, for all General Service staff at a particular duty station;

1. Requests the International Civil Service Commission to give high priority to the completion of the following studies and to report on them to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session:

(a) The broad principles for the determination of conditions of service with particular reference to the concept of career, types of appointment, career development and related questions, taking into account the views expressed by delegations in the Fifth Committee, all related studies and the relevant reports of the Joint Inspection Unit;

(b) The improvement of the comparison of total compensation between the comparator civil service and the International civil service, taking into account all relevant elements, including the level of pensions, but excluding expatriate benefits applicable to staff members in the Professional and higher categories in the comparator civil service;

(c) The fundamental and comprehensive review of the purposes and operation of the post adjustment system with a view to avoiding distortions in the system and ensuring equity;

(d) The elaboration of a special index for pensioners in collaboration with the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board, in accordance with General Assembly decision 35/447 of 17 December 1980;

2. Also requests the Commission to undertake or continue studies on the following questions:

(a) General principles and methodology for surveys to determine the conditions of service of the General Service and other categories of locally recruited staff members, including staff serving at field duty stations;

(b) A review of dependency allowances for all categories of staff and a review of the scope and purpose of the education grant;

(c) Development of Inter-agency co-operation in the field of training with a view to the more efficient and economical use of personnel resources in the common system;

Appointment of ICSC members

On 18 December 1981, the General Assembly appointed five persons to a four-year term on ICSC, beginning on 1 January 1982<sup>(47)</sup>, (for a list of the Commission's 15 members, see APPENDIX III). This decision was taken by a recorded vote of 105 to 6 (Australia, Canada, Netherlands, New Zealand, United Kingdom, United States), with 25 abstentions.

The appointees had been recommended by the Fifth Committee on 16 December 1981.<sup>(25)</sup> Two were chosen by acclamation for reappointment—Akira Matsui (Japan) and Antonio Fonseca Pimentel (Brazil). The three others—Ralph Enckell (Finland), Jean-Claude Fortuit (France) and Helmut Kitschenberg (Federal Republic of Germany)—were selected by ballot. Mr. Fortuit was reappointed and the others were to replace Arthur H. M. Hillis (United Kingdom) and Ersi H. Poston (United States), whose term expired on 31 December 1981.

In accordance with the ICSC statute,<sup>(3)</sup> the Secretary-General, as Chairman of the inter-agency Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC), had submitted to the Committee a list of five candidates, drawn up following consultations with Member States, the heads of the other organizations accepting the statute, staff representatives and ACABQ.<sup>(1)</sup> The Secretary-General suggested that four of the current members be reappointed and that Mrs. Poston be succeeded by Richard V. Hennes (United States).

However, on a motion by Finland, the Fifth Committee decided, by 78 votes to 8, with 16 abstentions, to make a selection (by secret ballot) from among the five candidates submitted by the Group of Western European and Other States, including two not on the Secretary-General's list—Mr. Enckell and Mr. Kitschenberg. As a result, those two and Mr. Fortuit, having received the largest number of votes, were recommended, and Mr. Hennes and Mr. Hillis were not.

In the Committee, the Finnish motion to hold a ballot was supported by Chile, Egypt, Fiji, the Federal Republic of Germany, India, Indonesia, Mauritania, Morocco, Nicaragua, Peru, Saint Lucia, Sierra Leone, Spain, Sweden, the United Republic of Tanzania and Uruguay. They argued that, as the regional group had submitted five names after having been unable to agree on a list of three, the power to decide whom to appoint rested with the Assembly. Opposing this view were the USSR, the United Kingdom and the United States. They contended that it would be contrary to the ICSC statute to vote on candidates whose names had not been submitted by the Secretary-General following consultations.

The opinion of the United Nations Legal Counsel, requested by the United Kingdom and others, was that the Assembly could act only on the names submitted by the Secretary-General in accordance with the consultation process provided for in the ICSC statute. If it rejected some or all of those names, it could request the Secretary-General to submit different names after further consultations.

When the Assembly took up the Committee's recommendation, it rejected, by a recorded vote of 46 to 35, with 49 abstentions, a motion by the United States to request the Secretary-General to compile a new list of candidates for the vacant seats.

Before the United States made its motion, France proposed that the Assembly postpone action on the appointments to enable the Secretary-General to resume consultations. This proposal was supported by Canada and the Netherlands. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Peru, Spain and Venezuela opposed deferral and asked that the Assembly act on the Fifth Committee's recommendation. Spain added that the Secretary-General had not acted correctly in submitting the names of only three candidates from the Group of Western European and Other States, when the Group had submitted five names.

The Legal Counsel, asked by Australia for an opinion, said the only possible interpretation of the Fifth Committee's action was that it rejected the Secretary-General's list and sent the matter back to him for new consultations. The Committee's recommendation, if endorsed by the Assembly, could not produce any final appointments, because that would violate the ICSC statute, which had been accepted by all the organizations belonging to the common system.

Career development

An August 1981 report by the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) on personnel policy options, prepared by Inspectors Maurice Bertrand and Moustapha Ould Khalifa, was transmitted to the General Assembly in September by the Secretary-General.<sup>(3)</sup>

The report, submitted in response to a December 1980 Assembly request,<sup>(7)</sup> stated that difficulties encountered in dealing with career questions, types of appointment and the definition of occupational groups demonstrated that it was not simply a matter of solving technical problems, but rather that a clarification of all personnel questions involving political choices had become essential. According to the report, the current situation of the international civil service was characterized by: an ideological and political debate on the conception of that service, which had been going on since the founding of the United Nations; the absence of a coherent system for staff management and recruitment, with grave repercussions on staff morale and the effectiveness of secretariats; and repeated efforts at reform yielding only modest results.

The report suggested that the Assembly either accept or reject the idea that negotiation among Member States to determine the proportion of career staff to fixed-term staff was possible and desirable, and the idea that an overall view of personnel problems was indispensable if the Assembly was to be able to make choices. The definition of a true personnel system would be facilitated, it added, if the Assembly were to give guidance in regard to the career concept, the proportion of career staff to fixed-term staff and types of contract, and the relationship among occupational groups, career paths and recruitment methods.

Commenting on the JIU report in November,<sup>(4)</sup> the Secretary-General conveyed the view of ACC, expressed on 30 October,<sup>(9)</sup> that the personnel policy questions referred to in the report were essentially of the kind on which the organizations must take a co-ordinated approach if the common system was to be maintained and enhanced. Any decisions the Assembly might take, even preliminary ones, would pre-empt development of a common policy responding to the programmes and needs of all organizations. ACC therefore recommended that ICSC and JIU be requested to continue their studies in close collaboration with each other and in full consultation with organization heads and staff representatives.

The study of this subject prepared by ICSC was annexed to its 1981 report to the Assembly.<sup>(1)</sup> The Commission decided that it would not be appropriate for JIU or itself to make any new substantive recommendations to the Assembly in 1981. However, it intended to proceed with a 16-step work plan, on which it had already reached step 9, encompassing studies on career development, recruitment, human resources development and other issues.

The view that any action concerning career structure should be deferred at least until the 1982 session was shared by the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations (FICSA) in comments transmitted to the Assembly by the Secretary-General in October.<sup>(2)</sup> FICSA added that it believed that all issues raised by the JIU and ICSC reports should be studied at the inter-agency level before any decisions were taken.

The staff organizations of the United Nations Secretariat, in their October report transmitted to the Fifth Committee,<sup>(5)</sup> rejected the JIU recommendations as inimical to an independent and impartial career service. They stressed the need for consulting the staff before far-reaching personnel changes were introduced. They favoured the establishment of a comprehensive career and staff resources planning function, embodying recruitment, job classification, training, and promotion based on merit. To enhance the development of staff members within their profession, the report suggested several steps, including lifting the ban on the use of authors' names in published papers, relaxing regulations on non-recurring outside activities unrelated to United Nations work, greater flexibility in exchanging posts or accepting temporary assignments, creating additional training opportunities, and facilitating greater participation and involvement in work through a more systematic approach to staff consultation and orientation.

At its February/March session, ICSC recommended a set of common procedures for filling vacancies, under which posts would be advertised simultaneously within and outside an organization but would be filled, first, by qualified candidates from within, then from other United Nations organizations and, lastly, from outside the system. It also established a central vacancy-announcement bulletin, which grouped together in one publication descriptions of all vacancies.

In his September report on the composition of the Secretariat,<sup>(6)</sup> the Secretary-General stated that career development objectives were being met through staff placement and reassignment. A computerized roster of internal candidates, expected to be operational in 1982, would facilitate optimum deployment through rapid identification of staff suitable for reassignment. Efforts had been made to link this roster with that of external candidates to establish a unified and comparable data-base for consideration of both external and internal candidates in filling vacancies.

The report also described steps to develop clear and uniform concepts of occupations and occupational groups to be used in recruitment, recruitment planning, rostering of external and internal candidates, career development and staff mobility, organization of recruitment and promotion examinations, training and job classification. Occupational descriptions had been prepared for 14 groups: administration, economics, electronic data processing, engineering and architecture, finance, information, language, legal, library, political affairs, publishing and printing, science and technology, social development, and statistics.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 18 December,<sup>(10)</sup> the General Assembly took note of the ICSC and JIU reports, the Secretary-General's comments and his note transmitting the report of the Secretariat staff organizations. It decided to discuss in 1982 the concept of career, types of appointment, career development and related questions.

The decision was adopted without vote after the Fifth Committee had similarly approved it on 15 December. The text, proposed by the Committee Chairman, incorporated oral drafting changes by him and by Sierra Leone, and an oral amendment by Canada adding the paragraph by which the Assembly noted the staff organizations' report (p. 1334).

Also on 18 December, the Assembly, in its resolution on ICSC,<sup>(8)</sup> requested that body to give high priority to completion of the study on broad principles for determining conditions of service with particular reference to the concept of career, types of appointment, career development and related questions, taking into account the views expressed by delegations in the Committee and all related studies and JIU reports.

Commenting on this request, the Under-Secretary-General for Administration, Finance and Management stated that its wording was so comprehensive as to detract from a focus on the study of career development requested by the Assembly in 1980. This comment was endorsed by Algeria. Belgium explained that the wording had been diluted when the sponsors tried to obtain a consensus text for the clause.

In the Fifth Committee discussion of the work of ICSC, a number of States commented on the respective roles of ICSC and JIU in this area. Argentina said the JIU report should be submitted to ICSC before the Assembly considered it. Barbados suggested that, if ICSC and JIU could not resolve their jurisdictional dispute, the Assembly should act in 1982 to set up machinery for that purpose. Belgium thought the divergent views of the two bodies should not be allowed to delay the Assembly's work on such vital matters as personnel policy. Canada believed it useful to refer the questions raised by JIU to the organizations and their staff so that ICSC could take their comments into account when making its recommendations. Ghana said the JIU report should be studied by ICSC, which had a statutory obligation to consult the staff while JIU did not.

The Netherlands remarked that a list of options such as that suggested by JIU should be submitted to Governments only after ICSC and staff organizations had had ample time for their own input. Pakistan said it was unclear that the JIU mandate and statute gave it any role in regard to career concepts, an area in which ICSC had primacy. The United Republic of Cameroon thought the Assembly should take a decision in 1982 after allowing all interested parties to express their views.

On general aspects of career development, Australia commended the ICSC report as a valuable contribution to the establishment of an effective career development system, critical for the continued service of qualified and experienced personnel. Austria stressed the importance of establishing an improved system of career development in which promotion was granted on the basis of merit and not because of political pressure. Finland, speaking for the Nordic States, said career planning by ICSC must be carried out in close co-operation with the organizations and with staff representatives; the Commission had a particularly important role to play in introducing new theoretical knowledge. Japan commended the establishment of a vacancy-announcement system as a positive step to facilitate staff movement between organizations and help identify qualified outside candidates. The United States observed that career development applied equally to the General Service category.

The Ukrainian SSR and the USSR disagreed with the ICSC recommendation that vacancies should be opened first to internal candidates, stating that this would only result in limiting the entry of nationals of inadequately represented countries.

Adopted without vote

Concept of career, types of appointment, career development and related questions

At its 105th plenary meeting, on 18 December 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee:

(a) Took note of the report of the International Civil Service Commission and the report of the Joint Inspection Unit and the comments of the Secretary-General on the report of the Unit;

(b) Decided to discuss at Its thirty-seventh session the subjects of the concept of career, types of appointment, career development and related questions as requested in section IV of its resolution 35/210;

(c) Also took note of the note by the Secretary-General transmitting the report submitted by the Staff Unions and Associations of the United Nations Secretariat.

Job classification

In 1981 the United Nations and several specialized agencies put into effect the Master Standard (Tier I) adopted by ICSC in 1980 as the first part of a three-tiered system of job-classification standards.<sup>(5)</sup> The Master Standard incorporated a point-factor rating system to measure the relative importance of jobs. In addition, ICSC promulgated in July the first set of Tier II standards, covering translators and revisers (p. 1329), personnel management specialists and economists. Tier II described duties and responsibilities at each level within an occupational group, using the rating system of the Master Standard.

In his September 1981 report on the composition of the Secretariat,<sup>(3)</sup> the Secretary-General stated that, since 1 January, posts in the Professional category and above, through the Director (D-2) level, were classified according to the Master Standard. With regard to the General Service and related categories in New York, a co-ordination committee, composed of representatives of the administration and staff of the United Nations, the United Nations Development Programme and the United Nations Children's Fund, had been established to develop job-classification standards to be applied in 1984. All General Service posts at the United Nations Office at Geneva, the Economic Commission for Europe and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development had been tentatively classified by July and completion of the process was expected by year's end.

In its 1981 report,<sup>(1)</sup> ICSC noted with satisfaction the plans by most United Nations organizations to implement the Master Standard as at 1 January. It recommended that responsibility for job classification up to the D-2 level be delegated to organization heads. It also stated that the organizations had insufficient resources to operate proper job-classification systems.

The staff organizations suggested, in their October report for the Fifth Committee,<sup>(2)</sup> that job classification should be flexible enough to allow for changing organizational patterns and programmes and legitimate aspirations for upward mobility.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 18 December, in its resolution on ICSC, the General Assembly noted the progress made by ICSC with regard to job classification.<sup>(4)</sup>

In the Fifth Committee's discussion of the work of ICSC, Algeria stressed the importance of defining occupational groups within which staff could pursue a normal career and said that, in the absence of geographical balance in the Classification Section, there was a danger of arbitrary classifications. Austria said the current job-classification system provided no guarantee that descriptions of posts had been correctly established, that they had not been influenced by the desire to promote the persons occupying the posts and that the posts they described were needed for the work programme. The Byelorussian SSR said the classification system must allow the level of a post to be determined properly; it asked the Secretariat to indicate how many posts had been proposed for upgrading and downgrading. Finland, speaking for the Nordic States, welcomed the adoption of the Master Standard but said account should be taken of the heterogeneous working conditions in various organizations and flexibility in job classification should be maintained. Malawi thought the proper grading of posts and the existence of promotion prospects could eliminate unnecessary requests for reclassification, which it saw as a commonly used way to promote staff.

The USSR supported the establishment of a job-classification system as a way to improve discipline and regulate job distribution, but said the system should not continue to be complicated by increasing the number of staff dealing with classification and raising administrative costs. The United States said the ICSC recommendation that responsibility for job-classification decisions up to the Director level be delegated to organization heads implied that Member States would no longer be in a position to contain budget growth by controlling personnel classification through the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and the Fifth Committee.

Promotion from General Service to the Professional category

In 1981, 48 staff members were promoted to Professional jobs in the Secretariat as a result of the first competitive examination, held in 1979/1980, for the passage of General Service staff and related categories to the Professional category.<sup>(4)</sup> They were chosen from among 750 applicants for the examination, of whom 157 candidates were convoked for interview following a written examination. The results were set forth in the Secretary-General's September 1981 report on the composition of the Secretariat.<sup>(2)</sup> The second examination was held in 1981 and 459 staff sat for it at 12 centres.

United Nations staff organizations, in their October report transmitted to the Fifth Committee,<sup>(1)</sup> expressed concern at the manner in which the results of the 1979 examination had been implemented. They said that orientation and training for the new assignments had been inadequate or non-existent, some staff members had encountered hostility in their new jobs and some posts had been denied to successful candidates. They expressed dissatisfaction with preparations for the 1981 examination, stating that the administration had refused to accept a joint review of its content. They also objected to what they saw as a trend to decrease the number of posts available for the examination by upgrading them in order to recruit more external candidates at higher levels.

During discussion of personnel questions in the Fifth Committee, Austria stated that organization of the examinations should be improved and inequities in the current promotion procedure eliminated. Barbados hoped it might be possible to develop an internal roster of General Service staff, which might provide an opportunity for making fundamental changes in the competitive examination. Spain, noting that the number of promotions to the Professional category had decreased since the system's introduction, felt that the $5-million cost could not be justified. Yugoslavia said the modalities for implementing the examination were the Secretary-General's responsibility and experience alone would demonstrate their validity.

The United States felt that the Office of Personnel Services should evaluate the programme to date; it also maintained that staff should be entitled to take the examination after two years (rather than five years) in the General Service category and that a higher percentage of posts should be available for promotion through this means. However, the Ukrainian SSR was opposed to reserving for such promotions more than the current limit of 30 per cent of available posts-established by the General Assembly in 1978<sup>(3)</sup>—and objected to allowing staff without a higher education to take the exam. The latter view was also stated by the USSR. Malawi urged that it be made clear to the administration that the 1978 Assembly resolution on the subject was a directive that must be implemented.

Job classification and career development of language staff

The Secretary-General, in a September 1981 report on job classification and career development of language staff in the Secretariat,<sup>(2)</sup> described the initial steps in implementing a three-year plan (1981-1983), approved by the Assembly in December 1980,<sup>(3)</sup> for the progressive adjustment of staffing tables of translators, interpreters, verbatim reporters, editors, copy-preparers and proof-readers at Headquarters and Geneva to provide for reclassification of posts and improved career prospects, together with reductions in the number of posts.

The Secretary-General stated that it was too early to provide an analysis of an important element in the plan — the introduction of more institutionalized "self-revision", whereby a translator produced a final document by translating it and revising the translation instead of sending it to a senior translator for revision. While initial results had been encouraging, the amount of work which could be self-revised during the plan's first three years would depend on the proportion of experienced staff in each language unit who could be entrusted with self-revision. The Secretary-General suggested that, should reviews at offices other than at Headquarters and Geneva indicate the need for reclassifications to ensure equality of treatment, he be permitted to proceed in 1982 and 1983 to the extent that the approved staffing table allowed.

In July 1981, the International Civil Service Commission (ICSC) promulgated Tier II grade level standards defining the jobs of translators and revisers throughout the United Nations system, as part of its introduction of a job-classification scheme for the international civil service (p. 1327). In its annual report to the Assembly,<sup>(1)</sup> ICSC said it had been placed in a difficult position by the Assembly's 1980 decision endorsing the Secretary-General's proposals to reclassify language posts in the United Nations Secretariat. Though it recognized the United Nations right to change work methods and duties, ICSC affirmed that it was singularly authorized to establish job-classification standards in work common to more than one organization. It requested the United Nations to report to it any post upgradings that could not be justified by the application of ICSC-approved standards.

Speaking in the Fifth Committee, the Chairman of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) said that too little time had elapsed since the introduction of the ICSC Master Standard for job classification to enable ACABQ to study to what extent reclassifications proposed by the Secretariat were consistent with the new system.

The General Assembly took note of the Secretary-General's report on 18 December when it adopted without vote a section of a resolution on questions relating to the programme budget for 1982-1983.<sup>(4)</sup> This action, orally proposed by the Fifth Committee Chairman, had been approved without objection by that Committee on 7 December.

In the Fifth Committee's discussion of this topic, Algeria, Iraq, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Morocco and the Syrian Arab Republic expressed reservations about the Secretariat's announced intention to abolish posts in the newly expanded Arabic Translation Service (p. 1369 as a consequence of the introduction of self-revision. The Under-Secretary-General for Conference Services and Special Assignments responded that the reduction in posts in the Translation Division would be allocated proportionally among the various services.

Job classification and career development of language staff [The General Assembly...]

Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the job classification and career development of language staff;

Staff training

The Secretary-General's September 1981 report on the composition of the Secretariat<sup>(4)</sup> stated that the Staff Development Programme at United Nations Headquarters offered approximately 200 occupational training courses and seminars each year, in addition to the language training programme (p. 1330). During 1981, emphasis had been placed on developing courses to meet specific departmental and organizational needs, on training staff in the General Service and related categories and on developing managerial skills for Professional staff. Between mid-1980 and mid-1981, 1,651 staff had participated in in-house occupational training and 91 in external studies.

At its February/March session,<sup>(2)</sup> ICSC noted the low priority given to training by United Nations organizations, as indicated by an average total staff training expenditure of only 0.39 per cent of overall costs, with 35 Professionals supervising and conducting training programmes for 46,000 staff—a ratio of 1 to 1,300. ICSC recommended that all organizations consider allocating greater resources for training and evaluate training activities to assess their usefulness. In July it instructed its secretariat to study the possible establishment of a common fund for training services.

Information on training activities by United Nations organizations was exchanged at the eighth session of the Sub-Committee on Staff Training, a body of the Consultative Committee on Administrative Questions (Personnel and General Administrative Questions), held at Geneva from 12 to 14 October.<sup>(1)</sup> The Sub-Committee expressed the view that creation of a common fund for training did not seem feasible at that time but it agreed that organizations should continue sharing the cost of training in which they were jointly interested.

Commenting on training in its October report for the Fifth Committee on personnel questions,<sup>(3)</sup> the staff organizations of the Secretariat maintained that improvement or acquisition of skills beneficial to the Organization should be rewarded and a more flexible attitude towards granting study leave, paid or unpaid, encouraged. Also, adequate funds should be allocated to meet training needs. The staff organizations proposed that guidelines be established on the kind of training and education programmes for which Professional staff might obtain full or partial support from the United Nations and on conditions under which support would be granted.

On 18 December, the General Assembly, in its resolution on ICSC,<sup>(5)</sup> noted that body's consideration of training. The Assembly requested it to study the development of inter-agency co-operation on training with a view to more efficient and economical use of personnel, and to evaluate, in close collaboration with the organizations, the utility of current and proposed training activities in the system, especially management training.

Also on 18 December, the Assembly authorized funding for a training programme for translators/précis-writers at the Economic Commission for Africa (p. 633).

Speaking in the Fifth Committee discussion of the work of ICSC, Finland, on behalf of the Nordic States, said the closed nature of international organizations intensified the need for training. Malawi welcomed the Secretary-General's efforts to organize occupational training courses and management seminars. The United States endorsed the ICSC recommendation that training activities be evaluated in regard to their utility to the organizations and the results they were expected to achieve.

The Byelorussian SSR and the USSR, on the other hand, expressed the view that the United Nations must not become a branch of educational institutions; its recruits should join the Organization after their training had been completed. Hungary said that although training was necessary at the beginning of a staff member's career, it should not become automatic at later stages and the United Nations should not be transformed into a free-of-charge training institution. The Ukrainian SSR thought the ICSC suggestion that additional resources be provided for training implied acceptance of the possibility that the requirement of securing the highest standards of efficiency when recruiting staff would be ignored.

Language training

Decisions were taken in 1981 to improve the language training programme organized at United Nations Headquarters and other major United Nations centres to enhance the language proficiency of Secretariat staff (see below). In addition, the General Assembly, in December, decided to allow staff of the permanent missions of Governments accredited to the United Nations to participate in the programme without charge (p. 1331), and requested further study of a proposal by the Secretary-General to give language teachers the status of staff members (p. 1332).

Review of the language training programme

In a June 1981 report reviewing and evaluating the United Nations language training programme for staff members,<sup>(2)</sup> the Secretary-General outlined the scope and structure of the programme, described the language proficiency examination, and discussed organizational and administrative aspects. It gave attendance figures of 1,700 per term at United Nations Headquarters and 1,100 at Geneva for courses in Arabic, Chinese, English, French, Russian and Spanish.

The report recommended improvements in the programme, including: a decrease in class size at Headquarters to 12-18 students from the current 21 or 22; an increase in teaching hours in each language at all levels; review, completion and harmonization of teaching material and preparation of teachers' manuals; reduction of language proficiency examinations from three to two per year and their revision to ensure that those who passed were fully able to understand and use the language in their official duties; development of additional courses in drafting, correspondence, documentation and conference servicing, open to staff attaining the proficiency level; and increased assistance in pedagogical material and guidance to offices away from Headquarters. Experimentally, it was proposed to carry out these recommendations without adding to the 1982-1983 United Nations budget, by charging a fee to all staff repeating any level, limiting study to one language at a time and setting a maximum of two languages which might be learned free of charge.

The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ), in an October report,<sup>(1)</sup> felt that the Secretary-General's recommendations were consistent with General Assembly objectives on the use of languages in the Secretariat and recommended their approval. However, it said a fee should not be charged to those repeating a course because of absence from duty attributable to ill-health or to mission assignment of which they were unaware at the time of enrolment. It also recommended that the Secretary-General submit a progress report in early 1983, together with up-to-date and refined statistics.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 18 December, the General Assembly, in its resolution on questions relating to the programme budget for 1982-1983,<sup>(3)</sup> approved the Secretary-General's recommendations on the charging of a fee to repeaters, reducing the number of examinations and limiting study to one language at a time. It endorsed the ACABQ observation that a fee not be charged in certain circumstances and requested the Secretary-General to report in 1983 on the possibility of limiting the number of languages which might be learned free of charge.

This section of the resolution was adopted without vote. On 11 November, the Fifth Administrative and Budgetary Committee had approved the draft without objection as orally proposed by the USSR, incorporating a proposal by Egypt adding the endorsement of the ACABQ observation. Egypt said the Secretary-General should be given latitude to waive the fee when staff were obliged to repeat a class for reasons beyond their control.

Proposing that the Assembly not approve the recommendation to limit to two the number of languages that could be learned free of charge, the USSR said such a step might discriminate against some of the Organization's official languages. This view was endorsed by Algeria, Iraq and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. Morocco believed the matter should be studied before a decision was taken.

United Nations language training programme
[The General Assembly...]

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the review and evaluation of the United Nations language training programme and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

1. Approves the recommendations made by the Secretary-General in paragraphs 46 (a) to (c) of his report;

2. Endorses the observation contained in paragraph 8 of the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to conduct a review for the purpose of exploring the possible quantitative limitations of the number of official languages which may be learned free of charge and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its thirty-eighth session;

Participation by permanent missions

On 18 December 1981, the General Assembly, by a section of its resolution on questions relating to the programme budget for 1982-1983,<sup>(2)</sup> requested the Secretary-General to enable accredited staff of permanent missions of Governments at United Nations Headquarters to participate free of charge in the language training programme from 1 January 1982. This was to be on conditions suggested in a note by the Budget Division:<sup>(1)</sup> that access would be on a first-come, first-served basis with no quota per mission, but limited by available space. The Secretary-General was also requested to adjust the income section of the proposed budget (to compensate for the loss of revenue from fees currently paid by mission personnel) and to report in 1982 on implementation.

This section of the resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 95 to 32, with 11 abstentions. On 16 December, the Fifth Committee had approved the draft, proposed and orally revised by Panama, by a recorded vote, requested by the USSR, of 52 to 30, with 17 abstentions. The revision specified that the decision applied to Headquarters.

The conditions of attendance specified by the Assembly had been defined in one of two options put before the Committee in a note by the Budget Division submitted at the request of Panama.<sup>(1)</sup> The cost of this option was estimated at $106,000 in 1982-1983, due to abolition of fees based on the 1981 enrolment of 390 mission personnel. Under the other option, mission staff would not be limited to enrolment on a space-available basis but would be able to enrol free of charge upon demand, on the same basis as Secretariat staff. It was estimated that this would have resulted in a doubling of enrolment by mission personnel, requiring additional classes, teachers, staff, equipment and classrooms at a cost of $281,600, not counting the revenue loss.

Panama, the sponsor of the Assembly's decision, remarked that the benefits it would provide to delegations, particularly those from developing countries experiencing economic difficulties, would be important for the work of the United Nations.

A number of delegations explained their negative votes. The USSR said the Committee did not have the right to use the United Nations budget to pay for free language training for mission staff. Belgium, Ghana, the United Kingdom and the United States said that such training was the responsibility of Member States. The Netherlands cautioned that approval might pave the way for requests for further privileges.

India abstained because it was not convinced that the draft represented a proper cause. Morocco said its abstention was out of a sense of decency since its mission would have been a main beneficiary. (Both these States voted in favour in the Assembly.)

Explaining their votes in favour, Guinea, Sierra Leone (which abstained in the Assembly) and Uruguay said language training was needed in part because many United Nations documents were not issued simultaneously in all languages. Algeria said it had voted affirmatively in the light of arguments by developing countries. Pakistan believed that enabling delegation members to avail themselves of the United Nations language training programme was consistent with the Organization's objectives, as it would facilitate the missions' work.

During the Committee's discussion, Egypt said mission staff should be given the opportunity, as an experiment, to receive language training within available resources-initially at Headquarters and then, if the experiment was successful, at other United Nations offices. Yugoslavia expressed the view that, as Governments paid for the language training programme, their missions' staff should be allowed access to the classes; if not, Secretariat staff should be required to pay for their tuition.

Status of language teachers

In a December 1981 report on the contractual status of language teachers at Headquarters,<sup>(2)</sup> the Secretary-General proposed that 20 teachers be given renewable one-year appointments as United Nations staff members, entitling them to pension and other benefits which they were not receiving under their current Teacher Employment Agreements. Part-time teachers, numbering 21 as of July, would continue to be paid on an hourly basis. An additional appropriation of $154,400 for 1982-1983 would be required to implement these proposals, the report added.

The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ)<sup>(1)</sup> said it could not support the proposals until other alternatives had been examined and before the system-wide implications of granting staff-member status had been examined by the International Civil Service Commission (ICSC). Therefore, ACABQ recommended that the General Assembly postpone a decision until additional information and the recommendations of ICSC had been received.

On 18 December, the Assembly, by a section of its resolution on questions relating to the programme budget for 1982-1983,<sup>(3)</sup> endorsed the ACABQ recommendations and requested ICSC and the Secretary-General to report to it in 1982.

This section of the resolution was adopted without vote. On 16 December the Fifth Committee had approved the draft without objection as orally proposed by its Chairman, after the USSR had suggested that the Assembly adopt the ACABQ recommendation. The proposal was modified by Algeria to add that ICSC should report in 1982.

In the Fifth Committee, the Assistant Secretary-General for Personnel Services expressed concern at the consequences of deferring a decision, stating that the proposal to convert language teachers to staff-member status had been advanced after two years of discussion with the teachers and staff representatives, and would benefit the language training programme. Alternative forms of pension coverage could be more costly to the United Nations in future.

The Secretary-General's position was endorsed by Algeria, Egypt, India, Kuwait and Yugoslavia, which stressed the human aspects of the problem. In support of the ACABQ recommendations, the USSR favoured seeking the views of ICSC, while the United States said that giving the teachers staff-member status for an intermittent job would make it more difficult to adjust staffing needs to training requirements.

Other personnel questions

Proposed day-care services at UN Headquarters

The General Assembly, in December 1981, endorsed a recommendation for a study of alternatives to a proposal by the Secretary-General that the United Nations help finance a proposed child-care centre at Headquarters to provide day-care services to children of staff members and others associated with the United Nations.

The Secretary-General's proposal was made in a December report<sup>(2)</sup> as a follow-up to a similar proposal in 1980<sup>(6)</sup> and an Assembly request for a new study.<sup>(3)</sup> The 1981 report called for a centre to accommodate 120 children between 1 and 5 years of age, located in rented space in the second United Nations Development Corporation building (DC-2) being built to provide additional office space for the United Nations between East 44th and 45th Streets, across United Nations Plaza from the main Headquarters complex. The centre, administered by a board of directors composed of United Nations officials and parents, would serve the children of staff of United Nations organizations at Headquarters and of the permanent missions of Governments accredited there.

The Secretary-General estimated the cost of the centre during its first two years (1982-1983) at $1,307,000, excluding direct operating costs of some $418,300 a year to be met through tuition and fund raising. The $1.3 million included $804,300 in construction costs, which he proposed that the Assembly appropriate from the United Nations budget, and $332,700 in space occupancy and other indirect operating costs, which he said could be absorbed within existing appropriations.

After studying this proposal, ACABQ submitted a report<sup>(1)</sup> in which it concluded that the centre's cost-nearly $7,000 a year for each child-would be too high, and that the provision of day care for 120 children in a United Nations community of 7,000 staff and many more mission officials would cover only a fraction of those potentially eligible. It also thought that potential income from fund raising should not be relied upon to cover operating deficits. Considering the small number of children, other alternatives should be explored, such as payment of a day-care allowance on a graduated scale to all eligible staff or arrangements with existing day-care facilities near Headquarters, ACABQ said.

On 18 December, the General Assembly, in a section of its resolution on questions relating to the programme budget for 1982-1983,<sup>(5)</sup> took note of both reports and endorsed the ACABQ recommendations. This section of the resolution was adopted without vote. On 16 December, the draft had been approved by the Fifth Committee without objection, as orally proposed by its Chairman.

In the Fifth Committee, Costa Rica reiterated its support for the establishment of a child-care centre at Headquarters and expressed regret that the current proposal was regarded as too costly. Sweden, on behalf of the Nordic States, observing that the establishment of such a centre would substantially improve opportunities for women to contribute to the United Nations, expressed regret that it had not been possible to mobilize sufficient support for the proposal and suggested that the matter of a subsidy for child-care expenses be referred to ICSC. The latter proposal was endorsed by Belgium, which proposed that ICSC review dependency allowances for all categories of staff, including the possibility of subsidizing child-care expenses, and review the scope and purpose of the education grant

(p. 1342). This proposal, without the reference to a subsidy for child-care expenses, was included in the Assembly resolution of 18 December on the work of ICSC.<sup>(4)</sup>

Amendments to the Staff Rules

In October 1981, the Secretary-General reported to the General Assembly<sup>(1)</sup> on amendments made to the Staff Rules during the year. These changes reflected decisions of the Assembly taken in December 1980 on pensionable remuneration, the education grant and home leave travel,<sup>(2)</sup> and also included revised salary and benefit schedules and rules on matters within the Secretary-General's authority.

On 18 December, the General Assembly took note of this report by a decision adopted without vote.<sup>(3)</sup> On 15 December, the draft had been similarly approved by the Fifth Committee, as proposed by its Chairman.

Amendments to the Staff Rules

At its 105th plenary meeting, on 18 December 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee, took note of the report of the Secretary-General on amendments to the Staff Rules.

Staff-management relations

A Secretariat-wide Staff-Management Coordinating Committee, established in June

1980<sup>(3)</sup> and composed of representatives of both administration and staff, held its second (June) and third (September) sessions in 1981. It considered amendments to the Staff Regulations and Rules to reflect the structure of staff representation and staff-management relations. Other items on its agenda concerned the rights and obligations of staff representatives and the facilities to be provided to them, part-time employment, competitive examinations for promotion from the General Service to the Professional category (p. 1328) and the performance evaluation system. In his September 1981 report on the composition of the Secretariat,<sup>(2)</sup> the Secretary-General stated that the Committee had already proven to be a useful and important forum.

Commenting on staff-management relations, the Secretariat staff organizations stated, in their October report for the Fifth Committee,<sup>(1)</sup> that a fundamental reorientation of those relations was required to bring them into line with accepted international standards for the public service as defined by the International Labour Organisation (ILO). Stating that there was growing discontent with the consultation system, the staff organizations advocated negotiation, since they considered consultation to be paternalistic, outmoded and leaving too much scope for unilateral decision-making.

In the Fifth Committee's discussion of personnel questions, India stated that ILO conventions were not designed for the international civil service and it was for the General Assembly to decide on their applicability to the Professional and higher categories. The USSR expressed concern over the establishment of the Co-ordination Committee, stating that its power to make proposals affecting the nature of relations between the staff and the Secretary-General would mean an unacceptable change in the Assembly's role. Yugoslavia expressed the view that the Fifth Committee should not become an arbiter or engage in negotiations between the staff and the Secretary-General, who bore exclusive responsibility for personnel policies.

Staff representation in the Fifth Committee

Two documents prepared by staff organizations (p. 1322) -the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations (FICSA)<sup>(1)</sup> and the Staff Unions and Associations of the United Nations Secretariat<sup>(2)</sup>—were introduced in the Fifth Committee by representatives of the organizations. The Committee invited them to do so in accordance with a December 1980 resolution in which the General Assembly decided that the Committee might invite one representative from each of these two groups for that purpose.<sup>(3)</sup>

The decision to invite the FICSA representative was taken on 10 November by 44 votes to 16, with 32 abstentions. The motion to this effect was made by New Zealand and was put to the vote at the request of the USSR. The FICSA representative addressed the Committee on 12 November.

On 13 November, the Committee decided without discussion or vote, on a motion by Sweden, to invite a representative of the Secretariat staff organizations to introduce their report on personnel questions. The representative addressed the Committee on 23 November.

Voicing their objections to the invitation to a FICSA representative, the German Democratic Republic, Morocco, the USSR and Viet Nam said staff representatives had already had the opportunity to present their position to the International Civil Service Commission (ICSC) and, under the Charter of the United Nations, the Secretary-General represented the staff in the Fifth Committee. Also voting against, Kenya would have preferred the Committee to begin its discussion before deciding whether to invite a FICSA representative. Yugoslavia said it did not see why the matter was being raised again after a decision had been taken in 1980. The Bahamas said its negative vote, based on juridical and practical reasons, did not imply insensitivity to staff issues.

Among those abstaining, Brazil said it was not convinced of the need for an oral presentation, while Japan feared that an invitation to FICSA might discourage it from good-faith participation in the work of ICSC.

In favour of extending an invitation, Egypt thought the action was in accordance with the fundamental principles of democracy, while Guyana said it supported staff access to the Committee out of respect for their concerns and because they could contribute to the Committee's decision-making. Peru said an oral statement was the only way the Committee could obtain clarification of the written document. The United Kingdom (for the European Community members) and the United Republic of Cameroon said an oral statement would be a useful supplement to the FICSA document; the latter added that the invitation should not constitute a precedent. Though voting in favour, Argentina thought it premature for the Committee to determine whether an oral statement was desirable.

The Assembly, in its decision of 18 December on career development,<sup>(4)</sup> took note of the Secretary-General's note containing the views of the Secretariat staff organizations. This provision was originally proposed orally by the Fifth Committee Chairman as a separate draft decision to have the Assembly take note of the staff views as contained in the organizations' report. However, the USSR, supported by Morocco, objected to taking note of staff views, on the ground that only the Secretary-General had the authority to put forward views to the Assembly. Belgium, India and Sri Lanka recalled that the Assembly had authorized the staff to submit their views. The Committee then approved a proposal by Canada, accepted by the USSR, to include the reworded version of the Chairman's proposal in the decision on career development.

Recruitment of Professional staff

The Secretariat's Professional staff recruitment policies were outlined in the Secretary-General's September 1981 report on the composition of the Secretariat.<sup>(1)</sup> Recruitment planning, the report said, was the primary means used to achieve a staff which met the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity and whose members were equitably distributed by nationality and sex. Such planning included vacancy projection, recruitment monitoring, vacancy announcement and publicity, and the establishment of pools of suitable candidates by occupational group.

The first annual work plan of recruitment mandated by the Assembly in December 1980,<sup>(2)</sup> was to cover 1982, during which some 270 posts would be open for recruitment, the report stated. The plan's target was to fill at least 40 per cent of all vacancies arising in posts subject to geographical distribution during 1981-1982 by nationals of unrepresented and under-represented Member States (p. 1317), and to increase the number of women in these posts to 25 per cent by the end of 1982 (p. 1321).

The report stated that, when posts subject to geographical distribution became vacant, candidates recruited from outside were, whenever possible, of another nationality. However, replacement by the same nationality was permitted in respect of Member States whose nationals served primarily on a fixed-term basis.

According to the report, the roster of external candidates continued to be improved and modernized. For P-1 and P-2 (entry-level Professional) posts, examinations were held in April 1981 in France and Japan.

During the debate in the Fifth Committee on personnel questions, Austria, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, Mauritania and the United Republic of Cameroon stressed the importance of competitive examinations for the recruitment of junior Professional staff. To improve this procedure, Japan suggested that future examinations be administered by a single United Nations office, that questions be designed to test potential ability and language proficiency rather than knowledge of minor details about the United Nations system, and that decisions on the appointment of successful candidates be accelerated. However, Algeria and Mauritania were concerned that such examinations might adversely affect the qualitative representation of developing or under-represented countries.

Brazil, Spain and Suriname welcomed plans to organize examinations in their countries, but Spain deplored the fact that they were aimed exclusively at recruitment at the P-2 level rather than at P-3 and P-4. On the other hand, the United Republic of Cameroon believed it inadvisable at the current stage to consider using examinations for recruitment above the P-2 level, though it thought the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) should analyse the system of competitive exams in several years' time.

The Central African Republic urged a new recruitment policy, including semi-annual publication of all vacancy notices to be valid for several months, recruitment missions to inadequately represented States and a streamlined recruitment procedure. Greece, stating that recruitment criteria laid down by the Assembly in 1980 were not always taken into consideration, urged closer co-operation in recruitment procedures between the Office of Personnel Services and other United Nations services. Hungary and Mauritania asked for steps to shorten and simplify recruitment and appointment. India suggested a study of the feasibility of drawing up a medium-term recruitment plan that would be integrated into the United Nations medium-term plan and the programme planning and budgeting process.

The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya hoped further efforts would be made to announce vacancies well ahead of the time set for recruitment. The USSR, supporting efforts to establish an annual recruitment plan, said it should give figures for recruitment from unrepresented and under-represented countries and a description of the kind of candidates being sought, and should be sent to all permanent missions of Member States to the United Nations.

Bangladesh, Madagascar, Malawi, Mexico and the Syrian Arab Republic endorsed a recommendation of JIU, in its report on geographical distribution of the Secretariat (p. 1318), that recruitment procedures be expanded by issuing vacancy announcements not only within the Secretariat but also externally.

Field personnel

As authorized by the General Assembly in December 1980,<sup>(3)</sup> the International Civil Service Commission (ICSC), at its February/March 1981 session,<sup>(1)</sup> approved criteria for use in designating field offices of the United Nations system where, by virtue of conditions of life and work, staff would qualify for accelerated home leave travel on 12- and 18-month cycles (instead of the usual 24 months), additional education grant travel for their children and, at the most difficult duty stations, financial incentives. The financial incentives, in the form of a higher assignment allowance, were $1,200 a year for a staff member in the Professional or higher category outside his or her home country not accompanied by a dependent spouse and $2,400 for a similar staff member accompanied by a dependent spouse or child. Decisions on the applicability of these benefits at particular duty stations took effect from 1 January 1981, at a cost which ICSC estimated at $1,150,000 for the United Nations system as a whole in 1981.

In July, the Commission authorized its Chairman to designate duty stations, from which the Secretary-General had ordered the evacuation of dependants, as qualifying for home leave travel on a 12-month cycle, and to promulgate entitlements for new duty stations. Also in July, ICSC requested information on the use of local or national Professionals so that the question could be considered in 1982.

Commenting on the topic in its document on personnel questions transmitted to the Fifth Committee in October,<sup>(2)</sup> the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations (FICSA) expressed disappointment that ICSC had not thoroughly reviewed conditions of service of all categories of field staff, including local recruits.

In the Fifth Committee's discussion of the work of ICSC, Japan welcomed the ICSC decision to survey all field offices every three years from the standpoint of conditions of service and asked the Commission to include in its report a statement of general trends. The USSR said it did not understand why ICSC was making a study which could only lead to higher salaries for staff in the field, who were already guaranteed a sufficiently high living standard.

Salaries, allowances and pensions

Salaries

ICSC CONSIDERATION. During 1981, ICSC examined various aspects of the salary system governing staff in the United Nations system, including the application of the Noblemaire principle- whereby international civil service salaries in the Professional and higher categories were based on the salary levels of the highest paying comparable national civil service- and made several related observations.

Margin of remuneration. ICSC continued to review the relationship between salary levels of the United Nations common system and the United States civil service, the comparator service used as a reference point for United Nations salaries. These comparisons- made annually between United Nations staff in New York at levels P-1 through D-2 and United States civil servants at corresponding levels in Washington, D. C.- were based on the net pay of officials with a dependent spouse but no children, adjusted for the cost-of-living difference between the two cities and averaged over 12 months (1 October-30 September). United Nations salary figures included post adjustment, the salary supplement used to compensate for cost-of-living changes and differences between duty stations.

ICSC found that the margin by which United Nations salaries exceeded those of the United States Government had widened from a ratio of 116.0 in 1979/1980 to 117.8 in 1980/1981 (United States civil service salaries = 100), due principally to the fact that salary increases of United States civil servants on 1 October 1980 had lagged behind movement in the cost of living. The total compensation ratio adjusted for cost-of-living differences was 114.2, however.

Comparison of total compensation. With regard to the methodology for comparing total compensation of the two services- covering salary and allowances and fringe benefits such as pensions and health and life insurance subsidies- ICSC pointed out that the methodology it had developed was highly complex, requiring a large number of parameters and large amounts of data for processing through computerized comparison models. It requested the General Assembly to note that some doubts had been expressed by the organizations and staff concerning the use of the methodology and some of the assumptions employed, that the matter would be kept under review by ICSC and that further improvements in methodology would be made.

Study of the highest paid civil service. ICSC continued its study, begun in 1979,<sup>(10)</sup> into whether the United States civil service should remain the comparator for United Nations salaries. After preliminary examination of data from the Federal Republic of Germany, it found there was no evidence to suggest that the United States civil service should be replaced as the comparator.

Salary level. Reiterating a request it had made three years previously, FICSA proposed an interim salary increase of 10 per cent for Professional and higher-level staff pending completion of the ICSC studies. However, ICSC said it could not support this proposal as the current trend had been towards a widening of the margin between United Nations salaries and those of the United States civil service. FICSA repeated its request in October in its document on personnel questions for the Fifth Committee.<sup>(2)</sup>

The Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC), on 14 April, asked former Under-Secretary-General for Administration, Finance and Management George F. Davidson to review all aspects of the question.<sup>(7)</sup> On 30 June, ACC referred the matter to its Consultative Committee on Administrative Questions (CCAQ) for urgent consideration.<sup>(8)</sup> On 30 October,<sup>(9)</sup> ACC adopted a statement saying that it continued to view with concern the erosion in the purchasing power of Professional salaries but was not in a position at that time to propose an increase. It informed the Fifth Committee that it supported continuation of the ICSC studies, including extension of its work on the methodology for total compensation to include expatriate benefits (allowances paid to officials working away from their home country).

Post adjustment Responding to a December 1980 Assembly request to present the results of its review of the post adjustment system at the Assembly's 1981 session,<sup>(4)</sup> ICSC provided details of studies completed with the aid of its Advisory Committee on Post Adjustment Questions, which held its sixth session in Paris from 11 to 25 May. Although much progress had been made towards improving the methodology for cost-of-living measurement surveys, ICSC said, further work remained to be done on this and other aspects of the post adjustment system, which would be reported to the Assembly in 1982. At the Commission's request, the Assembly approved additional funds to strengthen the Cost-of-Living Section of the ICSC secretariat for 1982-1983 so that it could improve the methodology of cost-of-living measurements (p. 1323).

Supplementary payments by Governments. As requested by the Assembly in December 1980,<sup>(5)</sup> ICSC kept under review the matter of supplementary payments made by some Governments to certain of their nationals in the international civil service. After seeking information from the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan and the United States, ICSC recalled its 1980 recommendation that the Assembly call to the attention of all Member States that such payments were unnecessary, inappropriate, undesirable and inconsistent with staff regulations.<sup>(11)</sup>

Conditions of service in the General Service category. ICSC continued its study of a general methodology for surveys of best prevailing conditions of employment in cities housing United Nations offices, to be used in determining salaries and allowances for General Service and other locally recruited workers. After receiving detailed proposals by its secretariat, it decided, at the request of CCAQ and FICSA, to defer the item to 1982.

After carrying out a survey of the best prevailing conditions of employment at Vienna, Austria, ICSC recommended new salary scales with increases averaging 3.3 per cent for General Service staff and 4.7 per cent for manual workers. It also considered problems which had arisen in the implementation of scales it had recommended in 1980 for Geneva (p. 1340).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. In its resolution of 18 December 1981 on the work of ICSC,<sup>(6)</sup> the General Assembly requested the Commission to give high priority to completing four studies and to report on them to the Assembly in 1982. Two of these studies concerned salary issues: improving the comparison of total compensation between the comparator civil service and the international civil service, taking into account all elements including pensions but excluding expatriate benefits applicable to Professional and higher-category staff in the comparator civil service; and a comprehensive review of the purposes and operation of the post adjustment system with a view to avoiding distortions and ensuring equity. The Assembly also requested ICSC to study three other salary-related topics: principles and methodology for surveys on conditions of service of General Service and other locally recruited staff, a general review of staff assessment (p. 1341) and supplementary payments by Governments to international civil servants.

The request for continued study of the total compensation comparison was orally revised by the sponsors to exclude expatriate benefits paid to United States civil servants working in foreign countries. Commenting on this change, the ICSC Chairman recalled that ACC had specifically asked the Commission to include expatriate benefits in the comparison, whereas the text as revised would have the Commission include only those expatriate benefits paid to the international civil service. The Under-Secretary-General for Administration, Finance and Management said it seemed essential for ICSC, at some stage, to assess expatriate benefits as part of its overall review of the adequacy of Professional remuneration.

In regard to the provision on supplementary payments, Barbados, in introducing the draft resolution in the Fifth Committee, suggested that, to enable the Assembly to take meaningful decisions, ICSC should provide information on whether other States made such payments and whether they had been made by Governments only to their nationals.

In another action on 18 December, the Assembly decided not to appropriate funds for a proposed salary increase for staff in the General Service category at Geneva (p. 1340).

Various salary issues were commented on by speakers in the Fifth Committee's discussion of the work of ICSC.

A number of speakers expressed concern at the increasing margin between international civil service salaries and those of the United States as the comparator national civil service. Egypt said the two scales should be harmonized within a definite but reasonable time-limit. The Ukrainian SSR saw no reason to maintain such a wide margin. On the other hand, Brazil observed that the increase in the margin had been due to the fact that salaries of the United States civil service had not risen enough to offset inflation fully.

Regarding comparisons of total compensation, the Bahamas suggested that ICSC consider whether the benefits to be expected from the comparison were proportionate to the expenditure entailed by the highly sophisticated methodology adopted. Belgium urged ICSC to submit recommendations on ways to ensure that the margin between total compensation in the two civil services remained reasonable. Finland, speaking for the Nordic States, said it was important to continue to compare and develop new ideas to test the Noblemaire principle, including the possibility of a broader definition of living conditions for comparison purposes.

Spain stated that the study must not lead to unjustified and inflationary salary increases. The Ukrainian SSR welcomed continued work on this topic by ICSC but did not concur with its request for an additional $350,000 for the purpose a request on which the Assembly took no action. The USSR questioned the exclusion from the comparison of the appreciable expatriate benefits paid to United Nations staff serving away from their home country, and urged that the results of the study be submitted to the Assembly in 1982.

Australia commended ICSC for its restraint in turning down the application for a 10 per cent increase in Professional salaries. Belgium, Ghana, Hungary and the United States also supported the ICSC decision or opposed the FICSA request; Ghana added that ICSC, when considering such questions in future, should take the world economic crisis into account.

The Bahamas accepted the FICSA argument that the most recent base salary increase approved by the Assembly in 1974 with effect from 1975<sup>(3)</sup> had not fully compensated for the erosion in purchasing power since the previous adjustment, but could not accept other FICSA arguments, such as the idea that the salary slippage had made it increasingly difficult to recruit staff of the requisite calibre. The Netherlands, while not referring specifically to the proposed increase, said staff representatives must pay due regard to the financial realities limiting the organizations' capacity to satisfy their demands. Pakistan said it could not support the proposal for a 10 per cent increase but was prepared to consider salary increases if there was convincing evidence that United Nations salaries had declined in real terms. The Ukrainian SSR viewed the proposal as totally unjustified. The USSR opposed the proposal and hoped FICSA would be more responsible and realistic in future.

Argentina hoped ICSC would propose solutions to the Assembly in 1982 regarding post adjustment, which was of fundamental importance because of its financial implications. Australia thought that the review of post adjustment should be given even higher priority and that anomalies in allowances between high- and low-cost areas should be resolved urgently.

Pakistan said it would be disappointed if ICSC did not come to grips with the central issue of possible anomalies in the post adjustment indices for New York, Geneva and Vienna. Spain urged ICSC to improve the methods for determining cost-of-living differences for post adjustment purposes. The Ukrainian SSR thought ICSC should try to improve cost-of-living surveys; it expressed concern that field surveys were sometimes conducted by "independent persons" who often had close ties with embassy personnel and other expatriates. The USSR said the delay in producing the ICSC study was inadmissible in view of the serious deficiencies in the current system that led to excessive cost-of-living payments; it thought Member States rather than staff should monitor the preparation of cost-of-living indices in order to avert unjustified expenditures.

Regarding the determination of the highest-paid national civil service, Belgium, Ghana and Sierra Leone questioned the wisdom of investing ICSC time and resources in what Ghana called a peripheral problem. Brazil suggested that ICSC examine as alternatives the totally different conclusions reached in comparison studies by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, Somalia, citing recruitment difficulties and supplementary payments by some Governments, questioned the ICSC conclusion that there was no evidence to suggest that the United States civil service should be replaced as the comparator. Spain supported the continued study by ICSC of whether a civil service other than that of the United States should be chosen as the comparator. The Ukrainian SSR deplored the position of FICSA on this subject and stated that the ICSC comparison supported its conclusion that there was no reason to change the civil service used as the comparator.

Referring to supplementary payments received by some staff from their Governments, Barbados hoped ICSC would submit recommendations that would provide a realistic chance of ending such payments or establishing an acceptable method of meeting the special difficulties of certain States. Egypt said it opposed any privileged or discriminatory treatment of a kind that might compromise the independence or integrity of the international civil service. India viewed such payments as enabling Governments to wield influence over staff. The Netherlands described the practice as unnecessary and dangerous because it could impair the independence of the international civil servant. Pakistan suggested that officials seconded from government service might be given a lump-sum payment prior to their entry into the United Nations system, thereby safeguarding both the special interests of their countries and the impartial character of the international civil service.

The USSR viewed the Commission's work on supplementary payments as neither useful nor a matter of priority. The Bahamas, on the other hand, suggested that ICSC keep the matter under review.

With regard to General Service salaries, the USSR said one of the reasons why unjustified increases had been granted in the past was the selection of foreign or private companies for local salary comparisons in preference to entities which performed work comparable to that of international organizations.

Salaries of the General

Service category at Geneva

In its 1981 report to the General Assembly,<sup>(3)</sup> ICSC pointed out that, following its 1980 survey of best prevailing employment conditions for staff of the General Service category at Geneva, six of the seven organizations there (United Nations, World Health Organization, International Telecommunication Union, World Meteorological Organization, World Intellectual Property Organization, General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) were implementing new salary scales recommended by ICSC retroactive to 1 March 1980. However, the International Labour Organisation (ILO) had adopted the recommended scale for staff recruited after 1 January 1979 but, with effect from 1 March 1981, had granted a 3 per cent net salary increase to ILO staff in service since 1978 or earlier. The pay of all General Service staff of organizations at Geneva had remained unchanged since a lower scale recommended by ICSC—averaging 17 per cent less than the then current rates—went into effect on 1 January 1978,<sup>(6)</sup> and was to remain at that level until inflation lifted salaries enough to overcome the difference between scales.

Stating that the ILO action had minimized if not disregarded the objective of a single international civil service with common salary scales, ICSC called on organization heads and staff representatives, and recommended that the Assembly call on Member States, to foster development of a single, unified international civil service and to enable ICSC to carry out its mandate.

In a note to the Fifth Committee in October,<sup>(1)</sup> the Secretary-General stated that he and the heads of the Geneva-based organizations other than ILO, concluding that equitable treatment of staff was of paramount importance, had decided to grant comparable increases effective 1 March 1981 to staff to whom the higher, pre-1978 scale had once applied. He estimated the cost of the increases to the United Nations at $903,400 for 1981 and $1,084,000 for the 1982-1983 biennium.

The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, in a November report,<sup>(2)</sup> expressed the belief that preservation of the common system and equity for the staff did not require the organizations to follow the lead of any one of them which unilaterally deviated from accepted norms. It added that the best way for organizations to discourage unilateral action was by refusing to be bound by it.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. In a section of its 18 December resolution on questions concerning the 1982-1983 programme budget,<sup>(5)</sup> the General Assembly requested the Secretary-General to reconsider his intention to grant the salary increase and decided not to approve the related expenditures for 1981, 1982 and 1983.

This section of the resolution was adopted without vote. On 9 December, the Fifth Committee had approved the draft, proposed by the United States, without objection.

In its 18 December resolution on the work of ICSC,<sup>(4)</sup> the Assembly reaffirmed the importance of applying common salary scales for all General Service staff at a particular duty station and regretted the ILO decision. It also supported ICSC efforts to promote uniform and co-ordinated action in the common system and called on the Secretary-General, as ACC Chairman, to ensure measures to that end.

Presenting its proposal, the United States said it was important that the Secretary-General be made aware that the Committee knew that Geneva General Service staff were overpaid by local standards.

Before the Fifth Committee acted, the Under-Secretary-General for Administration, Finance and Management stated that the establishment of General Service salaries fell exclusively within the competence of the Secretary-General. He added that the staff might interpret a refusal to grant the increase as a denial of equal treatment.

During the Fifth Committee discussion of the work of ICSC, an ILO representative said that, while his organization was one of the staunchest supporters of the common system, all organizations had at times felt obliged to make independent arrangements to meet their particular circumstances. The recent increase had been the result of negotiations with staff representatives under an agreement endorsed by the ILO Governing Body in 1978. Following a 10-point rise in a local cost-of-living index, the staff had requested a 5 per cent salary increase but the ILO Director-General had agreed to only 3 per cent.

New Zealand, while regretting the ILO decision, said it would have abstained in a vote; it might have been worth while to consider a compromise solution under which an increase would be given from a later date. Egypt supported this view since it felt there was a contradiction between the paragraphs of the text. Algeria, Morocco and the United Republic of Cameroon also said they would have abstained; the last added that it was not happy with the prospect of granting a salary increase under a zero-growth budget.

A number of States, including Australia, Canada, Finland (for the Nordic States), Ghana, Japan, Sierra Leone, Spain, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR, the United Kingdom (for the European Community States) and the United States, voiced regret at the ILO decision, particularly in the light of the effects on the common system. Despite ICSC recommendations and Assembly decisions, said the Byelorussian SSR, the ILO secretariat had obtained from its Governing Body approval of an illegal salary increase. Japan stated that an effort must be made to prevent such unilateral decisions, especially those not based on objective criteria. The United Kingdom thought it inconsistent for ILO to act against the advice of ICSC and equally inconsistent for the heads of the other organizations, including the United Nations, to follow ILO.

The United States said the salaries concerned were higher than the best local salaries even before the increase had been proposed. Yugoslavia also expressed the view that General Service salaries at Geneva were already too high.

These and other States stressed the importance of maintaining the unity of the common system. Argentina saw the difficulties over General Service salaries at Geneva as demonstrating an alarming shortcoming in that system. Belgium said measures must be taken to prevent a recurrence of such events. Ghana hoped that other organizations would refrain from unilateral action that would further damage the credibility of ICSC and the concept of a unified international civil service. Finland said the ILO decision called into question the ICSC mandate. The Ukrainian SSR saw the decision as creating a dangerous precedent which could undermine efforts towards uniform procedures for determining United Nations salaries. The USSR hoped the Assembly would call on all organizations participating in the work of ICSC to refrain from such measures in future.

Several of these States and others, including Canada, spoke in support of the United States proposal. Sweden, speaking for the Nordic States, thought it inadvisable to condone an error made by one organization by allowing others to repeat the error. New Zealand, however, doubted whether it was fitting to adopt the proposal, as such matters were within the Secretary-General's competence.

Implementation of revised General Service salary scales at Geneva

[The General Assembly...]

1. Requests the Secretary-General to reconsider his intention to grant a 3 per cent increase in salaries with effect from 1 March 1981 to those General Service staff members at Geneva to whom the pre-1978 scale had once applied, taking into account the views expressed in the Fifth Committee:

2. Decides not to approve the related expenditures for 1981, 1982 and 1983;

Staff assessment

In its 1981 report to the General Assembly,<sup>(1)</sup> ICSC said it had not found any suitable alternative to staff assessment—a kind of internal income tax deducted from the gross salary of every United Nations staff member. This sum was paid into a Tax Equalization Fund, used in part to reimburse staff who must pay national or local income tax on their United Nations salary (p. 1287). Most such staff were United States nationals; the nationals of eight other States also received smaller amounts. The system was introduced in 1948 with the aim of equalizing the pay of staff of different nationalities without requiring Member States that did not impose income taxes on United Nations officials to make up the difference.

After a study of the relationship between staff assessment and the Tax Equalization Fund, ICSC indicated that the need for staff assessment would remain so long as the Member States concerned had not exempted their nationals from income tax. It therefore suggested that the Assembly reiterate past requests that Member States make such exemptions, thereby leading to the Fund's abolition.

Changes approved by the Assembly in December 1980 in the staff assessment rates for locally recruited staff, including the General Service category,<sup>(4)</sup> were protested by the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations<sup>(2)</sup> and by the staff organizations of the Secretariat<sup>(3)</sup> in their October 1981 reports for the Fifth Committee. They called for a further study by ICSC to develop a uniform scheme for all categories of staff. They maintained that: the new rates, decreasing the pensionable remuneration of General Service staff and thereby lowering future pension benefits, violated staff members' acquired rights; there had been inadequate staff-management consultation; and, since some specialized agencies had refused to implement the new rates, the validity of the common system and the role of ICSC were called into question.

In its resolution on the work of ICSC, the Assembly requested ICSC to undertake a general review of staff assessment for the equitable treatment of all categories of staff at all duty stations.<sup>(5)</sup>

Income tax

The Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC), on 30 October 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> noted that a Member State had approached several organizations with respect to amending agreements with them regarding reimbursement of income taxes levied on its nationals serving on their staff. ACC referred the matter to its Consultative Committee on Administrative Questions and requested the organizations to refrain from entering into individual arrangements pending receipt of a report from that body.

Decision: <sup>(1)</sup>ACC, 1981/19, 30 Oct.

Allowances

The General Assembly, in December 1981, clarified the method of calculating the repatriation grant and other payments made to staff on separation from the international civil service, and asked for a study of dependency allowances and the education grant.

Separation payments

On the recommendation of the International Civil Service Commission (ICSC),<sup>(2)</sup> the General Assembly decided on 18 December 1981 that payments to staff members in the Professional and higher categories on retirement or other separation from service should continue to be based on gross salary adjusted by movements of the world-wide cost-of-living adjustment index for United Nations salaries known as the weighted average of post adjustments (WAPA), less staff assessment.<sup>(1)</sup>

The decision was adopted without vote. The draft, sponsored by Barbados, Belgium and the United Kingdom, had been similarly approved on 17 December by the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee. Introducing the text, the United Kingdom explained that it would maintain the status quo for this type of payment by clarifying the existing rule.

Separation payments-repatriation grant, death grant, termination indemnity and commutation of annual leave-had been calculated since 1977 on the basis of pensionable remuneration (the portion of pay used in calculating pension benefits and contributions) less staff assessment. However, in December 1980, the General Assembly had approved a dual system for determining pensionable remuneration, requiring separate calculations for the pension benefits (based on movements of the United States consumer price index) and pension contributions (based on movements of WAPA).<sup>(3)</sup> In its 1981 report, ICSC pointed out that, in thus redefining pensionable remuneration, the Assembly had not decided what basis should be used in calculating separation payments. Accordingly, it recommended the revised definition linked directly to WAPA, noting that this would require no immediate change in the scale of separation payments.

Report of the International Civil Service Commission

At its 105th plenary meeting, on 18 December 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee, decided that separation payments (commutation of annual leave, repatriation grant, death grant and termination indemnity) for the Professional and higher categories should continue to be based on gross salary adjusted by movements of the weighted average of post adjustments, less staff assessment, and that, accordingly, in annexes III and IV to the Staff Regulations of the United Nations, concerning termination indemnity and repatriation grant, respectively, the reference to "pensionable remuneration less staff assessment" should be amended to read "gross salary adjusted by movements of the weighted average of post adjustments, less staff assessment".

Education grant

In its resolution of 18 December 1981 on the work of ICSC, the General Assembly requested the Commission to review dependency allowances for all categories of staff and the scope and purpose of the education grant- the allowance paid to internationally recruited staff serving outside their home country to reimburse them for part of the additional costs entailed in educating their children.<sup>(2)</sup>

During the Fifth Committee's discussion of proposals for day care at United Nations Headquarters (p. 1333), Belgium had orally proposed that ICSC review dependency allowances including the possibility of subsidizing child-care expenses. No action was taken on this proposal, but Belgium agreed to a suggestion by the USSR that there be an informal understanding that ICSC had been requested to review the possibility of such a subsidy.

In their October report for the Fifth Committee,<sup>(1)</sup> the staff organizations of the Secretariat had urged that the education grant be extended to all groups of staff, including Professionals and local recruits currently excluded.

Pensions

UN Joint Staff Pension Fund

The number of participants in the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund rose from 49,098 on 31 December 1980 to 51,048 as at 31 December 1981. The principal of the Fund increased from $2,154,600,924 to $2,458,365,968; and income from interest and dividends, less investment management costs, was $166,638,000, compared with $142,196,000 in 1980. At the end of 1981, 17,357 benefits were being paid, as follows: retirement, 5,874; early retirement, 2,077; deferred retirement, 3,708; widow and widower, 2,026; disability, 382; child, 3,257; and secondary dependant, 33.

During 1981, the number of organization belonging to the Fund increased to 14 with the admission of the International Centre for the Study of the Preservation and the Restoration of Cultural Property (ICCROM), as authorized by the General Assembly in December 1980.<sup>(3)</sup> (For list of member organizations, see APPENDIX III.)

The United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board, charged with overseeing the pension system for staff of the United Nations and the other participating agencies, held its twenty-ninth session at Geneva from 22 June to 3 July at the headquarters of the World Health Organization. The Board's annual report to the General Assembly<sup>(2)</sup> contained, in addition to recommendations for Assembly action (see below): the Fund's audited accounts for 1980, and the report of the Board of Auditors thereon (p. 1345); a summary of Fund investments (p. 1348); statistics on the operation of the Fund in 1980; estimates of administrative expenses (p. 1346); the Board's discussion of a special index for pensioners (p. 1347); and the actuarial valuation of the Fund (see below). The Board also reported on other matters referred to it by the Assembly, including requirements for proof of residence for pensioners (p. 1348) and provisions for admission as a member organization of the Fund (p. 1352).

On 10 December 1981, following consideration of the Board's recommendations and a report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ),<sup>(1)</sup> the General Assembly adopted six resolutions on pension matters. By the first of them,<sup>(4)</sup> submitted by the Board, supplementary benefits for certain pensioners were approved, a $100,000 contribution was authorized for the Emergency Fund for pensioners facing hardships and administrative expenses for 1982 were approved

(p. 1346). The Assembly's Fifth Committee had approved this text without vote on 23 November and the Assembly adopted the final version in the same manner.

By the next two resolutions, the Assembly requested studies of alternatives to improve the Fund's actuarial balance<sup>(5)</sup> and of the financial obligations of a pensioner to his or her spouse or former spouse.<sup>(6)</sup> The three other resolutions dealt with the Fund's investments.

General Assembly resolution 36/118A

Adopted without vote Meeting 93 10 December 1981

Approved by Fifth Committee (A/36/773) without vote, 23 November (meeting 50); draft by UNJSPB (A/36/9); agenda item 109.

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board to the General Assembly and to the member organizations of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund for 1981, chapter iii of the report of the International Civil Service Commission and the related report of the Advisory Committee Administrative and Budgetary Questions.

Supplementary measures

Decides, with effect from 1 January 1982, to revise the pension adjustment system contained in General Assembly resolution 35/215 of 17 December 1980, in accordance with the recommendations of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board contained in section III. H of its report to the Assembly for 1981;

II

Emergency Fund

Authorizes the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board to supplement the voluntary contributions to the Emergency Fund for a further period of one year by an amount not exceeding $100,000;

iii

Administrative expenses

Approves expenses, chargeable directly to the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund, totalling $5,456,900 (net) for 1982 and supplementary expenses of $147,000 (net) for 1981 for the administration of the Fund.

Financial situation

The biennial actuarial valuation of the Pension Fund as at 31 December 1980, summarized in the Pension Board's 1981 report,<sup>(4)</sup> indicated that the current contribution rate would be insufficient in the long run to meet the Fund's obligations. (Contributions continued to be made at the rate of 21 per cent of pensionable remuneration- the portion of staff salaries from which pension benefits and contributions are calculated- of which the staff paid one third and their organizations two thirds.) Depending on assumptions made as to future rates of inflation and returns on investment, the contribution rate needed to restore the actuarial balance between the Fund's prospective assets and liabilities ranged from approximately 22.5 to 27.8 per cent of pensionable remuneration.

The report stated that this indicated a serious deterioration since the previous valuation, as at 31 December 1978, which had shown contribution requirements ranging from 20.1 to 24 per cent. That deterioration was attributable partly to a more conservative assumption as to the future real rate of return on investments net of inflation, and partly to the fact that large increases in pensionable remuneration (p. 1352) and in pensions had not been completely offset by the Fund's investment experience. Moreover, the valuation results did not reflect the extra cost of modifications in the system for adjusting pensions to cost-of-living changes, adopted by the General Assembly in December 1980.<sup>(5)</sup>

The Board's Committee of Actuaries pointed out that projections beyond the 30-year period of the valuation showed that the Fund, after reaching a peak, would begin to decrease and eventually become depleted. It also emphasized the seriousness of the Fund's financial condition, necessitating immediate action, and suggested a number of remedial measures.

The Board discussed these options, which included: reviewing the current practice of refunding half their contributions to organizations in respect of participants who withdrew before completing five years of pensionable service; raising the interest rate used in calculating the lump-sum withdrawal which pensioners may make on commencing retirement (thereby reducing the amount of the lump sum); reducing the rate of entitlement accumulation (currently 2 per cent of pensionable remuneration for each year of service); and recruiting younger staff. The Board decided that in 1982 it would analyse these measures and review the provisions of an article of the Fund's Regulations concerning deficiency payments, in order to make recommendations to the Assembly.

In its October 1981 report on the Pension Fund,<sup>(3)</sup> ACABQ also stressed the need for early action and, after considering additional information from the Consulting Actuary, noted that the worsening actuarial position of the Fund was due mainly to salaries and benefits rising faster than had been assumed in 1978. It cited figures showing that the actuarial imbalance had increased from $121.7 million as at 31 December 1978 to $722.1 million as at 31 December 1980, based on a number of assumptions about inflation, interest rates and number of participants.

While acknowledging that increasing the contribution rate or authorizing deficiency payments would restore the Fund's actuarial balance, ACABQ believed the Board should seek alternative solutions. One way to improve the actuarial position would be to raise the retirement age (p. 1352) from 60 to 62, thereby reducing the actuarial imbalance by more than $300 million.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 10 December, in a resolution adopted without vote,<sup>(6)</sup> the General Assembly welcomed the Pension Board's intended analysis of all possible measures to improve the actuarial balance and requested it, in co-operation with the International Civil Service Commission (ICSC) where necessary, to consider alternative courses of action. The Assembly also requested that the analysis take into account all views expressed in the Fifth Committee and that it be submitted to the Assembly in 1982.

On 23 November, also without vote, the Fifth Committee had approved the draft, sponsored by Egypt. The text was put forward after consultations on four draft decisions, subsequently withdrawn, submitted separately by Belgium, the USSR and the United States (two).

Belgium's draft<sup>(1)</sup> would have had the Assembly request the Board to study the situation where staff members otherwise eligible for participation in the Fund were excluded. Details would have been requested on the categories of staff involved, their numbers and reasons for exclusion, contributions lost to the Fund and the actuarial implications. After this proposal was withdrawn, Belgium said it had been assured that the study to be undertaken by the Board would consider the four points mentioned in the Belgian proposal.

The USSR text<sup>(2)</sup> would have had the Assembly propose that the Board and ICSC urgently compare United Nations pensions with those of national civil servants in countries where Fund member organizations were headquartered. Introducing the proposal, the USSR expressed hope that the Board would emphasize the need to make good the actuarial deficit by adjusting benefits.

The two United States drafts proposed a study on raising the retirement age (p. 1352) and requested a report on arrangements for furnishing proof of pensioners' residence (p. 1348).

During the discussion in the Fifth Committee, general concern was expressed about the deteriorating financial situation of the Pension Fund and various suggestions were put forward to solve the problem. Austria and Canada stressed that the system's financial soundness, especially the Fund's worsening actuarial position, would have to be dealt with promptly. New Zealand urged the Board to recommend specific remedies in 1982.

A number of delegations opposed increasing contribution rates to meet the deficit, particularly contributions made indirectly by States through their share of the budgets of participating organizations. Belgium said neither Governments nor the participating organizations would agree to higher assessments, while Canada preferred the actuarial problem to be resolved by measures other than increasing the contribution rate of States. Spain hoped the Board would not recommend increases for staff members or agencies. The United States did not favour any increase in staff or government contributions or any cut in benefits.

The USSR rejected any review of the practice of refunding to organizations half their contributions in respect of participants who withdrew before completing five years of pensionable service and said that a plan to retain all of that sum would be doubly discriminatory.

Concern was also voiced over the possibility of invoking the provisions of the article of the Fund Regulations whereby each member organization would make additional payments to make good any deficiency. Austria, Italy, Spain and the United Kingdom hoped this would not be necessary, while the USSR rejected any review of the article which might call for additional contributions by States.

The Byelorussian SSR, Japan and the USSR believed benefits were over-generous. The Byelorussian SSR urged the Board to consider discontinuing any liberalization of retirement benefits pending rectification of the actuarial situation; it also supported a USSR suggestion that United Nations pensions be compared with those paid to corresponding levels of national civil services, which the USSR said were significantly lower than those of the United Nations. Japan suggested that the Board consider cutting back on benefits by reducing the length of contributory service. The United Kingdom opposed further liberalization of benefits until the actuarial balance was restored and thought the frequency of cost-of-living adjustments might be reduced.

Although supporting the resolution, Morocco said there could be no question about asking the Board and ICSC to solve the problem; requesting them to recommend courses of action implied that those measures would be acceptable.

The USSR said it was not surprising that proposals to increase pensions were made in the Pension Board, since two thirds of its members were staff representatives; it suggested that the Board be composed of an equal number of staff and representatives of intergovernmental bodies, with equitable geographical distribution among the five major regions. A similar suggestion was made by the Byelorussian SSR.

As one possible means to reduce the actuarial deficit, Belgium proposed putting a ceiling on payments to staff members at the highest grade. The United States said new benefits had been introduced without a commensurate increase in new contributions, and it mentioned a number of possible actions to reduce benefit payments.

Commenting on its proposal, later withdrawn, for a study of the circumstances under which individuals had been excluded from participation in the Fund, Belgium remarked that the Fund should include all qualified persons and organizations. The USSR, however, thought that increasing the number of participants would increase the deficit.

The possibility of raising the retirement age in order to improve the Fund's actuarial balance was also discussed (p. 1353).

General Assembly resolution 36/118 B

Adopted without vote Meeting 93 10 December
Approved by Fifth Committee (A/36/773) without vote. 23 November (meeting 50); draft by Egypt (A/C.5/36/L.13); agenda item 109.

The General Assembly,
Recognizing the actuarial situation of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund.

We/coming the intention of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board to undertake a comprehensive analysis of all possible measures to improve the actuarial balance of the Fund,

1. Requests the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board, in co-operation with the International Civil Service Commission where necessary, to consider alternative courses of action that might be taken:

2. Further requests that the analysis to be undertaken take into account all the views expressed during the discussion in the Fifth Committee and that it be submitted to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session.

Accounts

The Board of Auditors made three suggestions on accounting practices to the Pension Board in 1981. It called for preparation of a finance manual, for follow-up to ensure that action was taken when organizations delayed their monthly remittances to the Pension Fund, and for establishing a deadline on the submission of annual financial statements to the Board. The Auditors' report on the Pension Fund for 1980 was annexed to the Board's 1981 report to the General Assembly.<sup>(2)</sup>

In its October report on the pension system,<sup>(1)</sup> ACABQ said it had been informed by representatives of the Secretary-General that the United Nations made every effort to pay its contribution by the tenth of each month but that delays occurred from time to time due to cash-flow difficulties attributable to the late receipt from Member States of their assessed budgetary contributions. The Fund's loss of interest in those cases had been compensated by offsetting delays in Fund payments to the United Nations, except that in 1980 the offsets had not matched the Fund's losses. Commenting on a Board suggestion that the United Nations consider raising the amount of its $130,000 deposit with the Fund to compensate for these interest losses, ACABQ said the question should be studied in the context of the cash-flow difficulties experienced by the United Nations and other organizations.

Administrative expenses

On 10 December 1981, in the resolution on the Pension Fund submitted by the Pension Board,<sup>(4)</sup> the General Assembly approved exchangeable to the Fund, totalling $5,456,900 (net) for administration of the Fund in 1982. It also approved supplementary expenses of $147,700 (net) for 1981, raising to $4,870,200 the amount originally approved by the Assembly in December 1980.<sup>(3)</sup>

In proposing these sums,<sup>(2)</sup> the Board explained that the 1981 supplement was needed to pay higher investment advisory fees due to the increased value of the Fund's portfolio, which also accounted for the bulk of resource growth in 1982. The 1982 figure consisted of $3,246,000 in investment costs and $2,210,900 in administrative costs, covering a permanent staff of 88, the same as in 1981. Approval of these expenses was recommended by ACABQ.<sup>(1)</sup>

Resolutions: GA: <sup>(3)</sup>35/215A, sect. VI, 17 Dec. 1980 (YUN 1980, p. 1186); <sup>(4)</sup>36/118 A, sect. III, 10 Dec. 1981 (p. 1343).

Contributions to the Emergency Fund

The General Assembly, in its resolution of 10 December 1981<sup>(3)</sup> proposed by the Pension Board,<sup>(2)</sup> authorized the Board to supplement voluntary contributions to its Emergency Fund by up to $100,000 for an additional year. The proposal had the endorsement of ACABQ.<sup>(1)</sup> The Emergency Fund, established by the Board in 1973 and financed by voluntary contributions from member organizations, staff associations and individuals for the purpose of alleviating hardship among pensioners, had been used to provide aid in individual cases of proven emergency due to illness, infirmity or similar causes. The Assembly had authorized the Board each year since 1974 to supplement the contributions by $100,000. Payments by the Fund in 1981 amounted to about $47,000.

Benefits

Supplementary payments. Measures to alleviate the situation of pensioners whose retirement in the early years of the Pension Fund resulted in inadequate pensions were approved by the General Assembly in its resolution of 10 December 1981 proposed by the Pension Board.<sup>(4)</sup> Two measures were approved, applying to retirement and disability benefits of those who had retired before 1961: (a) pensioners 75 or older on 1 January 1982 whose annual pension on that date was below half of the net base salary of a Professional staff member at the lowest level (P-1, step 1) were to receive a thirteenth monthly payment every year, from 1982; and (b) pensioners receiving benefits which began before 1961 and amounted to less than $4,000 on 1 January 1982 were to receive the special adjustments for small pensions introduced on 1 January 1981, even though their benefits were based on fewer than 15 years of contributory service.

The Board's proposals were made in response to a request of the General Assembly,<sup>(3)</sup> made in December 1980 when it approved a change in the post-retirement pension adjustment system to benefit persons receiving an annual pension of less than $4,000 after 15 or more years' service.<sup>(5)</sup> According to the Board's 1981 report to the General Assembly,<sup>(2)</sup> the Fund's Consulting Actuary estimated the annual cost of the proposed measures at about $200,000 and said this would have no meaningful effect on the actuarial balance. The Board took no decision on how to finance the cost.

After considering the proposals, ACABQ said it had no objection to the Board's proposals on supplementary payments but did not believe they should be financed by the Emergency Fund (see above), as had been suggested in the Board.<sup>(1)</sup>

When the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee discussed pensions, several countries supported supplementary payments. Austria said the proposal reflected a concern for meeting pressing social needs first. Belgium thought there was a moral obligation to improve modest pensions. In Canada's view, this was a legitimate social concern and it was only just that the United Nations rectify the situation by introducing temporary relief measures. Spain had no objection to such measures but said they should not be financed from the Emergency Fund. The United Kingdom supported the proposal as a transitional measure whose cost would be insignificant in relation to the Fund's actuarial imbalance.

Expressing some reservations, the Federal Republic of Germany said the measures should apply only to pensioners who had no source of income other than their United Nations pensions. Japan said it was reluctant to support supplementary payments because they would set a precedent for other temporary measures.

Special index for pensioners. The International Civil Service Commission (ICSC) initiated in 1981 a study of factors required to elaborate a special index that would be used in calculating an increased pension entitlement for persons residing in a country where the cost of living was substantially higher than in New York. The task of elaborating this index, including the impact of national taxation, was assigned to ICSC, in co-operation with the Pension Board,<sup>(4)</sup> when the General Assembly, in December 1980, decided to authorize such a differential in high-cost countries, effective 1 January 1981.<sup>(5)</sup> Pending application of a special index, pensions of persons retired from the Professional and higher categories were being adjusted according to a comparison between the post adjustment (cost-of-living differential) paid in New York and that paid in the retiree's country of residence, while pensions of General Service retirees were adjusted according to a salary comparison between the duty station and the country of residence.

After initial consideration of the matter in 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> ICSC concluded that it needed more time in view of the complexities involved. It therefore requested its secretariat, in co-operation with that of the Pension Board, to study the issues and make proposals to be forwarded to the Board for comment. The results would be considered by ICSC in 1982, after which recommendations could be made to the Assembly to take effect on 1 January 1983. At that time, the pensions of all retirees, regardless of date of retirement, in countries where the cost-of-living differential was applied would be recalculated. Since early 1981, when the revised pension system went into effect, this differential had been applied in some 30 countries, the ICSC Chairman informed the Assembly's Fifth Committee.

This matter was also a major subject at the June/July 1981 session of the Pension Board,<sup>(2)</sup> which considered alternatives for determining cost-of-living differentials and for calculating gross pensions in local currency. No conclusions were reached pending receipt of the ICSC recommendations.

On 18 December, in its resolution on the work of ICSC,<sup>(3)</sup> the Assembly requested the Commission to give high priority to completing the elaboration of a special index for pensioners.

During the discussion in the Fifth Committee on the work of ICSC, Austria and Yugoslavia agreed with the Commission that more time was needed before recommendations on a special index could be submitted to the Assembly, but added that proposals should be submitted in 1982. Canada also looked forward to hearing ICSC proposals in 1982. New Zealand attached high priority to the development of a special index. Spain believed the index would be of great value in deciding on pension adjustments in individual cases; it supported the ICSC decision that all pensions, regardless of retirement date, would be recalculated in accordance with the index.

The USSR also regarded preparation of the index as a high-priority matter and favoured reducing the current cost-of-living differential in countries with low tax rates. The United States was concerned that the study was becoming too complicated, as it tried to take into account State and local taxes throughout the world; it trusted that the outcome would not be additions for high-tax areas but rather deductions for areas with low taxation.

Protection of spouses. On 10 December 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the General Assembly adopted without vote a resolution by which it noted that the Pension Fund Regulations and Rules contained no provision on the financial obligations of a pensioner to his or her spouse or former spouse. It requested the Pension Board to study in 1982 the desirability and feasibility of measures to deal with such situations and to make recommendations to the Assembly.

The resolution was adopted on a revised draft by Belgium, Kenya and the United States, including an oral drafting change by the sponsors, which the Fifth Committee had approved without vote on 23 November.

The United States, introducing the draft to the Committee, expressed the view that the Pension Fund should have a provision similar to that in the United States civil service, which allowed for garnishment of a pension when an estranged spouse or former spouse received no financial assistance from a pensioner.

Australia, Egypt and Greece said they had approved the text on the understanding that the Board should take account of national laws in its study of this matter. Morocco also supported it, saying that it was closer to the Moroccan legal régime and to Islamic morality with regard to the status of spouses.

General Assembly resolution 36/118 C

Adopted without vote Meeting 93 10 December 1981

The General Assembly,

Noting that no provision exists under the Regulations and Rules of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund with respect to the financial obligations of a pensioner to his or her spouse or former spouse,

Concerned that this may give rise to serious injustice and hardship,

Requests the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board to study, at its thirtieth session, the desirability and feasibility of measures to deal with such situations and to make recommendations thereon to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session.

Determination of pensioners' residence. In response to a December 1980 request by the General Assembly,<sup>(3)</sup> the Pension Board, at its June/July 1981 session,<sup>(2)</sup> agreed on a definition of residence for pension purposes and on a system of verifying a pensioner's residence. Residence was defined as the place of a pensioner's "primary home and habitual abode". The Board said a reliable indication of residence would be the test of tax treatment, as most national tax systems distinguished between residents and non-residents. However, because of different definitions for tax purposes, a person could be a resident simultaneously in more than one country. Thus, other evidence would have to be sought, but its nature could not be prescribed uniformly as it depended on the laws and institutions of each country.

Responding to the Assembly's question as to the feasibility of prorating payments for pensioners who spent a significant part of a year away from the stipulated country of residence, the Board concluded that this would not be feasible as it would conflict with the primary purpose of pension adjustments.

In the Fifth Committee in November, the United States submitted but later withdrew a draft decision calling for a Pension Board report in 1982 on the application of the definition of residence and on the operation of arrangements to furnish proof.<sup>(1)</sup>

Spain, speaking during the Committee's discussion of pensions, endorsed the Board's definition of residence but said that more work was needed on verification of proof of residence so as to rule out unreasonable and opportunistic claims and establish appropriate limits. Welcoming the current study on determining residence, the United States hoped the Pension Fund secretariat would pay close attention to proofs of residence and would pay the base dollar pension when a pensioner could not conclusively prove that he was living in a high-cost country. Uruguay said it was essential to effect without delay the revised system for adjusting pensions according to country of residence.

Investments

The Pension Board informed the General Assembly in its 1981 report<sup>(1)</sup> that the Pension Fund's investments had a market value of $2,495 million at 31 March 1981, up from $1,875 million a year previously. The investment return in the year ended 31 March 1981 had been 26.6 per cent, reflecting unusual strength in most equity (stock) and bond markets and the fact that the year had started from an especially low base. This figure compared with a return of minus 0.39 per cent for the previous year, and an average of 6.35 per cent per annum over 21 years. Over that period, the Fund's average annual return on United States equities had been 7.4 per cent, while those outside the United States had provided 8.82 per cent and bonds 4.79 per cent.

In December, the General Assembly adopted three resolutions on Pension Fund investments. Two dealt with diversifying investments in developing countries (see below) and the third with investments in States members of the Organization of African Unity (p. 1350).

Investments in developing countries. The Pension Board, reviewing in its 1981 report<sup>(2)</sup> the investment of Pension Fund assets in developing countries, noted that resources placed in development-related securities had increased over the year ended 31 March and that additional investments had been made in major development institutions and in issues of developing countries previously represented in the portfolio. The Board welcomed what it characterized as significant progress in increasing such investments, in compliance with the requirements of safety, profitability, liquidity and convertibility. With regard to reinvestment in developing countries of funds held in transnational corporations (TNCs)—called for by the Assembly in previous years— the Board noted difficulties arising from the lack of a clear or officially accepted definition of the term and the fact that virtually all areas of economic activity which provided expectations of good investment returns had some involvement in international business.

The Secretary-General, in an October report to the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee on Pension Fund investments, (1) reviewed investment policies, provided information on the size and growth of investments, and indicated progress made in implementing Assembly resolutions on the subject. As at 30 June, it said, investments in development-related securities amounted to $392 million, representing 18 per cent of the total Fund (up from 16 per cent) and a 28 per cent increase over the $306 million of a year earlier. The proportion of development-related bond issues had increased from $300 million to $366 million, or from 35 to 37 per cent of the bond portfolio. Investments made directly in developing countries, as opposed to those in regional development banks, stood at $133 million compared with $81 million on 30 June 1980. New bond investments had been made in Indonesia, Jamaica, Kenya, Panama, Thailand and Zimbabwe, and equity investments in Malaysia, Mexico, Papua New Guinea and Singapore.

Concerning investment in TNCs, the Secretary-General said it had been largely those investments which had provided the best contributions to the Fund's investment return, and divesting any large share of the Fund could not be done without disruption and probable loss. In view of the flow of new money into the Fund, increased investment in developing countries did not necessarily require that existing investments be sold. In the circumstances, actions during the year were considered to conform to the prudent balance called for by Assembly resolutions. The Fund would continue to focus on increasing investment in developing countries in accordance with the basic criteria to which its investments must adhere and on the basis of a prudent overall investment strategy.

On 10 December, acting without vote, the General Assembly adopted two resolutions on Pension Fund investments in developing countries.

By the first, it reaffirmed confidence in the Secretary-General as trustee of the Fund's assets and endorsed the policy of diversification of its investments in developing countries, wherever that served the interests of participants and beneficiaries, in accordance with the four criteria of safety, profitability, liquidity and convertibility.<sup>(4)</sup>

By the second resolution,<sup>(5)</sup> the Assembly, observing with satisfaction the increasing pace at which the Fund was investing in developing countries, commended the Secretary-General's work as trustee, and requested him to accelerate efforts to diversify the Fund's investments and to maintain consultations with the Investments Committee to ensure that investments in TNC shares would be reinvested in developing countries to the greatest extent practicable, subject to observance of the four criteria, and in conformity with the Fund's Regulations. The Assembly requested him to report on those efforts in 1982.

Both resolutions had been approved without vote by the Fifth Committee. The first, introduced by the United Kingdom on behalf of the European Community (EC) members and later revised by them to reflect changes suggested by the United Republic of Cameroon, was approved by the Committee on 23 November. The second, introduced by Cuba, was also sponsored by Barbados, Costa Rica, Guinea, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Mexico, Panama and Peru, and was approved on 19 November.

Introducing the first resolution, the United Kingdom said it was designed merely to indicate that the Secretary-General's report was consistent with the Assembly's intentions.

In explanation of its position, Ghana said it would have abstained in a vote on the resolution because it could not accept the false hypothesis on which it was based— that only investments in developing countries were risky.

Explaining its position on the text introduced by Cuba, Canada welcomed the changes made over the past two years in resolutions on Pension Fund investments and said it had supported the current text in the desire to protect the interests of the Fund and its participants. Sweden, agreeing with the main provisions, said it supported diversification of investments provided that no particular type of investment suffered and it agreed to more investments in developing countries provided that no particular type of investment was prejudiced, but the Secretary-General should determine how those objectives should be met. Australia endorsed the statements by Canada and Sweden. The United Kingdom, on behalf of the EC members, said they had supported the resolution because it was more moderately worded than one submitted to the Assembly in 1980<sup>(3)</sup> and because it indicated the need to observe the requirements of safety, profitability, liquidity and convertibility.

Several delegations in the Fifth Committee expressed support for the Pension Fund's investing in developing countries. The Byelorussian SSR noted with satisfaction the growth of investments in those countries, particularly in Africa, and said that investment diversification enabled the four criteria to be satisfied. Congratulating the Secretary-General on the increasing rate of investments in developing countries, Panama stated that fears expressed in the Committee 'regarding the safety of such investments were unjustified since the custodians could only invest where the four criteria were met. Also emphasizing the importance of meeting the criteria, Spain reaffirmed its view that, provided those basic conditions were guaranteed, preference should be given to investment in developing countries, thus contributing to one of the Organization's most important objectives.

Among those countries critical of current investment policies, Cuba considered that the volume of investment in TNCs was still very high. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya welcomed the increase of investments in developing countries but pointed to a gap between the amount invested in TNCs and that invested in developing countries. Yugoslavia said the Investments Committee should increase investments in developing countries while taking into account the preference of many such countries for capital assistance on a concessionary basis. Zaire said that investments made in developing countries remained very modest.

Morocco stated that, as two thirds of Pension Fund resources came from States, it was not surprising that they should seek to guide to some extent the way in which those resources were invested; if more trust was placed in TNCs than in States, no real intergovernmental work was being done. The USSR said the Fund should invest in the most reliable areas and those which yielded the greatest return, an approach that should by no means preclude an increase in developing countries.

Benin, the Congo, Ecuador, Ethiopia, Iraq, the Ivory Coast, Kenya, Poland, Romania, Rwanda, Sierra Leone and Tunisia expressed support for the resolution on reinvestment of the Fund's resources invested in TNCs.

Certain delegations, while supporting diversification of investments in developing countries, emphasized that other points should be considered in investment strategy. Austria endorsed the resolution on priority for investment in developing countries when the four criteria were satisfied but expressed reservations about calling on the Secretary-General to reinvest in developing countries the resources invested in TNCs since that would require the liquidation of previous investments, possibly some of the most profitable. The United States was pleased that the Secretary-General, while increasing investments in developing countries, had continued to stress safety and profitability; it felt he should not be requested to invest in developing countries or anywhere else, since he alone was responsible for the Fund's investments.

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 31/197 of 22 December 1976, 32/73 A of 9 December 1977, 33/121 A of 19 December 1978, 34/222 A of 20 December 1979 and 35/216 B of 17 December 1980,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the investments of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund, Observing with satisfaction the increasing pace at which the Fund is making investments in developing countries.

1. Commends the work of the Secretary-General as trustee of the assets of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to continue and accelerate the efforts to diversify the investments of the Fund, and to maintain the consultations initiated with the Investments Committee in order to ensure that the resources which the Fund holds invested in shares of transnational corporations shall be reinvested in developing countries to the greatest extent practicable, subject to observance of the criteria of safety, profitability, liquidity and convertibility, and in conformity with the Regulations of the Fund;

3. Further requests the Secretary-General to report on those efforts to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session.

Investments in Africa. The Secretary-General, in his October 1981 report on the Pension Fund's investments,<sup>(1)</sup> said its investments in Africa had increased from $24 million as at 30 June 1980 to $30.3 million as at 30 June 1981. In March, a letter had been sent to all countries of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) to obtain further information and assistance in locating investments meeting the criteria established by the General Assembly. For this purpose, liaison had been established with the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, as well as with private sources.

The Secretary-General reiterated two major constraints to speeding up investments in Africa. First, because of high interest rates, international bond markets had remained unattractive to African Governments as a source of funds; consequently, few public issues had been offered in those markets during the year. Second, restrictions existed which made it difficult for foreign portfolio investors such as the Fund to invest in African domestic capital markets. The investment staff and advisers would monitor opportunities to increase investment in Africa which met the criteria of the Fund.

On 10 December, the General Assembly adopted without vote a resolution<sup>(2)</sup> by which, expressing concern at the low level of Fund investments in OAU countries, it requested the Secretary-General to continue consultations with each OAU member, the African Development Bank and other financial institutions in Africa with a view to improving the level of investments in member States. He was asked for a further report in 1982.

This text, sponsored by 18 countries, most of them African, had been approved without vote by the Fifth Committee on 19 November.

In the Committee, the United Kingdom, speaking for the EC members, orally proposed the addition of the words "taking due account of the requirements of safety, profitability, liquidity and convertibility referred to in the preamble" to the paragraph calling for increased investments in OAU countries. Egypt, one of the sponsors, remarked that the amendment was redundant since the Assembly's criteria for investment still applied. The United Kingdom withdrew its proposal when the sponsors agreed to revise the second preambular paragraph, citing the view of the Pension Board that the four criteria "must be" (rather than "have been") observed.

Introducing the draft resolution, Zaire said the institutions mentioned in the text were sufficiently sound financially to guarantee the safety of the Fund's resources and to meet the four investment criteria.

During the Fifth Committee discussion, several African countries expressed support for investment in OAU countries. Benin said the African countries wished to participate fully in the operation of the Fund, especially with regard to investments. The Central African Republic pointed out that the draft resolution did not seek to give orders to the Secretary-General; it simply requested that investments be made in viable institutions in Africa, since in that way the Fund's assets would benefit the countries most in need of development resources. Kenya, expressing satisfaction at the progress made with respect to Fund investments in Africa, said such investments were protected by the Assembly's criteria and because the Governments of developing African countries in which such investments were placed safeguarded the funds.

In Morocco's view, investments in African countries should be increased since many of them had difficulty in finding resources in developed countries due to restrictions that were frequently political. Sierra Leone said that, by adopting the resolution, the international community would be expressing confidence in the capacity of the developing African States and their financial institutions to raise the level of living of their peoples.

Ecuador, Ethiopia, Iraq, the Ivory Coast, Mexico, Poland, Romania, Tunisia and Yugoslavia also expressed support for the resolution.

Some delegations mentioned the Secretary-General's efforts to improve investments in OAU countries. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya was pleased that he had asked OAU for further information and assistance in locating investments that met the Assembly's criteria. Zaire suggested that, to increase investments in Africa, a contact mission to the Governments concerned would be more useful than an exchange of correspondence. This idea was endorsed by Cuba. Yugoslavia, commending the Secretary-General's efforts to increase the Fund's investments in African and other developing countries, said more investments could be made there.

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 33/121 B of 19 December 1978, 34/222 B of 20 December 1979 and 35/216 C of 17 December 1980.

Taking into consideration the report of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board, in which the Board recognized that in spite of some constraints due to the behaviour of the market, the four criteria must be observed,

Concerned at the very low level of the investments made to date in the States members of the Organization of African Unity,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his consultations with each State member of the Organization of African Unity, the African Development Bank and other financial institutions in Africa with a view to improving the level of investments in member States;

2. Further requests the Secretary-General to report on this question to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session.

Admission of members to the Fund

The Pension Board, in response to a 1980 suggestion by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions that it review requirements for membership of organizations in the Fund,<sup>(2)</sup> agreed at its June/July 1981 session<sup>(1)</sup> that a pre-condition should be strict adherence to the United Nations common system in such areas as salaries and pensionable remuneration of the two major categories of staff (Professional and General Service), promotion policies and minimum retirement age. The Board concluded that there was no need to change the qualifications stipulated by article 3 (b) of the Fund's Regulations, requiring that a member be either a specialized agency or another international, intergovernmental organization participating in the United Nations common system of salaries, allowances and other conditions of service. The Board believed that approval by the General Assembly, following the Board's recommendation, was a sufficient safeguard for screening organizations seeking admission to the Fund.

The Board postponed until 1982 consideration of a membership application from the European and Mediterranean Plant Protection Organization, to await its action on a proposal that it join the common system.

Pensionable remuneration

The International Civil Service Commission (ICSC), in its 1981 report,<sup>(1)</sup> informed the General Assembly that the pensionable remuneration for staff in the Professional and higher categories—the portion of their pay counted in calculating their pension benefits and contributions—would rise from 117.9 per cent of gross salary to 128.2 per cent, effective 1 October 1981. This rise was the result of increases in both the weighted average of post adjustments index (based on cost-of-living adjustments at major duty stations throughout the United Nations system) and the United States consumer price index.

In the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee's discussion of the work of ICSC, Belgium said the increase in pensionable remuneration over the past eight years—at least 139 per cent since 1973 for staff at the P-5 level and above while the United States cost of living had risen by 75 per cent—was difficult to justify in the light of conditions in the United States civil service and the actuarial difficulties of the Pension Fund.

Report: <sup>(1)</sup>ICSC, A/36/30.

Retirement age

The Secretary-General informed the General Assembly, in his September 1981 report on the composition of the Secretariat,<sup>(3)</sup> that in conformity with requests by the Assembly in 1978<sup>(4)</sup> and 1980,<sup>(5)</sup> extensions of service beyond the mandatory retirement age of 60 had been granted since 1979 for up to six months only, and solely for the purpose of finding replacements for retiring staff, with the exception of staff with special language requirements and General Service staff with special technical skills. According to tables in the report, between 1977 and 1981 the number of staff in geographic posts (P-1 to D-2 levels) retained in service beyond the age of 60 (as at 30 June) fell from 78 to 26, the number in language posts from 30 to 11, and those in other categories from 74 to 24, for a total reduction from 182 staff members in 1977 to 61 in 1981. However, the total in 1981 increased from 49 in 1980, mostly in the General Service and related categories.

The Joint Inspection Unit (JIU), in its August 1981 report on geographical distribution of the Secretariat (p. 1317), recommended that extension beyond retirement age be limited to three months and granted only when time was needed to find a replacement. However, the Secretary-General, in comments on this report, said such an action would unnecessarily restrict his authority to extend the limit in exceptional circumstances.

The possibility of raising the mandatory retirement age was mentioned by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions in its October report on pensions.<sup>(2)</sup> It said it had been informed that such action would be one way to improve the actuarial position of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund (p. 1343). It understood that if all participating organizations followed the practice of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, which had a retirement age of 62, the actuarial imbalance would be reduced by more than $300 million.

In the General Assembly's Fifth Committee, the United States submitted a draft resolution, which it later revised and then withdrew, to have the Assembly welcome the intention of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board to undertake a comprehensive analysis of all measures which could restore the Fund's actuarial balance, and request the Board, in co-operation with ICSC, to consider recommendations that might be taken to increase the statutory retirement age. Introducing the revised draft,<sup>(1)</sup> the United States pointed out that it had been reworded so as to delete mention of a specific retirement age (65 in the original version); it added that the purpose was to restore the actuarial balance, not to force staff to retire later or lose any acquired rights. At the suggestion of the Committee Chairman, the United States later withdrew the draft when Egypt submitted another more broadly based text—subsequently adopted<sup>(6)</sup>—calling for a review of alternatives to improve the Fund's actuarial situation.

In the Committee's discussion on pensions, Austria suggested a study of the possibility of raising the retirement age for some categories of staff not subject to geographical distribution, such as General Service and language staff. Belgium said raising the retirement age not only would reduce the actuarial deficit, but would also have the advantage of limiting abuses resulting from the age-limit of 60, such as undeserved promotion to the grade of Assistant Secretary-General. Spain said the current retirement age was low and often resulted in retirement at the very time a staff member could be most useful to the Organization.

Reservations about raising the retirement age were voiced in the Committee's debates on pensions and on personnel policies. Austria said the right of staff to retire at 60 must not be denied. Hungary and Suriname did not agree to the suggestion to raise the retirement age to 65. Japan could not support a higher retirement age, believing that it would have many negative effects on personnel policy. Malawi favoured standardization of the retirement age without necessarily raising the limit above 60. The Upper Volta doubted whether increasing the retirement age to 65 would be the best way of eliminating the Pension Fund's actuarial deficit and believed the effects of such a move on personnel matters should be studied. In Yugoslavia's view, such a measure would not improve the Fund's actuarial position, but would block the recycling of Secretariat personnel and hamper professional mobility.

Several States expressed concern about the effects a rise in the retirement age would have on the Secretariat's nationality balance. Greece said raising the retirement age would perpetuate geographical imbalances. Stressing the political impact of the United States draft resolution, Kenya, supported by Uganda, said that, whatever the results of the study, the principle of equitable geographical distribution must not be jeopardized. While expressing concern about the actuarial imbalance of the Pension Fund, the USSR said the proposal would lead to only a temporary improvement which would be followed by a sharper deterioration; its adoption would extend the service of staff holding permanent contracts and jeopardize the geographical distribution of posts.

Algeria and Yugoslavia preferred that a comprehensive study be carried out before the Committee was asked to decide on the matter. The Bahamas, however, considered the proposed study inadvisable because an analysis would not provide any new information, and Ghana questioned its timeliness.

The Federal Republic of Germany was among those favouring keeping to the minimum extensions beyond the established retirement age. Greece said that extensions beyond that age granted in 1981 could have been avoided if post vacancies had been announced well in advance. Mauritania and Mongolia were among those sharing the view of JIU on the subject. The Syrian Arab Republic called for the statutory retirement age to be respected strictly. Uganda expressed the view that more could have been done to enforce the mandatory age by beginning to seek a replacement well before a staff member retired.

Other staff questions

Privileges and immunities

The Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC), in its annual overview report for 1980/1981 submitted to the Economic and Social Council in May,<sup>(7)</sup> expressed concern at what it called the tendency of some countries to demonstrate contempt for international rules and practices, which could seriously affect the security and effectiveness of the international civil service. It recalled a statement it had adopted in 1980, expressing concern at measures against international civil servants which threatened their security and obstructed the discharge of their duties.<sup>(19)</sup>

In November 1981, the Secretary-General submitted a report,<sup>(10)</sup> requested by the General Assembly in December 1980,<sup>(14)</sup> on cases in which the international status of staff of the United Nations or the specialized agencies had not been fully respected. The report used a definition of "cases" approved by ACC on 14 April 1981,<sup>(16)</sup> relating to instances where a verified breach of a staff member's status had occurred and had not been remedied by the Government concerned. The law on this matter, ACC said, should consist principally of the Charter of the United Nations and other constituent instruments of the organizations concerned, the 1946 Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations,<sup>(11)</sup> the 1947 Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies,<sup>(12)</sup> the 1959 Agreement on the Privileges and Immunities of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the various headquarters agreements, the Standard Basic Assistance Agreements of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and the practice developed in implementing those agreements.

The report, based in part on information from these organizations, gave details of 47 cases of arrest, detention or disappearance, as follows: United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA)—26 cases in the Gaza Strip, the West Bank, Jordan and the Syrian Arab Republic, including one staff member recently sentenced in the West Bank and, in the Syrian Arab Republic, one currently detained and one missing; UNDP—11 cases in Poland, Uganda and the United Arab Emirates, including one imprisoned in Poland since 1979; United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF)—3 cases in Afghanistan and Mozambique, including one currently detained; Economic Commission for Africa—4 cases in Ethiopia, including 2 currently detained and 1 missing after detention; Economic Commission for Latin America—2 earlier cases in Chile; United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO)—1 case in the German Democratic Republic, currently under arrest.

The report also mentioned restrictions imposed by Israel on the official travel of five UNRWA officials, and differences with Thailand over duty-free importation of automobiles by three officers with the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific.

Cited in the report was a January 1980 memorandum from the Assistant Secretary-General for General Services to the heads of United Nations offices away from Headquarters, stating that the United Nations had the right to visit and converse with an arrested staff member, to be apprised of the grounds for arrest or detention, to assist the staff member in arranging for legal counsel and to appear in legal proceedings to defend any United Nations interest.

In written comments to the General Assembly's Fifth Committee in October on various personnel matters,<sup>(8)</sup> the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations asked that the fate of staff who had been arrested or detained or had disappeared be drawn to the Assembly's attention, and urged reiteration of an appeal to Member States to respect the privileges and immunities of officials of United Nations organizations and the status of all international civil servants.

The staff organizations of the Secretariat, in their October report for the Committee,<sup>(9)</sup> proposed that diplomatic immunity, but not privileges, be accorded to all United Nations staff. They suggested that this be done through a protocol to the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, which, they noted, accorded such immunity only to staff at the Assistant Secretary-General level and above, and to experts on mission.

The number of parties to the Conventions on the privileges and immunities of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies remained unchanged during 1981 (p. 1243). Action was taken during 1981 to improve security measures for staff and premises of the United Nations system (p. 1383).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 18 December, the General Assembly, in a resolution on the privileges and immunities of United Nations system officials,<sup>(15)</sup> appealed to any Member State which had arrested or detained such a person to enable the Secretary-General or organization head to visit and converse with the staff member, to apprise himself of the grounds for arrest or detention, to enable him to assist in arranging for legal counsel and to recognize the functional immunity of a staff member as asserted by him in conformity with international law. The Secretary-General was asked to request information from other United Nations organizations on cases where there were clear indications that those principles or the status of staff had not been respected, and to report annually on cases in which he had been unable to exercise full responsibility for the protection of United Nations staff. The Assembly requested him and organization heads to ensure that staff observed their obligations in accordance with the staff rules and regulations and international conventions.

The resolution was adopted by a recorded vote of 117 to none, with 17 abstentions. On 11 December, the revised 19-nation draft, amended by Ethiopia and the German Democratic Republic with an oral sub-amendment by Sri Lanka, and further orally amended by Jordan, had been approved by the Fifth Committee by a recorded vote of 78 to none, with 27 abstentions.

The approved amendment by Ethiopia and the German Democratic Republic added a preambular paragraph recalling staff obligations, in the conduct of their duties, to observe the laws and regulations of States. It was adopted by 75 votes to 8, with 17 abstentions, after its sponsors accepted an oral proposal by Sri Lanka-supported by Morocco- that the paragraph be added to the text rather than replace one recalling that the International Court of Justice had held (in a 1949 advisory opinion<sup>(17)</sup>) that international organizations had the power and responsibility to protect their staff.

The Jordanian amendments, supported by Morocco, were accepted by the resolution's sponsors. Among other things, they: added to the last preambular paragraph-recalling that staff of specialized agencies enjoyed privileges and immunities similar to those of the United Nations- the phrase "in accordance with the instruments mentioned in the second preambular paragraph above" (a reference to conventions on privileges and immunities and agreements with host Governments); added references to these instruments in paragraphs 1 and 4; deleted from paragraph 1 the words "whether internationally or locally recruited" from the clause appealing for action by States in regard to arrested or detained staff; and, in paragraph 4, replaced a reference to the "inherent right and duty" of organization heads to protect their staff by the word "responsibility".

The amended paragraph 1-appealing to States to follow certain principles when they had arrested or detained a staff member-was approved by 70 votes to 14, with 17 abstentions. The amended paragraph 4-requesting an annual report-was approved by 72 votes to 14, with 16 abstentions.

Four other amendments by Ethiopia and the German Democratic Republic were rejected in Committee by recorded votes, taken at Ethiopia's request. They were as follows:

In the fourth preambular paragraph, to have the Assembly note the various positions of States on the role and responsibility of the Secretary-General and of agency heads (instead of the position consistently upheld by the United Nations) in the event of arrest and detention of United Nations staff-rejected by 51 votes to 21, with 25 abstentions; to replace paragraph 1 by an appeal that all Member States respect the privileges and immunities accorded United Nations officials by the 1946 and 1947 Conventions-rejected by 51 votes to 23, with 24 abstentions; in paragraph 3, to delete mention of the principles from the request that United Nations organizations inform the Secretary-General of cases where the principles in paragraph 1 or a staff member's status had not been respected, and to add a request that he report to the Assembly "whenever necessary"-rejected by 52 votes to 19, with 28 abstentions; and to delete paragraph 4, containing the request for an annual report from the Secretary-General-rejected by 59 votes to 20, with 23 abstentions.

The fourth preambular paragraph, unamended, was approved by 70 votes to 13, with 18 abstentions.

The Committee, by recorded votes, also rejected two amendments by Bulgaria:<sup>(5)</sup> to add a preambular paragraph stating that nothing in the resolution authorized the United Nations or the specialized agencies to intervene in matters essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State-rejected by 45 votes to 34, with 19 abstentions; and to delete a preambular paragraph expressing awareness of the necessity that staff be enabled to discharge tasks assigned by the Secretary-General without interference-rejected by 57 votes to 19, with 23 abstentions.

Three additional operative paragraphs proposed by the USSR<sup>(6)</sup> were rejected in Committee by recorded votes requested by New Zealand: an appeal that any Member State which had-arrested or detained a United Nations staff member enable an official of the Member State of which the staff member was a national to visit and converse with him, without prejudice to the 1963 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations<sup>(18)</sup> by 48 votes to 27, with 24 abstentions (the reference to the Vienna Convention was added to the amendment on an oral proposal by New Zealand which the USSR accepted); a request that the Secretary-General present in 1982 a comparative analysis of the levels of privileges and immunities enjoyed by staff in the States where United Nations organizations had their headquarters-rejected by 48 votes to 30, with 24 abstentions; and a decision that the privileges and immunities item be considered in 1982 by the Sixth (Legal) Committee-rejected by 45 votes to 31, with 25 abstentions.

The last amendment was proposed orally after the USSR withdrew an amendment to have the Assembly appeal to Member States in which the headquarters of the United Nations and the specialized agencies were located to ensure that the levels of privileges and immunities granted to staff members were raised to the most favourable existing level.

Amendments to the original draft resolution were not put to the vote after the revised text was submitted. They included amendments by: Bulgaria, to include a reference to Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter (on non-intervention in the domestic jurisdiction of a Member State);<sup>(1)</sup> Ethiopia, to mention the obligation of staff to refrain from abuses of privilege and to have the Secretary-General submit a report when he deemed necessary (rather than annually);<sup>(2)</sup> the German Democratic Republic, to state that the privileges and immunities of United Nations officials under Article 105 of the Charter were indispensable for a proper discharge of their duties, and to delete mention of the 1949 advisory opinion in which the International Court held that international organizations had the power and responsibility to protect their staff;<sup>(3)</sup> and the USSR, to add an appeal that an official from an arrested or detained staff member's State be enabled to visit him, a request for a comparative analysis of the levels of privileges and immunities enjoyed in different headquarters countries, and an appeal that host Governments raise that level to the most favourable of existing ones.<sup>(4)</sup>

The revised draft resolution incorporated four preambular paragraphs proposed to the original by the German Democratic Republic, mentioning Article 100 on the commitment of each Member State to respect the exclusively international character of staff members' responsibilities and the requirement that staff not seek or receive instructions from any external authority, reaffirming staff regulations, and citing the necessity that staff be enabled to discharge their duties without interference. The German Democratic Republic noted that these paragraphs had been taken from the 1980 Assembly resolution on the subject.<sup>(13)</sup> Also incorporated in the revised text, with modified wording, was a paragraph by Ethiopia requesting the Secretary-General to ensure that staff observed their obligations under the conventions on privileges and immunities and the staff rules and regulations.

The Netherlands, which introduced the draft resolution in its original and later revised forms, said the sponsors believed it necessary to reaffirm the responsibility of international organizations to protect their staff. The text did not cover acts performed in a personal capacity, nor was it intended to put any country on trial. The revised draft struck a balance between the need to protect the staff and the obligations with which they must comply. It extended no new immunities, nor did it extend the range of staff to whom those immunities applied; it merely reaffirmed existing commitments and powers.

In the Committee's debate, the United Nations Legal Counsel explained that most United Nations officials-including locally recruited salaried employees-were accorded functional rather than diplomatic immunity, meaning that the immunity attached not to the person but to official acts. Most violations cited in the Secretary-General's report involved cases in which the Secretary-General had been prevented from exercising his right under international instruments to determine independently whether an official act had been involved.

Explaining their abstentions on all amendments and the draft text as a whole, Algeria ascribed its position to the circumstances in which the debate had taken place while Egypt stated that it regarded the proposals as unbalanced. Brazil said it had abstained on the draft resolution because a number of issues required further legal study-a view shared by Yugoslavia, which voted in favour. Sierra Leone said its abstentions in all the votes reflected its view that the issues transcended administrative and budgetary questions and that the Fifth Committee could have benefited from the Sixth Committee's views.

Iraq said it had not participated in the vote as it considered a precipitate decision unwise; but, as the future host country of the Economic Commission for Western Asia (p. 672), it was providing every possible assistance to the United Nations and its staff.

Ethiopia, which voted for the resolution, expressed reservations on paragraphs 1 and 4. Jordan, also voting affirmatively, voiced dissatisfaction with the Secretary-General's report on the grounds that it used the term "east Jordan" instead of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, it made no reference to the fact that the West Bank had been an occupied territory since 1967, and it accused Jordan of violating various agreements without giving Jordan an opportunity to defend itself. Explaining its positive vote, Liberia said the resolution was well balanced and incorporated the views of various States.

A number of States expressed their views on individual provisions of the resolution and the amendments proposed to it.

Introducing the amendments it sponsored jointly with Ethiopia, the German Democratic Republic said they proposed to replace paragraph 1 because it provided for a procedure which, if accepted, would be a near violation of the sovereignty of Member States.

Several States explained their negative votes on the four rejected two-nation amendments. Canada said they would seriously dilute the Secretary-General's inherent rights and duties in respect of protection of the functional immunities of staff. The Netherlands said they would reverse the thrust of the resolution, depriving the Secretary-General of an opportunity to be active and dynamic in supporting the staff. Peru felt the resolution's sponsors had made every effort to arrive at consensus by accepting a number of changes. Spain said the sponsors would regard a vote for the amendments as a vote against their draft. The United States said the amendments sought to replace an important principle by a statement that varying views were held, and suggested that the Secretariat be stripped of the right to express concern about officials in difficulties, including trial or detention.

Chile abstained on paragraph 1, stating that it would have preferred a clearer statement that in no case did staff privileges and immunities affect the independence of national judiciaries or domestic laws. Malawi, which voted for the amendment to paragraph 1, reserved its position on the paragraph as approved. Mauritania abstained in the votes on the two-nation amendments, referring to its view that the proposals had legal implications which should be handled by the Sixth Committee.

Commenting on the one amendment by Ethiopia and the German Democratic Republic which the Committee approved, the United States, though voting against, said it had no difficulty with wording recalling the obligations of the staff, on the understanding that observance of those obligations was not a pre-condition to respect for privileges and immunities.

The USSR, speaking of its amendments proposing a comparative study of privileges and immunities in different headquarters cities and appealing to States to raise privileges and immunities to the most favourable existing level, said the privileges and immunities granted to international civil servants in Austria and Switzerland were much more extensive than those granted in New York.

The Netherlands regarded this proposed appeal as a new element best dealt with in a separate draft resolution. New Zealand thought the appeal would prejudice the results of the proposed study. The United States, which voted against the proposal for a study, said the requested analysis was similar to one made in 1974 and, as no substantial changes had occurred since then, it would be a waste of time.

Explaining their votes against the USSR amendment requesting that an official of an arrested staff member's country be allowed to visit him, Canada regarded it as redundant; Ghana said it might conflict with Article 100 of the Charter (on the international character of the staff); the Netherlands thought such a matter should be dealt with through bilateral contacts between the country of nationality and the host country, and the United States remarked that legal difficulties would arise where the State of nationality had no relations with the State with which the staff member had problems.

Four States explained their votes against the USSR amendment to have staff privileges and immunities discussed by the Sixth Committee beginning in 1982. Australia felt the amendment was procedurally incorrect; the Fifth Committee could not decide, but only recommend, that an item be considered by the Sixth Committee. Canada and Spain said that if the Sixth Committee were to deal with the item, it should consider only the legal aspects; personnel aspects should remain before the Fifth Committee. The Netherlands said the proposal ran counter to the earlier decision to discuss the matter in the Fifth Committee.

Bulgaria, introducing its amendments, said the draft resolution was one-sided; observance of privileges and immunities should not be at the expense of the rights of Member States.

Explaining why it had proposed to delete the reference to the advisory opinion of the International Court, the German Democratic Republic said it was inappropriate to refer to an opinion which the Assembly had never endorsed.

Before the voting, Iraq proposed that the matter be deferred until 1982 and submitted then to the Sixth Committee; it remarked that the Secretary-General's report contained misleading political connotations and the revised draft resolution would present Governments with problems of implementation. Iraq's proposal was supported by Algeria, Cuba, Democratic Yemen, Egypt, the German Democratic Republic, Mauritania, the United Arab Emirates and Yugoslavia; they felt that political and legal implications were involved and that unnecessary confrontation should be avoided. Sri Lanka thought a co-ordinated meeting of the Fifth and Sixth Committees should have been sought and that the resolution did not take full account of the laws of host countries.

A number of States explained their opposition to deferral. Barbados said deferral would erode the confidence of the staff and might result in prolonged imprisonment for those being held incommunicado. The latter point was echoed by Australia and Canada, with Canada adding that deferral would be an abdication by Member States of their responsibilities. France said the practical implications of the resolution merited immediate attention. Ghana saw the question as neutral since the resolution made no specific reference to any country or individual. Greece and Trinidad and Tobago felt that the matter was within the Fifth Committee's competence and the context of personnel questions. The United Kingdom concurred and was joined by Mexico and New Zealand in pointing out that lengthy consultations on the draft resolution had already taken place. Kenya saw no reason to defer, as the sponsors of the resolution had agreed to amendments that covered all matters of concern to Kenya.

Also opposing deferral, Spain said the resolution's adoption would provide the incoming Secretary-General with the means to take firm action to protect United Nations officials. Sweden was concerned that deferral might mean the question would not receive the consideration it merited. This position was shared by Australia, which added that the draft did no more than recall existing provisions. The United States felt that deferral would be a rebuff to the United Nations and its staff.

The Bahamas abstained on the Iraqi proposal but said immediate action should be taken to prevent further hardship for staff members.

After deciding, by 48 votes to 39, with 11 abstentions, to give priority to Iraq's proposal, the Committee rejected it by a recorded vote, requested by Canada, of 51 to 41, with 16 abstentions.

Also during the item's consideration, the United Kingdom, on behalf of the European Community (EC) members, proposed that a paper presented by the UNESCO Director-General to that body's Executive Board be distributed to the Committee. Subsequently, the United Kingdom withdrew the proposal, stating that this was in the interest of expediting the Committee's work. The proposal had been supported by the United States but opposed by the German Democratic Republic and the USSR on the grounds that no new facts had been presented and that the issue was not relevant to the item under discussion.

During the the Fifth Committee's discussion of personnel questions, the Committee heard a statement by a representative of staff organizations in the United Nations Secretariat (p. 1334), who said the Organization's effectiveness and authority were seriously compromised when the Secretary-General was unable to offer guarantees of protection to his staff.

Most speakers in the debate urged respect for staff privileges and immunities. Barbados and Liberia voiced disapproval of their infringement and urged all States to comply with their commitments and obligations. Mauritania pledged to abide by its commitment to respect staff privileges and immunities. Mexico remarked that, as all members of an organization had acceded to its constituent instrument, they must respect the guarantees established in the staff rules.

The Netherlands supported the Secretary-General's view that he should be able to converse with arrested or detained staff, be apprised of the charges against them, assist in arranging for legal counsel and be given the right to defend any United Nations interest in legal proceedings. Taking a similar position, Sweden, on behalf of the Nordic States, said the immunity of United Nations employees was an integral part of the characteristics of an independent international civil service. This view was shared by the United Kingdom, for the EC members, which added that only the Secretary-General or other organization head could determine whether particular acts had been performed in an official capacity. The United States observed that a violation of the immunity of an international civil servant was an attack on the United Nations.

The Byelorussian SSR expressed the view that the Secretary-General's report presented unclear and tendentious information and slandered some States. Czechoslovakia said it firmly opposed any interpretation of immunities that would allow staff to enjoy United Nations protection even if they had violated obligations imposed by the Charter. Ethiopia stated that, by abusing their privileges and immunities, staff were often a source of conflict and misunderstanding between an international organization and the host country; the best way to protect their rights was to establish a mechanism through which the host country and the organization could work to see that those rights were exercised solely for the work of the organization. The USSR said it favoured strengthening the privileges and immunities of international civil servants; however, the intelligence services of imperialist States recruited such persons, in flagrant violation of their status, for activities having nothing to do with international organizations.

India expressed the view that the practice of some countries which made supplementary payments to their nationals in the Secretariat (p. 1337) was a much more damaging violation of its international character than the small number of reported cases in which privileges and immunities had been violated. Jordan said it respected international law and conventions on privileges and immunities but did not think they covered violation of the laws of the host country by local citizens subject to those laws. Malawi thought the United Nations and related organizations should continue efforts to negotiate with the States concerned. The Syrian Arab Republic and the United Republic of Cameroon said they intended to respect all applicable instruments and hoped international civil servants would observe the regulations that guided their professional conduct.

Chile and Peru voiced reservations on the proposal by Secretariat staff organizations (p. 1354) to grant diplomatic immunity to all categories of staff; they believed this would give rise to abuses.

With regard to the case of Percy Stulz, Director of the Cultural Heritage Division of UNESCO who according to the Secretary-General's report had been detained and arrested while visiting his country, the German Democratic Republic, in March 1980—the representative of that country told the Fifth Committee that Mr. Stulz had been sentenced for anti-State activities performed on the instructions of a Western secret service, had submitted his resignation from UNESCO and had subsequently been released after serving two thirds of his prison term. A UNESCO representative informed the Committee that the organization had not been formally informed that Mr. Stulz had been freed, but in any case the State concerned should permit him to return to UNESCO headquarters either to resume work or to resign in conformity with the rules.

Regarding the detention of a locally recruited official of UNICEF in Afghanistan, that country's representative said that, as such a person was first of all a national of his country, the State's jurisdiction over him could not be disputed.

Israel, explaining its vote for the resolution, said that, whenever a staff member was arrested, it endeavoured to give prompt notice to UNRWA and the family concerned; it was unaware of cases in which an individual had been arrested or detained because of acts relating to his functions as a staff member.

Proposal for a single administrative tribunal

Responding to a 1979 General Assembly decision<sup>(1)</sup> the Secretary-General submitted a note to the Assembly in October 1981 on the feasibility of establishing a single administrative tribunal in the United Nations system.<sup>(3)</sup> Currently two judicial bodies, the United Nations Administrative Tribunal and the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation (ILO), heard and decided on grievances by staff against the administration.

In the note, the Secretary-General stated that ILO had sought the views of the intergovernmental organizations submitting to the jurisdiction of its Administrative Tribunal, concerning the broad lines along which harmonization between the two tribunals might be sought. The United Nations Office of Legal Affairs had also undertaken a study. As consultations were continuing between ILO and the United Nations, and as the International Court of Justice had been asked for an advisory opinion in respect of a judgement of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal (p. 1202), the Secretary-General suggested that the question be taken up at a future session.

On 18 December, the General Assembly, acting without vote, took note of the Secretary-General's note and requested him to report again in 1982.<sup>(2)</sup> On 9 December, the draft had been similarly approved by the Fifth Committee, as orally proposed by the Chairman.

Approved by Fifth Committee (A/36/838) without vote, 9 December (meeting 69); oral proposal by Chairman; agenda item 103 (b).

Feasibility of establishing a single administrative tribunal

At its 105th plenary meeting, on 18 December 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee:

(a) Took note of the note by the Secretary-General on the feasibility of establishing a single administrative tribunal;

(b) Requested the Secretary-General, pursuant to General Assembly decision 34/438 of 17 December 1979, to submit a report on the subject to the Assembly at its thirty-seventh session.

Activities of the UN Administrative Tribunal

The United Nations Administrative Tribunal met in a special plenary session at Geneva on 8 May 1981 and in its annual plenary session in New York on 8 October. It held two panel sessions during the year, at Geneva from 27 April to 15 May and in New York from 21 September to 9 October, at which it considered 12 cases. During 1981, the Tribunal delivered 13 judgements. An outline of its work was transmitted to the General Assembly in October, attached to a note by the Secretary-General.<sup>(1)</sup> The International Court of Justice received a request for an advisory opinion on a May 1981 judgement by the Tribunal (p. 1202).

Travel of staff and other UN officials

In his annual report to the General Assembly on first-class travel in the United Nations, issued in October 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> the Secretary-General estimated that $247, 226 had been saved between 1 October 1980 and 30 June 1981 through application of the rule, established by the Assembly in 1977, that most high officials previously entitled to first-class travel for all flights would have only economy-class entitlement for flights of under nine hours.<sup>(2)</sup> The report also listed exceptions made during the period to allow first-class travel by 14 officials, mainly staff members, including 5 cases for medical reasons.

In addition, in response to a December 1980 request by the Assembly for a study on travel of permanent representatives accredited to the United Nations while on official missions for the Organization,<sup>(3)</sup> the report said that, out of 155 such trips between 1 January 1978 and 30 April 1981, 35 had been made in whole or in part by first class, either because they had been longer than nine hours or because exceptions had been made. If all 155 trips had been by first class, they would have cost $297,209, or 43 per cent higher than their actual cost of $208,191-averaging about $574 more per trip.

On 18 December, the General Assembly, by a section of its resolution on questions relating to the programme budget for 1982-1983,<sup>(4)</sup> took note of the report. This section of the resolution was adopted without vote. On 24 November, the draft had been approved without objection by the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee, as orally proposed by the Chairman on an oral recommendation of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ).

Use of experts and consultants

Pursuant to a December 1980 General Assembly request,<sup>(4)</sup> the Secretary-General submitted a report in November 1981 on the use of experts and consultants in the United Nations.<sup>(3)</sup> The report ascribed past difficulties in monitoring their use to the lack of clear definitions. It stated that, early in 1982, new administrative instructions would be issued establishing policies for obtaining the services of individuals on behalf of the Organization and distinguishing between regular staff, temporary staff, individual contractors, consultants, participants in advisory meetings and technical co-operation personnel. Consultants and participants in advisory meetings would be used to provide expertise, special skills or knowledge not normally possessed by regular staff and for which there was no continuing need in the Secretariat. Consultants would not be engaged to assist regular staff in their normal work or to deal with peak work-loads or unexpected demands or to cover temporary vacancies; those needs would be met by temporary staff or contractors.

A table annexed to the report showed that $6,102,000 had been spent on consultants in 1980 under the United Nations regular budget, consisting of $4,870,300 in remuneration and $1,231,700 for travel. In addition, $1,830,300 had been spent from extrabudgetary funds.

In a December 1981 report,<sup>(2)</sup> ACABQ stated that strict application of the definitions proposed by the Secretary-General should lead to reduced expenditure on consultants. If that was accompanied by greater use of temporary staff, strengthened administrative controls would be needed. Believing that up-to-date data on the use of consultants and temporary staff would assist its consideration of the Secretary-General's budget proposals, ACABQ recommended that his next report on the subject cover the period to February or March 1983 and be available to ACABQ in time for its examination of the proposed budget for 1984-1985.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION. On 18 December 1981, the General Assembly, by a section of its resolution on the programme budget for 1982-1983,<sup>(5)</sup> took note of both reports and requested the Secretary-General to submit an updated report in 1982. This section was adopted without vote. On 17 December 1981, the draft had been similarly approved by the Fifth Committee, as orally proposed by the Chairman on Poland's suggestion.

In a related action on 18 December, the Assembly requested information on experts and consultants employed by the United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations (p. 604).

No action was taken on a draft resolution submitted in the Fifth Committee by the United States.<sup>(1)</sup> This would have had the Assembly note with concern that appropriations for experts and consultants had increased by 61.5 per cent between 1976-1977 and 1980-1981, express pleasure that the Secretary-General's proposed budget for 1982-1983 reflected a 10.6 per cent decrease for this item from the previous biennium, note with concern that additional appropriations approved by the Assembly in 1981 would significantly increase the initial estimates, and request the Secretary-General to re-examine proposed expenditures on experts and consultants in 1982-1983 with a view to achieving savings.

Use of experts and consultants in the United Nations

[ The General Assembly ...]

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the use of experts and consultants in the United Nations and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to submit an updated report on this subject to the General Assembly at Its thirty-seventh session;

Methods of determining staff requirements

A January 1981 report by the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU), prepared by Inspector Mark E. Allen and transmitted to the General Assembly by the Secretary-General in April, stated that the most important feature in the budgetary process from the point of view of cost and administrative efficiency was determining the number of staff required to carry out programmes and their distribution among secretariat units. Noting that staff costs accounted for about 70 per cent of regular budgets of the United Nations system, or about $900 million in 1980, the report concluded that units did not have sufficiently precise techniques for accurately assessing their staffing requirements and that central management services could play a greater role in that respect. Reviews of staff requirements did not give sufficient attention to demonstrating the continuing need for existing staff, and legislative bodies did not always have the information needed for an informed judgement.

The report recommended that: work measurement systems and analytical estimating techniques should be devised for both new and existing posts, leading to the adoption of productivity norms to guide the preparation of staffing proposals; organizations with central management services should participate in determining staff requirements by helping to introduce such systems; secretariats should provide legislative bodies with information in their draft budgets to permit better assessment of staffing proposals; and those bodies should decide whether the cost of programme elements was commensurate with their value or whether there were cheaper alternatives.

Commenting on this report in October,<sup>(3)</sup> the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC) said it would not be desirable or possible to formulate one set of practices and procedures for determining staff requirements that would be useful for all United Nations organizations, in view of their varied budgetary and management practices. While endorsing the use of work measurement techniques and accepting the recommendations for inter-agency information exchange and participation of central management services, ACC was not convinced that including greater detail in budget documents would be useful.

On 18 December, the General Assembly took note of this and other JIU reports.<sup>(1)</sup>

During discussion of JIU reports in the Fifth Committee, Barbados expressed the view that furnishing additional detail in budget documents could only be helpful to States responsible for approving budgets.

Chapter IV

Other administrative and management questions

The General Assembly approved in December 1981 measures to rationalize the scheduling of United Nations conferences and meetings, and extended until the end of 1982 a moratorium on the establishment of new subsidiary bodies of the Assembly.<sup>(2)</sup> Also in December, it decided that documents be given simultaneous distribution in the various United Nations languages;<sup>(3)</sup> urged United Nations-related bodies established by treaty to review their documentation requirements;<sup>(4)</sup> and approved guidelines for the control and limitation of documentation for special conferences.<sup>(5)</sup>

Most of those actions were taken on the recommendation of the Committee on Conferences. In addition, the Assembly's Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee approved funding for additional Arabic language services in 1982-1983 for the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council and subsidiary bodies of the Assembly (p. 1369). The Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) presented recommendations on ways to improve the documentation system (p. 1370).

On other administrative questions, the Committee of Governmental Experts to Evaluate the Present Structure of the Secretariat in the Administrative, Finance and Personnel Areas began its work by identifying areas for further inquiry (p. 1376). In December, the Assembly requested the Committee to continue its work.<sup>(6)</sup> JIU recommended measures to improve the management services of the United Nations system (p. 1378).

Also in December, the Assembly approved a revised construction project at Nairobi, Kenya, for a permanent headquarters of the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) (p. 1380). Agreement was reached between the two main Secretariat units located at the United Nations Centre at Nairobi-UNEP and the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) - that a common organizational unit should administer certain of their administrative services (p. 1381).

Two agreements with the Government of Austria concerning facilities at the Vienna International Centre entered into force in 1981 (p. 1381). In December, the Assembly requested a study of the adequacy of conference facilities at the headquarters of the Economic Commission for Africa at Addis Ababa, Ethiopia (p. 634). JIU reported on building construction procedures of United Nations organizations (p. 1382) and the Secretary-General submitted an interim report on office accommodation at Headquarters (p. 1380).

The Assembly in December authorized the Secretary-General to enter into financial commitments for security measures to protect staff members and property at field offices of United Nations organizations, with the expenses to be shared by those organizations under an agreed reimbursement formula (p. 1383).

In July, the Economic and Social Council approved measures intended to strengthen inter-agency co-ordination of computerized information systems.<sup>(1)</sup> The Administrative Committee on Co-ordination decided to continue the Inter-Organization Board for Information Systems as a clearing-house and forum for the exchange of experience on information systems within the United Nations system, but without operational functions or an operational secretariat (p. 1386). In December, the Assembly approved budget estimates for the International Computing Centre (p. 1387).

The 1981 gross revenue of the United Nations Postal Administration from the sale of philatelic items totalled almost $17 million. During the year, six commemorative postage stamps and two souvenir cards were issued (p. 1387).

Conferences and meetings

On 10 December 1981, the General Assembly adopted four resolutions relating to the pattern of conferences, including conference-related documentation (p. 1370).

By the first resolution, on the future work of the Committee on Conferences,<sup>(3)</sup> adopted without vote, the Assembly took note of the Committee's report and approved its recommendations. It decided that the capacity of the United Nations Secretariat's documentation services should be considered in drawing up calendars of conferences and meetings (p. 1365). It extended a moratorium on the establishment of subsidiary bodies of the Assembly (p. 1366) and dealt with the possibility of shortening sessions of United Nations organs (p. 1367). It recommended that the Economic and Social Council consider calling on the Committee on Conferences to review proposals affecting the Council's calendar and asked the Secretary-General to prepare a manual to assist committee secretaries (p. 1365). It approved the calendar of United Nations conferences and meetings for 1982-1983 (p. 1368), requested the Secretary-General to submit a programme for replacing and upgrading electronic equipment in the conference rooms at Headquarters and asked for recommendations on the way in which conference-servicing costs were calculated (p. 1368).

The Fifth Committee approved the text, which was prepared during informal consultations and introduced by a Committee Vice-Chairman, without vote on 4 December.

Most of the provisions of the resolution were based on recommendations by the Committee on Conferences.

ACTIVITIES OF THE COMMITTEE ON CONFERENCES. The work of the 22-member Committee on Conferences in 1981 focused on five main areas: control and limitation of documentation; utilization of conference resources; calendar of conferences and meetings for 1982-1983; co-ordination of United Nations conferences; and future requirements for conference services, facilities and documentation.

The Committee held 12 meetings between 30 January and 18 September to deal with specific problems pertaining to the 1981 calendar of conferences (p. 1367). In addition, it held four meetings on substantive questions from 22 to 24 April.

In accordance with a November 1980 Assembly resolution outlining the Committee's main tasks,<sup>(2)</sup> the Committee agreed on a procedure for reviewing proposals made at Assembly sessions which affected the schedule of conferences and meetings.

In its report submitted to the Assembly in September,<sup>(1)</sup> the Committee made several recommendations concerning the limitation of conference documentation, including reports of subsidiary organs of the Assembly (p. 1370). It recommended to the Assembly the adoption of two draft resolutions: one on possible limitation of documentation of treaty bodies, and the other containing guidelines for the control and limitation of documentation and national papers for special conferences (p. 1373).

The Committee recommended that the Assembly approve the draft calendar of conferences and meetings for 1982-1983 (p. 1368), and that it authorize the Committee to make the necessary adjustments arising from decisions taken by the Assembly at its 1981 regular session and at its 1982 special session on disarmament (p. 27), or from the scheduling of a session in 1982 of the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea (p. 130).

Annexed to the Committee's report were a suggested format for national papers and the draft calendar of conferences and meetings for 1982-1983.

The recommendations of the Committee on Conferences were endorsed in general by a number of speakers in the Fifth Committee debate on the pattern of conferences, among them Bulgaria, Hungary, Kenya, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR and Uruguay. Kenya believed that the recommendations contributed constructively by identifying possible areas where rationalization of United Nations activities and savings were feasible, and Ghana said if the recommendations were implemented the high cost resulting from the proliferation of conferences would be minimized. The USSR, on the other hand, remarked that the Committee had made little headway in holding down the costs of conferences and meetings. The Ukrainian SSR expressed a similar opinion, and Hungary said the Committee must fulfil its mandate by making recommendations that would ensure the most efficient use of conference resources, facilities and services.

The United States suggested that the Committee, in co-operation with the United Nations Secretariat and the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, study ways to remedy the inadequacy of information on conference services provided in the programme budget, so that more effective control could be exercised. Yugoslavia declared its support for further strengthening the role of the Committee in its efforts to achieve economical and effective use of conference facilities and related budgetary resources.

In the consolidated statement of conference-servicing costs and in the programme budget and invites both organs to submit appropriate recommendations relevant to their respective areas of competence to the Assembly at its thirty-seventh session.

Pattern of conferences

Following a recommendation of the Committee on Conferences,<sup>(1)</sup> the General Assembly, in its resolution of 10 December 1981 on the work of the Committee,<sup>(4)</sup> decided that in drawing up the calendar of conferences and meetings the implications for the documentation services of the Secretariat, and its ability to issue documentation in time for sessions of United Nations organs, should be taken into account. The Assembly recommended that the Committee review proposals before the Economic and Social Council affecting the schedule of conferences and meetings. It requested the Secretary-General to prepare a manual to assist secretaries of United Nations organs in preparing and organizing their work, scheduling meetings and submitting documentation in good time.

With a view to ensuring the availability of documentation in time for meetings, the Economic and Social Council requested, in a resolution of 24 July,<sup>(2)</sup> that the Secretary-General submit proposals for the consideration of some items before the Council biennially or triennially, suggest how items might be better distributed between the Assembly and the Council, and indicate desirable changes in the calendar of conferences.

The Council recommended that the Assembly examine the question of United Nations documentation (p. 1370) and that the Committee on Conferences be asked to review the 1982-1983 calendar of conferences and meetings, particularly in the economic and social fields, in order to adjust it to the servicing capacities of the Secretariat.

The Trade and Development Board of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD), on 7 October 1981, decided to ask UNCTAD to consider at its sixth (1983) session how the Board might comply with a November 1980 Assembly instruction<sup>(3)</sup> that all subsidiary organs of the Assembly complete their reports to the Assembly by 1 September (p. 538).

The recommendation that the Committee on Conferences examine proposals before the Economic and Social Council affecting the calendar of conferences and meetings was endorsed in the Assembly's Fifth Committee by several speakers, including Austria, Brazil and Kenya. The USSR said the Committee should act as an advisory body to the Council, as it had already done for the Assembly.

Hungary and New Zealand endorsed the request that a handbook for conference secretaries be prepared. Indonesia declared it would support any measure to mobilize committee secretaries in an effort to ensure that Assembly decisions on conferences and documentation were put into practice.

Other matters taken up during the debate on the pattern of conferences included a fixed time-limit for statements, favoured by Australia, among others. Morocco, however, said it might be difficult to implement that suggestion; it favoured instead the preparation of common positions by groups of States, an idea also supported by Australia and Yugoslavia.

Concerning requests for additional conference services, Poland said they should be limited and the United States declared it would not agree to providing conference resources for informal groups. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, on the other hand, considered it important that meetings of unofficial bodies and regional groups, which formed part of the decision-making process, be provided with conference services.

Uruguay expressed concern at the cost of meetings held away from United Nations offices, saying they involved costly transfer of staff, equipment and documents. Japan held it necessary that meetings of marginal usefulness be identified; budget resources for additional meetings or conferences should come only from the termination, or reduction in number, of meetings with a low priority. In order to control demand for conference services, the United States said, perhaps the most effective control could be exercised through the programme budget.

Subsidiary bodies of the General Assembly

Establishment of bodies

The General Assembly, in its resolution of 10 December 1981 on the work of the Committee on Conferences, extended until the end of 1982 a moratorium on the establishment of new subsidiary bodies of the Assembly.<sup>(4)</sup> It had declared a one-year moratorium in October 1980, as a temporary measure and with exceptions for certain bodies.<sup>(2)</sup>

The Secretariat, by a note of 19 October 1981 to the Assembly's Fifth Committee,<sup>(1)</sup> pointed out that too short a time had elapsed since the adoption of the October 1980 resolution to allow an assessment of the degree to which the new policy had been implemented. This observation also applied to a provision of a November 1980 Assembly resolution which had stipulated that preparatory committees for special conferences should be established only if preparations could not be carried out appropriately by an existing intergovernmental organ.<sup>(3)</sup>

In the course of its 1981 regular session, the Assembly waived the moratorium several times and established the following: the Ad Hoc Committee of the International Conference on Kampuchea (p. 243), the Group of Governmental Experts on International Co-operation to Avert New Flows of Refugees (p. 1050), the Interim Committee of the United Nations Conference on an International Code of Conduct on the Transfer of Technology (p. 756), and the Interim Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy (p. 690).

Extension of the moratorium was favoured in the Fifth Committee by several speakers, among them Brazil, Hungary and Japan. Hungary, however, noted that the establishment of the Ad Hoc Committee of the International Conference on Kampuchea had violated that rule and said such an exception should not be repeated.

Meetings of bodies

On 6 and 21 October 1981, the General Assembly decided to permit 10 of its subsidiary bodies to meet at United Nations Headquarters during its regular session.<sup>(2)</sup> The Assembly acted without vote, after the General Committee approved likewise on 6 October the recommendations of the Chairman of the Committee on Conferences, made by letters dated 21 September<sup>(3)</sup> and 2 October<sup>(4)</sup> to the Assembly President. The Chairman had transmitted requests from eight bodies for an exception to the 1979 Assembly decision that its subsidiary bodies should not meet during regular sessions unless specifically authorized to do so.<sup>(1)</sup> In addition, the Chairman recommended on 13 October<sup>(5)</sup> that two further bodies be permitted to hold meetings.

General Assembly decision 36/403

Adopted without vote

Approved by General Committee (A/36/250/Add.1) without vote. 6 October (meeting 3); requests by Committee on Conferences Chairman (A/36/537 and Add.1,2) (Add.2 approved by Assembly): agenda item 8 (b).

Meetings of subsidiary organs during the thirty-sixth session
At its 28th and 40th plenary meetings, on 6 and 21 October 1981, the General Assembly decided that the following subsidiary organs should be authorized to hold meetings during the thirty-sixth session:

(a) Advisory Committee on the United Nations Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa;

(b) Advisory Committee on the United Nations Programme of Assistance in the Teaching, Study, Dissemination and Wider Appreciation of International Law;

(c) Committee on Relations with the Host Country;

(d) Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People;

(e) Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples:

(t) Special Committee against Apartheid:

(g) Ad Hoc Committee on the Indian Ocean;

(h) Committee of Trustees of the United Nations Trust Fund for South Africa;

(i) United Nations Council for Namibia;

(j) Working Group on the Financing of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East.

Duration of sessions

During 1981, a seven-member working group of the Committee on Conferences- discussed ways to implement requests made by the General Assembly in October<sup>(3)</sup> and November 1980<sup>(4)</sup> that the duration of sessions of subsidiary organs of the Assembly should be reduced.<sup>(2)</sup> On the group's recommendation, the Committee Chairman wrote to the chairmen of seven such bodies seeking their co-operation. He also contacted the Assistant Secretary-General of the Centre for Disarmament with respect to the number and duration of sessions of various expert groups.

Of those which responded, the Committee on Contributions agreed to hold a four-week session only in those years when it considered a new scale of assessments and a two-week session in all other years. The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (p. 1095) adopted a revised pattern of conferences which took account of suggestions by the Chairman of the Committee on Conferences. Other bodies responded that, while it was not possible to shorten their sessions, they could take measures to improve the utilization of conference resources. A note by the Secretariat to the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee<sup>(1)</sup> stated that the results of the Committee's consultations had been reflected in the draft calendar for 1982-1983 (p. 1368).

In its resolution of 10 December 1981 on the work of the Committee on Conferences,<sup>(5)</sup> the Assembly invited the Committee to continue its efforts to bring about a shortening of sessions of subsidiary bodies, or to indicate which could meet on a biennial basis.

During the debate in the Fifth Committee, the USSR expressed regret that the problem of shorter sessions had not been solved and that no subsidiary organ had agreed to decrease the number of its sessions; there were objective criteria, such as the non-use of time and conference services allocated, to evaluate meeting requirements, yet the Committee on Conferences had not taken a consistent position in order to establish such requirements.

Morocco said it was encouraged by the prospect that some sessions could be reduced in length; at the same time, it must be stressed that the United Nations could not carry out its role fully if efforts to collaborate were frustrated and conference diplomacy was jeopardized. In considering the question of shortening sessions, Argentina stated, the needs of developing countries must be borne in mind.

Calendar of conferences

The Chairman of the Committee on Conferences informed the General Assembly President, by a letter of 15 September 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> how the Committee would implement a November 1980 Assembly resolution on the scheduling of conferences and meetings.<sup>(2)</sup> By that resolution, the Committee was asked to review proposals before the Assembly affecting the calendar of meetings when they had administrative implications. The Chairman stated that the Committee would send its recommendations to the Assembly's Main Committees, with the exception of the Fifth, before they adopted draft resolutions and decisions affecting the calendar. These would be issued as addenda to the statements of administrative and financial implications.

Changes in the 1981 calendar

In accordance with its mandate, laid down in 1974<sup>(2)</sup> and redefined in 1977,<sup>(3)</sup> the Committee on Conferences approved changes requested by three bodies in the places or dates of their 1981 sessions. <sup>(1)</sup> In each case the Committee stipulated that the changes should be made within existing resources. It agreed to an additional session for the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development (changed from a session in New York in January/February to one at Geneva in April and one in New York in June) (p. 737), to an extended session for the Group of Experts on the Reduction of Military Budgets (Geneva, November/December) (p. 93) and to a change of venue for the International Civil Service Commission (New York instead of Vienna) (p. 1322).

The Committee noted a growing tendency for bodies to seek departures from the calendar for reasons of convenience rather than necessity and decided to consider future requests for changes only if accompanied by convincing justification. It also decided that the Secretariat should inform the Committee, well in advance, of the need for sessions to be postponed, giving substantive reasons for the delay.

In addition to the changes approved by the Committee, the Economic and Social Council took several decisions affecting the calendar of some of its subsidiary organs, including dates, changes of venue and the addition of sessions (p. 1089). The General Assembly also decided to permit 10 of its subsidiary bodies to meet at United Nations Headquarters during its 1981 regular session (p. 1366).

Speaking during the debate on the pattern of conferences in the Assembly's Fifth Committee, Morocco said it was pleased that all changes in the calendar had been effected without additional financial implications; none the less, it was disturbed at the disruption caused by such changes. Yugoslavia regarded as unacceptable the growing tendency to seek changes in the calendar for reasons of convenience rather than necessity. In Indonesia's view, the wastage of conference resources due to cancellation, late starts and early endings of meetings had reached alarming proportions. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya pointed out that frequent changes impeded the timely preparation and distribution of documents; it hoped the Committee on Conferences would deal at greater length with that problem in its next report.

1982-1983 calendar

On the recommendation of the Committee on Conferences, the General Assembly, in its resolution of 10 December 1981 on the work of the Committee, <sup>(2)</sup> approved the 1982-1983 calendar of United Nations conferences and meetings and authorized the Committee to make any changes that might result from decisions of the Assembly in 1981 or at its 1982 special session on disarmament (p. 27). It also approved the recommendation that the Committee should propose necessary adjustments in the calendar resulting from the scheduling in 1982 of a session of the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea (p. 130). The calendar, annexed to the 1981 Committee report, <sup>(1)</sup> contained 196 listings for bodies to meet in 1982 and 173 in 1983.

The Economic and Social Council also approved a 1982-1983 calendar of conferences for its own subsidiary and related organs, and at various times during 1981 it took decisions amending the calendar in respect of dates, venue and the addition of sessions (p. 108). The Trade and Development Board took similar decisions affecting the 1981-1982 calendar of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (p. 537).

During the Fifth Committee debate, Uruguay said the calendar seemed dynamic and had apparently been determined on the basis of current needs of organs, rather than on their work-load in earlier years. The Ukrainian SSR expressed its support of the calendar on the understanding that any additional meetings and conferences would be funded out of resources released from revised priorities and the elimination of obsolete activities. Argentina said it was gratified by the observation of the Committee on Conferences that for the first time practical results had materialized, which was only the first step towards a more effective distribution of the time available; meetings particularly important for the fulfilment of the principles of the Charter of the United Nations should have priority and be allocated a greater proportion of resources.

Morocco said the 1982-1983 calendar must allow enough time for such bodies as the United Nations Development Programme, the United Nations Children's Fund and the United Nations Environment Programme to submit their reports to the Economic and Social Council. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya noted that, despite the importance of the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories (p. 301), no meetings had been scheduled for it.

Conference and meeting services

The General Assembly, in its resolution of 10 December 1981 on the work of the Committee on Conferences, <sup>(3)</sup> requested the Secretary-General to submit to its 1982 regular session a programme for replacing and upgrading electronic equipment in the conference rooms at United Nations Headquarters. It also asked him to submit an analysis to the Committee on Conferences and to the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) on the way in which conference-servicing costs were calculated and presented in statements of administrative and financial implications, in the consolidated statement of conference-servicing costs presented near the close of each Assembly session, and in the programme budget. The Assembly invited both Committees to make recommendations on these procedures in 1982.

Earlier in the year, the Committee on Conferences discussed a Secretariat note on future requirements for conference facilities and services, including the replacement and modernization of electronic equipment, the installation of four small conference rooms without interpretation facilities, increased seating capacity in the Economic and Social Council Chamber and in conference rooms, and installation of additional electronic voting machines.<sup>(2)</sup>

The Secretary-General, in his consolidated statement of administrative and financial implications of conference-servicing costs submitted in December, informed the Assembly's Fifth Committee that the full cost of servicing all additional 1982 meetings newly authorized by the Assembly in 1981 totalled $28,986,400 more than had been provided for in the proposed 1982-1983 budget ($21 million for Headquarters, $6.1 million for Geneva and $1.9 million for Vienna, Austria); however, all but $12 million of this could be absorbed.<sup>(1)</sup>

The Fifth Committee agreed on 16 December 1981 to an ACABQ recommendation that an additional $10 million (rather than $12 million) be appropriated for 1982 for conference-servicing costs, allocated as follows: $3.6 million for Headquarters, $3.7 million for Geneva and $2.7 million for Vienna. Appropriations for conference services in 1982-1983, as included in the 1982-1983 programme budget approved by the Assembly on 18 December 1981,<sup>(4)</sup> totalled $231,521,900.

After adoption of the ACABQ recommendation, the United States said if a vote had been taken it would have voted against. The USSR stated that it would not have been able to support the recommendation in a vote, and Japan, although having joined in the consensus, believed that the Committee on Conferences should review the calendar of meetings with a view to reducing the expenditure on temporary staff.

During the Fifth Committee debate on the pattern of conferences, New Zealand called for inclusion in a work programme of issues such as the modernization of sound equipment, the installation of additional voting machines and the enlargement of seating capacity, so that their study could be undertaken systematically and the expenditure spread over a number of years; the Secretariat should be asked to examine requirements in that area and to submit proposals in time to the Committee on Conferences.

In other action pertaining to conference servicing, the Assembly, in December, decided on a further programme for training translators for the Economic Commission for Africa (ECA) (p. 633), requested a study of the adequacy of conference facilities at ECA headquarters at Addis Ababa, Ethiopia (p. 634), and took note of a report by the Secretary-General on job classification and career development of language staff (p. 1328).

Arabic language services

On 7 December 1981, the Fifth Committee accepted without vote cost estimates of $9,965,500 (net) to finance additional Arabic language services for the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council and subsidiary bodies of the General Assembly in 1982-1983. These included the cost of 109 new Secretariat posts, including 68 at Headquarters, 31 at Geneva, 8 at Vienna (for the United Nations Industrial Development Organization) and 2 at Nairobi, Kenya (for the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP)).

The additional money and staff were provided to implement a December 1980 decision of the Assembly to provide additional Arabic language services.<sup>(3)</sup> In line with the Assembly's request that the Economic and Social Council include Arabic among its official languages by 1 January 1983, the Council, on 8 May 1981, agreed to pursue arrangements and to finalize them at its first regular session of 1982.<sup>(4)</sup> Also in accordance with the December 1980 Assembly resolution, the Governing Council of UNEP decided on 26 May 1981 to include Arabic as one of its official and working languages (p. 822).

The Fifth Committee's decision was taken following the submission of reports on Arabic language servicing requirements by the Secretary-General<sup>(2)</sup> and ACABQ.<sup>(1)</sup> The Secretary-General said funding in the amount of $10.2 million ($6 million for subsidiary organs of the Assembly, and $4.2 million for the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council) would be required for interpretation, translation, meeting records and documentation, library services and conference room alterations. ACABQ recommended a reduction of $231,600, to be achieved through savings on office accommodation and supplies for new staff members. The Fifth Committee agreed to this reduction but also approved, by a recorded vote of 69 to 9, with 18 abstentions, an oral proposal by Algeria to add five additional Arabic translation posts at Headquarters, at a cost of $452,000.

Speaking during the Fifth Committee debate on the pattern of conferences, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya called for services in all languages to be provided to all the regional groups, now that a larger number of Arabic interpreters were available.

Draft rules of procedure for conferences

As requested by the General Assembly in November 1980,<sup>(2)</sup> the Secretary-General submitted in September 1981 a set of draft standard rules of procedure for special United Nations conferences.<sup>(1)</sup> The draft rules governed such aspects of special conferences as their preparation, participation and representation of delegations and others, organization of sessions, conduct of business, officers, general committee, subsidiary organs, secretariat, decision-making procedures, languages and documentation. Also submitted was a model agreement between the United Nations and host countries for conferences.

On the recommendation of the Fifth Committee, as proposed orally by the United Kingdom on behalf of the member States of the European Community, taking up a suggestion by Japan, the Assembly decided without vote on 10 December to defer consideration of the draft rules until 1982, recommending that at that time they be referred to the Sixth (Legal) Committee.<sup>(3)</sup> The Fifth Committee similarly approved the decision on 7 December.

The recommendation that the draft rules be referred to the Sixth Committee and that they be considered in 1982 was supported by a number of speakers in the Fifth Committee, among them Brazil, Bulgaria, New Zealand, the Ukrainian SSR and the United States.

The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya regarded the draft rules as an important step towards achieving savings and hoped they would also help improve documentation. New Zealand thought the rules should result in saving time for the Secretariat and preparatory organs of conferences.

Draft standard rules of procedure for United Nations conferences

At Its 93rd plenary meeting, on 10 December 1981, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee, decided to defer to its thirty-seventh session consideration of the report of the Secretary-General on draft standard rules of procedure for United Nations conferences and recommended that at that session the report should be referred to the Sixth Committee.

Documentation

Limitation of documentation

JIU RECOMMENDATIONS. A study on the control and limitation of documentation in the United Nations system,<sup>(2)</sup> noting the increasing volume and late distribution of documents and making recommendations to improve the situation, was completed by the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) in December 1980 and transmitted by the Secretary-General to the General Assembly in April 1981.

In order to reduce documentation, JIU recommended that bodies should periodically review their meeting calendars with a view to reducing meetings, and organizations should establish rules governing the length and timely issuance of documents and should consider which documents could be discontinued or issued less frequently. An intergovernmental body in each organization might be asked to review the implementation of decisions on documentation. The Committee on Conferences should be renamed the Committee on Conferences and Documentation, to extend its terms of reference.

Where appropriate, organizations should consider introducing a document quota system. They should strengthen their documents and editorial control units, closely relate central editing units with documents control, and provide drafting and editing courses for their staff. Organizations should analyse costs for regular staff, temporary assistance and contractual services for document translation and typing, and select the most cost-effective. They should study the cost-effectiveness of modern documentation technology and act according to the findings. The Inter-agency Meeting on Language Arrangements, Documentation and Publications, convened by the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC), should assume responsibility for identifying methods to control and limit documentation of individual organizations.

The JIU report also contained recommendations on meeting records (p. 1374).

Comments on the report were submitted in October by ACC<sup>(3)</sup> and by the Secretary-General.<sup>(4)</sup>

The Secretary-General noted that only the Assembly could make decisions to reduce the meetings of its subsidiary bodies and that the Economic and Social Council itself established and reviewed its subsidiary bodies' programme of meetings and agenda. He would welcome a 32-page limit for reports of subsidiary bodies and expert groups, and would favour a reiteration of the rule that subsidiary bodies' agenda include an item on documentation. He did not consider it advisable to change the title of the Committee on Conferences and believed its current terms of reference entitled it to discuss all aspects of documentation. In the opinion of ACC, control and limitation of documentation could only be effectively sought as a joint effort of the Member States, as represented in the various bodies, and the secretariats.

With regard to the JIU recommendation on a document quota system, ACC said that, while certain agencies had such a system, others were not convinced of its appropriateness; the Secretary-General stated that a quota system was not workable at the United Nations. Concerning documents control and editorial control services, ACC said some organizations felt their services were sufficiently effective while others were studying the introduction or strengthening of such services within existing budget restrictions. The Secretary-General believed there was adequate central authority to enforce rules and procedures regarding documentation at the United Nations, although in some offices practical arrangements could be strengthened.

ACC indicated that some organizations provided drafting and editing courses, while others questioned whether the seriousness of their documentation problems warranted the expense of introducing them. The Secretary-General said the United Nations planned to increase the number and intensity of its courses.

With regard to the most cost-effective methods of translating and typing documents, ACC noted that organizations were giving them continuing consideration as part of their regular budget processes. The Secretary-General said the same occurred at the United Nations and the question was a matter of regular management attention. On modern documentation technology, ACC reported that organizations were interested in such techniques and, where cost-effective, took action to introduce them. The Secretary-General said the Secretariat kept itself informed of technological advances but sometimes encountered resistance from delegations to changes in traditional services.

In a November report to the Fifth Committee<sup>(6)</sup> on implementation of past JIU recommendations (p. 1313), the Secretary-General said that only two recommendations made by JIU in a 1980 evaluation of the translation process in the United Nations could be identified as not implemented: a call for consideration of a document quota system, which would require General Assembly approval, and a suggestion that translation staff receive the same financial incentives as other staff members to learn additional languages.

nisms to enforce rules on documentation,<sup>(1)</sup> and recommended that the Assembly's subsidiary organs reduce requests for documents, limit the number of reports on a subject and consider requesting oral rather than written reports. Their reports should not exceed 32 pages. The Committee recommended the adoption of guidelines on documentation for special conferences and of a resolution to limit documentation of treaty bodies (p. 1373). It considered the practice of circulating Member States' communications as documents of the Assembly, but did not submit recommendations on the matter.

In its resolution of 10 December on the work of the Committee on Conferences,<sup>(8)</sup> the Assembly requested the Committee to examine Secretariat policies on the reproduction and distribution of documents, and to adjust the 1982-1983 calendar of conferences, especially in the economic and social fields, to the Secretariat's document servicing capacities. Confirming a 32-page limit for action-oriented Secretariat documents and documents of its subsidiary organs, the Assembly urged the latter to reduce requests for documents, limit the number of reports on a subject and consider requesting oral rather than written reports. It decided that at the end of sessions of United Nations organs the Secretary-General should submit lists of the documents requested, with the expected date of issuance. It insisted that the Secretary-General take the necessary measures to prevent undue delays in the submission of documents, encouraged him to make wider use of contractual translation services and referred the JIU report on documentation to the Committee on Conferences for observations.

In a December report to the Assembly on a special review of the ongoing work programme of the United Nations (p. 1309), the Secretary-General suggested that existing limitations on the length of documents be amplified by imposing a 32-page limit on reports of subsidiary bodies of the Economic and Social Council and the Assembly, and by reducing the maximum number of pages for any Secretariat document from 32 to 24.<sup>(5)</sup> The Assembly, in a resolution of 18 December,<sup>(9)</sup> requested the Committee on Conferences to examine those recommendations and to report to it in 1982.

During the Fifth Committee debate on the pattern of conferences, a number of speakers, including Argentina, Brazil, Bulgaria, Chile, Guyana, Hungary, Japan, Morocco, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR, the United States and Uruguay, voiced concern about the increasing volume of documentation.

While countries such as Austria, Morocco and New Zealand held that the Secretariat was responsible to a great extent for the proliferation of documentation, others, such as Bulgaria and Poland, stated that the excessive volume of documents overburdened the Secretariat staff. In Guyana's opinion, much of the responsibility for excessive documentation lay with delegations, which continually requested additional studies and reports; the failure to control documentation reflected the failure to find solutions to problems besetting the international community and the never-ending stream of documents would continue until the political will to implement United Nations resolutions and decisions was found. Japan said what was needed to control documentation was the will of Member States to take remedial action.

Attributing the increasing volume of documents to the increasing number of meetings, Argentina expressed the view that, once the necessary rationalization of meetings and conferences had been achieved, it might be possible to implement the JIU recommendations on control of documentation, in particular the proposed procedures to ensure efficient use of the programme budget.

Venezuela called for the appointment of an ad hoc group of experts to study the problem. That proposal was endorsed by several others, among them Japan, Kenya and Morocco. Opposition to the idea was voiced by Guyana.

In order to rationalize and control the flow of documentation, Austria, supported by New Zealand and the United States, suggested that a consolidated list be issued of documents requested by the Main Committees of the Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, indicating the anticipated length of documents and the date by which they were to be prepared; such a list would enable Member States to see exactly what documents they had requested and, at the same time, they should be informed by the Secretariat of any difficulties in issuing documentation.

With regard to the JIU recommendations, the USSR said they should be studied closely in the Committee on Conferences before a final decision was taken in 1982; the suggestion of a quota system to limit the volume of documentation was a valuable one, as was the extension of the 32-page limit to other United Nations organizations. The Ukrainian SSR agreed that the Committee should become more actively involved in the question of limiting the volume of documentation. Hungary said subsidiary organs should strictly observe the 32-page limit; also, it would be wise to establish a moratorium on the reproduction of previous Assembly resolutions in reports of subsidiary organs. By setting lower limits on the number of copies distributed, Guyana said the Secretariat could contribute to reducing the volume of documentation.

Brazil felt United Nations bodies and organizations should include regularly in the agenda of their sessions the question of discontinuing the production of recurrent documents which had become redundant or had lost their usefulness, and should issue some documents at less frequent intervals; action to limit the volume of documentation should take into account the experience of preceding sessions. The recommendation that redundant documents be discontinued while others be issued less frequently was also supported by Morocco and the USSR.

Morocco also declared its support for the JIU recommendations concerning review of the implementation of decisions of intergovernmental bodies on documentation, strengthening the documents control unit and an analysis of the cost for translation and typing of documents.

Kenya said the application of the principle of cost-effectiveness would cut down on the volume of documents, improve their quality and expedite their distribution.

The delays in the preparation and distribution of documents were another concern of a number of States, among them Argentina, Chile, Guyana, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Ukrainian SSR, Uruguay and Yugoslavia. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya thought the main reason for delay in documentation was the failure of most departments to observe deadlines, and requested that the Secretary-General consider measures to deal with the problem. The USSR called for strict adherence to deadlines and suggested the use of document submission schedules. Hungary and Yugoslavia proposed that the reasons for delays be explained to the bodies concerned, and the Ukrainian SSR said the Committee on Conferences should become more involved in order to ensure that documents were produced on time.

With regard to the translation of documents, the USSR favoured a more extensive use of contractual services, but held it necessary when contracting out work to be more selective, to tighten control and to impose harsher penalties for work below acceptable standard.

OTHER ACTION. On 27 June 1981, in a decision on the rationalization of its work,<sup>(10)</sup> the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme called for strict implementation of measures recommended to control its documentation, including specific limits on the number of pages to be submitted to it in 1982, except for documents on country and intercountry programmes (p. 458). The Economic and Social Council, by a resolution of 24 July 1981,<sup>(7)</sup> called for steps to reduce the volume of documentation and delays in its submission and circulation.

Treaty bodies

The General Assembly, by a resolution of 10 December 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> invited treaty bodies to consult with the Committee on Conferences on possible measures to control documentation, urged them to review their documentation and meeting records requirements with a view to restricting the volume, and requested them to report in 1982 on the measures they had taken.

The resolution, adopted without vote, was addressed to bodies established by treaty and serviced by the United Nations, such as the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (p. 871) and the Human Rights Committee (p. 889).

The Assembly's Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee approved the text on 4 December by implication when it approved the draft on the work of the Committee on Conferences, submitted by a Committee Vice-Chairman (p. 1363). The text was proposed by the Committee on Conferences in its 1981 report<sup>(1)</sup>

During the Fifth Committee debate, Ghana expressed reservations about the resolution and cautioned against any action that would prevent treaty bodies from effectively discharging their duties. Chile, on the other hand, declared its support of the text.

General Assembly resolution 36/117 C

Adopted without vote Meeting 93 10 December 1981

Approved by Fifth Committee (A/36/787) by implication when it approved draft by vice-Chairman, A/C.5/36/L.26, on 4 December (meeting 63); draft by Committee on Conferences (A/36/32); agenda item 105.

Control and limitation of documentation for treaty bodies
 The General Assembly,

Concerned at the critical situation prevailing with regard to the issuance of documentation in all the official languages in good time,

Noting the considerable volume of documentation and summary records for treaty bodies whose conference-servicing costs are borne by the regular budget of the United Nations and their adverse effect on the processing capacity of the central conference services for other documentation required for intergovernmental meetings,

1. Invites the officers of treaty bodies to consult with the Chairman of the Committee on Conferences on possible measures to control and limit documentation;

2. Urges all treaty bodies, as a matter of priority, to review their requirements for documentation in all languages and for meeting records, with a view to adopting immediate measures to restrict substantially the present volume of documentation;

3. Requests all bodies to inform the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session, through the Committee on Conferences, about the practical measures they have taken.

Conferences

By a resolution of 10 December 1981 on documentation for special conferences,<sup>(3)</sup> adopted without vote, the General Assembly decided that the design of such conferences should be harmonized with documentation needs and that national papers should be called for only if they were to play an integral part in the preparatory activities and at the conferences themselves. Annexed to the resolution were guidelines for the control and limitation of conference documentation. They stipulated that measures on documentation in force when a special conference was being prepared or held would apply to the conference and its preparatory organs, and that summary records of meetings would not be provided unless they were determined to be necessary for legal codification conferences. The guidelines contained provisions for national papers-including their length, languages, format, deadlines for submission, number of copies and distribution-as well as for documents submitted by non-governmental organizations.

The Fifth Committee approved the resolution on 4 December when it approved the draft on the work of the Committee on Conferences (p. 1363). The text was proposed by the latter Committee. An amendment prepared during informal consultations and introduced by a Fifth Committee Vice-Chairman, adding a provision to the guidelines for national papers to allow for limits on the number of language versions, was approved without vote.

At its 1981 session,<sup>(1)</sup> as requested by the Assembly in November 1980,<sup>(2)</sup> the Committee on Conferences discussed the guidelines, prepared by it in 1979. It noted the considerable impact national papers had on the Secretariat's translation, typing, reproduction and distribution services, and the need to consider whether such papers would play a significant role in the work of the conference and its preparation.

During the debate in the Fifth Committee, Ghana voiced reservations about the resolution, saying it not only was redundant but also challenged the authority of the organs preparing special conferences and deprived Member States of necessary resources; some of the recommendations were reminiscent of attempts in previous years to introduce a quota system for the allocation of conference resources and might prevent the United Nations from convening conferences to discuss unforeseen but important issues as and when they arose.

Chile, on the other hand, expressed support of the resolution. Poland and the Ukrainian SSR called for a stricter attitude with regard to the organization of special conferences. Poland said attention should be given to the inter-secretariat co-ordination of preparations for servicing such conferences and to the number of staff involved, and the Ukrainian SSR thought the Committee on Conferences should become involved in efforts to reduce the number of sessions and meetings. Yugoslavia opposed the establishment of any new machinery to service special conferences; instead, existing staff should be strengthened or local staff used and preparatory committees should be established only when existing intergovernmental bodies were inadequate.

Control and limitation of documentation for special conferences

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolution 35/10 C of 3 November 1980,

1. Decides that, if and when special conferences of the United Nations are convened, particular attention shall be given to harmonizing the proposed design of the conference with the documentation needs, so as to foster attainment of the stated objectives of the conference during both the preparatory phase and the conference phase itself;

2. Declares that the submission of national papers on the occasion of special conferences should be proposed only if such papers are intended to play an integral part in the preparatory activities and at the conference itself, taking into account the time required for a useful integration of such papers both in the preparatory activities and in the negotiating process of the conference;

3. Approves the guidelines for the control and limitation of documentation for special conferences of the United Nations set forth in the annex to the present resolution.

ANNEX

Guidelines for the control and limitation of documentation for special conferences of the United Nations

1. All measures to control and limit documentation in force at the time when a special conference is being prepared or held shall apply to documentation prepared for that conference as well as to any preparatory organ that may be designated.

2. Summary records shall not be provided to special conferences and their preparatory organs, with the exception of legal codification conferences, for which the needs will be determined in each case.

3. Whenever Governments are requested to submit national papers or reports, the following rules might apply:

(a) The organ which decides to convene the conference or preparatory organ, whenever it has been designated, should adopt specific rules to limit the length of national papers or summaries thereof, to the extent possible, and to determine the language versions in which they should be issued, taking into account experience gained on the occasion of past special conferences in the same area of activity;

(b) Each paper or report and each summary or abstract should be prepared in the format described in the layout appended to annex II to the report of the Committee on Conferences;

(c) A firm deadline for the submission of such papers or reports and their summaries and abstracts should be established, taking into account the purpose for which they are required in the preparatory process, but which in any event should not be later than eight weeks before the opening of the conference;

(d) All papers or reports received, as well as summaries or abstracts thereof, should be listed by the Secretariat in an information document and grouped in various ways, such as alphabetically by country, region or by subject;

(e) National papers or reports should not be redistributed at the conference site, if the conference is held away from established headquarters; Instead, a library should be established at such a conference site which shall contain in single copies all relevant material pertaining to the conference;

(f) The Secretary-General should keep the total number of copies printed for this type of documentation under constant review and adjust it to a realistic level of demand.

4. Submissions by non-governmental organizations shall bear a uniform cover page with a document symbol and number provided by the Secretariat. It shall be the responsibility of each submitting non-governmental organization to make sure that this cover page appears on each copy of the report. The Secretariat shall then distribute such a report if it is submitted in a sufficient number of copies. Reports by non-governmental organizations will not be translated or reproduced by the Secretariat, nor will they be transported to the conference site by the Secretariat if the conference is held away from established headquarters. Furthermore, a deadline shall be set for the presentation of such reports to the Secretariat. A list of all documents presented by non-governmental organizations will then be issued by the Secretariat.

Meeting records

JIU REPORT. The April 1981 report of the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) on control and limitation of documentation in the United Nations system<sup>(2)</sup> included a review of practices in producing verbatim and summary records of meetings. It noted that verbatim records, prepared for the General Assembly's plenary meetings, the Security Council and certain other bodies, entailed overtime costs in the Department of Conference Services which in 1978 had amounted to over $408,000 and in 1979 had increased 37 per cent to over $557,000. Other organizations issuing verbatim records for major organs were the International Labour Organization, the World Health Organization (WHO), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO).

In its report, JIU recommended that organizations which issued verbatim records in each working language consider introducing multilingual records, as employed by WHO, UNESCO and FAO. In his comments on the JIU recommendations,<sup>(3)</sup> the Secretary-General said consideration should be given to issuing verbatim records only in the language in which a statement was made, relying on sound recordings of its interpretation into other official languages. He would be pleased to explore with Member States any alternative method, but changes increasing the translation work-load could result in higher costs and delays.

JIU also recommended that, whenever possible, United Nations organizations dispense with verbatim and summary records and that secretariats be more active in advising intergovernmental organs on measures to limit meeting records. Noting in his comments that the Assembly had addressed such requests to its subsidiary bodies, the Secretary-General said he believed that an argument could be made that, in principle, subsidiary bodies should not have written records; views of States on matters dealt with by a subsidiary body could be reflected in the records of the Assembly, its General and Main Committees, and the three Councils (Security, Trusteeship, and Economic and Social). An argument could also be made that all the records of the latter bodies should be verbatim. However, the Secretary-General stated, the question should perhaps be based on a reconsideration of the régime of written records according to the needs of the Organization, bearing in mind technological advances.

OTHER ACTION. In 1981, the Committee on Conferences<sup>(1)</sup> discussed exceptions to an Assembly rule dating from 1979<sup>(6)</sup> that summary records be discontinued for its subsidiary organs, with exceptions specified by the Assembly in November 1980.<sup>(7)</sup> The Committee concluded that the time elapsed since the exceptions had been applied was too short for final judgement and that the question should be discussed further in 1982, including alternatives to the current practice. It requested the Secretariat to submit a report on the matter.

In a resolution of 24 July 1981 on documentation,<sup>(5)</sup> the Economic and Social Council reaffirmed for a further two years, with some exceptions, the discontinuance of summary records for its subsidiary bodies. It decided to consider in 1982 the possibility of discontinuing, for an experimental period of two years, the provision of summary records for its sessional committees and their replacement by reports reflecting the course of discussions.

The Assembly, in a resolution of 10 December 1981 on the work of the Committee on Conferences,<sup>(8)</sup> requested the Committee to study the rationale determining the provision of meeting records to United Nations organs, with a view to identifying criteria for the selection of those that should receive records in the future. The Committee was requested to submit recommendations in 1982 on the matter as well as on the November 1980 resolution allowing certain bodies to have summary records.<sup>(7)</sup>

In a December 1981 report to the Assembly on a special review of the ongoing work programme of the United Nations (p. 1309), the Secretary-General suggested the elimination of written records for all subsidiary bodies of the Economic and Social Council and the Assembly, as well as of summary records for the Council's sessional committees and the Assembly's Main Committees.<sup>(4)</sup> The Assembly, in a resolution of 18 December,<sup>(9)</sup> requested the Committee on Conferences to examine those recommendations and to report to it in 1982.

During the Fifth Committee debate on the pattern of conferences, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya suggested that the proposal to dispense with summary records be studied in depth and that the possibility be considered of gradually applying the experiment to all bodies. In Australia's opinion, formal meeting records frequently impeded the free flow of informal negotiation. The USSR expressed the hope that the Committee on Conferences would pursue its work on summary records with a view to reducing expenses; however, the USSR felt it would not be wise to discontinue verbatim records for meetings of the Security Council, the Assembly and its First Committee.

Poland welcomed limiting the number of bodies entitled to summary records and voiced doubts about the advisability of issuing both summary records and press releases; to set an example and limit documentation, the Fifth Committee should discontinue the latter, which could be dispensed with if summary records were prepared on the day of the meeting and issued in one language.

Brazil, on the other hand, felt that the complete elimination of summary records for the subsidiary organs of the Assembly should be given further study and that other viable alternatives should be considered. Morocco said summary records were very useful if issued promptly; the current delays in their publication were attributable to the failure of the Department of Conference Services to comply with a strict schedule.

New Zealand expressed doubts about the JIU recommendation on the introduction of multilingual verbatim records, while Guyana saw some merit in such a system.

Distribution of documents

The General Assembly, by a resolution of 10 December 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> decided that documents should be given effective simultaneous distribution in the official and working languages of the United Nations, and requested the Secretary-General to report in 1982 on the resolution's implementation.

The Assembly adopted the text without vote, after the Fifth Committee approved it by consensus on 4 December. The draft was introduced by France, also on behalf of China, Peru, Saudi Arabia, the Ukrainian SSR and the United Kingdom. One of its preambular paragraphs was orally revised by France to include mention of two 1972 Assembly resolutions on the inclusion of Arabic<sup>(2)</sup> and Chinese<sup>(1)</sup> among the languages of United Nations bodies.

Explaining its position in the Committee, Sweden observed that the resolution was aimed at greater equity among the already privileged; it hoped that the simultaneous distribution of documents would not make matters more difficult for those to whom all official United Nations languages were foreign languages. Spain, on the other hand, said it was sure that the production of translations, for simultaneous distribution would not be used as an excuse to delay the availability of documentation in the original language. Iraq and Venezuela expressed the hope that the simultaneous distribution of documents would be implemented as soon as possible.

Introducing the text in the Committee, France said the six sponsors represented the official United Nations languages and the draft was largely a recapitulation of past Assembly resolutions; however, while some progress had been made in recent years, the many examples of failure justified further emphasis on the principle of equality of all languages. The resolution required only an extra effort by the Administration and had no financial implications.

In the opinion of Argentina, Chile and Uruguay, the unequal treatment of the various official languages was a matter of concern; Argentina added that it would continue to raise the matter until it was given the attention it deserved.

Simultaneous distribution of documents in the different languages of the United Nations

The General Assembly,

Aware that the diversity of languages of the United Nations is a source of general enrichment and of better understanding among Member States,

Recalling Its resolution 2(I) of 1 February 1946 entitled "Rules of procedure concerning languages",

Recalling further its resolutions 2247(XXI) of 20 December 1966 and 2292(XXII) of 8 December 1967 as well as its resolutions 3189(XXVIII), 3190(XXVIII) and 3191 (XXVIII) of 18 December 1973,

Noting the necessity of giving full effect to paragraph 3 of resolution 2247(XXI) and paragraph 4 of resolution 2292 (XXII) concerning the simultaneous distribution of documents, Reiterating its deep concern at the steady lengthening of delays in the distribution of documents in the different official languages.

1. Decides that documents shall be given effective simultaneous distribution in sufficient time in the official and working languages of the organs of the United Nations;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Administration and management

Structuring of the Secretariat

ACTIVITIES OF THE COMMITTEE OF GOVERNMENTAL EXPERTS. The 17-member Committee of Governmental Experts to Evaluate the Present Structure of the Secretariat in the Administrative, Finance and Personnel Areas, established in December 1980,<sup>(3)</sup> held two organizational meetings in September 1981 and 17 substantive meetings between 12 October and 5 November.<sup>(1)</sup> In view of delays in the appointment of its members, the Assembly authorized the Committee, on 14 September, to meet beyond its original deadline of 1 September.<sup>(4)</sup>

In November, the Committee reported to the General Assembly that it had identified the following seven areas of inquiry for its work: the capacity of the Secretariat's structure to promote policy coherence and clear lines of authority; the structure's adequacy to implement the Assembly's personnel reforms and recruitment policies; the role of the Executive Office of the Secretary-General in relation to the administrative, finance and personnel areas; the structure's capacity to achieve a balance between administrative decentralization and central control and co-ordination; the role of the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation in relation to the administrative, finance and personnel areas; the structure's adequacy to undertake programme planning in relation to the programme budget and allocation of resources; and the development of effective management tools based on modern information systems to enhance the effectiveness of the administrative, finance and personnel areas through a review of the roles of the Secretariat's Administrative Management Service and the Electronic Data Processing and Information Systems Division.

The Committee concluded that, due to time constraints, it had been unable to complete its examination of those questions and suggested that the Assembly might wish to decide on further action.

Reporting to the Assembly in September on the restructuring of the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system,<sup>(2)</sup> the Secretary-General said he would bring to the Committee's attention matters concerning the implications of restructuring for the functioning of the Secretariat (p. 1094).

General Assembly decision 35/455

Adopted without vote

Oral proposal by President; agenda Item 8.

Committee of Governmental Experts to Evaluate the Present Structure of the Secretariat in the Administrative, Finance and Personnel Areas

At its 114th plenary meeting, on 14 September 1981, the General Assembly decided, in view of the fact that the members of the Committee of Governmental Experts to Evaluate the Present Structure of the Secretariat in the Administrative, Finance and Personnel Areas had just been appointed, to authorize the Committee to meet beyond the deadline of 1 September, provided for in paragraph 24 of Assembly decision 34/401, in order to perform its task and submit its report during the thirty-sixth session.

Continuation of the Committee

By a resolution of 18 December 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> adopted without vote, the General Assembly requested the Committee of Governmental Experts to continue its work, taking into account reports of the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) and the Secretary-General's comments, and to submit a final report in 1982. It asked the Secretary-General to consult with the Committee on the questions outlined in its 1981 report (p. 1376), to submit his views to the Assembly and to maintain the interim measures, within the existing administrative structure, which it had asked him to take in 1980<sup>(1)</sup> to ensure that the Office of Personnel Services had the authority to implement the personnel policies outlined by the Assembly. That was to be done without prejudice to the Assembly's decision on the Committee's report in 1982.

The Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee approved the draft, proposed by the Chairman after consultations, by consensus on 16 December. After Morocco proposed the deletion of paragraph 6, requesting that interim measures concerning the Office of Personnel Services be maintained, the Chairman, following further consultations, orally revised the paragraph to state that this should be done without prejudice to the Assembly's decision in 1982.

Explaining its position in the Fifth Committee, France said if a vote had been taken it would have voted against the extension of the mandate of the Committee of Governmental Experts; the organization of Secretariat units should be within the competence of the Secretary-General alone. France's view was endorsed by the Netherlands and the United States; the latter added it would have abstained but would none the less continue to assist in the Committee's work. The USSR said it shared the same doubts but, since there seemed to be general agreement, it would not object to continuation. The Federal Republic of Germany opposed the maintenance of interim measures, saying that the Department of Administration, Finance and Management should continue as an integrated structure.

Morocco said that, as a result of concessions to achieve consensus, the resolution did not correspond to its original wishes; it had not intended to divide the Secretary-General's responsibilities. Explaining its proposal to delete the paragraph on interim measures, Morocco said that, while it had no wish to undermine the efforts of the Committee of Governmental Experts, the ultimate responsibility for administrative and personnel matters had to be vested in the Secretary-General. Support for the Moroccan proposal was also expressed by France and the United States. Peru believed the interim measures were no longer required.

Sierra Leone, on the other hand, stated that the continuation of the Committee's mandate would not have been meaningful if the paragraph on interim measures had been deleted; those measures did not prejudice the continuity of the Secretariat's administration, nor did they restrict the Secretary-General. Rwanda also supported the extension of the Committee's mandate, emphasizing that it should work independently of the Secretariat. The Sudan said the Committee had been set up neither to resolve personal differences in the Secretariat nor to replace the Secretary-General.

Opposition to deletion of the paragraph was also expressed by the Bahamas, the Congo and Pakistan. Benin, supported by Ethiopia, Panama and Sierra Leone, said the paragraph was important; until the Committee completed its task, interim measures would have to remain. The United Republic of Tanzania thought deletion of the paragraph could have serious consequences; interim measures were needed because the Office of Personnel Services had a central role in implementing reforms. Trinidad and Tobago said deletion of the last paragraph might give the impression that the interim measures were to be discontinued; however, the paragraph should not be seen as derogating from the Secretary-General's authority.

Guinea, India and the United Republic of Cameroon urged Morocco to withdraw the proposal. India stated that the Committee of Experts had started its work on the assumption that the interim measures would remain in effect until it submitted its final report.

Renewal of the Committee's mandate was supported by a number of States, among them China, India, Mauritania, Norway (speaking for the Nordic countries), Pakistan, Panama, Poland, and Trinidad and Tobago. Benin thought the delay in setting up the Committee explained why it had completed only part of its work. Morocco stated that the Committee could only make recommendations, while the ultimate responsibility lay with the Secretary-General.

Belgium expressed the hope that the Committee would interview a sufficient number of women Secretariat officials.

Report of the Committee of Governmental Experts to Evaluate the Present Structure of the Secretariat in the Administrative, Finance and Personnel Areas

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 35/211 of 17 December 1980, by which it established the Committee of Governmental Experts to Evaluate the Present Structure of the Secretariat in the Administrative, Finance and Personnel Areas,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the report of the Committee of Governmental Experts to Evaluate the Present Structure of the Secretariat in the Administrative, Finance and Personnel Areas;

2. Requests the Committee to continue its work, taking into account the relevant reports of the Joint Inspection Unit, with the comments of the Secretary-General thereon, and to submit a final report to the General Assembly at its thirty-seventh session;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to consult with the Committee, prior to the next session of the Committee, on the questions outlined in its report;

4. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly his views on the final report of the Committee;

5. Decides to consider at its thirty-seventh session the final report of the Committee and the report of the Secretary-General thereon;

6. Further requests the Secretary-General to maintain the interim measures within the existing administrative structure as provided for in paragraph 4 of General Assembly resolution 35/211, pending and without prejudice to the decision to be taken by the Assembly at its thirty-seventh session.

Management services

A report describing the management services in the United Nations system<sup>(2)</sup> and suggesting changes to increase their effectiveness was completed by JIU in February 1981. The Secretary-General transmitted the report to the General Assembly in June and the comments of United Nations organizations in November.

The report stated that seven of the 11 participating organizations of JIU had management services, as did, within the United Nations, the United Nations Development Programme and the United Nations Office at Geneva. JIU made 21 recommendations on management improvement to ensure it higher priority.

It recommended that organizations carry out management improvement functions on a continuing basis, in addition to responding to specific problems and situations as they arose. Management services should ensure that the organization did not become fixed in routines and that policy changes were promptly reflected in rules and procedures. They should assume a leadership role in reviewing policies and procedures to simplify and rationalize them, with substantive offices participating actively, and should prepare and revise manuals of policies and procedures on a continuing basis. They should advise on staffing requirements through organization and methods reviews and through the establishment of norms and investigations, such as work measurement studies. Managers and staff should be involved in the preparation of long- and short-term management services work programmes.

Training programmes for management services staff must advance skills in a planned progression and emphasize know-how and experience in the behavioural sciences. With the help of management services units, supervisors and staff should be trained in modern management practices. Career development policies should provide for movement into and out of management services.

Organizations should foster links among management services units through short secondments of staff, assistance to smaller organizations through loans of management specialists, annual meetings of the heads and senior officers of management services units, shared training and exchange of information. They should seek to increase the resources of management services by reconsidering priorities and shifting budgetary allocations or by having staff of other units undertake specific management service assignments.

In their comments on the JIU report, United Nations organizations expressed agreement with most recommendations. The United Nations noted the concern voiced in the Assembly's Fifth Committee and elsewhere that it did not have manuals for finance, personnel and general administration, and reported that most sections of a new finance manual had been prepared. It suggested that JIU might propose, on a pilot basis, a basic outline for manuals in a number of areas, including purchasing and inventory control, but it did not support centralized preparation of manuals.

Another comment was that it was already standard practice for management services to advise on staffing requirements. Two organizations pointed out, however, that while work measurement techniques could be applied to repetitive tasks, methodologies to be applied to other tasks required development. The United Nations said there was great reluctance to accept and apply work standards.

Organizations supported the involvement of executive heads and staff members. They accepted the proposals that staff from other units should be drawn upon to help in carrying out management service projects and that managers and staff should be involved in review. With regard to training, they agreed that management services staff should be systematically trained in modern management practices. Organizations looked forward to co-operation in implementing the recommendations on centralized co-ordination of training, system-wide meetings and interchange between management services, and increased exchange of information.

The Assembly, in a decision of 18 December,<sup>(1)</sup> took note of the report, as well as of another JIU report on methods of determining staff requirements in the United Nations system (p. 1362).

Report: <sup>(2)</sup>JIU, transmitted by S-G note, A/36/296, and comments by UN system organizations, Add.1.

Administrative Management Service

The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) reported to the General Assembly in October 1981 on the United Nations Secretariat's Administrative Management Service (AMS).<sup>(1)</sup>

It noted that the activities of AMS in 1980 included management reviews of the Budget and Accounts Divisions of the Office of Financial Services, and reviews of the security function at the Palais des Nations, Geneva, and of staffing requirements of the Special Unit on Palestinian Rights, projects for which final reports were completed. Among projects for which draft reports were completed and sent to departments for comment were reviews of the Treasury Division of the Office of Financial Services, the, Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs, the secretariat of the Economic Commission for Africa, the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat), the common services at the United Nations Centre at Nairobi, Kenya, the Secretariat's editing function, and management and training at United Nations Headquarters. Future surveys would focus on a limited number of activities, including comparative studies of units performing similar functions and the resolution of difficulties arising from overlapping responsibilities between organizational units.

In its comments, ACABQ trusted that AMS would keep abreast of developments in office management, particularly regarding new technology. It favoured closer relations between AMS and such organs as JIU, the Board of Auditors and the Internal Audit Division. It believed that topics of AMS study should be identified in advance and that they should not duplicate those being investigated by JIU, the Board of Auditors or Secretariat units; ad hoc requests should be kept to a minimum. ACABQ recommended that AMS be permitted to submit biennial rather than annual reports, in keeping with the biennial budget cycle.

The Assembly, acting without vote on 18 December,<sup>(2)</sup> took note of the ACABQ report and endorsed its comments and recommendations. The Fifth Committee recommended that action without objection on 2 November, as orally proposed by its Chairman.

Explaining its position in the Committee, the United States said AMS could be useful in increasing Secretariat efficiency; closer links with other organs would be of benefit, although there should be no duplication of work.

Headquarters

Submitting an interim report on office accommodation at Headquarters<sup>(1)</sup> to the General Assembly in November 1981, the Secretary-General proposed to postpone until 1982 a full report on the cost of consolidating rented office space into new premises so that more precise financial and other implications could be presented.

The Secretary-General reported that a high-level committee had been established to assess needs and consider longer-term plans for the rationalization of office space arrangements. During the year, several Secretariat units were relocated in outside rented premises to alleviate overcrowding. However, since most of the foreseeable needs for the next several years would be met by the new United Nations Development Corporation building (located across United Nations Plaza from the main Headquarters buildings), it would not be prudent to undertake additional high-cost rental commitments before the building was ready for occupancy in 1983.

The Assembly, without vote, took note of the interim report on 18 December.<sup>(2)</sup> The Fifth Committee recommended that action without objection on 9 December, as orally proposed by its Chairman and the Chairman of ACABQ.

Nairobi

Construction

The General Assembly, on 18 December approved by a recorded vote of 130 to 9 a revised construction project at Nairobi, Kenya, for a permanent headquarters of the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) and for accommodation of other United Nations offices.

Under the programme budgets for 1978-1979 and 1980-1981, the Assembly had appropriated

$7,942,400 for the project. The balance of funds required, in the amount of $19,135,800, was included in the 1982-1983 programme budget adopted by the Assembly also on 18 December 1981.<sup>(5)</sup> The Fifth Committee, on the recommendation of ACABQ, approved that amount without vote on 8 December.

This action was taken after the Secretary-General reported to the Assembly in November<sup>(2)</sup> that the cost of the project in Kenyan shillings might be some KSh 14,637,300 higher than the KSh 254,944,000 limit approved by the Assembly in 1979. However, due to a devaluation of the Kenyan currency in relation to the United States dollar, he envisaged no increase in the dollar cost of the project, currently estimated at $27,078,200 but subject to change when construction bids were tendered in January 1982.

By its 18 December 1981 resolution,<sup>(4)</sup> the Assembly authorized the Secretary-General to enter into commitments in excess of appropriations, with the prior concurrence of ACABQ provided that the total cost of the project in United States dollars remained within the dollar equivalent of the original KSh 254,944,000 limit, using the exchange rate in effect in 1980 when the Assembly confirmed the limit<sup>(3)</sup> (KSh 7.33 = $US 1.00 at the United Nations operational rate of exchange).<sup>(6)</sup> He was requested to report on those commitments as well as on the results of the tendering of bids.

The Assembly acted on the recommendation of ACABQ<sup>(1)</sup> approved without objection by the Fifth Committee on 8 December 1981.

Explaining its position in the Committee, the USSR said it would have voted against the proposal, had it been put to a vote. Iraq, on the other hand, said it was pleased that the proposal was adopted; the construction project should result in model facilities. Kenya said there could be no question of not performing work already authorized by the Assembly; future exchange-rate fluctuations and cost inflation would be absorbed in the normal way.

United Nations accommodation at Nairobi

[The General Assembly...]

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on United Nations accommodation at Nairobi and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

1. Approves the revised construction project at Nairobi;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions as soon as possible on the results of the tendering and to make recommendations based on those results;

3. Authorizes the Secretary-General to enter into commitments, with the prior concurrence of the Advisory Committee. In excess of the appropriations, provided that the total cost of the project in United States dollars remains within the dollar equivalent of 254,944,000 Kenyan shillings at the time the General Assembly specified that amount as the limit of the cost of the project, reflecting the commitments in question, if any, in the performance report to be submitted to the Assembly at its thirty-seventh session;

Common services

Agreement was reached in 1981 that a common organizational unit should administer certain administrative services required by the two main Secretariat entities located at the United Nations Centre at Nairobi-UNEP and the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (UNCHS), also known as Habitat.

Reporting to the General Assembly in November<sup>(2)</sup> on that agreement, reached between the Executive Directors of UNEP and UNCHS, the Secretary-General stated that the common unit would administer services which either were primarily in support of the physical layout or stood alone as independent service functions, such as buildings and grounds management and the medical service. It had not been possible to achieve an agreed division of responsibilities in regard to certain other administrative functions, including personnel administration, recruitment and financial services. Resources for the central unit would be drawn from both extrabudgetary resources and the United Nations regular budget. The Secretary-General said he would report to the Assembly in 1982 following further consultations.

Commenting on the report,<sup>(1)</sup> ACABQ urged the Secretary-General to achieve further progress on the remaining common services before completion of the construction project (p. 1380). It said a common approach would be in the interest of the United Nations and trusted that objective criteria would be used in determining which of the remaining functions would be assigned to a common unit. ACABQ believed that the common unit's staff should be provided to the maximum extent possible through redeployment. It would consider unacceptable a continuation of common service functions as currently performed, with only co-ordination by the common unit.

The Assembly, without vote, took note on 18 December of the Secretary-General's report and the comments of ACABQ.<sup>(3)</sup> The Fifth Committee recommended this action without objection on 8 December, as orally proposed by the Chairman.

In the Committee, Canada expressed appreciation of the Secretary-General's report and of the progress already achieved; it agreed with ACABQ that, even though managerial authority was vested in each of the Executive Directors, the final decision on common service functions should be taken in the best interest of the Organization as a whole.

Vienna

An agreement between the United Nations and Austria regarding the headquarters of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization and other offices at the Vienna International Centre-regulating the occupancy of the Centre by international organizations, including the use of the land, buildings and facilities-entered into force on 1 October 1981.

An agreement between the United Nations, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) and Austria regarding the establishment and administration of a common fund for financing major repairs and replacements at the Vienna

International Centre was signed and entered into force with effect from 1 January 1981. The cost of such work would be borne equally by the parties, except that the United Nations and IAEA would not be required to pay more than $225,000 a year each; expenditures beyond those amounts would be met by the Austrian Government. A protocol to that agreement, which entered into force on the same date, listed elements to be used in deciding whether a repair or replacement was major and thus to be financed from the fund.

Reporting to the General Assembly in September,<sup>(1)</sup> ACABQ said it regretted not having had the opportunity to comment on the agreement prior to signature. It trusted that the provision regarding disbursements would be applied with the proviso that neither the United Nations nor IAEA would have to pay for repairs which were the responsibility of the Government. The Secretary-General had given assurances that no reimbursement would be made for repairs necessitated by force majeure or due to faulty material, design or labour, since under the agreement such expenses were to be borne by the Government. In the Advisory Committee's interpretation, the ceiling of 225,000 for annual payments included a limit on liability for payment.

The ACABQ report added that the Secretary-General planned to develop a long-range major maintenance and replacement programme which would be updated biennially and submitted to ACABQ for review in connection with the biennial budget; he intended to submit the first of these with the 1984-1985 budget. ACABQ believed, and the Secretary-General agreed, that proposed revisions of the ceiling on financial responsibility should be reviewed by it before the Secretary-General accepted them.

The Assembly, without vote, took note of the ACABQ report on 18 December 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> endorsed its observations and understandings, and took into account the Secretary-General's assurances. The Fifth Committee recommended this action without objection on 11 November, as orally proposed by the Chairman.

Explaining its position, Austria said its participation in the Fifth Committee decision would not prejudice its legal rights under the agreement in question, which must be executed in accordance with the provisions of international law governing the application and interpretation of treaties.

Canada regretted that the agreement had been signed before being submitted to ACABQ; it was important that the Assembly took note of the Advisory Committee's observations but, since the latter was not a party to the agreement, it was not clear what legal validity those might have.

Vienna International Centre

The General Assembly

1 Takes note with appreciation of the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions on the Vienna International Centre as well as of the agreements referred to therein;

2 Endorses the observations and understandings put forward by the Advisory Committee with respect to those agreements;

3 Takes into account the assurances given by the Secretary-General on the various concerns expressed by the Advisory Committee in its report.

Addis Ababa

On the recommendation of the Economic and Social Council, made on 24, July 1981, the General Assembly requested on 17 December a study of the adequacy of conference facilities at the headquarters of the Economic Commission for Africa at Addis Ababa, Ethiopia (p. 634).

Building construction procedures

In accordance with a 1979 General Assembly resolution,<sup>(3)</sup> the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) reported in February 1981 on building construction procedures of United Nations organizations. The Secretary-General transmitted its report to the Assembly in June.<sup>(2)</sup> The report was based on information from the United Nations and four agencies on their general practices for 12 projects and on detailed information for six of those.

The Inspectors stated that most buildings in their survey had been designed with insufficient flexibility to meet evolving requirements, and recommended that consideration be given to the cost-effectiveness of each building over its lifetime. Organizations had abandoned too much responsibility for control and supervision of building design and construction. In order for them to deal effectively with architects and building contractors, organizations should form an in-house technical team, engage a consulting firm or combine both approaches. Architects for large projects should be chosen through international competition and contracts should contain clauses on architects' financial responsibility for errors or omissions.

Organizations should maintain responsibility for construction management, cost estimating and quantity surveying. Non-revisable fixed-price contracts should be eliminated except for jobs of one year or less. Revisable fixed-price contracts were preferable to cost-plus-fee contracts where the organization bore a greater share of the risk. Bonds should be used to protect organizations against a contractor not fulfilling his obligations. There should be rigorous application of competitive bidding, wherever possible on an international basis. A sufficient number of contractors should submit bids and organizations should have the technical expertise to evaluate them. The Assembly might request the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) to pay special attention to building projects and report on them promptly to the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee. More attention should be given to the preparation of accurate cost estimates.

Comments on the JIU report were made by the Secretary-General in October<sup>(2)</sup> and by ACABQ in November.<sup>(1)</sup>

The Secretary-General remarked that, because decisions regarding space requirements could be affected by political and financial considerations, each situation needed individual consideration. It would be desirable to establish a special unit to plan, supervise and control major new construction at United Nations Headquarters; at other United Nations offices, limited technical personnel should be supplemented by in-house staff or consultants. International competitions to select architects were better suited to projects involving new buildings than to alteration and modification work. It was planned that architectural contracts at Headquarters would provide for different fee levels according to the nature of the project.

The Secretary-General welcomed the active interest of ACABQ in past projects and expected its guidance in future. He noted that the preparation of cost estimates during inflation and currency revaluation was not a simple matter, nor was it possible to foresee delays in work due to such problems as energy shortages and strikes. Some of the JIU recommendations would increase the initial estimates of construction costs, although they were predicated on the expectation that costs would be recouped by reducing actual construction costs and through flexibility of use and maintenance.

In its report, ACABQ concurred with JIU on the need for a clear delineation of responsibilities and for supervision, control and co-ordination in construction projects. For construction away from Headquarters, the Under-Secretary-General for Administration, Finance and Management and the Assistant Secretary-General of the Office of General Services should provide the central point of overall direction and control. Before a decision was taken on construction projects, the Assembly and other intergovernmental bodies should be given information, including options that took into account a forecast of long-range needs.

The technical expertise, knowledge and experience in the United Nations system should be shared. The rigorous application of competitive bidding would reduce costs and ensure the quality and timely completion of projects. The report outlined how the Secretary-General's procedures for construction project proposals could be refined to allow for closer involvement of ACABQ at the earliest stages.

The Assembly took note of the JIU report on 18 December.<sup>(4)</sup>

Security measures

The General Assembly, on 18 December 1981,<sup>(5)</sup> by a recorded vote of 128 to 10, authorized the Secretary-General to enter into commitments for interorganization security measures in an amount not exceeding $300,000 in a biennium and to seek reimbursement from other organizations in accordance with an agreed cost-sharing formula. It authorized him to enter into commitments in excess of that amount with the prior concurrence of ACABQ and requested him to report security-related expenditures and the related reimbursements to the Assembly.

The Assembly's Fifth Committee recommended that action on 19 November without objection, as orally proposed by the Chairman on the recommendation of ACABQ.

A similar authorization was given by the Assembly in another resolution of 18 December, on unforeseen and extraordinary expenses for 1982-1983.

Explaining its position in the Fifth Committee, the Byelorussian SSR said that, if the ACABQ recommendation had been put to a vote, it would have voted against. The USSR declared it would have abstained, while Sweden and Yugoslavia expressed their support.

Measures to deal with threats to the safety of staff members and property at field offices of United Nations organizations were initially proposed on 14 April by the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC).<sup>(6)</sup> In its annual overview report to the Economic and Social Council,<sup>(2)</sup> ACC noted an increase of instances in which the safety of persons and property had been endangered. On the basis of recommendations by an Ad Hoc Inter-agency Meeting on Security Matters (Crisis Management in the Field) in January, ACC approved various measures including those relating to security facilities and evacuation procedures.

ACC reaffirmed a 1980 decision that each agency should designate a field security coordinator and an alternate. It agreed that security facilities for housing should be provided on a system-wide basis and recommended that the Secretary-General remind host Governments of their responsibility for protecting United Nations personnel and property. It requested the United Nations and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) to study arguments for and against the employment of security guards for private housing and to study the introduction of a system-wide identity card. It asked United Nations organizations to provide the host Government with a list of staff and agreed that a designated official might require the evacuation of dependants when staff members had to remain on duty.

It endorsed a 1980 decision to establish a Global Security Fund to cover the costs of evacuation operations and provision of short-term security personnel and movable security equipment. It decided that the Fund should remain at $400,000 and that the possibility of increasing it should be considered only after gaining experience of its operation at that level.

In May, members of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination expressed dismay over the ACC decision to establish the Fund, questioned its authority to do so and asked who would contribute to it.<sup>(3)</sup> A proposal for its establishment should first have been submitted to an intergovernmental body for approval.

The Secretary-General reported to the Assembly in October<sup>(4)</sup> that, in collaboration with UNDP, he had formulated a plan for the establishment of the Fund as a special account administered by the United Nations and contributed to by all participating organizations.

In November,<sup>(1)</sup> ACABQ reported that, according to the Secretary-General's representatives, approximately $130,000 in security-related expenditures had been incurred in the preceding 18 months, mainly for the purchase of radio equipment. Should the Assembly approve the establishment of the Fund at an initial level of $400,000 in 1982-1983, approximately half would be used for the purchase of additional mobile communications equipment. The balance would be held in reserve for servicing the equipment, travel of security staff, the provision of emergency food and health supplies, and emergency transportation.

ACABQ stated that the desired objective of the Fund could, however, be attained without its establishment. Accordingly, it recommended the action which the Assembly subsequently took (p. 1383) and which required no additional appropriations.

Computers and information systems

Co-ordination of information systems

The Economic and Social Council, on 23 July 1981, adopted without vote a resolution on strengthening the inter-agency co-ordination of information systems.<sup>(2)</sup> Affirming the importance to Governments of timely and accurate information on the United Nations system, it requested the Secretary-General to submit in 1982 a report which would include ACC recommendations on enhancing co-ordination, bearing in mind recommendations made in 1979 by the Joint Inspection Unit.<sup>(5)</sup> The Council asked ACC to draw up a proposal for ensuring the cost-effective compatibility of computerized information systems, including the continued elaboration of vocabularies of common terminology. It requested the Secretary-General to engage independent experts to prepare the proposals and recommendations. The Council also asked ACC to reconsider its decision that the Inter-Organization Board for Information Systems should no longer retain operational functions (p. 1386).

The Council's Third (Programme and Co-ordination) Committee approved the draft without vote on 17 July 1981. The text was introduced by the United States, also on behalf of Belgium, Japan, Norway, Spain and the United Kingdom, and was orally revised by the sponsors so that the Secretary-General would report to the Council with the agreed recommendations of ACC, rather than have the Council request United Nations organizations to report their agreed recommendations to the Council. The sponsors also revised the paragraph on the preparation of recommendations by experts, so as to characterize the experts as independent rather than international.

On 30 October,<sup>(3)</sup> ACC decided to appoint two experts to assist it in developing its proposals. Their terms of reference stipulated that they should assess the scope for the harmonization of, and compatibility between, information systems in order to: provide access to programme and project planning, implementation and evaluation, and to information on the United Nations system; facilitate access to and exchange of information, particularly that of a scientific and technical nature; and utilize and exchange experience on technological developments, particularly in computer communications. They should recommend measures for those purposes, including the development of common terminologies and indexing vocabularies, and assess the main operational implications and benefits to be derived from the recommended measures. ACC decided to convene an ad hoc inter-agency meeting, as soon as possible after the report of the experts became available, to prepare a draft report for the Economic and Social Council.

The Secretary-General reported those developments to the Council in October.<sup>(1)</sup> On 2 November, the Council, acting without vote on an oral pro proposal by its President, took note of the report.<sup>(4)</sup>

In a related action, the General Assembly decided on 18 December to continue the Information Systems Unit in the United Nations Secretariat's Department of International Economic and Social Affairs and to finance it within the United Nations budget (p. 397).

Strengthening of the co-ordination of information systems
The Economic and Social Council.

Recalling its interest in the co-ordination of information systems as expressed in Council resolution 1889(LVII) of 31 July 1974, in which it recommended, inter alia, that the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination should strengthen the Inter-Organization Board for Information Systems and its staff,

Aware of the concern and serious need of recipients of services of the United Nations system for the strengthening of the planning and delivery of effective activities,

Recognizing the importance, for maximizing the development activities of the United Nations system in favour of developing countries, of the harmonization of information systems,

Stressing the importance to all Member States of easily accessible comprehensive information on the applications of the resources made available to the United Nations system,

Emphasizing the importance of rationalizing, co-ordinating and ensuring the useful compatibility of hardware, software, and data-set information systems,

Recalling the recommendations for the strengthening of the Inter-Organization Board for Information Systems made by the Joint Inspection Unit in its report concerning the co-ordination of information systems,

1 Endorses the recommendation of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination at its twenty-first session that the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination should review its decision 1981/3, by which it had terminated the operational functions of the Inter-Organization Board for Information Systems and abolished its secretariat:

2. Affirms that timely and accurate information on the activities, resources, results and findings of the United Nations system is important to Governments in enabling them to participate more effectively in the programme planning and evaluation process;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report to the Economic and Social Council at its first regular session of 1982, including the agreed recommendations of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination on methods of enhancing the effectiveness of the co-ordination of the information systems in the United Nations system, bearing in mind the recommendations of the Joint Inspection Unit;

4. Requests the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination to include in the recommendations called for in paragraph 3 above a detailed proposal for ensuring the cost-effective compatibility of computerized information systems, including the continued elaboration of vocabularies of common terminology;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, as Chairman of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination, to engage immediately, within the limits of existing resources, independent recognized experts to prepare recommendations which will assist in developing the proposals and recommendations mentioned in paragraphs 3 and 4 above.

Economic and Social Council decision 1981/197

Adopted without vote

Oral proposal by Council President: agenda item 2.

Strengthening the co-ordination of information systems

At Its 43rd plenary meeting, on 2 November 1981, the Council took note of the report of the Secretary-General on strengthening the co-ordination of information systems, submitted in accordance with a decision taken by the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination, in pursuance of Council resolution 1981/63 of 23 July 1981.

Inter-Organization Board for Information Systems

Continuation of IOB. On 14 April 1981,<sup>(5)</sup> ACC decided to continue the Inter-Organization Board for Information Systems (IOB) as a clearing-house and forum for the exchange of experience on information systems within the United Nations system, but without operational functions or an operational secretariat. The Chairman of IOB, a body composed of representatives of the United Nations and a number of specialized agencies, was asked to report to ACC on the practical arrangements for implementing the decision, and IOB was requested to report regularly to ACC on its activities.

In May, ACC reported to the Economic and Social Council<sup>(1)</sup> that the IOB Chairman had concluded that the intrinsic value of what the IOB machinery had produced could not be regarded as commensurate with the effort made. The report added that participating organizations should individually assume a more active role and absorb the cost within existing resources.

In June,<sup>(3)</sup> the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination (CPC) expressed surprise and dissatisfaction over the ACC decision, noting that IOB had made modest progress and had achieved some positive results. Recalling the importance that Member States attached to establishing a centralized means of examining proposals to create new information systems and ensuring their compatibility, CPC recommended that ACC review its decision and requested it to submit to the Council in July the measures it advocated for enhancing the effectiveness of information system co-ordination.

Reporting to the Council in July,<sup>(2)</sup> ACC suggested arrangements for continuing certain IOB activities, including the following. The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) would assume responsibility for servicing IOB as a forum for the exchange of experience, limited to documentary information systems. With the co-operation of participating organizations, UNESCO would maintain and update such information tools as the Directory of United Nations Information Systems and the Common Register of United Nations Serial Publications. Under the general responsibility of the ACC Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions, the United Nations Development Programme would become responsible for the data base of CORE 1—the first phase of the Common Register for Development Activities—designed to produce a financial analysis of the development expenditures of United Nations organizations by sector and country. Organizations participating in CORE 1 would make financial contributions and supply information.

ACC noted that co-ordination of information systems was a complex matter and that there was a desire to rationalize systems and halt their proliferation, while at the same time there were repeated calls for ambitious new systems. To entrust IOB with the power and responsibility to vet new or redesigned systems would involve virtually insuperable difficulties. ACC did not consider it justified to devote scarce resources to endeavours having uncertain results.

On 23 July,<sup>(7)</sup> the Economic and Social Council decided without vote to take note of the ACC report. The Third Committee approved the decision in like manner on 17 July, as orally proposed by its Chairman.

On the same day, in its resolution on strengthening the co-ordination of information systems, the Council endorsed the CPC recommendation that ACC should review its decision to terminate the operational functions of IOB.<sup>(4)</sup>

On 30 October,<sup>(6)</sup> ACC decided to continue the IOB staff in service until the April 1982 session of ACC and to approve, on a contingency basis, a 1982 budget for the IOB secretariat (p. 1387) at the 1980-1981 level, subject to the standard adjustments for inflation and currency fluctuations, on the understanding that ACC would decide in April 1982 on the continued use of funds.

Report of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination on co-ordination of information systems
In the United Nations family

At its 40th plenary meeting, on 23 July 1981, the Council took note of the report of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination on co-ordination of information systems in the United Nations family.

Financing of IOB. On 24 November 1981, the General Assembly's Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee decided without vote to approve $280,500 as the United Nations share of the 1982 budget of IOB. The Committee acted on the recommendation of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ), on the basis of a contingency budget submitted by ACC. The total budget, as reported by the Secretary-General in November 1981,<sup>(1)</sup> amounted to $674,300, taking into account the ACC decision of 30 October regarding the staff and budget of IOB (p. 1386).

International Computing Centre

The General Assembly, on 18 December 1981,<sup>(2)</sup> approved without vote 1982 budget estimates in the amount of 5,343,100 for the International Computing Centre (ICC), an inter-agency facility at Geneva financed by the United Nations and 12 other participating United Nations organizations and programmes.

The Fifth Committee recommended this action without objection on 24 November, as proposed orally by its Chairman on an oral recommendation of the Chairman of ACABQ.

The budget estimates were submitted by the Secretary-General in November,<sup>(1)</sup> following a review by a panel of the ACC Consultative Committee on Administrative Questions, composed of representatives from organizations using ICC services. During that review, the ICC Director noted that there was a movement away from the use of central computer facilities towards mini- and micro-computers.

The share of the United Nations in the 1982 budget came to $1.7 million.

UN postage stamps

The 1981 gross revenue of the United Nations Postal Administration from the sale of philatelic items at United Nations Headquarters and at overseas offices totalled almost $17 million. Revenue derived from the sale of stamps for philatelic purposes was retained by the United Nations; revenue from stamps used for postage from United Nations Headquarters was retained by the United States Postal Service in accordance with an agreement between the United Nations and the United States Government. Similarly, revenue from stamps used for postage from the Palais des Nations, Geneva, and from the Vienna International Centre was retained by the Swiss and Austrian postal, telephone and telegraph enterprises, in accordance with agreements between the United Nations and the Swiss and Austrian Governments.

Six commemorative stamps and two souvenir cards were issued.

The theme of the first commemorative stamp, issued on 30 January, was "Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People". The denominations were 15 cents, 0.80 Swiss francs (SwF) and 4 Austrian schillings (S).

The second commemorative, issued on 6 March, paid tribute to the "International Year of Disabled Persons". The stamps were issued in denominations of 20 and 31 cents, SwF 0.40 and 1.50 and S 4 and 6. A souvenir card was also issued.

On 15 April, the Fresco stamp, in the "Art at the United Nations" series, was the third commemorative to be issued, in denominations of 20 and 31 cents, SwF 0.80 and S 6.

"New and Renewable Sources of Energy" was the theme of the fourth commemorative stamp, issued on 29 May in denominations of 20 and 31 cents, SwF 1.10 and S 7.50. A souvenir card was issued at the same time.

The second group of 16 stamps was issued in the commemorative "Flag Series" on 25 September, in denominations of 20 cents each.

The sixth and final commemorative issue for 1981 was "10th Anniversary of the United Nations Volunteers Programme". The stamps were issued in denominations of 20 and 31 cents, SwF 0.40 and 0.70, and S 5 and 7.

By the end of 1981, United Nations stamps were available for purchase in local currency to collectors in 115 countries outside the United States.

The number of first-day covers serviced for the various issues in 1981 was as follows:

Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People	453,479
International Year of Disabled Persons	698,347
Fresco	529,277
New and Renewable Sources of Energy	570,102
Flag Series	3,961,237
10th Anniversary of the United Nations Volunteers Programme	694,187

In line with a December 1980 Assembly decision to issue stamps on the conservation and protection of nature,<sup>(2)</sup> the Postal Administration, with the advice and assistance of the United Nations Environment Programme, selected the six themes of flora, insects, reptiles, birds, mammals, and fish and other marine life, each of which was to be the subject of a stamp. A stamp design competition was organized and 206 designs by 59 artists from 23 countries were received. An Interdepartmental Stamp Design Committee selected the winning designs and international bids were sought for the printing of the issue. The stamps were to be released in November 1982.

In an October 1981 report<sup>(1)</sup> to the General Assembly on the United Nations financial emergency (p. 1295), the Secretary-General estimated the net revenue from their sale at $2 million. Part of this was to be earmarked for promoting, under United Nations auspices, the conservation and protection of nature and endangered species; the rest was to be placed in a special account, as required by the Assembly's 1980 resolution.

In a resolution of 10 December 1981,<sup>(3)</sup> the Assembly noted that a partial or interim solution to the Organization's financial problem could enhance its liquidity and might facilitate progress towards a comprehensive settlement. It requested the Secretary-General to submit in 1982 a progress report on the postage stamp project.

Intergovernmental organizations related to the United Nations

Chapter I

International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA)

In 1981, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) continued its activities to accelerate and enlarge the contribution of atomic energy to peace, health and prosperity throughout the world and to ensure that the assistance provided was not used for military purposes.

Continued emphasis was placed on safeguards, the safety of nuclear power stations, nuclear fuel-cycle services and the management of nuclear waste, and the provision of technical assistance to member States, particularly the developing countries.

The Agency's responsibility in the field of safeguards was the focus of discussions in 1981 following an attack by Israel on an Iraqi nuclear research centre on 7 June (p. 275).

At the end of 1981, the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons<sup>a</sup> (Non-Proliferation Treaty) had 113 non-nuclear-weapon States parties (Antigua and Barbuda, and Egypt became parties during the year; Cape Verde's accession in 1979 was notified to IAEA on 7 May 1982) and 98 per cent of the world's nuclear facilities outside the nuclear-weapon States were under IAEA safeguards. The Agency continued its efforts to improve the effectiveness and efficiency of its international safeguards system, which aimed at deterring the proliferation of nuclear weapons by early detection, while respecting States' sovereign rights. Work also continued on assuring supplies of nuclear material, equipment and technology and fuel-cycle services, on possible schemes for international storage of plutonium and on the international management of spent fuel.

Progress in completing an up-to-date set of internationally agreed safety standards for nuclear power plants-IAEA's Nuclear Safety Standards (NUSS)-was made during the year and the Agency assisted member States in implementing NUSS recommendations through advisory missions and training courses.

Revised Basic Safety Standards for Radiation Protection were approved in 1981. These were the result of a joint effort between IAEA and the World Health Organization (WHO), the International Labour Organisation (ILO) and the Nuclear Energy Agency (NEA) of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development; they were based on recommendations of the International Commission on Radiological Protection (ICRP), an independent non-governmental expert body. Increasing emphasis was also given to an exchange of information in such fields as safety research, nuclear-plant operating experience and emergency preparedness.

Membership of IAEA remained at 110 in 1981. Zimbabwe, admitted to membership by the IAEA General Conference on 21 September 1981, had not deposited its instrument of acceptance as at 31 December.

The twenty-fifth session of the General Conference of IAEA was held at Vienna, Austria, from 21 to 26 September. The Conference decided, among other things: to suspend immediately the provision of any assistance to Israel under the Agency's technical assistance programme and to consider at its 1982 regular session the suspension of Israel from the exercise of the privileges and rights of membership, if by that time it had not complied with a Security Council resolution of 19 June 1981 (p. 276); to request the IAEA Board of Governors-its executive organ-to submit recommendations on proposed amendments to its statute in relation to representation on the Board of the areas of Africa and of the Middle East and south Asia; to appoint Hans Blix (Sweden) as IAEA Director-General for a four-year term; to confer the title of "Director-General Emeritus of the International Atomic Energy Agency" upon Sigvard Eklund, who retired in 1981, as Director-General; to request the Board of Governors to take the necessary measures so that technical assistance might be funded through IAEA's regular budget or through other assured resources and so that such funds were increased to respond adequately to increasing requirements; and to request the Director-General to increase substantially the number of staff members drawn from developing areas, particularly at the senior and policy-making levels.

The Board of Governors met four times during 1981, in February, June, July/August and September, at Vienna.

Agency safeguards responsibilities

As at 31 December 1981, 113 non-nuclear-weapon States and three nuclear-weapon States (USSR, United Kingdom, United States) had ratified or acceded to the Non-Proliferation Treaty. Safeguards agreements with IAEA, concluded under article III of the Treaty, had entered into force for 70 non-nuclear-weapon States parties. An agreement with France and the European Atomic Energy Community (EURATOM) under which IAEA might apply safeguards to certain nuclear material in civil nuclear facilities in France entered into effect on 12 September 1981. Similar agreements had previously entered into force with the United Kingdom (1978) and the United States (1980).

Agency safeguards were applied under other agreements in 10 non-nuclear-weapon States not party to the Treaty but having substantial nuclear activities, namely Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, India, Israel, Pakistan, South Africa and Spain, as well as with Cuba and Viet Nam. In eight of these States, all substantial nuclear activities known to IAEA were covered by a network of individual safeguards agreements.

On 17 December, Greece acceded to the 1973 safeguards agreement concluded between the non-nuclear-weapon States of EURATOM, EURATOM itself and IAEA.

At the end of 1981, safeguards applied by IAEA covered material in 133 power reactors, in 176 research reactors and critical assemblies, in four conversion, 39 fuel fabrication, seven reprocessing and four enrichment plants, and in 486 other nuclear installations.

Technical assistance

During 1981, more than 70 countries received IAEA technical assistance in the form of expert services or equipment or both. A total of 608 fellows were carrying out individual field studies, and 595 persons participated in 28 group training projects. Technical assistance provided by IAEA in 1981 exceeded $21 million in value, 11.3 per cent higher than in 1980.

The Agency served as the executing agency for 37 large-scale projects financed by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). Among these were: installation and operation of a research and service reactor (Albania); a national centre for non-destructive testing and quality control, and nuclear engineering (Argentina); exploration for atomic minerals (Bangladesh, Chile, Colombia, Greece, India, Madagascar, Malawi); nuclear manpower training, and development of agriculture through nuclear technology (Brazil); a centre for isotope application (Bulgaria); a nuclear power plant (Chile); introduction and techniques application of nuclear techniques (Cuba, Ethiopia, Ghana, Senegal); a national centre for radiation technology (Egypt); radiation processing for industries (Indonesia); applied nuclear physics training and research (Morocco); nuclear techniques in animal production (Nigeria); nuclear energy (Peru); training in nuclear power-plant safety analysis, engineering and public information, and manpower development (Philippines); nuclear technology (Romania); radioactive tracer techniques for studying coastal sedimentology (Sri Lanka); industrial application of high-energy ionizing radiation, and uranium analysis and ecological laboratories (Yugoslavia); strengthening the infrastructure of the regional centre for nuclear studies at Kinshasa (Zaire); nuclear analytical techniques (regional, Africa); industrial application of isotopes and radiation technology, and nuclear techniques training in the mineral industry (regional, Asia and the Pacific); and Rift Valley fever control and modern techniques in physics (interregional).

The Agency also continued to provide large-scale assistance to projects in Bangladesh and India for the use of nuclear techniques in agricultural research, financed by Sweden. A project funded by the Federal Republic of Germany, Sweden and the United Kingdom provided assistance for control of the tsetse fly in Nigeria.

The target for member States' voluntary contributions to IAEA's regular programme was $13 million in 1981, of which $11.86 million was pledged. Other sources of support for the technical assistance programme were UNDP funds ($5.2 million) extrabudgetary contributions ($3.6 million) and assistance in kind ($2.8 million).

Nuclear power

At the end of 1981, 272 nuclear power plants with a total capacity of 152,603 megawatts (electrical) (MW(e)) accounted for around 9 per cent of the world's electricity-generating capacity. The record of operating nuclear power plants continued to be excellent; 2,600 reactor years had accumulated without any significant spread of radioactivity to the environment or any radiation-induced fatality.

The Agency continued to help its developing member States introduce nuclear-powered electricity-generating plants by assistance with planning surveys, feasibility studies and the evaluation of technical bids. It also continued preparation of a series of guidebooks, for example, on manpower development for nuclear power, on technical evaluation of bids for nuclear power plants, on the introduction of nuclear power, on the interaction of grid characteristics with the design and performance of nuclear power plants, and on nuclear power plant instrumentation and control.

In 1981, six interregional training courses, four of which focused on special aspects of nuclear power plant safety, were attended by 200 participants from developing countries. During the year IAEA continued to develop its energy data bank and to collect and disseminate information on nuclear technology and the reliability of nuclear power plants.

A computerized power-reactor information system was established which contained nuclear power plant operating-experience data provided by member States since 1971.

Environment

Because the future growth of nuclear power was felt to depend to a large extent on providing evidence of the capability to manage radioactive waste safely, IAEA continued to attach importance to its waste management programme, addressing the technological, environmental, safety and regulatory aspects of the treatment and disposal of radioactive waste. Two technical reports, reviewing the technology of waste handling and treatment, and three reports in a Safety Series, containing guidance on the safe underground disposal of radioactive waste, were completed for publication in 1981.

Work was begun on a code of practice for, and a seminar was held in the Federal Republic of Germany in October on, the management of radioactive waste from nuclear power plants; a symposium was also organized, jointly with NEA, on the migration of long-lived radionuclides in the terrestrial environment (Knoxville, Tennessee, United States, in July).

At IAEA's request and within its responsibilities under the 1975 Convention on the Prevention of Marine Pollution by Dumping of Wastes and Other Matter, a United Nations Joint Group of Experts on the Scientific Aspects of Marine Pollution was reviewing, with a view to recommending improvements, the oceanographic model used for the definition of high-level radioactive waste under the Convention.

Nuclear safety

The Agency continued development of its safety standards and regulations for nuclear power plants: 37 of 57 planned safety guides were completed. An extensive effort to implement those standards was under way by means of training courses, seminars and visits by experts to member States. The Basic Safety Standards for Radiation Protection of workers and the general public, developed by IAEA, were revised in 1981 to reflect the latest ICRP recommendations.

Advisory services continued throughout the year to member States with developing nuclear programmes; some 24 missions dealt with a wide spectrum of safety issues, from general questions such as problems of organizing a national regulatory authority to those which involved specific details such as mechanical problems with a particular nuclear power-plant component.

The exchange of information continued to be emphasized. Safety information was transmitted in many training courses given by IAEA throughout the world.

The Agency also maintained its radiological assistance plan, involving about 20 duty officers ready to deal with radiation-release accidents. New publications and training courses strengthened the programme of emergency preparedness planning, and special assistance missions were sent to member States to develop, evaluate and improve their emergency plans.

Nuclear information

The International Nuclear Information System, with 67 participating countries and 14 international organizations, provided a comprehensive nuclear information and abstracting service from its file of more than 640,000 items.

Life sciences

In co-operation with WHO, IAEA continued to promote the use of nuclear techniques in medicine, biology and health-related environmental research and to conduct research on techniques for improving the accuracy of radiation dosimetry.

Symposia were held in June on health impacts of different sources of energy (Nashville, Tennessee, United States) and nuclear techniques in the study and control of parasitic diseases (Munich, Federal Republic of Germany). Seminars treated quality assurance in the use of nuclear medicine instruments, and the prospective methods of radiation therapy in developing countries. Advisory groups dealt with: nuclear-based techniques for the in vivo study of human body composition; immunological and pathological criteria associated with the use of radiation-attenuated vaccines; radiation treatment of domestic wastes; and high-dose inter-comparisons for industrial purposes.

The IAEA/WHO network of Secondary Standard Dosimetry Laboratories encompassed 43 member laboratories, 30 of which were located in developing countries. Thirteen co-ordinated research programmes were continued and developed during 1981. These related to: maintenance of equipment and quality control of radioassay techniques in nuclear medicine; trace elements in nutrition and in environmental pollution; high-dose standardization and inter-comparison; radiation sterilization of medical supplies; preparation of irradiated vaccines; improved methods of radiotherapy; radiation-induced chromosomal changes and biological hazards of low-level radiation.

Physical sciences and laboratories

The role of IAEA in co-ordinating the international effort in controlled fusion was reflected in the continuation of the INTOR (International Tokamak Reactor) Workshop, in which scientists from the major fusion laboratories of EURATOM, Japan, the USSR and the United States participated. The conceptual design of the machine was completed in July 1981 and work on optimization of the design and cost/benefit/risk analysis of design alternatives was under way.

A UNDP preparatory assistance project on industrial applications of isotopes and radiation technology was fully implemented in Asia and the Pacific region under the Regional Co-operation Agreement for Research, Development and Training Related to Nuclear Science and Technology (RCA)-in force in 1981 for IAEA and for 13 member States in that region-in the field of nucleonic control systems for paper gauging, non-destructive testing, radiation processing of rubber, and nuclear instrument maintenance.

Efforts continued to be devoted to radioisotope production for medical purposes by the use of accelerators and research reactors. Within the isotope hydrology programme, isotope techniques were used, in co-operation with other organizations of the United Nations system, to help 25 member States in the assessment of their water resources. A regional seminar was held in Colombo, Sri Lanka, in November to inform hydrologists at the management level, from countries in Asia and the Pacific region, of the potential and scope of isotope hydrological techniques in water resources development investigations.

The Agency continued to provide nuclear data services to member States. In response to requests, which increased by more than 50 per cent during the year, 778 nuclear data reports, 54 data-processing codes and 56,000 numerical data sets were distributed to scientists. With the aim of training nuclear scientists in developing countries, IAEA initiated a new research programme on the measurement and analysis of fast-neutron nuclear data.

The International Laboratory of Marine Radioactivity in Monaco, with the co-operation of the United Nations Environment Programme and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, conducted studies in the occurrence, distribution and behaviour of radionuclides and other pollutants in the Mediterranean Sea and the Pacific, Atlantic and Indian Oceans. Research activities related to the disposal of radioactive wastes in the oceans were established with several countries.

The IAEA Laboratory at Seibersdorf, Austria, provided back-up services for the Agency's research, radioisotope and safeguards programmes. Agricultural work emphasized fertilizer utilization, residues left by agrochemicals, mutation breeding and the sterile-male technique for insect control. Medical programmes included studies on trace elements in human hair and animal bone. A new medical applications and dosimetry laboratory was commissioned at Seibersdorf as the central reference for a growing network of dosimetry laboratories in member States.

The Safeguards Analytical Laboratory continued to analyse nuclear fuel-cycle samples collected by IAEA's safeguards inspectors. On 12 October, IAEA took over full responsibility for the operation of the Laboratory, with the agreement of the Austrian authorities.

Food and agriculture

Under joint programmes of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations and IAEA, work continued through 25 co-ordinated research programmes on the application of isotope and radiation techniques in order to increase agricultural production, improve the quality of food, reduce food losses and minimize pollution of food and the environment. Support was given to 86 technical assistance projects in 46 developing member States during the year.

Work continued on insect control, particularly the control of the Mediterranean fruit fly in Central America and the tsetse fly in Nigeria. Other projects were designed to improve crop and livestock production.

Secretariat

As at the end of 1981, 1,660 staff members were employed by IAEA. Of these 596-drawn from 66 countries-were in the Professional and higher categories and 1,064 were in the General Service and Maintenance and Operatives Service categories.

Budget

The General Conference of IAEA at its September 1981 session adopted a regular budget of $86,369,000 for 1982. The target for voluntary contributions to finance the Agency's technical co-operation programme for 1982 was set at $16 million.

Chapter II

The International Labour Organisation (ILO)

During 1981, the International Labour Organisation (ILO) continued activities in its four major programme areas: promotion of policies to create employment and satisfy basic human needs; improvement of working and living conditions and environment; strengthening of industrial relations and tripartite (government/employer/worker) co-operation; and the advancement of human rights in the social and labour fields. The main instruments of action continued to be standard-setting, technical co-operation activities, research and publishing.

Membership in ILO rose to 146 during the year, with the admission of Equatorial Guinea (30 January) and Belize (17 November).

Meetings

The sixty-seventh session of the International Labour Conference, held at Geneva from 3 to 24 June 1981, was attended by nearly 1,900 delegates, advisers and observers from 137 countries. The Conference had before it the annual report of the ILO Director-General and the seventeenth special report on the effect of apartheid on labour and employment in South Africa.

The Conference adopted an International Labour Convention and Recommendation on the promotion of collective bargaining, a Convention and Recommendation to ensure equality of treatment for both men and women workers with family responsibilities, and a Convention and Recommendation on occupational safety and health and the working environment. It also held a first discussion on the maintenance of workers' rights in social security, and on termination of employment at the initiative of the employer, with a view to adopting standards at its 1982 session.

In accordance with usual practice, a tripartite Conference committee examined the application by member States of the 153 Conventions and 162 Recommendations adopted since 1919. It also reviewed application of the ILO standards concerning minimum age for admission to employment or work.

Ratifications of ILO Conventions registered during the Conference raised the total number of ratifications to 4,917.

On 18 June, the Conference adopted a new Declaration concerning the policy of apartheid in South Africa, which updated a 1964 Declaration (p. 179).<sup>a</sup> It also adopted resolutions on the training and retraining of managers, ILO's role in the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,<sup>b</sup> the economic and social consequences of disarmament, participation of women in ILO meetings, and training. A new ILO Governing Body was elected for a three-year term (1981-1984).

Guidelines to cushion the impact of technological change were proposed by the Advisory Committee on Salaried Employees and Professional Workers at its eighth session (Geneva, 13-22 January). Adopted were conclusions on employment, work organization, health and safety, women workers and part-time employment, and equality of opportunity and treatment.

The Second Tripartite Technical Meeting for the Printing and Allied Trades (Geneva, 22 September-1 October) adopted conclusions relating to technological change and its effect on working conditions, remuneration, skill requirements and employment, and on training.

The improvement of working conditions and environment, and training in developing countries, were the focus of conclusions reached by the Tenth Session of the Iron and Steel Committee (Geneva, 13-22 October), which called for reliance on tripartite consultation in resolving the serious economic and social problems facing the industries.

Steps to improve employment security in the teaching profession, overcome teacher shortage in developing countries and reduce the workload and nervous tension of teachers were among measures proposed by a Joint Meeting on Conditions of Work of Teachers (Geneva, 27 October-4 November).

The Third Tripartite Technical Meeting for the Timber Industry (Geneva, 1-10 December) adopted conclusions designed to promote employment and training and improve occupational safety and health in the industry.

Working environment

The International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment, approved by the Governing Body in 1976, continued to encourage member States to set definite objectives and carried out standard-setting and operational activities, studies and tripartite meetings, clearing-house activities in the fields of occupational safety and health and quality of working life.

By the end of 1981, multidisciplinary teams of experts had visited 14 countries. Tripartite evaluation missions on the effectiveness of labour administration were also carried out. The International Occupational Safety and Health Alert System became fully operational, facilitating communication among 98 countries regarding urgent safety and health hazards. A number of tripartite seminars and symposia were held in various parts of the world. A code of practice for safety and health in the construction of fixed offshore installations in the petroleum industry was finalized. The Programme also expanded its educational and training activities.

World Employment Programme

Launched in 1969 as ILO's principal contribution to the International Development Strategy for the Second United Nations Development Decade,<sup>c</sup> the World Employment Programme remained a central feature of the Agency's contribution to the Strategy for the Third Development Decade. The Programme was designed to assist Governments to promote employment, alleviate poverty and satisfy basic needs. The Declaration of Principles and the Programme of Action adopted by the 1976 World Employment Conference,<sup>d</sup> and reaffirmed by the 1979 session of the International Labour Conference, reinforced ILO's mandate to play a main role in the worldwide attack on unemployment and poverty.

The Programme, through its action-oriented research, technical advisory services and other field activities paid special attention to the development problems of rural areas where the vast majority of poor and underemployed lived, and to the rapidly growing urban informal sector. Activities in the areas of appropriate and new technologies, employment forecasting, manpower planning and labour market information, population and labour policies, labour intensive public works and emergency employment schemes, and the special problems of rural women all figured prominently in this work. It was also concerned with the international aspects of employment policy, including the contribution to employment objectives of expanded trade and restructuring of the world economy.

Field activities

During 1981, ILO spent more than $106.5 million on technical co-operation activities (an increase of about 7 per cent compared with 1980) to promote employment, development of human resources and social institutions, and improvement in living and working conditions.

Most of this expenditure ($55.6 million) continued to be financed by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). The ILO regular programme provided $7.6 million in 1981 while expenditure funded from multi-bilateral arrangements and other special programmes rose to $36.9 million. Activities financed by the United Nations Fund for Population Activities (UNFPA) increased to $6.3 million.

An analysis of expenditure showed that training received the largest share of funds ($46 million), followed by employment planning and promotion ($31.1 million), sectoral activities ($15.8 million), working conditions and environment ($6.5 million), and industrial relations and labour administration ($2.9 million). Of the remaining $3 million, social security received $1 million.

A breakdown of expenditure on technical co-operation by field of activity, source of funds and country, territory or region is shown in the tables below.

Educational activities

The International Institute for Labour Studies at Geneva, an ILO centre for advanced study in the labour and social fields, included in its 1981 programme 11 educational activities for 320 participants: 105 from government institutions; 79 from employers' groups; 135 from organizations of workers; and one from a university. Seven of the educational activities were four-day national industrial-relations seminars which were held in Bangladesh, India (two), Indonesia, Pakistan, the Philippines and Thailand. Each seminar incorporated the Institute's decision-making exercise on plant-level industrial relations and one objective was to train a nucleus of national officials from governments, trade unions and employers' associations who would in turn reach a much wider group.

The second international course on labour/management relations in the petroleum industry was held at Geneva in May. During the three-week course, attended by 31 participants from Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Caribbean, the Middle East and Western Europe, participants analysed basic labour/management relations.

A seminar on the social aspects of rural development was held for 40 participants from the French-speaking countries of Africa, from 28 September to 10 October at Tashkent (Uzbekistan, USSR). This was a continuation of the programme initiated in 1980 with the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions of the USSR and the United Nations Institute for Training and Research.

The annual International Internship Course on Active Labour Policy Development was held at Geneva during October and November and was attended by 18 participants from 15 countries in Africa, the Americas, Asia and Europe. Major topics included the processes of economic and social change, population, labour force and employment issues, industrial relations, and ILO's role in the formulation and implementation of an active labour policy.

In December, the Institute and the Ambekar Institute for Labour Studies (Bombay, India) conducted a joint seminar for trade unionists from India and Sri Lanka on labour studies research, thus continuing a co-operative programme initiated several years earlier.

International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training

During 1981, ILO's International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training at Turin, Italy, continued to conduct residential training courses covering four main programme areas: educational technology, trade unionism, industry and management. Sixty-nine courses for 1,224 participants from 125 developing countries were held. The Centre also administered 645 individual fellowship programmes of varying duration.

The main preoccupations of ILO for the 1980s were given increased emphasis in the Centre's 1981 training programme: new and renewable energy sources and energy conservation; working conditions and the environment; labour administration; and small enterprise and co-operative development. The Centre also moved into new fields of advanced training, taking into account openings created by the possible uses of microelectronics and computers in developing countries.

The year witnessed a diversified approach to training activities: before overseas training was initiated, preparatory work took place at national level in many programmes, with specific follow-up in the trainee's country of origin. A distinct trend was towards technical training tied to a period of in-plant or in-service training, and towards practical training in an industrial environment.

Efforts to transfer the Centre's experience in educational technology to regional and national institutions in developing countries also continued in 1981.

Publications

The ILO's published research covered a wide range of topical social and labour questions. New volumes issued in 1981 included Employment, Trade and North-South Co-operation; Minimum Wage Fixing: An International Review of Practices and Problems; The Urban Informal Sector in Developing Countries: Employment, Poverty and Environment; Industries in Trouble; Workers' Participation in Decisions in Undertakings; Child Work, Poverty and Underdevelopment; Black Migration to South Africa; The Cost of Social Security: Tenth International Inquiry, 1975-1977; Modular Programme for Supervisory Development (5 volumes); Guide to Tools and Equipment for Labour-Based Construction; Employment Effects of Multinational Enterprises in Industrialised Countries; and Employment Effects of Multinational Enterprises in Developing Countries.

Among the periodicals and technical serials which continued to be produced were: the bimonthly International Labour Review, the quarterly Social and Labour Bulletin, the Yearbook and Bulletin of Labour Statistics and Women at Work,

Secretariat

As at 31 December 1981, the total number of full-time staff under permanent, fixed-term and short-term appointments at ILO headquarters and elsewhere was 3,194. Of these, 1,671 were in the Professional and higher categories (drawn from 112 nationalities), and 1,523 were in the General Service category. Of the Professional staff, 874 were assigned to technical co-operation projects.

Budget

In June 1981, the International Labour Conference adopted a budget of expenditure for the 1982-83 biennium amounting to $230,033,000. Of this amount, member States were to be assessed $119,023,222 in 1982 and $111,009,778 in 1983. The budget included $7,884,428 for reimbursement to the Working Capital Fund and $3,703,531 under Undistributed Reserve.

Chapter III

Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO)

The Governing Conference of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), held its twenty-first biennial session at Rome, Italy, from 7 to 25 November 1981 and noted, in its final report, the gloomy economic situation in the world, which, it said, was marked by economic recession, a slow-down in the growth of trade, a continuation of protectionist pressures and practices and widespread inflation and unemployment, which, along with the lack of a fully effective system of world food security, made the present period one of the most economically difficult since the Second World War.

The Conference reaffirmed its support of FAO's 1979 Plan of Action on World Food Security<sup>a</sup> calling for the establishment and maintenance of national and regional food stocks to ensure against shortages and emergencies.

It recommended that the agricultural energy needs of developing countries be assured through better use of fertilizers and other inputs and through more effective application of locally available and renewable sources, such as the recycling of organic matter, draught animals, biogas, and solar and wind energy.

The Conference appointed Edouard Saouma to a second six-year term of office as Director-General from January 1982.

On 7 November, the Conference admitted five new members-Bhutan, Equatorial Guinea, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Tonga and Zimbabwe-bringing membership of the organization to 152. The Conference also appointed Dr. Monkombu Sambasivan Swaminathan, an Indian agricultural research scientist, to the post of Independent Chairman of the 49-nation Council-FAO's main governing body between sessions-in succession to Bukar Shaib (Nigeria). World Food Day was held for the first time on 16 October and the Conference urged that future activities be intensified to increase awareness of world food problems (p. 725).

World food and agricultural situation

While the immediate threat of another world food crisis had been averted with a larger cereals harvest in 1981, the agency considered that the food and agricultural situation continued to be unsatisfactory.

World food and agricultural production increased by about 2.5 per cent and 2.7 per cent respectively in 1981, following two years of increases of less than 1 per cent. Although those increases were a little above the annual average rate for the 1970s, food and agricultural output failed to regain the long-term trend level and was unevenly distributed around the world.

In developed country regions, North America and Oceania recovered well from 1980, but output in western Europe declined after two good years, while in eastern Europe and the USSR the declines in production which had marked 1979 and 1980 were little more than arrested.

Increased food production in 1981 reflected larger harvests of cereals, pulses, roots and tubers, and sugar, production of some of which had declined in 1980. Production of poultry meat showed a significant increase, while such non-food crops as coffee and cotton also expanded.

Some rebuilding of cereal stocks through 1981/1982 was in prospect as a result of the increase in cereal production, although stocks would still be lower than the estimated minimum safe level for food security.

Availability of food aid remained at disappointingly low levels in relation to rising needs for cereal imports of low-income, food-deficit countries, estimated at 41 million tons for 1980/1981. Total shipments of food aid in cereals fell to 8.6 million tons in 1980/1981, the lowest level since 1975/1976. On the positive side, fulfilment of the 500,000-ton target for the International Emergency Food Reserve was assured for 1981, and the International Monetary Fund expanded its compensatory financing facility to enable developing countries to finance exceptional rises in import costs of cereals.

Activities in 1981

Field programmes

The trend towards increasing diversification of funding sources for FAO's field programmes continued in 1981. The United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) was the major source of funds, but its share of the total decreased from 87 per cent in 1971 to 56 per cent in 1981. This reflected the increasing importance of various Trust Fund sources and the establishment of FAO's Technical Co-operation Programme (TCP).

The 1981 total field programme delivery of $314 million was divided between the three main components, with $180 million under UNDP, $118.6 million under Trust Funds and $15.4 million from TCP. Operating at the end of the year were 895 UNDP-financed projects, 695 Trust Fund projects and 550 TCP projects. Experts in the field numbered 2,150.

With an increase in the total field programme delivery from $287 million in 1980 to $322 million in 1981, the steady expansion of previous years came to a halt since the increase reflected inflated costs alone.

The organization remained the largest executing agency for UNDP, with 25 per cent of its total expenditures for 1981. During the year, a large number of FAO/UNDP programming missions in agriculture, forestry and fisheries were carried out to prepare programmes and projects for FAO implementation in the third 5-year cycle (1982-1986). Particular attention was paid to the poorest countries with a predominantly agricultural base.

The major Trust Fund category in 1981 continued to be the FAO/Government Co-operative programme. Expenditure totalled $53.1 million, including disbursements for 336 associate experts.

The FAO/Near East Co-operative Programme, financed by oil-exporting countries, was primarily for the benefit of less privileged countries in the Near East and north Africa. Expenditures under this and related funding arrangements were $5.2 million in 1981. Some Near East countries drew on FAO's competence in entrusting to it, for execution under Unilateral Trust Fund arrangements, development activities in their own countries. In 1981, expenditure under this heading amounted to $10.3 million.

In November 1981, the Technical Co-operation Programme completed its fifth year of operation; during this period, 1,299 projects were approved at a cost of $81.7 million.

World Food Programme

For the fifth consecutive year, World Food Programme (WFP) shipments exceeded one million tons of food commodities in 1981. This assistance was heavily concentrated upon the least developed countries and those most seriously affected by the world economic crisis.

New projects approved in 1981 represented an outlay of some $513 million. The largest of these was for further expansion of a $33 million project in Upper Volta, supporting government programmes for rural development. Other approved projects included: several in China to expand the agricultural base of state farms; a $13 million project to assist settlers in India's Rajasthan canal area; and a $27 million expansion for Indonesia's transmigration scheme to resettle 2.5 million people by the end of 1984.

Emergency assistance to Democratic Kampuchea continued with five expansions of the initial commitment for the relief operation, valued at $18.5 million, for a total of $98.9 million.

Between January and mid-November 1981, there were eight expansions of aid to Afghan refugees in Pakistan, valued at $68.8 million, bringing the total cost of emergency relief to $109 million since inception at the end of 1979. In Somalia, over the same 1981 period, WFP assistance consisted of three expansions valued at $16.1 million, for a total of $24.6 million since the end of 1979.

(See also p. 726.)

Capital for development

During 1981, the Investment Centre of FAO worked on 126 projects for submission to financing institutions. Among projects approved for financing during 1981 was one for $62 million in north-west Bangladesh to establish a reliable long-term credit system. The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (World Bank), through its affiliate, the International Development Association (IDA), extended a credit of $40 million for this purpose, and also promised $35 million towards a $55-million project to rehabilitate 174 pumping systems in the Sudan along the White Nile.

Co-operation with regional banks, such as the African and Asian Development Banks, increased substantially during 1981. The Asian Development Fund contributed $16 million to a paddy and rice storage project prepared by the Investment Centre in Burma. At full development, the project was to result in annual savings of some 28,000 tons of rice, worth about $9 million.

Freedom from Hunger Campaign

In Africa, FAO's Freedom from Hunger/Action for Development programme, with private funding, helped local organizations to support such rural projects as village-level food storage, income-generating activities for women's associations, and co-operative fishing and horticultural projects for young people.

Under this programme, non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in India and other Asian countries trained staff to work with the rural poor in development activities at community level, and exchange visits were made between workers in similar projects in neighbouring countries.

The programme helped to create the Latin American Association of Development Organizations, a regional coalition of 15 national NGOs whose main interest was to promote agricultural education and training through community-based projects.

In September 1981, 82 projects, totalling $5 million, were in operation. In addition 65 new projects, totalling $5.6 million, were at various stages of preparation.

Plant production and protection

During 1981, FAO continued to concentrate on programmes for intensive breeding of high yielding and high quality field food crops with more than 100 persons from Africa, Asia and Latin America attending training courses.

Technical support was given to 123 horticultural projects and 71 field projects for the improvement of arid and semi-arid rangelands and development of tropical pastures, and a major Trust Fund project to intensify range research in Saudi Arabia was started.

The Seed Improvement and Development Programme involved 118 countries in 1981; 43 new projects on seed production were implemented; four seed production and training centres were established and twelve training courses held on seed technology for 270 trainees.

Twenty-two countries received assistance from FAO in 1981 in the application of integrated pest control to cereal crops, and three training courses were held on plant quarantine and on grain storage.

Action to control the African migratory locust upsurge, started in 1980, was completed in 1981.

Livestock

Control of African animal trypanosomiasis and work on related development continued to receive high priority in 1981. Preparatory missions advised Governments on control policies and on related land use.

Projects for trypanotolerant cattle improvement were carried out in Benin and Guinea. Tsetse and trypanosomiasis control projects in various countries continued to receive technical inputs including monitoring environmental effects of tsetse control activities.

Breeding improvement programmes paid special attention to dairy cattle suited to humid tropical conditions. In co-operation with the Inter-African Bureau for Animal Resources of the Organization of African Unity (OAU), work started to establish a data bank on animal genetic resources.

Projects were under way in several African countries for the development of sheep and goat production, particularly on small farms. With the support of UNDP, an FAO mission to Latin American countries recommended a co-operative project between a number of developing countries to develop livestock production technologies for small farms. Integrated crop/livestock/fish production and small-scale poultry and rabbit production in rural areas was also promoted.

Increasing prices for fuel oil had led to a renewed interest in draught animals. An FAO consultant's report on this subject formed the basis for recommendations on draught animal power included in the Nairobi Programme of Action for the Development of New and Renewable Sources of Energy adopted at the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy (p. 710). The importance of buffaloes in Asia, both as draught and milk animals, led to projects for their improvement, in collaboration with the Animal Production and Health Commission for Asia, the Far East and the Southwest Pacific.

A test kit developed to measure the resistance of various tick populations to different acaricides was distributed to laboratories throughout the world and training in its use was given during the year to specialists from Latin American countries.

The sudden spread of rinderpest in west Africa in 1980 called for emergency (TCP) assistance to Benin, Gambia, Ghana, Mali, Mauritania, Niger, Senegal, Togo, Uganda and Upper Volta and the disease was brought under control. However, further outbreaks in west and east Africa during the year brought representatives of the countries to meet in Nairobi, Kenya, under the sponsorship of the FAO/International Office of Epizootics/OAU to plan a strategy for eradication of the disease from Africa. During the year, assistance was extended to Argentina, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Peru and the Republic of Korea for the control of foot-and-mouth disease. With financial support from the European Community, 700,000 doses of foot-and-mouth vaccine were provided for use in a buffer zone of south-eastern Europe.

Land and water management

The sixth session of the Committee on Agriculture, held in Rome during March and April, emphasized the alarming rate of deterioration of agricultural lands and the need for public awareness. The Committee recognized the importance of field projects to stimulate development of national soil conservation programmes. During the year, FAO conducted 12 projects in the field of soil conservation alone, and another 44 in which soil conservation was an essential component.

The organization's Remote Sensing Centre aided agriculture, forestry and fisheries in over 40 countries in Africa, Asia and Latin America.

The fertilizer programme carried out operations in 21 countries during the agricultural year (July 1980-June 1981), which included demonstrations, training courses, field days, and managing pilot schemes on fertilizer distribution and credit.

Rural development

Seven high-level FAO missions assisted Governments in overall policy reviews in implementation of the Programme of Action adopted by the World Conference on Agrarian Reform and Rural Development.<sup>b</sup> Additional missions were concerned with specific areas of work, such as agrarian reform and land settlement-aid for which was provided, through UNDP- and WFP-assisted projects-aimed mainly at country assistance in national policy and programme formulation. In follow-up, over 100 projects were formulated in 48 countries.

During 1981, perspectives in agricultural education, training and extension were reoriented towards the grassroots concept with self-help being promoted within the context of increased technical co-operation among developing countries. Small farmers in Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Near East received special help and some 60 projects relating to access to improved advisory services were supported technically.

Separate programmes for women among the rural poor and efforts to bring the concerns of rural women more actively into the technical programmes of FAO were two initiatives undertaken in 1981. The Organization embarked upon a programme for people's participation in rural development through promotion of self-help organizations of the rural poor and some 30 projects in Asia, Africa and Latin American countries were identified with international funding from non-governmental organizations and others to be implemented in 1982-1983.

Food production, trade and security

Special commodity studies were completed in 1981 on agricultural trade barriers, protectionism, and the scope for increased trade among developing countries. Several projects were also undertaken to help developing countries strengthen their commodity policies, particularly in relating national development objectives to production and marketing policies to improve farm income level.

The Food Security Assistance Scheme continued to assist countries to establish national emergency food reserves with missions visiting 12 developing countries to formulate food security policies and prepare suitable projects. A feasibility study on the establishment of national and regional food security reserves in the Sahel was concluded in 1981 and its recommendations endorsed by the Council of Ministers of the Permanent Inter-State Committee for Drought Control in the Sahelian Zone.

Trust Fund contributions to this Scheme from four new donors, Austria, Australia, Italy and Japan, helped overall resources to reach $55 million at the end of 1981. Six projects were completed during the year, 12 new projects worth $3.8 million became operational, and a further 22 in preparation were worth over $10 million. Twenty-one new projects valued at $15.5 million were approved by the Director-General of FAO.

Fisheries

During 1981, FAO continued to give priority to the special programme launched in 1979 to assist coastal states among developing countries in the management and development of fisheries in exclusive economic zones. Advice was also given to a large number of countries on the legal aspects of exclusive economic zone fisheries development. Monitoring, control and surveillance concepts and procedures were of special interest to member States, and regional training seminars were held in west Africa and South-East Asia.

Management and development advice continued to be channelled through technical assistance projects associated with FAO's network of regional fishery commissions and special assistance in stock management was given to specific regions.

The Regional Co-operative Research Programme for fish technology continued its work on post-catch waste and was expanded to include additional institutions in both Africa and Latin America. Over 30 institutions were co-operating in the Programme.

International trade in fishery products was assisted by the further activities of FAO's Fish Marketing Information Service in Latin America and the establishment of a similar service for Asia.

During 1981, some 170 projects supported the efforts of more than 60 Governments in training activities, institution building, research, development of small-scale fisheries, aquaculture and inland water fisheries.

Forestry

Through training, information programmes and direct assistance FAO endeavoured to provide for the developing world's current and future fuel-wood needs, and two projects with this goal were approved during the year, one for afforestation in the Peruvian Sierra for energy and rural development purposes and the other to supply Burma's national fuelwood programme with equipment and technical advisers in planting, agro-forestry, extension training and communications.

Twenty-seven forestry for local community development projects were in operation during the year. The majority aimed to introduce and strengthen agro-forestry systems and increase land productivity, while others were designed to increase fuelwood supplies through promoting village wood lots, and still others to increase local incomes through small-scale forestry activities.

Publications

In addition to books and papers published in 1981 under the aegis of FAO, the Organization issued its annual Commodity Review and Outlook, the Animal Health Yearbook, the Yearbook of Fishery Statistics, the Yearbook of Forest Projects, the Production Yearbook and the Trade Yearbook. Quarterlies included the Plant Protection Bulletin, the World Animal Review, Food and Nutrition (nos. 1-2 and 3-4 in two issues), and Unasylva the forestry magazine. Ceres, a review of the agricultural, economic and social aspects of development, appeared bimonthly. Monthlies included the Monthly Bulletin of Statistics. Lists of publications, depository libraries and sales agents appeared in FAO Books in Print.

Four works of major interest were also issued in 1981: Poplars and Willows, Eucalypts for Planting, Tropical Feeds, and a new, expanded edition of the FAO Atlas of the Living Resources of the Seas.

Secretariat

At the end of September 1981, the total number of staff employed by FAO at its headquarters and regional and country offices was 4,520 of whom 1,541 (drawn from 103 countries) were in the Professional and higher categories, and 2,979 in the General Service category. Field project personnel, working in 123 countries, comprised 2,248 staff members in the Professional and higher categories and 661 in the General Service category. Of the 338 associate experts working for the organization, 310 were in the field and 28 were at headquarters and regional offices.

Budget

The November 1981 session of the FAO Conference approved a budget of $366.6 million for 1982-1983, an increase of some $86 million over the previous biennium, needed to counter inflation; actual programme growth was 2.9 per cent per annum.

Chapter IV

United Nations Educational,
Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO)

During 1981, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) continued to give priority to its contributions to the new international economic order, to the promotion of peace, human rights and the elimination of colonialism and racism. A broad range of activities was carried out in the Organization's many fields of competence: education, natural and social sciences, culture and communication.

In 1981, Samoa (15 April) and the Bahamas (23 April) joined UNESCO, bringing the number of member States to 155. One associate member, the British Eastern Caribbean Group, also belonged to UNESCO.

Education

The education programme of UNESCO for 1981 emphasized literacy, the elimination of all forms of inequality and discrimination, improvement of the quality of education while assuring its relevance with respect to the advancement of knowledge and of the needs of a multidimensional endogenous development and, finally, its contribution to strengthening peace, disarmament, international understanding and co-operation, the promotion of human rights and the elimination of all forms of oppression.

The Intergovernmental Committee for Physical Education and Sport, held its second session at UNESCO headquarters in Paris from 3 to 10 March. In addition to the 30 States members of the Committee, 43 States sent high-level officials as observers. The Committee adopted a number of recommendations directed at the solution of the problems it had examined in its field.

A regional intergovernmental meeting (Quito, Ecuador, 6-11 April) examined objectives and strategies for the implementation of a major education programme begun by UNESCO in the Latin American and Caribbean region.

As part of the programme to mobilize world public opinion to support the fight against illiteracy, an effort was made to intensify activities related to the observance of International Literacy Day (8 September).

A world conference on actions and strategies for education and integration of the handicapped and prevention of disabilities was held (Torremolinos, Spain, 2-7 November) as part of the programme of the International Year of Disabled Persons. More than 100 countries and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations met to exchange information, adopt recommendations and to formulate a solemn declaration.

A plan for a regional agreement on the mutual recognition of studies and certificates, diplomas, degrees and other credentials of higher education in the African States was submitted for adoption to an intergovernmental conference at Arusha, United Republic of Tanzania, in December 1981. The agreement was similar to those for the region of the Americas and the Caribbean (1974), for Arab and European countries bordering on the Mediterranean (1976), for Arab States (1978) and European States (1979).

The International Institute for Educational Planning strengthened its research and training activities in 1981, particularly in the areas of adult education and literacy. It has based its co-operation with national research and training institutions in the framework of a fund established in 1977 to promote research and training in developing countries. Between 1978 and 1981, 77 contracts were concluded with institutions in 37 countries.

The UNESCO Institute for Education at Hamburg, Federal Republic of Germany, pursued its research on continuing education and undertook a series of case studies on teaching strategies for the continuing education of the newly literate.

The organisation took part in 298 national, regional and subregional projects with assistance from the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (World Bank), regional banks and funds-in-trust.

Natural sciences

During the year, UNESCO continued its efforts to use the resources of science and technology for the benefit of developing countries by assisting member States in planning, training and research activities. Following meetings held in May and September, a group of eminent scientists drew up recommendations concerning the organization's activities during 1984-1989.

The year also saw the launching by UNESCO of the International Organization for Chemical Sciences in Development and the International Biosciences Network (a joint undertaking with the International Council of Scientific Unions). Their objective was to expedite the growth of expertise in chemical and biological sciences, respectively, in developing countries.

An international conference on hydrology and the scientific bases for the rational management of water resources, convened jointly by UNESCO and the World Meteorological Organization (WMO) (Paris, 18-27 August), adopted an outline plan for the third phase of the International Hydrological Programme (1984-1989) with the ultimate goal of helping to solve the crucial water-related socio-economic problems which could be foreseen from 1984 onwards.

The education of engineers and technicians received high priority throughout the year, as did activities relating to new and renewable sources of energy, with pilot projects, seminars and training courses and the development of a global network of information systems and services. The organization also co-operated in the preparation of the United Nations Conference on New and Renewable Sources of Energy (Nairobi, 10-21 August).

An international symposium on coastal lagoons was held in Bordeaux, France, in September and was attended by 285 scientists from over 40 countries. The symposium discussed scientific and environmental management problems with a view to identifying scientific research requirements and to developing a strategy to ensure that scientific knowledge was effectively used in the management of lagoons.

The tenth anniversary of the intergovernmental Man and the Biosphere programme, of which 101 countries were currently members, was marked in 1981. It had set up 209 biosphere reserves in 55 countries. A conference-exhibition was held in September on "Ecology in Practice", following which several hundred copies of the exhibition were to be shown worldwide.

The sixth session of the Standing Conference of National Science and Technology Policy-making Bodies in Latin America and the Caribbean was organized by UNESCO in Bolivia in October. Among its recommendations was one proposing the agenda items for a second conference on the application of science and technology for development in Latin America and the Caribbean. The Conference also issued a "Declaration of La Paz" on science, technology and development in rural areas of Latin America.

Throughout the year, the International Geological Correlation Programme placed increasing emphasis on projects executed in and by developing countries in order to draw their earth scientists into closer regional and inter-regional co-operation. An agreement was concluded with the Arab Fund for Economic and Social Development, whereby UNESCO would undertake a feasibility study for the assessment and mitigation of earthquake risk in the Arab region.

Social sciences

In the course of 1981, UNESCO encouraged debates on the tasks and challenges for the social sciences in the 1980s at national, regional and international levels. It continued to support the development of the social sciences in all regions directly and indirectly through international professional, non-governmental organizations, regional centres and associations. Activities covered the areas of training, research, theory and methodology, information and documentation services, international exchanges and publications.

Studies for development were concerned with: socio-cultural inequalities between and within nations; new styles of development and participation of populations in the development process; socio-cultural aspects of rural development; the socio-cultural impact of the activities of transnational corporations; the conditions of exchange of knowledge for an endogenous development; and the situation and the role of children in different cultural and environmental contexts.

Activities concerning socio-economic analysis and development planning were aimed at the elaboration and application of social science methods of analysis, planning and evaluation, with a view to strengthening national capacity in those skills. They dealt with: the practical use of socio-economic indicators to illuminate problems of rapid socio-economic change, and the social integration of the disabled and the use of indicators at the national and sub-national levels for analysis and planning; research on planning methods, including modelling, and the strengthening of national capacity to use the UNESCO Educational Simulation Model; and studies on evaluation methods and their use in different countries. Several operational projects to train planners in developing countries were initiated in 1981.

Environmental activities were directed towards research on rural habitat and public participation, rehabilitation of historic centres, the broader ecosystem in which people lived, the integrated training of planners and administrators of human settlements, and the training of "barefoot" architects, and the UNESCO mass media programme to inform the public of environmental issues which concerned them.

Population activities dealt with: the demographic, socio-cultural and economic aspects of internal and international migration; the interrelationship between population, resources and development; assistance to member States to develop strategies for peoples' participation and involvement in development and in implementing population policies and programmes; the integration of human rights and development considerations in population communication programmes; the training of personnel in social communication techniques; and the training of journalists.

The organization continued its work on an analysis of human rights violations and the conditions for a constructive peace. Activities in this field dealt, in particular, with racism, the teaching of human rights and peace research. A symposium to examine scientific theories invoked to justify racism and racial discrimination was held in April 1981. Similarly, a meeting on ethno-development and ethnocide was organized in Latin America in December.

Other activities included: setting up specialized courses in human rights for university students and related socio-professional organizations; creation of an international network of institutions and the improvement of information and documentation for human rights teachers and peace researchers; and follow-up to the 1980 International Congress on Disarmament Education, including regional training seminars for university teachers and the publication of teaching materials.

Philosophical and interdisciplinary research was carried out on several planes, namely, philosophical investigation of the fundamental problems of endogenous development, comparative philosophical studies on changes in the relation between science and society, philosophical perspectives on the concept of environment, and studies on the process of change in a culture and the concept of a transcultural universal.

Culture

Study continued on African, Latin American, Caribbean, Arab, Asian, Oceanic, European and Arctic cultures. Research and studies were also carried out in the field of intercultural studies, and a revision was begun of the History of the Scientific and Cultural Development of Mankind.

Particular efforts were made within the framework of the literature translation programme to maintain an equitable geographical balance in the publication of representative works; works from Africa, Asia and Latin America were being translated in collaboration with professors of comparative literature, and, in the European series of the collection, the Nordic countries received increasing attention.

In 1981, a commemorative day was organized at UNESCO Headquarters on the occasion of the centenary of the birth of Pablo Picasso, gathering together personalities in the arts and the humanities, writers, painters, art critics and museum directors, who discussed the influence of African art on the painter's work and Picasso's influence on modern art.

Within the framework of the International Year of Disabled Persons, four seminar/workshops were organized in different regions on the general theme of art in the service of the handicapped, the purpose of which was to promote the integration of disabled persons in social and cultural life.

The Programme for 1981-1983 saw an increase in the number of international campaigns for the protection of cultural heritage with the addition of the following new sites and monuments: Plaza Vieja, in Havana (Cuba); monuments and sites in Wadi Hadramaut and the architectural heritage of the city of Shibam (Democratic Yemen); the site of Göreme, in Cappadocia, and historic quarters and monuments of Istanbul, including the Golden Horn area (Turkey); monuments and the site of Paharpur Vihara and the mosque-city of Bagerhat, in particular the Shait Gumbad Mosque, and an archaeological park at the site (Bangladesh); and the historic city of Sana'a

In 1981, appeals were launched to mobilize international support for the safeguarding of: Fez (Morocco); the Palais de Sans Souci, Citadelle de la Ferrière and Site des Ramiers (Haiti); historic buildings and sites of Malta; the architectural heritage of the island of Gorée (Senegal); monuments of Hué (Viet Nam); exceptional monuments and sites in the "Cultural Triangle" (Sri Lanka); and ancient city sites of Mauritania.

The World Heritage Committee, meeting in Sydney, Australia, from 26 to 30 October, added the following to the World Heritage List: Los Glaciares (Argentina); Kakadu National Park, the Great Barrier Reef and the Willandra Lakes region (Australia); Anthony Island and Head-Smashed-In Bison Jump (Canada); Speyer

Cathedral and Wurzburg Residence (Federal Republic of Germany); Fontainebleau, Chambord Château, Amiens Cathedral, the Roman Theatre and Triumphal Arch in Orange, and Roman and Romanesque monuments of Arles and Fontenay Abbey (France); Quirigua ruins (Guatemala); Nimbe District Nature Reserve (Guinea); the Medina of Fez (Morocco); Thatta, Lahore Fort and Shalimar Gardens (Pakistan); Darien National Park (Panama); Djoudj National Bird Sanctuary and Niokolo-Koba National Park (Senegal); Kilwa Kisiwani and Songo Mnara ruins, and Serengeti National Park (United Republic of Tanzania); and Mammoth Cave National Park and Olympic National Park (United States).

Efforts continued to promote public awareness of the objectives of the 1972 International Convention concerning the Protection of the World Cultural and Natural Heritage and to encourage contributions to the World Heritage Fund. Ratifications of the Convention increased to 62 States and currently 112 sites were protected by the Convention.

Communications

In 1980, UNESCO continued to promote a free and better balanced flow of information, studies on the role of communication in society and the formulation of national communication policies and plans. Preparatory work was begun for the Intergovernmental Conference on Communication Policies in the Arab States, to be held in 1983.

The final report of the International Commission for the Study of Communication Problems, Many Voices, One World, examined by the UNESCO General Conference in 1980, became the subject of a number of seminars and studies in 1981, whose aim was to assess and analyse the report and suggest areas for further elaboration and exploration.

Among other activities were studies and consultations on the right to communicate, on reduction of telecommunication and satellite tariffs and on working conditions of journalists, as well as on the new world information and communication order and its relationship to the concept of an international economic order.

The first session of the 35-member Intergovernmental Council of the International Programme for Development of Communication (IPDC), established by UNESCO's General Conference in 1980, was held in Paris from 15 to 22 June. The Council discussed identification of the needs of Member States with regard to the development of communication, methods of determining priorities for the different groups of activities constituting the programme, criteria for the presentation and selection of projects under the international programme, the system of financing required, and ways of ensuring reciprocal consultation and better co-ordination.

A pilot project for the production of children's books was launched in Benin in the framework of a project on African languages. Assistance was given by UNESCO in book promotion and reading to national and regional training programmes in the book trade and to those co-publishing moderately priced books within the plan of activities of the Asian Cultural Centre for UNESCO, as well as the regional centres for the promotion of books in Africa south of the Sahara and in Latin America and the Caribbean. Publication of a work in a series of studies on books and reading and the organization in Bologna, Italy, of an international seminar on the role of children's books in the integration of the young handicapped in daily life constituted UNESCO's contribution to the 1981 International Year of Disabled Persons.

General Information Programme

The General Information Programme of UNESCO was concerned with the development and promotion of information systems and services in the fields of scientific and technological information, documentation, libraries and archives at the national, regional and international levels.

The Programme continued to emphasize socio-economic information and the special needs of developing countries. It aimed at facilitating member States' choice, use and adaptation of advanced information and communication technology and at strengthening UNESCO's role in the information field within the United Nations system.

Publications included the quarterly Journal of Information Science, Librarianship and Archives Administration, as well as guidelines, studies, technical reports, state-of-the-art reviews and directories.

Chapter V

World Health Organization (WHO)

The thirty-fourth World Health Assembly met at Geneva, from 4 to 22 May 1981, and adopted a global strategy for health for all by the year 2000 as a step towards achieving its constitutional objective: the attainment by all peoples of the highest possible level of health.

The Assembly also considered the question of a transfer of the Regional Office for the Eastern Mediterranean from Alexandria, Egypt, in the light of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice of 20 December 1980 on the wishes of the majority of member countries of the region.<sup>a</sup> Pursuant to paragraph 51 of the advisory opinion, discussions with the Government of Egypt were held in November 1981.

The Assembly amended the International Health Regulations (1969) to remove all provisions relating to smallpox in view of its global eradication. The amendment was to come into force on 1 January 1982.

In addition, the Assembly adopted an International Code of Marketing of Breast-milk Substitutes in the form of a recommendation to member States. The most important provision of the Code was that there should be no advertising or other form of promotion to the general public of the products concerned within the scope of the code.

Dominica became a member of the World Health Organization on 13 August 1981. Thus, at 31 December, the organization had 157 Members and one associate member.

Research promotion and development

At its twenty-third session, held at Geneva in October, WHO's Advisory Committee on Medical Research noted the progress made in ethics, health services research and mental health. It recommended establishing two new sub-committees on health services research with emphasis on maternal and child health, and on health services research in health systems for the adult population. In addition, the Advisory Committee reviewed the area of research in gerontology and the utilization and protection of non-human primates and other animals in research.

Co-ordination with other organizations

The focus for WHO's co-ordination activities during 1981 was the global strategy for health for all by the year 2000 and its relationship to the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade.<sup>b</sup> Acting on the recommendation of the Economic and Social Council, the United Nations General Assembly at its regular 1981 session unanimously adopted resolution 36/43 by which it requested all organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to collaborate fully with WHO in carrying out this global strategy (p. 802).

During the year, specific attention was given by WHO to the International Year of Disabled Persons (1981) with the organization hosting an interagency meeting in August and attending other interagency meetings in Paris (February) and Vienna (October) (p. 796).

A Health Resources Group for Primary Health Care was established to enable those interested in supporting the global health effort to discuss the international transfer of resources for health work and to have groups of donors act in unison in providing external support to individual countries. A particularly intensified effort was made to enhance technical co-operation among developing countries, including further development of collaboration with Arab, Islamic and regional funds and banks assisting socio-economic development.

Development of comprehensive health services

Primary health care

As a further effort to implement the main recommendations of the 1978 International Conference on Primary Health Care (Alma-Ata, USSR), the Joint Committee on Health Policy of the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) and WHO issued a study on national decision-making for primary health care. A plan of action was formulated for a multinational effort, with the participation of four countries (Burma, Democratic Yemen, Ethiopia, Nepal) to further the development of primary health care in countries seriously committed to that policy and to ascertain how UNICEF and WHO could best support such development.

To strengthen national health development networks, WHO collaborated with countries in the formulation of related national plans of action and development of a framework for monitoring those networks.

In the African region, interministerial co-ordination committees, or their equivalents, were set up to promote intersectoral activities within primary health care and national action programmes were formulated in a number of countries. Priority attention was given to newly independent nations, such as Zimbabwe. In the Americas, special emphasis was placed on meeting the health needs of underserved groups of the population. In South-East Asia, activities focused on the training and utilization of community health workers. In Europe, self-care, community participation, and the integration of primary, secondary and tertiary health care were emphasized. In the Eastern Mediterranean, additional countries incorporated primary health care programmes as an integral component of their health development plans. The Western Pacific region focused its attention on the promotion of national commitment to primary health care and its translation into action plans.

Family health

The programme of family health exemplified the principles of primary health care in emphasizing the crucial role of the family in health promotion and in the prevention, early diagnosis and treatment of disease. During 1981, WHO was executing agency for more than 100 national family health programmes, including co-operation in managerial, training and service aspects.

Infant and young child feeding continued to generate interest and positive action by Governments and non-governmental organizations because poor infant-feeding practices and their consequences were a major problem for both the developing and the developed world, along with the common communicable diseases of early childhood. The International Code of Marketing of Breast-milk Substitutes was adopted unanimously by the World Health Assembly in May 1981 and the Director-General was requested to report regularly on the status of compliance and on progress in promoting better infant-feeding practices.

Priority was given to the development of the methodology, including the necessary research, needed to strengthen the capabilities of the primary health workers for preventing the major nutritional problems, particularly of mothers and young children, through a better utilization of foods which were available and acceptable at the community level. In addition, specific attention was given to assisting many countries in further strengthening their health education services by re-examining the approaches taken in this field.

Human reproduction

In 1981, the special programme of research, development and research training in human reproduction involved administrators and scientists from 80 countries, 54 of which were developing countries. Guidance was made available to family planning programmes from operational studies completed during the year on the provision of family planning in the context of primary health care, and on the safety of currently used family planning methods. The special programme was largely financed by voluntary contributions. For 1981, the donors were Australia, China, Cuba, Denmark, Finland, India, the Netherlands, Nigeria, Norway, Sweden, Thailand, the United Kingdom, the United States and the United Nations Fund for Population Activities (UNFPA).

Mental health

Work proceeded along the lines of the three main objectives for the Organizations's mental health programme: to prevent or reduce psychiatric, neurological and psychosocial problems, including those related to alcohol and drug dependence; to increase effectiveness of general health services through appropriate utilization of mental health skills and knowledge; and to develop strategies for intervention based on an increased awareness of mental health aspects of social action and change.

Typical examples of collaborative country projects co-ordinated by WHO were: the project on determinants of outcome of severe mental disorders in which incidence, course and outcome of schizophrenia, in 11 areas in nine countries (Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, India, Japan, Nigeria, United Kingdom, United States, USSR) were assessed; the project on peripheral neuropathy in which field research centres in Canada, China, Italy, Mexico, Nigeria, Senegal, Spain and the United States collaborated to standardize assessment methods and to test the efficacy of drug treatment; and the projects on alcohol and drug dependence control which were implemented in Bolivia, Burma, Colombia, Ecuador, Egypt, Mexico, Pakistan, Thailand, the United Kingdom and Zambia and in which countries collaborated to increase the effectiveness of health and social service delivery systems by developing low cost approaches through the integration of those activities in existing health and social facilities and through primary health care programmes.

Diagnostic, therapeutic and rehabilitative technology

The newly formed Division of Diagnostic, Therapeutic and Rehabilitative Technology brought together important aspects of clinical and technological support for the delivery of health care. It included traditional medicine, essential surgical care and the action programme on essential drugs, which was aimed at improving the availability and utilization of drugs for primary health care at the lowest possible cost.

Under this programme, 71 countries participated in certifying the quality of internationally traded pharmaceutical products. Development of basic tests for identifying essential drugs and reorientation of the International Pharmacopoeia towards classical analytical methods helped developing countries develop their own quality control procedures.

The concept of basic radiological services continued to be promoted, and new approaches to minimize disability through prevention and rehabilitation were under evaluation.

Health manpower development

The emphasis in programme implementation in 1981 continued to be on the training and continuing education of front-line health workers, and their direct supervisors, and on the training of managers to ensure effective planning, implementation, supervision and evaluation of primary health care programmes. The network of institutions currently conducting innovative community oriented educational programmes, continued to promote exchanges of views and mutual support and to provide an information service on new educational methods and techniques.

Disease prevention and control

Acute respiratory infections

The programme on acute respiratory infections emphasized the development, through epidemiological and operational research, of appropriate technologies for the clinical management of those infections that could be applied as part of primary health care at the community level. This research component, being a priority at that stage, was supplemented by the development of a prototype programme of control based on existing knowledge, with emphasis on training of national staff involved in the programme.

In 1981, the programme was initiated in two countries (Kenya, Malaysia) and was continued in five countries (Brazil, China, Papua New Guinea, Philippines, United Republic of Tanzania).

Cancer

During 1981, a new, reoriented programme aimed at cancer control was devised and endorsed by the sub-committee on cancer of the WHO Advisory Committee on Medical Research. The programme sought to ensure international co-ordination of cancer activities in developing and implementing national cancer control programmes in line with the global strategy for health for all. Knowledge was currently available to predict that-given the right measures, sufficient resources and continued goal-directed research-up to one third of existing cancers could be prevented, up to one third could be cured and most incurable cancer patients could be spared pain.

Cardiovascular diseases

The Expert Committee on Prevention of Coronary Heart Disease, meeting in December 1981, stressed that a comprehensive plan for prevention of coronary heart disease should have three components: first, a population strategy for altering the mass characteristics of life-style and environment and their social and economic determinants; second, a high-risk strategy, concerned with identification and correction of individuals' susceptibility; and, third, a secondary prevention strategy aimed against recurrences and progression of the disease in those already afflicted.

The programme stressed the need for development of methods to enable public health authorities to prevent and control cardiovascular disease integrated with their health care systems.

Diarrhoeal diseases

The diarrhoeal diseases control programme, carried out in close collaboration with UNICEF, the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and the World Bank, developed national plans of action as a part of primary health care in about 30 developing countries by the end of 1981. In some two thirds of these, national programmes were under way. An essential element of national programmes was the provision of adequate supplies of oral rehydration salts; so far, 20 developing countries undertook large-scale production, a number of them with advice or support from UNICEF. Training was provided to 152 senior-level staff from 55 developing countries, with training for trainers being provided by regional or sub-regional training centres in seven countries and seminars in some 30 countries.

Expanded programme on immunization

By the end of 1981, this basic element of primary health care had developed from being a WHO-sponsored initiative to an operational programme in all developing countries. Improved technology for the storage and handling of vaccines considerably reduced the major technical constraint in providing immunization coverage to peripheral areas, but managerial constraints involving the training, motivation and supervision of staff remained. In most developing countries immunization within the first year of life against diphtheria, whooping cough, tetanus, measles, poliomyelitis and tuberculosis remained at less than 20 per cent. Training and evaluation efforts had currently resulted in more than 3,000 health workers being trained in the necessary techniques.

Leprosy

With the number of registered leprosy patients worldwide having increased to 5 million in 1981 from 3.6 million in 1976 and dapsone, the main anti-leprosy drug, encountering increased therapeutic resistance, a study group on chemotherapy of leprosy for control programmes met at Geneva in October 1981 and recommended use of known anti-leprosy drugs in combination. The ability to culture large quantities of the mycobacterium that caused leprosy in armadillos made it possible to develop a comprehensive plan for using such material to produce better diagnostic tests and a vaccine.

Malaria

The advent of multidrug resistance of Plasmodium falciparum in parts of Asia and South America had become the main obstacle to effective malaria control and a risk to the life of millions in these areas. In parts of East Africa, chloroquine-resistant P. falciparum had already taken a firm hold, but high immunity in the local population appeared to reduce its impact.

With the resurgence of malaria in Turkey, WHO co-operated with the authorities to control the disease and reduce the threat of future epidemics. In Haiti, India, Democratic Kampuchea, Mauritius and Sri Lanka, WHO also co-operated in the assessment of national antimalarial programmes.

Prevention of blindness

A majority of the estimated 28 million blind persons in the world lived in developing countries, where infectious and nutritional disorders, together with cataract, constitute the main causes of blindness, even though much of it was preventable or curable with existing knowledge. To redress this situation, continued emphasis was placed during 1981 on the planning and establishment of national programmes for the prevention of blindness that integrated simple but essential eye care within primary health care and increased community involvement in general preventive measures against common disorders leading to blindness. Currently, 21 such national programmes had been formulated and implemented.

Sexually transmitted diseases

In addition to setting out priorities regarding gonococcal and treponemal diseases and their complications, the WHO control programme for sexually transmitted diseases laid emphasis on other such diseases of public health importance and a technical guide was published containing up-to-date information on them and organization of control activities.

To make effective control methods available to areas with inadequate laboratory facilities, a simplified approach was developed which had an 80 to 90 per cent success rate. However, a rapid method of diagnosis remained to be developed.

Screening and systematic treatment campaigns for endemic treponematoses, yaws and endemic syphilis were carried out in a number of African countries, where several million inhabitants, mostly children, were at risk.

Smallpox eradication surveillance

As a result of the smallpox eradication programme and the follow-up programme on its surveillance, there remained only eight countries at the end of 1981 that were still routinely providing vaccinations against smallpox, and only one other that required international certification. To heighten public confidence in the fact that smallpox had actually been eradicated, a total of 30 suspected cases were investigated in 19 countries, and research on monkeypox and orthopox was conducted in Africa. In addition, sufficient vaccine for 200 million people was stockpiled in Geneva and New Delhi, India, and was available to any country, should an emergency occur. The number of laboratories retaining variola virus stocks was reduced to four, all of them under WHO supervision for safe storage.

Smoking and health

The action programme in the field of smoking and health became fully operational in 1981. It included the WHO international clearing-house for smoking and health information, which collected and disseminated information on smoking prevalence around the world. The programme organized workshops and international conferences on smoking and health, published a review of smoking control legislation around the world, and initiated a project to monitor tar, nicotine and carbon monoxide yields of cigarettes on sale in developing countries.

Tropical disease research

During 1981, the special programme for research and training in tropical diseases, a WHO/UNDP/World Bank programme of international technical co-operation, continued research and development towards controlling six tropical diseases (malaria, schistosomiasis, filariasis, trypanosomiasis-both African sleeping sickness and Chagas' disease-leishmaniasis and leprosy). The programme also pursued the strengthening of the research capabilities of tropical countries affected by the diseases.

As at 31 December 1981, the programme had supported 1,395 projects and over 2,300 scientists from 118 member States had participated in its planning, implementation, operation and evaluation. More than $72 million was obligated for direct support to national scientists and institutions. The percentage of financial support for projects going to developing tropical countries rose from 29 per cent in 1977 to 62 per cent in 1981.

Findings of the programme's research resulted in the publication of some 1,400 scientific papers. Support to scientists and institutions of developing endemic countries has included 325 individual training grants and long-term support to 57 institutions.

Tuberculosis

In sharp contrast to developed countries where a spectacular decline in tuberculosis was observed, little improvement had been made in developing countries and a joint WHO/International Union Against Tuberculosis study group on tuberculosis control reconfirmed the need for comprehensive programmes on a country-wide scale through the existing health services.

An emergency programme, co-ordinated by WHO with special contributions by UNICEF and several member States, was set up to evaluate the effectiveness of BCG (Bacillus Calmette-Guérin) vaccination in infants and children and developing countries in all regions of the world co-operated by carrying out case-control studies and studies in contacts of newly discovered cases.

Vector biology and control

The December 1981 meeting of the Expert Committee on Biological Control of Vectors of Disease, concluded that biological agents played a useful role in naturally regulating vector populations and could, thus, become part of an integrated vector control programme. However, the development and use of biological control agents required specialized knowledge and hence additional training of researchers, vector control personnel and community members. The Committee recommended the development of regional centres for this purpose. It also noted that chemical pesticides were likely to remain a principal vector control agent for the foreseeable future.

Virus, rickettsial and related diseases

In the field of virus laboratory diagnosis, new, simple and rapid techniques were developed for use without sophisticated equipment and at the peripheral health level. During 1981, the need for efficacious vaccines was emphasized when dengue haemorrhagic fever reached record levels in some South-East Asian countries, and the haemorrhagic form appeared for the first time in the Americas. Rift Valley fever also continued to cause concern since its sudden appearance in Egypt in 1977 and a consultation was held to outline approaches for the disease's surveillance and control.

Other non-communicable diseases

Activities of WHO concerning other non-communicable diseases related to formulating and implementing community-oriented programmes in the prevention and control of diabetes, chronic respiratory and chronic rheumatic diseases. Meetings between WHO and the International Diabetes Federation, International League against Rheumatism and the International Union against Tuberculosis held in 1981 led to the establishment of jointly supported programmes in each area.

Promotion of environmental health

The International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade, 1981-1990, proclaimed by the United Nations General Assembly in November 1980,<sup>c</sup> was of major importance to WHO's effort to implement its global strategy for health based on primary health care, essential elements of which were drinking-water supply and sanitation.

At the country level, WHO pursued co-operation with more than 100 member States with emphasis on the promotion of the Decade, including the elaboration of national plans and programmes, institutional development, the development of human resources, information exchange and technology development, and the mobilization of financial resources.

Attention was also focused on similar problems in the industrial countries without a universal supply of clean drinking water and where toxic wastes represented new hazards. The evaluation and assessment of those hazards were top priorities of the international programme on chemical safety, undertaken jointly with the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) and the International Labour Organisation.

Another active programme was that on food safety and on the control of environmental hazards. Work with the Food and Agriculture <sup>c</sup> See YUN 1980, p. 704, resolution 35/18 of 10 November 1980.

Organization of the United Nations (FAO) continued on international food standards in the Codex Alimentarius Commission and new priorities in work on food safety emerged in WHO's attempt to enhance the control of diarrhoeal disease.

Secretariat

As at 31 December 1981, the total number of full-time staff employed by WHO stood at 4,379 on permanent and fixed-term contracts. Of these, 1,575 staff members, drawn from 113 nationalities, were in the Professional and higher categories and 2,804 were in the General Service category. Of the total number of staff, 222 were in posts financed by UNDP, UNEP, UNFPA and the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control.

Budget

The thirty-second World Health Assembly (1979) had approved an effective working budget of $427,290,000 for 1980-1981.

It also authorized the use of casual income up to a maximum amount of $15 million for this period in order to meet any net additional costs arising under the regular budget resulting from differences between the exchange rate used for budgeting purposes and actual accounting rates of exchange between those currencies during the biennium. At the same time, the Director-General was requested to transfer to casual income any net savings resulting from such differences in the budgetary and accounting rates of exchange between the Swiss franc and the United States dollar, provided that such net savings need not exceed $15 million.

Because of the more favourable exchange rate, savings accrued under the regular budget for 1980-1981 amounted to $18,071,000 which was to be credited to casual income as and when the arrears of contributions for the 1980-1981 financial period were collected. Furthermore savings amounting to $2,368,393 were effected during the biennium; as a result total obligations incurred during 1980-1981 were $406,850,607.

Chapter VI

International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (World Bank)

The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (World Bank) and its affiliate, the International Development Association (IDA), continued their efforts, during the fiscal year 1 July 1980 to 30 June 1981, to assist developing countries in a deteriorating world economic situation.

Lending commitments by the Bank, credit approvals from IDA, and investment commitments by another Bank affiliate, the International Finance Corporation (IFC), amounted to $13,102 million-up $940 million (8 per cent) from the previous year.

Membership in the Bank rose to 141 during 1981, with the admission of Bhutan and Vanuatu on 28 September.

Lending operations

In the fiscal year ending 30 June 1981, the World Bank made 140 loans amounting to $8,809 million to 50 countries, an increase of $1,165 million over fiscal year 1980. This brought the cumulative total of loan commitments by the Bank since its inception in 1946 to $68,150.3 million.

The table on the following pages summarizes World Bank lending in fiscal 1981 by area and by purpose.

Agriculture and rural development

The Bank continued its commitment to rural development, making 38 loans in fiscal 1981 amounting to 2,406 million in 22 countries. Efforts continued in support of projects directly benefiting the rural poor.

Mexico received $628 million, of which $280 million was for a rural development project that included establishment of agricultural research programmes and construction of farm-to-market roads, irrigation schemes, and drainage facilities to benefit more than 160,000 farm families in rainfed areas. Nigeria received a total of $274 million for two support services projects, and the United Republic of Cameroon received $25 million to benefit farm families in its northern

Egypt received $64 million to rehabilitate its largest producer of steel, while Turkey received $110 million to increase fertilizer production. In other countries, credits were allotted for: rehabilitation of steelmaking facilities, technical assistance, improvement of railway services and textile industry rehabilitation.

Non-project

Ten non-project loans totalling 789.0 million were made to eight countries in fiscal 1981. Turkey received two credits totalling $375 million, of which a $300 million credit went to support the country's 1980 stabilization programme and to restore economic viability. The Philippines received $200 million for an industrial development programme designed to accelerate industrial growth, expand employment, maintain rapid growth of non-traditional exports and stimulate industry outside Manila. Of two credits totalling $92 million extended to Zimbabwe, one of $50 million went to financing high-priority import requirements for raw materials, spare parts and equipment for the manufacturing sector.

Other purposes for which credits were committed included: structural-adjustment loans and assistance, financing of high-priority import requirements and technical assistance.

New projects included one for $3.4 million to assist 60 countries assess their energy assistance needs, a first Bank/UNDP project in China for the preparation of investment projects and a technical assistance project in Bolivia to help it carry out the programme for which the Bank had made a structural-adjustment loan. With UNDP contributing $8 million, this would be the largest single UNDP-funded project for which the Bank had served as executing agency.

Brazil received $180 million for improvement of health conditions through provision of piped water as well as sewerage to residents in five states and in the Federal district. A $125 million loan to Mexico was for construction of water-distribution networks and related facilities to provide water supply to 1.2 million people and sewerage to 1.3 million people in several cities. Morocco received $87 million for expansion of water-supply facilities, technical assistance and training. Other loans went for improvement of water-supply services and provision of sanitation services.

Economic Development Institute

The fiscal 1981 programme of the Economic Development Institute, designed to train senior officials of the Bank's member developing countries in economic management and investment, included eight courses and nine seminars in Washington, D.C. (United States) for 400 participants, and 25 regional and 18 national courses and seminars for 1,200 participants. The Institute also began training Chinese officials when a project-planning seminar for senior officials was held in Washington followed a similar course in Shanghai.

In Africa, the Institute co-sponsored six regional courses and one regional seminar, in addition to a railway course and a regional development planning seminar for French-speaking African countries. Other regional courses and seminars co-sponsored by the Institute included: one on organizational and financial aspects of power projects, with the Electricity Generating Authority of Thailand; one on metropolitan management, with the Asian Development Bank; and two courses on development banking and agroindustrial projects, with the Association of Argentine Banks.

During the fiscal year, the Institute also responded to over 1,000 requests a month for training materials such as case studies and course notes- five times as many as in fiscal 1980.

Development aid co-ordination

At the request of donor and recipient governments, the Bank continued to organize various aid co-ordination mechanisms for developing countries receiving assistance from bilateral and multilateral sources. During the year, the Bank sponsored meetings of 11 aid co-ordinating groups -for Bangladesh, Burma, the Caribbean nations, India (twice), Mauritius, Pakistan, Peru, the Philippines, Sri Lanka, Thailand and Zaire. The Bank also participated in a meeting of the Inter-Governmental Group for Indonesia, sponsored by the Netherlands and the Turkey Consortium, chaired by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

Financing activities

During fiscal 1981, the World Bank borrowed the equivalent of $5,068.8 million: $1,437 million in deutsche mark; $1,111 million in United States dollars; $1,090.6 million in Japanese yen; $962.5 million in Swiss francs; $251.9 million in Netherlands guilders; and $215.8 million in pounds sterling.

Of the 44 borrowing operations conducted by the Bank, 28 were public issues or private placements throughout the world and accounted for $3,322.6 million, or 66 per cent of total funds borrowed. The other 16 issues, totalling $1,729.1 million, or 34 per cent of funds raised, were placed with official sources such as member Governments of the Bank, central banks and government institutions.

As at 30 June 1981, the Bank's outstanding obligations amounted to $27,797.8 million, denominated in 17 different currencies placed with investors in over 100 countries. Estimates indicated that 23.3 per cent was held in the Federal Republic of Germany, 17.2 per cent in the United States, 16.3 per cent in Japan, 14.9 per cent in Switzerland, 14.9 per cent by countries belonging to the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries; and the remaining 13.4 per cent in other countries.

Capitalization

In the Bank's Articles of Agreement, the institution's capital stock is expressed in terms of 1944 dollars- the United States dollar of the weight and fineness in effect on 1 July 1944. On 1 April 1978, when the Second Amendment of the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) became effective, currencies no longer had par values, and the basis for translating the 1944 dollar into current United States dollars no longer existed.

Thus, for the fiscal year ended 30 June 1981, the value of the Bank's capital stock was expressed on the basis of special drawing rights (SDRs) in terms of the United States dollar as computed by IMF on 30 June. On that date, the value of the SDR was set at $1.15060.

The subscribed capital of the Bank was increased by SDR 1,650.3 million in fiscal 1981, bringing the total of subscribed capital to SDR 31,822.1 million as of 30 June.

income, expenditures and reserves

The Bank's gross revenues, generated primarily from its loans and investments, increased by $199 million in fiscal 1981 to a record level of $2,999 million. Net income was $610 million, an increase of 3.7 per cent over the previous fiscal year.

Total expenses amounted to $2,389 million, up 8 per cent from fiscal 1980. Administrative costs totalled $255 million, up $57 million.

The General Reserve of the Bank amounted to $2,859 million at the end of fiscal 1981.

Chapter VII

International Finance Corporation (IFC)

The International Finance Corporation (IFC) was established in 1956 as an affiliate of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (World Bank) to assist developing member countries by helping them to promote the private sector of their economies. The principal objectives of IFCare: to provide risk capital for productive private enterprise, in association with private investors and management; to encourage the development of local capital markets; and to stimulate the international flow of private capital.

In the fiscal year ending on 30 June 1981—the Corporation's twenty-fifth year of operation—the Board of Directors approved 56 projects with an equity and loan commitment value of over $810 million; an increase of 19 per cent over the previous year ($681 million). Operating income for the current year rose 11 per cent to over $100 million while net income was $19.5 million compared with the previous year's $20.7 million. Syndications, a measure of IFC's ability to attract others to help finance projects in which it is involved, reached $374 million and embraced over 50 financial institutions—as against the 1980 figure of $266.8 million.

Of the total financing approved, $396.9 million went to establish new operations; $344.2 million to expand and modernize existing plants; and $61.4 million to support financial institutions. The balance, $8.5 million, involved the exercise of stock rights.

The total cost of approved investment was about $3,300 million as compared with $2,400 million in the previous year. Of this, IFC Provided $811 million so that of every dollar of project cost, IFC contributed approximately 24 cents of which about half, or 11 cents, was raised from other financial institutions through syndications of IFC loans. Of the balance of project costs, $1,940 million was raised through other financial institutions, mainly commercial banks, and $589 million was provided by the sponsors and through cash generation.

With respect to the investments approved, agroindustrial, hotel, cement, and pulp and paper ventures were more prominent than in the recent past. Manufacturing, at about 44 per cent of the total number of projects approved, dropped below 50 per cent for the first time.

The Corporation continued to place greater emphasis on its activities in some of the smaller and low-income countries so that 29 ventures, roughly half, were in countries with per capita income of less than $626 per year. The Corporation undertook investments in 34 countries, six of them for the first time.

Including approvals for two major projects, a coal mine in Zimbabwe and a fertilizer plant in Senegal, the year's investment in Africa exceeded $100 million for the first time with costs totaling over $800 million. In view of the importance of Africa in IFC's operations, the position of Vice-President for investment operations in Africa was established in 1981.

At the end of 1981, following the admission during the year of the Congo, Seychelles and Vanuatu, membership in IFC was 120.

Chapter VIII

International Development Association (IDA)

Established in 1960 as an affiliate of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (World Bank), the International Development Association (IDA), promotes economic development by supporting productive, high-priority projects in developing member countries.

The Association lends for the same purposes as the World Bank, using the same staff and appraisal criteria, but its capital and assets are entirely separate from those of the Bank.

The Bank obtains the larger part of its funds, called credits to distinguish them from Bank loans, in the capital markets and lends on roughly conventional terms. The bulk of the resources of IDA are contributed by member Governments, enabling it to lend to the poorest countries on more flexible terms that bear less heavily on their balance of payments.

In general, a country eligible to receive IDA credits must have an annual per capita gross national product of less than $681; in the fiscal year ending on 30 June 1981 over 70 countries were eligible under this criterion.

The Association's credits are interest-free, with a service charge of 0.75 per cent on disbursed and outstanding credit balances. The credits are repayable over 50 years, with an initial grace period of 10 years before repayment begins.

Unlike the Bank, which may lend to public and private entities with Government guarantees, IDA lends only to Governments. In the case of revenue-producing projects, IDA credits are lent by the Governments on terms reflecting the local cost of capital. Thus, IDA terms help Governments to finance economic development without distorting the local credit structure.

At the end of fiscal 1981, IDA's resources totalled the equivalent of $22,331 million.

The bulk of IDA funds for lending is provided by its Part I (richer) member countries and several Part II (developing) countries under a series of replenishment agreements. As at the end of fiscal 1981, however, the agreement on the sixth replenishment of IDA, covering fiscal years 1981-1983 and providing the equivalent of $12,000 million in funding, had not yet become effective. Pending effectiveness of the agreement, IDA made credit commitments against advance contributions amounting to some 1,837 million special drawing rights ($2,409 million) provided by 22 countries.

Membership of IDA rose to 128 during the year, with the admission of Bhutan and Vanuatu on 28 September and the United Arab Emirates on 23 December.

Lending operations

By 30 June 1981, IDA had made cumulative net commitments totalling $24,051 million. Commitments in fiscal year 1981 amounted to $3,482.1 million, of which $2,101.2 million went to six countries in South Asia and $570.1 million to 13 countries in East Africa. India, with 11 credits amounting to $1,281 million, was the largest borrower from IDA during the year, followed by Bangladesh with 8 credits of $334 million.

The table below summarizes IDA lending in fiscal year 1981 by area and by purpose.

Agriculture and rural development

As in previous years, credits for agriculture and rural development accounted for the largest portion of IDA lending in fiscal 1981. Forty-seven credits totalling the equivalent of $1,357 million were committed in 27 countries.

Of credits totalling $490 million made to India, one of $140 million was to increase food grain production and raise living standards of farmers in Madhya Pradesh state.

To benefit 4,000 low-income farm families in West Nubariya, Egypt received $94 million, of which $80 million was for desert reclamation, including irrigation and drainage, economic and social infrastructure, farm machinery, consultant services and training.

Other purposes for which credits were committed included: agricultural credit, irrigation and drainage, area development, agroindustry, forestry, fisheries, livestock, perennial crops, and research and extension.

Development finance companies

Of four credits totalling $70.5 million granted in fiscal 1981, $50 million went to Bangladesh for industrial projects and to expand private industrial investment. The Solomon Islands received $1.5 million for projects in agriculture, manufacturing and transport. Haiti's $7 million was to finance industrial projects, as was the $12 million allotted to Yemen.

Education

Credits totalling $360.7 million were granted during fiscal 1981 for educational projects in 12 countries.

China received $100 million, in addition to a $100 million World Bank loan, for the initial phase of a programme to strengthen higher education and research activities in science and engineering. A $10 million credit to Lesotho was for the construction of 150 primary-school classrooms and 1.9 million textbooks and workbooks.

Other loans went for: vocational, agricultural and handicrafts training centres; primary education; veterinary, school management, teacher, agricultural and industrial training; educational materials; and school buildings.

Energy

Five countries received credits totalling $136 million for energy-related projects. Bangladesh received $85 million to reduce its dependence on imported oil over a three-year period through replacement of liquid hydrocarbons with indigenous natural gas. A $28.5 million credit was made to Guinea to finance part of a programme to rehabilitate and expand power facilities in and around Conakry and to strengthen management and operations of the Société Nationale d'Electricité. In other countries credits were allotted for: electrification programmes; evaluation of hydrocarbon potential, and petroleum and mineral research and exploration.

Industry

Three credits totalling $409.7 million were made for industrial development during fiscal 1981. India received $400 million for the construction of a fertilizer plant in Gujarat state that will produce 2,700 tons of ammonia and 4,400 tons of urea a day thereby reducing fertilizer imports. Togo received $5.7 million for a phosphate fertilizer feasibility study and Burundi, $4 million to analyse development of nickel deposits.

Non-project

In the non-project sector, seven credits totalling $223 million were made during the fiscal year. To help meet fertilizer demand, a $50 million credit was made to Pakistan to finance fertilizer imports and improve fertilizer production. Loans to other countries were for funds to cover cost of essential imports to improve agricultural production, the industrial sector and identify high-priority investment areas.

Small-scale enterprises

A total of $71.5 million was granted to four countries for small-scale enterprises.

Bangladesh received $35 million to increase productivity, employment and cottage industry exports. Pakistan's $30 million was to refinance commercial bank subloans for development of small-scale industries and to provide extension services to woodworking and leather goods enterprises, to promote export of handicrafts and to initiate project development in Baluchistan. In addition to $6.5 million from the World Bank, $2.5 million was provided by IDA to Senegal for investments in industrial, fisheries and tourism projects and to improve small- and medium-scale enterprises—a purpose for which Liberia also received $4 million.

Technical assistance

Of ten credits totalling $81.6 million $10 million was granted to the United Republic of Cameroon to improve the organization and operation of current systems of national planning and external debt management. An $11.5 million credit was made to Madagascar to establish an instructional programme to provide professional accountants and auditors, industrial management consulting and audit services, and to create a legislative framework.

Telecommunications

Three credits totalling $329.2 million were made for telecommunications projects during fiscal 1981. To benefit 40 million people without access to public telephones, India received $314 million for additional direct-exchange lines, public call offices, telex facilities and related equipment, and upgrading production facilities of telecommunications equipment. Burundi received $7.7 million to improve long-distance transmission networks and extend coverage by installation of public call boxes. Rwanda's $7.5 million was for expansion of the urban cable network.

Transportation

Fifteen credits totalling $299.8 million were made for transportation projects in 14 countries during fiscal 1981. Upper Volta received $46 million to rehabilitate and maintain 6,000 kilometres of paved and gravel roads and construct 1,640 kilometres of feeder roads for better access to rural areas. Democratic Yemen received $12.5 million for a 92-kilometre road to improve access to three towns in the isolated Shabwah governorate. Credits approved for other countries went to improve highways, transportation, ports and waterways, airlines and airports, and railways.

Urbanization

The only credit in the urbanization sector ($42 million) was given to India for a Madras project that included development of 15,000 residential and 200 industrial plots, provision of basic infrastructure and land tenure to 50,000 slum households, home improvement loans and grants to 80,000 slum households, the procurement of 550 buses, road construction and maintenance, and improvement of solid waste management.

Water supply and sewerage

Of five credits totalling $101.1 million made for water supply and sewerage projects, Egypt received a $56.6 million credit for expansion and rehabilitation of water-supply facilities in Beheira to improve water supplies for the current two million consumers and to provide safe drinking water for another 800,000.

Chapter IX

International Monetary Fund (IMF)

The financial activity of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) reached a new peak in 1981 in terms of the number of arrangements with members involving high conditionality in the use of Fund resources, the total amount of resources committed under existing arrangements, and the magnitude of actual purchases. In addition, the Fund took a number of major decisions to make special drawing rights (SDRs) the principal reserve asset in the international monetary system. With effect from 1 January 1981, the valuation "basket" of the SDR—the unit of account of IMF—was reduced from 16 international currencies to five. The Fund also adopted guidelines on multiple currency practices and on enlarged access to Fund resources, and decided to assist members encountering balance-of-payments difficulties owing to excessive cost of their cereal imports.

New loan commitments approved under stand-by and extended arrangements in 1981 amounted to an unprecedented SDR 15.2 billion—more than twice the previous high of SDR 7 billion attained in 1980, all for non-oil developing countries. Members' purchases (drawings) from the Fund in 1981 reached a record high of SDR 7.1 billion (excluding reserve tranche purchases), all drawn by non-oil developing countries. Repurchases of SDR 2.1 billion in 1981, less than in any of the four previous years, yielded net purchases of SDR 5 billion—a new record and the second year in which purchases exceeded repurchases after three consecutive years of net repurchases. This increased financial activity over previous years reflected the large and widespread payments imbalances of IMF members and the Fund's policy of enlarged access under its stand-by and extended arrangements.

The Fund's regular resources, consisting primarily of quota subscriptions by members, rose from SDR 39 billion to SDR 60 billion, as a result of the coming into effect in November 1980 of the quota increase proposed under the Seventh General Review of Quotas, initiated in 1976. Preliminary work began on the Eighth General Review, to be completed by December 1983, with special attention being paid to the overall size of the Fund and selective adjustments in members' quotas so as to reflect in the quota structure the developments in members' positions in the world economy, world economic conditions and the Fund's liquidity.

Substantial borrowings, required to supplement the Fund's regular resources, were forecast at SDR 6 to 7 billion a year for the next three years. These borrowings would enable the Fund to play a suitable role in recycling increases in reserves, concentrated among a small number of members.

In 1981, IMF concluded arrangements with the Saudi Arabian Monetary Agency (SAMA) to enable it to borrow up to SDR 4 billion in each of the next two years. In addition, the Fund made arrangements for short-term financing of SDR 1.3 billion from the central banks of 16 industrial countries with one-half available under a borrowing agreement with the Bank of International Settlements (BIS) and the remainder under direct bilateral arrangements with four central banks.

In anticipation of the full commitment of resources from the supplementary financing facility, the Executive Board adopted in March a policy of enlarged access to the Fund's resources, to be used until the Eighth General Review of Quotas became effective. The policy became operative with the completion of borrowing agreements with SAMA, BIS and the central banks. It was expected to help provide supplementary financing in conjunction with the use of the Fund's ordinary resources to members facing payments imbalances large in relation to their quotas.

Like its predecessor, the supplementary financing facility, the enlarged access policy was intended to support economic programmes under stand-by arrangements reaching into the upper credit tranches or under extended arrangements. Such drawings were subject to relevant Fund policies, including those on conditionality, phasing and performance criteria, and the period of arrangement was normally to exceed one year and could extend up to three years in exceptional cases. While the amount of assistance under the policy was determined according to guidelines adopted by the Fund from time to time, current guidelines specified limits of 150 per cent of quota annually or 450 per cent over a three-year period; at the same time, a limit of 600 per cent of quota, net of scheduled repurchases, applied to the cumulative use of Fund resources. These limits, however, excluded drawings under the compensatory and buffer stock financing facilities as well as outstanding drawings under the oil facility, whose operations concluded in 1976.

The Fund entered into borrowing agreements with various members or institutions within their territories, as well as with BIS and the Swiss National Bank, under which they agreed to make resources available to the Fund to finance purchases by members under the Fund's policy of enlarged access.

Ten members or institutions within their territories had adhered to the General Arrangement to Borrow (GAB), under which the Fund could borrow their currencies up to specified amounts when supplementary resources were needed to forestall or cope with an impairment of the international monetary system. Any calls made by the Fund under GAB, which first became effective on 24 October 1962 and were renewed until 23 October 1985, were repayable within five years, with 4 per cent annual interest rate.

The Fund's Executive Board took a number of major decisions during the year to enhance further the role of SDRs as an international reserve asset. With effect from 1 January 1981, the SDR valuation basket was reduced from 16 currencies to five (the United States dollar, the deutsche mark, the French franc, the Japanese yen and pound sterling), and unified with the basket used to determine the interest rate on SDRs. The SDR interest rate was raised from 80 per cent to 100 per cent of the combined market interest rate, effective as of 1 May. The reconstitution requirement whereby each member was obliged to maintain over time a minimum average holding of 15 per cent of its net cumulative SDR allocation was abrogated with effect from 30 April.

By agreement between participants, SDRs became freely transferable in transactions and operations that included SDR purchases and sales, loans, donations (grants), swaps and SDR pledges. The first use of SDRs in loans and in settlement of financial obligations took place during the year. The unit was also increasingly accepted for private-contract use as well as by other international and interregional organizations.

The third and final allocation of SDRs (SDR 4,053 million) in the third basic period (1 January 1978-31 December 1981) was made as of 1 January 1981 to all Fund members, bringing total SDR allocations to 21.4 billion. Four more institutions were prescribed as "other holders" of SDRs, and the first transactions and operations in SDRs involving "other holders" took place in 1981.

The Fund's Executive Board also decided in 1981, after a comprehensive review, to simplify the structure of the Fund's charges by introducing a single charge rate of 6.25 per cent on members' use of the Fund's ordinary resources, together with provision for periodic reviews of the Fund's income position. While the level of charges had been raised somewhat, charges for the use of ordinary resources still contained an important element of concessionality. Charges on Fund assistance financed with borrowed resources, however, would reflect the cost of borrowed funds.

In May, the Executive Board adopted a decision aimed at assisting members with balance-of-payments difficulties due to excess in their cereal import cost for factors beyond their control. This assistance was to be integrated with that already available under the compensatory financing facility for shortfalls in export earnings, with an overall purchase limit of 125 per cent of quota. The integrated facility, while available to all Fund members, was expected to be particularly beneficial to low-income countries.

Under other Executive Board decisions, effective 1 May, Fund members using the credit tranches or the extended Fund facility now had the option either to use or retain a reserve tranche position, thus gaining greater flexibility in timing the use of their reserve tranche position. In conjunction with the raising of the rate of remuneration on Fund creditor positions from 72 per cent to 85 per cent of the combined market interest rate, the decisions also improved the attractiveness of the reserve tranche position for members.

Membership of the Fund rose to 143 in 1981, with the admission on 28 September of Bhutan and Vanuatu.

Supplementary financing facility

The supplementary financing facility, for which financing was provided by 14 lenders for a total of SDR 7.8 billion (see table below), enabled the Fund to provide supplementary financing under stand-by and extended arrangements, in conjunction with the use of the Fund's ordinary resources.

The borrowed resources available under the facility were fully committed by 30 March, except that resources could become available again in the event of cancellation of an arrangement involving supplementary financing, and were, in principle, to be made from borrowing by the Fund under the new policy of enlarged access.

In accordance with the loan agreements, supplementary financing facility funds could not be committed after 22 February 1982. However, the Fund decided that, in the period up to that date, supplementary financing released under a cancelled arrangement by a member would be committed if another arrangement that replaced that arrangement was entered into by the same member.

Chapter X

International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO)

The International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) estimated total traffic of the world's scheduled airlines to be close to 134 billion tonne-kilometres during 1981, an increase of 2.5 per cent above 1980. The airlines carried almost 745 million passengers at a load factor of 64 per cent, an improvement over the previous year's 63 per cent. Air freight increased by a little over 4 per cent to some 30 billion tonne-kilometres, the third lowest rate recorded during the last decade. Air mail traffic amounted to 3.08 billion tonne-kilometres, an increase of about 4 per cent, close to the average rate of increase in 10 years.

During 1980, membership of ICAO rose to 150 with the admission of Antigua and Barbuda (10 December), Grenada (30 September), Kiribati (14 May) and Zimbabwe (13 March).

Activities in 1981

Air navigation

During 1981, ICAO'S main efforts in the air navigation field continued to be directed towards updating and implementing ICAO Specifications and Regional Plans. The Specifications consisted of International Standards and Recommended Practices contained in 17 technical Annexes to the Convention on International Civil Aviation (Chicago, 1944), and of Procedures for Air Navigation Services (PANS) contained in three PANS documents. The Regional Plans set forth air navigation facilities and services required for international air navigation in the nine ICAO regions.

The Specifications in nine Annexes and two PANS documents were amended and one new Annex was adopted. Amendments were also made to Regional Plans.

Nine air navigation meetings were held in 1981; they covered a wide range of subjects and made recommendations for changes to ICAO Specifications.

To promote uniform application of the Specifications, ICAO made available guidance material in the form of new and revised technical manuals and ICAO circulars.

The regional offices of ICAO assisted States in implementing Regional Plans. This work was supplemented by that of experts sent to advise States on the installation of new facilities and services and the operation of existing ones.

Special attention was given to: aircraft airworthiness, operations, noise, engine emissions, and accident investigation and prevention; aerodromes; air traffic control; aeronautical charts, communications, information services and meteorology; personnel licensing and training; aviation medicine and security; and transport of dangerous goods.

Air transport

In the air transport field during 1981, ICAO continued its programmes of economic studies, collection and publication of air transport statistics and promotion of greater facilitation in international air transport.

The Conference on Airport and Route Facility Economics (19 May to 5 June), attended by participants from 59 countries and seven international organizations, reviewed the general economic situation of international airports and route facilities in relation to that of the air carriers, considered the financing of airport security and airport noise alleviation measures and ICAO activities in the field of airport and route air navigation facility economics. The Conference developed 18 recommendations.

The seventh session of the Statistics Division, held from 1 to 18 September, was attended by representatives from 41 countries and two international organizations. It reviewed the organization's statistical programme and made 13 recommendations, some in the fields of commercial air carrier, airport and route facility statistics.

The fifth meeting of the expert panel on regulation of air transport services, held in July, gave preliminary consideration to the regulation of non-scheduled air transport and the feasibility of amending certain Articles of the Convention on International Civil Aviation. Another panel of experts, on machinery for establishment of international fares and rates, held its fifth meeting in December, and considered rules and conditions associated with international scheduled passenger fares, and made a preliminary examination of rules and practices concerning denied boarding compensation and baggage allowances and charges. It also reviewed draft material for a manual on tariff matters and exchanged views concerning the currency conversion system of the International Air Transport Association for specification of fares and rates in national currencies.

Informal regional workshop meetings were held during 1981 in the fields of aviation forecasting and economic planning (Mexico City, April), statistics (Dakar, Senegal, May), and airport and route facility economics (Bangkok, Thailand, December).

A study of air passenger and freight transport for the Middle East was completed for publication in January 1982. Other publications in 1981 included the regular series of digests of civil aviation statistics, the yearbook on world civil aviation statistics, manuals on ICAO'S statistical programme and on airport and air navigation facility tariffs, a study of regional differences in fares, rates and costs for international air transport in 1979 and a survey of international air transport fares and rates in 1980.

The organization continued secretariat services to three independent regional civil aviation bodies- the African Civil Aviation Commission, the European Civil Aviation Conference and the Latin American Civil Aviation Commission.

A 1956 joint financing agreement for air navigation services in Greenland and the Faeroe Islands, and another in Iceland, also continued to be administered by ICAO.

Legal matters

A Panel of Experts met at Montreal, Canada, from 8 to 16 June 1981 to make recommendalions to the ICAO Council on the general work programme of the Legal Committee in the light of a decision of the twenty-third (1980) session of the ICAO Assembly that the Council should propose a revised programme reflecting the needs of international civil aviation in the 1980s. After studying replies from States and international organizations to questionnaires on the legal status of the aircraft commander, on the liability of air traffic control agencies, on aerial collision and on the status of the legal instruments of the "Warsaw System" (the Warsaw Convention of 1929 for the Unification of Certain Rules relating to International Carriage by Air, as amended by subsequent Protocols, dated 1955, 1971 and 1975), the Panel recommended that the questions of liability of air traffic control agencies, and the study of the status of the Warsaw System should remain in the Legal Committee's general work programme.

In October, the ICAO Council requested detailed studies on those subjects as well as on the legal implications of aircraft accident and incident investigation and on the development of standard contracts on lease, charter and interchange of aircraft.

The Committee on Unlawful Interference with International Civil Aviation and its Facilities held three meetings during the year and re-examined proposals for the amendment of certain specifications in Annex 17 (security and safeguarding international aviation against acts of unlawful interference), in the light of comments made by contracting States and interested international organizations. On 15 June 1981, the Council consequently adopted Amendment 4 to the Annex which introduced a new element in Chapter 6 of Annex 17, namely the concept of lease, charter and interchange of aircraft in international operations and it added a specification on the transportation of persons in custody.

The Committee also made recommendations to the Council concerning implementation of a resolution of the Assembly's 1980 session on the refusal to allow unlawfully seized aeroplanes to land.

During the year, the ICAO Council adopted three resolutions (26 June, 23 November and 17 December 1981) relating to acts of unlawful interference with international civil aviation and its facilities.

The following conventions and protocols on international air law concluded under ICAO auspices were ratified or adhered to during 1981:

Convention on International Civil Aviation (Chicago, 1944)

Antigua and Barbuda, Grenada, Kiribati, Zimbabwe

Convention on International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft (Geneva, 1948)

Technical assistance

During 1981, ICAO provided technical assistance to 106 States; in 81 of these there were resident missions consisting of one or more experts. In addition to resident expertise, assistance was provided in the form of equipment, fellowships and scholarships and through short missions by experts.

Twenty new large-scale projects, each costing more than $500,000, for which ICAO was to be the executing agency, were approved by the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). Two large-scale projects were financed under trust funds assistance.

The organization employed 804 experts from 51 countries during all or part of 1981, 458 on assignments under UNDP, 369 on trust fund projects and eight under the associate experts programme. There were also 21 United Nations volunteers. The number of experts in the field at the end of 1981 was 415 as compared with 401 at the end of 1980.

A total of 1,180 fellowships were awarded in 1981 as compared with 1,354 for 1980.

Equipment purchases and subcontracts were a substantial proportion of the technical assistance programme in 1981; the total sum committed during 1980 increased to $19.9 million. Twenty-nine Governments or organizations had registered with ICAO under the Civil Aviation Purchasing Service.

Chapter XI

Universal Postal Union (UPU)

The Universal Postal Union (UPU), established at Berne, Switzerland, in 1874 for the reciprocal exchange of postal services between nations, is one of the oldest international intergovernmental organizations. Its aim is to promote the organization and improvement of postal services and to further the development of international collaboration in this sphere. It also participates in various forms of postal technical assistance requested by its member States.

In 1981, the number of UPU members increased from 160 to 164, following the admission of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, and Tuvalu (3 February), South Africa (19 June)<sup>a</sup> and Zimbabwe (31 July).

Activities of UPU organs in 1981

Universal Postal Congress

The Universal Postal Congress, composed of all UPU member States, is the supreme legislative authority of UPU. It normally meets every five years. The most recent Congress—the eighteenth—was held at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, in 1979 and the next is scheduled to meet at Hamburg, Federal Republic of Germany, in 1984.

Executive Council

At its 1981 session, held at Berne from 27 April to 14 May 1981, the 40-member Executive Council—responsible for carrying out the work of UPU between sessions of the Congress—considered administrative matters and several studies concerning international mail which had been referred to it by the 1979 Congress.

Among other matters taken up by the Council were: technical assistance for developing countries; relations with the United Nations, other international organizations and restricted postal unions; UPU finances; international high-speed mail (Datapost, Express Mail, Postadex, etc.); customs treatment of postal items; transit charges and terminal dues; development of postal financial services; revising rates and supplementary charges for parcel post; and various matters relating to airmail such as basic rates, calculating internal dues, priority given by airlines, maximizing air conveyance, shipment of biological substances and the settlement of accounts.

Consultative Council for Postal Studies

The 35-member Consultative Council for Postal Studies, was responsible for organizing the study of technical, operational and economic and technical co-operation problems of the postal administrations of UPU member States including matters of particular interest to new and developing countries.

During its annual session, held at Berne from 22 to 29 October 1981, the Council examined such questions as the future of postal services in a time of telecommunications; improvement of postal operations; mechanization, buildings, and motor transport; financial services and accounting; personnel; postal management; international post; and technical co-operation.

International Bureau

Under the general supervision of the Government of the Swiss Confederation, the International Bureau—the Secretariat of UPU—continued to serve member States' postal administrations as an organ for liaison, information and consultation.

The Bureau remained responsible for collecting, co-ordinating, publishing and disseminating international postal service information, continued conducting inquiries requested by postal administrations and acted as a clearing house for the settlement of certain accounts between them.

In connection with the International Year of Disabled Persons (1981) (p. 795), the Bureau was informed by some 100 postal administrations that they had decided to issue special postage stamps to mark the occasion; a number of administrations also announced measures applied to take account of disabled persons' needs such as improved access to post offices.

As at 31 December 1981, the total number of permanent and temporary staff members employed at the Bureau was 133, of whom 53 were in the Professional or higher category (drawn from 42 countries) and 80 in the General Service category. Also, 13 officials were employed in the Arabic, English, Spanish and Russian translation services.

Technical co-operation

In 1981, UPU technical co-operation was financed mainly by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) with expenditure amounting to some $3 million.

Assistance was also provided through the UPU Special Fund and the regular budget of UPU. Total expenditures from these two sources in 1981 amounted to approximately $950,000. In addition, the postal administrations provided assistance on a bilateral basis.

Training of postal instructors continued to be given priority; several training courses were organized in France, the United Kingdom and other regional training centres. An interregional course was held in the German Democratic Republic and four similar courses were organized in developing countries (India, Ivory Coast, Kenya, Malawi).

Fifty national and regional projects concerning postal services were carried out under UNDP. Fifty-nine expert missions were undertaken and 260 scholarships were awarded, three quarters of which were for study courses. Several projects received assistance in the form of equipment. The projects dealt with all main branches of postal service, including national or regional vocational training centres.

The UPU Special Fund, with voluntary contributions in cash and kind from member States, in the form of scholarships, training courses and equipment continued operation. Projects financed under the Special Fund and the regular budget accounted for 46 consultants who completed 52 missions, and 141 scholarships, the majority for participation in training courses or technical meetings. In addition, the Special Fund assisted a project for the drought-stricken Sahelian region of Africa. Other technical assistance activities such as scholarships and training courses, were also offered by several countries during the year.

The Union continued its programme of technical assistance subject to payment, under which member States could finance assistance themselves by funds on deposit.

Budget

Whereas previously the Government of the Swiss Confederation had advanced the necessary funds for UPU's activities, the 1979 Universal Postal Congress decided, beginning in 1981, that member countries should pay in advance on the basis of the following year's budget, instead of on the basis of actual expenditure.

At its 1981 April/May session, the Executive Council approved the following budget for 1982:

	Amount fin Swiss francs)
Income
Contributions from member States	18,532,500
Contributions allocated by UNDP for support of projects of technical co-operation	788,500
Sales of publications	180,000
Other receipts	719,600
Total	20,220,600
Expenditures
Staff	15,284,500
General expenses	4,556,100
Other budgetary provisions	380,000
Total	20,220,600
Equal to $11,233,670 on the basis of Swiss francs 1.80 = us $1.00.

Each member State of UPU chooses its class of contribution, on a scale of 1 to 50 units. For 1982, the Executive Council fixed the amount of the contributory unit at 17,500 Swiss francs on the basis of a total of 1,059 units. The table below gives assessments in Swiss francs by class of contribution.

Chapter XII

International Telecommunication Union (ITU)

As at 31 December 1981, 157 countries were members of the International Telecommunication Union (ITU), including three new members admitted during the year: Zimbabwe (10 February), Grenada (17 November) and Belize (16 December).

Administrative Council

The thirty-sixth session of the Administrative Council of ITU was held from 1 to 19 June 1981 at ITU headquarters, Geneva. It reviewed administrative matters, approved a revised schedule of conferences and drew up the agenda for a regional administrative conference for the planning of the Broadcasting Satellite Service in region 2 (the Americas).

Administrative radio conferences

The second session of the Regional Administrative Medium-Frequency Broadcasting Conference for region 2, held in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, from 9 November to 19 December 1981, adopted a regional agreement on medium-wave broadcasting service in that region.

International consultative committees

Study groups of the two ITU international consultative committees- the International Radio Consultative Committee (CCIR) and the International Telegraph and Telephone Consultative Committee (CCITT) - held numerous meetings during the year.

At its meetings, CCIR was engaged in: preparing technical information for future world and regional administrative radio conferences; studying spectrum utilization, especially frequency-sharing between different services, and efficient use of the geo-stationary satellite orbit; drawing up standards for satellite broadcasting, digital microwave radio relay, digital television transmission and new television broadcasting-data and still-image services; and radiowave propagation studies.

Activities during 1981, the first year of a new study period for CCITT following the seventh plenary assembly in 1980, included publication of telecommunications standards based on the previous four years of work, and division of work for 1981-1984 among the 15 major and several other specialized study groups. The new standards, together with all previously approved standards remaining in force, comprised some 6,000 pages of recommendations covering all aspects of telecommunications, except radio-communications.

Topics covered in the principal study groups included: transmission systems; data transmission on public-switched telephone network and public data networks; digital networks; switching and signalling; maintenance and protection; and general tariff principles. Special study groups produced manuals and case studies of interest to developing countries on such subjects as general network planning, primary sources of energy, rural telecommunications, regional satellite communications, choice of transmission systems and transition from analogue to digital telecommunication networks.

Regional plan committee meeting

The Regional Plan Committee for Latin America, at its 1981 meeting, co-ordinated development of telecommunications facilities and revised a definite plan for 1981-1984 and an estimated plan for 1985-1988.

International Frequency Registration Board

The International Frequency Registration Board continued to implement the decisions taken at the 1979 World Administrative Radio Conference, including development of a method for placing a large number of frequency assignments currently in the fixed service to appropriate bands, development of a method for conversion of designation of emissions and preparation of a handbook on procedures.

The Board also studied adaptation of its working methods to increased use of the computer, made preparations for and also participated in the medium-wave broadcasting conference, in region 2 (the Americas), and provided assistance to member administrations in application of the provisions and obligatory procedures of the Radio Regulations. In addition, it examined and recorded some 147,000 frequency assignment notices received from member countries, in the Master International Frequency Register.

Technical co-operation

In 1981, under various ITU programmes of technical co-operation in developing countries, 727 expert missions were carried out, 726 fellows were undergoing training abroad and equipment valued at $12,011,143 was delivered, mainly to telecommunication training centres. The total cost of this assistance amounted to $40,293,069, an increase of 21 per cent over the previous year. Countries and territories aided were the following:

Africa: Algeria, Angola, Burundi, Botswana, Cape Verde, Chad, Congo, Djibouti, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Malawi, Mauritania, Mauritius, Morocco, Mozambique, Namibia, Nigeria, Rwanda, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Sudan, Swaziland, Tunisia, Uganda, United Republic of Cameroon, Upper Volta, Zaire.

The Americas: Argentina, Brazil, Cuba, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Jamaica, Netherlands Antilles, St. Christopher/Nevis, Trinidad and Tobago, Uruguay.

Asia and the Pacific: Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Burma, China, India, Indonesia, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Malaysia, Nepal, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Philippines, Republic of Korea, Samoa, Singapore, Sri Lanka, Tonga.

Europe and the Middle East: Albania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Greece, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Oman, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Saudi Arabia, Turkey, United Arab Emirates, Yemen.

The three main objectives of ITU technical co-operation activity continued to be: promoting development of regional telecommunication networks in Africa, the Americas, Asia and the Pacific, and the Middle East; strengthening telecommunication technical and administrative services in developing countries; and vocational training.

The Union continued its efforts to promote development of regional telecommunication networks and their integration into the world-wide telecommunication system, in accordance with objectives established by the World Plan Committee and regional plan committees. In this connection, 147 expert missions were carried out during the year.

Progress continued to be made in 1981 in the implementation of the Pan-African Telecommunications Network comprising high-grade large-capacity terrestrial, submarine and space systems. Fifteen countries in the region possessed modern international automatic exchanges and six more were under installation, while nearly all countries in Africa were equipped with modern automatic telex exchanges.

In west Africa, the initial stage of the five-country project linking Benin, Upper Volta, Mali, Niger and Senegal was implemented in September. Progress was also made on the coastal routes along the sections linking Guinea and Sierra Leone, Sierra Leone and Liberia, and Liberia and the Ivory Coast. The submarine cable along the coast from Casablanca (Morocco) to Lagos (Nigeria) via Dakar (Senegal) and Abidjan (Ivory Coast) also went into service on all sections. In eastern and southern Africa, Ethiopia, Kenya, Uganda and the United Republic of Tanzania became linked by broad-band systems, and Djibouti was connected to that network by a small-capacity ultra high-frequency (UHF) link which was projected to be upgraded.

The Union continued to collaborate with the Central American Telecommunication Commission towards completion of the planning of the third phase of a regional network development, including preparation of technical specifications and execution of studies on the traffic routing between various international switching centres.

The Inter-American Telecommunication Conference continued to receive co-operation in its programme for development and integration of telecommunication systems.

In Asia, geo-political factors were largely responsible for delays in implementation of links in the subregion, involving Afghanistan, India, Iran and Pakistan. However, significant progress was made in resolving a technical question concerning the link between India and Pakistan, and agreement was reached on setting up a trans-border coaxial cable link in the subregion covering India and Nepal.

Completion of the microwave link between Chuadanga (Bangladesh) and Krishnanagar (India) in May closed the trans-border gap in that subregion. Problems of signalling compatibility, which prevented full commissioning of multiplex equipment in the area, were satisfactorily resolved, and maintenance and operational procedures, together with a programme for circuit utilization, had been established.

A satellite system for telecommunications purposes was being used by the countries belonging to the Association of South-East Asian Nations, and steady progress was made in the planning of submarine cables to connect these countries among themselves.

Improvement and expansion of telecommunications for Pacific island countries included: assistance in implementation of projects funded by the European Community for gateway telephone exchanges for Tonga and Samoa; installation and testing in Tuvalu of equipment acquired with funds provided by the United Nations Development Programme for the high-frequency (HF) radio link to Fiji, providing good-quality telephone and telegraph services; establishment of an HF radio link between Kiribati and Australia; and aid to Fiji, Kiribati, Papua New Guinea, Tonga and Tuvalu for development of a regional network.

In the Middle East and Mediterranean region, ITU continued to assist in implementation of the 1978 Middle East and Mediterranean telecommunication network master plan, including studies and supervision of the execution of various network components for Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Somalia and Yemen. With assistance from ITU and financing from the Arab Fund for Economic and Social Development, these countries met for the purpose of establishing a sub-regional microwave network linking them with each other and with international switching exchanges. Experts who prepared the general conditions and technical specifications for the project, also assessed the tenders received. Studies were also made on national extensions needed in Somalia and Yemen; progress was made in a pilot project ITU was completing in collaboration with the Gulf Television Company for the planning of a subregional television network; and efforts continued to be made for development of regional telecommunications networks.

The Union continued to advise developing countries on administrative and technical measures; 287 expert missions were devoted to assistance of this type.

More than half of the total ITU field expenditure in 1981 was spent on training telecommunications personnel in developing countries.

Chapter XIII

World Meteorological Organization (WMO)

Membership of the World Meteorological Organization (WMO) increased to 154 in 1981-149 States and five territories. New members admitted in 1981 were Zimbabwe (11 February) and Saint Lucia (1 April).

The programme and financial resources of WMO for 1980-1983 had been adopted by the Eighth (1979) Meteorological Congress, the highest body of WMO, which meets at least once every four years.

The 29-member Executive Committee, which supervises Congress resolutions and regulations, held its thirty-third session at Geneva from 1 to 17 June 1981.

The twenty-sixth International Meteorological Organization Prize was awarded to Bert Bolin (Sweden) for outstanding contributions to the science of the atmosphere, especially his work in dynamic meteorology, atmospheric chemistry and biochemistry, and services to international collaboration in meteorology.

Activities in 1981

World Weather Watch

The World Weather Watch (www), the basic programme of WMO, continued as an integrated global system designed to make available to member States observational data and processed information required for their operational and research purposes. Its essential elements were: the Global Observing System (GOS), whereby observational data were obtained; the Global Data-Processing System (GDPS), providing for processing, storage and retrieval of observational data and making available processed information; and the Global Telecommunication System (GTS), offering telecommunication facilities and arrangements for rapid, reliable collection, exchange and distribution of observational data and processed information.

During 1981, under the two GOS sub-systems, one surface-based and the other space-based, the main activities continued towards maintaining and improving System operations at global, regional and national levels. The surface-based sub-system provided conventional basic data from regional basic synoptic networks, other observational networks of stations on land and at sea, and aircraft meteorological observations required for operation and research. Within the space-based sub-system, meteorological satellites in both near-polar orbiting and geostationary systems took direct observations, accomplishing data collection and dissemination missions. These satellite systems made a major contribution to operations and research in meteorology, hydrology and other related environmental activities by providing to member States additional quantitative data and qualitative information such as: vertical profiles of temperature and humidity; temperatures of sea, land and cloud top surfaces; wind field derived from cloud displacements; cloud amounts, type and height of cloud tops; snow and ice cover, as well as radiance balance data.

Upgrading to high-speed data transmission was accomplished on some additional GTS circuits during 1981 and more high-frequency point-to-point circuits were replaced by satellite circuits.

Ocean affairs

The quadrennial meeting of the Commission for Marine Meteorology whose eighth session was held at Hamburg, Federal Republic of Germany, during September, took action on a number of issues including means of improving data coverage of the world oceans using the latest advances in marine telecommunications, satellite systems and automation techniques, and maintenance of high standards of marine meteorological services. To this end, the Commission approved publication of the second edition of a guide to marine meteorological services, established a new plan for the production of marine climatological summaries and adopted a new punch card and tape format for the international exchange of marine meteorological data, proposed projects for sea-ice services, adopted a new international system of sea-ice symbols and revised WMO sea-ice nomenclature.

The development of a joint WMO/International Oceanographic Commission (IOC) Integrated Global Ocean Services System received increasing attention in view of its global ocean monitoring functions. Operational oceanographic data exchanged through GTS was extensively used for both operational and research purposes, such as for climate studies.

Aviation

Up-to-date revisions of regulatory material for the provision of service to international civil aviation were prepared for consideration by the appropriate WMO technical commission. Efforts were also made to evaluate and improve short-range aerodrome forecasting to provide better service to civil aviation and meet operational requirements of the International Civil Aviation Organization.

World Climate Programme

The World Climate Programme Office continued the research and co-ordination activities of the Programme. Technical and expert meetings in individual problem areas were held to provide guidance as to data requirements and applications. A large-scale Technical Conference on Climate for Asia and the Western Pacific was held in December 1981. Another technical conference was scheduled for January 1982 at Arusha, United Republic of Tanzania. The 1981 conference resulted in the initiation of a series of actions to improve the availability and accessibility of climate data and their optimum utilization in the socio-economic and resource management activities of the countries of the region.

Research and development

The research and development programme included weather prediction research, tropical meteorology, weather modification, environmental prediction research and climate change.

In weather prediction research during 1981, a data study intercomparison project proceeded well with 15 numerical weather prediction centres participating and the Finnish Meteorological Institute undertaking data collection and processing. A summary report of the first phase (January 1979-December 1980) was widely distributed. Developments in dynamical/statistical weather prediction were also reviewed and standard procedures for local weather forecast verification considered.

Research continued in tropical meteorology and a Symposium on Meteorological Aspects of Tropical Droughts was held in New Delhi, India, from 7 to 11 December for meteorologists, agrometeorologists and climatologists to exchange experiences. The symposium was followed by an expert meeting on tropical disturbances and associated rainfall which reviewed current knowledge of tropical rain-bringing systems (other than cyclones). Based on the review, detailed implementation proposals for specific priority projects were developed and initiatives identified to promote further research by member States.

In the weather modification programme, WMO continued to provide advice and support. Guidance was provided by the Executive Committee's Panel of Experts on Cloud Physics and Weather Modification, which met twice in 1981. Among other things, it recommended ways to analyse data collected during three seasons of the precipitation enhancement project field investigations, established criteria to determine the suitability of a site in Spain for a randomized statistical experiment and considered future international development of weather modification projects. The sixth annual register of national weather modification projects containing information for the year 1980 was also issued.

The third in a series of WMO meetings of experts dealing with questions concerning hail suppression was held at Geneva in February 1981 and an expert meeting to review the current status of warm cloud modification and to assess future prospects was held at Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, in March.

Concerning global ozone research and monitoring, efforts continued to upgrade and standardize the observing network upon which most activities in the World Plan of Action on the Ozone Layer depended.

In December, a meeting of experts on meteorological aspects of the long-range transport of pollutants was convened at the headquarters of the Atmospheric Environment Service (Downsview, Ontario, Canada) where such problems as research developments in long-range transport modelling and research questions relating to large-scale deposition were reviewed.

Meteorological applications and environment

The meteorological applications and environment programme included activities aimed at applying meteorology to various human activities and problem areas such as agriculture, aviation, atmospheric and marine pollution, production and use of energy (in particular new and renewable sources of energy), urban and regional land-use planning, engineering, building and human settlements, human health and well-being, transport and tourism.

In carrying out agrometeorological activities, emphasis was placed on transfer of techniques and methods. Short- and medium-term expert missions to a number of developing countries were organized for this purpose; training seminars and courses in agrometeorology were held; a revised guide to agricultural meteorological practices and a number of technical notes on various aspects of agricultural meteorology were published.

Activities relating to energy included a Technical Conference on Meteorology and Energy (Mexico City, November). Experts were also sent to developing countries to advise on the applications of meteorology to energy problems.

The first volume of the Climatic Atlas of Asia, containing maps of mean temperature and precipitation, was prepared by the Geophysical Observatory in Leningrad, USSR, and published there by Gidrometeoizdat for WMO with financial support from the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP).

The Commission for Climatology and Applications of Meteorology continued its preparatory work for a new edition of the Guide to Climatological Practices and other publications including technical notes on human biometeorology and on applications of meteorology to atmospheric pollution problems on local, urban and regional scales.

In the environmental pollution field, WMO's background air pollution monitoring network again expanded and currently consisted of 116 stations in 74 countries. Another 72 stations were being considered or prepared.

An assessment report on the first phase of the Economic Commission for Europe/UNEP/WMO co-operative programme on monitoring and evaluation of the long-range transmission of air pollutants in Europe became available and, on 1 January 1981, the second phase commenced. Other activities involved problems of the interchange of pollutants between atmosphere and oceans, on transport and deposition of air pollutants into the Mediterranean and the impact of atmospheric pollution on terrestrial and fresh-water ecosystems.

Hydrology and water resources development

The hydrology and water resources programme focused on the operational hydrology programme whose aims were, inter alia: efficient transfer of operational hydrological technology; to improve the quantity and quality of hydrological data; and an international and systematic framework of the integration of techniques and procedures for the collection and processing of hydrological data.

A large part of WMO's activities in the field of hydrology and water resources were carried out by the Commission for Hydrology which meets every four years. The Commission had approved a plan for the period 1980-1983 at its sixth (1980) session.

The programme for hydrology in environmental management and development included technical support for the hydrological components of other WMO activities dealing with environmental problems such as the tropical cyclone programme, the world climate programme, and drought and desertification control.

Education and training

The main activities of the education and training programme in 1981 were the award of fellowships, strengthening of regional meteorological training centres, organization and cosponsorship of courses, seminars and workshops, preparation of training publications and other aids, studies and surveys of training needs, provision of information education and training, and collaboration with other organizations.

Among 20 training events organized or co-sponsored by WMO during 1981 were: courses on climatological data processing, Asheville, North Carolina, USA and Paris, France; seminar on the use of meteorological data with implications for forecasting and research in tropical countries, Reading, England; technical conference on management of meteorological services in Regional Association I (Africa), Nairobi, Kenya; seminar/workshop on maintenance and repair of conventional meteorological and hydrological instruments for Regional Associations II and V (Asia and South-West Pacific), Dacca, Bangladesh; seminar on mathematical models for hydrological forecasting, Indonesia, Malaysia, Pakistan, the Philippines and Thailand; seminar on agrometeorology in Regional Association II, Bangladesh, Burma, Nepal, Pakistan, Sri Lanka and Thailand; course for technicians on the control of general pollution in the atmosphere, Buenos Aires, Argentina; course for meteorological technicians, Guatemala; and seminar on meteorological telecommunications, Barbados.

Over 500 participants, mainly from developing countries, benefited from WMO training and a further 260 from training awards under fellowship funds administered by WMO from various sources.

Technical co-operation

In 1981, under the technical co-operation programme, assistance was provided through the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), the Voluntary Co-operation Programme, from funds-in-trust and from WMO's regular budget.

Under UNDP, assistance was provided to 92 countries to a value of approximately $11.5 million, compared to $9.8 million for 1980. Assistance was provided for meteorological and hydrological services development, and in training of personnel at all levels: experts, fellowships for training abroad and support for training seminars.

In 1981, two sectoral advisers (one in meteorology and one in hydrology) assigned by UNDP to WMO, visited 19 countries to advise on requirements for, and application of, meteorological information of all types in various national economic sectors.

Total value of assistance provided under the Voluntary Co-operation Programme for 1981 was slightly over $5 million. The Programme gave support mainly to the GOS element of WWV and long-term fellowships for training of meteorological personnel were also awarded.

Under WMO's regular budget, a number of fellowships were awarded in 1981 and substantial financial assistance provided for participants in special training courses and technical conferences.

Seven trust fund projects were under implementation during the year-three funded by countries receiving assistance and four by others.

To meet the need of the meteorological and hydrological services of developing countries for trained personnel, long-term fellowships were awarded by WMO. In 1981, 499 fellows received meteorological or hydrological training. The number of students who started training under fellowships awarded in 1981 under UNDP was 140; under the Voluntary Co-operation Programme, 74; under the regular budget, 20; and under trust funds, 10.

Secretariat

As at 31 December 1981, the total number of full-time staff employed by WMO (excluding 85 professionals on technical assistance projects) on permanent and fixed-term contracts stood at 297: 125 in the Professional and higher categories (drawn from 45 nationalities) and 172 in the General Service and related categories.

Budget

The year 1981 was the second year of the eighth financial period (1980-1983), for which the 1979 World Meteorological Congress had established a maximum expenditure of $74,400,000, and authorized additional expenditures, not to exceed $1 million, to provide for such circumstances as losses from currency exchange rate changes or urgent unforeseen programme activities.

The regular budget for 1981 amounted to $18,663,800; while the budget for technical co-operation activities, financed from overhead allocations and other extrabudgetary sources amounted to an additional $2,596,100.

At its June 1981 session, the Executive Committee approved the following regular budget of $17,516,800 for 1982:

Activities in 1981

Safety of life at sea

The 1978 Protocol to the International Convention for the Safety of Life at Sea, 1974 (SOLAS Convention) entered into force on 1 May 1981 and introduced provisions chiefly designed to improve the safety of tankers. The Maritime Safety Committee also adopted a number of amendments to the Convention which were expected to enter into force on 1 September 1984.

Safe containers

The 1973 amendments to the International Convention for Safe Containers, 1972, entered into force on 1 December 1981. The amendments extended the time limit for the fixing of safety approval plates on containers to 1 December 1985 and deferred, until 1 January 1987, the date for marking the container's next examination..

Civil liability for oil pollution damage

The 1976 Protocol to the International Convention on Civil Liability for Oil Pollution Damage, 1969, entered into force on 8 April. The Protocol provided for the use of a new unit of account, based on the special drawing rights of the International Monetary Fund, for calculating the limits of liability under the Convention.

Collision regulations

A number of amendments to the Convention on the International Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1972, were adopted by the IMCO Assembly at its twelfth session in November 1981. These amendments were expected to enter into force on 1 June 1983.

Technical assistance

In 1981 the technical assistance programme continued to expand with IMO contributing to projects in Argentina, Bangladesh, Benin, Brazil, Cape Verde, Chile, China, Egypt, Fiji, Gabon, Ghana, India, Indonesia, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Malawi, Malaysia, Malta, Mauritania, Mexico, Morocco, Namibia, Nigeria, Panama, Philippines, Qatar, Republic of Korea, Tuvalu and the United Arab Emirates.

Inter-regional advisers travelled extensively advising on technical port operations and management, marine pollution, various fields of maritime training and safety administration and legislation. Regional maritime advisers provided assistance in Africa, Asia and the Pacific, and Latin America.

During the year, 78 awards were made under the fellowship programme; the trainees included nationals from Algeria, Argentina, Bangladesh, Benin, Brazil, Chile, Cape Verde, Cyprus, Guinea, India, Indonesia, Jamaica, Malawi, Papua New Guinea, Philippines, Republic of Korea, Romania, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Sri Lanka and Togo. Fields of study included naval architecture, marine survey and engineering, navigation, oil pollution, fire fighting, port administration, radar simulator training, study tours of training facilities, and hydrographic survey and equipment training.

Among seminars held during the year was a two-week maritime training course at the Dalian Marine College, Dalian, China, in March.

World Maritime Day

The theme for World Maritime Day (25 September 1981) was the effective global implementation of IMO's technical standards for safer shipping and cleaner oceans. On that day, Modolv Hareide, former Director-General of Shipping and Navigation of Norway who was associated with IMO from 1959 to 1978, was presented with the International Maritime Prize for 1980.

Publications

New publications issued by IMO during 1981 included the IMCO Search and Rescue Manual; Guidelines on Surveys under the 1978 SOLAS Protocol, Recommendations on the Safe Transport, Handling and Storage of Dangerous Substances in Port Areas; and a Pocket Guide Book to Cold Water Survival.

Among other publications were: the 1981 edition of the Code of Safe Practice for Solid Bulk Cargoes; a new consolidated edition of the International Maritime Dangerous Goods Code, Merchant Ship Search and Rescue Manual, 3rd ed.; amendment no. 2 to Ship's Routeing, 4th ed.; Code of Safe Practice for Ships Carrying Timber Deck Cargoes, new ed.; a supplement relating to the International Convention for the Prevention of Pollution of the Sea by Oil 1954, as amended in 1962 and 1969; Amendments to the Convention on the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization; Recommendations on the Safe Use of Pesticides in Ships, revised ed.; and a supplement relating to the International Convention on Load Lines, 1966.

Decisions of IMCO Assembly

The 1981 IMCO Assembly adopted 49 resolutions, the majority dealing with maritime safety and the prevention of marine pollution, which included a code for noise levels in ships and a code of safety for nuclear merchant ships.

Secretariat

As at 31 December 1981, the secretariat of IMCO consisted of 232 full-time staff members (excluding those on technical assistance projects). Of these, 79 were in the Professional and higher categories (drawn from 33 nationalities) and 153 were in the General Service and related category. There were 56 Professional staff employed on technical assistance projects in the field.

Budget

The 1981 IMCO Assembly adopted a budget of $25.7 million for the 1982-1983 biennium ($11.4 million allocated to 1982; $14.3 million to 1983).

Chapter XV

World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO)

During 1981, membership of the World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO) rose to 97 with the admission of Costa Rica and Zimbabwe. Zimbabwe announced its succession, and Guinea acceded, to the Paris Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property, bringing membership of the Paris Union to 91. Berne Union membership increased to 73 as a result of Zimbabwe's announcement of its succession to the Berne Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works. At the end of the year, total membership in WIPO and its various Unions, taken together, was 117.

Fifteen intergovernmental unions in the two main fields of intellectual property were administered by WIPO in 1980. They were founded on the multilateral treaties, conventions and agreements listed below in order of adoption:

Industrial property: Paris Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property; Madrid Agreement for the Repression of False or Deceptive Indications of Source on Goods; Madrid Agreement Concerning the International Registration of Marks; The Hague Agreement Concerning the International Deposit of Industrial Designs; Nice Agreement Concerning the International Classification of Goods and Services for the Purpose of the Registration of Marks; Lisbon Agreement for the Protection of Appellations of Origin and their International Registration; Locarno Agreement Establishing an International Classification for Industrial Designs; Patent Co-operation Treaty; International Patent Classification Agreement; Trademark Registration Treaty; Budapest Treaty on the International Recognition of the Deposit of Microorganisms for the Purposes of Patent Procedure.

Copyright and neighbouring rights: Berne Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works; Rome Convention for the Protection of Performers, Producers of Phonograms and Broadcasting Organizations; Geneva Convention for the Protection of Producers of Phonograms Against Unauthorized Duplication of Their Phonograms; Brussels Convention Relating to the Distribution of Programme-Carrying Signals Transmitted by Satellite.

At the twelfth series of meetings, held at Geneva in November 1981, the governing bodies of WIPO and the Unions administered by it reviewed the activities of the International Bureau, WIPO's secretariat, and approved the programme and budget for 1982 and 1983.

Activities in 1981

Development co-operation activities

Two WIPO permanent programmes, supervised by intergovernmental permanent committees, provided the framework for development co-operation relating to industrial property and to copyright and neighbouring rights.

In the field of industrial property, WIPO organized or participated in the meetings of a Group of Consultants on Questions Relating to Trade-marks and Developing Countries, at Geneva; a Working Group on the Establishment of a Guide on the Organization of Industrial Property Activities of Enterprises in Developing Countries, at Geneva; and an International Conference on Inventive Activity as a Factor for Development of Technology in the Developing Countries, in Belgrade (Yugoslavia). Medals and prizes for inventors were awarded by WIPO at exhibitions and competitions held in India (March), the Philippines (April) and at Geneva (November).

In continuation of the programme initiated in 1975, nearly 200 state-of-the-art search reports on technology disclosed in patent documents and related literature were furnished to developing countries, free of charge, under agreements concluded between WIPO and contributing industrial property offices in developed countries.

An industrial property glossary, previously published in five languages (Arabic, English, French, Russian, Spanish), was published also in a version containing Chinese, English and French. A general summary of the industrial property situation in Latin America was also published on the basis of fact-finding missions carried out in 1979 and 1980.

Development co-operation activities in copyright and neighbouring rights included the convening, jointly with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) of working groups and expert committees on model provisions for national legislation on the protection of folklore, and on the problems posed for developing countries by access to works protected under copyright conventions.

The WIPO training programmes in industrial property and in copyright continued to grow, with 173 fellowships granted in 1981 to nationals of 82 developing countries. Twenty-six countries, including eight developing countries, provided individual training, in addition to study opportunities and courses for groups organized in Canberra (Australia), Geneva (Switzerland), The Hague (Netherlands), London (United Kingdom), Madrid (Spain), Moscow (USSR), Strasbourg (France), Vienna (Austria) and Zurich (Switzerland). Regional and national meetings and seminars were organized by WIPO in Algeria, Argentina, Barbados, Brazil, China, Congo, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Guinea, Honduras, Jamaica, Kenya, Rwanda, Sudan, Thailand and Zimbabwe.

During 1981, WIPO co-operated with Governments of 63 developing countries and with three intergovernmental organizations in their development projects relating to intellectual property, by providing assistance in the preparation of legislation, or establishment or modernization of national or regional institutions, including patent documentation and information services.

Industrial property

The second session of the Diplomatic Conference on the Revision of the Paris Convention was held at Nairobi, Kenya, from 28 September to 24 October; in November, the Paris Union Assembly decided that a third session of the Conference should be held at Geneva in October/November 1982. The objective of the revision was to introduce special provisions to meet the needs of developing countries more effectively, and to incorporate new provisions giving full recognition to inventors' certificates, a form of protection of inventions existing in socialist countries. At a separate diplomatic conference held in Nairobi from 24 to 26 September, the Nairobi Treaty on the Protection of the Olympic Symbol-anticipated to provide revenue for national Olympic committees-was adopted and opened for signature.

Work continued on keeping up to date the International Patent Classification and other classifications relating to industrial designs or registration of trade marks and service marks. As in the past, WIPO assisted the International Patent Documentation Centre and remained on its Supervisory Board, while efforts continued towards early conclusion of the Computerized Administration of Patent Documents Reclassified According to the International Patent Classification.

At the end of 1981, thirty-two States were party to the Patent Co-operation Treaty (PCT). During the year, record copies of 4,606 international applications were transmitted to WIPO by 20 receiving offices. Thirty issues of the PCT Gazette were published during the year, containing information on 3,734 published international applications.

At the recommendation of a group of consultants, a questionnaire was sent to member Governments and interested organizations on the feasibility of an international treaty on the protection and international registration of computer software. A group of consultants, meeting at Geneva in June, gave advice on the protection of inventions made in the course of international joint ventures; the International Association for the Advancement of Teaching and Research in Intellectual Property was created and its Constitution adopted at a meeting of university professors organized by WIPO at Geneva in July; and a study on the industrial property aspects of consumer protection was issued in March for comments by States members of WIPO and of the Paris Union and by interested organizations.

Publications in the industrial property field included those on industrial property statistics, industrial property laws and treaties, the monthly review Industrial Property, and the first issue of the WIPO Handbook on Patent Information and Documentation.

Copyright and neighbouring rights

The Permanent Committee for Development Co-operation Related to Copyright and Neighbouring Rights met at Geneva in March. Among the proposals made for new activities was a study of the problems of home taping and private copying of recordings and broadcasts, as well as the convening of a worldwide meeting on this question under WIPO auspices.

The WIPO Worldwide Forum on the Piracy of Sound and Audiovisual Recordings, held at Geneva in March, focused on the dangers posed by the growth of commercial piracy-unauthorized copying and sale of recordings for profit—and urged the organization to intensify efforts towards combating and eliminating such practices. At joint WIPO/UNESCO meetings, recommendations were made by experts on the impact of cable television in the sphere of copyright and neighbouring rights (Geneva, May), and the text of model provisions for national laws on the protection of expressions of folklore was approved by a working group (Paris, February).

Publications in the copyright field in 1981 included two further multilingual editions of a glossary of terms of the law of copyright and neighbouring rights (Arabic/English/French and English/French/Russian), the WIPO Guide to the Berne Convention (in German and Hindi), the WIPO Guide to the Rome Convention and the Phonograms Convention (in English and French), supplements to the WIPO Copyright Law Survey, and the monthly periodical Copyright.

Budget

The principal sources of the budget of WIPO expected to approximate Swiss francs 72 million for the biennium 1982-1983—are ordinary and special contributions from member States and income derived from international registration services.

Ordinary contributions are paid on the basis of a class-and-unit system by members of the Paris, Berne, Nice and Locarno Unions and by member States of WIPO that are not members of any of the Unions.<sup>a</sup>

States members of those four Unions were placed in seven classes (I to VII) to determine the amounts of their ordinary contributions. States members of WIPO not members of any of the Unions are placed in three classes (A, B or C) for the same purpose. States in Class I or A pay the highest contributions of their group and those in Class VII or C the lowest. The class in which a State is placed is solely a matter for the State itself to decide. The rights of each State are the same, irrespective of class chosen.

The contribution class for each member State of WIPO and of the Paris or Berne Unions, together with the amount of the ordinary contribution of each State, is given in Annex I to this chapter (the class indicated for the Paris Union also applies to the Nice, Locarno and International Patent Classification Unions). The members of one or more Unions do not pay separate contributions to WIPO; the Unions themselves contribute towards the costs of WIPO's International Bureau.

The amounts of ordinary contributions for 1981 are given in the table on the page opposite.

Secretariat

As at 31 December 1981, WIPO employed 265 full-time staff members. Of these, 89 were in the Professional and higher categories (drawn from 36 member States) and 176 were in the General Service category. In addition, 34 experts were employed by WIPO on technical assistance projects.

<sup>a</sup> Nine of the 15 Unions in 1981 had independent administrative budgets. While the Madrid Union had an administrative budget, its costs were met by fees paid by applications for the international registration of trade marks rather than by contributions.

Chapter XVI

International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD)

The International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD), created in 1977 to provide concessional-term resources for the agricultural development and reduction of rural poverty in its developing member States, completed its fourth year of operation in 1981. The Fund's lending policies continued to reflect its conviction that food problems could be solved only if the rural poor were enabled to participate in the development process.

Membership of IFAD remained at 135 during 1981. Of these, 20 were in Category I (developed countries), 12 in Category II (oil-exporting developing countries) and 103 in Category III (other developing countries).

With the approval of 30 additional projects in 1981, total assistance provided by the Fund to 76 member countries since 1978 amounted to some $1,190 million, with about $1,150 million committed for 89 projects, and over $42 million provided as technical assistance grants.

Of the 89 loans approved in this four-year period, 36 loans were for projects in Africa, 33 in Asia and 20 in Latin America. Most of the loans were provided on highly concessional terms, with 50-year maturity periods, including a 10-year grace period and a service charge of 1 per cent per annum. Of the total loan commitments of $1,150 million, 71 per cent were provided to low-income countries with per capita gross national product (GNP) of less than $300: about half of the total financial assistance provided to this group went to the least developed countries. Loans to those countries with above $300 per capita income were made available on intermediate terms (at 4 per cent, 20 years maturity with a five- or eight-year grace period) or on ordinary terms (8 per cent, 15 years maturity with three years' grace).

Since 1979 approved loans have been denominated in special drawing rights (SDRs), an international unit of account. Dollar figures in this chapter are based on the SDR/United States dollar conversion rate at 31 December 1981 (SDR 1 = US $1.16396).

Resources

Of the total initial resources of $1,015 million pledged by members, $931 million had been paid as of 31 December 1981-$508 million in cash and the balance of $423 million in irrevocable, non-interest-bearing demand promissory notes.

In recognition of the need to replenish the Fund's resources, the Governing Council, in January 1980, invited members to make additional contributions at a level sufficient to provide for an increase in real terms in the level of IFAD operations.

Investments

Investments of the Fund's liquid assets continued to be restricted to obligations issued or fully guaranteed by Governments or by major banks. While 69 per cent ($315 million) of such assets was held on deposit with, or in obligations issued by, commercial banks, IFAD continued to build up the percentage of its portfolio of bonds and similar obligations issued by developing country members.

At the end of 1981, IFAD's liquid assets totalled $459 million. Although the average rate of return earned on these assets for 1981 was 12.8 per cent- significantly higher than the 11.8 per cent for 1980-investment income fell as a result of currency realignments and disbursements on loans and grants.

Activities in 1981

During 1981, IFAD approved financial assistance totalling some $355 million for 30 projects in 30 countries, compared with 27 projects in 1980, 23 in 1979 and 10 in 1978. Of these 30 projects, 12 were in Africa, 11 in Asia and seven in Latin America: seventeen of them were initiated by IFAD, and 13 were co-financed projects from the pipelines of other institutions.

The Fund continued to concentrate on increasing the food-crop production, and on improving the living conditions of the poor. Some of the projects were aimed at improving the storage and marketing elements to meet the anticipated increase in production, while others provided credit for seasonal inputs or on-farm investments as an important means for achieving increased production.

As regards technical assistance, the Fund provided some $2.31 million in support of project preparation activities to assist 12 member States. Grant financing also continued to be provided, in appropriate cases, for certain elements of technical assistance forming part of a project such as training, agricultural extension and special studies. Gambia, Haiti, Rwanda, Uganda and Upper Volta received such grants, totalling $4.39 million.

The tables below show the technical assistance grants approved during 1981 for project preparation and those for research. For technical assistance grants as components within loans, see table on PROJECT LOANS on page 1480.

As in previous years, irrigation continued to be an important element in IFAD lending. It featured in projects benefiting Bolivia, China, the Gambia, India, Indonesia, Mauritius, Nepal and Pakistan and in a number of these the main effort was directed towards rehabilitating or improving existing irrigation works. Livestock development received increased attention during 1981 with projects being approved for China, the Philippines and Samoa.

Loans were made for credit projects in Jordan and Panama, along with 16 other projects with a credit element. The Fund continued efforts to ensure that agricultural credit would reach small farmers, rather than large- and medium-scale farmers as in the past.

Four special missions- to Bangladesh, Guinea, Peru and Zambia-analysed the food production and nutrition situation and explored the nature and extent of rural poverty, and identified specific assistance programmes suitable for IFAD financing.

Project loans

The table on p. 1480 summarizes project loans approved and related technical assistance granted during 1981. Loans were all made on highly concessional terms except in the case of Bolivia, Botswana, Colombia, Grenada, Jordan, Liberia, Mauritius, Nicaragua, Paraguay, the Philippines and Zambia (intermediate terms), and Panama (ordinary terms).

Income and expenditures

Total revenue for 1981 was $61.4 million-some $60.3 accruing from investment income and the rest (over $1 million) interest from loans. Expenses for the year amounted to $15.3 million compared with a budget of $18.5 million approved by the Governing Council at its fourth session, in December 1980. The excess of revenue over expenses for 1981 was $46.1 million.

Secretariat

As at December 1981, the secretariat of IFAD totalled 158, of whom 67, were executive or technical staff (Professional category and above), drawn from 45 countries, and 91 were support staff (General Service category).

Chapter XVII

Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization (ICITO) and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT)

The United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment, held at Havana, Cuba, between November 1947 and March 1948, drew up a charter for an International Trade Organization (ITO) and established an Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization (ICITO). Since the charter itself was never accepted, ITO was not established. However, while they drew up the Charter, the Preparatory Committee's members negotiated on tariffs among themselves, and also drew up the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT). The Agreement—a multilateral treaty embodying reciprocal rights and obligations—entered into force on 1 January 1948, with 23 Contracting Parties. Since then, ICITO has provided the GATT secretariat.

The General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, which had been progressively amended and supplemented since 1948, remained the only multilateral instrument that set out agreed rules for international trade.

At the end of 1981, the number of Contracting Parties to GATT had risen to 86 with the addition of Colombia; one other country—Tunisia—had acceded provisionally. The Contracting Parties conducted about 85 per cent of all international trade and 30 other countries applied the rules of GATT.

Multilateral trade negotiations

Implementation of the Tokyo Round agreements

With the entry into force on 1 January 1981 of agreements on customs valuation and government procurement, all agreements resulting from the so-called Tokyo Round of multilateral trade negotiations had taken effect. These negotiations, concluded in 1979,<sup>a</sup> had been launched in Japan, in 1973.

The second of the annual tariff cuts agreed upon by Tokyo Round participating countries also became effective on 1 January 1981. This series of eight annual reductions in customs duties was to extend to 1 January 1987, and would result in an average cut of about one third in the level of tariffs imposed by industrialized countries on imports of manufactured goods. Further reductions were being made on agricultural products, and many developing countries had also agreed to make tariff cuts, or to bind tariffs against increase.

By the end of 1981, 47 countries, including 19 developing nations, had accepted one or more of the Tokyo Round agreements.

The committees or councils set up to oversee operation of each agreement or code met regularly during 1981 to monitor implementation of the agreements in national legislation, regulations and procedures, and to discuss interpretation and application of agreements, including disputes arising over these matters between signatories.

Various substantive questions arose in the committees and councils concerning coverage of the agreements. For example, the Committee on Subsidies and Countervailing Measures and the Committee on Anti-Dumping Practices asked a group of experts to define objective criteria for determining when a producer and an exporter or importer were considered to be "related"; the group set out such criteria in a report, later adopted by both committees.

The Committee on Anti-Dumping Practices discussed the extent to which basic price systems might be used in conformity with the provisions of the Anti-Dumping Code. The main purpose of basic prices was to facilitate the imposition of anti-dumping duties when several foreign countries were involved. The Committee adopted an understanding by which it recognized that the wording of the relevant provision of the Code contained ambiguities and, in the light of different possible interpretations, was not essential to the Code's operation and should not provide the basis for any anti-dumping investigation or for the imposition and collection of anti-dumping duties.

The Committee on Technical Barriers to Trade took up international and regional standardizing activities, and decided to undertake a study on private standardizing and certifying bodies. The Committee also organized a discussion among persons responsible for national enquiry points on standards-related activities that had been established in each signatory country, in order to determine practical arrangements for improving the notification and information system set up under the agreement.

The Committee on Government Procurement considered inclusion of taxes and customs duties in the minimum value of procurement contracts, and also the identification of contracts published in accordance with the Agreement on Government Procurement. As there was disagreement in the Committee over the extent to which leasing and similar arrangements were subject to the Agreement, its members were asked to communicate their current practices, with a detailed description of the types of contracts considered to fall within the coverage of the Agreement. In March 1981, GATT published complete lists of the purchasing agencies or entities covered by the Agreement on Government Procurement.

New tasks were given to some Committees, such as a study in the Committee on Tariff Concessions of tariff escalation in relation to the degree of processing of products, and an examination entrusted to a technical sub-committee of the Committee on Trade in Civil Aircraft of a list of products which might be added to the coverage of the Agreement on Civil Aircraft.

The Councils overseeing the Arrangement Regarding Bovine Meat and the International Dairy Arrangement met during 1981 to supervise both agreements and to evaluate the world market situation for meat and dairy products on the basis of annual secretariat reports.

In June 1981, the International Meat Council set up a meat market analysis group to assist the Council in carrying out its functions under the Arrangement Regarding Bovine Meat, in particular to help evaluate and analyse reports on meat market trends.

In September 1981, the three Committees responsible for implementing the Protocol Regarding Certain Milk Powders, the Protocol Regarding Milk Fat and the Protocol Regarding Certain Cheeses examined the minimum price level of the products covered. These minimum prices were fixed for pilot products defined in the International Dairy Arrangement taking account of the current market situation, dairy prices in participating producer countries, the need to ensure equitable prices to consumers, and the desirability of maintaining a minimum return to the most efficient producers in order to ensure stability of supply over the longer term. They were not to be considered as market prices. It was decided to increase the minimum prices as from 1 October 1981 to the following levels (free on board per metric ton): skimmed milk powder and buttermilk powder: $600; whole milk powder: $950; butter: $1,200; anhydrous milk fat: $1,440; certain cheeses: $1,000.

Other GATT Activities

Council of Representatives

During 1981, the Council of Representatives, GATT's highest body, meeting between sessions of the Contracting Parties, acted on some 50 different international trade policy issues, including reports from panels of independent experts set up to examine and make recommendations on trade disputes between GATT's member Governments. Eleven of the 17 international trade disputes brought before the Council during the year concerned agricultural products.

Ministerial session

At their annual session in November 1981, GATT's member States decided that their next session, in November 1982, should be convened at ministerial level to examine the functioning of the multilateral trading system, and to reinforce the common efforts of the contracting parties to support and improve the system for the benefit of all nations. It was further agreed that the ministerial session would address the implementation of the results of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations, problems affecting the trading system, the position of developing countries in world trade and future prospects for the development of trade. In the context of their consideration of the work programme of GATT for the 1980s, the Ministers would also determine future priorities for co-operation among contracting parties. A preparatory committee for the session, open to all the member States of GATT was also set up.

Committee on Trade and Development

The Committee on Trade and Development, continued to review issues of trade interest to developing countries as did its two sub-committees established in 1980.

Preferential arrangements among developing countries

Possibilities for a further round of negotiations to increase trade among developing nations continued to be explored in 1981. The developing countries taking part included signatories to the 18-nation Protocol Relating to Trade Negotiations Among Developing Countries concluded in 1973.

Balance-of-payments restrictions

Consultations with countries whose balance-of-payments difficulties had led them to restrict imports were held in 1981 with Brazil, Egypt, Greece, Italy, Peru, Portugal, the Republic of Korea, Sri Lanka, Tunisia, Turkey and Yugoslavia.

Textiles Arrangement

As the result of negotiations in GATT during 1981, agreement was reached, on 22 December, that the Arrangement Regarding International Trade in Textiles (the Multifibre Arrangement (MFA)) should be extended for a further period of four years and seven months, from 1 January 1982 until 31 July 1986. The Arrangement, whose signatories accounted for four fifths (about $80 billion worth) of world trade in textiles and clothing, was originally negotiated in 1973 under GATT auspices. Although no changes were made in the original MFA text, the Protocol of Extension mentioned certain understandings recorded in the adopted conclusions.

Technical assistance

In 1981, a number of GATT missions were dispatched to developing countries and officials participated in seminars and training courses on GATT and the Tokyo Round agreements held in Barbados, Colombia, Ecuador, Ghana, Honduras, Kenya, Malawi, the Philippines, Romania, Uruguay, Zambia and Zimbabwe. Discussions on certain of the Tokyo Round agreements and other specific issues were also held by GATT officials with Colombia, Nigeria, Thailand, Tunisia and Yugoslavia.

Training programme

Two trade policy courses with a total of 42 participants were held at Geneva during 1981. The biannual courses, begun in 1955, aimed at deepening developing country officials' knowledge of trade policy issues and at improving their skills in international trade negotiations.

International Trade Centre

Established by GATT in 1964, but jointly operated by GATT and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development since 1968, the International Trade Centre continued to provide trade information and trade promotion advisory services for developing countries. The Centre's work was directed to helping developing countries to formulate and implement trade promotion programmes and activities, and to become progressively self-reliant.

Publications

Publications issued in 1981 included the annual volumes of GATT Activities and International Trade, and a new monthly newsletter, launched in February, GATT Focus.

Secretariat

As at 31 December 1981, the GATT secretariat employed 269 staff; of these 120 were in the Professional and higher categories, and 149 were in the General Service category. They were drawn from 39 nationalities.

Financial arrangements

The member countries of GATT contribute to the budget in accordance with a scale assessed on the basis of each country's share in the total trade of the Contracting Parties and associated governments. The budget for 1981 was 41,864,000 Swiss francs. The scale of contributions for 1982 is given below. (The United Nations rate of exchange for December 1981 was Swiss francs 1.76 = US $1.00).

On 13 October 1961, Syria, having resumed its status as an independent State, also resumed its separate membership in the United Nations; it changed its name to the Syrian Arab Republic on 14 September 1971. The United Arab Republic continued as a Member of the United Nations and reverted to the name of Egypt on 2 September 1971.

Charter of the United Nations and Statute of the International Court of Justice

Charter of the United Nations

NOTE: The Charter of the United Nations was signed on 26 June 1945, in San Francisco, at the conclusion of the United Nations Conference on International Organization, and came into force on 24 October 1945. The Statute of the International Court of Justice is an integral part of the Charter.

Amendments to Articles 23, 27 and 61 of the Charter were adopted by the General Assembly on 17 December 1963 and came into force on 31 August 1965. A further amendment to Article 61 was adopted by the General Assembly on 20 December 1971, and came into force on 24 September 1973. An amendment to Article 109, adopted by the General Assembly on 20 December 1965, came into force on 12 June 1968.

The amendment to Article 23 enlarges the membership of the Security Council from 11 to 15. The amended Article 27 provides that decisions of the Security Council on procedural matters shall be made by an affirmative vote of nine members (formerly seven) and on all other matters by an affirmative vote of nine members (formerly seven), including the concurring votes of the five permanent members of the Security Council.

The amendment to Article 61, which entered into force on 31 August 1965, enlarged the membership of the Economic and Social Council from 18 to 27. The subsequent amendment to that Article, which entered into force on 24 September 1973, further increased the membership of the Council from 27 to 54.

The amendment to Article 109, which relates to the first paragraph of that Article, provides that a General Conference of Member States for the purpose of reviewing the Charter may be held at a date and place to be fixed by a two-thirds vote of the members of the General Assembly and by a vote of any nine members (formerly seven) of the Security Council. Paragraph 3 of Article 109, which deals with the consideration of a possible review conference during the tenth regular session of the General Assembly, has been retained in its original form in its reference to a "vote of any seven members of the Security Council," the paragraph having been acted upon in 1955 by the General Assembly, at its tenth regular Session, and by the Security Council.

On 31 December 1981, the total number of staff of the United Nations holding permanent, probationary and fixed-term appointments with service or expected service of a year or more was 26,281. Of these, 8,878 were in the Professional and higher categories and 17,403 were in the General Service, Manual Worker and Field Service categories. Of the same total, 22,826 were regular staff serving at Headquarters or other established offices and 3,455 were assigned as project personnel to technical co-operation projects. In addition, UNRWA had some 16,500 local area staff.

Appendix IV

Agenda of United Nations principal organs in 1981

This appendix lists the items on the agenda of the General Assembly, the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council and the Trusteeship Council during 1981. The column headed "Page" shows the page of the present volume on which a summary of the main treatment of each item begins. For the Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, the column headed "Allocation" indicates the assignment of each item to plenary meetings or committees.

Agenda item titles have been shortened by omitting mention of reports following the subject of the item. Thus, 'Question of Cyprus: report of the Secretary-General' has been shortened to 'Question of Cyprus'. Where the subject-matter of the item is not apparent from its title, the subject is identified in square brackets; this is not part of the title.

As treatment of topics in the yearbook does not always correspond to agenda items, the page number cited in the last column does not necessarily refer to the treatment of all resolutions or decisions adopted under that item. Thus, under item 12, "Report of the Economic and Social Council", the reference is to a page in the yearbook describing the Assembly's treatment of that report; no reference is given to the resolutions on specific topics adopted under that item. These may be found by resolution or decision number in the INDEX OF RESOLUTIONS AND DECISIONS.
