Co-operation with other United Nations bodies, particularly UNDP, UNESCO, WHO, UNICEF and ILO, as well as with UNTSO and UNIFIL, greatly facilitated UNRWA's tasks. Co-operation with NGOs was furthered through consultations held at Amman in February 1986, under the joint sponsorship of UNRWA and the International Council of Voluntary Agencies. The meeting, the third of its kind, took place for the first time in UNRWA's area of operations, giving the 70 participants an opportunity to visit some of the Agency's installations and have a first-hand look at its operations. Discussions focused on health, education, training and employment, income-generating projects and ways UNRWA and individual NGOs could expand co-operation to improve services available to refugees. During informal consultations with donor and other Governments in May 1986, a number of participants urged UNRWA to explore broader co-operation with NGOs, both those able to contribute funds for certain programmes and those interested in a more active role in the region.

UNRWA activities and its financial situation in 1986 were described in the Commissioner-General's reports covering the periods 1 July 1985 to 30 June 1986⁽³⁾ and 1 July 1986 to 30 June 1987.⁽¹⁾ The Advisory Commission of UNRWA met at Vienna on 28 August 1986 to consider the draft 1985/86 report.

Introducing the 1985/86 report in the General Assembly's Special Political Committee, the Commissioner-General said that UNRWA should do much more to assist the refugees but its resources were limited. That the refugee problem remained unsolved might be sufficient reason to extend the Agency's mandate—due to expire on 30 June 1987—further. Other compelling considerations included the stabilizing role UNRWA fulfilled in one of the world's most turbulent regions and the humanitarian aspect exemplified by the 350,000 children in UNRWA schools, the 4,500 young men and women in training institutes, the thousands of mothers and children attending health clinics every day and the more than 100,000 refugees unable to provide for themselves; all relied on UNRWA.

UNRWA's vital work, the Secretary-General said in his report on the work of the Organization (see p. 3), had to be carried out under extremely difficult circumstances and continued to merit and need the financial support of all States.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 3 December 1986, acting on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/69 A by recorded vote.

Assistance to Palestine refugees

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 40/165 A of 16 December 1985 and all its previous resolutions on the question, including resolution 194(III) of 11 December 1948,

Taking note of the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1985 to 30 June 1986,

1. Notes with deep regret that repatriation or compensation of the refugees as provided for in paragraph 11 of General Assembly resolution 194(III) has not been effected, that no substantial progress has been made in the programme endorsed by the Assembly in paragraph 2 of its resolution 513(VI) of 26 January 1952 for the reintegration of refugees either by repatriation or resettlement and that, therefore, the situation of the refugees continues to be a matter of serious concern;

2. Expresses its thanks to the Commissioner-General and to all the staff of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, recognizing that the Agency is doing all it can within the limits of available resources, and also expresses its thanks to the specialized agencies and private organizations for their valuable work in assisting the refugees;

3. Reiterates its request that the headquarters of the Agency should be relocated to its former site within its area of operations as soon as practicable;

4. Notes with regret that the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine has been unable to find a means of achieving progress in the implementation of paragraph 11 of General Assembly resolution 194(III), and requests the Commission to exert continued efforts towards the implementation of that paragraph and to report to the Assembly as appropriate, but no later than 1 September 1987;

5. Directs attention to the continuing seriousness of the financial position of the Agency, as outlined in the report of the Commissioner-General;

6. Notes with profound concern that, despite the commendable and successful efforts of the Commissioner-General to collect additional contributions, this increased level of income to the Agency is still insufficient to cover essential budget requirements in the present year and that, at currently foreseen levels of giving, deficits will recur each year;

7. Calls upon all Governments, as a matter of urgency, to make the most generous efforts possible to meet the anticipated needs of the Agency, particularly in the light of the budgetary deficit projected in the report of the Commissioner-General, and therefore urges non-contributing Governments to contribute regularly and contributing Governments to consider increasing their regular contributions;

8. Decides to extend until 30 June 1990, without prejudice to the provisions of paragraph 11 of General Assembly resolution 194(III), the mandate of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Israel.

Israel said that, far from being opposed to the extension of international assistance to Palestinian Arabs—whether registered with UNRWA or not—it welcomed any increase in financial, technical, cultural and economic assistance, with the sole requirement that it be channelled through the proper and legitimate organs and be used for constructive purposes. Israel rejected, however, slandrous propaganda on the false pretence of assessing the living conditions of the Palestinian Arabs and granting them protection and assistance; it also opposed the political connotations and implications given to the item at the prompting of countries actively engaged in a military and diplomatic war against it. It could not condone the different criteria applied to various refugee situations, the rewriting of history and artificial perpetuation of refugee status and camps for exclusively political aims. Those most vociferous on that matter were the countries directly responsible for the plight of the Palestinians and which for years had been impeding world efforts to promote constructive and lasting solutions; among the staunchest supporters of texts adopted under the agenda item were countries which gave little to the Palestinians or which refused to increase their contributions. Behind the careful diplomatic wording was the intention to induce the world community to condone blind terrorism and relentless warfare, block the way to peace and stability and actively help extremists seeking to destroy two United Nations Members—Israel and Jordan—without any concern for the fate of the Palestinians who were still being kept in refugee camps. The Palestinians should be protected and assisted in rejecting terror and bloodshed and should be persuaded to seek a constructive, peaceful and lasting settlement that would allow them to work hand in hand with their natural neighbours for the development and welfare of the region and all the peoples involved.

The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya pointed out that it voted for the text for purely humanitarian reasons, but had always considered the United States responsible for prolonging the situation because it aided the occupiers who had usurped Palestinian lands.

UNRWA financing

As at 1 January 1986,⁽⁴⁾ total regular contributions pledged to UNRWA were $175.8 million, while estimated expenditures in the 1986 budget (less the construction part) amounted to $183.6 million. The gap between expected income and expenditure was closed during the year partly by a number of Governments responding favourably to the Agency's appeals and partly through exchange-rate movements that reduced costs in United States dollar terms in some parts of the area of operation. UNRWA managed for the first time in several years to balance its income with expenditure and, at the end of 1986, had a small excess of income over expenditure, which enabled it to begin to restore its working capital that had been severely reduced by the 1984 and 1985 financial crisis. The Agency's budget for capital construction, however, which amounted to $7.6 million in 1986, was largely unfunded and several construction projects had to be postponed.

Total income received by UNRWA for all funds, in cash and in kind, in 1986 was $189.9 million, which included a $6.5 million allocation from the United Nations. Expenditure by all funds was $186.5 million, $0.9 million less than in 1985, leaving an excess of income over expenditure of $3.4 million which helped to offset the shortfall in previous years. This was mainly due to increased contributions from donors, mostly Governments, which had responded generously and in a timely fashion to UNRWA's appeals; of primary importance also were the austerity measures introduced by UNRWA in 1985 which for the most part had been maintained or even extended. The informal meeting of donors with UNRWA and the Working Group on financing (see below), held for the first time on 22 and 23 May 1986 at Vienna, proved an effective means of involving donor and host Governments more closely with UNRWA and of increasing their participation in and understanding of its activities.

According to the Commissioner-General, prospects for sufficient income to cover the 1987 budget were quite good, a trend which was apparent at the pledging conference held in New York in November 1986 when, for the first time, the amount of cash pledged for the coming year came close to equalling the Agency's planned cash expenditure for the regular programme.

UNRWA's financial position was very sensitive to changes in exchange rates, due to the fact that its budget was prepared in United States dollars, while many contributions were paid in Western European and other currencies; expenditures, however, were made mainly in currencies of the Near East and, to a much lesser extent, in Austrian schillings and other Western currencies. Increases in prices and salary levels in the Agency's areas of operation also had their impact on expenditures. As salary levels for government employees rose, UNRWA reviewed the pay of its area staff to keep it in line.

A breakdown of contributions in cash and kind to the UNRWA General Fund in 1986 was set out in the audited financial statements for the year.⁽⁵⁾

Working Group on UNRWA financing

Report of the Working Group. In 1986, the Working Group on the Financing of UNRWA held three meetings, on 17 September and 3 and 13 October, to consider recent developments in the Agency's financial situation.⁽⁶⁾ The Group noted the Commissioner-General's special efforts to secure the level of contributions required and that the Vienna May meeting (see above) had led to greater understanding.

In order to provide a more rational longer-term approach to the planning and execution of the UNRWA programme, the Agency introduced a three-year medium-term plan covering 1987-1989, which would be revised annually and would be the basis for preparing each year's annual budget; it would also provide for better programme monitoring and evaluation.

For 1987, it was expected that expenditure would increase by not more than 5 per cent, an increase due almost entirely to a projected increase in school population. Even without a precise figure, the Group said, it was clear that, if UNRWA was not to slip back into deep financial difficulties, the funds provided for 1987 would have to be increased.

In concluding remarks, the Working Group noted that the financial situation in 1986 was less critical than in 1985 and the Commissioner-General expected to be able to maintain services to refugees without interruption; it congratulated him on his successful efforts and expressed appreciation to donors, especially those that increased their 1986 contributions.

The fact that little much-needed construction was undertaken in 1986 was, however, a matter of concern; many of UNRWA's facilities were in need of replacement and in recent years work had had to be postponed for lack of funds. The Group recognized that priority must be given to maintaining services and that funds could only be allocated to construction when services were assured; it endorsed the Commissioner-General's efforts to seek funding for construction from non-governmental sources, as well as his efforts to persuade Governments to make special contributions for construction.

The Group welcomed the introduction of a three-year medium-term plan as being of great assistance to donor countries, by giving them advance guidance on future financial needs, and as providing opportunities to improve programme development and evaluation.

Noting that expenditure in 1987 was expected to be some 5 per cent higher than in 1986, the Group urged all Governments to recognize that UNRWA would need additional financial support.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 3 December 1986, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/69 B without vote.

Working Group on the Financing of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 2656(XXV) of 7 December 1970, 2728(XXV) of 15 December 1970, 2791(XXVI) of 6 December 1971, 2964(XXVII) of 13 December 1972, 3090(XXVIII) of 7 December 1973, 3330(XXIX) of 17 December 1974, 3419 D (XXX) of 8 December 1975, 31/15 C of 23 November 1976, 32/90 D of 13 December 1977, 33/112 D of 18 December 1978, 34/52 D of 23

November 1979, 35/13 D of 3 November 1980, 36/146 E of 16 December 1981, 37/120 A of 16 December 1982, 38/83 B of 15 December 1983, 39/99 B of 14 December 1984 and 40/165 B of 16 December 1985,

Recalling also its decision 36/462 of 16 March 1982, whereby it took note of the special report of the Working Group on the Financing of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East and adopted the recommendations contained therein,

Having considered the report of the Working Group on the Financing of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East,

Taking into account the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1985 to 30 June 1986,

Gravely concerned at the critical financial situation of the Agency, which has already reduced the essential minimum services being provided to the Palestine refugees and which threatens even greater reductions in the future,

Emphasizing the urgent need for extraordinary efforts in order to maintain, at least at their present minimum level, the activities of the Agency,

1. Commends the Working Group on the Financing of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East for its efforts to assist in ensuring the Agency's financial security;

2. Takes note with approval of the report of the Working Group;

3. Requests the Working Group to continue its efforts, in co-operation with the Secretary-General and the Commissioner-General, for the financing of the Agency for a further period of one year;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to provide the necessary services and assistance to the Working Group for the conduct of its work.

Accounts for 1985

Following the audit of the UNRWA financial statements for the year ended 31 December 1985, the Board of Auditors made its recommendations⁽⁷⁾ ACABQ, in September 1986,⁽⁸⁾ commented on the Board's report.

The General Assembly, in resolution 41/176, accepted the audited financial statements and requested remedial action as required by the Board's and the Advisory Committee's comments and observations.

Claims for compensation

According to the Commissioner-General, UNRWA had received no response to a 1984 claim against Israel for $4,381,867 as compensation for loss and damage caused to Agency property and facilities as a result of the invasion of Lebanon in 1982. The General Assembly had called for such compensation in 1983,⁽⁹⁾ 1984⁽¹⁰⁾ and 1985⁽¹¹⁾. A separate claim had been made for $194,901 for loss and damage caused by Israeli military action in Lebanon before June 1982. There had also been no response from Israel to UNRWA's claim, lodged in 1969, for damage arising out of the 1967 hostilities.

No progress had been made over claims against the Syrian Arab Republic, relating mainly to the levy of certain taxes from which UNRWA believed it was exempt under existing agreements. Likewise, there had been no progress with regard to the establishment of a joint committee of the Jordanian Government and UNRWA to discuss the Agency's claims against the former, which included those arising out of the 1967 hostilities and the disturbances of 1970 and 1971, despite an understanding reached in 1984 that Jordan would nominate representatives to the joint committee. The Syrian Government, however, responded in June 1986 to UNRWA's requests for a more favourable exchange rate, advising that henceforth the tourist rate of exchange would apply to United Nations transactions; in doing so, it helped reduce the projected shortfall in UNRWA's 1986 income and made it easier for donors to fund much-needed construction of new school and other facilities in the Syrian Arab Republic.

Other aspects

Displaced persons

Humanitarian assistance

In addition to relief services, which included the provision of basic food commodities, blankets, clothing, shelter repair and cash grants, UNRWA continued to provide in 1986 a small measure of humanitarian assistance to persons displaced as a result of the June 1967 and subsequent hostilities in the Middle East but who were not registered with UNRWA as refugees. In Jordan, UNRWA continued to distribute rations on the Government's behalf to some 193,000 persons. Also in Jordan, UNRWA administered jointly with OXFAM (United Kingdom) two day-care centres for mentally disabled children at Suf and Jerash camps; a third centre, scheduled to open in 1987, had been constructed.

In 1986 after prolonged negotiations, Egypt and Israel agreed on a solution to the problem of 4,600 refugees left on the Egyptian side of the international boundary at Rafah when Israel withdrew from the Sinai in April 1982. The solution provided for a phased return of the refugees to the Gaza Strip for settlement in the Tel al-Sultan housing project near Rafah. Financial help would be given to the refugees by Egypt, while Israel offered to provide land and other facilities. The plan's first phase was implemented in the summer of 1986 when heads of families in groups of 25 visited plots assigned to them in the housing project and registered their belongings with the Israeli authorities. The second phase—the construction of their homes by the heads of family—was temporarily delayed. UNRWA had made provision within its regular programmes for education and health care for the refugees upon their return; in the mean time, it continued to provide them with services, including elementary and preparatory education for some 1,200 refugee children and basic health care focusing mainly on mother and child health services. Rations, blankets and clothing were distributed to the majority of those refugees, most of whom were unemployed and lived in hardship.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 3 December 1986, acting on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/69 C without vote.

Assistance to persons displaced as a result of the June 1967 and subsequent hostilities

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 40/165 C of 16 December 1985 and all its previous resolutions on the question,

Taking note of the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1985 to 30 June 1986,

Concerned about the continued human suffering resulting from the hostilities in the Middle East,

1. Reaffirms its resolution 40/165 C and all its previous resolutions on the question;

2. Endorses, bearing in mind the objectives of those resolutions, the efforts of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East to continue to provide humanitarian assistance as far as practicable, on an emergency basis and as a temporary measure, to other persons in the area who are at present displaced and in serious need of continued assistance as a result of the June 1967 and subsequent hostilities;

3. Strongly appeals to all Governments and to organizations and individuals to contribute generously for the above purposes to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East and to the other intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations concerned.

Repatriation of refugees

the Secretary-General submitted in September 1986 a report⁽¹³⁾ on population and refugees displaced since 1967. In response to his February 1986 request to Israel for information on its steps to facilitate the return of displaced inhabitants, Israel on 16 July had referred to its position as set out in successive annual replies, the most recent in September 1985.⁽¹⁴⁾ Contrary to claims in the 1985 resolution, Israel said, it had made every effort to review individual cases of resettlement based on the merits of each case; as a result, the total number of persons that had returned since 1967 was approximately 72,000.

The Secretary-General also obtained information from the Commissioner-General on the return of refugees registered with UNRWA. Since UNRWA was not involved in arrangements for return, the data were based on requests by returning registered refugees for transfer of their entitlement for services to the areas to which they had returned; UNRWA would not necessarily be aware of the return of any registered refugees who did not request the provision of services. So far as was known to UNRWA, 150 refugees registered with the Agency returned to the West Bank between 1 July 1985 and 30 June 1986, and 23 to the Gaza Strip; some of those might not themselves have been displaced in 1967, UNRWA noted, but might be members of the family of a displaced registered refugee whom they had accompanied on return or joined afterwards. The number of displaced registered refugees known by UNRWA to have returned to the occupied territories since June 1967 was about 10,900. The Agency was unable to estimate the total number of displaced inhabitants who had returned, as it kept records only of registered refugees and even those records, particularly with respect to the location of refugees, might be incomplete.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 3 December 1986, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/69 G by recorded vote.

Population and refugees displaced since 1967

The General Assembly,

Recalling Security Council resolution 237(1967) of 14 June 1967,

Recalling also its resolutions 2252(ES-V) of 4 July 1967, 2452 A (XXIII) of 19 December 1968, 2535 B (XXIV) of 10 December 1969, 2672 D (XXV) of 8 December 1970, 2792 E (XXVI) of 6 December 1971, 2963 C and D (XXVII) of 13 December 1972, 3089 C (XXVIII) of 7 December 1973, 3331 D (XXIX) of 17 December 1974, 3419 C (XXX) of 8 December 1975, 31/15 D of 23 November 1976, 32/90 E of 13 December 1977, 33/112 F of 18 December 1978, 34/52 E of 23 November 1979, ES-7/2 of 29 July 1980, 35/13 E of 3 November 1980, 36/146 B of 16 December 1981, 37/120 G of 16

December 1982, 38/83 G of 15 December 1983, 39/99 G of 14 December 1984 and 40/165 G of 16 December 1985,

Having considered the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1985 to 30 June 1986, and the report of the Secretary-General,

1. Reaffirms the inalienable right of all displaced inhabitants to return to their homes or former places of residence in the territories occupied by Israel since 1967, and declares once more that any attempt to restrict, or to attach conditions to, the free exercise of the right to return by any displaced person is inconsistent with that inalienable right and inadmissible;

2. Considers any and all agreements embodying any restriction on, or condition for, the return of the displaced inhabitants as null and void;

3. Strongly deplores the continued refusal of the Israeli authorities to take steps for the return of the displaced inhabitants;

4. Calls once more upon Israel:

(a) To take immediate steps for the return of all displaced inhabitants;

(b) To desist from all measures that obstruct the return of the displaced inhabitants, including measures affecting the physical and demographic structure of the occupied territories;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, after consulting with the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, to report to the General Assembly, before the opening of its forty-second session, on Israel's compliance with paragraph 4 above.

^a Later advised the Secretariat it had intended to abstain.

The United States considered the text highly controversial and biased. In Sweden's view, it seemed to rule out negotiations on the modalities that would enable Palestinians displaced as a result of the 1967 war to return to their homes.

Food aid

The General Assembly, in December 1986, again called for resumption of the general ration distribution to Palestine refugees which had been suspended in September 1982,⁽¹⁵⁾ except in Lebanon where it had ceased in March 1984.⁽¹⁶⁾ In September 1986,⁽¹⁷⁾ the Secretary-General reported that response to the Assembly's 1985 call⁽¹⁸⁾ for generous contributions had not been forthcoming; the annual cost of reinstating the basic ration for 1,606,000 eligible refugees would be $66.7 million, including $6.1 million in cash. Since the required additional resources had not been at UNRWA's disposal in 1986, it had had to use the available income to maintain its education, health and welfare programmes at the 1985 level and it had not been possible to consider resuming the ration distribution.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 3 December 1986, acting on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/69 F by recorded vote.

Resumption of the ration distribution to Palestine refugees

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 36/146 F of 16 December 1981, 37/120 F of 16 December 1982, 38/83 F of 15 December 1983, 39/99 F of 14 December 1984 and 40/165 F of 16 December 1985 and all its previous resolutions on the question, including resolution 302(IV) of 8 December 1949,

Having considered the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1985 to 30 June 1986 and the report of the Secretary-General,

Deeply concerned at the interruption by the Agency, owing to financial difficulties, of the general ration distribution to Palestine refugees in all fields,

1. Regrets that its resolutions 37/120 F, 38/83 F, 39/99 F and 40/165 F have not been implemented;

2. Calls once again upon all Governments, as a matter of urgency, to make the most generous efforts possible and to offer the necessary resources to meet the needs of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, particularly in the light of the interruption by the Agency of the general ration distribution to Palestine refugees in all fields, and therefore urges non-contributing Governments to contribute regularly and contributing Governments to consider increasing their regular contributions;

3. Requests the Commissioner-General to resume on a continuing basis the interrupted general ration distribution to Palestine refugees in all fields;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Commissioner-General, to report to the General Assembly at its forty-second session on the implementation of the present resolution.

3 December 1986 Meeting 95 130-20-4 (recorded vote)

Approved by Special Political Committee (A/41/754) by recorded vote (98-20-4), 4 November (meeting 19); 8-nation draft (A/SPC/41/L12); agenda item 75.

Sponsors: Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Cuba, Egypt, Indonesia, Malaysia, Pakistan, Yugoslavia.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Austria, Cameroon, Costa Rica, Spain.

The United States, stressing support for the Commissioner-General's efforts to make best possible use of UNRWA's scarce resources, felt that the text was aimed at restricting his discretionary powers. Without sufficient financial resources, Sweden stated, the resumption of the ration distribution as requested would endanger the vitally important educational and health care activities which must be given highest priority.

Education and training services

Schools and teacher training centres

The aim of the UNRWA education programme was to provide, within the framework of the curricula prescribed by the host countries, general education, teacher and higher education, and vocational and technical training for Palestine refugees in accordance with their educational needs, identity and cultural heritage. In 1986, UNRWA spent $116.3 million on its education programme under the General Fund and $5.7 million under project funds.

Under an agreement between UNRWA and UNESCO, the latter continued to provide technical and professional advice to the Commissioner-General on aspects of the UNRWA education programme, which included schooling for some 350,000 Palestine refugee children through nine grades of elementary and preparatory education in 635 schools. In Jordan and the Syrian Arab Republic, schools operated normally throughout the year. In Lebanon, the disturbed situation seriously affected school operations; schools in certain areas, however, notably in the Bekaa Valley and Tripoli, operated normally with only minor, short-lived interruptions of services. In the Beirut area, all schools were inoperative from November 1986 on.

Pre-service and in-service teacher training was offered; pre-service training was given to some 1,000 trainees at three training centres, one in Jordan and two at Ramallah in the West Bank, and a variety of in-service training courses were conducted through education development centres located in the five fields of operation.

Some 4,000 young men and women received vocational and technical education in eight training centres located throughout UNRWA's areas of operation; the trend was to increase the number of trainees in that area and to reduce teacher training to reflect market trends in employment possibilities.

Thanks to an increase in financial contributions to the Agency's construction programme, UNRWA was able to build or renovate several educational facilities.

Proposed University of Jerusalem "Al-Quds"

Report of the Secretary-General. As requested by the General Assembly in 1985,⁽¹⁹⁾ the Secretary-General reported in July 1986⁽²⁰⁾ on efforts to establish a university for Palestine refugees at Jerusalem, first considered by the Assembly in 1980.⁽²¹⁾ Since then, he had submitted four annual reports on measures he had taken, including the preparation of a functional feasibility study concerning the proposed university which he considered necessary; to that end, after adoption of the 1985 resolution, he had contacted the Rector of the United Nations University who had designated Federico Mayor, of the Universidad Autonoma in Madrid, a qualified expert to assist in the study's preparation.

In order to carry out his task, the expert would be expected to visit the area and meet with the competent Israeli officials, the Secretary-General informed Israel on 12 March 1986. Replying on 10 June, Israel referred to its previous statements⁽²²⁾ adding that the sponsors of the annual resolution were exploiting higher education to politicize extraneous issues. The higher academic institutions in Judaea and Samaria were successfully meeting all the requirements of the area's inhabitants, Israel pointed out, adding that it had enabled the establishment of five universities there, as well as other colleges and teacher training schools. Until clarifications to questions it had raised were provided, Israel was unable to take the matter further. In view of Israel's position, the Secretary-General said, it had not been possible to complete the feasibility study.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 3 December 1986, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/69 K by recorded vote.

University of Jerusalem "Al-Quds" for Palestine refugees

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 36/146 G of 16 December 1981, 37/120 C of 16 December 1982, 38/83 K of 15 December 1983, 39/99 K of 14 December 1984 and 40/165 D and K of 16 December 1985,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General,

Having also considered the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1985 to 30 June 1986,

1. Emphasizes the need for strengthening the educational system in the Arab territories occupied since 5 June 1967, including Jerusalem, and specifically the need for the establishment of the proposed university;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to take all necessary measures for establishing the University of Jerusalem "Al-Quds", in accordance with General Assembly resolution 35/13 B of 3 November 1980, giving due consideration to the recommendations consistent with the provisions of that resolution;

3. Calls once more upon Israel, the occupying Power, to co-operate in the implementation of the present resolution and to remove the hindrances that it has put in the way of establishing the University of Jerusalem "Al-Quds";

4. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-second session on the progress made in the implementation of the present resolution.

Scholarships

Report of the Secretary-General. In a September 1986 report⁽²³⁾ submitted in accordance with a 1985 General Assembly resolution⁽²⁴⁾ the Secretary-General provided information on responses to the Assembly's annual appeals beginning in 1977⁽²⁵⁾ for special allocations for grants and scholarships to Palestine refugees, for which UNRWA acted as recipient and trustee.

In 1986, the Federal Republic of Germany offered three fellowships to Palestine refugee graduates of UNRWA vocational training centres. Japan offered 15 training scholarships for vocational training instructors; as at 29 August, eight candidates had been proposed for the scholarships which were tenable in Japan under the guidance of the Japan International Co-operation Agency. In addition, Japan proposed in 1986 sending up to three specialists to the Wadi Seer Training Centre in Jordan to give on-the-job training to UNRWA instructors in automobile mechanics and diesel engine courses.

Among United Nations agencies and organizations, the Universal Postal Union resumed assistance by granting scholarships for further training in the postal field to two Palestinian students; the first scholarship was to be applied to the study cycle from October 1986 to September 1990. The International Labour Organisation (ILO) indicated that scholarships for training in hygiene and safety would be granted in 1986; an ILO expert continued to assist a UNDP project to help Palestinian women's institutions promote vocational training. UNIDO provided a six-week course in industrial co-operation to 12 Palestinians from the territories, which was held at ILO's International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training at Turin, Italy.

As part of a long-standing agreement with UNRWA, UNESCO awarded five scholarships to UNRWA education staff, in addition to a number of fellowships to students from the occupied territories and to teaching staff of educational institutions in those territories. The World Health Organization awarded five regional and international fellowships in post-graduate training, aimed at developing the technical and managerial skills of UNRWA health staff and at meeting future replacement needs under various health disciplines. A scholarship was also granted by the World Intellectual Property Organization.

Fellowships granted by NGOs to Palestine refugees included two 10-month fellowships for study of community nursing by the Australian People for Health, Education and Development; a one-year fellowship for post-graduate study in water and waste engineering by the British Council; a 27-month fellowship in midwifery, by Medical Aid for Palestinians; and a one-year scholarship in public health nursing by the British Save the Children Fund.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 3 December 1986, acting on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/69 D by recorded vote.

Offers by Member States of grants and scholarships for higher education, including vocational training, for Palestine refugees

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 212(III) of 19 November 1948 on assistance to Palestine refugees,

Recalling also its resolutions 35/13 B of 3 November 1980, 36/146 H of 16 December 1981, 37/120 D of 16 December 1982, 38/83 D of 15 December 1983, 39/99 D of 14 December 1984 and 40/165 D of 16 December 1985,

Cognizant of the fact that the Palestine refugees have, for the last three decades, lost their lands and means of livelihood,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General,

Having also considered the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1985 to 30 June 1986,

1. Urges all States to respond to the appeal contained in General Assembly resolution 32/90 F of 13 December 1977 in a manner commensurate with the needs of Palestine refugees for higher education, including vocational training;

2. Strongly appeals to all States, specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations to augment the special allocations for grants and scholarships to Palestine refugees in addition to their contributions to the regular budget of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East;

3. Expresses its appreciation to all Governments, specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations that responded favourably to General Assembly resolution 40/165 D;

4. Invites the relevant specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system to continue, within their respective spheres of competence, to extend assistance for higher education to Palestine refugee students;

5. Appeals to all States, specialized agencies and the United Nations University to contribute generously to the Palestinian universities in the territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including, in due course, the proposed University of Jerusalem "Al-Quds" for Palestine refugees;

6. Also appeals to all States, specialized agencies and other international bodies to contribute towards the establishment of vocational training centres for Palestine refugees;

7. Requests the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East to act as the recipient and trustee for the special allocations for grants and scholarships and to award them to qualified Palestine refugee candidates;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-second session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Israel.

The United States believed that the text provided for some of the needs of the refugees in a tangible manner, but it disapproved of the reference in paragraph 5 to the proposed universality at Jerusalem for Palestine refugees.

Property rights

Report of the Secretary-General. In September 1986,⁽²⁶⁾ the Secretary-General submitted a report on revenues derived from Palestine refugee properties, as requested in a 1985 General Assembly resolution⁽²⁷⁾ which in February 1986 he had brought to Israel's attention asking for information regarding its implementation. Replying on 16 July, Israel stated that its position had been set out previously, most recently in 1985.⁽²⁸⁾ With regard to the Assembly's request for information from other States on Arab property, assets and property rights in Israel, no replies had been received.

Report of the Conciliation Commission. In its report covering the period from 1 September 1985 to 31 August 1986⁽²⁹⁾ the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine stated that the circumstances which had limited its possibilities of action regarding compensation for Palestine refugee properties remained unchanged. The Commission hoped, however, that the situation in the region would improve, thus enabling it to carry forward its work in accordance with its mandate⁽³⁰⁾

On 3 December 1986, acting on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/69 H by recorded vote.

Revenues derived from Palestine refugee properties

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 35/13 A to F of 3 November 1980, 36/146 C of 16 December 1981, 37/120 H of 16 December 1982, 38/83 H of 15 December 1983, 39/99 H of 14 December 1984, 40/165 H of 16 December 1985 and all its previous resolutions on the question, including resolution 194(III) of 11 December 1948,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General,

Taking note also of the report of the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine, covering the period from 1 September 1985 to 31 August 1986,

Recalling that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the principles of international law uphold the principle that no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his or her private property,

Considering that the Palestine Arab refugees are entitled to their property and to the income derived from their property, in conformity with the principles of justice and equity,

Recalling, in particular, its resolution 394(V) of 14 December 1950, in which it directed the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine, in consultation with the parties concerned, to prescribe measures for the protection of the rights, property and interests of the Palestine Arab refugees,

Taking note of the completion of the programme of identification and evaluation of Arab property, as announced by the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine in its twenty-second progress report, and of the fact that the Land Office had a schedule of Arab owners and file of documents defining the location, area and other particulars of Arab property,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to take all appropriate steps, in consultation with the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine, for the protection and administration of Arab property, assets and property rights in Israel, and to establish a fund for the receipt of income derived therefrom, on behalf of the rightful owners;

2. Calls once more upon Israel to render all facilities and assistance to the Secretary-General in the implementation of the present resolution;

3. Calls upon the Governments of all the other Member States concerned to provide the Secretary-General with any pertinent information in their possession concerning Arab property, assets and property rights in Israel, which would assist the Secretary-General in the implementation of the present resolution;

4. Deplores Israel's refusal to co-operate with the Secretary-General in the implementation of the resolutions on the question;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-second session on the implementation of the present resolution.

The United States felt that the questions of repatriation and compensation could be settled more satisfactorily within the framework of negotiations. The right of Palestine refugees to recover property or be compensated should be dealt with in the context of a comprehensive Middle East solution, said Sweden.

Refugee protection

Protection of Palestine refugees, especially those in Lebanon, was again in 1986 the subject of a General Assembly resolution. The Secretary-General reported on steps taken to ensure their protection, as did the UNRWA Commissioner-General in his annual report⁽³⁾.

Report of the Secretary-General. In September 1986⁽³¹⁾ the Secretary-General reported on the implementation of a 1985 resolution⁽³²⁾ in which the General Assembly held Israel responsible for the security of the Palestine refugees in the occupied territories and called on it for compensation for the damage resulting from its invasion of Lebanon. Responding on 16 July 1986 to the Secretary-General's February request for information on steps taken or envisaged in compliance with the resolution, Israel stated that its position had been fully set out in 1985;⁽³³⁾ it rejected the resolution, which brushed aside realities and was particularly abhorrent as it omitted mention of the death and destruction in certain Arab countries. Since April 1985, Syrian and Lebanese forces had killed over 2,500 Palestinians and wounded over 6,300 in refugee camps in Lebanon; likewise, Palestinian camps in the Syrian Arab Republic and Jordan were the scenes of death, destruction and misery. In May 1985, Shiite forces in Lebanon had slaughtered hundreds of Palestinians in the camps around Beirut, and heavy fighting in Tripoli resulted in the death and injury of hundreds more. Intensified fighting in the camps around Beirut had prompted Democratic Yemen to transmit an urgent plea of 2 June from PLO to the Secretary-General to end the fighting⁽³⁴⁾ and the United Arab Emirates had transmitted an 11 June letter from PLO, which charged that Amal gangs and the sixth brigade of the Lebanese army continued shelling the camps in an attempt to break into them.⁽³⁵⁾

The UNRWA Commissioner-General continued his efforts in consultation with the Secretary-General to contribute to the safety and security of the refugees in all the occupied territories. Following the withdrawal of the Israeli forces from the Sidon and Tyre areas in Lebanon, the Secretary-General stated that there was nothing further to report regarding the Palestine refugees in Lebanon in the context of refugee protection.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 3 December 1986, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/69 I by recorded vote.

Protection of Palestine refugees

The General Assembly,

Recalling Security Council resolutions 508(1982) of 5 June 1982, 509(1982) of 6 June 1982, 511(1982) of 18 June 1982, 512(1982) of 19 June 1982, 513(1982) of 4 July 1982, 515(1982) of 29 July 1982, 517(1982) of 4 August 1982, 518(1982) of 12 August 1982, 519(1982) of 17 August 1982, 520(1982) of 17 September 1982 and 523(1982) of 18 October 1982,

Recalling its resolutions ES-7/5 of 26 June 1982, ES-7/6 and ES-7/8 of 19 August 1982, ES-7/9 of 24 September 1982, 37/120 J of 16 December 1982, 38/83 I of 15 December 1983, 39/99 I of 14 December 1984 and 40/165 I of 16 December 1985,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General,

Having also considered the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1985 to 30 June 1986,

Referring to the humanitarian principles of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, and to the obligations arising from the Regulations annexed to the Hague Convention IV of 1907,

Deeply concerned at the marked deterioration in the security situation experienced by the Palestine refugees as stated by the Commissioner-General in his report,

Deeply distressed at the continuous suffering of the Palestinians resulting from the Israeli invasion of Lebanon and its consequences,

Reaffirming its support for the sovereignty, unity and territorial integrity of Lebanon, within its internationally recognized boundaries,

1. Urges the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, to undertake effective measures to guarantee the safety and security and the legal and human rights of the Palestine refugees in all the territories under Israeli occupation in 1967 and thereafter;

2. Holds Israel responsible for the security of the Palestine refugees in the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied since 1967, including Jerusalem, and calls upon it to fulfil its obligations as the occupying Power in this regard, in accordance with the pertinent provisions of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949;

3. Calls once again upon Israel, the occupying Power, to release forthwith all detained Palestine refugees, including the employees of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East;

4. Urges the Commissioner-General, in consultation with the Government of Lebanon, to provide housing to the Palestine refugees whose houses were demolished or razed by the Israeli forces;

5. Calls once again upon Israel to compensate the Agency for the damage to its property and facilities resulting from the Israeli invasion of Lebanon, without prejudice to Israel's responsibility for all damages resulting from that invasion;

6. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Commissioner-General, to report to the General Assembly, before the opening of its forty-second session, on the implementation of the present resolution.

Against: Israel, United States.

For the United States, the text contained an unacceptable and unilateral condemnation of Israel, disregarding the truth; making the Secretary-General responsible for the safety, security and rights of the Palestine refugees in the territories would pose legal and practical problems because it would be conducive to jurisdictional clashes.

Explaining its vote on all texts under the agenda item, Israel rejected what it called the slanderous propaganda onslaught against it on the false pretence of granting the Palestinian Arabs protection and assistance; it could not condone the different criteria applied to various refugee situations.

Speaking for the 12 EC member States, the United Kingdom, reaffirming their concern for the safety and rights of all Palestine refugees, regretted that the text, which traditionally had addressed the problems of Palestine refugees in Lebanon, did not reflect fully their current difficult circumstances. The text also lacked cohesion, and, with regard to paragraph 1, the EC members considered it important to avoid bringing into question Israel's responsibility as an occupying Power for protecting the civilian population; it was for Israel to respect its obligations, whatever the circumstances.

In Sweden's opinion, the preamble was an improvement over that of 1985;⁽³²⁾ however, it continued to regard as inappropriate that the Secretary-General should guarantee the safety of the refugees in situations where he had no means of so doing. Furthermore, paragraph 3 was too general, while the sixth preambular paragraph, which had been taken from the Commissioner-General's report⁽³⁾ referred specifically to the situation in Lebanon.

Finland supported all measures which might improve the refugees' protection and, although it appreciated the new preambular wording, particularly in the sixth paragraph, it regretted the lack of balance in the text, which, it felt, ignored the serious security problems of Palestine refugees in Lebanon. It also had reservations on paragraphs 1 and 3 on the grounds that it was not the Secretary-General's task to guarantee security and because paragraph 3 was inaccurate and too general.

Austria also considered that there were positive changes over the 1985 wording; it could, however, be improved, particularly in paragraph 3 where it would be better to speak of Palestine refugees detained for political reasons.

Palestine refugees in the Gaza Strip

The situation in the Gaza Strip was less dramatic than that in Lebanon, the UNRWA Commissioner-General stated when introducing his 1985/86 annual report⁽³⁾ in the General Assembly's Special Political Committee, but developments were building towards a serious crisis. The area was one of the most densely populated in the world and pressure on human and physical resources was mounting. Local employment opportunities were diminishing and fresh water supplies were being consumed at nearly twice the replenishment rate. Residents were evincing a growing sense of desperation and despair and there had been increasing demands on UNRWA for additional services, which limited resources had made impossible to meet. The time had come for the Assembly to look carefully at the emerging situation and to attend to the need for co-ordinated action to ease the situation there.

Report of the Secretary-General. In September 1986⁽³⁶⁾ the Secretary-General reported on Palestine refugees in the Gaza Strip, in accordance with a 1985 resolution⁽³⁷⁾ in which the General Assembly again demanded that Israel desist from removing and resettling them and from demolishing their shelters. In reply to the Secretary-General's February 1986 request for information regarding implementation of the resolution, Israel stated on 16 July that its position had been set out in successive annual replies, the latest in August 1985.⁽³⁸⁾ In addition, Israel had addressed several points raised in the resolution in its 1985 statement before the Special Political Committee⁽³⁹⁾. The annual adoption of that resolution reflected the refusal to acknowledge the improved living conditions in the Gaza district, Israel added. No mention was made of the 120 per cent increase since 1967 of pupils attending school there, of the 25 per cent drop in illiteracy, or of the extensive development of medical care or the improvement of environmental services, including water supply, sewage and refuse disposal. Moreover, the demand that Israel desist from removing and resettling refugees and from destroying shelters was based on groundless accusation. Since 1967, Israel had initiated community development projects, enabling some 80,000 people to leave refugee camps and relocate to new residential areas; the occupants of old shelters had been moved to new, better-quality homes and vacant, dilapidated shelters had been demolished because of the threat they posed to the camps' sanitary conditions. As a result, the level of housing in the area had improved significantly and the projects were becoming increasingly popular among the refugees because they improved their living conditions.

The Secretary-General reported that, from September 1985 until the end of June 1986, Israel had demolished 13 shelter rooms constructed by the families, affecting seven refugee families comprising 66 persons. In September 1985, two rooms in the Rafah camp and one in a housing project nearby had been demolished on the grounds that they had been occupied by persons alleged to have stabbed an Israeli in Gaza town; UNRWA had protested to the authorities that the demolitions had also rendered homeless other members of the families against whom no allegations had been made, and constituted punitive action. Similarly, UNRWA protested the June 1986 demolition of a room in a Gaza town shelter, occupied by a family of nine, while two other rooms in that shelter were locked on punitive grounds because of an alleged security offence by the shelter's owner. Also in June, nine rooms in Gaza town, occupied by four refugee families comprising 27 persons, were demolished, on the grounds that the construction contravened building regulations.

UNRWA was following up with the Israeli authorities the rehousing of refugees who remained affected by the 1971 demolitions⁽⁴⁰⁾. Of 87 families previously categorized as living in hardship conditions, 19 were in hardship, 18 were inadequately and 37 were adequately housed, and 13 had previously purchased houses in Israeli-sponsored projects. The position of the 19 families living in hardship had been checked several times during the reporting period; despite repeated assurances by Israel that they would be rehoused, little progress had been made. The authorities had assured UNRWA, however, that a solution had been developed and would be implemented as soon as possible.

During the reporting period, the Commissioner-General had received the following information relating to demolition of refugee shelters by Israel on the grounds that they had been built without proper authority on State land outside camp boundaries. Previously, it was stated that the Israeli authorities had told several families living on the northern perimeter of Jabalia camp to remove some of their shelter extensions and that those families had taken the matter to the High Court of Israel⁽³⁸⁾ which had ruled against them; no demolitions had taken place so far, although the shelters had been isolated by bulldozing sand around their premises and the authorities had had discussions with some members of the group. The 35 families whose shelters on the perimeter of Beach camp had been demolished in 1983⁽⁴¹⁾ had still not been rehoused—28 were living in self-built temporary shelters on or near the same site and 7 had left the site. Recently, Israel had stated that it might be willing to consider allocating land to these families in a housing project, although not in Sheikh Radwan, the nearest project. Some refugee families at Rafah camp had, at the instance of the Israeli authorities, arranged to construct new houses on sites which would form part of the Tel el-Sultan housing project. Unfortunately, some families lacked the ability to undertake such work; they remained in their original shelters but had sand bulldozed around, sometimes as high as the shelter itself, on the grounds that the development of the area for future housing must continue. The Agency had urged the authorities to take a more humanitarian approach towards those remaining.

In the year under review, according to available information, 381 refugee families, comprising

2,366 persons, moved to 236 plots of land in Israeli-sponsored housing projects; in addition, three families, comprising 20 persons, moved to three completed housing units of nine rooms in all at the Sheikh Radwan project. As a precondition, demolition of 627 shelter rooms had been required, of which 310 had been built by UNRWA, 7 with UNRWA assistance and 310 without. Not only did that cause practical complications in cases of extended families sharing the same shelters, where one family wished to move but another, usually the older, wanted to remain, it also prevented UNRWA from using vacated shelters to help relieve the situation of other families living in poor, overcrowded conditions.

Israel had to date allocated approximately 3,714 plots of land in the Gaza Strip for housing projects. A total of 2,303 plots had been built on by 3,187 refugee families comprising 19,682 persons, 261 plots were under construction, 1,036 were vacant and 114 had been built on by non-refugees. In addition, 2,915 families, consisting of 17,972 persons, had moved into 2,649 completed housing units, consisting of 5,837 rooms.

Refugee families continued to purchase plots at subsidized rates for constructing houses in projects developed by the Israeli authorities in the Beit Lahiya, Nazleh and Tel el-Sultan areas. A new development was the construction of multi-storey apartment blocks in Sheikh Radwan, sponsored by the Israeli authorities; the apartments were offered for sale upon completion.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 3 December 1986, acting on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/69 E by recorded vote.

Palestine refugees in the Gaza Strip

The General Assembly,

Recalling Security Council resolution 237(1967) of 14 June 1967,

Recalling also its resolutions 2792 C (XXVI) of 6 December 1971, 2963 C (XXVII) of 13 December 1972, 3089 C (XXVIII) of 7 December 1973, 3331 D (XXIX) of 17 December 1974, 3419 C (XXX) of 8 December 1975, 31/15 E of 23 November 1976, 32/90 C of 13 December 1977, 33/112 E of 18 December 1978, 34/52 F of 23 November 1979, 35/13 F of 3 November 1980, 36/146 A of 16 December 1981, 37/120 E of 16 December 1982, 38/83 E of 15 December 1983, 39/99 E of 14 December 1984 and 40/165 E of 16 December 1985,

Having considered the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1985 to 30 June 1986, and the report of the Secretary-General,

Recalling the provisions of paragraph 11 of its resolution 194(III) of 11 December 1948 and considering that measures to resettle Palestine refugees in the Gaza Strip away from the homes and property from which they were displaced constitute a violation of their inalienable right of return,

Alarmed by the reports received from the Commissioner-General that the Israeli occupying authorities, in contravention of Israel's obligation under international law, persist in their policy of demolishing shelters occupied by refugee families,

Emphasizing the statement contained in paragraph 16 of the report of the Commissioner-General, which reads as follows:

"I believe I have a duty to draw the attention of Member States to the deteriorating conditions in the Gaza Strip and urge that the international community give serious consideration to what can be done to ease conditions there. This problem warrants immediate attention",

1. Reiterates strongly its demand that Israel desist from the removal and resettlement of Palestine refugees in the Gaza Strip and from the destruction of their shelters;

2. Requests the Commissioner-General to extend all the services of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East to Palestine refugees in the Gaza Strip;

3. Requests the Secretary-General, after consulting with the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, to report to the General Assembly, before the opening of its forty-second session, on Israel's compliance with paragraph 1 above.

3 December 1986 Meeting 95 146-2-5 (recorded vote)

Approved by Special Political Committee (A/41/754) by recorded vote (117-23), 4 November (meeting 19); 9-nation draft (A/SPC/41/L.11); agenda item 75.

Sponsors: Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Cuba, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Malaysia, Pakistan, Yugoslavia.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Israel, United States.

Abstaining: Cameroon, Costa Rica, Liberia, Malawi, Zaire.

According to the United States, the text was controversial, was biased and condemned Israel severely.

Although firmly supporting efforts to improve the conditions of refugees in the Gaza Strip, the United Kingdom said it was the 12 EC members' understanding of the request in paragraph 2 that the Commissioner-General's efforts depended on the resources available. Similarly, Austria found that wording unsatisfactory; the request to extend all UNRWA services to the refugees was meant to take into account available means. Finland considered that all services should be extended, it being understood that resource limits would not be exceeded.

Palestine refugees in the West Bank

Report of the Secretary-General. Of the 365,315 refugees in the West Bank registered with UNRWA, 272,870 lived outside camps, the Secretary-General noted in a September 1986 report.⁽⁴²⁾ He also reported that, in reply to his February request to Israel to inform him of any steps taken to implement the General Assembly's 1985 resolution,⁽⁴³⁾ in which it again called on Israel to refrain from removing and resettling refugees in the West Bank, Israel had stated on 16 July that its position had been set out previously, in 1984⁽⁴⁴⁾ and 1985.⁽⁴⁵⁾

The Secretary-General added that, while there had been occasional press reports concerning the possible voluntary movement of Palestine refugees in the West Bank into new housing outside of camps, no such development had taken place. The UNRWA Commissioner-General's position continued to be that, while he would hardly object if refugees voluntarily sought better housing outside a camp, he would strongly do so if any pressure or coercion were used to make them move. The mere fact of relocation outside the camps did not affect eligibility for UNRWA services.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 3 December 1986, acting on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/69 J by recorded vote.

Palestine refugees in the West Bank

The General Assembly,

Recalling Security Council resolution 237(1967) of 14 June 1967,

Recalling also its resolutions 38/83 J of 15 December 1983, 39/99 J of 14 December 1984 and 40/165 J of 16 December 1985,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General,

Having also considered the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1985 to 30 June 1986,

Alarmed by Israel's demolition of Palestine refugee camps in the West Bank,

Alarmed also by Israel's plans to remove and resettle the Palestine refugees of the West Bank and to destroy their camps,

Recalling the provisions of paragraph 11 of its resolution 194(III) of 11 December 1948 and considering that measures to resettle Palestine refugees in the West Bank away from the homes and property from which they were displaced constitute a violation of their inalienable right of return,

1. Calls once again upon Israel to abandon those plans and to refrain from any action that leads to the removal and resettlement of Palestine refugees in the West Bank and from the destruction of their camps;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, to keep the matter under close supervision and to report to the General Assembly, before the opening of its forty-second session, on any developments regarding this matter.

General Assembly resolution 41/69 J

3 December 1986 Meeting 95 145-2-6 (recorded vote)

Approved by Special Political Committee (A/41/754) by recorded vote (115-2-4, November (meeting 19); 9-nation draft (A/SPC/41/L16); agenda item 75.

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: SPC 13-19; plenary 95.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Israel, United States.

Abstaining: Costa Rica, Cote d'Ivoire, El Salvador, Liberia, Malawi, Zaire.

The United States was unable to support paragraph 1 because it would preclude programmes aimed at improving the refugees' living conditions pending the achievement of a comprehensive political settlement; it would therefore also preclude programmes for constructing new housing for those outside the camps, undertaken on a voluntary basis by the refugees themselves in co-ordination with UNRWA.

Speaking for the EC members, the United Kingdom said the reference in the fifth preambular paragraph to Israel's demolition of the camps was contrary to the facts. Sweden interpreted the wording of paragraph 1 as a statement of Israel's responsibility for refraining from displacing and relocating the refugees against their will, and it added that the use of the definite article in the sixth preambular paragraph was misleading.

Chapter X

Other political questions

Issues relating to information, a peace zone in the South Atlantic, atomic radiation and Antarctica were examined by the General Assembly in 1986.

The Assembly adopted resolutions on public information activities, work of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) in the information and communication field, membership of the United Nations Committee on Information, and the fortieth anniversary of UNESCO (41/68 A, B, C and E, respectively).

Taking up a new item, the Assembly declared the South Atlantic a zone of peace and co-operation (41/11). It asked for continued study of the levels, effects and risks of ionizing radiation (41/62 A) and decided to increase the membership of the United Nations Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation (41/62 B). It requested further information on Antarctica (41/88 A), called for a moratorium on negotiations to establish a minerals regime for Antarctica (41/88 B), and appealed for the exclusion of South Africa from the meetings of the Antarctic Treaty Consultative Parties (41/88 C).

Information

Public information activities of the United Nations continued to focus on two broad objectives: publicizing the United Nations work and goals, and enhancing the information-processing capacities of the developing countries. They were carried out through the Department of Public Information (DPI) of the United Nations Secretariat, UNESCO and the International Telecommunication Union (ITU), and co-ordinated by the Joint United Nations Information Committee.

The General Assembly's Committee on Information⁽¹⁾ continued to examine United Nations public information policies and activities. Following an organizational session in New York on 17 March 1986, the Committee held its eighth session from 23 June to 3 July, and made 57 recommendations to the Assembly.

Mass communication

UNESCO activities. In response to a 1985 General Assembly request⁽²⁾ the Secretary-General transmitted to it in September 1986 a report by the UNESCO Director-General⁽³⁾ and, in a November addendum⁽⁴⁾ information on ITU activities in communication.

The UNESCO report focused on three questions: implementation of the International Programme for the Development of Communication (IPDC); activities related to the establishment of a new world information and communication order; and the social, economic and cultural effects of the accelerated development of communication technologies.

More than half of the UNESCO projects for communication development—some funded by the IPDC Special Account and some others by funds-in-trust contributions—were directed towards Africa, while new projects were also launched in Latin America and the Caribbean, in Asia and the Pacific and in the Arab States. Major projects were begun to assist the development of national news agencies in eastern and southern Africa, rural radio and journalism training in Nepal and radio broadcasting in the Pacific. Emphasis was on training, mostly through national and subregional courses conducted by regional institutions and specialists. With problems of foreign exchange placing a constraint on the maintenance and expansion of communication infrastructures, developing countries were turning increasingly to UNESCO for new or replacement equipment.

At its seventh session (Paris, 14-20 January), the IPDC Intergovernmental Council approved funding from the IPDC Special Account for 61 projects (5 interregional, 19 regional and 37 national), of which 42 were new and 19 were ongoing projects requiring additional financing. The number of Governments and foundations agreeing to funds-in-trust arrangements for projects approved by IPDC continued to increase; financing projects in that way were Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands, the Republic of Korea, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States. Several countries had offered to provide experts or study grants to the Programme.

Since its founding in 1980⁽⁵⁾ IPDC had contributed $12,641,000 to 209 projects, of which 109 were national and 100 were regional or interregional. Of the funds allocated, 20 per cent each was for training, and developing research and training centres, and 19 per cent was for creating or developing press agencies.

ITU activities. Activities of ITU⁽⁶⁾ included participation in the second international round table on a new world information and communication order (see p. 358), and the convening of the first regional co-ordination meeting on the ITU International Sharing System for Training for Europe and the Middle East countries (Oslo, Norway, 16-21 June). ITU also organized a maintenance workshop, the first of its kind in Africa, with the participation of African telecommunication administrations and suppliers of telecommunication equipment. With the Inter-Agency Co-ordination Committee, ITU continued to play a leading role in a feasibility study for a regional African satellite communication system for the development of Africa. The sixteenth Plenary Assembly of the International Radio Consultative Committee (Dubrovnik, Yugoslavia, 12-23 May) examined reports on technical and operational matters relating to radio-communications. Among the 1986 publications were a study entitled "Information, telecommunications and development", and, jointly with UNESCO, a report on "Telecommunication tariffs for the mass media".

Activities of the Committee on Information. The Committee on Information⁽¹⁾ recommended that the United Nations system and the developed countries be urged to co-operate in strengthening the information and communication infrastructures of developing countries, in accordance with their priorities; they should be enabled to develop their own information and communication policies freely and independently and in the light of their history, social values and cultural traditions. In that regard, the Committee considered that IPDC, as an important step in the development of those infrastructures, deserved full support; and that the developing countries should have access to communication satellites, modern electronic information systems, informatics and other advanced information and communication facilities.

In regard to co-operation with the Pool of Non-Aligned News Agencies, as well as with the regional news agencies in developing countries, the Committee recommended that DPI assist UNESCO in implementing a plan for an integrated communication network and regional data and communication centres. Co-operation should also be extended to the recently established Eco-Pool of the Pool of Non-Aligned News Agencies in receiving and transmitting daily economic information to governmental and other institutions responsible for economic and social development.

The recommendations were approved by the Assembly in resolution 41/68 A.

Communications. In 1986, a number of declarations and letters on the international role of information were transmitted to the Secretary-General.

The Ministerial Meeting of the Co-ordinating Bureau of Non-Aligned Countries (New Delhi, 16-19 April), in a Political Declaration conveyed by India on 15 May,⁽⁶⁾ reaffirmed the need to establish a new international information and communication order and congratulated UNESCO for its efforts in that regard; expressed support for Eco-Pool, a new economic information project by the non-aligned news agencies Pool; congratulated the Pan African News Agency for its efforts against misinformation and in favour of the decolonization of information; agreed to support DPI so that it could enhance public awareness of the issues of interest to non-aligned countries; and condemned the use by States of radio as an instrument of hostile propaganda.

A similar statement was made by the Eighth Summit Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries (Harare, 1-6 September), in a Political Declaration transmitted by Zimbabwe on 30 September,⁽⁷⁾ which also stressed the need to give impetus to the activities of the broadcasting organizations of non-aligned countries.

On 23 June⁽⁸⁾ Bulgaria transmitted the text of a 22 May speech at Sofia by the Chairman of the Council of State of Bulgaria, at the International Meeting of Agrarian and Other Democratic Parties and Organizations, in which he criticized what he described as information "terrorism" by reactionary political forces against socialism.

On 29 July⁽⁹⁾ Panama transmitted a 27 June letter from its President, asserting that major United States newspapers and television channels were conducting a campaign to discredit the Commander-in-Chief and other high-ranking officers of the Defence Forces of Panama.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 3 December, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted by recorded vote resolution 41/68 B, under the agenda item on questions relating to information.

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 34/181 and 34/182 of 18 December 1979, 35/201 of 16 December 1980, 36/149 A of 16 December 1981, 37/94 A and B of 10 December 1982, 38/82 A of 15 December 1983, 39/98 A and B of 14 December 1984 and 40/164 A and B of 16 December 1985,

Recalling the relevant provisions of the Declarations of the Seventh and Eighth Conferences of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries held at New Delhi from 7 to 12 March 1983 and at Harare from 1 to 6 September 1986 as well as the final documents of the Conference of the Ministers of Information of Non-Aligned Countries, held at Jakarta from 26 to 30 January 1984, and the relevant provisions of the Final Political Declaration adopted by the Conference of Ministers for Foreign Affairs of Non-Aligned Countries, held at Luanda from 4 to 7 September 1985,

Recalling the relevant resolutions adopted by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity at its eighteenth ordinary session, held at Nairobi from 24 to 27 June 1981, and the Conference of Ministers of Information of States members of the Organization of African Unity at its third ordinary session, held at Addis Ababa in March 1985, and at its first extraordinary session, held at Cairo in November 1985, especially those encouraging regional co-operation in the field of information,

Recalling the relevant provisions of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, signed at Helsinki on 1 August 1975, and those of the Concluding Document of the meeting of representatives of the participating States of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, held at Madrid from 11 November 1980 to 9 September 1983,

Recalling article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which provides that everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression and that this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers, and article 29, which stipulates that these rights and freedoms may in no case be exercised contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations,

Recalling also the relevant provisions of the Declaration on the Preparation of Societies for Life in Peace,

Conscious that, in order progressively to remedy existing imbalances, it is essential to strengthen and intensify the development of infrastructure, networks and resources in the communications field and thus encourage a free flow and a wider and better balanced dissemination of information,

Emphasizing its full support for the International Programme for the Development of Communication of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, which constitutes an essential instrument for the development of human and material resources and communication infrastructures in the developing countries,

Recognizing the central role of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in the field of information and communications within its mandate, as well as the progress accomplished by that organization in that field,

1. Takes note of the report of the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization;

2. Recalls the Declaration on Fundamental Principles concerning the Contribution of the Mass Media to Strengthening Peace and International Understanding, to the Promotion of Human Rights and to Countering Racism, Apartheid and Incitement to War, adopted on 28 November 1978 by the General Conference of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization;

3. Considers that the International Programme for the Development of Communication of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization represents a significant step towards the gradual elimination of existing imbalances in the field of information and communications and welcomes the decisions adopted by the Intergovernmental Council of the Programme at its seventh session, held in Paris from 14 to 20 January 1986;

4. Expresses its appreciation to all Member States that have made or pledged a contribution towards the implementation of the International Programme for the Development of Communication;

5. Again calls upon Member States and organizations and bodies of the United Nations system as well as other international governmental and non-governmental organizations and concerned public and private enterprises to respond to the appeals of the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to contribute to the International Programme for the Development of Communication by making financial resources available as well as staff, equipment, technologies and training resources;

6. Recalls resolution 4/22 of 27 October 1980 concerning the reduction of telecommunication tariffs for news exchanges, adopted by the General Conference of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, and takes note of the efforts made by Member States in this respect;

7. Reaffirms its support for the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, its Constitution and the ideals reflected in it;

8. Invites the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to continue his efforts in the information and communication field and to submit to the General Assembly, at its forty-second session, a detailed report on the application of the International Programme for the Development of Communication as well as on the social, economic and cultural effects of the accelerated development of communication technologies;

9. Reaffirms the ongoing efforts of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, which retains the central role in the field of information, gradually to eliminate existing imbalances, particularly with respect to the development of infrastructures and production capacities, and to encourage a free flow and wider and better balanced dissemination of information with a view to the establishment of a new world information and communication order, seen as an evolving and continuous process, in accordance with the relevant United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization consensus resolutions.

3 December 1986 Meeting 95 143-2-7 (recorded vote)

Approved by SPC (A/41/753) by recorded vote (114-2-7), 28 November (meeting 38); draft by Yugoslavia, for Group of 77 (A/SPC/41/L.32); agenda item 74.

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: SPC 20-26, 38; plenary 95.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Italy, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United

Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Canada, Denmark, Germany, Federal Republic of, Iceland, Israel, Japan, Netherlands.

In explanation of vote, the United Kingdom said the draft was suffused with careless references to documents of the non-aligned countries and the Organization of African Unity, the relevance of which was not apparent. Along with the United Kingdom, the Netherlands said it had difficulties with paragraph 2, for referring to a Declaration which had been rendered irrelevant by subsequent developments in UNESCO, and paragraph 9, for introducing detrimental ambiguous elements. Referring to paragraph 2, Denmark held that the mass media were not in the service of Governments, and consequently Governments should not make recommendations relating to them. Similarly, the United States considered the draft to be replete with language which attempted to set an agenda for the media.

Canada said it could not support a resolution which further involved the General Assembly in the substantive operations of other organizations, such as UNESCO. Japan said that quoting selectively from UNESCO declarations and resolutions was not conducive to reaching a consensus. The Federal Republic of Germany found that the draft introduced ambiguous elements by not properly reflecting, in paragraph 9, the relevant provisions of UNESCO resolutions. Finland asserted that the draft should have incorporated the language used in the 1985 UNESCO General Conference resolution in order to avoid ambiguity; it reserved its position concerning the principles cited in paragraph 2. Norway said the text could have been improved.

Proposed new world information and communication order

UNESCO activities. As part of UNESCO's efforts to improve existing communication structures and to redress information and communication imbalances, its Director-General⁽³⁾ reported that attention continued to be given to such key concepts as plurality of information, access to communication in the public and private sectors and the right to communicate. Those concepts were being examined mostly through national case-studies, with emphasis on greater participation by women and young people.

The second round table on a new world information and communication order (Copenhagen, Denmark, 2-7 April)⁽¹⁰⁾—convened jointly by UNESCO and DPI—examined suggestions dealing with international co-operation in training of communication professionals in developing countries; encouragement of endogenous communication development in those countries, particularly the production of software; and further sensitization of media professionals and the general public to communication needs and possibilities through research, discussions and publications.

Preparation continued of a comprehensive historical survey of documents dealing with the new information and communication order since the idea originated at the beginning of the 1970s. An international project on the information situation of migrant workers, comprising 25 sub-studies in 15 countries, also continued, while regional studies commenced, in consultation with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and the International Committee of the Red Cross, of ways in which the media could accommodate the information needs of refugees.

Efforts to promote the 1978 UNESCO Declaration on Fundamental Principles concerning the Contribution of the Mass Media to Strengthening Peace and International Understanding, to the Promotion of Human Rights and to Countering Racism, Apartheid and Incitement to War⁽¹¹⁾ concentrated on the preparation of a brochure for French-speaking schoolchildren; brochures in English and Spanish were being prepared for dissemination in co-operation with the World Federation of UNESCO Clubs and other non-governmental organizations.

In resolution 41/68 B, the Assembly reaffirmed the ongoing efforts of UNESCO towards establishing a new world information and communication order.

Activities of the Committee on Information. Among a series of recommendations on promoting the establishment of a new world information and communication order, the Committee on Information (1) recommended that all countries and the United Nations system collaborate in establishing such an order, based on free circulation and wider and better balanced dissemination of information. The Committee stressed the importance of guaranteeing diversity of information sources and free access to information, and asserted that the principle of sovereign equality among nations extended to the communication field, and hence there was an urgent need to change the dependent status of the developing countries in information and communication.

Those recommendations were approved by the General Assembly in resolution 41/68 A.

Anniversary of UNESCO

In 1986, under the agenda item on questions relating to information, the General Assembly expressed support for UNESCO's efforts in the information field.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 3 December, the Assembly, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, adopted resolution 41/68 E by recorded vote.

Fortieth anniversary of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 40/164 A and B of 16 December 1985, in which it reaffirmed its strong support for the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization,

Considering that the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, observed in November 1986, is an important event in international life,

1. Reaffirms its full support for and deep appreciation of the efforts that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization has been exerting in the information field;

2. Requests the Department of Public Information of the Secretariat to pay particular attention to that event and to make broad use of that anniversary for the dissemination of information on the role of the United Nations and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in the information field, and in all the fields of competence of the latter, namely education, science and culture.

Approved by SPC (A/41/753) by recorded vote (105-10-9), 28 November (meeting 38); 22-nation draft (A/SPC/41/L.35); agenda item 74.

Sponsors: Afghanistan, Benin, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Byelorussian SSR, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Ethiopia, German Democratic Republic, Guyana, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Mongolia, Nicaragua, Syrian Arab Republic, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Republic of Tanzania, Viet Nam.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Cote d'Ivoire, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, France, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Germany, Federal Republic of, Iceland, Japan, Netherlands, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Austria, Finland, Israel, Italy, Luxembourg, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Sweden.

In explanation of vote, Denmark, the Federal Republic of Germany and the United Kingdom stated that the draft inappropriately requested DPI to disseminate information on the role of UNESCO, regardless of the United Nations financial situation and despite the fact that UNESCO was capable of doing that task itself. The United States described the draft as redundant, while the Netherlands said it was contrary to the desire to reach a consensus which had characterized the negotiations. Despite its positive vote in support of UNESCO, Spain said the draft was divisive and contained reference to a controversial Assembly resolution.

UN public information

The Committee on Information⁽¹⁾ recommended that DPI should continue to promote an informed understanding of the work and purposes of the United Nations among the people of the world, taking measures to ensure that its output contained objective and equitable information about issues before the Organization, reflecting divergent opinions where they occurred.

Among a series of recommendations submitted by the Committee for Assembly approval were those concerned with mass communication, the proposed new world information and communication order, and co-operation with the Pool of Non-Aligned News Agencies. Other recommendations dealt with DPI activities, the right to freedom of opinion and expression under the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights⁽¹²⁾ the World Disarmament Campaign, the critical economic situation in Africa, the human rights of the populations in occupied Arab territories, apartheid policies and the illegal occupation of Namibia.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

Following the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted on 3 December resolution 41/68 A by recorded vote.

The General Assembly,

Recalling its previous resolutions on questions relating to information,

Recalling the recommendations of the Committee on Information approved by the General Assembly in its resolution 40/164 A of 16 December 1985 and annexed thereto, as well as the provisions of that resolution, and taking into account the views expressed by delegations at the fortieth session of the Assembly, on 16 December 1985,

Reaffirming the mandate given to the Committee on Information by the General Assembly in its resolution 34/182 of 18 December 1979,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on questions relating to information,

1. Takes note of the comprehensive report of the Committee on Information, which served as an important basis and stimulated further deliberations, and urges the full implementation of the following recommendations:

(1) All countries, the United Nations system as a whole and all others concerned should co-operate in the establishment of a new world information and communication order, seen as an evolving and continuous process, and based, inter alia, on the free circulation and wider and better balanced dissemination of information, guaranteeing diversity of sources of information and free access to information and, in particular, the urgent need to change the dependent status of the developing countries in the field of information and communication, as the principle of sovereign equality among nations extends also to this field, and intended also to strengthen peace and international understanding, enabling all persons to participate effectively in political, economic, social and cultural life and promoting human rights, understanding and friendship among all nations. The ongoing efforts of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, which retains the central role in this field, to eliminate gradually the existing imbalances in the field of information and communication and to encourage a free flow and a wider and better balanced dissemination of information in accordance with the relevant resolutions of that organization, adopted by consensus, should be reaffirmed;

(2) Fully aware of the important role that the media world-wide can freely play, particularly under the present situation, it is recommended that:

(a) The mass media should be encouraged to give wider coverage to the efforts of the international community towards global development and, in particular, the efforts of the developing countries to achieve economic, social and cultural progress;

(b) The United Nations system as a whole should co-operate in a concerted manner, through its information services, in promoting a more comprehensive and realistic image of the activities and potential of the United Nations system in all its endeavours, in accordance with the purposes of the Charter of the United Nations, with particular emphasis on the creation of a climate of confidence, the strengthening of multilateralism and the promotion of the development activities in the United Nations system;

(c) All countries should be urged to extend assistance to journalists for the free and effective performance of their professional tasks;

(3) Aware of the existing imbalances in the international distribution of news, particularly that affecting the developing countries, it is recommended that urgent attention should be given to the elimination of existing inequalities in and all other obstacles, both internal and external, to the free flow and wider and better balanced dissemination of information, ideas and knowledge by, inter alia, diversifying the sources of information and respecting the interests, aspirations and socio-cultural values of all peoples, as a step towards the attainment of a free and more balanced flow of information;

(4) The United Nations system as a whole, as well as the developed countries, should be urged to co-operate in a concerted manner with the developing countries towards strengthening the information and communication infrastructure in the latter countries, in accordance with the priorities attached to such areas by the developing countries, with a view to enabling them to develop their own information and communication policies freely and independently and in the light of their history, social values and cultural traditions, taking into account the principle of freedom of the press and information. In this regard, full support for the International Programme for the Development of Communication of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, which constitutes an important step in the development of these infrastructures, should always be emphasized;

(5) It is recommended that the need be stressed to promote the access of the developing countries to communication technology, including communication satellites, modern electronic information systems, informatics and other advanced information and communication facilities so that they may improve their own information and communication systems in accordance with the specific conditions prevailing in each country;

(6) While satisfaction is expressed with the successful co-ordination and co-operation displayed by the Department of Public Information of the Secretariat with the News Agencies Pool of Non-Aligned Countries, as well as with regional news agencies of developing countries, it is recommended that the Department of Public Information continue to strengthen this co-operation as it constitutes a concrete step towards the elimination of existing inequalities;

(7) The Department of Public Information should continue to co-operate with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in assisting the News Agencies Pool of Non-Aligned Countries, as well as the regional news agencies of developing countries, by providing them with press releases and other materials and facilities for meetings on data and communication exchange of the public information bodies of the non-aligned countries;

(8) It is recommended that the Department of Public Information, as well as the specialized agencies of the United Nations system, should co-operate with the Eco-Pool of the News Agencies Pool of Non-Aligned Countries, which began its operation in September 1985 in order to receive and transmit daily economic information to relevant government, economic, banking and other institutions responsible for economic and social development, and which should help in promoting economic co-operation with and among developing countries;

(9) Reaffirming the primary role that the General Assembly is to play in elaborating, co-ordinating and harmonizing United Nations policies and activities in the field of information and emphasizing the central role of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in the field of information and communication, it is recommended that the United Nations system as a whole and all others concerned should be urged to give that organization adequate support and assistance in the field of information and communication. The Department of Public Information, in particular, should co-operate more regularly with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, especially at the working level, with a view to maximizing the contributions of the Department to the efforts of that organization in further promoting the attainment of a free and a more balanced flow of information;

(10) Article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which provides that everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression and that this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers, and article 29, which stipulates that these rights and freedoms may in no case be exercised contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations, should be recalled;

(11) The United Nations system, particularly the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, should aim at providing all possible support and assistance to the developing countries with due regard to their interests and needs in the field of information and to action already adopted within the United Nations system, including, in particular:

(a) Development of human resources as indispensable for the improvement of information and communication systems in developing countries, and support for the continuation and strengthening of practical training programmes, such as those already operating under both public and private auspices throughout the developing world;

(b) Creation of conditions that will gradually enable the developing countries to produce, by using their own resources, the communication technology suited to their national needs, as well as the necessary programme material, specifically for radio and television broadcasting;

(c) Assistance in establishing and promoting telecommunication links at subregional, regional and interregional levels, especially among developing countries;

(12) The Secretary-General should be requested to ensure that the activities of the Department of Public Information, as the focal point of the public information tasks of the United Nations, are strengthened and improved, keeping in view the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and along the lines established in the pertinent resolutions of the General Assembly and the recommendations of the Committee on Information, so as to ensure an objective and more coherent coverage of, as well as better knowledge about, the United Nations and its work, especially in its priority areas, such as those stated in section III, paragraph 1, of Assembly resolution 35/201 of 16 December 1980;

(13) The Department of Public Information should be requested to continue its co-operation with the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, as well as with intergovernmental organizations and regional organizations, and should monitor, as appropriate, important meetings of that Movement, as well as of intergovernmental and regional organizations, with a view to promoting a free and more balanced flow of information;

(14) In the light of the grave economic situation prevailing in Africa, the Secretary-General should be requested to ensure that the Department of Public Information does its utmost in bringing to the attention of the international community the real dimensions of the plight of the African people and the tremendous efforts of the African countries, with a view to increasing its contribution to alleviating this human tragedy. In this regard, the Secretary-General should be requested to ensure that the Department of Public Information does its utmost to disseminate widely and to publicize the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990, adopted by the General Assembly at its thirteenth special session, on the critical economic situation in Africa, which was held from 27 May to 1 June 1986;

(15) The Department of Public Information should be urged to give the widest possible dissemination of information pertaining to acute world economic problems in general and, in particular, to the critical economic situation in Africa, the severe economic difficulties of the least developed countries and the external debt crisis and development, as well as to the adverse effect of the international economic environment on the developing countries;

(16) The relevant provisions of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, signed at Helsinki on 1 August 1975, and those of the Concluding Document of the meeting of representatives of the participating States of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, held at Madrid from 11 November 1980 to 9 September 1983, should be recalled;

(17) The relevant provisions of the Declaration on the Preparation of Societies for Life in Peace should also be recalled;

(18) The final documents of the Conference of Ministers of Information of Non-Aligned Countries, held at Jakarta from 26 to 30 January 1984, should be recalled;

(19) The Conference of Ministers of Information of States members of the Organization of African Unity, held at Addis Ababa in March 1985, which expressed its conviction of the importance of a new world information and communication order, should be noted;

(20) The relevant resolution on the question relating to information of the Fourth Islamic Summit Conference, held at Casablanca from 16 to 19 January 1984, should be recalled;

(21) The relevant section of the Political Declaration adopted by the Eighth Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at Harare from 1 to 6 September 1986, should be recalled;

(22) The Department of Public Information should be urged to continue to give appropriate support to the lasting values of the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, which were reconfirmed during the observance of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations;

(23) The Department of Public Information should continue to maintain editorial independence and accuracy in reporting for all material produced by the Department and should promote, to the greatest possible extent, an informed understanding of the work and purposes of the United Nations among the peoples of the world, taking necessary measures to ensure that its output contains objective and equitable information about issues before the Organization, reflecting divergent opinions where they occur. The Department should ensure that there is open and unhindered access to all United Nations materials distributed through United Nations information centres;

(24) The assessment contained in the report of the Secretary-General relating to the acquisition by the United Nations of its own communications satellite should be kept under constant review;

(25) In this regard, attention is drawn to the success attained by the ARABSAT, BRASILSAT, INSAT-1B, MORELOS and PALAPA satellite systems and the

CONDOR project, designed to promote national and regional integration, and the improvement of communication infrastructures;

(26) In the light of the present financial difficulties of the Department of Public Information, it is recommended that the Department consider expanding the programme of telephone news bulletins. The Department is further requested to contact, in the immediate future, interested countries and radio broadcasting organizations in order to examine ways and means to resume, on favourable conditions for the Organization, short-wave broadcasting;

(27) The Department of Public Information should co-operate closely with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization and the News Agencies Pool of Non-Aligned Countries to continue to organize a workshop in 1987 for the familiarization of news agencies of developing countries with modern technology of relevance to news agencies and for the standardization of teaching methods and syllabuses and to produce training manuals in various languages for the training centres of the Pool and should report to the Committee on Information at its substantive session in 1988 on progress made to this effect. The Department of Public Information should, as a matter of priority, continue its annual training programme for journalists and broadcasters from developing countries. In this connection, the Department should continue to examine the possibility of allocating a week of the programme for a visit by journalists and broadcasters from developing countries to one of the developing countries that expresses readiness to receive them for the purpose of acquainting them with the ways in which information on the United Nations is received and utilized;

(28) In order to enhance awareness and understanding of the lofty objectives of the United Nations, the Department of Public Information should provide assistance, in an objective and equitable way, to educational institutions of Member States for teaching about the structure of the United Nations, as well as the principles and aims enunciated in its Charter. In order to implement this recommendation, the Department should continue to organize its fellowship programme for educators;

(29) Within the framework of the World Disarmament Campaign, the Department of Public Information should encourage coverage aimed at the promotion of a climate of understanding, confidence and co-operation, peace and development, and the enhancement of human rights;

(30) The Department of Public Information should be requested to continue to cover adequately and accurately all United Nations activities pertaining to the situation in the Middle East and the question of Palestine, in accordance with relevant United Nations resolutions;

(31) The Department of Public Information should continue its activities and dissemination of information on the policies and practices of apartheid, giving due attention to the unilateral measures and official censorship imposed on the local and international media with regard to all aspects of this issue;

(32) The Secretary-General should be requested to intensify his efforts in order to alert world public opinion to the illegal occupation of Namibia and to continue to disseminate, with the full assistance of the United Nations Council for Namibia, the Department of Public Information and the United Nations system as a whole, information relating to the struggle of the oppressed people of Namibia for self-determination, national independence and freedom as well as to the need for the full and speedy implementation of the United Nations plan for Namibia;

(33) The Department of Public Information should be requested anew to use the official languages of the General Assembly adequately in its documents and audio-visual documentation and to arrange accordingly for an appropriate number of staff in order better to inform the public about the activities of the United Nations. It should also make available to the French Language Production Section of the Press and Publications Division of the Department the means that will allow it consistently to produce and distribute press releases and "blue notes". With a view to assuring the best possible coverage of United Nations activities, the Department of Public Information should again be requested, in conformity with resolution 2(1) of 1 February 1946 and the pertinent instructions of the Secretary-General, to make balanced use of the two working languages of the Secretariat in its written and audio-visual documents. In particular, the Department, within existing resources, should give to the concerned divisions the means to produce and distribute press releases and "blue notes" in the two working languages of the Secretariat;

(34) The Secretary-General should be requested to strengthen the Middle East/Arabic Unit as the producer of Arabic television and radio programmes. The Department of Public Information should implement the provisions of General Assembly resolution 38/82 B of 15 December 1983 on the Caribbean Unit. In view of the importance of United Nations radio programmes in the European region, the functions of the European Unit should not only be maintained, they should also be expanded;

(35) The unique function of United Nations information centres as one of the most important means of disseminating information about the United Nations among the peoples of the world is recognized. In this regard, United Nations information centres should continue to assist press and information media in their respective countries in accordance with the mandate given by the General Assembly and should intensify direct and systematic communication exchange with local information and educational institutions in a mutually beneficial way, taking into account the areas of particular interest to host countries, with a view to the elimination of existing inequalities. Every effort should be made to establish close co-ordination with other field offices of the United Nations system, particularly those of the United Nations Development Programme, in order to avoid duplication of work. Co-ordination with these other offices should take into account the functional autonomy of the United Nations information centres;

(36) The Department of Public Information should promote to the greatest extent possible an informed understanding of the work and purposes of the United Nations and its contribution to the well-being of the peoples of the world. In this connection, coverage of United Nations activities in the area of social and economic development should be enhanced;

(37) The Department of Public Information should disseminate information concerning the decisions of the United Nations dealing with acts of terrorism in all its forms, with particular regard to General Assembly resolution 40/61 of 9 December 1985, which was adopted by consensus, as well as the relevant statements of the President of the Security Council and the Secretary-General;

(38) The Secretary-General should continue to strengthen and accelerate his efforts to develop a system for monitoring and evaluating the effectiveness of the activities of the Department of Public Information, particularly in the priority areas determined by the General Assembly, taking into account the need to improve data collection procedures, analysis of feedback data and end-use of the Department's materials, and maximizing the efficiency of the operations in all their aspects;

(39) Future reports of the Department of Public Information to the Committee on Information and to the General Assembly, in particular on new programmes or on the expansion of existing programmes, should contain:

(a) More adequate information on the output of the Department in respect of each topic included in its work programme, which forms the basis of its programme budget;

(b) The costs of the activities undertaken in respect of each topic;

(c) More adequate information on target audiences, end-use of the Department's products, and analysis of feedback data received by the Department;

(d) A statement detailing the priority level that the Secretary-General has attached to current or future activities of the Department in documents dealing with such activities;

(e) The Department's evaluation of the effectiveness of its different programmes and activities, with particular reference to the need constantly to review internal programme elements and activities;

(40) The steps taken by the Department of Public Information in redressing the imbalance in its staff should be noted. The Department should continue its efforts to that end. The Secretary-General should take appropriate steps to increase the representation of underrepresented developing countries and of other underrepresented groups of countries, especially at the senior levels, in conformity with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, and to submit a report to the Committee on Information at its substantive session in 1987;

(41) Member States should be called upon once again to make voluntary contributions to the United Nations Trust Fund for Economic and Social Information;

(42) The assessment contained in the report of the Secretary-General on the present system of charging Member States and the media for video tapes, audio tapes and news photographs of important United Nations events should be noted, and the Department of Public Information should report to the Committee on Information at its substantive session in 1987 on that subject with a view to reducing appropriately the final cost of these materials and spreading overtime charges legitimately incurred in an equitable way so as to enable the media in the Member States to give wider publicity to the aims and activities of the United Nations. Every effort must be made to reduce the cost of this activity to the United Nations;

(43) It is again requested that the Secretary-General submit his final report on the role of the Department of Public Information as the focal point of all information activities of the United Nations, and it is recommended that no new information units independent of the Department be created in the Secretariat;

(44) Note is taken of the report on the implementation of recommendations to improve the distribution of taped radio programmes produced by the Department of Public Information in New York and the Department is requested to take steps to improve their distribution, to examine its current effectiveness and to report to the Committee at its substantive session in 1987. In this connection, the Department of Public Information should review its decision to curtail certain radio programmes and explore ways and means to resume them as early as possible;

(45) Note is taken of the report on the programme and activities of the Joint United Nations Information Committee, and the Secretary-General is urged to continue his efforts to secure a sound and stable financial basis for Development Forum, the only inter-agency publication of the United Nations system that concentrates on development issues. The Secretary-General should continue to ensure that Development Forum retains its editorial policy of intellectual independence, thus enabling this publication to continue to serve as a world-wide forum in which diverse opinions on issues relating to economic and social development can be freely expressed;

(46) The quality, usefulness and coverage of the daily press releases and the weekly news summary issued by the Department of Public Information in all working languages should be further enhanced and improved in view of the important public information tasks that they can perform. Services provided by the Press Section of the Department both for the media and the delegations should be improved. The Department should continue to co-operate closely with and provide assistance to the United Nations Correspondents Association;

(47) The Department of Public Information should improve the timely distribution of its materials to subscribers and United Nations information centres, particularly the UN Chronicle, a major source of information on the United Nations to its recipients, and to reassess the effectiveness of this publication and to report to the Committee on Information at its substantive session in 1987;

(48) The Secretary-General should be encouraged to continue and intensify his efforts to explore all possibilities of securing the adequate resources for the continuation of the World Newspaper Supplement project;

(49) The Joint United Nations Information Committee, as the essential instrument for inter-agency co-ordination and co-operation in the field of public information, should be further strengthened and given more responsibility for the public information activities of the entire United Nations system;

(50) It is recognized that free distribution of materials is necessary in the public information activities of the United Nations, but, as demands increase and whenever it is desirable and possible, the Department of Public Information should actively encourage the sale of its materials;

(51) Note is taken of the report on the review of the distribution of photo materials produced by the Department of Public Information in New York and the implementation of the recommendations contained in that report is urged;

2. Requests that the recommendations relating to the activities of the Department of Public Information of the Secretariat be implemented within existing resources;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Committee on Information, at its substantive session in 1987, on the implementation of the above recommendations;

4. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-second session on the implementation of the present resolution;

5. Requests the Committee on Information to report to the General Assembly at its forty-second session;

6. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-second session the item entitled "Questions relating to information".

3 December 1986 Meeting 95 148-1-4 (recorded vote)

Approved by SPC (A/41/753) by recorded vote (117-1-4), 28 November (meeting 38); draft by Chairman of working group on questions relating to information (A/SPC/41/L31), orally amended; agenda item 74.

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: SPC 20-26, 38; plenary 95.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Cote d'Ivoire, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: United States.

Abstaining: Canada, Israel, Malawi, United Kingdom.

Before acting on the draft as a whole, the Committee adopted, by a recorded vote of 100 to 9, with 12 abstentions, an oral amendment by Poland to add a new paragraph as recommendation 17, on the 1978 Declaration on the Preparation of Societies for Life in Peace⁽¹³⁾

The Netherlands protested, and the Federal Republic of Germany deplored, that an earlier request by the Netherlands for a separate vote on recommendation 1 had not been complied with.

A number of countries—Denmark, Finland, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, the Netherlands, Norway and Sweden—said they would have abstained on paragraph 1(1), had a separate vote been taken, as they considered it not in line with the 1985 UNESCO General Conference resolution on the topic. Israel said it would have voted against the paragraph. Mexico, on the other hand, said nothing would be gained from voting separately on a paragraph of a compromise text designed to harmonize positions. The German Democratic Republic declared that information flows had to strengthen peace, and that view was reflected in paragraph 1(1).

The United States said it could not support or accept the establishment of a new world information and communication order as formulated in paragraph 1, the addition of various UNESCO resolutions containing anti-free press prescriptions, and the continued unwarranted presence of selective political recommendations in the report of the Committee on Information. Canada, the Netherlands and the United States said the recommendations should have focused on the public information policies of the United Nations and the impartial reporting by DPI of United Nations activities. Similarly, the United Kingdom said the draft should have presented an orderly list of priorities commensurate with the United Nations financial situation and a proper assessment of DPI's role; it added that the draft did not accurately reflect the UNESCO position on the new world information and communication order and fell short of avoiding the selective introduction of contentious political issues. Canada stated that the Committee on Information and the Assembly should recognize the consensus achieved in UNESCO with respect to a new world information and communication order and avoid texts which infringed on the mandates of other organizations, such as ITU. Israel could not support a resolution under which DPI was misused to foster anti-Semitism.

Denmark and the United States said the draft had been improved in 1986 by recognizing a new world information order as an evolving and continuous process. Spain said the draft should serve as the basis for a consensus at the 1987 Assembly session.

On 3 December, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/68 C without vote, thereby increasing the membership of the Committee on Information from 69 to 70 and appointing Malta as a new member.

DPI activities

In 1986, DPI continued to act as a focal point for formulating and implementing United Nations information activities, through the use of various media at its disposal, including radio, visual and publications services, and information centres (for details, see below under the respective headings).

Responding to a 1985 General Assembly request⁽¹⁴⁾ the Secretariat submitted to the Committee on Information in April a note on DPI efforts to recruit nationals from developing countries in order to achieve a more balanced geographical distribution of its staff⁽¹⁵⁾ The percentage of staff in posts subject to geographical distribution on 1 January 1986 (as against 1 January 1985) was as follows: Africa, 17.6 (18.9); Asia and the Pacific, 16.8 (15.6); Europe (Eastern), 7.6 (8.9); Europe (Western), 19.8 (18.6); Latin America, 8 (7.2); Middle East, 4.6 (5.1); North America and the Caribbean, 25.6 (25.7).

The Secretary-General reported to the Committee, in May, on the improvement of data-collection procedures in the redissemination of photo materials distributed by DPI and its information centres⁽¹⁶⁾

After examining United Nations public information policies and activities, the Committee on Information(1) recommended that DPI should continue to give support to the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations; maintain editorial independence and accuracy, as in the past; improve the quality, usefulness and coverage of the daily press release and weekly news summary; use the official languages of the General Assembly adequately in its written and audio-visual documentation; and widen the coverage of the economic, social and development activities of the United Nations system. It also recommended that DPI should aim at a timely distribution of its materials, particularly the UN Chronicle; that the resources of the United Nations system should be pooled in support of Development Forum and Development Business; and that the Secretary-General should continue to ensure that Development Forum retained its intellectual independence.

Further, DPI should ensure appropriate use of the daily dispatches of the Pool of Non-Aligned News Agencies, and should co-operate with the Pool and UNESCO in organizing a 1987 workshop to familiarize the news agencies of developing countries with modern technology and to produce training manuals for the Pool's training centres. In addition, the World Disarmament Campaign should consider the role of the mass media as the most effective way to promote the understanding conducive to peace and disarmament, human rights and development. The mass media should not be used as an instrument of hostility against the sovereignty of other States.

The Secretary-General, also in response to a 1985 Assembly resolution⁽¹⁴⁾ submitted a report⁽¹⁷⁾ to the Assembly in September 1986 on the implementation of the Committee's 1985 recommendations, dealing with, among other things, short-wave broadcasting (see below), co-operation with the Pool of Non-Aligned News Agencies, activities relating to the African crisis, the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations, the annual training programme for journalists and broadcasters, the fellowship programme for educators, the European radio unit (see below), and dissemination of information on acts of terrorism.

Radio and Visual Services Division

The Committee on Information(1) recommended in 1986 that DPI should examine ways to resume short-wave broadcasting for which the Department used to buy time on a rental basis, and that the assessment by the Secretary-General⁽¹⁸⁾ relating to acquisition by the United Nations of its own communications satellite should be kept under review. It also recommended the strengthening of audio/visual programmes in the Caribbean, Europe and the Middle East.

In an addendum to his September report⁽¹⁷⁾ the Secretary-General stated that, as a result of a DPI search for broadcasting organizations in developing countries willing to take on free-of-charge short-wave broadcasting of weekly United Nations news programmes, two organizations agreed and regular transmissions began on 19 September 1986—Radio Beijing, in Bengali, Chinese and English to North-East Asia, South Asia, South-East Asia and the South Pacific; and the Voice of Nigeria, in Arabic, English, French and Swahili to various parts of Africa. Efforts continued for similar arrangements for the Middle East and Latin America. In the absence of a major regional short-wave broadcaster in the Caribbean, arrangements were made with the Caribbean News Agency in Barbados to transmit weekly United Nations news programmes in English by radio circuit to 21 stations in the region; those transmissions also started on 19 September.

The results of a 1985 experiment and a survey to ascertain the viability of daily short-wave broadcasts from United Nations Headquarters⁽¹⁹⁾ were considered in a May 1986 report by the Secretary-General⁽²⁰⁾ The survey in six African capitals indicated that there would be a potential audience for a short-wave network owned and operated by the United Nations, but it was concluded that the establishment of such a system might not be possible under the Organization's current financial circumstances. The Secretary-General also reported that, following a notice by Voice of America that its transmitter rental rate to DPI would be increased from $30 to $179 per transmitter hour beginning in January 1986, the weekly short-wave broadcasts from Headquarters were discontinued as of 6 January. DPI continued to provide broadcasters around the world with taped programmes (sent by mail) and telephone news bulletins.

Regarding the European Unit in the Radio Service, the Secretary-General reported that the United Nations financial crisis had forced suspension of short-wave newscasts in English, French, Turkish, Greek and Hebrew, as well as of programming previously undertaken by outside contractors in Greek, Hebrew and Serbo-Croat.

In response to a 1985 General Assembly resolution⁽¹⁴⁾ the Secretariat⁽²¹⁾ reported that in order to improve the distribution of taped radio programmes produced by DPI, contacts between DPI and broadcasting organizations had been intensified, resulting in suggestions about the format and periodicity of programmes, their subject-matter and particular audience interests. In another note⁽²²⁾ the Secretariat dealt with the question of charges to Member States and the media for United Nations video tapes, audio tapes and news photographs.

As recommended by the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination (CPC) in 1983,⁽²³⁾ the Secretary-General reported on an evaluation study conducted by DPI on photograph distribution⁽²⁴⁾ and made recommendations on better meeting the needs of end-users and conducting a resource/management study of the DPI Photo Section.

UN information centres and services

In 1986, the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly a report of the Joint Inspection Unit on the location of United Nations information centres (UNICs).⁽²⁵⁾ The report covered UNICs as conductors of information, some of their organizational and financial aspects, and criteria for the location of new centres. It noted that, as at mid-1985, 66 UNICs served 153 countries, or 70 per cent of world population, and that the effectiveness of service was impeded by shortcomings in communications and by a scarcity of financial resources. The Inspector suggested that a careful review should be made of the various conditions and available resources before deciding on opening a new UNIC.

Commenting on the report, the Secretary-General⁽²⁶⁾ said that the criteria suggested could be used to evaluate the feasibility of new centres or the viability of existing ones. He noted that the centres' major problems were the speed with which they obtained information from Headquarters and the inadequacy of financial and other resources; asserted that a centre that was not performing satisfactorily would have to be phased out; and agreed that an evaluation of the centres' audience and state of communications should be undertaken.

The Committee on Information⁽¹⁾ recommended that UNICs should continue to assist the information media in their respective countries and promote the establishment of a new world information and communication order. It also recommended that while co-operation between DPI and the United Nations Development Programme in the field should be promoted, it was important to bear in mind the functions of the centres as distinct from those of United Nations development activities.

Programme evaluation

The Secretary-General submitted two reports to CPC in 1986 on information activities and programmes.

In a March report,⁽²⁷⁾ he described the mandates, programme outputs and resources devoted to United Nations public information activities for 1984-1985 and 1986-1987. He noted that other offices in addition to DPI had received public information mandates from intergovernmental committees, which felt that their secretariats would be able to produce materials without being bound by the same constraints as DPI. Separate information units existed for several United Nations programmes, such as the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat), the United Nations Environment Programme, the World Food Council, UNHCR and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development. The regional commissions often operated also as a United Nations information service at the regional level.

The Secretary-General noted, as examples of mechanisms for the co-ordination of public information activities, thematic task forces, composed of representatives of DPI and of substantive departments, and the Joint United Nations Information Committee (see below), a subsidiary body of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination. Tables contained in the report described the mandates, programme outputs and resources devoted to public information activities, and the distribution of resources allocated to such activities among the major areas of the United Nations work programme. The Secretary-General concluded that a significant portion of public information activities (15.4 per cent in 1984-1985 and an estimated 14.1 per cent in 1986-1987) was carried out outside DPI, particularly in areas related to disarmament, peace-keeping and peace-making, decolonization, refugees, disaster relief assistance and Namibia.

In April, the Secretary-General submitted a triennial review⁽²⁸⁾ of the implementation of CPC recommendations based on a 1983 evaluation of the work of DPI⁽²⁹⁾ The first part of the report reviewed the follow-up to recommendations concerning end-users, target audiences, feedback mechanisms and impact; the second part reviewed recommendations made by CPC in 1977.⁽³⁰⁾ The Secretary-General found that the attention of DPI and information centre staff had not been drawn specifically to CPC's 1977 and 1983 recommendations, nor had they been reviewed by senior management in the context of existing mandates or the approved programme of work. Also apparent was a tendency for work to be oriented towards the mandates of the most proximate intergovernmental body rather than to those of a programming body. The Secretary-General suggested that DPI might be asked to consider a clearer enunciation of the goals of the management information system, a monitoring system that measured actual outputs against programmed activities, clarification and standardization of terminology, such as "end-users", and more timely publications.

CPC consideration. In May, CPC⁽³¹⁾ expressed concern about the lack of implementation of its 1983 recommendations,⁽³²⁾ which had called for the assessment of the impact of DPI products and services and the identification and reaction of end-users. It made further recommendations regarding those matters as well as feedback mechanisms, balance between production and dissemination of outputs, electronic media and radio services, and press releases.

Taking note of the Secretary-General's report on public information activities,⁽²⁷⁾ CPC reiterated that no new information units should be created within the United Nations Secretariat.

Co-ordination in the UN system

JUNIC activities. Information activities in the United Nations system continued to be co-ordinated by the inter-agency Joint United Nations Information Committee (JUNIC). At its thirteenth session (Geneva, 8-11 April 1986)⁽³³⁾ JUNIC considered guidelines for responding to criticism of the United Nations system; an information programme on the critical economic situation in Africa; and the operations of the publications Development Forum and Development Business. It also discussed the work of the Non-Governmental Liaison Services (Geneva and New York), which dealt with non-governmental organizations in the industrialized countries concerned with issues of international economic development and co-operation; the JUNIC Ad Hoc Working Group on Audio-Visual Matters; development information meetings; and international conferences and years.

Noting that the United Nations system continued to experience diverse and often ill-informed criticism, JUNIC called for a greater and more co-ordinated effort to ensure accurate accounting to the public, rapid correction of erroneous assertions and more effective presentation of United Nations accomplishments. JUNIC recommended, among others, that senior officials respond to requests for debate in public forums and media on both the shortcomings and achievements of their organizations.

A JUNIC action plan for 1986-1987, annexed to the report, provided a framework for a number of high-priority activities in which the United Nations information services could co-operate. Ongoing joint projects under JUNIC auspices included the publication of Development Forum, financially supported by 17 organizations; special services to non-governmental groups in the industrialized countries on development issues; development education projects to deepen public understanding of those issues; development information meetings; technical co-operation on audio-visual matters; and co-ordination by a JUNIC task force of the financial, architectural, design and other aspects of United Nations participation in international expositions. The United Nations system took part in the Vancouver (British Columbia, Canada) Expo 1986, under the theme "Peace through communication".

In the light of the work at the session, JUNIC submitted a report⁽³³⁾ on its programme and activities to the Committee on Information.

Action by the Committee on Information. The Committee on Information⁽¹⁾ noted the JUNIC report on its programme⁽³³⁾ particularly in regard to Development Forum as the only inter-agency publication that concentrated on development issues. It recommended that the Secretary-General ensure its continued publication, that the United Nations system pool its resources in support of both Development Forum and Development Business, and that any attempt in the system to duplicate the functions performed by those publications should be avoided.

International Year of Peace

In a statement adopted in response to a 1985 General Assembly resolution⁽³⁴⁾ on the 1986 International Year of Peace (see also Chapter IV of this section), the Committee on Information⁽¹⁾ emphasized the important influence of information and communication on international relations and co-operation, and expressed its intention to contribute, within its areas of competence, to the achievement of positive results in international co-operation aimed at promoting peace.

Mobilization of popular support

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

In commemoration of the fortieth anniversary in 1986 of the establishment of the World Federation of United Nations Associations—a non-governmental organization dedicated to informing the general public about the United Nations and thus mobilizing popular support for the activities of the Organization—the General Assembly, on 3 December, adopted resolution 41/68 D without vote, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee.

The General Assembly,

Recalling the Charter of the United Nations, which sets out in its preamble the principles and purposes for which "we the peoples of the United Nations" are to strive,

Reaffirming that the United Nations cannot achieve the purposes for which it has been created unless the peoples of the world are fully aware of its aims and activities,

Recalling its resolution 137(II) of 17 November 1947, in which, inter alia, the Assembly considered that the knowledge and understanding of the aims and activities of the United Nations are essential in promoting and assuring general interest and popular support of its work,

Noting that the World Federation of United Nations Associations, which commemorates its fortieth anniversary in 1986, was established by people from all parts of the world motivated by the ideas of the Charter, as a movement dedicated to the promotion of such understanding and support,

Noting that the Federation is the only international non-governmental organization which devotes itself entirely to building support for the purposes and principles of the United Nations,

Acknowledging with great satisfaction the efforts of thousands of individuals voluntarily working to promote the purposes and principles of the United Nations through United Nations associations around the world,

Considering the sustained programmes and numerous activities of the Federation and United Nations associations during the last four decades in pursuit of these objectives,

1. Commends the World Federation of United Nations Associations and United Nations associations for the valuable contribution they have made during the past forty years through their activities in the mobilization of popular support for the programmes and work of the United Nations;

2. Expresses the wish that the Federation and United Nations associations will have continued success in their efforts to inform the general public about the United Nations at the national and international levels;

3. Calls upon all Governments and peoples to encourage and help the World Federation of United Nations Associations through their local United Nations associations to expand and develop the pursuit of the goals to which the Member States have committed themselves.

Departmental News Service

In May 1986⁽¹⁾ the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly an evaluation, by the Secretariat's Administrative Management Service, of the News Service of the Department of Political and Security Council Affairs. The evaluation considered the history and mandate of the Service, its objectives, outputs, staffing, redeployments, costs and 24-hour wire-service monitoring. It recommended, among other things, continuing the News Service, reducing the number of daily bulletins from four to two, integrating the weekly news summary activities with those in DPI and the Office for Field Operational and External Support Activities, increasing the circulation of raw wire-service print-outs from three to four times daily, and monitoring wire-service outputs on a 24-hour basis, including weekends and holidays. It recommended that the internal press clipping service and preparation of special topic reports be discontinued.

The Secretary-General considered the recommendations to be sound; however, he felt that reducing the number of daily bulletins might detract from their value based on timeliness, and expressed preference for reduction by only one.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 11 December, on the recommendation of the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee, the General Assembly adopted by recorded vote section V of resolution 41/209.

News Service of the Department of Political and Security Council Affairs

(The General Assembly . . .)

Approves the continuation in 1987 of the News Service of the Department of Political and Security Council Affairs;

General Assembly resolution 41/209, section V

11 December 1986 Meeting 101 124-11-10 (recorded vote)

Approved by Fifth Committee (A/41/954) by recorded vote (88-9-7), 24 November (meeting 34); oral proposal by Chairman; agenda item 110.

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 5th Committee 29, 34; plenary 101.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Finland, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Afghanistan,^a Australia, Belgium, France, Germany, Federal Republic of Israel, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Canada, Central African Republic, Denmark, Iceland, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Turkey.

^aLater advised the Secretariat it had intended to vote in favour.

Prior to approving the text, the Committee rejected, by a recorded vote of 60 to 13, with 27 abstentions, an oral proposal by Belgium that would have approved an appropriation of $257,000 for 1986-1987 in respect of the News Service, on the understanding that the Secretary-General would consider reducing the costs relating to the Service, study the optimal location for the Service within the Secretariat and, should that location require a transfer of credits between sections of the budget, seek the prior concurrence of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ).

In approving the proposals in the report of the Secretary-General⁽²⁾ agreed to by ACABQ⁽³⁾ for the continuation in 1987 of the News Service, the Fifth Committee appropriated an additional $288,600 in the programme budget for 1986-1987.

Zone of peace

In 1986, the General Assembly took up an item on a zone of peace and co-operation of the South Atlantic, at the request of Brazil. In making that request on 29 May⁽¹⁾ Brazil urged the United Nations to examine the topic with a view to keeping the region free from tensions derived from interests alien to the developing countries on both the Latin American and African coastlines.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 27 October, the General Assembly adopted by recorded vote resolution 41/11.

Zone of peace and co-operation of the South Atlantic

The General Assembly,

Conscious of the determination of the peoples of the States of the South Atlantic region to preserve their independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity and to develop their relations under conditions of peace and liberty,

Convinced of the importance of promoting peace and co-operation in the South Atlantic for the benefit of all mankind and, in particular, of the peoples of the region,

Convinced further of the need to preserve the region from measures of militarization, the arms race, the presence of foreign military bases and, above all, nuclear weapons,

Recognizing the special interest and responsibility of the States of the region to promote regional co-operation for economic development and peace,

Fully conscious that the independence of Namibia and the elimination of the racist regime of apartheid are conditions essential to guaranteeing the peace and security of the South Atlantic,

Recalling the principles and norms of international law applicable to ocean space, in particular the principle of the peaceful uses of the oceans,

Convinced that the establishment of a zone of peace and co-operation in the South Atlantic would contribute significantly to the strengthening of international peace and security and to promoting the principles and purposes of the United Nations,

1. Solemnly declares the Atlantic Ocean, in the region situated between Africa and South America, a "Zone of peace and co-operation of the South Atlantic";

2. Calls upon all States of the zone of the South Atlantic to promote further regional co-operation, inter alia, for social and economic development, the protection of the environment, the conservation of living resources and the peace and security of the whole region;

3. Calls upon all States of all other regions, in particular the militarily significant States, scrupulously to respect the region of the South Atlantic as a zone of peace and co-operation, especially through the reduction and eventual elimination of their military presence there, the non-introduction of nuclear weapons or other weapons of mass destruction and the non-extension into the region of rivalries and conflicts that are foreign to it;

4. Calls upon all States of the region and of all other regions to co-operate in the elimination of all sources of tension in the zone, to respect the national unity, sovereignty, political independence and territorial integrity of every State therein, to refrain from the threat or use of force, and to observe strictly the principle that the territory of a State shall not be the object of military occupation resulting from the use of force in violation of the Charter of the United Nations, as well as the principle that the acquisition of territories by force is inadmissible;

5. Reaffirms that the elimination of apartheid and the attainment of self-determination and independence by the people of Namibia, as well as the cessation of all acts of aggression and subversion against States in the zone, are essential for peace and security in the South Atlantic region, and urges the implementation of all United Nations resolutions pertaining to colonialism, racism and apartheid;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its forty-second session a report on the situation in the South Atlantic and the implementation of the present declaration, taking into account the views expressed by Member States;

7. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-second session the item entitled "Zone of peace and co-operation of the South Atlantic".

27 October 1986 Meeting 50 124-1-8 (recorded vote)

17-nation draft (A/41/L.11 & Add.1); agenda item 139.

Sponsors: Angola, Argentina, Bangladesh, Brazil, Cape Verde, Congo, Cote d'Ivoire, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Ghana, Guinea-Bissau, Liberia, Nepal, Nigeria, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Uruguay.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Cote d'Ivoire, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Finland, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Nepal, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sunname, Sweden, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zimbabwe

Against: United States.

Abstaining: Belgium, France, Germany, Federal Republic of Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Portugal.

The United States said the resolution inadequately defined the waters to be covered, specifically excluded the littoral and hinterland States of the region from the zone, and attempted to create an internationally recognized zone of peace through an Assembly resolution rather than multilateral negotiations. The United Kingdom understood the zone to consist of the South Atlantic Ocean between Africa and South America not covered by treaty; it added that the resolution did not affect its rights and obligations under treaties—such as the Protocols to the Treaty for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America—or general international law. France stated that the resolution provided no adequate guarantees for freedom of navigation on the high seas and was ambiguous as to the limits of the zone, the States to which the obligations would apply and the nature of the obligations. The Federal Republic of Germany also considered the zone's definition ambiguous; it was joined by Israel, Spain and the United States in saying that the resolution could not presuppose any changes in the norms and principles of international law, such as freedom of navigation on the high seas or the law of the sea.

Reservations to the resolutions mentioned in paragraph 5 were expressed by Canada, Israel, Sweden (on behalf of the Nordic countries), the United Kingdom and the United States. On the other hand, Argentina and the USSR, saying that a tense situation still existed in the South Atlantic over the Falkland Islands (Malvinas), called for a peaceful settlement of the dispute on the basis of existing General Assembly resolutions. (See also TRUSTEESHIP AND DECOLONIZATION, Chapter IV.)

Algeria would have liked the text to include reaffirmation of the right of self-determination, as it saw applicable to Namibia. Mexico saw particular significance in paragraph 3 in the context of Namibia's independence.

Radiation effects

A comprehensive report entitled Genetic and Somatic Effects of Ionizing Radiation⁽¹⁾ was submitted to the General Assembly in 1986 by the United Nations

Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation (UNSCEAR)⁽²⁾. In preparation since 1982 and finalized at the Committee's thirty-fifth session (Vienna, 14-18 April 1986), the report contained reviews of three topics in the area of biological effects of ionizing radiation—genetic effects of radiation, dose-response relationships for radiation-induced cancer, and biological effects of pre-natal irradiation.

Recent advances relevant to the evaluation of genetic radiation hazards in man were reviewed, including the identification of the prevalence of naturally occurring monogenic, chromosomal and other disorders; the use of recombinant deoxyribonucleic acid (DNA) technology for analysing human genetic material; the relationships between gene mutations, chromosomal aberrations and cancer; the role of movable genetic elements in the production of spontaneous mutations and their implications for estimating the genetic risk; and other data relating to quantifying genetic hazards and detriment in man. As a result of that analysis, the Committee believed the assessment of radiation-induced genetic risk contained in its 1982 report⁽³⁾ remained broadly valid.

The Committee also examined the nature of the dose-response relationships for a variety of cellular and sub-cellular radiobiological effects in vitro and in vivo—an exercise seen as an important preliminary step towards re-evaluating the risk estimates for radiation-induced cancer, which the Committee planned to release in the future.

In considering the biological effects of pre-natal irradiation, the Committee reviewed the following: modern knowledge of developmental events, particularly in the brain of mammalian embryos and fetuses; recent data on effects induced by irradiation of animals in utero; and findings concerning children exposed to radiation in the womb during the atomic bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Those, and a large body of older data, were used to derive quantitative estimates of risk for a number of radiation effects in utero, such as death, malformations, severe mental retardation and cancer. For the small doses and dose rates of radiation likely to be encountered in practice, the risk was judged to be small in comparison with the natural incidence of congenital anomalies in non-irradiated individuals.

An appendix to the report listed the research reports received by the Committee, between 11 November 1982 and 18 April 1986, from Member States, members of the specialized agencies and of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), and from those agencies themselves. The information received by the Committee was supplemented by other data available in the current scientific literature or, in rare cases, from unpublished communications of individual scientists.

Communications. On 25 August⁽⁴⁾ China informed the Secretary-General that it had applied for UNSCEAR membership and requested him to transmit the application to the General Assembly for consideration. In its application, dated 19 August and annexed to the letter, China stated that nuclear energy and isotopes were used extensively in industry, agriculture, medicine and other areas, and that it had become a designated member of the IAEA Board of Governors since achieving full membership in the Agency in 1984.

By a 22 September letter⁽⁵⁾ to the Secretary-General, the United Kingdom transmitted a memorandum, which addressed, among other things, the question of nuclear safety (see ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL QUESTIONS, Chapter IX).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 3 December, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted two resolutions under the agenda item on the effects of atomic radiation. It adopted resolution 41/62 A without vote.

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 913(X) of 3 December 1955, by which it established the United Nations Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation, and its subsequent resolutions on the subject, including resolution 40/160 of 16 December 1985, by which it, inter alia, requested the Scientific Committee to continue its work,

Taking note with appreciation of the report of the United Nations Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation, Reaffirming the desirability of the Scientific Committee continuing its work,

Concerned about the potentially harmful effects on present and future generations, resulting from the levels of radiation to which man is exposed,

Conscious of the continued need to examine and compile information about atomic and ionizing radiation and to analyse its effects on man and his environment,

Bearing in mind the decision of the Scientific Committee to submit, as soon as the relevant studies are completed, shorter reports with scientific supporting documents on the specialized topics mentioned by the Committee,

1. Commends the United Nations Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation for the valuable contribution it has been making in the course of the past thirty-one years, since its inception, to wider knowledge and understanding of the levels, effects and risks of atomic radiation and for fulfilling its original mandate with scientific authority and independence of judgement;

2. Notes with satisfaction the continued and growing scientific co-operation between the Scientific Committee and the United Nations Environment Programme;

3. Requests the Scientific Committee to continue its work, including its important co-ordinating activities, to increase knowledge of the levels, effects and risks of ionizing radiation from all sources;

4. Endorses the Scientific Committee's intentions and plans for its future activities of scientific review and assessment on behalf of the General Assembly;

5. Requests the Scientific Committee to continue at its next session the review of the important problems in the field of radiation and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its forty-second session;

6. Requests the United Nations Environment Programme to continue providing support for the effective conduct of the Scientific Committee's work and for the dissemination of its findings to the General Assembly, the scientific community and the public;

7. Expresses its appreciation for the assistance rendered to the Scientific Committee by Member States, the specialized agencies, the International Atomic Energy Agency and non-governmental organizations, and invites them to increase their co-operation in this field;

8. Invites Member States, the organizations of the United Nations system and non-governmental organizations concerned to provide further relevant data about doses, effects and risks from various sources of radiation, which would greatly help in the preparation of the Scientific Committee's future reports to the General Assembly.

General Assembly resolution 41/62 A

3 December 1986 Meeting 95 Adopted without vote

Approved by SPC (A/41/730) without vote, 9 October (meeting 4); 28-nation draft (A/SPC/41/L.3); agenda item 70.

Sponsors: Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bangladesh, Canada, China, Costa Rica, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Egypt, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, India, Indonesia, Japan, Libyan Arab Jamahanya, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nigeria, Oman, Poland, Swaziland, Sweden, USSR, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay.

The Assembly also adopted resolution 41/62 B without vote.

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 913(X) of 3 December 1955, by which it established the United Nations Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation, and its subsequent resolutions on the subject, including resolution 3154 C (XXVIII) of 14 December 1973, by which it decided to increase the membership of the Scientific Committee to a maximum of twenty,

Recognizing the valuable contribution made by the Scientific Committee to wider knowledge and understanding of the levels and effects of atomic radiation,

Conscious of the continued need for the Governments of Member States to commit themselves to giving to the Scientific Committee the greatest possible co-operation in order that its work may be more effective,

Emphasizing, in this connection, that the five permanent members of the Security Council are in a position to make particularly valuable contributions to the work of the Committee,

Noting with satisfaction that the People's Republic of China desires to become a member of the Scientific Committee,

Convinced that the participation of the People's Republic of China will enhance the effectiveness of the Scientific Committee,

1. Decides to increase the membership of the United Nations Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation to a maximum of twenty-one;

2. Invites the People's Republic of China to become a member of the Scientific Committee, requesting the Government of that country to designate one scientist, with alternates and consultants as appropriate, to be its representative in the Committee.

General Assembly resolution 41/62 B

3 December 1986 Meeting 95 Adopted without vote

Approved by SPC (A/41/730) without vote, 9 October (meeting 4); 20-nation draft (A/SPC/41/L.4); agenda item 70.

Sponsors: Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, India, Indonesia, Japan, Mexico, Peru, Poland, Sudan, Sweden, USSR, United Kingdom, United States.
Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: SPC 3, 4; plenary 95.

Antarctica

Reports of the Secretary-General. Two reports on the question of Antarctica were submitted by the Secretary-General to the General Assembly in 1986.

In October⁽¹⁾ in response to a 1985 Assembly resolution⁽²⁾ inviting the Antarctic Treaty Consultative Parties to inform the Secretary-General of their negotiations to establish a regime regarding Antarctic minerals, he reported that he had received on 30 April a communication from Australia on behalf of the Consultative Parties (Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Chile, China, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, India, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, South Africa, USSR, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay). Australia recalled that, when the Assembly considered the topic in 1985, the Parties had made it clear that consideration of Antarctica could proceed only on the basis of consensus, that they would be compelled to reconsider their further participation in the item unless consensus could be restored, and that they were not responding to the 1985 resolutions, in the adoption of which they did not participate. The Australian reply was issued as an addendum⁽³⁾ to the Secretary-General's report.

The Secretary-General also submitted a report in November⁽⁴⁾ in response to a 1985 Assembly resolution⁽⁵⁾ requesting that he update and expand a 1984 study on all aspects of Antarctica⁽⁶⁾ with the co-operation of Member States and the relevant specialized agencies and bodies of the United Nations system, as well as intergovernmental and non-governmental bodies. As at 30 June 1986, replies had been received from six Member States with reference to the 1985 resolution, and communications from three States with reference to Antarctica and the 1984 study.

The updated study examined the involvement of the relevant specialized agencies and intergovernmental organizations in the 1959 Antarctic Treaty system, the availability to the United Nations of information from the Consultative Parties on their activities regarding Antarctica, the significance of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea in the Southern Ocean, and issues of sovereignty and jurisdiction.

Communications. During 1986, several communications on Antarctica were transmitted to the Secretary-General.

On 16 October⁽⁷⁾ Belgium submitted a copy of the report of the 1985 Antarctic Treaty Consultative Meeting in the four official languages (English, French, Russian, Spanish) of the Antarctic Treaty system.

Australia, on 13 November⁽⁸⁾ transmitted a statement made by the Chairman at the conclusion of the ninth session of the Special Consultative Meeting on Antarctic Mineral Resources (Tokyo, 27 October-12 November). The Chairman stated that the negotiations going on since 1982 among the Antarctic Treaty countries were aimed at ensuring that, in the event mineral activities took place in Antarctica, they would be regulated legally in an acceptable manner without threat to peace and stability or to the environment. He explained that the negotiations had reached a very detailed stage, with the bulk of the work being conducted in working groups. One group was examining some of the practical elements of the open regime; another was discussing provisions for monitoring and inspection, compliance and enforcement, dispute settlement and liability for damage. Informal discussion was continuing on key institutional issues.

On 15 May⁽⁹⁾ India transmitted the final documents of the Ministerial Meeting of the Coordinating Bureau of Non-Aligned Countries (New Delhi, 16-19 April), in which the Ministers reiterated that the interest of the international community in Antarctica could be enhanced by keeping the United Nations fully informed of developments there; affirmed that all Member States of the United Nations had a valid interest in the exploitation of Antarctic resources; and urged the Antarctic Treaty Consultative Parties to exclude South Africa from their meetings. A similar statement was made at the Eighth Summit Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries (Harare, Zimbabwe, 1-6 September)⁽¹⁰⁾

On 4 December, on the recommendation of the First Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolutions 41/88 A, B and C, each by roll-call vote, on the question of Antarctica.

A

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 38/77 of 15 December 1983, 39/152 of 17 December 1984 and 40/156 A of 16 December 1985,

Having considered the item entitled "Question of Antarctica",
Welcoming the increasing international awareness of and interest in Antarctica,

Bearing in mind the Antarctic Treaty and the significance of the system it has developed,

Taking into account the debate on this item at its forty-first session,

Convinced of the advantages of a better knowledge of Antarctica,

Affirming the conviction that, in the interest of all mankind, Antarctica should continue for ever to be used exclusively for peaceful purposes and that it should not become the scene or object of international discord,

Recalling the relevant paragraphs of the Political Declaration adopted by the Eighth Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at Harare from 1 to 6 September 1986, and the resolution on Antarctica adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its forty-second ordinary session, held at Addis Ababa from 10 to 17 July 1985, as well as the decision of the Council of Ministers of the League of Arab States held at Tunis on 17 and 18 September 1986,

Conscious of the significance of Antarctica to the international community in terms, inter alia, of international peace and security, economy, environment, scientific research and meteorology,

Recognizing, therefore, the interest of mankind as a whole in Antarctica,

Taking into account the provisions of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea,

Noting with appreciation the expanded study on the question of Antarctica submitted by the Secretary-General,

Noting the increased flow of information from the Antarctic Treaty Consultative Parties, and expressing concern at the continuing non-availability of information to the Secretary-General on certain issues affecting the question of Antarctica,

1. Requests the Antarctic Treaty Consultative Parties to keep the Secretary-General fully informed on all aspects of the question of Antarctica so that the United Nations could function as the central repository of all such information;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to follow all aspects of the question of Antarctica and to provide an updated report thereon to the General Assembly at its forty-second session;

3. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-second session the item entitled "Question of Antarctica".

4 December 1986 Meeting 96 94-0-12 (roll-call vote)

Approved by First Committee (A/41/902) by roll-call vote (76-0-9), 19 November (meeting 51); 15-nation draft (A/C.1/41/L86); agenda item 66.

Sponsors: Antigua and Barbuda, Bangladesh, Brunei Darussalam, Burkina Faso, Congo, Ghana, Indonesia, Malaysia, Mali, Oman, Pakistan, Rwanda, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Zimbabwe.

Roll-call vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brunei Darussalam, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Comoros, Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Cyprus, Democratic Kampuchea, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Gabon, Ghana, Grenada, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Philippines, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Uganda, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Austria, Belize, Canada, China, Fiji, Ireland, Luxembourg, Peru, Portugal, Solomon Islands, Turkey, Venezuela.

B

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 38/77 of 15 December 1983, 39/152 of 17 December 1984 and 40/156 B of 16 December 1985,

Having considered the item entitled "Question of Antarctica",

Recalling the relevant paragraphs of the Political Declaration adopted by the Eighth Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at Harare from 1 to 6 September 1986, and the resolution on Antarctica adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its forty-second ordinary session, held at Addis Ababa from 10 to 17 July 1985, as well as the decision of the Council of Ministers of the League of Arab States held at Tunis on 17 and 18 September 1986,

Recognizing that the management, exploration and use of Antarctica should be conducted in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and in the interest of maintaining international peace and security and of promoting international cooperation for the benefit of mankind as a whole,

Aware that negotiations are in progress among the Antarctic Treaty Consultative Parties, with the non-Consultative Parties as observers, to which other States are not privy, with a view to establishing a regime regarding Antarctica's minerals,

1. Reaffirms that any exploitation of the resources of Antarctica should ensure the maintenance of international peace and security in Antarctica, the protection of its environment, the non-appropriation and conservation of its resources and the international management and equitable sharing of the benefits of such exploitation;

2. Calls upon the Antarctic Treaty Consultative Parties to impose a moratorium on the negotiations to establish a minerals regime until such time as all members of the international community can participate fully in such negotiations;

3. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-second session the item entitled "Question of Antarctica".

4 December 1986 Meeting 96 96-0-12 (roll-call vote)

Approved by First Committee (A/41/902) by roll-call vote (76-0-10), 19 November (meeting 51); 15-nation draft (A/C.1/41/L87); agenda item 66.

Sponsors: Antigua and Barbuda, Bangladesh, Brunei Darussalam, Burkina Faso, Congo, Ghana, Indonesia, Malaysia, Mali, Oman, Pakistan, Rwanda, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Zimbabwe.

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 1st Committee 49-51; plenary 96.

Roll-call vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brunei Darussalam, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Comoros, Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Cyprus, Democratic Kampuchea, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Gabon, Ghana, Grenada, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Philippines, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Uganda, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Austria, Bahamas, Canada, China, Fiji, Ireland, Luxembourg, Peru, Portugal, Solomon Islands, Turkey, Venezuela.

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 40/156 C of 16 December 1985,

Having considered the item entitled "Question of Antarctica",

Noting with regret that the racist apartheid regime of South Africa, which has been suspended from participation in the General Assembly of the United Nations, has continued to participate in the meetings of the Antarctic Treaty Consultative Parties,

Recalling the resolution adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its forty-second ordinary session, held at Addis Ababa from 10 to 17 July 1985,

Recalling also the relevant paragraphs of the Political Declaration adopted by the Eighth Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at Harare from 1 to 6 September 1986,

Recalling further that the Antarctic Treaty is, by its terms, intended to further the purposes and principles embodied in the Charter of the United Nations,

Noting further that the policy of apartheid practised by the racist minority regime of South Africa, which has been universally condemned, constitutes a threat to regional and international peace and security,

1. Views with concern the continuing participation of the apartheid regime of South Africa in the meetings of the Antarctic Treaty Consultative Parties;

2. Appeals once again to the Antarctic Treaty Consultative Parties to take urgent measures to exclude the racist apartheid regime of South Africa from participation in the meetings of the Consultative Parties at the earliest possible date;

3. Invites the States parties to the Antarctic Treaty to inform the Secretary-General on the actions taken regarding the provisions of the present resolution;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report in this regard to the General Assembly at its forty-second session;

5. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-second session the item entitled "Question of Antarctica".

4 December 1986 Meeting 96 119-0-8 (roll-call vote)

Approved by First Committee (A/41/902) by roll-call vote (99-1-5), 19 November (meeting 51); 54-nation draft (A/C.1/41/L88), orally revised; agenda item 66.

Sponsors: Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Bangladesh, Benin, Botswana, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Comoros, Congo, Djibouti, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Gabon, Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Kenya, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Mali, Mauritania, Mauritius, Morocco, Mozambique, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Rwanda, Sao Tome and Principe, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Swaziland, Togo, Tunisia, Uganda, United Republic of Tanzania, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Roll-call vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Abstaining: Austria, Canada, Fiji, Ireland, Luxembourg, Portugal, Solomon Islands, Turkey.

Australia, on behalf of the Antarctic Treaty Consultative Parties, declared before the First Committee vote that, generally, they would not participate in the voting on the first two of the three drafts, in expression of their disappointment at the breaking of consensus. On the third draft, they would reflect their views in ways which did not affect their position on the successful functioning of the Treaty. Requesting a roll-call vote on each of the three drafts, Australia said the parties remained convinced that the Assembly's consideration of Antarctica could proceed usefully and realistically only on the basis of consensus.

In the plenary, 42 States announced their non-participation in the vote on resolution 41/88 A. They were: Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Bulgaria, Byelorussian SSR, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Ecuador, Finland, France, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Guatemala, Hungary, Iceland, India, Israel, Italy, Japan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Poland, Seychelles, Spain, Sweden, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Kingdom, United States.

The same 42 States, with the addition of Uruguay, announced their non-participation in the vote on resolution 41/88 B, while the following 25 countries declared likewise in the vote on resolution 41/88 C: Australia, Belgium, Chile, Cote d'Ivoire, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Iceland, Israel, Italy, Japan, Lesotho, Malawi, Mauritius, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Spain, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States. Malawi noted that it was listed as a sponsor of resolution 41/88 C, although it was absent from the First Committee meetings during consideration of the agenda item; while agreeing with the objective, it could not support the tactics and methods prescribed in the text.

Chile, adding to the Australian statement on non-participation in the voting, contended that the drafts bore little relation to realities in Antarctica, to the Treaty, or to the sovereignty issue; rather, they represented what appeared to be a decision by their sponsors to maintain and widen the rupture in consensus that first emerged at the 1985 Assembly session. China regretted that consensus had not been restored; in its view, the task was to seek further improvement of the Antarctic Treaty regime, promote dialogue, prevent confrontation and restore consensus. Similarly, Canada viewed resolutions 41/88 A and B as counter-productive; it objected to the limitation of a State's right to participate in an international agreement, as proposed in the third text. Peru said it was disquieting to see an absence of willingness to negotiate for a convergence of positions and consensus.

Chapter XI

Institutional machinery

The year 1986 saw the fortieth anniversary of the first meeting of the Security Council, which, in addition to its agenda, continued to explore ways to enhance its effectiveness in accordance with the powers entrusted to it under the Charter of the United Nations.

The General Assembly held two special sessions during the year—one on the critical economic situation in Africa and the other on the question of Namibia. The Assembly resumed and concluded its fortieth session in 1986 and held the major part of its forty-first session, with 146 items on its agenda. On 19 December, the Assembly suspended that session, retaining six items and one sub-item on the agenda (decision 41/470).

In the closing report of his first term of office, the Secretary-General expressed the conviction that the Organization's effectiveness depended on the readiness of Member States to see the whole of the United Nations as the necessary structure for dealing with the problems of an interdependent world (see p. 12). On 10 October, the Assembly, on the Security Council's recommendation (resolution 589(1986)), appointed Javier Perez de Cuellar for a second five-year term of office beginning on 1 January 1987 (resolution 41/1).

During the year, the Secretary-General continued his missions of good offices in an effort to achieve a political solution to the situations involving Afghanistan, Cyprus, the Falkland Islands (Malvinas), Iran and Iraq, and Kampuchea.

In October, the Assembly requested continued co-operation between the United Nations and both the Organization of the Islamic Conference (resolution 41/3) and the League of Arab States (41/4).

As there were no new admissions to the United Nations during 1986, its membership remained at 159.

Security Council

The Security Council held 91 meetings in 1986 and adopted 13 resolutions.

Meeting numbers. SC 2640-2730.

On 17 January 1986, the President of the Security Council made a statement on behalf of the Council members, on the occasion of the fortieth anniversary of the first meeting of the Security Council and the inauguration on 1 January 1986 of the International Year of Peace (see p. 115).

In his annual report on the work of the Organization, presented to the Assembly in September (see p. 3), the Secretary-General said that, in previous reports, he had suggested measures to make the United Nations—primarily the Security Council—more effective in dealing with the threat, as well as the reality, of armed conflict. In that regard, two requirements had to be met: the permanent Council members, especially the two most powerful, had to perceive that, notwithstanding bilateral differences and distrust, it was in their national interest to co-operate within the Council and to apply their collective influence to the resolution of regional disputes; and all Member States had to perceive in greater measure that the existence of an authoritative and representative international organization capable of maintaining peace and security was in their individual as well as the common interest and that its decisions should be respected.

On 13 June 1986⁽¹⁾ the Security Council President stated that he was placing on record that the Council had held consultations on issues raised in the Secretary-General's four annual reports covering 1982 to 1985. Members had explored possible ways to enhance the Council's effectiveness in accordance with the powers entrusted to it under the Charter and the consultations were being pursued informally.

The question of enhancing the Council's role in limiting international conflict continued to be considered in 1986 by the Special Committee on the Charter of the United Nations and on the Strengthening of the Role of the Organization (see p.999).

Agenda

During 1986—its forty-first year—the Security Council considered 16 agenda items. It continued the practice of adopting at each meeting the agenda for that meeting. (For list of agenda items, see APPENDIX IV.)

Ten of the items were included for the first time⁽²⁾ They concerned complaints by the Syrian Arab Republic against Israel (one item), by Burkina Faso, Iraq, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malta, Oman, the Syrian Arab Republic and the USSR against the United States (three items), by Nicaragua against the United States (four items), by Chad against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (one item); and the situation in southern Africa.

On 17 September⁽³⁾ the Secretary-General notified the General Assembly, in accordance with Article 12, paragraph 2, of the United Nations Charter, of 20 matters relative to the maintenance of international peace and security that the Council had discussed since his previous annual notification⁽⁴⁾. He listed 111 other matters not discussed during the period but of which the Council remained seized. On 3 December,⁽⁵⁾ the Secretary-General notified the Assembly that the Council had taken two additional matters under consideration and that it had ceased to deal with one matter previously listed. By decision 41/409, the Assembly took note of those matters.

In other actions related to the Council's responsibilities for the maintenance of peace and security, the Assembly, by resolution 41/90, stressed the need to enhance the Council's effectiveness in discharging its principal role of maintaining international peace and security and its authority and enforcement capacity in accordance with the Charter. It emphasized that the Council should consider holding periodic meetings to review outstanding problems and crises, enabling it to play a more active role in preventing conflicts. The Assembly reiterated the need for the Council, particularly its permanent members, to ensure effective implementation of its decisions in compliance with the Charter. By resolution 41/38, the Assembly requested that the Council remain seized of the question of the April 1986 military attack by the United States against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and that the Secretary-General report thereon in 1987.

With regard to South Africa, by resolution 41/35 B the Assembly called on the Council urgently to take action under Chapter VII of the Charter with a view to applying comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against South Africa and urged it to strengthen its 1977 mandatory arms embargo against that country⁽⁶⁾. That action was also requested by the Assembly in resolution 41/95. In resolution 41/35 H, the Council was additionally urged to take steps for strict implementation of the arms embargo requested by it in 1984⁽⁷⁾ and to secure an end to military and nuclear co-operation with South Africa and the import of military equipment or supplies from it. Council action was requested by the Assembly in resolution 41/55 B to block existing loopholes in the 1977 arms embargo. It was also urged, in resolution 41/35 F, to impose a mandatory embargo on the supply and shipping of oil and petroleum products to South Africa.

In action with regard to Namibia, the Assembly, by resolution 41/39 A, reiterated its call for the Council to tighten the arms embargo against South Africa and ensure strict compliance. It also urged the Council to act decisively to fulfil the United Nations direct responsibility over Namibia and ensure that the United Nations independence plan for the Territory was fully respected and implemented. The Council was urged to act decisively against any action by the illegal occupation regime to frustrate the Namibian people's struggle for self-determination and national liberation and was called on to declare that Walvis Bay was an integral part of Namibia and not a question to be left for negotiation between an independent Namibia and South Africa. In view of South Africa's persistent refusal to comply with United Nations resolutions and decisions on Namibia, the Assembly strongly urged the Council to impose comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against it. That action was again urged in resolution 41/39 B.

By resolution 41/63 D, the Assembly requested the Council to ensure Israel's compliance with the provisions of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War in the Palestinian and other occupied Arab territories and to initiate measures to halt Israeli policies and practices in those territories. With regard to Israeli nuclear armament, the Assembly, in resolution 41/93, again requested the Council to ensure that Israel comply with a 1981 resolution⁽⁸⁾ and place its nuclear facilities under International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards, and to investigate Israel's nuclear activities and the collaboration of other States, parties and institutions in the nuclear field.

Members

In 1986, as in the previous four years, the question of equitable representation on the Security Council and increase in its membership was not considered. Draft resolutions, proposing an increase in membership from 15 to 21, had been discussed in 1979⁽⁹⁾ and 1980⁽¹⁰⁾ by the General Assembly, but no action had been taken.

On 19 December 1986, the Assembly decided to include the item in the provisional agenda of its forty-second (1987) session (decision 41/469).

Report for 1985/86

At a private meeting on 12 November 1986, the Security Council unanimously adopted its report covering the period 16 June 1985 to 15 June 1986.⁽¹⁾ The General Assembly took note of the report by decision 41/415 of 1 December.

General Assembly

The General Assembly met in four sessions during 1986—its resumed fortieth regular session and the major part of its forty-first, as well as its thirteenth and fourteenth special sessions.

The first part of the fortieth session had been held from 17 September to 18 December 1985.⁽¹⁾ The session resumed in 1986 from 28 April to 9 May, on 20 June and on 15 September, when it was declared closed.

The thirteenth special session on the critical economic situation in Africa was held from 27 May to 1 June and the fourteenth on the question of Namibia from 17 to 20 September.

The forty-first regular session opened on 16 September and continued until its suspension on 19 December. During the general debate, from 22 September to 10 October, the Assembly heard 149 statements by heads of State or Government and heads or members of delegations.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

Following a statement by its President that, with the exception of six items and one sub-item, consideration of the agenda had been concluded, the General Assembly adopted decision 41/470 without vote.

Suspension of the forty-first session

At its 102nd plenary meeting, on 19 December 1986, the General Assembly decided to retain on the agenda of the forty-first session the following agenda items:

- Item 38: Review of the efficiency of the administrative and financial functioning of the United Nations;
- Item 43: Question of Cyprus;
- Item 44: Implementation of the resolutions of the United Nations;
- Item 45: Consequences of the prolongation of the armed conflict between Iran and Iraq;
- Item 62 (d): Comprehensive programme of disarmament;
- Item 140: Current financial crisis of the United Nations;
- Item 146: Judgment of the International Court of Justice of 27 June 1986 concerning military and paramilitary activities in and against Nicaragua: need for immediate compliance.

Oral proposal by President; agenda item 8.

Agenda

As it had decided in December 1985,⁽²⁾ the General Assembly resumed its fortieth session in April 1986 to consider nine items and four sub-items remaining on that session's agenda. In addition, it reopened one item to take note of information provided by the Secretary-General that eight Member States were in arrears in paying their financial contributions to the United Nations within the terms of Article 19 of the Charter (item 122), and two sub-items: one to appoint a member of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (item 17 (a)) and the other to consider the convening of the International Conference on the Relationship between Disarmament and Development (item 69 (c)). It also added an item on the current financial crisis of the United Nations (item 150) and a sub-item to confirm the appointment of the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) (item 17 (m)).

At the closing meeting of its fortieth session, on 15 September, the Assembly, by a series of decisions, included items in the agenda of its forty-first session on: the launching of global negotiations on international economic co-operation for development (decision 40/459 B); the current financial crisis of the United Nations (40/472 B); the situation in Central America: threats to international peace and security and peace initiatives (40/479); the observance of the quinqucentenary of the discovery of America (40/480); the question of Cyprus (40/481); implementation of the resolutions of the United Nations (40/482); and consequences of the prolongation of the armed conflict between Iran and Iraq (40/483). The Assembly also decided on 15 September to defer consideration of the appointment of a member of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and to include it in the agenda of a future session (40/326).

On 27 May, by decision S-13/23, the Assembly adopted a seven-item agenda for the thirteenth special session on the critical economic situation in Africa⁽³⁾ allocating six of them for consideration in plenary meetings and the substantive item to its Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole.

By decision S-14/22 of 17 September, the Assembly adopted a six-item agenda for the fourteenth special session on the question of Namibia⁽⁴⁾ and decided to consider the substantive item directly in plenary meetings.

In 1986, the forty-first session had 146 items on its agenda, of which 143 were included by the Assembly on 20 September; the other three were added on 14 and 31 October, and a sub-item was included on 19 November⁽⁵⁾ (For list of agenda items, see APPENDIX IV.) Inclusion of the items and their allocation to the Assembly's Main Committees or plenary meetings⁽⁶⁾ were recommended by the General Committee⁽⁷⁾

On 16 September, the Committee approved a 142-item agenda on the basis of preliminary⁽⁸⁾ and annotated preliminary lists of items⁽⁹⁾ a 143-item provisional agenda⁽¹⁰⁾ a one-item supplementary list⁽¹¹⁾ and a request to include an item on a Declaration by the Organization of African Unity on the April 1986 United States military attack against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya⁽¹²⁾ (see p. 247). The Committee recommended: that two items—celebration of the one-hundred-and fiftieth anniversary of the emancipation of slaves in the British Empire and observance of the quincentenary of the discovery of America—be deleted from the list; that consideration of the inclusion of items concerning East Timor (see p. 964) and the external debt crisis and development (see p. 509) be deferred; and that the item on establishment of a comprehensive system of international security be re-titled to read "Establishment of a comprehensive system of international peace and security" and included in the agenda as amended.

On 19 September, the Committee recommended that the item on the external debt crisis and development be included in the agenda and allocated to the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee. On 13 October, it recommended that an item on "Israeli nuclear armament" be included and allocated to the First Committee (see p. 59) and that an item on "Emergency assistance to El Salvador" be included and considered directly in plenary meeting (see p. 482). On 30 October, it recommended that an item concerning the June 1986 "Judgment of the International Court of Justice concerning military and paramilitary activities in and against Nicaragua: need for immediate compliance" be included in the agenda and considered directly in plenary meeting, and rejected, by 10 votes to 9, with 6 abstentions, its merger with the item on the situation in Central America: threats to international peace and security and peace initiatives (see p. 194).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

Following examination of the recommendations of the General Committee, the General Assembly adopted decision 41/402 without vote.

Adoption of the agenda and allocation of agenda items

At its 3rd, 36th and 52nd plenary meetings, on 20 September, 14 and 31 October 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendations of the General Committee as set forth in its first, second, third and fourth reports, adopted the agenda and the allocation of agenda items for the forty-first session.

At its 76th plenary meeting, on 19 November 1986, the General Assembly, on the proposal of the Secretary-General, decided to include in the agenda of its forty-first session an additional sub-item of item 18 entitled "Appointment of an alternate member of the United Nations Staff Pension Committee".

General Assembly decision 41/402

Adopted without vote

First part approved by General Committee (A/41/250 & Add.1-3), 16 and 19 September, 13 and 30 October (meetings 1-4); second part proposed by Secretary-General (A/41/245); agenda item 8.

Organization of work

In its first and second reports, covering its 16 and 19 September meetings⁽¹³⁾ the General Committee made recommendations concerning the organization of the forty-first session, based on suggestions by the Secretary-General⁽¹⁴⁾ and recommendations of the Committee on Conferences.⁽¹⁵⁾

The General Committee's recommendations provided for a schedule of daily meetings, fixed the duration of the general debate and drew attention to provisions embodied in a 1979 decision⁽¹⁶⁾ on the rationalization of the Assembly's procedures and to recommendations on the same subject made at a 1985 meeting of Presidents of the General Assembly on the occasion of the Organization's fortieth anniversary⁽¹⁷⁾ The Committee also drew attention to the Assembly's May 1986 decision (40/472 A) on the current financial crisis of the United Nations, deferred consideration of the Secretary-General's proposal that the Assembly's forty-first session be curtailed by three weeks, and recommended that both the practice whereby the Special Political Committee could obtain transcriptions of the debates of some of its meetings on request and the Assembly's decision not to reproduce in extenso statements made in a Main Committee should be maintained for the forty-first session. The Committee also recommended that the Assembly consider the recommendations relating to the rationalization of the Assembly's work contained in the report of the Group of High-level Intergovernmental Experts to Review the Efficiency of the Administrative and Financial Functioning of the United Nations⁽¹⁸⁾ (see p. 1021) and the recommendations on the subject made by the Working Group of the Whole of the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee, transmitted to the Secretary-General on 25 June by the United Republic of Tanzania⁽¹⁹⁾

Acting on the General Committee's recommendations, the General Assembly adopted decision 41/401 without vote.

Organization of the forty-first session

At its 3rd plenary meeting, on 20 September 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendations of the General Committee as set forth in its first and second reports, adopted a number of provisions concerning the organization of the forty-first session.

General Assembly decision 41/401

Adopted without vote

Approved by General Committee (A/41/250 & Add.1) without vote, 16 and 19 September (meetings 1,2) suggestions by Secretary-General (A/BUR/41/1); agenda item 8.

In the light of recommendations submitted by the Committee on Conferences⁽²⁰⁾ the General Committee recommended to the Assembly that a number of subsidiary organs be authorized to meet during the forty-first session. Acting on its recommendations, the General Assembly adopted decision 41/403 without vote.

Meetings of subsidiary organs during the forty-first session

At its 3rd, 14th, 48th and 80th plenary meetings, on 20 and 29 September, 23 October and 21 November 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendations of the Committee on Conferences and of the General Committee, decided that the following subsidiary organs should be authorized to hold meetings during the forty-first session:

- (a) Advisory Committee of the United Nations Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa;
- (b) Committee of Trustees of the United Nations Trust Fund for South Africa;
- (c) Committee on Conferences;
- (d) Committee on Relations with the Host Country;
- (e) Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People;
- (f) Special Committee against Apartheid;
- (g) Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories;
- (h) United Nations Council for Namibia;
- (i) Working Group on the Financing of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East.

General Assembly decision 41/403

Adopted without vote

Approved by General Committee (A/41/250) without vote, 16 September (meeting 1); proposals by Committee on Conferences (A/41/595 & Add.1-3); agenda item 8.

Representatives' credentials

At each of its 1986 sessions except the resumed regular session continued from 1985, the General Assembly approved reports of its Credentials Committee, accepting the credentials submitted by Member States for representatives attending those sessions.

On 29 May, the Credentials Committee examined a memorandum of the previous day from the Secretary-General, reporting, as updated during the meeting, on the status of credentials of representatives to the thirteenth special session.

The memorandum indicated that formal credentials had been received from 77 Member States and communications on the subject had been received from a further 46. Thirty-one Member States had empowered their permanent representatives to represent their respective State in the Assembly without limitation as to session, while four Members had not yet communicated information regarding their representatives.

At the May meeting and at a 16 October meeting in respect of the forty-first regular and the fourteenth special sessions, the Committee heard statements in connection with the credentials of Afghanistan, Chile, Democratic Kampuchea and Grenada. (For the composition of the Credentials Committee at each 1986 session, see APPENDIX III.)

The USSR opposed acceptance of the credentials of what it called Fascist Chile and the puppet regime established by the United States in Grenada, as well as those of so-called Democratic Kampuchea, which, the USSR said, were representatives of a band of renegades driven from their country for their bloody crimes against the Kampuchean people; the People's Republic of Kampuchea, formed through free elections in 1979 and exercising effective control over the entire territory of the country, should be granted the legitimate right to represent the Kampuchean people's interests. The United States, stating that the credentials of those three countries were in order, said that, although it would not object to the credentials of Afghanistan, that did not mean it did not object to the nature of that country's Government which had been installed as a result of foreign aggression from the USSR. China felt that Democratic Kampuchea was the legal Government of Kampuchea and added that allowing Afghanistan to take part in the special session should not be interpreted as acquiescence in a situation created by foreign armed invasion and occupation. Ghana stated that the situations in Chile, Democratic Kampuchea and Grenada were domestic and should be left to the people to resolve, while the Afghanistan situation was a regional issue for which Ghana expected the international community to find a solution in the near future.

The Netherlands felt that the Committee's task was technical and it was not its function to make political judgements regarding the Governments that had issued credentials, a position shared by Fiji. Rwanda stated that it had no formal objection to any credentials, although its acceptance of Chile was not to be interpreted as acceptance of certain policies of that Government. The Bahamas was willing to accept the credentials of all representatives since they complied with the Assembly's rules of procedure. Brazil spoke similarly. Canada said it accepted the credentials of delegations for technical reasons and not for foreign policy considerations; the credentials of Democratic Kampuchea appeared to be in order—they had been accepted at previous Assembly sessions and there was no basis for a departure from past practice. For the same reasons, Canada had no objections to the credentials of Afghanistan, Chile and Grenada.

On 29 May, the Committee, acting on a proposal by its Chairman, adopted without vote a resolution, by which it accepted the credentials received, taking into account the various reservations, it being understood that those credentials not yet submitted by Member States participating in the thirteenth special session would be communicated to the Secretary-General as soon as possible. The Committee also recommended for adoption a draft resolution by which the Assembly would approve its report⁽²¹⁾

On 30 May, the Assembly adopted without vote resolution S-13/1, by which it approved the report of the Credentials Committee on the credentials of representatives to the thirteenth special session. Following the resolution's adoption, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, on behalf of Viet Nam and other delegations that had not recognized the existence of Democratic Kampuchea, expressed reservations regarding its credentials. Democratic Kampuchea replied that the Lao People's Democratic Republic was trying to deceive world opinion. China said that the coalition Government of Democratic Kampuchea was the legitimate regime of that country and repeated its views on Afghanistan as voiced at the meetings of the Credentials Committee (see above). Afghanistan said China's remarks were irrelevant.

On 17 September, the Assembly adopted without vote decision S-14/21, by which it decided to consider at its forty-first session a consolidated report by the Credentials Committee concerning the credentials of representatives to both the fourteenth special session and the forty-first session.

At its first meeting of the forty-first session on 16 October, the Committee had before it a memorandum of the same date from the Secretary-General on the status of credentials of representatives to the two sessions. That memorandum indicated that formal credentials for the forty-first session had been submitted by 138 Member States and communications on the subject had been received from a further nine. With regard to the fourteenth special session, formal credentials had been submitted by 60 Member States and communications received from a further 13. The Legal Counsel informed the Committee that a majority of Member States were represented at the fourteenth special session by permanent representatives whose credentials empowered them to represent their States in all United Nations organs and thus no additional credentials were required. Also before the Committee was a letter from the Arab Group objecting to the credentials of Israel to the Assembly's forty-first session (see below)⁽²²⁾

The Committee heard statements in connection with the credentials of Afghanistan, Chile, Democratic Kampuchea and Grenada (see above).

Acting on an oral proposal by its Chairman, the Committee adopted without vote a resolution by which it accepted the credentials received for the forty-first and fourteenth special sessions, taking into account the reservations expressed. It also recommended for adoption a draft resolution by which the Assembly would approve the Committee's first report regarding those two sessions⁽²³⁾

On 4 December, at its second meeting, the Committee examined a further memorandum from the Secretary-General stating that, for the forty-first session, formal credentials from an additional nine Member States had been received and communications on the subject had been received from two more. With regard to the fourteenth special session, formal credentials had been received from another seven Member States and communications had been received from another three. The Committee approved the Chairman's proposal that it should accept the formal credentials submitted and accept the communications received as provisional credentials.

Acting without vote on an oral proposal by its Chairman, the Committee submitted a draft resolution recommending Assembly approval of its second report⁽²⁴⁾

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

As recommended by the Credentials Committee, the General Assembly adopted two resolutions on credentials of representatives to its forty-first and fourteenth special sessions.

On 21 October, it adopted resolution 41/7 A without vote.

21 October 1986 Meeting 45 Adopted without vote

Approved by Credentials Committee (A/41/727) without vote, 16 October (meeting 1); draft orally proposed by Chairman; agenda item 3.

Before adopting the resolution, the Assembly, by a recorded vote of 77 to 40, with 16 abstentions, decided not to act on an amendment sponsored by 20 States to reject the credentials of Israel. That decision was taken on a motion by Iceland, also on behalf of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden. On 7 October⁽²²⁾ Oman had transmitted a letter from the Arab Group, signed by 20 countries and the Palestine Liberation Organization, giving the grounds for their objection (see p. 269).

Israel's credentials were also challenged in a 17 October letter⁽²⁵⁾ signed by 48 Member States. On 27 October⁽²⁶⁾ Israel, referring to the Arab Group's letter⁽²²⁾ stated that the Group had abused the United Nations credentials procedure and sought to undermine the broad consensus on the principle of universality.

The representation of Kampuchea in the United Nations was also challenged in two communications (see p. 208).

Explaining its vote on the resolution, the Byelorussian SSR, speaking also on behalf of Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, protested the recognition of the credentials of Democratic Kampuchea, stating that such a State did not exist and that representatives presenting themselves under that label represented people expelled from their country, including Pol-Potists, condemned for carrying out bloody crimes against the Kampuchean people. The Lao People's Democratic Republic said it, Viet Nam and what it termed the People's Republic of Kampuchea were disappointed at the erroneous decision by the Credentials Committee with regard to Kampuchea's representation; the Government of the People's Republic of Kampuchea, which exercised full authority over all the national territory, should have regained its rightful place within the Organization. These views were echoed by Cuba, Democratic Yemen and Mongolia; Cuba also expressed reservations concerning the credentials of Grenada. The Syrian Arab Republic recorded its reservations concerning Democratic Kampuchea's credentials for reasons given at previous Assembly sessions. China stated that although Democratic Kampuchea was suffering Vietnamese aggression and occupation, its credentials were valid from the political and legal points of view. Democratic Kampuchea said the Assembly had again confirmed the country's status as a Member of the Organization and its Coalition Government as the legal representative of the Khmer nation.

Belgium, China, the Federal Republic of Germany and the United Kingdom stated that the fact that they did not object to Afghanistan's credentials did not imply recognition of the current regime there. Pakistan recorded its formal reservation concerning the Afghan delegation's credentials, consistent with its stand on the situation there which, it said, constituted a flagrant contravention of the United Nations Charter. Afghanistan stated that it again rejected the validity and relevance of statements made with regard to its credentials; such statements had no bearing on the legitimacy of the Afghanistan Government which derived its legitimacy from its own people.

Israel said that if a member of the Assembly was for the United Nations, it had to be for the principle of universality and should vote accordingly. Egypt pointed out that its support of the motion by Iceland was in accordance with its position on the means of reaching a peaceful solution to the Middle East crisis.

On 11 December, the Assembly adopted resolution 41/7 B without vote.

Rationalization of UN procedures

Responding to the General Assembly's 1985 request⁽²⁷⁾ the Special Committee on the Charter of the United Nations and on the Strengthening of the Role of the Organization kept the question of the rationalization of United Nations procedures under review, devoting three meetings to the topic in April 1986⁽²⁸⁾ (see p. 999). The Committee's Working Group had before it a revised version of a working paper submitted in 1985 by France and the United Kingdom⁽²⁹⁾

Some Committee members stressed the close link of the rationalization of procedures with the substantial issues and stressed the importance of keeping the subject under review; they also noted that the financial situation of the Organization required optimum use of reduced resources. Other members pointed out, however, that a body had been established to deal specifically with the Organization's financial situation and that the issue of rationalization was complex. It was also recalled that a number of forums had considered aspects of the rationalization topic and it was suggested that the Secretariat should undertake a survey of developments in them. Some said that the paper focused selectively on the Assembly and that it should deal with all the United Nations principal and subsidiary organs, particularly the Security Council, and their functioning and modalities.

In resolution 41/83 on the report of the Special Committee's April/May session, the Assembly again requested the Committee to keep the topic under review.

Secretary-General

In the final annual report of his first five-year term (see p. 12), the Secretary-General stated that he had received strong and consistent support from the membership during his years in office but felt compelled to express concern over a tendency to view the Secretary-General as separate from the rest of the Organization. To express full confidence in the Secretary-General while failing to support the Security Council or work constructively in the General Assembly was fundamentally contradictory, he said. He was convinced that the continuing and enhanced effectiveness of the United Nations depended on the readiness of Member States to see the whole of the United Nations as the necessary structure for dealing with the transcendent problems of an interdependent world.

Appointment of the Secretary-General

At a closed meeting on 10 October 1986, the Security Council adopted unanimously resolution 589(1986), by which it recommended to the General Assembly that Javier Perez de Cuellar be appointed Secretary-General of the United Nations for a second term of office from 1 January 1987 to 31 December 1991.

Meeting number. SC 2714.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

Later the same day, after the Council President informed the President of the General Assembly of the recommendation⁽¹⁾ the Assembly adopted resolution 41/1 by acclamation.

Appointment of the Secretary-General of the United Nations

The General Assembly,

Acting in accordance with the recommendation contained in Security Council resolution 589(1986) of 10 October 1986,

Expressing its appreciation for the effective and dedicated service rendered to the United Nations by Mr. Javier Perez de Cuellar during his first term of office, Appoints Mr. Javier Perez de Cuellar Secretary-General of the United Nations for a second term of office beginning on 1 January 1987 and ending on 31 December 1991.

During 1986, the Secretary-General continued the missions of good offices entrusted to him by either the Security Council or the General Assembly. Those missions concerned Afghanistan, Cyprus, the Falkland Islands (Malvinas), the Iran-Iraq conflict and Kampuchea.

The Secretary-General continued his efforts towards achieving a political solution to the Afghanistan situation through the intermediary of his Personal Representative, who undertook extensive consultations in the area. The seventh round of negotiations on the situation commenced at Geneva on 5 May (see p. 215). He also continued to pursue his good offices mission concerning Cyprus and, in March, presented to the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot communities a draft framework agreement for consideration (see p. 237). At the request of the Security Council in October (see p. 227), the Secretary-General intensified his mediation efforts in the Iran-Iraq conflict, including an attempt to reactivate the eight-point plan presented by him to both parties in 1985.⁽²⁾

With regard to the question of the Falkland Islands (Malvinas), the Secretary-General continued his renewed mission of good offices to assist Argentina and the United Kingdom to initiate negotiations, meeting with their heads of Government, Foreign Ministers and Permanent Representatives to the United Nations (see p. 962). During the year, he also maintained contacts with representatives of the States most closely concerned with the Kampuchea situation, both directly and through his Special Representative (see p. 206).

Co-operation with other intergovernmental organizations

Co-operation between the United Nations and other intergovernmental organizations was the subject of four 1986 General Assembly resolutions. Those organizations were the League of Arab States and the Organization of the Islamic Conference (see below); the Organization of African Unity (see p. 172); and the Asian-African Legal Consultative Committee (see p. 1016). Co-operation between the United Nations and the Agency for Cultural and Technical Co-operation was discussed in the Economic and Social Council (see p. 888).

League of Arab States

Report of the Secretary-General. In accordance with a 1985 General Assembly resolution⁽¹⁾ the Secretary-General, in August 1986, submitted a report on progress made in strengthening political, economic, social and cultural co-operation between the United Nations and the League of Arab States⁽²⁾

The report described consultations and exchanges of information between the two organizations during 1986 and summarized follow-up action on proposals for co-operation agreed by them in 1983.⁽³⁾ Information was given on 19 multilateral proposals, involving two or more bodies of the United Nations system, concerning such topics as disarmament, economic and social data collection and population research, natural resources (water, minerals), promotion of technical co-operation, conventional, new and renewable energy sources, maritime transport, rural development, preservation of historical sites, health care and various social issues.

The report also described the status, as described by the United Nations agencies, programmes and bodies concerned, of bilateral proposals in six main areas of co-operation. These included: political matters, particularly the situation in the Middle East and the Gulf area; economic, financial and technical co-operation for development; food and agriculture; social development, labour matters, human resources and cultural affairs; refugees, disaster prevention and emergency relief, and human rights; and information and communication. Also included was a summary of progress made on proposals adopted at a 1985 joint United Nations/Arab League meeting on social development⁽⁴⁾

JIU report. In September 1986,⁽⁵⁾ the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly a report of the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) on co-operation between the two organizations. The report reviewed areas of co-operation during the preceding 10 years and proposals under discussion for future co-operation. It also described mechanisms for co-operation between the secretariats of the League of Arab States system and those of the United Nations system, noting that relations were governed by a network of more than 40 arrangements, agreements and letters of intent. The mechanisms thus established ranged from the exchange of documents to reciprocal representation at meetings; others provided for periodic inter-secretariat meetings or permanent representation. The report went on to describe the formulation of co-operation programmes and projects and their financing, execution and evaluation.

In a series of recommendations, JIU said that the organizations of the United Nations system should give priority, in their regional co-operation with the Arab specialized institutions, to advanced sectors which justified recourse to outside expertise. With regard to mechanisms for co-operation, it recommended that, to benefit from the experience accumulated by Arab specialized institutions, UNDP should obtain their technical advice before intergovernmental meetings on the Arab regional programmes at the beginning and in the middle of each UNDP programming cycle. Given the high level of representation at ad hoc meetings between the United Nations system, the League of Arab States and the Arab specialized institutions, the United Nations should concentrate the work of those meetings on examining problems in regional technical co-operation and means of solving them, leaving detailed discussion of projects to the mechanisms set up for that purpose. It also recommended: that support for the joint inter-agency working groups should be entrusted to a senior headquarters specialist in technical co-operation who would be responsible for coordinating and intensifying their activity and guiding it towards practical results; that United Nations organizations should ensure that their programmes and projects for co-operation with the League and the Arab specialized institutions fell within the framework of the 1980 Strategy for Joint Arab Economic Development⁽⁶⁾ that the United Nations system should make more use of the networks-of-institutions mechanism, employing their administrative infrastructure, and increase the number of economically viable projects, in order to lighten the budgetary burden of regional projects; and that United Nations organizations should be invited to call on the services of local experts, obtain equipment from domestic industries and undertake training within the region whenever such a course was possible and less expensive. In addition, it was recommended that the United Nations should assist the League with a view to strengthening its evaluation activities concerning regional programmes and projects.

In his comments on the JIU report⁽⁷⁾ the Secretary-General said that, although it provided a useful overview of the various areas of technical co-operation and of related mechanisms for co-operation, it did not reflect the full range of co-operation between the United Nations and the League of Arab States. In preparing his comments, the Secretary-General consulted with all participating organizations of the United Nations system, some of which indicated that the report did not sufficiently reflect the scope of current co-operation.

Statements in the Security Council. In 1986, the League's Secretary-General, its Permanent Observer to the United Nations and its Acting Permanent Observer made statements at nine Security Council meetings, to which they had been invited to participate in accordance with rule 39^a of the Council's provisional rules of procedure. Those meetings dealt with the Middle East situation, including the occupied Arab territories, the Iran and Iraq conflict, and complaints against the United States regarding its attackin against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 17 October, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/4 by recorded vote.

Co-operation between the United Nations and the League of Arab States

The General Assembly,

Recalling its previous resolutions on the promotion of co-operation between the United Nations and the League of Arab States, in particular resolution 40/5 of 25 October 1985,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on co-operation between the United Nations and the League of Arab States,

Recalling the Articles of the Charter of the United Nations which encourage activities through regional arrangements for the promotion of the purposes and principles of the United Nations,

Noting with appreciation the desire of the League of Arab States to consolidate and develop the existing ties with the United Nations in all areas relating to the maintenance of international peace and security, and to co-operate in every possible way with the United Nations in the implementation of United Nations resolutions relating to the question of Palestine and the situation in the Middle East,

Aware of the vital importance for the countries members of the League of Arab States of achieving a just, comprehensive and durable solution to the Middle East conflict and the question of Palestine, the core of the conflict,

Realizing that the strengthening of international peace and security is directly related, inter alia, to disarmament, decolonization, self-determination and the eradication of all forms of racism and racial discrimination,

Convinced that the maintenance and further strengthening of co-operation between the United Nations system and other organizations of the United Nations system and the League of Arab States contribute to the work of the United Nations system and to the promotion of the purposes and principles of the United Nations,

Recognizing the need for closer co-operation between the United Nations system and the League of Arab States and its specialized organizations in realizing the goals and objectives set forth in the Strategy for Joint

Arab Economic Development adopted by the Eleventh Arab Summit Conference, held at Amman from 25 to 27 November 1980,

Having heard the statement of the Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States of 17 October 1986 on co-operation between the United Nations and the League of Arab States, and having noted the emphasis placed therein on follow-up actions and procedures on the recommendations in the political, economic, social and cultural fields adopted at the meeting between representatives of the General Secretariat of the League of Arab States and its specialized organizations and the secretariats of the United Nations and other organizations of the United Nations system, held at Tunis from 28 June to 1 July 1983, as well as on the recommendations relating to political matters contained in the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly,

1. Takes note with satisfaction of the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for the follow-up action taken by him on the proposals adopted at the meeting between representatives of the General Secretariat of the League of Arab States and its specialized organizations and the secretariats of the United Nations and other organizations of the United Nations system held at Tunis and the sectoral meeting on social development in the Arab region, held at Amman from 19 to 21 August 1985, as well as to the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system for their efforts to facilitate the implementation of the Tunis and Amman proposals;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to strengthen co-operation with the General Secretariat of the League of Arab States for the purpose of implementing United Nations resolutions relating to the question of Palestine and the situation in the Middle East in order to achieve a just, comprehensive and durable solution to the Middle East conflict and the question of Palestine, the core of the conflict;

4. Requests the Secretariat of the United Nations and the General Secretariat of the League of Arab States, within their respective fields of competence, further to intensify their co-operation towards the realization of the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, the strengthening of international peace and security, disarmament, decolonization, self-determination and the eradication of all forms of racism and racial discrimination;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to strengthen co-operation and co-ordination between the United Nations and other organizations of the United Nations system and the League of Arab States and its specialized organizations in order to enhance their capacity to serve the mutual interests of the two organizations in the political, economic, social and cultural fields;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to co-ordinate the follow-up action to facilitate the implementation of the proposals of a multilateral nature adopted at the Tunis meeting in 1983, and to take appropriate action regarding the multilateral proposals relating to social development adopted at the Amman meeting in 1985, including the following measures:

^aRule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure states: "The Security Council may invite members of the Secretariat or other persons, whom it considers competent for the purpose, to supply it with information or to give other assistance in examining matters within its competence."

(a) Promotion of contacts and consultations between the counterpart programmes, organizations and agencies concerned;

(b) Setting up of joint sectoral inter-agency working groups;

(c) Consultation with the Secretary-General of the League of Arab States regarding the convening in 1987 of the joint sectoral meeting on development of human resources in the Arab region;

(d) Provision, within existing resources, of necessary assistance for the proposed meeting on the development of human resources in the Arab region;

7. Calls upon the specialized agencies, and other organizations and programmes of the United Nations system:

(a) To continue to co-operate with the Secretary-General and the programmes, organizations and agencies concerned within the United Nations system and the League of Arab States and its specialized organizations in the follow-up of multilateral proposals aimed at strengthening and expanding co-operation in all fields between the United Nations system and the League of Arab States and its specialized organizations;

(b) To maintain and increase contacts and consultations with the counterpart programmes, organizations and agencies concerned regarding projects of a bilateral nature in order to facilitate their implementation;

(c) To inform the Secretary-General, not later than 15 May 1987, of the progress of their co-operation with the League of Arab States and its specialized organizations, in particular the follow-up action taken on the multilateral and bilateral proposals adopted at the Tunis and Amman meetings;

8. Requests the Secretary-General, in close co-operation with the Secretary-General of the League of Arab States, to hold periodic consultations, as and when appropriate, between representatives of the Secretariat of the United Nations and of the General Secretariat of the League of Arab States on follow-up policies, projects, actions and procedures;

9. Further requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its forty-second session a progress report on the implementation of the present resolution;

10. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-second session the item entitled "Co-operation between the United Nations and the League of Arab States".

Against: Israel, United States.

Abstaining: Cyprus.*

*Later advised the Secretariat it had intended to vote in favour.

Israel, explaining its vote, said the Arab League's activities contravened the Charter and disregarded the fundamental principles of peace and security on which the United Nations was based; since its inception in 1945, it had had one central goal—the eradication of the State of Israel. The United States voted negatively because in paragraph 3 the Secretary-General was requested to implement Assembly resolutions which the United States had voted against.

Although supporting the promotion of co-operation between the United Nations and the League, a number of other speakers also had reservations about paragraph 3: Australia, Canada, Japan, New Zealand, Norway (also on behalf of Denmark, Finland, Iceland and Sweden) and the United Kingdom (for the 12 members of the European Community), which added that resolutions on co-operation should avoid introducing contentious issues and that the scarce resources available for co-operation should be applied to the best effect.

Organization of the Islamic Conference

In response to a 1985 General Assembly resolution⁽⁸⁾ the Secretary-General in August 1986 submitted a report on co-operation between the United Nations system and the Organization of the Islamic Conference⁽⁹⁾

He reported that, in accordance with the Assembly's 1985 recommendation⁽⁸⁾ the second general meeting between the secretariats of the United Nations system and the secretariat of the Conference was held at Geneva from 28 to 30 July 1986, the first having been held in 1983.⁽¹⁰⁾ The meeting focused on five priority areas: food security and agriculture; development of science and technology; investment mechanisms and joint ventures; eradication of illiteracy; and assistance to refugees. It agreed on a series of conclusions and recommendations in those areas and identified two additional priority areas of co-operation—technical co-operation among Islamic countries and development of trade—for which UNDP and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development respectively were designated lead agency. It was also agreed that enhanced co-operation was desirable in other areas, including women and development, human resources and manpower development, telecommunications and disaster relief. It was felt that such co-operation should initially be developed between the concerned United Nations agencies and the Conference.

During the year, co-operation in political matters continued to centre on decolonization and apartheid, outer space, disarmament and a number of political and security-related matters, including the Middle East situation, the Iran-Iraq war and Afghanistan. Close co-operation also continued between the Conference and various bodies of the United Nations system in economic, social and cultural development.

On 5 May,⁽¹¹⁾ Morocco transmitted the final communique and resolutions adopted by the Sixteenth Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers (Fez, 6-10 January), dealing with political and information, economic, cultural, and administrative and financial affairs. Morocco also transmitted, on 21 October⁽¹²⁾ the final communique of the Co-ordination Meeting of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Conference (New York, 2 October), dealing with, among other matters, the Middle East, Afghanistan, South Africa and Namibia, the attack by the United States against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, and the situation in the Horn of Africa. The Foreign Ministers also appealed to quarters exercising influence in Lebanon and to the Islamic parties there to stop the massacres of Palestinians in refugee camps in southern Lebanon. They also requested the United Nations Secretary-General to intervene to stop the aggressive attacks by the Amal militias and Israel and to ensure protection and provide relief to the residents of the camps.

During 1986, the Secretary-General of the Conference participated in two Security Council meetings and its Acting Permanent Observer in one, under rule 39^b of the Council's provisional rules of procedure. Those meetings dealt with the situation in the occupied Arab territories, complaints against the United States and the situation in southern Africa.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 October, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/3 without vote.

Co-operation between the United Nations and the Organization of the Islamic Conference

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on co-operation between the United Nations and the Organization of the Islamic Conference,

Taking into account the desire of both organizations to co-operate more closely in their common search for solutions to global problems, such as questions relating to international peace and security, disarmament, self-determination, decolonization, fundamental human rights and the establishment of a new international economic order,

operation for the promotion of the purposes and principles of the United Nations,

Noting the strengthening of co-operation between the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system and the Organization of the Islamic Conference,

Taking note of the second general meeting between representatives of the secretariats of the United Nations and other organizations of the United Nations system and the secretariat of the Organization of the Islamic Conference held at Geneva from 28 to 30 July 1986 in compliance with General Assembly resolution 40/4,

Taking note of the encouraging progress made in the five priority areas of co-operation as well as in the identification of other priority areas for developing trade and technical co-operation among the Islamic countries,

Convinced that the strengthening of co-operation between the United Nations and other organizations of the United Nations system and the Organization of the Islamic Conference contributes to the promotion of the purposes and principles of the United Nations,

Recalling its resolutions 37/4 of 22 October 1982, 38/4 of 28 October 1983, 39/7 of 8 November 1984 and 40/4 of 25 October 1985,

1. Takes note with satisfaction of the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Approves the conclusions and recommendations of the second general meeting between representatives of the secretariats of the United Nations and other organizations of the United Nations system and the secretariat of the Organization of the Islamic Conference;

3. Notes with satisfaction the active participation of the Organization of the Islamic Conference in the work of the United Nations towards the realization of the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations;

4. Requests the United Nations and the Organization of the Islamic Conference to continue co-operation in their common search for solutions to global problems, such as questions relating to international peace and security, disarmament, self-determination, decolonization, fundamental human rights and the establishment of a new international economic order;

5. Encourages the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system to continue to expand their co-operation with the Organization of the Islamic Conference, particularly by negotiating co-operation agreements, and invites them to multiply the contacts and meetings of focal points for co-operation in priority areas of interest to the United Nations and the Organization of the Islamic Conference;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to strengthen co-operation and co-ordination between the United Nations system and the Organization of the Islamic Conference to serve the mutual interests of the two organizations in the political, economic, social and cultural fields;

7. Recommends that a co-ordination meeting of the focal points of the lead agencies of the United Nations and the Organization of the Islamic Conference should be organized at a time and place to be determined through consultations with the organizations concerned;

8. Expresses its appreciation for the efforts of the Secretary-General in the promotion of co-operation between the United Nations and the Organization of the Islamic Conference, and expresses the hope that he will continue to strengthen the mechanisms of co-operation between the two organizations;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-second session on the state of co-operation between the United Nations and the Organization of the Islamic Conference;

10. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-second session the item entitled "Co-operation between the United Nations and the Organization of the Islamic Conference".

Other intergovernmental organizations

At the request of the host Governments of several intergovernmental conferences, the main documents of those meetings were transmitted to the Secretary-General in 1986 for circulation as documents of the General Assembly, the Security Council or both, as follows:

—Resolutions adopted by the Seventy-fifth Inter-Parliamentary Conference (Mexico City, 7-12 April).⁽¹³⁾

—Final documents of the Ministerial Meeting of the Co-ordinating Bureau of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries (New Delhi, India, 16-19 April).⁽¹⁴⁾

—The Tokyo Declaration entitled "Looking forward to a better future" and the "Statement on international terrorism" issued at the Tokyo Economic Summit (Tokyo, 4-6 May).⁽¹⁵⁾

—Final documents of the Eighth Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries (Harare, Zimbabwe, 1-6 September).⁽¹⁶⁾

—Final communique adopted by the meeting of Ministers and heads of delegation of the non-aligned countries to the forty-first session of the General Assembly (New York, 2 October).⁽¹⁷⁾

Other institutional questions

Composition of UN organs

In 1986, as in previous years since 1979, consideration of the question of the composition of the relevant organs of the United Nations was deferred, based on a recommendation of the Special Political Committee, which reported that none of its members had requested to speak on the substance of the item.⁽¹⁾ Acting on that recommendation, the General Assembly on 3 December adopted decision 41/417, by which it included the item in the provisional agenda of its forty-second (1987) session.

Observer status of national liberation movements

By resolution 41/71, the General Assembly called on States to accord to the national liberation movements recognized by the Organization of African Unity and/or by the League of Arab States, and accorded observer status by international organizations, the facilities, privileges and immunities necessary for the performance of their functions (see p. 1003).

Economic and social questions

Chapter I

Development policy and international economic co-operation

The failure of the economic recovery in the developed economies to spread to the developing countries was examined by several United Nations bodies during 1986. The continued overall net transfer of resources from developing to developed countries, largely related to the international debt crisis, was increasingly perceived as unsustainable, economically as well as politically. During discussions on the world economic situation and in major economic reports, the importance of the interrelationship between the issues of money, finance, resource flows, debt, trade, raw materials and development was stressed.

In his annual report to the General Assembly (see p. 3), the Secretary-General said that measures to return the world economy to the path of healthy growth and development could only be successfully planned and implemented on a multilateral basis. He emphasized that the role of the United Nations in that regard was unique and important as it provided a universal forum to consider the issues in an interrelated manner and could provide the political impulse for concerted action by States.

A number of economic issues were considered in the Assembly and the Economic and Social Council during 1986. As follow-up to its 1985 request that the Secretary-General prepare a report on international economic security for its 1987 session, the Assembly specified the approach to be taken in that document. The Assembly reaffirmed that developed countries should refrain from applying coercive economic measures against developing countries and asked the Secretary-General to report in 1987 on eliminating such measures. He was also requested to submit in 1988 a report on measures to promote the contribution of indigenous entrepreneurs to the economic development of developing countries. The Economic and Social Council asked him to keep the matter of confidence-building in international economic relations under review and to identify and promote possible economic confidence-building measures.

In connection with the 1985 review of the implementation of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, the Assembly requested information from all States on their implementation of the Charter, in order to facilitate preparation of a 1989 report on the subject.

Repeated consultations during the year on the launching of global negotiations on international economic co-operation for development, originally scheduled to start in 1980, yielded no concrete progress. The Assembly, therefore, decided to defer consideration of the issue until 1987. The question of a proposed new international economic order, including its legal aspects, continued to be discussed.

The background document for the Economic and Social Council's annual discussion of international economic and social policy was the World Economic Survey 1986, which gave an account of trends and policies in the world economy. The Trade and Development Report, 1986, published by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD), analysed the world economic situation and discussed the set-back to development caused by the depression experienced by the developing world in the early 1980s. The Committee for Development Planning (CDP) was concerned with the problems facing development finance.

After considering the Secretary-General's report on a unified approach to development planning, the Assembly invited States to support developing countries' efforts to strengthen their management capacity to apply a unified approach, especially in integrating food and agricultural production in all sectors and supporting industrialization, economic and social infrastructure and human resources development. The improvement of various other aspects of development planning, education and administration was studied in several United Nations forums during the year. The system's work in rural development was also reviewed.

An inter-agency consultation was held to discuss the results of the 1985 mid-term global review of the Substantial New Programme of Action (SNPA) for the 1980s for the Least Developed Countries (LDCs), while the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board invited the UNCTAD Secretary-General to start consultations on the review and appraisal of SNPA to take place in 1990. Country review meetings for individual LDCs continued to be organized by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). In December, on the recommendation of CDP and the Economic and Social Council, the Assembly added Kiribati, Mauritania and Tuvalu to the list of LDCs, bringing the total to 40.

The special problems of island developing countries were considered by the Assembly, which requested the United Nations system to respond positively to their particular needs. The UNDP Governing Council also recognized those special needs and requested the UNDP Administrator to submit in 1987 an evaluation of UNDP's role in implementing special measures in their favour. The geographical handicaps and transit-transport problems of land-locked developing countries were discussed in the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board.

International economic relations

Development and economic co-operation

Aspects of development and economic co-operation were discussed in several United Nations bodies during 1986, including the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council. In resolution 41/184, the Assembly described the approach to be taken by the Secretary-General in preparing a report on the concept of international economic security to be submitted to it in 1987. The Assembly called on the international community to adopt urgent and effective measures in order to eliminate the use of coercive economic measures against developing countries (41/165). The Secretary-General was requested by the Assembly to study national and international measures to promote the contribution of indigenous entrepreneurs to the economic development of developing countries (41/182). He was also asked to seek information from States on their implementation of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States (decision 41/440). The Economic and Social Council, by resolution 1986/75, requested the Secretary-General to identify and promote possible economic confidence-building measures in appropriate regional and specialized United Nations bodies.

CDP activities. At its March 1986 session⁽¹⁾ CDP focused on the capital requirements of developing countries. Its report highlighted the problems facing development finance and called for a co-operative solution towards which developed and developing countries, multilateral financial institutions and private financial agencies had contributions to make (see Chapter IV of this section).

In a section of its report dealing with the world economic situation and prospects, CDP stated that in many aspects the world economy remained fragile and there was danger of slow growth becoming permanently entrenched in many parts of the world. While policy-makers in some key economies saw a need for caution, there was increasing recognition that problems were interrelated and that, in several areas, multilateral approaches might be more effective. Growing interdependence underlined the importance of considering policy linkages when devising solutions. Further, enhanced co-ordination among the main actors to improve their own policy mix was important to achieve stronger non-inflationary growth in the world economy. More comprehensive efforts with wider participation of other countries were also needed to discuss the formulation of policies with international implications.

The cautious stance in industrial countries was partly explained by the seeming change in cyclical patterns and the fact that relations among critical variables—interest rates, the money stock, inflation, investment, government spending and output—were not as clear-cut as in the past. Since the late 1970s, policy-makers in various countries had shifted their attention from demand management to supply-side considerations. In many productive sectors as well as in functional areas, adjustments seemed to be taking place in the desired direction through the interplay of market forces. In some cases, however, market solutions did not seem to be working effectively. The pattern of the recycling of global savings, if continued, could lead to increasing disequilibria and the persistent difficulties of debtor countries showed that approaches to debt problems were not working effectively. Although a case could be made for a gradual approach to certain problems, there was no case for hesitation in adopting the set of measures required to correct global disequilibria and promptly accelerate growth in the North while restoring development in the South (see Chapter IV of this section).

Among the measures cited were a further reduction of interest rates, co-ordination of monetary policies to achieve a pattern of interest rates leading to a smooth correction of the overvaluation of the dollar, improvement of the international monetary system with the participation of all countries, expansion of debtor countries' export capacity and rapid growth in world import demand.

ACC activities. In accordance with a 1985 decision by the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC),⁽²⁾ its Task Force on Long-term Development Objectives made preparations at its fourteenth session (Geneva, 21-24 January 1986)⁽³⁾ for an ACC review of issues related to conditions for fostering economic growth.

The Task Force focused particularly on the economic and social implications of growth strategies and the impact of adjustment policies and measures. The first section of its four-part report gave a brief assessment of the world economic and social situation, emphasizing some key implications for the medium and longer terms. It concluded that the low rate of economic growth during the preceding five years and projected for the remainder of the decade should be a cause for deep concern, given its far-reaching social implications. The situation called for ways by which growth could be accelerated in both developed and developing countries and for appropriate development policy responses to prolonged economic slowdown and social decay.

The report's second section discussed the causes of economic strains and the consequences of adjustment to those strains, and how inappropriate policies, including adjustment policies and measures, might delay resumption of sound growth and social progress. It attempted to identify instances where adjustment entailed heavy economic, social and political costs which should be considered in their own right and argued that the ultimate purpose of adjustment was to ensure conditions for sustained growth with reasonable price stability and a viable balance of payments, as a basis for long-term development and social progress.

The third section discussed the general implications of different growth strategies, stressing the wide diversity of experience, performance and policies among countries, with different economic and social implications in the long run. The Task Force noted that there was no single policy model or pattern of growth to which structurally diverse economies should be expected to conform; while there was a core set of issues which any strategy had to take into account, too abstract and general discussion of growth strategies should be avoided.

With regard to its future programme, the Task Force concluded that the subject of conditions for fostering economic growth required further detailed study and discussion and that the Task Force should return to it at its 1987 session. With regard to its two technical working groups, the Task Force recommended that the group on quantitative analysis and modelling continue its work but meet, in future, only every two years. It suspended its technical working group on energy since the issue as it related to economic growth and development could be dealt with by the Task Force itself.

In its annual overview report for 1986,⁽⁴⁾ ACC stated that, at its second regular session of the year, it had reviewed the development of the world economy and was apprised of the outcome of various deliberations in the United Nations system on development and international economic co-operation. It had before it the report of its Task Force on Long-term Development Objectives (see above), which had also been submitted, under cover of a note by the Secretary-General⁽⁵⁾ to the Economic and Social Council. ACC noted that the world economy was in a difficult period of transition, with Governments hoping to move towards a less inflationary economy and a more stable period of growth. During 1986, exchange rates were more reasonably aligned, interest rates were lower and there was a decrease in the price of oil. Commodity prices remained depressed. Industrialized countries maintained a growth rate of less than 3 per cent for the year, while developing countries had witnessed a decrease in their rate of growth from 4 per cent in 1984 to 3.2 per cent in 1985 and to about 3 per cent in 1986. The deceleration was due to a deterioration in the external environment of those countries, including a marked deterioration in their terms of trade and reduced net capital inflows from the international financial system.

ACC stated that the year had also witnessed an increase in the total debt burden of developing countries, although there was general acceptance of a debt strategy oriented towards growth. With regard to trade, ACC welcomed the launching by the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) of a new round of trade negotiations (see PART TWO, Chapter XVIII). On monetary and financial stability, the need for effective co-ordination of macro-economic policies among the major industrialized countries was highlighted. ACC emphasized the need for increased resources for the multilateral financial institutions that had played a critical role in the area of resource flows to developing countries.

ACC continued its dialogue on the economic and social implications of growth strategies and the impact of adjustment policies. Members felt that, conceptually, much progress had been achieved since ACC began considering the matter in 1984 and noted the growing consensus on the need to pay more attention to the social, distributional and human development impact of adjustment. Many members were of the view that, at a future meeting, ACC should discuss the policy implications for growth and development, taking into account recent experiences and the world economic outlook. ACC therefore adopted a decision⁽⁶⁾ inviting its Task Force on Long-term Development Objectives to study the long-term conditions for balanced growth and to examine, from the social as well as from the economic and financial angles, the lessons to be learned from structural adjustment programmes. The Task Force was also requested to consider what follow-up should be given to evaluating the implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade (the 1980s) adopted by the General Assembly in 1980.⁽⁷⁾

World Economic Survey 1986. During its July 1986 discussion of international economic and social policy (see below), the Economic and Social Council had before it the World Economic Survey 1986 W prepared by the United Nations Department of International Economic and Social Affairs (DIESA) and based on information available as at 1 April 1986.

The Survey analysed trends and prospects in the world economy (see p. 400) and addressed salient features in international trade and finance (see Chapter IV of this section).

Among key policy issues identified in the Survey as requiring international co-operation and action within a multilateral framework were: the need to see the international trading system and the international monetary and financial systems as interrelated, given the prevailing interdependence among countries and among policy issues linking trade with monetary and financial arrangements; the role of multilateral financial institutions as a source of both balance-of-payments financing and financial resource flows for longer-term economic development, particularly for LDCs; international commodity policy issues and co-operative solutions to the problems of more than 70 commodity-exporting developing countries; and the need for a broader view to be taken of the debt problem of developing countries. The Survey also set out policy issues requiring action among country groups and issues requiring action at the national level.

The Council's general discussion of international economic and social policy⁽⁸⁾ focused on three topics: the current economic situation and prospects for the world economy; the interrelatedness of policy issues in the fields of money, finance, resource flows, debt, trade, raw materials and development, which the Council, by decision 1986/121 of 21 May, had selected as a topic for priority consideration; and the role of the United Nations in enhancing international co-operation in those interrelated fields.

With regard to the world economic situation, many Council members noted that the performance of the world economy in 1985 and early 1986 had been disappointing, with world trade growing by only 3.2 per cent in 1985 and expected to grow by some 4 per cent in 1986, after increasing by nearly 9 per cent in 1984. Although developed market-economy countries expressed cautious optimism based on the prolongation of their recovery, most developing countries were unable to share that optimism, as the recovery was largely unrelated to their own experience. Many members expressed the view that sustained growth in the world economy required a reactivation of the development process in developing countries and referred to the Survey, which showed that, in 1985, 49 developing countries had stagnant or declining real incomes per capita. The continuing crisis in Africa received particular attention.

No country denied that developing countries should seek more self-reliant development or undertake economic readjustment of some internal sectors and policies. It was widely agreed, however, that self-reliant development would be impossible without international co-operation and a more favourable international environment. It was noted that the industrial countries could go a long way towards creating that environment if broad objectives were translated into concrete policy actions.

The need for international co-operation was strongly reasserted and it was stressed that economic deliberations had contributed to a better understanding of the interdependence between nations and of the linkages between the various interrelated issues. Some speakers were of the view that the international economic debate was moving closer to a consensus that an integrated approach was necessary to solve development, trade and finance problems; those issues should be dealt with in a comprehensive and systematic manner.

Some developed market economies cited developments in several multilateral forums as indications that multilateralism was not being eroded as claimed by many others. On behalf of many developed market economies, a representative recalled that the Council could make recommendations to the General Assembly, to Member States and to specialized agencies and could co-ordinate the specialized agencies' activities; no other body was mandated to consider world economic questions overall.

Another representative, speaking on behalf of many countries, stressed the United Nations role as a universal forum for negotiations on economic and social problems and regretted the practice whereby a small group of developed countries, acting outside the established multilateral institutions of the United Nations system, took decisions of concern to the entire world which were vital to the future of the international monetary, financial and trading systems.

Several speakers from the centrally planned economies and from developing countries emphasized the links between disarmament and development, indicating that the release of resources employed in armaments production and an improved international political situation would contribute to the reactivation of the development process and improve standards of living throughout the world, which should be part of a larger process of strengthening peace and international security. In that context, one representative proposed the convening of a world congress on problems of economic security and emphasized that international economic security should be the subject of discussion at the 1986 Assembly session.

On 23 July, by decision 1986/182, the Council took note of the Survey(8) the CDP report⁽¹⁾ and the Secretary-General's note transmitting the report of the ACC Task Force⁽⁵⁾

Report of the Secretary-General. In his September 1986 report to the General Assembly on the Organization's work (see p. 3), the Secretary-General stated that the Economic and Social Council needed to take the lead in assuring the co-ordinated application of resources to the most urgent economic problems on both a global and regional basis. He suggested that, in order to enhance the capacity of the United Nations to exercise clear leadership in the economic area, consideration be given to convening a short ministerial session of the Council to identify economic subjects that should receive priority attention during a given period of time.

Communications. During 1986, many communications dealing with general aspects of international economic relations were received by the Secretary-General. Among these were: a 23 January⁽¹⁰⁾ letter from Bangladesh transmitting documents issued at a meeting of heads of State and Government at which the South Asian Association for Regional Co-operation (SAARC) was established (Dhaka, 7 and 8 December 1985); a 3 March⁽¹¹⁾ letter from the USSR transmitting a section of the political report of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union to its twenty-seventh Congress, presented on 25 February; a 5 May⁽¹²⁾ letter from Morocco transmitting the final communique and resolutions of the sixteenth Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers (Fez, 6-10 January); an 8 May⁽¹³⁾ letter from Mozambique and the USSR transmitting the text of a joint communique of 3 April; a 15 May⁽¹⁴⁾ letter from India transmitting the final documents of the Ministerial Meeting of the Coordinating Bureau of Non-Aligned Countries (New Delhi, 16-19 April); a 21 May⁽¹⁵⁾ letter from Japan transmitting the Tokyo Economic Declaration issued at the Tokyo Economic Summit of seven major industrialized countries and representatives of the European Community (EC) (4-6 May); a note verbale of 13 June⁽¹⁶⁾ from Mexico transmitting the resolutions of the seventy-fifth Inter-Parliamentary Conference (Mexico City, 7-12 April); a statement by the World Federation of United Nations Associations on economic development and co-operation;⁽¹⁷⁾ a 7 July⁽¹⁸⁾ letter from Poland transmitting a joint statement by Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Mongolia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR on the contribution of the economic organs of the United Nations to the International Year of Peace (1986); a 22 September⁽¹⁹⁾ letter from the United Kingdom transmitting a memorandum giving fuller treatment of issues addressed in a speech by the United Kingdom, on behalf of EC, to the General Assembly on 23 September; a 30 September⁽²⁰⁾ letter from Zimbabwe transmitting the final documents adopted by the Eighth Summit Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries (Harare, 1-6 September); a 2 October⁽²¹⁾ letter from Yugoslavia transmitting a declaration adopted at a meeting of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Group of 77 developing countries (New York, 1 October); a 9 October⁽²²⁾ note verbale from Zimbabwe transmitting the final communique adopted by the Meeting of Ministers and Heads of Delegation of the Non-Aligned Countries to the General Assembly (New York, 2 October); a 21 October⁽²³⁾ letter from Peru transmitting the communique of the twelfth regular meeting of the Latin American Council (Lima, 16 and 17 October); a 23 October⁽²⁴⁾ letter from Romania transmitting the communique of the meeting of the Committee of Foreign Affairs Ministers of the States parties to the Warsaw Treaty (Bucharest, 14 and 15 October); a 28 November⁽²⁵⁾ letter from India forwarding the text of the declaration of the heads of State or Government of the member countries of SAARC issued following its Second Summit (Bangalore, 16 and 17 November); and a 3 December⁽²⁶⁾ letter from the USSR transmitting the communique issued at the forty-second meeting of the Session of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance (Bucharest, 3-5 November).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

The Second (Economic and Financial) Committee devoted a major part of its work during the Assembly's 1986 regular session to development and international economic co-operation, making recommendations on a number of topics (see APPENDIX IV, agenda item 79). A list of pertinent documents was included in part I of the Committee's report on that item,⁽²⁷⁾ which the Assembly took note of on 5 December when it adopted decision 41/434.

Proposed global economic negotiations

In accordance with a 1985 General Assembly decision⁽²⁸⁾ the question of launching a round of global negotiations on international economic co-operation for development, originally scheduled to begin in 1980,⁽²⁹⁾ was kept open to allow for continuing informal consultations. Also in accordance with a 1985 Assembly decision⁽³⁰⁾ the matter was included among several agenda items considered at the Assembly's resumed fortieth session in 1986.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

Reporting to the General Assembly's resumed fortieth session on 15 September 1986, its President stated that the launching of global negotiations on international economic co-operation for development had been on the Assembly's agenda for a number of years and repeated consultations had yielded no concrete progress. Therefore, he proposed, and the Assembly adopted, decision 40/459 B, by which it included the item in the draft agenda of its forty-first session.

At that session, the President proposed that consideration of the item be deferred until the forty-second (1987) session. The Assembly accepted his proposal in adopting on 19 December decision 41/467.

Proposed new international economic order

During 1986, aspects of a new international economic order, called for by the General Assembly in 1974,⁽³¹⁾ continued to be discussed in several United Nations bodies.

In June/July, the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law considered the report of its Working Group on the New International Economic Order which was drafting a legal guide on preparation of contracts for the supply and construction of industrial works. The Commission also discussed future work in the area of the new international economic order. (See LEGAL QUESTIONS, Chapter VI.)

Related resolution: GA 41/73.

International economic security

At the July 1986 session of the Economic and Social Council, the Syrian Arab Republic and the USSR sponsored a draft resolution entitled "International economic security".⁽³²⁾ By that text, the Council would have recalled a 1985 General Assembly resolution⁽³³⁾ requesting the Secretary-General to prepare a comprehensive analytical report on a concept of international economic security for submission to the Assembly in 1987. It would have considered that the system of international economic security should promote a stable, predictable and peaceful social and economic development of all countries, especially developing ones, and create conducive conditions for broad economic, scientific and technological co-operation among them on the basis of equality and mutual benefit.

The Secretary-General would have been requested, in preparing the analytical report, to take into account the need to identify points of existing or potential convergence in the approaches of countries and groups of countries towards solving global problems and unresolved issues in the world economy, as well as the need to promote the mutuality of interest for a secure, equitable and predictable system of international economic relations. He would also have been requested to take into account possible early warning measures for monitoring and assessing emerging problems in the world economy and for elaborating action-oriented recommendations on ways to tackle those problems. The Council would have recommended that CDP consider possible ways to promote international economic security and submit its views on the concept of such security to the Assembly in 1987.

On 22 July, on the proposal of the USSR, the Council decided to transmit the draft resolution to the Assembly for consideration and action (decision 1986/171).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

The Assembly's Second Committee had before it the draft text transmitted by the Council⁽³⁴⁾ as well as a 27 January letter⁽³⁵⁾ from the USSR to the Secretary-General transmitting a government memorandum on international economic security.

In November, a further draft resolution on international economic security was submitted and later revised and retitled (see below).

On 8 December, on the Committee's recommendation, the Assembly adopted resolution 41/184 by recorded vote.

Report of the Secretary-General in implementation of General Assembly resolution 40/173

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 40/173 of 17 December 1985, as adopted, in which it requested the Secretary-General to prepare a comprehensive analytical report on a concept of international economic security for submission to the General Assembly at its forty-second session, through the Economic and Social Council,

Recognizing, in this regard, that an integrated and co-ordinated approach to economic development and co-operation, with a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well-being, has been a primary accomplishment of the United Nations since its founding and is enshrined in Article 55 of the Charter of the United Nations,

Requests the Secretary-General, keeping in mind the already existing consensus on economic development and international co-operation, in preparing his report on international economic security, inter alia:

(a) To analyse approaches and contributions to economic development and international economic co-operation, and identify common elements in those approaches with emphasis on those that can further contribute to promoting international economic co-operation and development, particularly that of developing countries;

(b) To take into account the views expressed at the forty-first session of the General Assembly regarding possible ways and means of strengthening the dialogue on development and international economic co-operation for the benefit of all;

(c) To keep in mind the role and responsibilities of existing international and regional organizations, institutions and forums.

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/330/Add.1) by recorded vote (106-17-13), 21

November (meeting 34); 4-nation draft (A/C.2/41/L.33/Rev.D; agenda item 12. Sponsors: Angola, Democratic Yemen, Syrian Arab Republic, USSR.

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 2nd Committee 19,23-25,27, 28, 34; plenary 100.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Roland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zambia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain, United Kingdom.

Abstaining: Austria, Canada, Chile, China, Côte d'Ivoire, Finland, Greece, Israel, Sweden, Turkey, United States.

The United Kingdom, on behalf of the members of the European Economic Community, said that they had voted against the text because they did not see the need for it; the Assembly in 1985 had already requested the Secretary-General to report to it in 1987.

Israel abstained because it considered that the 1985 Assembly resolution contained the guidelines necessary for the Secretary-General to prepare his report. Liberia had hoped that there would be a consensus on the draft since it dealt with a concept which would be useful only if it were universally accepted. China considered the idea of international economic security to be very vague; it believed that it would be more useful to concentrate on implementing instruments already adopted rather than begin discussing an ambiguous idea. Canada said it would have joined in a consensus, but under the circumstances had to abstain. It hoped that the matter would continue to be considered.

Pakistan regretted that the Committee had voted on a concept which would be useful only if its value was universally acknowledged. Argentina understood that the draft would prejudice neither the conclusions of the report requested of the Secretary-General nor the consensus reached by the Assembly on development. Bangladesh said the resolutions referred to in the 1985 Assembly resolution should have been mentioned and hoped that the Secretary-General would take them into account when preparing his report. Indonesia hoped that the text would promote dialogue between the developing and developed countries; it was more important, however, to implement the concept of a new international economic order than to seek to define new concepts. Egypt said the concept of international economic security was of great interest to many countries, in particular the developing ones. Tunisia said the text dealt with a concept which was limited in scope and could be integrated into questions related to international economic co-operation and to development in the context of North-South negotiations.

Confidence-building measures

In response to a 1984 General Assembly request⁽³⁶⁾ the Secretary-General submitted to the Assembly through the Economic and Social Council a report on confidence-building in international economic relations⁽³⁷⁾ As requested by the Assembly, all States and United Nations organizations had been invited to submit their views on the subject. In an initial round of consultations mandated by the Assembly in 1983,⁽³⁸⁾ 21 Governments and 23 international organizations took part.

The Secretary-General's 1986 report comprised replies from 14 Member States and 21 United Nations organizations and bodies, an analysis of responses and conclusions. In the analysis it was stated that, in two rounds of consultations, many Governments and United Nations bodies had recognized the need to restore and enhance confidence in international economic relations, the fact that the United Nations had a major role in strengthening such confidence and that a complex set of actions by the international community as a whole appeared to be required.

The second round of consultations had confirmed that confidence-building would require three clusters of mutually supportive measures: reaffirmation of the basic principles and norms and instruments of international economic relations, as well as the basic principles of international law; joint efforts to revive international co-operation for growth and development and for expansion of trade and stabilization of financial and monetary relations; and new measures to promote or reinforce confidence in international economic co-operation. The consultations had also indicated a need for confidence-building measures in foreign indebtedness and international trade. Measures could be taken at the regional level, along with those of a global dimension. Several United Nations bodies had started to examine practical issues of confidence-building in international economic relations among countries having different economic and social systems and in a regional framework.

In spite of additional consultations and preliminary studies of the issues involved, there existed a considerable gap between the general recognition of the need for multilateral and national action to enhance confidence and the wide range of views on the most relevant measures and course of action for the United Nations. With regard to North-South relations, the concept of confidence-building measures related to how economic and other instabilities stemming from economic power, technological superiority or control over raw materials, natural resources, food, etc., could be reduced. More generally, the concept appeared to be linked to different perceptions of problems of economic sovereignty, national security and the orderly governance of the international economic system in an increasingly interdependent world economy.

Progress in building confidence could only be gradual and sustained if there was recognition of its universal benefits and unity of purpose among Member States in the endeavour. A new beginning of the process could be made by starting purposeful multilateral economic negotiations on issues of vital concern to the international community, particularly in the interrelated areas of debt, trade, money, finance and development.

The Secretary-General's consultations testified that efforts to improve confidence in international economic relations were an indispensable element in efforts to strengthen the United Nations as a universal forum for multilateral co-operation for economic development, negotiations and resolution of politically inspired economic disputes. There was a need to explore ideas which had been brought to the fore during consultations in the continuing debate on the United Nations role in peace, international security, economic development and social progress. In that connection, the report drew attention to the issue of international economic security (see above).

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1986/75 by roll-call vote.

Confidence-building in international economic relations

The Economic and Social Council,

Taking into account General Assembly resolutions 38/196 of 20 December 1983, 39/226 of 18 December 1984 and 40/173 of 17 December 1985,

Reiterating its view that there can be no sustained global development unless the deterioration of the economic situation of the developing countries is halted and the multilateral dialogue on key development issues is resumed,

Convinced that strengthening confidence in international economic relations and protecting those relations from the impact of political tensions is in the interest of all Member States,

1. Takes note with interest of the report of the Secretary-General on confidence-building in international economic relations, prepared on the basis of responses of Governments and United Nations bodies and organizations, and endorses the conclusions contained therein;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the matter under review and to take the necessary action to identify and promote possible economic confidence-building measures in appropriate regional and specialized bodies of the United Nations system.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/75

23 July 1986 Meeting 38 34-11-5 (roll-call vote)

Draft by Poland (E/1986/L35), orally revised; agenda item 3.
Meeting numbers. ESC 35, 38.

Roll-call vote in Council as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Bangladesh, Byelorussian SSR, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Egypt, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Guinea, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Jamaica, Morocco, Mozambique, Nigeria, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Romania, Rwanda, Senegal, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Syrian Arab Republic, USSR, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zimbabwe.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Iceland, Italy, Japan, Spain, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Brazil, Finland, Sierra Leone, Sweden, Turkey.

The roll-call vote was requested by the United States, which said it continued to question the meaning of the concept of confidence-building, a term which it considered an ill-defined and vacuous one drawn from political discussions elsewhere. The United Kingdom, speaking on behalf of the EC members, said they did not consider it appropriate to burden the Secretariat with work on an ill-defined concept.

Brazil abstained because it considered it to be a contradiction to try to introduce matters related to confidence-building through a divisive vote.

Egypt and India said they would have preferred such an important issue to be adopted by consensus.

The German Democratic Republic said it was convinced that confidence-building in international economic relations was an issue of major importance and hoped that the Secretariat would initiate the necessary action. Poland said the concept of confidence-building was neither imprecise nor vague and was in the interests of all States; it hoped that there would be increasing support for the concept.

Coercive economic measures against developing countries

In response to a 1985 General Assembly resolution⁽³⁹⁾ the Secretary-General in October 1986 submitted a report on economic measures as a means of political and economic coercion against developing countries⁽⁴⁰⁾. The report was prepared on the basis of replies received from 11 Member States in response to a request for comments and of the input of UNCTAD. The responding Governments were: Afghanistan, Bolivia, Byelorussian SSR, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, German Democratic Republic, Romania, Ukrainian SSR, Venezuela. The report summarized the replies under the headings of the scope of coercive economic measures, identification of such measures, their impact and purpose, and coercive economic measures and international institutions.

In conclusion, the report stated that the replies had highlighted that economic measures to exert coercion on another country should be rejected; that the adverse effect of such measures on the economic and social development of targeted developing countries could be of considerable importance and were detrimental to the health of the world economy as a whole; that restrictive measures adopted as coercive instruments should be lifted and countries should refrain from threatening or applying trade restrictions, blockades, embargoes or other economic measures; that improvements could be achieved through strict observance by all States of basic principles of international relations, respect for national independence and sovereignty, non-interference in internal affairs, non-use of force or of the threat of force, sovereign equality of States and fulfilment of international obligations and international law; that the promotion of international economic co-operation and application of basic principles embodied in General Assembly resolutions, through the adoption of new rules and principles governing trade, assistance and financial and monetary matters, would contribute towards ending the practice of economic coercion; and that the prospect of full intergovernmental agreement on the prohibition of such practices might be enhanced by a better understanding of the concept of economic coercion in the context of United Nations texts and of GATT.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 5 December, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted by recorded vote resolution 41/165.

Economic measures as a means of political and economic coercion against developing countries

The General Assembly,

Recalling the relevant principles set forth in the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling also its resolutions 2625(XXV) of 24 October 1970, containing the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, 3201(S-VI) and 3202(S-VI) of 1 May 1974, containing the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order, and 3281(XXIX) of 12 December 1974, containing the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States,

Reaffirming article 32 of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, which declares that no State may use or encourage the use of economic, political or any other type of measures to coerce another State in order to obtain from it the subordination of the exercise of its sovereign rights,

Bearing in mind the general principles governing international trade and trade policies for development contained in its resolution 1995(XIX) of 30 December 1964, United Nations Conference on Trade and Development resolution 152(VI) of 2 July 1983 on rejection of coercive economic measures, and the principles and rules of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and paragraph 7 (iii) of the Ministerial Declaration adopted on 29 November 1982 by the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade at their thirty-eighth session,

Reaffirming its resolutions 38/197 of 20 December 1983, 39/210 of 18 December 1984 and 40/185 of 17 December 1985,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the adoption and effects of economic measures taken by developed countries for coercive purposes, including their impact on international economic relations, and considering that further work should be undertaken in order to implement resolutions 38/197, 39/210 and 40/185,

Gravely concerned that the use of coercive measures adversely affects the economies and development efforts of developing countries and that, in some cases, those measures have worsened, creating a negative impact on international economic co-operation,

1. Calls upon the international community to adopt urgent and effective measures in order to eliminate the use of coercive measures against developing countries, which have been increasing and have taken new forms;

2. Deplores the fact that some developed countries continue to apply and, in some cases, have increased the scope and magnitude of economic measures that have the purpose of exerting, directly or indirectly, coercion on the sovereign decisions of developing countries subject to those measures;

3. Reaffirms that developed countries should refrain from threatening or applying trade restrictions, blockades, embargoes and other economic sanctions, incompatible with the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations and in violation of undertakings contracted multilaterally and bilaterally, against developing countries as a form of political and economic coercion that affects their economic, political and social development;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare a comprehensive, in-depth report on effective measures to eliminate the use of coercive measures against developing countries, mentioned in paragraph 1 above, and on the economic measures that adversely affect the development efforts of developing countries, mentioned in paragraph 3 above, taking into account existing information and including:

- (a) Relevant information from Governments;
- (b) Information from all the pertinent organs and organizations of the United Nations system;
- (c) Suggestions for monitoring application of the measures referred to in paragraph 3;
- (d) A compilation of the norms, rules, regulations, resolutions and other decisions existing in the pertinent organs and organizations of the United Nations system that are being violated by the use of coercive economic measures against developing countries;

5. Appeals to Governments and to the pertinent organs and organizations of the United Nations system to provide the necessary information to the Secretary-General, so that he may prepare the report called for in paragraph 4 above;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to submit the above-mentioned report to the General Assembly at its forty-second session.

5 December 1986 Meeting 98 115-23-3 (recorded vote)

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/857/Add.1) by recorded vote (113-21-4), 19 November (meeting 33); draft by Yugoslavia, for Group of 77 (A/C.2/41/L.30); agenda item 79 (a).

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Egypt, Ethiopia, Fiji, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Jamaica, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia.

Against: Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Ecuador,^a Finland, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain,^b Sweden, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Gambia, Greece, Turkey.

^a Later advised the Secretariat it had intended to vote in favour.

^b Later advised the Secretariat it had intended to abstain.

In the Second Committee, Israel proposed that the draft text be amended to delete the word "developed" from paragraph 2 and to replace the word "developed" by the word "all" in paragraph 3. Yugoslavia, for the Group of 77, said the sponsors could not accept the proposed amendments.

By recorded vote, taken at the request of the United States, the amendment to paragraph 2 was rejected by 106 votes to 3, with 27 abstentions, and the amendment to paragraph 3 was rejected by 104 to 3, with 29 abstentions.

New Zealand said it had voted against the draft because it had doubts as to the effectiveness of such methods and because the draft should not have referred only to the developed countries. Canada was against the draft because it did not treat all countries in the same way. The United Kingdom, speaking on behalf of the EC members, said they had voted against the text for reasons expressed in previous years and wondered about the value of putting such resolutions to the vote year after year.

Czechoslovakia, speaking also on behalf of Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Mongolia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, said that coercive economic measures were incompatible with the basic principles governing relations among States and were a violation of the principles embodied in the Charter and other relevant documents.

Indigenous entrepreneurs in economic development

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

At its July 1986 session, the Economic and Social Council had before it a draft resolution⁽⁴¹⁾ on "The role of entrepreneurship in promoting economic development", sponsored by Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Iceland, Italy, Japan, the United Kingdom and the United States. By this text, the Council would have affirmed the importance of promoting entrepreneurship and individual initiative as a means of mobilizing national resources and encouraging development, and invited UNDP and other United Nations organizations to support, through technical co-operation, the efforts of States to encourage entrepreneurship, providing incentives in all economic sectors and promoting private enterprise. The Secretary-General would have been requested to prepare a study on the subject for the 1987 General Assembly session, paying special attention to: the role of entrepreneurship and individual initiative in mobilizing national resources, setting priorities, and participating in economic and social growth and development; ways of encouraging and strengthening the private sector; and ways of facilitating the exchange of experience and information, especially among developing countries, on the role of entrepreneurship.

Amendments to the text were proposed by the Byelorussian SSR and the German Democratic Republic⁽⁴²⁾. These, as orally revised, would have deleted the words "the role of entrepreneurship in" from the title and would have revised, replaced or deleted all paragraphs of the text except the second preambular paragraph.

Zimbabwe also proposed amendments⁽⁴³⁾ which would have changed the title to read "The role of popular enterprises in promoting economic development", revised three preambular paragraphs and replaced the operative section.

On 22 July, by decision 1986/170, the Council decided to transmit the draft resolution and the amendments to the Assembly for consideration and action.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

The General Assembly had before it the draft Council resolution and amendments thereto (see above)⁽⁴⁴⁾. On 8 December, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, it adopted resolution 41/182 without vote.

Indigenous entrepreneurs in economic development

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the right of each country, in accordance with its chosen economic and social system and priorities, to determine its objectives, to endeavour to fulfil its development plans, to strengthen the public and private sectors of its economy and to promote the development of its human resources,

Recognizing the responsibility of the international community, in particular of the developed countries, to promote and endeavour to provide an equitable international economic environment, supportive of the development of developing countries, in the light of the goals and objectives of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Recognizing also the role and responsibility of each Government to promote development and provide an environment conducive to it,

Reaffirming its resolution 34/137 of 14 December 1979 on the role of the public sector in promoting the economic development of developing countries, as well as Economic and Social Council resolutions 1985/10 of 28 May 1985 on public administration and finance for development and 1986/73 of 23 July 1986 on the development of human resources,

Noting that indigenous entrepreneurs can play a crucial and positive role in mobilizing resources and promoting economic growth and socio-economic development,

Aware that many countries are actively seeking to encourage, strengthen and improve the effectiveness of indigenous entrepreneurs in expanding and modernizing productive capacities, particularly by increasing productivity and technological capabilities, and in contributing generally to the development process,

Bearing in mind that the promotion and development of indigenous entrepreneurs requires a dynamic capital formation process in developing countries, which is also related to financial and technical resources and to broader market opportunities available to these countries,

Recognizing that people are the mainspring and inspiration of social and economic progress,

1. Invites the Secretary-General and relevant organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, such as the regional commissions, the United Nations Development Programme, the International Labour Organisation, the International Trade Centre UNCTAD/GATT, the United Nations Industrial Development Organization and the World Bank, as well as regional development banks, within their existing mandates, programmes and priorities:

(a) To continue to support through, inter alia, technical co-operation projects, the efforts of States in encouraging indigenous entrepreneurs in the private, public and/or other sectors in accordance with national laws, priorities and regulations;

(b) To facilitate the practical exchange of information and experience among all countries on the role of indigenous entrepreneurs in economic development;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to study measures at the national and international levels to promote the contribution of indigenous entrepreneurs in both private and public sectors to the economic development of developing countries, drawing upon the work already in progress in the United Nations system and bearing in mind the need to avoid duplication of effort and cost, and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its forty-third session through the Economic and Social Council.

8 December 1986 Meeting 100 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/930Add.D without vote, 28 November (meeting 35); 9-nation draft (A/C.2/41/L28/Rev.2); agenda item 12.

Sponsors: Australia, Canada, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Iceland, Italy, Japan, United Kingdom, United States.

Economic rights and duties of States

The General Assembly's Second Committee in 1986 again discussed the implementation of the 1974 Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States⁽⁴⁵⁾

In December, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the Assembly adopted decision 41/440 by recorded vote.

Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States

At its 98th plenary meeting, on 5 December 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, requested the Secretary-General, in order to facilitate the elaboration of the comprehensive and analytical report requested in its resolution 40/182 of 17 December 1985, on the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, to circulate to all States a questionnaire which should, inter alia, seek information regarding:

(a) Their assessment of the implementation of the provisions of the articles of the Charter;

(b) All steps they have taken, including legal and economic regulations aimed at implementing the Charter;

(c) All national programmes and measures aimed at a broader implementation of the provisions of the Charter.

129-1-23 (recorded vote)

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/857Add.4) by vote (115-3-21), 4 November (meeting 27); draft by Yugoslavia, for Group of 77 (A/C.2/41/L.13); agenda item 79. Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 2nd Committee 19, 23, 27; plenary 98.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Cote d'Ivoire, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: United States.

Abstaining: Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Fiji, Finland, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, United Kingdom.

Israel said it did not believe it was appropriate for the Second Committee to instruct the Secretary-General as to how he should elaborate the report requested in the 1985 Assembly resolution on the subject⁽⁴⁶⁾ The United Kingdom, speaking on behalf of the EC members, said that they questioned the utility of requesting the Secretary-General to devote more time and resources to circulating a questionnaire on the subject. Sweden, speaking also on behalf of Finland, said that, since the 1985 Assembly resolution had called for a report to be submitted in 1989, there seemed to be little use in adopting a decision on the matter in 1986.

Czechoslovakia, also on behalf of Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Mongolia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, said it was important for the United Nations to appraise implementation of the Charter, the main aim being to expose the remaining obstacles to its implementation; Governments' replies to the questionnaire proposed in the draft could be useful in analysing which States had fulfilled the Charter's provisions and which declined to do so and why.

Economic co-operation among developing countries

During 1986, the United Nations continued to promote economic co-operation among developing countries (ECDC), mainly through UNCTAD. Technical co-operation among developing countries received the support of UNDP (see next chapter).

By a 15 September letter to the Secretary-General⁽⁴⁷⁾ Yugoslavia, on behalf of the Group of 77, transmitted the final documents of a High-Level Meeting on Economic Co-operation among Developing Countries (Cairo, Egypt, 18-23 August 1986). The documents comprised: the Cairo Declaration on ECDC, by which the Group reaffirmed the need to intensify ECDC and agreed on a series of measures towards that end; the report of the meeting; a decision on economic conditions in the occupied Palestinian territories; and a resolution on southern Africa.

Economic and social trends and policy

Two major economic reports, prepared by the United Nations Secretariat in 1986 as background to the annual discussion of international economic and social policy in the Economic and Social Council and the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board, noted that the slow-down in the pace of economic growth in major developed market-economy countries had also affected the developing countries, especially those whose fortunes were closely tied to international trade. The effects of the debt crisis on the developing countries were discussed in both reports (see Chapter IV of this section).

Economic surveys and trends

The World Economic Survey 1986(1) prepared by DIESA, said that in 1985 the world economy entered the critical phase in its recovery from the great slump of the early 1980s. Many countries had a disappointing economic performance and projections for both output and trade were revised downwards. For the year as a whole, world output grew slightly more than 3 per cent, a sharp deceleration from 1984. International trade grew at only one third of the 9 per cent of 1984.

Although the performance of the developed market economies in 1985 was well below expectations, the recovery continued for most countries in the group and for several of them it entered its fourth year in early 1986. Aside from its durability, a remarkable feature of the recovery was that significant expansion of output took place simultaneously with a sharp reduction in the inflation rate in nearly all of those countries. For the group as a whole, real output grew by 10.5 per cent in the period 1983-1985, while the inflation rate fell by 3 percentage points. Although their economic expansion continued in 1985, the real rate of growth of their combined gross domestic product (GDP) fell by more than 2 percentage points to 2.7 per cent.

With regard to the developing countries, events in 1985 again demonstrated the vulnerability of many of them to external events, which had increased partly as a result of inadequate external financing. After some progress in 1984, those developing countries whose fortunes were closely tied to international trade suffered a major setback in 1985; the rate of increase in their export volume fell significantly, their terms of trade worsened and for many of them interest rates in real terms rose sharply. For developing countries as a whole, the growth rate of GDP remained below 2.5 per cent for the fifth year in a row. Growth of net energy exporters remained insignificant and that of net energy importers fell from 3.8 per cent in 1984 to 3.3 per cent in 1985. Some of the largest developing economies, such as Brazil and India, grew at substantially higher rates than the average, but in the rest of the developing world gains made in 1984 were nearly wiped out in 1985. Nearly 60 per cent of developing countries, representing just under a third of the total population and located mainly in Africa and Latin America, had either stagnant or falling real per capita GDP in 1985. The weighted average inflation rate for the developing countries more than tripled between 1982 and 1985, reaching 150 per cent a year, a figure distorted by the very high inflation rates of only a few countries. The median inflation rate was only 10.5 per cent a year, about one percentage point less than in 1982. Only 10 developing countries had inflation rates in excess of 50 per cent in 1985.

In the centrally planned economies, despite a significant slow-down in output growth in nearly all major countries in 1985, aggregate growth was substantially above population growth, largely reflecting China's feverish growth. Excluding China, the group's average growth rate was lower than in 1983-1984, although there were still gains in per capita output. Eastern Europe's economic performance was adversely affected by bad weather conditions, with no increase in agricultural gross output in the USSR and a decline in Eastern Europe.

During 1985, there was a sharp slowing down of the United States economy, from 6.8 per cent growth in 1984 to 2.2 per cent in 1985, which affected world output significantly. The rate of growth of import volume in the United States fell by nearly two thirds from 24 per cent to 8.5 per cent in real terms, contributing to the slow-down in Japan and a number of East Asian developing economies. The rate of growth of import demand in developing countries and in Japan collapsed and decelerated markedly in Western Europe.

The world economy was beset not only by declining output growth rates but also by a high and rising debt burden in developing areas, continuing large internal and external imbalances in key industrial economies, highly volatile and misaligned exchange rates among key currencies, high unemployment rates in many European and developing countries and rising protectionism in key areas of international trade.

Despite declines in their nominal levels, interest rates remained high in real terms by historical standards and real interest rates paid by developing countries exporting primary commodities increased as prices of those commodities fell, making the debt problem particularly acute for developing countries with declining or stagnant export volumes. In 1985, debt-service levels were the highest in years for most debtor countries and interest payments alone were well in excess of $70 billion.

Regarding the short-term outlook for the world economy, the Survey stated that prospects for many countries, which had been expected to repeat the mediocre performances of 1985, had improved measurably. The rate of growth of real output in industrial countries was expected to accelerate while the average rate of inflation would continue to decline. However, the projected growth rates for developing countries were still low despite some expected improvement over 1985 figures.

Other chapters of the Survey dealt with international trade and finance issues (see Chapter IV of this section) and the final chapter dealt with the development crisis in sub-Saharan Africa. The Supplement to World Economic Survey 1985-1986(2) contained studies on international monetary reform and the socialist countries, the changing institutional character of international financial markets in the 1980s, countertrade in developing countries, and problems and policies of countries affected by desertification and drought.

In its chapter on the world economy in 1985 and prospects for the near future, the Trade and Development Report, 1986(3) stated that, during 1985, economic activity in developing countries continued to expand at a very moderate pace. At 2 per cent, the expansion of aggregate output was lower than the 2.5 per cent reached in 1984. In contrast to 1984, when there had been buoyant growth in the volume of exports and a small improvement in the terms of trade, the stagnation or decline in the volume of exports in 1985 compounded the effects of worsened terms of trade; improvements in trade balances were therefore achieved through renewed cuts in import volumes. The volume of imports for developing countries declined by more than 3 per cent, a contraction which reflected the continued adjustment of countries to their reduced export revenues, whether or not they already had current-account deficits.

The decline in interest rates was almost the only positive external development during 1985. Its effect on net interest payments for developing countries as a whole, however, was partly offset by reduced interest payment arrears, the increase in outstanding debt for the net debtor countries and the reduction in assets, and consequently of the net investment income, of some capital-surplus oil-exporting countries. Hardly any of the countries that had previously experienced debt-servicing difficulties were able to meet their scheduled payments in 1985, and the expectation that the improvement of their balances of payments which occurred in 1983 and 1984 would soon lead to a resumption of voluntary lending and sustained growth was unfulfilled.

Wide deceleration in the rate of growth of output took place in the developed market-economy countries in the first half of 1985, but growth accelerated again during the second half of the year. However, at 2.8 per cent for the year, the rise was short of the 4.5 per cent advance registered in 1984. Expansion was fuelled mainly by buoyant expenditure on private consumption; investment, on the other hand, weakened in most countries. For the year as a whole, growth in Western Europe was only about 2.3 per cent, much the same as in 1984. For the United States, output growth was weak during the first six months of 1985; there was a subsequent revival, but the annual rate of increase of gross national product, estimated at 2.5 per cent for 1985 as a whole, was much below the 6.6 per cent of 1984. There was also a slow-down in Japan during the first half of 1985 and, as the subsequent recovery was relatively weak, real output grew by 5 per cent for the year, somewhat less than the 5.8 per cent recorded for 1984. The sharp slow-down in the United States was the main cause of the lower growth for developed market-economy countries. Both private and public consumption rose strongly in the United States in 1985, but there was a marked deceleration in fixed investment, destocking and a negative contribution from net exports.

Economic growth in the socialist countries of Eastern Europe was not as pronounced in 1985 as in the two previous years, and some basic economic indicators remained slightly lower than expected. The growth of net material product (NMP) was half a percentage point lower than in 1984, but the expansion of gross industrial output was more marked, approaching the 1983-1984 levels. Economic expansion in the USSR came close to the targets of the annual plan. The growth of NMP used for domestic consumption and accumulation reached about 3.1 per cent, against 2.6 per cent in 1984. The rate of expansion of industrial output of 1983-1984 was maintained in 1985, reaching 3.9 per cent. A weakness persisted in the energy sector, particularly during the first half of the year, although an annual rate of 4.6 per cent was reached in the second half. Despite improved grain production, gross agricultural output remained unchanged. The performance of other socialist countries of Eastern Europe varied considerably. The high growth rates of NMP in 1983-1984 in the German Democratic Republic and Czechoslovakia continued in 1985. However, the modest performance of Bulgaria and, particularly, Hungary contributed to a 1.8 percentage point decline from the previous year in the NMP growth rate for the socialist countries of Eastern Europe, other than the USSR, as a whole.

During early 1985, the Chinese economy continued to expand at an accelerated pace, exceeding target rates. However, increasing concern about the overheating of the economy led the Government to reassert central control of various aspects of the economy and to move more slowly towards implementing reforms already announced. Up to July, industrial output grew at an annual rate of 23 per cent. Although, by the end of the year, the rate had been brought down to 8 per cent, for the whole year it was almost 18 per cent, twice as high as the average for 1980-1984 and 4 percentage points higher than for 1984 alone. The expansion's sheer magnitude continued to put strains on infrastructure and brought about a rise in prices of intermediate goods, such as iron and steel. Agricultural output also continued to expand rapidly, by 13 per cent in value terms. Rural enterprises and cash crops were the most dynamic sectors, with output of the former increasing by 35 per cent. Conversely, the output of some traditional crops like cotton and food grains declined.

Other chapters of the Report dealt with deflation, debt and trade, and debt, growth and development (see Chapter IV of this section).

A paper on prospects for developing economies, 1986-1995,⁽¹⁾ was prepared by the World Bank for the June 1986 meeting of the Preparatory Committee for the International Conference on the Relationship between Disarmament and Development (see p. 78). The paper reviewed the recent performance of developing countries, described two economic paths for the world economy for the next 10 years, considered capital requirements and sources of net financing flows, described recent international initiatives and the World Bank's role in helping to restore and sustain economic growth in developing countries, and considered the links between flows from traditional sources of capital supply and military outlays.

Economic and social research and policy analysis

On 22 July 1986 (resolution 1986/51), the Economic and Social Council endorsed the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination⁽²⁾ on the cross-organizational programme analysis on economic and social research and policy analysis in the United Nations system⁽⁶⁾ (see Chapter XXIII of this section).

Development planning, administration and education

The capital requirements of developing countries were the focus of the work of CDP at its 1986 session; the Committee emphasized the crucial role of multilateral co-operation in restoring flows of finance to them. By resolution 41/174, the General Assembly invited States to support the efforts of developing countries to apply a unified approach to development analysis and planning and requested the Secretary-General to take a unified approach into account when preparing economic and social studies.

Development planning

The Committee for Development Planning held its twenty-second session in New York from 19 to 22 March 1986.⁽¹⁾

Composed of 24 experts appointed by the Economic and Social Council, it focused on the capital requirements of developing countries, emphasizing the crucial role of multilateral co-operation in restoring flows of finance to them (see p. 510). It also analysed the world economic situation (see p. 390) and addressed the question of the eligibility of Kiribati, Mauritania and Tuvalu for inclusion in the list of LDCs (see p. 405).

The Committee proposed the issue of "adjustment with growth" as the subject of its 1987 session. It would examine the nature of growth-oriented adjustment policies and programmes and the dimensions of such a process.

Unified approach to development planning

In response to a 1983 General Assembly resolution,⁽²⁾ the Secretary-General submitted a report on a unified approach to development analysis and planning.⁽³⁾ The report was prepared on the basis of information received from 11 Governments and 14 international organizations. In addition, Sweden submitted a paper prepared by the Swedish International Development Authority concerning the experience of the Swedish Government in that regard. Replies from a further two States were included in an addendum.

In the report's observations and conclusions, it was noted that the reported national and international experience in applying the concept of a unified approach to development analysis and planning pointed to a sense of realism and pragmatism in facing the development challenges of the 1980s. There was increased appreciation of the value of formulating objectives in a longer-term perspective and the need for continuity in development objectives over a longer period was stressed by Governments as the most important prerequisite of successful planning.

The report noted that new approaches to promoting economic and social development were emerging. That the State could have become overburdened in its role as economic agent and provider of social services was a major new concern in some cases. In many countries, increased attention was being given to the role of price mechanisms, both to measure opportunity costs and better reflect real scarcities, and also to promote greater efficiency in production and in satisfying consumer demand. Other new approaches included decentralization and encouragement of self-management and wider participation in decision-making at the grass-roots level. There was a continued search for effective social mechanisms to make it easier to consider economic and social aspects of development at the local level in an interrelated way. The new perception of a unified approach also appeared to focus on concerns with the natural environment and with social and economic conditions for the development of science and indigenous technological capability.

Considerable headway appeared to have been made in sectoral planning in areas such as population, health or food. United Nations organizations were continuing to assist Governments in planning for those sectors having linkages to overall development objectives.

Since only a limited number of Governments responded to the Secretary-General's request for information on a unified approach, themes of common concern were not necessarily representative, the report noted. However, they coincided with the experience of many countries as expressed in a variety of international forums.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 5 December, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/174 without vote.

Unified approach to development analysis and planning

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 35/56 of 5 December 1980, the annex to which contains the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Recalling also its resolution 38/179 of 19 December 1983 on a unified approach to development analysis and planning,

Mindful of its resolution 40/178 of 17 December 1985 on strengthening the role of the United Nations in the field of international economic, scientific-technological and social co-operation, in which it stressed, inter alia, the willingness of Member States to strengthen the United Nations system as a framework for constructive dialogue and joint efforts in solving international economic problems, especially those confronting the developing countries,

Bearing in mind Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/51 of 22 July 1986, in which the Council endorsed the conclusions of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination at its twenty-sixth session, concerning the United Nations special responsibility for carrying out research on global and sectoral issues, and their interrelationship, in order to assist Member States and the deliberations of the competent intergovernmental bodies,

Believing in the usefulness of integrating economic and social components in the formulation of policies and programmes at the national and international levels for the benefit of social and economic progress and human well-being,

Stressing that the eradication of hunger and malnutrition and the solution of other economic and social problems on the basis of industrial, agricultural and rural development are among the objectives of the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Recalling the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990, adopted by the General Assembly at its thirteenth special session,

Reaffirming that each State has the sovereign and inalienable right to choose its economic and social system in accordance with the will of its people and without outside interference,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on a unified approach to development analysis and planning, in particular the observations and conclusions contained therein;

2. Considers that an integrated approach to development analysis and planning, which takes into account differing economic, social and political features of national economies, is one of the tools for the attainment of sustained social, economic and human development;

3. Invites States to support the efforts of developing countries, if they so request, to strengthen their management capacity to apply a unified approach to development analysis and comprehensive macro-economic strategies and planning, especially with regard to integrating food and agricultural production in all sectors and supporting industrialization, economic and social infrastructure and human resources development;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to take into account a unified approach to development analysis and planning when preparing economic and social studies, ongoing research, projections and reports, including the World Economic Survey and the Report on the World Social Situation, as well as the appraisal of the implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade;

5. Also requests the Secretary-General to continue to make available to States the experience gained in the use of a unified approach to development analysis and planning, taking into account the fact that new ideas relating to the promotion of social and economic development are emerging.

Development administration

In 1986, the United Nations Department of Technical Co-operation for Development (DTCD) implemented 158 projects to assist developing countries to enhance management performance and improve overall productivity. Governments increasingly sought assistance in reviewing the role of public administration in national development and in devising new approaches to economic management.

During the year, DTCD, whose main source of funds was UNDP, delivered $14.9 million in assistance, of which 42 per cent was spent in Africa, 20 per cent in Asia and the Pacific, 15 per cent in the Americas, and 23 per cent in the Middle East, the Mediterranean and Europe and for interregional projects. Interregional advisers undertook 48 missions, largely in financial administration, including government budgeting and financial management, accounting and auditing, public enterprise, tax reform and mobilization. Advisory services were also requested in management development and training, administrative reform, personnel administration and information systems management⁽⁴⁾

Development education

At its April 1986 session⁽⁵⁾ the Joint United Nations Information Committee (JUNIC) (see p. 367) reviewed a conceptual paper on the role, function and place of the United Nations Non-Governmental Liaison Services, prepared by the JUNIC Ad Hoc Working Group on Development Education. JUNIC endorsed the recommendations in the paper and agreed to annex an edited version to its report to ACC.

By resolution 41/68 A, the General Assembly recommended that the United Nations Department of Public Information be urged to disseminate widely information on acute world economic problems, particularly on the critical economic situation in Africa, the severe economic difficulties of LDCs and the external debt crisis and development, as well as on the adverse effect of the international economic environment on developing countries.

Rural development

The ACC Task Force on Rural Development, meeting at Geneva from 12 to 14 March 1986,⁽¹⁾ reviewed work accomplished since its 1985 meeting⁽²⁾ in three areas: joint action at the country and regional levels; people's participation in rural development; and monitoring and evaluation.

A progress report by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the lead agency in the rural development area, indicated that progress was being made towards more concerted efforts in rural poverty alleviation.

Special economic areas

During 1986, various United Nations bodies again considered the specific problems of particular groups of developing countries. Following recommendations of CDP and the Economic and Social Council (decision 1986/153), the General Assembly, by resolution 41/186, added Kiribati, Mauritania and Tuvalu to the list of LDCs. By resolution 41/163, the Assembly requested the Secretary-General to prepare a comprehensive report, including specific recommendations, to enable the Assembly in 1988 to undertake a thorough review of the problems and special needs of island developing countries.

Developing countries

In October 1986, a draft resolution on urgent measures for reactivation of growth and development in developing countries⁽¹⁾ was introduced in the General Assembly's Second Committee by Yugoslavia, on behalf of the Group of 77. By that draft, the Assembly would have emphasized the urgency for the international community to take action to support sustained and equitable growth and development. It would have expressed concern at the continuing deflationary tendencies in the world economy, aggravated by the policies of the major developed countries which needed to be corrected in order to create an external environment more supportive of the development process. The Assembly would have stressed that a substantial increase in financial flows was needed to meet the serious financing gap faced by developing countries and would have emphasized the need to increase development finance, particularly to LDCs, so as to reach accepted targets for official development assistance. It would also have reaffirmed the need for a political and global approach to the debt crisis in a spirit of shared responsibility between debtor developing countries, creditor developed countries, international multilateral financial institutions and commercial banks, in a manner that contributed to the sustained growth and development of developing countries.

Further, the Assembly would have emphasized the urgent need to improve the market access of developing countries' exports and their terms of trade and urged action to reverse the deteriorating trend in world trade in commodities. The need to provide stable and supportive monetary and financial conditions for the development process would have been reaffirmed and Governments and United Nations organizations would have been urged to take measures to ensure implementation of Assembly resolution S-13/2 concerning the Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development.

In November, the sponsors informed the Second Committee that they had decided not to press for adoption of the draft in view of the failure to reach agreement on a final text in informal consultations.

Related resolution: GA 41/133.

Least developed countries

The problems of the States officially designated as LDCs were considered in several United Nations forums during 1986, including the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board, the UNDP Governing Council and ACC.

With the General Assembly deciding in December to act on CDP and Economic and Social Council recommendations to include Kiribati, Mauritania and Tuvalu in the United Nations list of LDCs, the number rose to 40. The others were: Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Benin, Bhutan, Botswana, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Comoros, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Gambia, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Malawi, Maldives, Mali, Nepal, Niger, Rwanda, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Sudan, Togo, Uganda, United Republic of Tanzania, Vanuatu, Yemen.

Identification of LDCs

CDP action. In March⁽²⁾ CDP re-examined the eligibility of Kiribati and Tuvalu for inclusion in the United Nations list of LDCs, having been unable to reach a conclusion in 1985⁽³⁾ because of inadequate information on their economies. In accordance with a 1985 General Assembly resolution⁽⁴⁾ and a 1986 Economic and Social Council decision (see below), CDP also examined the case of Mauritania.

Based on data supplied by the Secretariat on the three criteria for determination of eligibility—per capita GDP, share of manufacturing output in GDP, and adult literacy rate—CDP recommended that all three countries be added to the list.

UNDP action. On 27 June⁽⁵⁾ the UNDP Governing Council invited the UNDP Administrator to take steps to implement the 1985 Assembly resolution on Mauritania⁽⁴⁾ and to ensure that Mauritania received those benefits to which it might be entitled as an LDC when the Assembly approved the CDP recommendation that it be added to the list. It also invited the Administrator to take similar action in respect of Kiribati and Tuvalu.

By decision 1986/103 of 7 February 1986, the Economic and Social Council requested CDP to examine the socio-economic situation of Mauritania and to consider including it in the list of LDCs.

By decision 1986/153 of 11 July, the Council endorsed CDP's recommendation regarding the inclusion of Kiribati, Mauritania and Tuvalu in the list and recommended that the General Assembly approve the inclusion at its 1986 session.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December 1986, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/186 without vote.

Inclusion of Kiribati, Mauritania and Tuvalu in the list of the least developed countries

The General Assembly,

Noting Economic and Social Council decision 1986/153 of 11 July 1986, in which the Council endorsed the conclusion and recommendation of the Committee for Development Planning regarding the inclusion of Kiribati, Mauritania and Tuvalu in the list of the least developed countries, Decides to include Kiribati, Mauritania and Tuvalu in the list of the least developed countries.

Programme of Action for the 1980s

During 1986, following the 1985 endorsement by the General Assembly⁽⁶⁾ of the conclusions and recommendations of the mid-term global review of the implementation of the Substantial New Programme of Action for the 1980s for LDCs, United Nations bodies continued to monitor SNPA's implementation. SNPA was adopted in 1981 by a United Nations conference⁽⁷⁾ and endorsed by the Assembly later that year⁽⁸⁾

UNCTAD action. On 21 March⁽⁹⁾ the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board invited the UNCTAD Secretary-General to start consultations to enable the General Assembly in 1987 to decide on the level, mandate, date and venue for the 1990 review and appraisal of SNPA, as well as the preparatory process for such a review, and requested him to report to the Board on progress made.

UNDP action. On 27 June 1986⁽¹⁰⁾ the UNDP Governing Council took note of the UNDP Administrator's report on implementation of SNPA during 1985⁽¹¹⁾ and endorsed new arrangements initiated by the Administrator in connection with managing the Special Measures Fund for LDCs and financing round-table activities during the fourth programming cycle (1987-1991). The Governing Council recognized the need for further improvement of the round-table process and requested the Administrator to ensure that the process provided an effective instrument for implementing SNPA, taking into account the views presented in the Council, especially those of LDCs. The Administrator was requested to report in 1987 on progress made in that respect.

During 1986, round-table-related activities were held with UNDP assistance for Bhutan, Burkina Faso, Cape Verde, the Central African Republic, Chad, Equatorial Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Maldives, the Niger, Rwanda, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone and Togo. Other countries elected to have the World Bank assist them with review meetings.

Funding for the round-table process and other activities benefiting LDCs was provided by the UNDP Special Measures Fund for LDCs. Contributions to the Fund in 1986 totalled $12 million and 10 countries pledged $6.1 million for 1987. Resources from a trust fund established in 1983⁽¹²⁾ for a special contribution from the Netherlands for LDCs were used to prepare round-table conferences and to finance follow-up activities to conferences held in recent years.

In a report to the UNDP Governing Council on 1986 activities⁽¹³⁾ the UNDP Administrator stated that strengthening the economic management and the aid co-ordination capacity of LDCs was a major objective of SNPA. UNDP had made that area a priority for its activities in LDCs, with $46.6 million (about 19 per cent) of the total indicative planning figure resources committed to LDCs being devoted to general development issues, policy and planning. That sector was also a priority area of the Special Measures Fund, with some $3.9 million of a total of $6.2 million committed to projects in economic management and aid co-ordination.

During 1986, UNDP continued to give highest priority to assisting the poorest countries (see next chapter). Assistance to LDCs was also provided by the United Nations Capital Development Fund, the United Nations Sudano-Sahelian Office and the United Nations Volunteers programme.

ACC action. An inter-agency consultation on SNPA follow-up (Geneva, 22 and 23 September 1986)⁽¹⁴⁾ discussed the results of the 1985 mid-term global review of SNPA; action taken by the United Nations system to implement the 1985 General Assembly resolution on implementation of SNPA;⁽⁶⁾ co-ordination, follow-up and monitoring arrangements, including experiences of round-table and consultative group meetings; and further steps to be taken to implement SNPA, taking into account the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990 (see Chapter III of this section).

Land-locked developing countries

In accordance with a 1985 UNCTAD Trade and Development Board resolution⁽¹⁵⁾ the UNCTAD secretariat submitted to the Board's September 1986 session a report on progress in implementing specific action related to the particular needs and problems of land-locked developing countries.⁽¹⁶⁾ The report was based on replies received from individual countries and international and intergovernmental organizations in response to a request by the UNCTAD Secretary-General, and on UNCTAD's own work in the areas specified in the 1985 resolution.

The report stated that the majority of donor countries reiterated that they did not recognize the land-locked developing countries as a category for which they had established a special assistance programme. They agreed, however, that those countries faced problems resulting from geographical handicaps and continued to assist them in that context.

That consideration also applied to the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, which assisted land-locked developing countries on the basis of the special economic circumstances and requirements of individual countries, rather than for geographical reasons. The United Nations regional commissions, UNDP and UNCTAD did have special technical assistance programmes designed particularly for land-locked developing countries.

From the pattern of sectoral allocation of assistance by donor countries, the report made the following observations: that all donors provided support for general economic development because they recognized that most land-locked developing countries were also least developed; that, because of the geographical disadvantages of those countries, there was an effort by donor countries to address transport and communications problems within their assistance programmes; that several major donor countries also continued to support regional co-operation groupings which offered a framework within which many problems of land-locked countries could be most effectively tackled; and that the scarcity of skilled manpower in those countries had prompted all major donor countries to include training and technical assistance programmes in their assistance packages. These observations also applied to the assistance provided by United Nations bodies and related agencies.

Noting that this support was not adequate to meet the growing requirements of these countries, the report stated that donor countries and institutions should make more deliberate efforts to address themselves to the transit-transport problem in their overall assistance programmes by giving direct support in critical areas in that sector. Such support should include development and maintenance of transit-transport infrastructure and services, improving management practices in transit-transport operations, training, simplifying customs and trade procedures and strengthening institutions in that sector.

Island developing countries

UNDP action. On 27 June 1986,⁽¹⁷⁾ the UNDP Governing Council, recognizing the special needs of island developing countries, requested the UNDP Administrator to submit in 1987 a report on his evaluation of UNDP's role in implementing specific measures in favour of those countries, in particular their efforts to achieve self-sustaining economic growth. The Administrator was also requested to bring to the Council's attention any special problems encountered by island developing countries in complying with a 1985 Council decision on the fourth programming cycle⁽¹⁸⁾ which, among other things, called for the application of special criteria in allocating financial resources to countries with specific geographical disadvantages.

Report of the Secretary-General. In accordance with a 1984 General Assembly resolution⁽¹⁹⁾ the Secretary-General submitted in August 1986 a report on specific measures in favour of island developing countries⁽²⁰⁾

The report, prepared by the UNCTAD secretariat, contained a summary of replies received from Governments, United Nations bodies, and international, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to a request for information on implementation of the 1984 Assembly resolution.

The report concluded that several donor countries and some institutions did not recognize island developing countries as a special category of developing countries requiring a particular type of assistance. Both UNCTAD and the Assembly, however, recognized the problems faced by island developing countries, particularly those suffering handicaps due to their smallness, remoteness, vulnerability to natural disasters, transport constraints, great distances from market centres, highly limited internal markets, lack of natural resources, dependence on a few commodities, shortage of administrative personnel and heavy financial burdens.

Although awareness of the problems of island developing countries, particularly the smaller ones, had increased, there was a continued need for wider recognition—accompanied by practical effects—by some donors and international bodies in order to help them to alleviate their special geographical disadvantages and develop their potential. Given the geographical concentration of island developing countries in the South Pacific and the Caribbean and, to a lesser extent, the Indian Ocean, many common problems of those countries could be most effectively addressed at the regional or subregional level, as indeed they already were to a considerable extent. It was recommended that the relevant regional institutions be further strengthened for that purpose.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 5 December 1986, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/163 without vote.

Specific measures in favour of island developing countries

The General Assembly,

Recalling the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order, contained in its resolutions 3201(S-VI) and 3202(S-VI) of 1 May 1974, the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, contained in its resolution 3281(XXIX) of 12 December 1974, resolution 3362(S-VII) of 16 September 1975 on development and international economic co-operation, and the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, contained in the annex to its resolution 35/56 of 5 December 1980,

Recalling also its resolutions 31/156 of 21 December 1976, 32/185 of 19 December 1977, 34/205 of 19 December 1979, 35/61 of 5 December 1980, 37/206 of 20 December 1982 and 39/212 of 18 December 1984, relating to the special needs and problems of island developing countries,

Reiterating the call for specific action in favour of island developing countries contained in resolutions 98(IV) of

31 May 1976, 111(V) of 3 June 1979 and 138(VI) of 2 July 1983 of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development,

Recognizing the difficult problems faced by island developing countries, in particular those which suffer handicaps due especially to their smallness, remoteness, vulnerability to natural disasters, constraints in transport and communications, great distances from market centres, a highly limited internal market, lack of natural resources, the acute problem of obtaining fresh water supplies, heavy dependence on imports and a few commodities, depletion of non-renewable resources, shortage of administrative personnel and heavy financial burdens,

Mindful of the fact that timely additional efforts are needed to implement the specific measures required to assist island developing countries in offsetting the major handicaps that hinder their development process,

Noting with regret that the comprehensive review of the problems and needs of island developing countries requested in resolution 39/212 has not been possible during the forty-first session of the General Assembly,

1. Reaffirms its resolution 39/212 and other relevant resolutions of the United Nations and of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, and calls for their immediate and effective implementation;

2. Welcomes decision 86/33 of 27 June 1986 of the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme on the special needs of island developing countries;

3. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General concerning the implementation by the international community of measures in favour of island developing countries;

4. Expresses its appreciation to all States and organizations that have responded to the special needs of island developing countries and have facilitated the implementation of resolutions in favour of those countries;

5. Notes with concern that the specific measures envisaged in the relevant resolutions of the United Nations and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, including Conference resolution 138(VI), have not yet been fully implemented, and calls upon all States, international organizations and financial institutions to respond positively in this regard and to intensify efforts in the implementation of specific measures in favour of island developing countries;

6. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, in co-operation with Governments and regional and other competent institutions, to continue the programme of in-depth studies of the common problems of island economies and of the constraints inhibiting their economic growth and development and, in this regard, to seek the views of island developing countries and other interested countries, with the objective of proposing concrete specific action;

7. Requests the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to intensify its role as the focal point for specific action at the global level in favour of island developing countries and as a catalyst in this regard, inter alia, by organizing and facilitating the cross-regional interchange of information and experience in full co-operation with regional and subregional organizations;

8. Requests the competent organizations of the United Nations system, in particular the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the United Nations Development Programme, the United Nations Capital Development Fund and the regional commissions, and invites the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, to take adequate measures to respond positively to the particular needs of island developing countries;

9. Requests the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, to renew his efforts with regard to the possibility of organizing a follow-up meeting to the interregional workshop on planning held in Saint Vincent and the Grenadines in November 1983, with the participation of representatives of island developing countries and other interested countries;

10. Also requests the Secretary-General to prepare an analytical and comprehensive report, which should make use, inter alia, of the work in progress in the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the United Nations Development Programme and should include specific recommendations to ensure that the General Assembly at its forty-third session is able to undertake a thorough review of the problems and special needs of island developing countries.

Chapter II

Operational activities for development

In 1986, a total of $6.6 billion in official development assistance (ODA) was transferred through the United Nations system to developing countries. Contributions for the system's operational activities totalled $6.5 billion in 1986, an increase of $1 billion over 1985. The triennial policy review of the system's operational activities for development took place in 1986; the Economic and Social Council (resolution 1986/74) and the General Assembly (resolution 41/171) recommended action by the governing bodies of United Nations organizations, their secretariats and Member States, and urged all countries to increase their voluntary contributions for operational activities for development, particularly those countries whose performance was not commensurate with their capacity.

For the first time in its history, the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) surpassed $1 billion in income received under its main programme and through special-purpose funds and cost-sharing. In November 1986, at the annual United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities, actual and pledged contributions for 1987 amounted to over $800 million, again the highest level in UNDP history. Expenditures from UNDP central resources during the year totalled $911 million, with $689.2 million expended on field programme activities.

The United Nations Department of Technical Co-operation for Development (DTCD) executed a programme of $145.9 million in 1986, an increase of 15 per cent over 1985. During the year, the Department had under execution 954 technical co-operation projects.

The second high-level intergovernmental meeting on international volunteerism and development called for an expansion of the United Nations Volunteers (UNV) programme and increased contributions to the UNV Special Voluntary Fund. The programme reached an all-time high during 1986, with 1,267 serving or accepted volunteers. On 5 December 1986, International Volunteer Day was celebrated for the first time.

In 1986, the UNDP Special Unit for Technical Co-operation among Developing Countries supported 112 activities costing $971,000, a 22.9 per cent increase over 1985. By decision 41/457, the Assembly named the Trust Fund for Economic Co-operation among Developing Countries/Technical Co-operation among Developing Countries the Perez Guerrero Trust Fund for Economic and Technical Co-operation among Developing Countries.

Delivery and approval of new projects in developing countries by the United Nations Capital Development Fund (UNCDF) increased substantially in 1986. The Fund approved $46.3 million in funding for 24 new projects and 27 grant increases during the year, with much of the work focused on agriculture and irrigation in rural areas of the regions of Africa and Asia and the Pacific.

General aspects

In his annual report on United Nations operational activities for development,⁽¹⁾ the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation (DIEC) stated that in 1986 some $6.6 billion in ODA was channelled to the developing countries through the financial institutions and organizations of the United Nations system. That figure represented about 15 per cent of total bilateral and multilateral ODA to those countries. Development grants financed by UNDP, UNDP funds, the United Nations Fund for Population Activities (UNFPA), the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), the World Food Programme (WFP) and other United Nations sources amounted to $2.6 billion, or 7 per cent, of total ODA, while concessional loans provided by the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD) and the International Development Association (IDA) amounted to some $3 billion. Non-concessional loans through the World Bank and the International Finance Corporation (IFC) to developing countries totalled $0.4 billion. In addition, a further $0.6 billion was spent on grant-financed refugee, humanitarian, special economic and disaster relief activities (see next chapter).

In 1986, the system's net transfers of concessional assistance for development, which comprised concessional loans and development grants, totalled $5.5 billion. Of that amount, almost seven eighths went to the Africa and Asia and Pacific regions. The least developed countries (LDCs) (see p. 405) received 37 per cent of all concessional development assistance. Overall in 1986, such assistance amounted to $1.17 per capita; in the poorest countries the figure was $2.1.

In terms of sectoral coverage, the system's grant-funded development assistance strongly emphasized two sectors—agriculture/forestry/fisheries and health. Other important areas were: natural resources; transport and communications; general development issues, policy and planning; industry; education; social conditions; and equity, population and human settlements.

Policy review. As requested by the General Assembly in 1983⁽⁵⁾ and 1985,⁽⁶⁾ the DIEC Director-General submitted a report⁽⁷⁾ for the triennial policy review of the United Nations system's operational activities for development. The report stated that those activities absorbed about 60 per cent of the regular and extrabudgetary resources of the system and comprised two fifths of the total disbursements of ODA by multilateral agencies. Each year the system supported over 6,000 development programme projects in over 150 developing countries and territories at the national, regional and global levels.

Noting that the need for an integrated approach to development was being increasingly recognized by Member States, the report cited the following examples of efforts being made within the system to promote such an approach: the fight against poverty; the continuity between emergency action and development; adjustment policies; and women and development.

The report put forward 20 policy recommendations to improve United Nations assistance to Governments in co-ordinating external development assistance at the local, sectoral and global levels. In addition to a general recommendation that the system should give high priority to assisting Governments in their co-ordination efforts, other proposed measures included: enhanced co-ordination among resident co-ordinators and their aid partners at the local level; a comparative study of existing inter-ministerial co-ordination practices at the global level; mobilization of resources for specific programmes in LDCs and other low-income countries based on a mutually agreed framework for multilateral and bilateral aid; joint needs assessments and programming exercises by the main financing agencies and donors with selected developing countries; and various initiatives in support of Governments' priority programmes for human resource development and institution-building.

Other recommendations were: a call for a more open and systematic dialogue between the capital lending and technical assistance agencies and programmes; a more active role for WFP in round tables and consultative groups to improve coherence between food aid and other development assistance; a more systematic exploration of the complementary use of United Nations system resources and of the contribution of non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and private and public sector enterprises; better project design; and a strengthening of the managerial capacities of Governments. In addition, the report called for: qualitative evaluation of the results of projects or programmes; greater cost-effectiveness through consistent use of developing countries' capacities; stimulation, support and co-financing of South-South projects; more equitable procurement through UNDP's Inter-Agency Procurement Services Unit; adequate resources for UNDP; and higher levels of contributions for operational activities as a whole.

In response to a 1985 General Assembly request⁽⁸⁾ for the views of the governing bodies of United Nations organizations on system-wide policy issues affecting operational activities, the Secretary-General submitted⁽⁹⁾ information received from eight specialized agencies (ILO, FAO, UNESCO, WHO, UPU, ITU, IMO, IFAD) and IAEA, five United Nations bodies (UNCTAD, UNICEF, UNHCR, UNDP, UNCHS), and three regional commissions (ECE, ESCAP, ESCWA).

In order to comply with the Assembly's request, the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board, on 21 March⁽⁶⁾ requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General to invite member States to comment on policy issues reflected in a secretariat document and requested the secretariat to compile those comments and submit them to the Economic and Social Council, together with comments made during the Board's March session. On 25 April⁽⁷⁾ the UNICEF Executive Board listed some system-wide issues that it considered of particular relevance to the review (see p. 810) and requested the Executive Director to prepare a background note on them to assist the Assembly and the Council in their deliberations. On 24 April⁽⁸⁾ ESCWA requested its Executive Secretary to submit to its Technical Committee the conclusions of the triennial review and an evaluation report on the Commission's activities over the preceding two years (see p. 573). On 27 June⁽⁹⁾ the UNDP Governing Council brought to the attention of the Assembly and the Council some views and concerns on issues of importance in the context of the triennial review (see p. 419). On 16 May⁽¹⁰⁾ the Commission on Human Settlements, the governing body of UNCHS, adopted a statement on policy issues affecting operational activities for development, to be transmitted to the Council for its policy review (see p. 677).

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted without vote resolution 1986/74.

Policy review of operational activities for development

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 3201(S-VI) and 3202(S-VI) of 1 May 1974, containing the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order, 3281(XXIX) of 12 December 1974, containing the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, and 3362(S-VII) of 16 September 1975 on development and international economic co-operation,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 38/171 of 19 December 1983 and 40/211 of 17 December 1985,

Appreciating the overall impact of operational activities for development, which have become an established and important dimension of the development efforts of the organizations of the United Nations system,

Reaffirming that the primary objective of the operational activities for development of the United Nations system is to promote the economic self-reliance of developing countries through multilateral co-operation and, in this context, emphasizing the need to maintain the multilateral character of the operational activities of the United Nations system and for all Governments to enhance their commitment in this regard,

Stressing the urgent need to strengthen multilateral co-operation for development through, inter alia, increased voluntary contributions to the operational activities for development of the United Nations system,

Reaffirming the exclusive responsibility of the Government of the recipient country in formulating its national development plan, priorities and objectives, as set out in the consensus contained in the annex to General Assembly resolution 2688(XXV) of 11 December 1970, and emphasizing that the integration of the operational activities for development of the United Nations system with national programmes would enhance the impact and relevance of those activities,

Reaffirming that economic and technical co-operation among developing countries should be a significant dimension of all operational activities for development, as a key element in the strategy of collective self-reliance and an essential instrument to promote changes contributing to a balanced and equitable process of global economic development,

Emphasizing the need to improve the effectiveness and efficiency of the operational activities for development of the United Nations system in supporting the efforts of developing countries,

Emphasizing also the urgency for the United Nations system to respond in an effective and coherent manner to the increasing requirements for external assistance and, in this context, reaffirming the need for new and purposeful efforts at all levels to improve the provision, utilization, administration and co-ordination of development assistance,

Aware that a substantial part of world resources, material as well as human, continues to be diverted to armaments, with a detrimental effect on international security and on bilateral and multilateral co-operation, including the operational activities for development of the United Nations system,

1. Expresses its appreciation for the contribution of the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation in promoting operational activities for development and takes note with interest of the report of the Director-General for the triennial policy review of operational activities for development;

2. Takes note of the information provided by some of the organizations of the United Nations system in response to General Assembly resolution 40/211, urges all organizations to respond, and expresses the hope that the quality of such information will be improved in the future;

3. Expresses its deep concern at the stagnation in recent years in real terms of overall contributions for operational activities for development, particularly the prognosis of a marginal annual rate of growth over the next few years;

4. Emphasizes the need for a significant, continuous, predictable and real increase in resources for operational activities for development to meet the growing requirements for development of the developing countries, in particular the least developed countries;

5. Urges all countries to increase their voluntary contributions for operational activities for development, in particular those countries whose overall performance is not commensurate with their capacity;

6. Affirms that the programming and implementation of operational activities for development shall continue to be based on the principles set out in the consensus of 1970, as contained in the annex to General Assembly resolution 2688(XXV);

7. Reiterates the need for all organizations of the United Nations system to make greater use of the capacities of developing countries, inter alia, through increasing government execution of projects and employment of local consultants and national experts, with a view to improving the cost-effectiveness and relevance of operational activities for development as well as facilitating the transfer of skills;

8. Expresses its concern at the recent decline in the proportion of equipment procured from developing countries, reaffirms the need to increase procurement from sources that at present are underutilized, and invites organizations of the United Nations system engaged in operational activities for development to take the necessary measures to widen the geographical distribution of their sources of procurement consistent with the principle of competitive international bidding through, inter alia, better utilization of sources of supplies from developing countries and underutilized donor countries;

9. Requests the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation to conduct further comparative analyses of the relationship between programme delivery and administrative and support costs with a view to releasing the maximum amount of resources for development activities and increasing programme delivery;

10. Encourages the steps being taken to conduct needs assessments as a basis for the co-ordination of all technical co-operation in support of the priority programmes of the recipient Government;

11. Reaffirms the responsibility of developing countries to co-ordinate development co-operation, through, inter alia, the determination of local co-ordination arrangements;

12. Requests organizations of the United Nations system to give high priority to assisting Governments at their request in strengthening their capacity for co-ordination at both the overall and the sectoral level;

13. Invites the organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to introduce, in close co-operation with the Governments of recipient countries, specific measures aimed at strengthening the capabilities of the recipient countries to exercise their sovereign rights regarding preparation and realization of programmes and projects of technical co-operation, including training projects for personnel in national planning, co-ordination and evaluation institutions and measures increasingly to entrust Governments and institutions of recipient countries with the responsibility for executing projects;

14. Decides to intensify its efforts to ensure overall co-ordination of the operational activities for development of the United Nations system and, in this context, stresses that efforts should be undertaken to strengthen the necessary dialogue and interaction between the governing bodies of the organizations of the United Nations system concerned with operational activities for development so as to ensure consistency between decisions taken by policy-making bodies;

15. Invites the governing bodies of the organizations of the United Nations system to reaffirm their full support for improved coherence of action by the system at the country level and for the role of the resident co-ordinator in accordance with General Assembly resolution 32/197 of 20 December 1977 and in accordance with the relevant recommendations of the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation;

16. Strongly urges Governments and organizations of the United Nations system to provide resident co-ordinators with the requisite authority to carry out their role and responsibilities as defined in General Assembly resolution 32/197, taking into account other relevant Assembly resolutions, in order to promote greater coherence and co-ordination within the United Nations system, inter alia, through the following measures:

(a) Enabling the resident co-ordinator to consult on a regular basis with the Government and representatives of organizations of the United Nations system on specific measures regarding areas where greater coherence of action is required and, where host country Governments so request, to play a broader co-ordinating role;

(b) Strengthening local co-ordination arrangements, where necessary, for the implementation of such measures, inter alia, through the conduct of joint technical co-operation needs assessments and programming missions;

(c) Establishing systematic exchange of information and streamlining procedures and reporting requirements by the United Nations field offices;

17. Requests the governing bodies of the organizations of the United Nations system to pay particular attention to the need to rationalize field representation of the organizations and, recognizing the necessity to consult with the recipient Government on such matters, to establish new field offices only if the required services cannot be shared with other organizations or provided in any other way;

18. Emphasizes the importance for recipient countries to receive full information from all donors on their assistance efforts within the framework of operational activities for development, including information on the cost, nature and objective of each project, concessionality, and tying status;

19. Requests the resident co-ordinators to assist Governments of recipient countries, upon request, in managing information from all donors on their assistance efforts and in ensuring co-ordination and improved effectiveness of such assistance;

20. Requests the Director-General to study in a few selected donor and recipient countries, with the agreement and co-operation of the Governments concerned, existing co-ordination practices designed to ensure consistency and coherence in their policy and positions in the area of operational activities for development;

21. Stresses the importance of the United Nations Development Programme country programme as the framework for promoting a more coherent and co-ordinated approach to technical co-operation activities by the United Nations development system;

22. Invites the Director-General, with the support of extrabudgetary resources, to conduct case-studies in one or more countries, with the agreement and co-operation of the Governments concerned, on the functioning of the operational activities for development of the United Nations system, bearing in mind the specificity of individual country circumstances;

23. Urges the continuation of efforts to harmonize, to the extent possible, the operational procedures of the organizations of the United Nations system engaged in operational activities for development, in areas such as project presentation, monitoring, evaluation and procurement;

24. Invites the organizations concerned to improve the integration of food aid with overall development efforts;

25. Strongly urges the United Nations Development Programme, the United Nations Fund for Population Activities, the United Nations Children's Fund and the World Food Programme to continue their efforts for co-ordinated programming, through the Joint Consultative Group on Policy, so as to promote greater collaboration;

26. Urges other organizations to consider adopting similar co-ordinated programming practices;

27. Invites organizations of the United Nations system to continue to pursue measures to enhance the involvement of non-governmental organizations and enterprises in operational activities, in accordance with the objectives and priorities of each developing country;

28. Reiterates the need for the increased participation of women in operational activities and requests the Director-General, in presenting his report to the General Assembly at its forty-first session, to address this issue along the lines called for in Assembly resolution 40/211;

29. Strongly urges the organizations of the United Nations system engaged in operational activities for development to intensify their efforts to integrate economic and technical co-operation among developing countries into operational activities, inter alia, by orienting their programmes and projects towards strengthening such co-operation in accordance with the priorities defined by the developing countries themselves;

30. Emphasizes the need for close collaboration between the United Nations Development Programme and the Department of Technical Co-operation for Development of the United Nations Secretariat in view of the potential for greater complementarity between them and requests the Director-General to include recommendations in this regard, as appropriate, in his report for the next policy review;

31. Reaffirms the authority and responsibility entrusted to the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation by the General Assembly in resolution 32/197, to ensure effective leadership of the United Nations system in the field of development and international economic co-operation and in exercising overall co-ordination within the system in order to ensure a multidisciplinary approach to the problems of development on a system-wide basis;

32. Requests the Director-General to include in his annual report on operational activities for development information on important policy and management issues affecting the coherence and functioning of system-wide activities, in the light of the relevant decisions of the governing bodies of organizations of the system, and to submit that information to the General Assembly through the Economic and Social Council for consideration;

33. Requests the Director-General, in preparing his report for the next policy review, to provide a general framework of broad objectives for operational activities for development within the United Nations system, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 32/197;

34. Also requests the Director-General to include in his report for the next comprehensive policy review of operational activities for development a specific chapter containing information about measures taken by organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system aimed at strengthening the capabilities of the recipient countries in the preparation and implementation of programmes and projects of technical co-operation;

35. Invites the governing bodies of the organizations of the United Nations system to provide the Council at its second regular session of 1987 with their views and comments on the implementation of the present resolution, in particular on the role of the resident co-ordinators, the use of the United Nations Development Programme country programming process as a framework for operational activities, the co-location of field offices and the further harmonization of operational procedures;

36. Further requests the Director-General, in presenting his report to the General Assembly at its forty-first session, to take into account the views expressed by Member States during the present review, including those on updating the report and particularly those concerning the mobilization of financial resources for operational activities for development and other areas that require greater coverage.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/74

23 July 1986 Meeting 38 Adopted without vote

Draft by Third Committee Chairman (E/1986/L.41), orally revised, based on informal consultations on draft by Yugoslavia, for Group of 77 (E/1986/C.3/L.15); agenda item 19.

Also before the Third (Programme and Co-ordination) Committee was a draft resolution on measures to strengthen operational activities for development, submitted by the German Democratic Republic⁽¹⁾ By that text, the Council would have reaffirmed that the basic purpose of technical co-operation should be the promotion of the self-reliance of developing countries by building up their productive capability and their indigenous resources and by increasing the availability of the managerial, technical, administrative and research capabilities required in the development process. United Nations organs, organizations and bodies would have been urged to co-operate closely with the Governments of recipient countries so as to strengthen their capabilities to exercise their sovereign rights in all stages of the preparation and implementation of the system's technical co-operation programmes and projects. They would have been invited to intensify efforts to diversify their sources of supply so as to mobilize all available human and material resources for technical co-operation, particularly those from developing countries.

A draft resolution on enhancing the quality of operational activities was submitted by the Federal Republic of Germany and the United States⁽¹²⁾ By that text, the Council would have appealed to all donors to provide full information to United Nations resident co-ordinators on their country-by-country breakdown of development assistance efforts, including the cost, nature and objective of each project, based on agreed uniform and transparent formats. Donors would have been invited to submit information on the concessionary, grant element and tying status of assistance; such information was to be made widely available to interested countries and agencies.

The USSR introduced amendments⁽¹³⁾ to that draft by which donors of development assistance would have been asked to provide full information on the outflow of resources in all forms from the recipient country to the donor country concerned. Interested countries would have been recommended to make available information on development assistance to United Nations resident co-ordinators, and countries which were members of international development and financial institutions would have been called on to ensure a significant increase of resource flows from those institutions to developing countries.

In the light of the adoption of resolution 1986/74, the two draft resolutions and the amendments were withdrawn.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 5 December 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, adopted resolution 41/171 without vote.

Operational activities for development

The General Assembly,

Having considered the parts of the report of the Economic and Social Council for the year 1986 that concern the policy review of operational activities for development,

Endorses Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/74 of 23 July 1986, entitled "Policy review of operational activities for development", the text of which is annexed to the present resolution.

ANNEX

5 December 1986 Meeting 98 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/869) without vote, 21 November (meeting 34); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/41/L.67), based on informal consultations; agenda item 80.

By decision 41/446 of 5 December, the Assembly took note of the Director-General's report on the triennial policy review⁽⁴⁾ the Secretary-General's report on information provided by organizations of the system on system-wide policy issues⁽⁵⁾ and other reports on operational activities.

Financing of operational activities

In a report to the General Assembly on 1986 operational activities⁽¹⁴⁾ the DIEC Director-General stated that, on average, total disbursements of ODA had grown in real terms by about 2.2 per cent annually between 1979 and 1985. However, due to the intentions expressed by one large donor and to a reduction in external assistance provided by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries as a result of lower income from oil sales, the upward trend in ODA disbursements was not expected to continue. In 1986, the volume of resources made available to the 28 grant-assistance organizations and agencies of the United Nations system had grown by about 7 per cent, partly due to exchange-rate fluctuations as a result of a decline in the value of the dollar. However, the share of total ODA contributed to those organizations had declined from 1979 to 1986.

In recent years there had been changes in the relative share of ODA disbursed to various regions; due to the critical economic situation facing countries in sub-Saharan Africa, there had been increased assistance to that region, particularly by multilateral donors. By sector, food aid had become increasingly important for the financing of development activities reflected in the sharp increase in contributions to WFP. Direct contributions to specialized agencies, after having stagnated from 1982 to 1985, increased by over 10 per cent in 1986.

Expenditures

In his annual report on United Nations system technical co-operation expenditures⁽¹⁵⁾ the UNDP Administrator stated that non-UNDP agency expenditures were $903 million for 1986 as compared with $916 million for 1985. This represented a slight overall decrease of 1.4 per cent, contrasting with the marginal increase of 1.3 per cent in 1985. Non-UNDP-financed technical co-operation activities funded from regular budgets declined to $256 million in 1986 from $298 million in 1985, a fall of about 14 per cent, while activities funded from extrabudgetary sources rose to $451 million from $412 million, an increase of about 9 per cent. UNFPA-financed expenditures declined to $102 million in 1986 from $128 million in 1985, while expenditures financed from UNDP-administered funds rose sharply, totalling $94 million in 1986 as opposed to $77 million in 1985, an increase of about 22 per cent.

The five largest agencies—the United Nations, ILO, FAO, UNESCO and WHO—continued to account for 71 per cent of non-UNDP-financed technical co-operation activities. Expenditures for the United Nations, ILO and FAO rose by 8 per cent, 16 per cent and 4 per cent respectively, while those for UNESCO and WHO declined by about 9 per cent and 7 per cent respectively. The decline in the UNESCO share was caused primarily by a drop in programmes funded by regular budget (from $5.8 million to $5.5 million) and extrabudgetary resources other than UNDP, UNFPA and UNDP-administered funds (from $33.3 million to $30 million). For WHO, the decline was partly attributable to its biennial budgeting and accounting system, by which only actual disbursements made during 1986 were reported. Also, UNFPA-financed programmes for WHO declined from $25 million in 1985 to $19 million in 1986, while those financed from UNDP-administered trust funds declined to $134,000 in 1986 from $815,000 in 1985. Nevertheless, WHO continued to have the largest non-UNDP-financed technical co-operation programme with expenditures of $308 million (34 per cent), followed by FAO with $188 million.

The health sector again had the highest concentration of non-UNDP-financed technical co-operation expenditures, due to the size of the WHO regular budget. Agriculture, forestry and fisheries had the second highest expenditures, some $153 million, or about 17 per cent of total expenditures. The population sector was third largest, with 11 per cent of the total. Natural resources occupied fourth place with an expenditure of $76 million or 8 per cent. Transport and communications accounted for some 5 per cent of all the regular and extrabudgetary grant expenditures, followed by industry (4 per cent), general development issues, policy and planning (4 per cent), science and technology (3 per cent) and employment (3 per cent).

Expenditures funded from regular budgets alone were primarily concentrated in the health sector, accounting for some 65 per cent (amounting to $166 million against total expenditures of $257 million), followed by agriculture, forestry and fisheries ($29 million or 11 per cent). Expenditures funded from extrabudgetary sources, including those funded by UNFPA, and UNDP-administered funds (but excluding those financed by the recipient Governments themselves) indicated a wider dispersion of expenditures among the various sectors. The health sector accounted for about 29 per cent, population for 22 per cent and agriculture, forestry and fisheries for 21 per cent. Unilateral "self-supporting" resources—expenditures financed by the developing countries themselves—were mainly shared by agriculture, forestry and fisheries (34 per cent), transport and communications (24 per cent) and natural resources (14 per cent).

Project expenditures funded out of UNDP central resources rose to $682 million in 1986 from $564 million in 1985, an increase of about 21 per cent.

Technical co-operation expenditures financed under World Bank loans and IDA credits for training and consultants amounted to $1.06 billion in 1986, reflecting an increase of 12 per cent over the 1985 figure for this category.

Total grant assistance provided by the United Nations system amounted to almost $2.5 billion in 1986. It had continued at the annual level of $2.2 billion from 1982 to 1984 and regained the $2.4 billion level of 1981 in 1985.

Contributions

In his report to the General Assembly on 1986 operational activities⁽¹⁾ the Director-General stated that total contributions to the operational activities of organizations of the United Nations system involved in grant-financed assistance, including United Nations funds and programmes (UNDP, UNDP trust funds, UNFPA, UNICEF and other bodies), operational activities of specialized agencies and WFP, totalled $3,019 million in 1986, compared with $2,829.4 million in 1985. Total contributions to UNDP and funds administered by it in 1986 totalled $1,007 million and represented about 35 per cent of the total resources made available to the grant organizations of the system, as compared with about 30 per cent in 1985. This represented a significant upturn in the situation after several years of stagnation in contributions.

In 1986, general resources income for UNICEF—$418 million—benefited from an exceptional one-time contribution from events organized around the fortieth anniversary of UNICEF. Both general resources and supplementary funds income for UNICEF were forecast to grow at approximately 4 per cent per annum during 1987-1990.

Contributions to IDA and IFAD and capital subscription payments to the World Bank and IFC rose to $3,494 million. Capital subscription payments to the World Bank in 1986 rose to $647 million.

The eighth replenishment of IDA resources, agreed in 1986, provided $12.4 billion for the period 1 July 1987 to 30 June 1990, representing an increase of $3.4 billion over the seventh replenishment. The agreement provided that efforts should be made to allocate a minimum of 45 per cent of IDA resources to sub-Saharan Africa.

After two and a half years of negotiations, the second replenishment of IFAD, amounting to $460 million for 1985-1987, became effective in November 1986. The relatively low level of the replenishment was due primarily to the inability of developing donor countries to contribute to the Fund because of the oil price collapse. IFAD also approved the establishment of a Special Programme for Sub-Saharan African Countries Affected by Drought and Desertification, with a financial target of $300 million.

Technical assistance activities funded through concessional loans by the World Bank stood at more than $1 billion; the bulk of that amount related to technical assistance directly linked to the delivery of capital inputs. Free-standing technical assistance loans of the World Bank and related forms of assistance were estimated at $200 million.

Contributions to United Nations bodies for refugee, humanitarian, special economic and disaster relief activities totalled $552 million in 1986.

Communications. The Secretary-General received a number of communications during 1986 concerning economic assistance to developing countries. Among them were: a 15 May letter from India⁽¹⁶⁾ transmitting the final documents of the Ministerial Meeting of the Co-ordinating Bureau of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries (New Delhi, 16-19 April); an 11 July letter⁽¹⁷⁾ from Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, the Federal Republic of Germany, Iceland, Japan, Norway, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States providing data on contributions to the development activities of the United Nations system; a 30 September letter from the German Democratic Republic⁽¹⁸⁾ on its assistance to developing countries and national liberation movements in 1985; and a 2 October letter from Yugoslavia⁽¹⁹⁾ transmitting the declaration adopted at a meeting of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Group of 77 developing countries (New York, 29 September-1 October).

UN Pledging Conference for Development Activities

The 1986 United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities was held in New York on 13 and 14 November to receive government pledges for 1987 to United Nations funds and programmes concerned with development and related assistance.

Contributions to the funds and programmes participating in the Conference totalled approximately $1,440 million in 1986. As at 30 June 1987, pledges for 1987 from 108 countries for 22 participating funds and programmes amounted to more than $1,362 million, with $853.2 million designated for UNDP.

Inter-agency co-operation

The Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions (Operational Activities) (New York, 1-3 October 1986)⁽²⁰⁾ of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC) considered that preparation of a compendium of co-ordination arrangements for operational activities continued to be relevant and should be pursued in close consultation with the secretariat of the Development Assistance Committee of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

In connection with an Economic and Social Council request that the Director-General study in a few selected donor and recipient countries existing co-ordination practices (see resolution 1986/74), the Committee recommended close co-operation between its substantive secretariat and the Director-General in formulating the terms of reference for those case-studies.

Programme evaluation

In a February 1986 report on evaluation⁽²¹⁾ the UNDP Administrator said UNDP welcomed decisions by UNCTAD, DTCD and the International Trade Centre to adopt UNDP's revised evaluation procedures for all projects financed from their regular budgets and trust funds. He noted that the International Civil Aviation Organization employed the revised procedures to monitor and evaluate its trust fund projects. UNDP would continue to work with other agencies in an attempt to agree on a simple, workable system of value to Governments.

On 27 June⁽²²⁾ the UNDP Governing Council supported and encouraged the Administrator's efforts to contribute to harmonizing the system's evaluation, monitoring and reporting procedures.

An Inter-Agency Working Group on Evaluation (Geneva, 21 and 22 October) discussed the results of an 18-month-long field-test of monitoring, evaluation and reporting procedures. It had been found that: there was a genuine perception in the field of a workable monitoring and evaluation system; there was a need to address the increasingly important role of national project officials; there was an understanding of the importance of the design-evaluation linkage; there was a serious absence of feedback from agencies to the project level; there was a need to elaborate further on the system's requirements as applicable to regional and global projects; there was room for further development in in-depth evaluation; and training would be the most important supporting action for successful follow-up to the revised system's introduction.

The Working Group created a UNDP/agency drafting group to complete revisions of reporting formats.

Field representation

In June 1986,⁽²³⁾ the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly a report by the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) on the structure and co-ordination of the field representation of organizations of the United Nations system. The report was prepared in response to a 1983 Assembly request⁽²⁴⁾ that JIU prepare an in-depth study on the subject, particularly with regard to tasks allotted to resident co-ordinators.

The report discussed the growth of the system's field representation over the 1973-1983 period at country, subregional and regional levels, considered the role of the resident co-ordinator, and discussed the future of co-ordination within and between sectors, within the system and between the system and bilateral agencies. A set of criteria was put forward for the establishment of new field offices.

With regard to structure, the report stated that the field representation network had developed in a largely unco-ordinated manner. There was little consultation within the system on the need to establish new offices and where it would be best, for the system as a whole, to locate those offices. JIU therefore recommended that the Assembly should reaffirm its commitment to the coherent evolution of United Nations system activities for the benefit of Member States and to the role of resident co-ordinators as the officials best suited to promote those aims. The Assembly should also: seek the support of Member States and the co-operation of all partners in the system for a stay in establishing new arrangements for field representation until the criteria suggested by JIU were met; approve the criteria; and draw attention to UNDP's investment in office premises and staff and urge all its partners to make use of those facilities rather than set up new ones.

Governing bodies of organizations represented in the field should: put a stay on new arrangements to establish field representation to ensure that JIU's proposed criteria were met; and review the cost-effectiveness and efficiency of their field representation. Any representation which did not appear viable should be terminated.

With regard to co-ordination, JIU recommended that the DIEC Director-General should establish a roster of possible candidates for resident co-ordinator posts, including candidates from the specialized agencies. It also recommended that the Secretary-General should provide for a single accreditation to Governments to cover the work of both the resident co-ordinator and the director of the United Nations information centre.

By decision 41/444 of 5 December 1986, the General Assembly decided to transmit to the governing bodies of the organizations of the United Nations system the JIU report on field representation, together with the views expressed by Member States during discussion of the issue in the Second Committee and comments to be made by ACC, for the consideration of those bodies in formulating their views to be presented to the Economic and Social Council in 1987.

Technical co-operation through UNDP

In his annual report for 1986, (1) the UNDP Administrator stated that there was new growth and momentum in UNDP in 1986, as, for the first time in its history, it passed the $1 billion mark in income received under its main programme, by the special-purpose funds it administered and through cost-sharing. Pledges to UNDP for 1987 activities in national currencies showed an average increase of 6.6 per cent, a boost augmented by changed currency parities between the United States dollar (the UNDP unit of account) and the currencies of non-dollar contributors. The co-financing component of UNDP's sources of income reached a new high of $166.1 million during 1986.

There were marked improvements in UNDP's project delivery, with project expenditures rising for the second consecutive year to reach a total of $689.2 million—a 20.5 per cent increase over 1985. UNDP was thus able to field 8,969 international experts and technical consultants during 1986. Another 3,481 national experts were recruited, 26 per cent more than in 1985. More than 12,900 fellowships were provided to developing country nationals for study abroad. UNDP funded equipment for projects in the amount of $166.4 million and supported $90.6 million in work sub-contracted to consulting firms and other private and public institutions. The bulk of field programme expenditures—$563.5 million—was delivered under indicative planning figure (IPF) resources.

In 1986, UNDP established an in-house Action Committee of senior staff to co-ordinate programme policies and to review and approve all projects over $400,000. Appraisal groups in regional bureaux were deployed to examine projects more closely and regular meetings of the UNDP Programme Review Committee were convened to inject new standards of quality into the design and crafting of country programmes. In Africa, UNDP made a special effort to remove operational bottle-necks and to support the region's climb out of crisis.

In preparation for the fourth programming cycle (1987-1991), UNDP, together with Governments and agencies of the United Nations development system, proceeded to draw up new country programmes of medium-term technical assistance for 152 countries that would go into effect during the cycle.

In Africa and Latin America and the Caribbean in particular, UNDP was being asked to assist countries to manage their economies more efficiently and to boost agricultural and industrial production. In Asia and the Pacific, where impressive gains had been made in food self-sufficiency, the emphasis was on human resources development and the use of technology in development solutions. At the same time, UNDP continued to emphasize its major global objectives: the alleviation of poverty; increased food security; enhancement of women's role and share in development; environmental protection; the supply of clean drinking-water and sanitation; and technical co-operation among developing countries (TCDC).

In 1986, UNDP established a Division for Women in Development (see p. 791) and a Division for Non-Governmental Organizations. In conjunction with the latter, UNDP decided to establish a new "Partners in Development Fund" which would award grants of up to $50,000 for small-scale development activities by NGOs.

Responding to new interest in the accelerated development of the private sector, which had been recognized by many developing countries as a considerable force for development, UNDP established the African Project Development Facility in May 1986, in conjunction with IFC, several donor Governments and the African Development Bank. The Facility, which by the end of the year had opened offices in Abidjan, Cote d'Ivoire, and Nairobi, Kenya, aimed to provide technical and advisory services to African entrepreneurs. By the end of 1986, the model for the African initiative, the UNDP-supported Caribbean Project Development Facility, after four years of operations, had prepared investment feasibility studies for 58 projects at a total estimated cost of $180 million in 17 Caribbean States. In another dimension of its promotion of technical co-operation, UNDP continued to provide short-term advisory services (see p. 425) on an enterprise-to-enterprise basis, enhancing the flow of specialized skills to the production, commercial and service sectors of developing countries.

Although UNDP held the view that developing countries themselves were responsible for determining their own policies and priorities and that the central responsibility for aid co-ordination rested with each recipient Government, evidence suggested that many developing countries did not possess the capacity to co-ordinate aid activities effectively. Accordingly, UNDP had moved to ensure that the separate funds administered by it were jointly programmed.

During 1986, a new improved format for round-table meetings was developed and adopted in Bhutan, Cape Verde, Chad, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Maldives, Samoa and Sao Tome and Principe. UNDP considered the round-table process to be particularly important in Africa, where it actively supported the efforts of countries to restructure their economies through co-ordinated planning. UNDP helped African Governments to see that programmes of assistance designed through the round-table process were in accordance with the priorities emphasized in the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990, adopted by the General Assembly in June 1986 (see p. 446). At the end of the year, round-table conferences were being prepared for Burkina Faso, the Central African Republic, Equatorial Guinea, the Niger and Sierra Leone.

A new concern with environmental matters in relation to development arose during 1986. Taking stock of its 15-year involvement with environmental matters, UNDP stated that it had financed close to 1,800 environment-related projects at a total cost of over $1 billion since 1972. In 1986, environment-oriented projects cost nearly $123.3 million, representing 19.9 per cent of the total field programme. Through some 230 ongoing projects in the International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade (1981-1990), UNDP continued to promote environmental health. Another 152 UNDP-supported projects were helping to fight air, soil and water pollution caused by chemical wastes and industrial effluents. In 70 countries, 154 UNDP-supported projects helped to combat deforestation.

In Africa, the problems of drought and hunger were less severe in 1986; agricultural harvests increased in eastern and southern Africa, food was more abundant in western Africa and many Governments adopted economic and social policy reforms. UNDP was assigned a key monitoring role in the follow-up to the Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development, particularly in respect of IPF programming.

Economic growth for the countries of East Asia and the Pacific slowed considerably during 1986, reflecting declines in world-wide commodity prices and a lessened demand for manufactured goods.

In South Asia, however, many nations showed annual gross domestic product growth rates of some 4 per cent, and agricultural activities, particularly food production, remained vigorous. Priority for UNDP assistance was in the area of expansion and diversification of exports, technology transfer and adaptation, the modernization of industry, agriculture and social services, vocational training, job creation and the protection of rural and urban environments.

Growth in the Latin American and Caribbean region in 1986 continued to be constrained by the unfavourable global climate. UNDP continued to support efforts to reverse rural decline, alleviate poverty, manage adjustments, promote investment and maintain infrastructure vital to the region's economies.

The 20 Arab States ran the spectrum from low to middle to high income. The Persian Gulf countries continued to be faced with declining revenues, necessitating efforts to diversify their economic and industrial bases through infrastructure building. The middle-income States looked to UNDP for aid in obtaining transfers of technology and know-how to adapt and adjust to the demands and opportunities presented by their diversified economies, with emphasis on closing a growing food gap. The need for UNDP aid in the region's five LDCs focused on rehabilitation, particularly in rural areas, following disastrous droughts.

UNDP administered six funds during 1986: UNCDF (see p. 438), the United Nations Sudano-Sahelian Office (UNSO) (see p. 664), UNV (see p. 435), the United Nations Revolving Fund for Natural Resources Exploration (UNRFNRE) (see p. 574), the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM) (see p. 795) and the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development (UNFSSTD) (see p. 599). Six sub-trust fund arrangements were established on behalf of UNCDF (2), UNFSSTD (1), UNIFEM (2) and UNV (1). In addition, seven new trust funds were established in 1986 with contributions amounting to $5.8 million (see p. 429).

In the area of emergency and disaster relief, UNDP collaborated with the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-Ordinator and other international agencies in responding to a number of disasters, including floods in Bolivia and Uruguay; a fire in Rangoon, Burma; an earthquake in El Salvador; cyclones in Fiji, the Solomon Islands and Vanuatu; and tropical rainstorms in Jamaica (see pp. 473-483).

UNDP Council action. In response to a 1985 General Assembly request⁽²⁾ the Governing Council, on 27 June 1986,⁽³⁾ brought to the attention of the Assembly and the Economic and Social Council its views on issues of importance in the context of the triennial review of operational activities for development (see p. 411).

These views included: the United Nations, under the leadership of the DIEC Director-General, should pursue a co-ordinated strategy for operational activities for development on which to base long-term action to assist developing countries to achieve their development objectives; the Joint Consultative Group on Policy, comprising UNDP, UNICEF, UNFPA and WFP, was a positive example of co-operation which should be encouraged; the role of resident co-ordinators in the field should be strengthened; collaboration between UNDP and the specialized agencies in joint programming of technical co-operation activities should be enhanced; executing agencies should be accountable for fulfilling their obligations to UNDP in executing projects funded by it; comprehensive technical co-operation needs surveys could provide a useful framework for activities in support of the developing countries' development strategy and objectives; Governments and specialized agencies should consider using the UNDP country programme to promote a more co-ordinated approach to the system's technical co-operation activities; parts of the system engaged in operational activities should streamline their procedures to ensure speedy implementation of UNDP-financed activities; measures should be taken to expand the geographical distribution of procurement by the system through better utilization of supplies from developing countries and under-utilized donor countries; UNDP and specialized agency operational procedures in project presentation, monitoring, evaluation and procurement should be harmonized; national and regional inputs and expertise should be used whenever possible in project implementation; the transfer of skills to developing countries should be facilitated; dialogue and interaction between governing bodies of the system in the area of operational activities should be strengthened; the system should encourage TCDC; and the Secretary-General should consider further measures to promote coherence of action, increase programme effectiveness and mobilize increasing resources for operational activities for development.

The Governing Council requested the Administrator to convey those views to the Economic and Social Council and to prepare a background note on those issues to assist the Assembly deliberations and their outcome.

UNDP Governing Council

In New York, the UNDP Governing Council held an organizational meeting for 1986 on 18, 19 and 21 February and a special session to consider pending issues from 19 to 21 February; it held its thirty-third session at Geneva from 2 to 27

At the organizational meeting, the Council adopted five decisions on: arrangements for the Working Group of the Committee of the Whole, which included increasing the Group's membership from 24 to 26;⁽⁵⁾ election of Working Group members⁽⁶⁾ terms of office of Governing Council members, to be elected for a three-year term of office beginning with the organizational meeting of the Council in February of the year following the election⁽⁷⁾ the schedule of meetings in 1986 and other organizational matters⁽⁸⁾ and the agenda and organization of work of the Council in 1986.⁽⁹⁾

At its special session, the Council adopted six decisions on revised guidelines for the United Nations regular programme of technical co-operation (see p. 435), UNIFEM (see p. 796), special programme resources (see p. 429), economically disadvantaged States in southern Africa (see p. 441), UNDP field offices in Belgrade and Bucharest (see p. 432), and job classification (see p. 432).

At the thirty-third session, the Council resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, which met between 2 and 17 June, to consider evaluation and country and intercountry programmes and projects. Financial, budgetary and administrative matters were discussed by the Council's Budgetary and Finance Committee which met between 2 and 27 June.

Forty-six decisions were adopted at the June session; those not mentioned in this chapter dealt with: the role of UNDP in the implementation of the Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development (see p. 457); human resources development (see p. 640); women in development (see p. 791); drug abuse control (see p. 858); assistance to national liberation movements recognized by the Organization of African Unity (OAU) (see p. 121); island developing countries (see p. 407); the fourth-cycle IPF for Namibia (see TRUSTEESHIP AND DECOLONIZATION, Chapter III); UNFPA (see pp. 630 and 631); UNRFRNRE (see p. 574); UNFSSTD (see p. 600); implementation of the medium- and long-term recovery and rehabilitation programme in the Sahel and implementation in the Sudano-Sahelian region of the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification (see p. 664); programmes in energy development (see p. 578); and implementation of the Substantial New Programme of Action for the 1980s for LDCs, and assistance to Mauritania, Kiribati and Tuvalu (see p. 406).

On 2 June⁽¹⁰⁾ the Council approved the agenda and organization of work for its June session. On 27 June⁽¹¹⁾ it decided to extend the trial period of the Committee of the Whole by one year and to review the experience with that Committee and its Working Group at the 1987 Council session.

Decisions were also taken on future Council sessions⁽¹²⁾ and the Council's provisional agenda for 1987.⁽¹³⁾ The Council also took note of several reports and other documents⁽¹⁴⁾

By a 27 June decision⁽¹⁵⁾ on the Administrator's 1985 annual report⁽¹⁶⁾ the Governing Council requested the Administrator to undertake an assessment, with the DIEC Director-General, of UNDP's experience in co-ordinating technical co-operation activities of the United Nations development system and to report thereon in 1987. It re-emphasized that the co-ordination of technical co-operation activities was the responsibility of recipient Governments themselves, noted the Administrator's proposal to start an arrangement in two or three selected countries in each region whereby donors and recipient Governments could utilize UNDP to co-ordinate externally funded training activities, and asked him to report in 1988 on progress made. The Council requested him to stand ready to assist Governments in formulating technical co-operation programmes in public administration and financial management as part of their country programmes, and urged him to expand those UNDP pre-investment activities which might attract financing from new sources, including private ones. He was urged to analyse the staffing situation at headquarters and in the field to ensure that UNDP field offices were adequately staffed and to report in 1987. He was also requested to pursue efforts to increase the quality of UNDP programmes and projects.

The Council reaffirmed support for measures already taken by the Administrator to involve grass-roots organizations and NGOs in the development process and urged him to expand UNDP activities in this area. The Administrator was requested to report in 1987 on UNDP experience in financing equipment and its importance to other project components. The Council expressed concern at the declining implementation rate of UNDP-funded projects, urged the Administrator to initiate appropriate administrative measures to ensure improved performance by the executing agencies and appealed to Governments and those agencies to assist in attaining these objectives. The Council reaffirmed the importance of TCDC and asked the Administrator to strengthen his support and promotion of that modality in technical co-operation programmes and projects.

On 23 July 1986, by decision 1986/180, the Economic and Social Council took note of an extract from the report of the Governing Council covering its organizational meeting for 1986 and its June session.

On 5 December, by decision 41/446, the General Assembly took note of the Governing Council's report on all its 1986 sessions.⁽⁴⁾

UNDP operational activities

Country and intercountry programmes

In an April 1986 report⁽¹⁷⁾ the Administrator analysed 45 country programmes which were submitted to the Governing Council for approval. Of the programmes submitted, 16 were from the Asia and Pacific region (8 of them from small Pacific island developing countries) and 16 were from the Latin America and Caribbean region (8 involving mostly Caribbean countries with individual IPFs of less than $2 million). Five were from Africa, five from Europe and three from the Arab States region. There were three large programmes of over $125 million, in Bangladesh, China and Ethiopia, although the size of the Ethiopia programme was inflated by the inclusion of large non-IPF resources. There were 21 small programmes of less than $5 million—mostly in island territories and European countries. The remaining 21 programmes ranged between $6 million (Mongolia) and $84 million (Viet Nam). The report included information on the timing, preparations, financing, and major development objectives and orientation of the submitted programmes, allocation of resources, and global and regional priorities.

In a section of his annual report for 1986,⁽¹⁾ on project results of the global/interregional programmes and special funds, the Administrator stated that agricultural research, with special emphasis on increasing food production and enhancing soil fertility, continued to command the largest share—approximately 65 per cent—of global programme expenditures. In the health sector, the Special Programme for Research and Training in Tropical Diseases, co-sponsored by UNDP, WHO and the World Bank, operated in over 100 countries with an annual budget of $25 million. UNDP also supported a major global programme, in conjunction with WHO, UNICEF, the World Bank and bilateral organizations, to control diarrhoeal diseases, which severely afflicted children under five years of age. Development programmes involving fisheries, drinking-water and sanitation, public works, small enterprises, energy, and trade were also supported by UNDP in 1986. Resources were also channelled to developing countries to assist special efforts in specific areas through seven associated funds administered by UNDP or its Administrator: UNCDF (see p. 438), UNSO (see p. 664), the UNDP Energy Account (see p. 578), UNV (see p. 435), UNRFNRE (see p. 574), UNIFEM (see p. 795) and UNFSSTD (see p. 599).

UNDP Council action. On 25 June,⁽¹⁸⁾ the Council approved 44 country programmes for the duration of their programme periods and within the limits of their illustrative IPFs for the period 1987-1991. The countries were: Anguilla, Aruba, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Bulgaria, Cayman Islands, China, Cook Islands, Cuba, Ecuador, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Hungary, Jamaica, Kiribati, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Malta, Mauritania, Mongolia, Nepal, Netherlands Antilles, Nicaragua, Niue, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Rwanda, St. Helena, Samoa, Saudi Arabia, Seychelles, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Suriname, Tokelau, Tunisia, Tuvalu, Vanuatu, Viet Nam, Yugoslavia, Zimbabwe. The country programme for Maldives was extended. A global project—the International Centre of Insect Physiology and Ecology (field-testing and demonstration of integrated pest management strategies)—was also approved.

Country programmes by region

Africa

In a report on implementation of selected country programmes in the Africa region during 1986,⁽¹⁹⁾ the UNDP Administrator said that 45 programmes of assistance were in operation in the 42 countries in sub-Saharan Africa, including the regional programme and special programmes of assistance to Namibia and the African national liberation movements recognized by OAU. For the third programming cycle (1982-1986), about $1.4 billion of programmable resources were available to the Africa region through UNDP and its related funds. As of December 1986, approximately $1.35 billion (or 97 per cent of total resources) were committed to approved projects for the third cycle and the uncommitted balance was being programmed in the fourth cycle (1987-1991). Of total resources available, $975 million was from revised IPFs for country and regional programmes; $42 million from the Special Measures Fund for LDCs (SMF/LDC); and the balance from Special Programme Resources, Special Industrial Services (in conjunction with the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO), the Special Fund for Land-locked Developing Countries, trust funds, cost-sharing by African Governments and third parties, and associated funds.

During 1985 and 1986, virtually every UNDP-financed programme in sub-Saharan Africa was reviewed in depth and considerable adjustments were made in ongoing projects and programmes. Forward-looking programming exercises for the fourth cycle were a priority activity during 1986, giving UNDP an opportunity to focus on areas where its assistance could make an impact. UNDP activity in the region was concentrated in five areas which were in accord with the Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development: economic planning and management; planning and implementation of structural adjustments and economic reforms; strengthening productive capacity as part of recovery and development strategies; aid co-ordination and resource mobilization consultations; and assistance to African Governments in developing the framework and priorities for more relevant, effective and co-ordinated technical assistance.

The Administrator's review of the region's country programmes featured the West Africa subregion which covered 16 country programmes and included all the Sahelian countries except Chad. The combined country IPFs for the subregion for the third programming cycle were $292 million, which were increased by 27 per cent to $370 million for the fourth cycle. During 1986, some 81 evaluation, formulation and other review missions were organized for the 16 West African countries and adjustments were made in goals, activities and inputs.

The report presented selected highlights of programme activities both in West Africa and in the rest of the region and gave a brief account of the review of the regional programme in sub-Saharan Africa. Information was also given on management actions taken to improve programme performance and internal administration at the country level, at UNDP headquarters and at its Regional Bureau for Africa.

Arab States

The Administrator, in a report on implementation of selected country programmes in the Arab States region during 1986,⁽²⁰⁾ said that transition to the fourth programming cycle had been a major element of UNDP activity. The slump in oil prices and the consequent dramatic decline in the oil revenue of the capital-surplus countries of the region had adversely affected their own developmental efforts and, indirectly, those of the least developed and other low-income countries of the region as well. The cancellation of contracts with foreign companies and budgetary austerity in oil-exporting countries had generated greater interest in acquiring technical assistance through UNDP.

Five themes prevailed in programming for intercountry assistance: food security; human resources development; energy; transfer of know-how in science and technology; and technical co-operation among developing Arab and Latin American and Asian countries. Despite budgetary difficulties, government cost-sharing contributions increased by 8.7 per cent, from $21.5 million in 1985 to $23.4 million in 1986. During the year, formal country programme reviews were carried out in Iraq, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Yemen.

The regional programme financed projects in 1986 that were aimed specifically at meeting the manpower needs of the region, paying particular attention to LDCs. Regional needs with regard to water resources and natural resources exploration and utilization were met by a number of projects. Other projects addressed problems in agriculture and fisheries and in the packaging and iron and steel industries.

The UNDP Regional Bureau for Arab States had 321 large-scale projects under implementation in 1986, most of which were considered in the tripartite review process. Eight in-depth evaluations were carried out, mostly for projects at or near completion and for which the Government had requested continued UNDP assistance. High-level efforts at improving co-ordination between various United Nations-funded programmes, between UNDP and the World Bank, and between bilateral donors and UNDP were intensified during 1986.

Asia and the Pacific

In his annual report on implementation of selected country programmes in the Asia and Pacific region,⁽²¹⁾ the Administrator said that project expenditures in 1986 had exceeded $228 million, a continuation of the increase in 1984/85, when project expenditures rose from $177 million to $191 million, signifying restored confidence in UNDP by the region's Governments after cut-backs at the beginning of the third programming cycle. In order to sustain the recovery, the Regional Bureau for Asia and the Pacific (RBAP) sought to have as many country programmes as possible approved and operational before the fourth cycle began. The 30 programmes already prepared had a total value of almost $800 million and made specific mention of some 1,000 projects.

During 1986, UNDP resident representatives of the region carried out several hundred tripartite reviews and individual, in-depth project evaluations in the field. At headquarters, the RBAP's Project Appraisal Committee reviewed over 90 projects worth almost $200 million. To improve the speed and quality of project formulation, the Administrator formed an action committee in November 1986, which, in its first three months of operation, reviewed 92 RBAP projects valued at $115 million, representing 57 per cent of all projects presented.

By the end of 1986, of the total IPF resources of $1,111.6 million available to the region for the third programming cycle, some $1,067 million or 96 per cent had been spent or committed for approved projects. There were 2,077 ongoing projects in the region, of which 1,801 were country and 276 intercountry projects, with UNDP assistance budgeted at $1.3 billion. During the third programming cycle, the agriculture, forestry and fisheries sector had remained constant at about 23 per cent of the total, while industry, science and technology had climbed from 19 per cent in 1982/83 to 24 per cent in 1985/86. Natural resources remained at 14 per cent and transport and communications at 11 per cent. There had been an increase in expenditures on training activities and a declining rate of expenditure on equipment.

At the project level, a total of 448 tripartite reviews and 109 in-depth evaluations took place in 1986. Of the 34 UNDP-assisted country programmes, 22 were the subject of formal or informal review exercises.

In addition to convening a meeting of government aid co-ordinators from the region in October, RBAP's principal contribution to more effective planning and co-ordination of development assistance in 1986 was the holding of separate round-table meetings for four of the region's LDCs—Bhutan, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Maldives and Samoa.

During 1986, the intercountry programme for the fourth cycle was finalized. The new programme emphasized the entire area of applied technology, including micro-electronics, industry and development management. Transport and communications would continue to be the largest sector with a 20.8 per cent share of the total resources.

The report also described preparations being made for new country programmes and the modalities of country programme reviews carried out within the programme cycle.

Europe

In a report on implementation of selected UNDP country programmes in Europe during 1986,⁽²²⁾ the Administrator stated that no major events had seriously affected delivery. A decision by Czechoslovakia and Greece to forgo their IPFs after the third programming cycle resulted in the completion of all necessary adjustments to ongoing projects and approvals of new projects for both countries before the year's end.

Citing the limited number of programmes in Europe, the Administrator gave a region-wide overview without singling out a specific country. Most of the European programmes had small UNDP inputs and sizeable government inputs. Government execution of projects was not common, although it was used to some extent in Bulgaria, Cyprus, Greece and Yugoslavia.

IPF levels in the European region were small, ranging from $1.4 million in Malta to $11 million in Turkey. Cost-sharing was significant in many countries, notably Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Greece, Portugal, Turkey and Yugoslavia. Together with cost-sharing in the regional programme, cost-sharing budgets totalled $1.1 million in 1986, an amount that could have been higher but for the shortage of convertible currency in many of the countries concerned.

The average commitment rate at the end of the third cycle represented 103.4 per cent of programmable resources for 1982-1986. However, for a number of reasons, but particularly delays in implementation, the actual delivery level was expected to be about 65 per cent of the approved budgets for the year, as estimated at the end of 1986.

Frequent tripartite reviews in all countries and five in-depth project evaluations in Albania, Portugal and Turkey were held during 1986. Formal or informal reviews of country programmes were also held in all countries, with the exception of Czechoslovakia and Greece. The reviews concluded that priority had been given to projects in the science and technology sector and that specialized training had been heavily emphasized.

With regard to the regional programme, 21 projects were implemented during the third cycle, 14 of which involved UNDP expenditures of at least $400,000. The reduction, early in the cycle, in UNDP resources from $14.4 million to $10.4 million meant that there were only six new projects, half in the priority energy area. Twelve projects were concluded during the third cycle and the remaining nine were extended into the fourth; 12 projects, 10 of which were over $400,000, were evaluated during the cycle.

The Administrator, in a report on implementation of selected country programmes in the Latin America and Caribbean region during 1986,⁽²³⁾ said that the formulation of country and regional programmes for the fourth cycle was almost complete. An assessment of major areas of technical co-operation and pre-investment, reflected in the programmes' objectives, indicated that direct support to the productive sectors was a major objective in 17 of them, and support to public policies was indicated in 18 programmes. Supporting scientific and technological development was a major objective in 10 of the 20 country programmes, underlining the importance of boosting the productive sectors, with 8 of those programmes linking research and the acquisition of technology to its application to productive sectors. The eradication of critical poverty was a major objective in seven programmes. Objectives in the social, energy and natural resources sectors also represented important elements of the region's programmes. A number of programmes contained major objectives in the sectors of environmental sanitation and cultural heritage and tourism, while others adopted a multisectoral approach.

Other facets of programmes in the region included: increased use of national experts; government execution of projects; TCDC; pre-investment; projects targeted at women, particularly those in rural areas; grass-roots activities; and private sector endeavours.

At the end of 1986, the third-cycle IPF resources were fully delivered. Cost-sharing commitments for the third cycle totalled about $140 million or 53.4 per cent of the IPF for the region. An assessment of fourth-cycle programmes indicated that cost-sharing and other resources were expected to reach $300 million, representing an additional amount generated by the country programme resources amounting to 125 per cent of IPF allocations which totalled $280 million. Total programmed resources amounted to over $630 million.

The report gave conclusions on the country programmes reviewed in 1986—Brazil, Colombia, Haiti and Uruguay. Those countries were chosen in order to illustrate the varying conditions in which the region's programmes were being implemented. In general, it was found that most of the programmes reviewed contributed to the realization of their stated objectives. The report also gave a brief account of a number of specific projects in those countries illustrating results achieved and problems encountered in execution.

With regard to programme co-ordination, the report said that UNDP had provided assistance to Governments of the Caribbean in preparing overall technical co-operation programmes which served as a basis for preparing country programmes.

Indicative planning figures

At its February 1986 special session, the UNDP Governing Council considered a note by the UNDP Administrator containing the IPFs for the fourth programming cycle (1987-1991),⁽²⁴⁾ which were calculated on the basis of guidelines contained in a 1985 Council decision,⁽²⁵⁾ Also in accordance with that decision, which assumed an average annual growth of total voluntary contributions of at least 8 per cent, on the basis of a target of $700 million for 1986, the total amount of resources available for IPFs during the fourth cycle was established at $3,166 million.

In a May 1986 report⁽²⁶⁾ the Administrator gave his determination of the best estimates of per capita gross national product for Bulgaria and Poland, for use in calculating IPFs for those countries, and recommended that the Council accept his recommendations for calculating the fourth-cycle IPFs for them. On 24 June⁽²⁷⁾ the Council approved the Administrator's recommendation.

Also in June, the Council considered the IPF for Namibia (see TRUSTEESHIP AND DECOLONIZATION, Chapter III).

Programme implementation

In response to a 1985 UNDP Governing Council decision⁽²⁸⁾ in which it endorsed the Administrator's proposed measures for improving the quality of UNDP programmes and projects, the Administrator submitted a report⁽²⁹⁾ in February 1986 in which he reviewed the experience in implementing those measures.

The Administrator reported on action taken to broaden the country programming process, including the issuance of new programming guidelines and the establishment of a central Programme Review Committee to review all country programmes whose combined IFF and other resources were above $10 million.

With regard to improving the quality of project identification, formulation and appraisal, the Administrator stated that the Project Development Facility would finance project identification and project preparation missions in the case of complex or innovative projects. Other measures included a general revision and simplification of policies and procedures, improvement of management information systems relating to programme activities, and redeployment and training of staff. The importance of close collaboration with executing agencies in preparing country programmes was re-emphasized.

On 27 June,⁽³⁰⁾ the Governing Council requested the Administrator to pursue measures to improve programme and project quality, taking into account the responsibilities of all parties involved, particularly those of Governments, in identifying and selecting projects, and to report in 1987 on further progress made. He was urged to intensify efforts to improve performance of agencies executing UNDP projects and asked to report in 1987 on steps taken to improve programme delivery and the results achieved. The Council decided to extend the experimental period of the Project Development Facility to 30 June 1987 and authorized the use of the balance remaining from the $1 million allocated to the Facility in 1985. Should additional funding be required prior to the expiration of the experimental period, the Administrator would submit a proposal to the Council.

Programme planning and management

Programme evaluation

In a February 1986 report⁽³¹⁾ the UNDP Administrator gave the results of project evaluations carried out in 1984 and described efforts to further strengthen the evaluation system, including harmonization of evaluation and reporting requirements throughout the United Nations system (see p. 417). The report also dealt with strengthening government evaluation capacity and referred briefly to the contents of JIU reports on the status of evaluation in United Nations organizations.

The report concluded that evaluation in UNDP was an instrument of management which had to be cost-effective, and its closer integration in UNDP's decision-making processes to enhance its use in improving programme and project quality would remain a major management concern.

On 27 June⁽³²⁾ the Council endorsed the Administrator's efforts to raise the quality of evaluation and ensure better compliance with UNDP internal evaluation procedures to safeguard the tripartite nature of the evaluation system, and asked him to integrate the results of evaluations in future UNDP activities. The Administrator was called on to pay particular attention to strengthening the developing countries' own evaluation capacities and to intensify his efforts in that regard. He was also called on to examine the criteria for selecting projects to be evaluated and to report to the Council in 1987.

Information activities

In response to a 1985 UNDP Governing Council request⁽²⁵⁾ the Administrator submitted in April 1986 his recommendations for information support projects to be undertaken in 1987 and subsequent years for the International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade (1981-1990) and for TCDC.⁽³³⁾ The Administrator recommended continuing the information support project for the Decade with average annual budgets of $320,000, or a total of $1,280,000, chargeable to Special Programme Resources (SPRs) during 1987-1990, up to the end of the Decade. With regard to the TCDC information support project, the Administrator recommended the allocation of $1,600,000 from SPRs for 1987-1991.

On 27 June⁽³⁴⁾ the Governing Council decided to allocate amounts from fourth-cycle unallocated SPRs in accordance with the Administrator's recommendation.

Also on 27 June⁽³⁵⁾ the Council, recognizing the need for Governments and the general public to be more aware of the scope and effectiveness of UNDP activities and the fact that such awareness played an important part in determining resources generated for UNDP's work, supported the Administrator's efforts to promote and increase UNDP's visibility and requested him to keep the Council informed of his efforts.

Short-term advisory services

Pursuant to a 1985 UNDP Governing Council decision⁽³⁶⁾ the Administrator reported in March 1986⁽³⁷⁾ on progress in establishing a focal point for short-term advisory services (STAS), which would enhance the flow of skills to enterprises and institutions of developing countries through short-term missions of highly qualified advisers. He said organizational arrangements for STAS were in place and the programme would be fully operational by early 1987. He recommended that the Council approve financing of the programme's administrative costs for the first half of 1987 in the amount of $112,500.

On 27 June⁽³⁴⁾ the Council allocated that amount from the fourth-cycle unallocated SPRs.

Pre-investment activities

As requested by the Governing Council in 1982,⁽³⁵⁾ the Administrator submitted in April 1986 his second biennial progress report on pre-investment activities⁽³⁶⁾ the first having been submitted in 1984.⁽³⁷⁾ Reported investment commitments from all sources of finance related to UNDP-assisted pre-investment projects and investment-oriented projects increased from $6.6 billion in 1982 to $9.3 billion in 1984. During that period, the number of development finance institutions with which UNDP established special interest or co-operative arrangements rose from 7 to 10 and the amount of investment commitments reported for such institutions rose from $2.4 billion to $2.8 billion, an increase of some 17 per cent. The World Bank continued to be the largest single source of follow-up finance for those commitments, followed by the Asian Development Bank and the Inter-American Development Bank.

The report described relationships established by UNDP with other development finance institutions and co-operative arrangements entered into with seven United Nations executing agencies. The use of umbrella projects as a flexible mechanism to implement pre-investment studies was also discussed.

UNDP had initiated two reimbursable aid mechanisms to extend the use of UNDP resources to finance pre-investment studies, the first of which made use of IPFs to finance projects in which financial institutions might express special interest. The second was the Investment Feasibility Study Facility, established to assist Governments, primarily of LDCs, to finance feasibility studies for high-priority projects. Since becoming fully operational in 1984, the Facility had prepared six pre-investment studies costing some $255,000. The studies focused on agricultural and industrial sector investment projects, for some of which follow-up financing was expected with reimbursement of study costs to UNDP. Other project development facilities were: the Caribbean Project Development Facility, established in 1981 under UNDP auspices, with the World Bank/IFC acting as the executing agency; and the African Project Development Facility, sponsored by UNDP, IFC and the African Development Bank, which was being formulated as a UNDP-assisted World Bank/IFC-executed project.

Investment development training for UNDP staff, agency staff and host government counterparts continued to be provided jointly by UNDP and the World Bank. Training workshops for UNDP staff and government officials in the Asia and Pacific region had been initiated by UNDP and the Asian Development Bank.

On 27 June⁽⁴¹⁾ the Governing Council invited Governments to continue to give priority to pre-investment activities in their country programming. It took note of special interest arrangements between UNDP and sources of development finance and asked the Administrator to strengthen the scope of such arrangements. It encouraged his efforts and those of the agencies to increase pre-investment activities, noted progress achieved under the training programmes in pre-investment and supported the Administrator's efforts in that area, and approved the extension of the Investment Feasibility Study Facility for the fourth programming cycle.

Procurement

In his annual report⁽¹⁾ the Administrator noted that, during 1986, the UNDP Inter-Agency Procurement Services Unit (IAPSU) continued to concentrate on standardizing and negotiating preferential discounts for items commonly used by the United Nations system, such as office equipment and motor vehicles.

For the first time, IAPSU undertook direct procurement on a case-by-case basis and at the request of agencies, Governments or UNDP itself. In 1986, 257 purchase orders valued at more than $1.8 million were placed. Savings in the cost of both equipment and freight were estimated at about $400,000.

During the year, IAPSU issued its first country-specific documentation on procurement sources in developing countries, achieved cheaper air travel for staff members when two IATA airlines agreed to grant discounts to United Nations staff, and chaired the inter-agency subgroup, a body that worked to harmonize procurement procedures.

The UNDP Governing Council, on 27 June⁽⁴²⁾ approved the approach of the inter-agency subgroup and requested that the analysis of responses to a questionnaire on agency procurement policies and practices be submitted as an official document to the Council in 1987. It also asked that a written progress report on the work of the subgroup, including information on trends in procurement from developing and under-utilized donor countries, and on further measures taken towards achieving equitable geographical representation consistent with the principle of international competitive bidding be submitted to the Council in 1987.

In an April 1986 report⁽⁴³⁾ to the Council, which was requested by the High-level Committee on TCDC in 1985,⁽⁴⁴⁾ the Administrator described efforts to expand procurement from developing country sources, which was estimated at some 20 per cent of the total for the years 1982, 1983 and 1984. Difficulties experienced in that area included: the attitudes of some developing country Governments, which tended to favour goods and services from developed countries; inadequate infrastructure and high transportation costs which prevented rapid and economical movement of goods among developing countries; considerations such as warranties and after-sales service; limited experience of suppliers in developing countries of bid or proposal submitting; inadequate knowledge in the United Nations system about developing countries' capacities; and a tendency among international project staff to request products and services from traditional sources.

In response to those difficulties, the agencies, within the context of the Inter-Agency Procurement Working Group, had agreed that UNDP would continue to develop the IAPSU data base on potential sources of supply in developing countries and transmit the information to the agencies on a regular basis. A number of other concrete steps had been taken, including the fielding of missions to selected supplier developing countries, the updating by the UNDP Office for Projects Execution (OPE) of its roster of firms from developed and developing countries, and the publicizing of advance information on business opportunities.

The Administrator said he was committed to expanding procurement from developing countries, particularly with respect to projects financed by UNDP. However, much would depend also on the executing agencies, which did most of the procurement both for UNDP-financed projects and from other funds.

On 27 June⁽⁴⁵⁾ the Governing Council urged the Administrator to take further steps to increase UNDP procurement from developing countries and to impress on participating and executing agencies that they should take urgent steps to implement fully UNDP legislative provisions in that regard. The Council urged those agencies to intensify their efforts and asked the Administrator to urge them to adhere to its recommendations and those of the High-level Committee on TCDC and the General Assembly, and stressed that they should observe the 15 per cent price preference in favour of procurement from developing countries in all UNDP-financed projects. It also considered it appropriate that Governments pursue the subject in the governing bodies of participating and executing agencies. The Administrator was asked to report in 1987 to the High-level Committee and to the Council on the results of his efforts.

Financing

In his annual review of the financial situation in 1986⁽⁴⁶⁾ the Administrator stated that total income was $1,056.4 million ($121.4 million higher than forecast) and total expenditures $911 million ($23.4 million higher than forecast, with the increase occurring in field programme expenditures). As a result of a main programme surplus of income over expenditure, the balance of UNDP general resources increased from $184.4 million at 31 December 1985 to $316.6 million at 31 December 1986. Income from voluntary contributions amounted to $788.7 million. Miscellaneous income, mainly composed of income from UNDP placements of funds in short-term financial instruments and adjustments resulting from exchange rate changes, amounted to $128.1 million, considerably higher than the $60 million forecast. The value in United States dollar terms of voluntary contributions and miscellaneous income was also substantially increased by the continued weakening of the United States dollar during 1986, resulting in an increase of $40.9 million (about 6 per cent) in the value of pledges. The revaluation of national currencies held by UNDP resulted in increases in the value of those funds of $73.3 million (9.8 per cent).

The Administrator warned that the benefits gained during the prior two years from the weakening of the dollar could not be expected to continue. The total value of pledges received over the third cycle (1982-1986) actually decreased by $52.7 million in United States dollar terms from the expected level following the annual Pledging Conference. This was partially offset by gains of $29.1 million in the value of funds held by UNDP during the same period.

Field programme expenditure in 1986 totalled to $689.2 million—a 20 per cent increase over the 1985 level of $571.7 million—of which $563.5 million represented expenditure against IPFs, $90.1 million under cost-sharing arrangements and $35.6 million against supplementary programmes in the UNDP account: $13.9 million under SPRs; $3.9 million under Special Industrial Services; $10.3 million under SMF/LDC; and $7.5 million in Government cash counterpart contributions. The $563.5 million in IPF expenditures represented an increase of 16.9 per cent over 1985 and exceeded the $540 million forecast. On the basis of those figures, the Administrator reported that the pattern of decline in programme delivery during 1982-1984 had been reversed, and for the second year in succession there had been an increase in programme expenditure over the previous year.

In his annual report⁽¹⁾ the Administrator noted that aggregate income from contributions to UNDP and UNDP-administered funds, including voluntary pledges, cost-sharing arrangements and sub-trust funds, had reached $1,009.2 million in 1986, a climb of almost 17 per cent over the 1985 level of $863.7 million.

The value of new projects approved in 1986 exhibited a sharp rise of 33.3 per cent as compared with 1985, increasing from $349.05 million to $465.4 million. The total number of new approvals rose by 6.5 per cent, from 1,436 to 1,530. The three leading project sectors in 1986, in order of their numerical share of new approvals, were: development strategies, policies and planning; industry; and agriculture, forestry and fisheries.

The 112 UNDP field offices served 152 countries and territories in 1986, offering Governments and other development partners numerous services which extended beyond their central responsibilities. Three examples of UNDP support were: resource mobilization efforts and generation of parallel financing by UNDP-assisted projects; assistance in delivering non-UNDP expenditures which were supported by the UNDP field infrastructure; and assistance to recipients of World Bank loans by placing at their disposal the existing UNDP field-based delivery system to aid in implementing Bank-financed technical co-operation projects.

Other expenditures from central resources were $83.6 million on agency support costs, $132.2 million on administrative and programme support costs, and $6 million on sectoral support and other field-level costs.

Project expenditures by OPE totalled $126.3 million in 1986, an increase of almost 50 per cent over 1985. Disbursements under projects financed from UNDP core funds totalled some $57.4 million, an increase of more than 30 per cent.

The report of the Board of Auditors for 1986⁽⁴⁷⁾ stated that the total of unexpended UNDP resources increased from $318.4 million in 1985 to $461.1 million as at 31 December 1986.

Contributions. The audited financial statements for 1986⁽⁴⁷⁾ showed that total income from contributions to the UNDP account was $913.6 million. That included contributions from Governments and other sources as follows: voluntary contributions, $785.3 million ($788.7 million, less transfers to government local office costs of $3.4 million); voluntary contributions to SMF/LDC, $12 million; cost-sharing contributions, $108.9 million; and cash counterpart contributions for projects, $7.3 million. Exchange adjustments in the collection of contributions of $92,258 were added to derive the total.

As at 31 December 1986, pledges made in 1986 to the UNDP account for use in 1987 amounted to $410 million; pledges for 1987 for SMF/LDC amounted to $6.1 million. The financial statements gave a breakdown of contributions by Governments in 1986 and of pledges for 1987.

In his annual report⁽¹⁾ the UNDP Administrator stated that during 1986 five major donor countries raised their contributions by 8 per cent or more in United States dollar terms. Among recipient donors, 13 countries boosted their contributions appreciably. Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden had indicated their intended contributions for future years, helping to meet the forward-planning requirements of UNDP. The Netherlands, New Zealand and Sweden pledged a further $7.9 million in supplementary contributions.

Shortly after the annual Pledging Conference in November 1986, several Governments announced pledges, and two, Sweden and the United Kingdom, increased their original contributions. Further adjustments in exchange rate parities resulted in a greater appreciation of the value of pledges in United States dollar terms.

Revised 1986-1987 budget

Revised budget estimates for 1986 and estimates for the biennium 1986-1987⁽⁴⁸⁾ were submitted by the Administrator to the Governing Council in March 1986; an appropriation for 1986 only had been approved by the Council in 1985.⁽⁴⁹⁾ The revised estimates for 1986 amounted to $162 million (gross), a decrease of $8.3 million. The revised estimates for the biennium as a whole were $333.9 million (gross), a reduction of $12.9 million (3.9 per cent). The reduction consisted of a cost decrease of $18.9 million (5.5 per cent), partially offset by a volume increase in 1987 of $6 million (1.7 per cent). The cost decrease was attributable to: a decrease of $2 million (0.6 per cent) resulting from revised requirements under "Africa strengthening"; a currency release of $2.7 million (0.8 per cent); and a decrease in inflation of $14.2 million (4.1 per cent).

Also before the Council, as requested in 1984,⁽⁵⁰⁾ was a report of the Administrator on government contributions to local office costs⁽⁵¹⁾ The report included information on experience gained in 1985, the first year in which an accounting linkage was made among voluntary contributions, contributions to voluntary programme costs and contributions to local office costs. The Administrator said that in 1985 there was a global shortfall of $2.3 million in government contributions to UNDP local office costs.

In its May report⁽⁵²⁾ the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) considered the Administrator's reports and cautioned against requests for ex post facto approval of post reclassification, saying that it expected upgradings given in the Africa strengthening package not to last beyond the biennium. It had no objection to the conversion of 53 temporary posts to an established basis. ACABQ noted that the Administrator had used the information regarding government contributions to local costs in 1985 in formulating his income estimates for 1986-1987.

UNDP Council action. On 27 June⁽⁵³⁾ the Governing Council, noting the ACABQ report, approved appropriations in the amount of $334,199,500 (gross) to be allocated from the resources of UNDP, UNCDF, UNRFPNRE and UNSO to finance the 1986-1987 biennial budget, and resolved that income estimates in an amount of $50,703,600 should be used to offset the gross appropriations, resulting in net appropriations of $283,495,900. The Council also approved an exceptional allocation of $791,630 to be charged against UNDP support cost resources and to be treated as extrabudgetary income for the UNV programme (see p. 435), in order to permit an immediate strengthening of its administrative capacity. The Council took note of the Administrator's proposals in respect of government obligations for local office costs in the fourth programming cycle and of the carry-forward of $900,000 of the 1984-1985 support cost earnings of OPE as available for use in 1986-1987.

Review of 1985 financial situation

In an April 1986 report⁽⁵⁴⁾ the Administrator provided a comprehensive financial review of activities financed from the UNDP account during 1985 and of the financial position as at the end of that year. The report included estimates of anticipated resources and expenditures for 1986 and 1987, information on cost-sharing activities, the status of SMF/LDC and SPRs, the placement of UNDP funds, the Operational Reserve and the utilization of accumulated non-convertible currencies. Information was also provided on cash management, agency support cost arrangements, the status of the Reserve for Construction Loans to Governments, management and other support services, and government financial obligations in the fourth cycle.

In accordance with a 1984 Council decision⁽⁵⁰⁾ the Administrator provided the Council with information on the net flow of contributions to and payments from the UNDP system in respect of each participating Government.

By a 27 June decision⁽⁵⁵⁾ the Governing Council urged the Administrator, in co-operation with recipient Governments and executing agencies, to continue to improve programme delivery so that it was better aligned with the balance of available resources. It also urged all Governments to make prompt and early payment of pledges. The Administrator's policy regarding the use of currency options was taken note of and he was requested to report on problems related to such utilization. The Council asked the Administrator to continue to report annually on the provision of management services and to include a detailed analysis of experience gained to date in the report to be presented in 1988.

Special Programme Resources

The Administrator submitted to the February special session of the UNDP Governing Council a note⁽⁵⁶⁾ detailing the status and use of SPRs during the third programming cycle (1982-1986), the total funds planned to be available for SPRs during the fourth cycle (1987-1991), and a conceptual framework for the utilization of SPRs during the fourth cycle.

The Administrator noted that he would request the Council to carry forward from the third to the fourth programming cycle any amount of committed but unspent SPR allocations and would present to the Council in 1987 details of any such funds as at 31 December 1986, in order to request its formal authorization for such carry-over to the next cycle. He recommended a draft decision for the Council's adoption.

On 21 February⁽⁵⁷⁾ the Council authorized the use of SPRs during the fourth programming cycle for: financing emergency assistance in cases of natural disaster; financing longer-term assistance in the rehabilitation and reconstruction of areas stricken by natural disaster; financing activities related to programme development, including aid co-ordination, enhancing programme quality, promoting new initiatives, research and development in the social and economic development area and country programme assessment; contingency financing; and financing action-oriented promotional activities of TCDC. The Administrator was requested to report to the Council every two years on the status and use of SPRs.

In April⁽⁵⁸⁾ the Administrator proposed that the Council authorize the carry-over of the unspent balance of third-cycle SPR funds committed prior to 31 December 1986 and the balance of third-cycle funds not allocated or committed at that time. He stated that the June 1987 authorization originally proposed would result in a hiatus period between January and June 1987 when the Administrator would not be able to incur expenditures against commitments made under SPRs prior to 31 December 1986.

On 27 June⁽³⁴⁾ the Council authorized the carry-over from the third to the fourth programming cycle of both unallocated SPR funds and those allocated but not budgeted as at 31 December 1986, such amounts to be added to the authorized level of SPRs for the fourth cycle. The Administrator was asked to submit in 1987 a proposal on the type of activities which could be considered for financing under the category of contingencies.

During 1986, seven new trust funds were established by the Administrator on behalf of UNDP⁽⁵⁹⁾ They were the UNDP/Live Aid Foundation Trust Fund, the UNDP/United Support of Artists for Africa Trust Fund, the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA)/UNDP Trust Fund for the Pakistan National Household Survey Capability Programme, the CIDA/UNDP Trust Fund for the Caribbean Project Development Facility, the UNDP Trust Fund for Receipt of Payments by Users of the Caribbean Project Development Facility, the CIDA/UNDP Trust Fund for the African Project Development Facility, and the Government of France Trust Fund for the UNDP/World Bank Energy Sector Assessment Programme. Contributions to those funds received during the year amounted to $5.8 million. Six sub-trust fund arrangements were established on behalf of UNCDF (2), UNFSSTD, UNIFEM (2) and UNV. The value of those arrangements was approximately $7.4 million.

Total voluntary contributions to the special-purpose funds in 1986 rose to $41.4 million from $28.6 million in 1985; income received by the funds from cost-sharing and sub-trust fund arrangements also increased to $28.9 million from $25.5 million in 1985.

In response to a 1985 Governing Council request⁽⁶⁰⁾ the Administrator submitted in March 1986 a report on the financial structure of the UNDP-administered system.⁽⁶¹⁾ He reviewed action already taken to make management of the funds more effective and efficient with respect to country programmes, project preparation and reporting. He stated that he was still reviewing organizational arrangements regarding the management of the funds and noted that further consideration would take into account the future of UNFSSTD. He emphasized that options to be reviewed by him included the possibility of pooling the resources of all the funds, or among some of them, a rationalization under a single administrative structure, and effecting a limited reallocation of certain functions between the funds and UNDP.

On 27 June⁽⁶²⁾ the Governing Council urged the Administrator to pursue the initiatives outlined in his report and asked him to prepare a detailed analytical report in 1987 containing proposals for management and staffing arrangements for the various funds and programmes under his responsibility, in order to achieve the most cost-effective organizational structure in relation to the resources being managed.

In response to a 1984 Council decision⁽⁶³⁾ the Administrator submitted in March 1986 a report on trust funds conditioned on procurement from the donor country⁽⁶⁴⁾ He evaluated UNDP's experience with such trust funds between 1982 and 1985 and recommended that no new projects should be accepted under the modality of tied trust funds in respect of UNSO and UNCDF. However, he recommended that, with regard to UNFSSTD, the status quo be maintained until the General Assembly reached a final decision on the Fund's future.

On 27 June⁽⁶⁵⁾ the Council approved the Administrator's recommendation that no new contributions conditioned on procurement from the donor country be accepted with regard to UNSO, UNCDF or UNFSSTD after 30 April 1986.

In other 27 June action,⁽⁶⁶⁾ the Council took note of the Administrator's report on trust funds established in 1985.⁽⁶⁰⁾

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

By resolution 41/183, the General Assembly terminated UNFSSTD as at 31 December 1986 and transferred its responsibilities and resources to a facility entitled "United Nations Fund for Science and Technology for Development", to be established as a trust fund within UNDP.

Agency support costs

In accordance with a 1984 decision⁽⁶⁷⁾ the UNDP Administrator submitted to the Governing Council in May 1986 his second biennial ex post facto report on agency support costs⁽⁶⁸⁾ The report, covering the biennium 1984-1985, examined information received from agencies and analysed trends in agency support cost income and expenditure, as well as agency technical co-operation project expenditure since the 1984 report⁽⁶⁷⁾

The report showed that agency implementation of UNDP-financed projects in 1984-1985 decreased by some 12.4 per cent from the 1982-1983 level. The UNDP percentage share of total agency technical co-operation project expenditure also decreased, to 38.2 per cent in 1984-1985 from 43.4 per cent in 1982-1983. The decrease in the UNDP-financed portion of most of the agencies' technical co-operation activities was more than offset by an increase in technical co-operation activities funded through their regular budget programmes and from their other extrabudgetary sources. The overall reduction in the support cost expenditure of agencies in 1984-1985 was partly attributable to deliberate actions to reduce support cost expenditure through cost-saving measures.

On 27 June⁽⁶⁹⁾ the Governing Council, expressing concern at the decline in the share of total technical co-operation expenditure in the United Nations system of operational activities relating to UNDP, asked the Administrator to review the impact of fluctuating exchange rates on the agencies' support cost earnings covered by flexibility arrangements and to make recommendations in 1987. The Council also asked him to continue to submit biennial ex post facto reports.

Sectoral support

In a March 1986 report⁽⁷⁰⁾ requested in 1985⁽⁷¹⁾ the Administrator noted that arrangements for sectoral support to the smaller agencies had been considered in 1985 and confirmed that the Senior Industrial Development Field Adviser (SIDFA) programme was an effective mechanism for assisting Governments, UNDP and UNIDO. The report concluded that UNDP should continue its sectoral support to the SIDFA programme throughout the fourth cycle (1987-1991) and recommended an allocation of $16 million for the SIDFA programme and $9 million for sectoral support to smaller agencies. It was proposed that the SIDFA allocation be disbursed in equal biennial instalments.

On 27 June⁽⁷²⁾ the Governing Council noted the allocation of $25 million for the fourth programming cycle, together with any savings arising in the third cycle, to be used as follows: $9.6 million to cover UNDP costs for the services of the maximum number of SIDFAs in 1987, 1988 and 1989; $9 million to be used at the Administrator's discretion for the smaller agencies; and $6.4 million to be maintained for SIDFAs in the sectoral support line for the Council's further consideration. The Council asked the Administrator to review the SIDFA programme with UNIDO and to report in 1987 on the results.

Accounts and auditing

Accounts for 1985

The financial statements of UNDP for the year ended 31 December 1985, together with the report of the Board of Auditors, were submitted to the General Assembly in August 1986.⁽⁷³⁾ The statements also covered UNDP-administered trust funds.

ACABQ, in September⁽⁷⁴⁾ commented on the Board's findings.

By resolution 41/176 of 5 December, the Assembly accepted the financial report and audited financial statements and the audit opinions of the Board of Auditors, and endorsed the comments and observations of both the Board and ACABQ.

Audit reports for 1984

In a March 1986 note⁽⁷⁵⁾ by which he submitted the audited accounts and audit reports of some executing agencies relating to funds allocated to them by UNDP as at 31 December 1984, the Administrator included a summary of the most significant observations contained in the external auditors' report on UNDP for that year.

On 27 June⁽⁷⁶⁾ the UNDP Governing Council reaffirmed that increasing emphasis should be given by the external auditors to preparing long-form narrative audit reports which included observations on the effectiveness of financial management. It asked the Administrator to bring its decision and the views expressed by its Budgetary and Finance Committee to the attention of the Panel of External Auditors and to continue his efforts to ensure that long-form narrative audit reports were submitted in respect of every executing agency carrying out a significant volume of UNDP-financed activities.

Financial regulations

In January 1986⁽⁷⁷⁾ the Administrator submitted to the Governing Council the text of a proposed UNDP financial regulation (mainly dealing with currencies of contributions and their utilization) on which consensus had not been reached in 1985, as well as the text of portions of a 1981 Council decision⁽⁷⁸⁾ identified by the Administrator as the other questions on which consensus had not been reached by the Council. In accordance with a 1985 Council decision⁽⁷⁹⁾ those matters were to be considered by the Budgetary and Finance Committee during its meetings in June 1986.

The Council decided on 27 June⁽⁸⁰⁾ that the Committee would consider in 1987 the proposed financial regulation and other matters on which consensus was not achieved at the Council's 1986 session.

ITU request for additional support-cost reimbursement

In April 1986⁽⁸¹⁾ the Administrator reported that the Administrative Council of the International Telecommunication Union (ITU) had requested the Governing Council to reconsider its 1985 decision⁽⁸²⁾ regarding ITU's request for additional support-cost reimbursement in the amount of $644,000 covering the years 1980 to 1983.

In a report on ITU technical co-operation activities⁽⁸³⁾ JIU recommended that ITU absorb the accumulated deficit from its own resources if the UNDP Governing Council continued to refuse to write off the deficit. If this were the case, the Secretary-General would be asked to present a financing plan for absorbing the deficit over a period of several years.

On 27 June⁽⁸⁴⁾ the Council reaffirmed its 1984⁽⁸⁵⁾ and 1985⁽⁸²⁾ decisions, by which it had decided that support-cost reimbursement to executing agencies, including ITU, should continue to be made in accordance with the provisions of the 1980⁽⁸⁶⁾ and 1981⁽⁸⁷⁾ Council decisions on the topic.

Staff-related matters

Appointment of the Administrator

In April 1986⁽⁸⁸⁾ the Secretary-General informed the General Assembly that F Bradford Morse wished to retire as UNDP Administrator as from 30 April 1986. Following consultations with members of the UNDP Governing Council, the Secretary-General proposed the appointment of William H. Draper III as Administrator from 1 May 1986 to 31 December 1989.

By decision 40/325 of 28 April 1986, the Assembly confirmed the Secretary-General's appointment of Mr. Draper.

On 27 June⁽⁸⁹⁾ the UNDP Governing Council expressed its sincere appreciation and gratitude to Mr. Morse for the effective and dedicated manner in which he performed his functions as UNDP Administrator from 1976 to 1986 and, additionally, as Director of the Office for Emergency Operations in Africa from 1985 to 1986.

Job classification

In January 1986,⁽⁹⁰⁾ the Administrator reported on the implementation of the results of job classification for the General Service category in UNDP. He stated that UNDP had complied fully with the steps and requirements in the job classification exercise over the preceding three years. He considered it appropriate to request the Governing Council to authorize implementation of job classification for the following reasons: the UNDP classification was completed early without the delays experienced in the United Nations; ACABQ had endorsed the results of the UNDP exercise and had offered no objection to the classification being implemented with effect from 1 January 1985 without waiting for the United Nations; the International Civil Service Commission (ICSC) had formally requested the Administrator to proceed with the UNDP implementation without waiting for the United Nations; the General Assembly had deferred the implementation of the United Nations results pending the recommendations of ACABQ and ICSC, which had already endorsed the UNDP results; and the Assembly had established the effective date of 1 January 1985. The Administrator therefore requested the Council to amend its 1985 decision⁽⁹¹⁾ by which he was authorized to implement the exercise when the results were implemented by the Secretary-General.

On 21 February⁽⁹²⁾ the Governing Council authorized the Administrator to implement the results of the classification exercise, effective 1 January 1986, and to revert to the matter, if necessary, upon the finalization of the exercise in the United Nations.

Other administrative matters

UNDP field offices in Belgrade and Bucharest

In a note⁽⁹³⁾ to the February 1986 special session of the Governing Council, the UNDP Administrator reported that, following a 1985 Council discussion on closing UNDP field offices in Belgrade, Yugoslavia and Bucharest, Romania, both Governments had indicated their wish to keep the offices open. Since there was no provision in the 1986-1987 administrative budget for the financing of those offices after 1 January 1987, they would be closed as of that date if no action was taken to amend the budget. The note contained a financial summary of the estimated annual costs, based on 1987 prices, of maintaining the offices ($349,400), closing them ($67,000) and savings resulting from closure ($282,400). It was noted that, in the event of closure, the UNDP programmes in both countries would be administered by the Geneva office.

On 21 February⁽⁹⁴⁾ the Council deferred consideration of the Administrator's note to its June session. On 27 June⁽⁹⁵⁾ the Council agreed to retain the Belgrade and Bucharest field offices on the basis of an agreement reached between the UNDP administration and the Governments concerned, agreed that its decision would not set a precedent for future management of field operations, and decided that the agreement should be reflected in the appropriation decision on the 1986-1987 biennial budget. Also on 27 June⁽⁹⁶⁾ the Council decided that the two offices should be maintained on the understanding that from 1987 there should be no net additional cost to the biennial budget above those that would have been incurred in administering the two country programmes from the Geneva office.

Financial implications

On 27 June⁽⁹⁶⁾ the Governing Council requested the Administrator to ensure that, at its future sessions, all documents having financial implications and submitted for consideration to the Council contained a concise statement of such financial implications, including the nature and duration of activities for which financing was requested, the source of such financing, details of additional staff requested, and estimated total costs by object of expenditure.

1987 UNDP Governing Council session

On 8 December 1986, by resolution 41/188, the General Assembly requested the UNDP Governing Council, at its organizational session, to reschedule its 1987 annual session, which should be held from 26 May to 19 June in New York, and the session of the High-level Committee on the Review of TCDC, which should be held between 18 and 22 May.

Other technical co-operation

UN programmes

The United Nations, mainly through its Department of Technical Co-operation for Development, continued to provide technical assistance to developing countries in the economic and social sectors during 1986. The Secretary-General reported to the UNDP Governing Council⁽¹⁾ on DTCD policy issues and details of its 1986 technical co-operation programme as well as those of other United Nations Secretariat entities.

The report said the United Nations delivered a technical co-operation programme of $232 million in 1986, compared with $198 million in 1985 (excluding UNIDO, which became a United Nations specialized agency as of 1 January 1986), a 17 per cent increase in project expenditures. Of that amount, DTCD executed a programme of $145.9 million.

The United Nations regular programme of technical co-operation financed activities totalling some $12 million through DTCD, the regional commissions, the Centre for Human Rights, the Division of Narcotic Drugs, the Office of Legal Affairs, the Centre for Human Settlements, the Centre on Transnational Corporations, UNCTAD and the United Nations Environment Programme. UNDP-financed projects carried out by those entities totalled some $138 million.

DTCD activities

The Secretary-General stated in his report on technical co-operation activities⁽¹⁾ that the operational activities of DTCD had produced very encouraging results in 1986, with project expenditures increasing by 15 per cent for the second year in a row and the achievement of an 83 per cent implementation rate, compared with the 1985 rate of 77 per cent. A combination of increased support-cost ("overhead") income and decreased administrative costs resulted in complete elimination of the deficits accumulated by DTCD in its overhead account and by the end of 1986 a surplus of $1.4 million was realized.

In 1986, DTCD had under execution 954 technical co-operation projects in the areas of development issues and policies, natural resources and energy, public administration and finance, statistics, population, ocean economics and technology, and social development and humanitarian affairs. Project expenditures of $146 million were incurred against budgets of $176 million. Expenditures increased by $19 million (15 per cent) and budgets by $11 million (6 per cent) over 1985 levels. By source of funds, expenditures were $103.1 million for UNDP-financed projects; $13.2 million for UNFPA; $21.8 million under trust fund-financed activities; and $7.8 million under the United Nations regular programme of technical co-operation.

By geographic area, delivery was $58.7 million for Africa, $35.9 million for Asia and the Pacific, $30.4 million for the Middle East, Mediterranean, Europe and interregional projects, and $20.9 million for the Americas. The largest growth was in Africa, where the programme increased by $13.5 million and project delivery increased from 36 per cent to 40 per cent of the total.

By sector, natural resources and energy continued to account for the largest share of the programme: $74.3 million in project expenditures or 51 per cent of the DTCD total. This sector also exhibited the largest growth, increasing by $14.6 million, or 25 per cent, over 1985 expenditures. Development planning was second, representing $26.3 million (18.1 per cent). The statistics sector had expenditures of $15.5 million (10.6 per cent); public administration and finance, $14.9 million (10.2 per cent); population, $6.4 million (4.4 per cent); social development, $4.3 million (3 per cent); the United Nations Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa, $3.1 million (2.1 per cent); and others, $1.1 million.

During the year, DTCD executed 166 development planning projects. Headquarters staff undertook 144 project-related or direct-advisory missions to 69 countries; 105 of the missions were undertaken by interregional advisers. Methodologies and systems for planning capital investment projects ("project banks") were developed for and applied in eight countries and similar work was initiated in two other countries. Systems for monitoring and evaluating investment projects were introduced in Bangladesh, the Gambia and Malawi with the aim of improving the efficiency of planning and executing such projects. In the subnational, regional and spatial planning area, DTCD assisted Malaysia and Indonesia, and also assisted Burkina Faso, Guinea-Bissau and Mozambique in a broad range of planning efforts. Nicaragua, Panama and Venezuela were helped to plan overall technical co-operation activities and Costa Rica and Nicaragua were advised on debt management and negotiation. DTCD supported Equatorial Guinea's preparations for an international donors' round-table meeting and assisted Guinea-Bissau to strengthen its national planning capacity. It also co-operated in preparing for the interregional TCDC programming exercise, held in China (see p. 437). DTCD collaborated with national and regional consultancy firms and experts in projects in Belize, Honduras and Nicaragua and also co-operated with regional development banks in Burkina Faso and Malaysia. Integrated rural and community development emphasized popular participation in the development process, enhancing women's role in development, development of nomadic populations, community self-help, developing ground-water resources and employing small energy packages of renewable energy resources.

In the area of natural resources and energy, 68 projects in the minerals field were operational in 1986 and 73 advisory missions undertaken, a considerable increase over 1985, resulting from growth in requests in such fields as computer applications in mineral exploration and evaluation, investment promotion, mineral development legislation, contract negotiations, mineral sector planning and institution strengthening. In energy, 112 projects were under execution in the areas of conventional energy, electric power and new and renewable sources of energy. Water resources management activities included assistance in planning, legislation and institution building, provision of rural water supplies, international river basin development and applied hydraulic research, through a total of 116 projects. Twenty-seven new and follow-up projects were initiated, mainly in Africa. A total of 56 projects were operational in the area of cartography, remote sensing and public works.

DTCD implemented 158 projects in the public administration and finance sector during 1986. Priority attention was given to resolving the management and administrative problems of countries in Africa. Interregional advisers undertook 48 missions largely in the area of financial administration, including government budgeting and financial management, accounting and auditing, public enterprise, tax reform and mobilization. Advisory services were also requested in management development and training, administrative reform, personnel administration and information systems management.

Projects in statistics totalled 153 in 1986, with much of the work associated with the completion of the 1980 round of population and census programmes, the preparatory work for the 1990 round, statistical training and the provision of computer software. Projects for basic data collection and data processing assisted countries to organize and conduct censuses and demographic and related surveys, and to strengthen civil registration systems; 87 such projects were active in 1986, of which 15 were newly approved, and five countries carried out population census with DTCD assistance.

DTCD executed 83 projects in the field of population, including evaluation and analysis of demographic data and strengthening national capacities for research in the population field. During 1986, 38 country projects and two United Nations interregional population training centres provided training in demography and related population studies. Ninety individuals received fellowships to attend the interregional centres, and 61 nationals from 26 countries received grants to institutions other than those supported by the United Nations.

The Ocean Economics and Technology Branch of the Department of International Economic and Social Affairs provided substantive support to DTCD to implement a $12,000 project in Trinidad and Tobago, assisting the Institute of Marine Affairs, an important government agency in environmental studies and marine resource assessment.

DTCD executed 10 projects in the social development and humanitarian affairs sector, which dealt with social integration and welfare, crime prevention and criminal justice, youth, aging and disabled persons.

During 1986, DTCD recruited 1,228 experts and consultants and extended the services of 622, significantly more than in any year since 1981, as a result of higher budgets and delivery and resulting increased project activity. The experts worked predominantly in the sectors of natural resources and energy (39 per cent), economic planning (35 per cent) and development administration (15 per cent), a distribution similar to that of 1985. A total of 3,818 training awards were implemented in 1986, including fellowships, seminars, study tours and workshops, compared with 3,670 in 1985. Fellows and participants from 135 countries were trained in 97 host countries, with 43 per cent of them placed in developing countries.

In response to a 1985 Governing Council request⁽²⁾ the UNDP Administrator submitted proposed adjustments to the guidelines for the regular programme of technical co-operation⁽³⁾. The revised guidelines would enhance DTCD's ability to address the emergency situation in Africa and to meet that continent's long-term development needs. In programming its 1986-1987 regular programme resources, DTCD would expand its assistance to least developed and other particularly affected countries, with the specific purpose of including a special programme focusing on Africa and complementing large-scale activities financed from other sources. African Governments would be provided with advice and assistance in planning and managing their economic and social development strategy, taking into account both emergency and long-term needs. In addition, ongoing assistance to Africa in advisory services, training and field projects would be continued and intensified in critical sectors such as water resources and development administration and management. Since those activities could be carried out within existing arrangements governing DTCD's use of regular programme resources, it seemed that no adjustments in existing guidelines were currently necessary.

UNDP Council action. On 27 June 1986,⁽⁴⁾ the Governing Council took note of the Secretary-General's report on United Nations technical co-operation activities during 1985,⁽⁵⁾ commended DTCD for further reducing its administrative costs and increasing the efficiency of its service delivery and urged the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to adopt measures in administrative, financial and personnel matters to increase DTCD's effectiveness as an executing agency. It also urged that steps be taken to strengthen DTCD's technical capabilities and asked the Secretary-General to report in 1987 on steps taken; he was also to report in 1987 on the conclusions of the joint UNDP/DTCD task force and on guidelines for field and headquarters practices to be established.

The Council invited funding institutions in the United Nations system to make the fullest use of the special competence, experience and operational capabilities of DTCD. DTCD was requested to take measures to make use of the knowledge, competence and national recruitment services available indigenously in assigning staff to technical assistance projects, and was invited to play a role in elaborating and implementing new initiatives pertaining to human resources development. The Council stressed the Department's role in implementing the Special Action Programme for Administration and Management in Africa and drew attention to the need to mobilize and concentrate more resources on those types of programmes. DTCD was invited to complete its development of an internal implementation strategy to strengthen its ability to deal with the issues of women in development, taking into account parallel efforts by UNDP and UNFPA, and the Secretary-General was asked to report on the matter in 1987.

The Council expressed deep concern at the negative trend in the proportion of DTCD's technical co-operation activities in Africa and urged it to take measures to reverse that trend. It encouraged DTCD to improve the quality of its projects, particularly with regard to design and implementation, and requested it to report in 1987 on measures taken to that effect. The Secretary-General was invited to make available further information on the role, experience and competence of DTCD so as to assist Governments of developing countries to become fully aware of the possibilities for technical co-operation available through its services.

On 20 February⁽⁶⁾ the Council considered the Administrator's note on the revised guidelines for the United Nations regular programme of technical co-operation⁽³⁾ took note of DTCD's programme of activities for 1986-1987 contained therein, and decided that no further adjustments to the existing guidelines were currently necessary.

United Nations Volunteers

In 1986, the United Nations Volunteers programme reached an all-time high level of 1,267 volunteers either serving or already accepted and awaited at duty stations, with 537 additional posts established and under recruitment⁽⁷⁾. The year closed with 1,248 serving/accepted volunteers, a slightly lower level than earlier in the year due to the phasing out of the UNV emergency assistance programme for sub-Saharan countries. As at 31 December 1986, there were 543 additional established posts under recruitment.

The region with the largest number of volunteers as of 31 December 1986 continued to be Africa, with 595; Asia and the Pacific followed with 316; the Arab States had 146; and Latin America and the Caribbean, 68. UNV-executed projects in 1986 totalled 104 (577 volunteers) and agency-executed projects with UNV totalled 257 (548 volunteers). The number of countries in which volunteers were serving increased to 97 from the 1985 level of 92. Other trends included an increase in UNV personnel from developing countries, to 953 in 1986 from 929 in 1985; a decrease in women volunteers in service to 145 from 170; and a sizeable increase in the number of completed and extended contracts during the year (from 347 to 474, and from 222 to 317, respectively).

Voluntary contributions to the UNV Special Voluntary Fund totalled $1.12 million in 1986, with the balance due for 1986 and prior years at 31 December 1986 amounting to $385,606. Pledges received in 1986 for 1987 totalled $1.13 million as at 31 December.

A breakdown of contributions by Governments to UNV in 1986 and of pledges for 1987 was set out in the audited financial statements for 1986.⁽⁸⁾

In his annual report for 1986,⁽⁹⁾ the UNDP Administrator stated that UNV project expenditures in 1986 were $2.46 million, including UNV-administered trust funds obtained from bilateral sources in the amount of $285,714. The total for intercountry expenditures was $100,000, with global and interregional programmes accounting for $89,000 of that amount. Total expenditures for individual country programmes were $2.36 million.

The Domestic Development Services (DBS) programme of UNV continued to expand and diversify in 1986. In Africa, the UNV-executed regional DBS project completed its first phase with training courses in Togo and Zambia aimed at increasing the effectiveness of 50 leaders of community self-help groups. Another development was the start-up of a number of IPF-funded grass-roots projects which focused on establishing revolving funds, implementing women's programmes and promoting the participation of youth in development. In Asia and the Pacific, over 80 NGOs in 16 countries were involved in DBS activities.

As a follow-up to International Youth Year (1985), UNV intensified its activities by assigning UNV youth specialists to Papua New Guinea, Swaziland and Zaire and recruiting a youth adviser for Bangladesh to assist the Government in drawing up a large-scale project for skills-training centres for young people.

The second UNV high-level intergovernmental meeting on international volunteerism and development, hosted by UNV and the Government of Lesotho, was held at Maseru from 16 to 21 November 1986, the first having been held in 1982 at Sana'a, Yemen.⁽¹⁰⁾ The meeting examined the continuing relevance and role of international volunteerism in development, took stock of UNV progress in implementing its mandates since 1982, and examined key issues concerning the programme. Over 200 delegates representing 53 industrialized and developing countries attended the meeting, together with 18 UNV co-operating organizations, 11 United Nations agencies, 18 UNBP field offices and 11 NGOs.

Recommendations made at the meeting dealt with: international volunteerism and multilateral technical co-operation; volunteerism and the participation of youth in development; volunteerism and participatory development; and international volunteerism and women.

UNDP Council action. On 27 June,⁽¹¹⁾ the Governing Council approved an exceptional allocation of $791,630 to be charged against UNBP support-cost resources and to be treated as extrabudgetary income for the UNV programme to permit an immediate strengthening of its administrative capacity. The UNBP Administrator was asked to undertake a substantive review of the mandate, role and work priorities of UNV and to submit to the Council in 1987 a report which would include his recommendation on alternative financing modalities to meet the need for staffing UNV headquarters in relation to its work-load. He was also asked to report on his proposed consultations with specialized agencies regarding compensation to UNV for identifying and fielding volunteers for agency-executed projects.

Technical co-operation among developing countries

Project assistance continued to be one of the main tasks of the UNBP Special Unit for TCBC in 1986. A total of 112 activities costing $971,000 were supported, 22.9 per cent more than 1985 project expenditures. Twenty-three countries used the TCBC modality in implementing their IPF-financed projects during the year, compared with 19 countries in 1985. Of those, 14 countries were implementing umbrella projects under which multiple TCBC activities were covered.

The UNBP Administrator, in his annual report⁽⁹⁾ noted that the TCBC Information Referral System (INRES) had been expanded during 1986. The total number of institutions and line items included in the INRES data base increased by 15 per cent to 2,600 institutions and 60,000 line items, and information on 920 of the initial 2,300 institutions was updated.

As a result of the 1985 Governing Council decision to allocate $1.5 million from SPRs for action-oriented TCBC activities⁽¹²⁾ UNBP was able to increase its support for such initiatives and laid particular emphasis on organizing intergovernmental programming exercises. The Administrator reported⁽¹³⁾ that the project had supported several TCBC orientation seminars and programming exercises during the year.

In 1986, TCBC orientation seminars were held for 21 Latin American and Caribbean countries (Sao Paulo, Brazil, 14-18 April) for the 10 member countries of the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States and representatives of four Latin American countries (Bridgetown, Barbados, 5 and 6 June), and, in co-operation with the Islamic Development Bank, for 33 of the Bank's member countries (Jeddah, Saudi Arabia, 27-30 October). The seminars recommended that: national focal points for TCDC should be strengthened; TCDC should be an integral part of national development policies; funds for TCDC should be allocated in national budgets; national information systems should be developed and linked to regional, inter-regional and global information systems; and the use in TCDC of the facilities and resources available in the United Nations development system should be enhanced.

At Lima on 9 and 10 October, Peru hosted the first TCDC programming exercise for the countries of Latin America and the Caribbean, at which 249 TCDC activities in a variety of sectors were agreed upon bilaterally between Peru and other participating countries.

The first interregional TCDC programming exercise was held at Beijing, China, from 24 to 29 November, with representatives from 24 countries of Asia and the Pacific, Latin America and the Caribbean and Europe and from several specialized agencies. A total of 146 TCDC activities at an estimated cost of $1.12 million were finalized bilaterally between China and the other participating countries.

In April 1986,⁽¹⁴⁾ the Administrator presented his recommendations for TCDC information support projects, as requested by the Governing Council in 1985.⁽¹⁵⁾ Among the obstacles to increased technical and economic co-operation among developing countries were long-standing attitudinal barriers and practical difficulties in interregional exchanges of information and experience. To overcome such problems, the 1978 Buenos Aires Plan of Action for TCDC⁽¹⁶⁾ had called for the United Nations system to support long-term information and education programmes on TCDC. The magazine Co-operation South (formerly TCDC News) had been issued since 1985, the Administrator reported, and currently had a print run of 30,900. The Administrator proposed that the magazine be improved and that three synthesis publications and three regional media seminars be held over the following five years, with the annual costs chargeable to SPRs, for information support of TCDC. He recommended an allocation of $1.6 million for TCDC from SPRs.

On 27 June⁽¹⁷⁾ the UNDP Governing Council allocated that amount from unallocated fourth-cycle SPRs.

On 5 December, by decision 41/444, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, transmitted to the governing bodies of the organizations of the United Nations system the 1985 JIU report on TCDC.⁽¹⁸⁾

TCDC Focal Points meeting. The first Meeting of TCDC Focal Points of the Organizations of the United Nations Development System was convened by UNDP in New York on 4 and 5

March 1986.⁽¹⁹⁾ The aim of the Meeting, attended by representatives of 25 organizations and offices, was to share experience in, and exchange views on, the application of TCDC policies, concepts and procedures in the technical co-operation activities of the organizations involved. The Meeting adopted recommendations covering such TCDC-related topics as the terms and conditions for experts and consultants, financial aspects and modalities, information systems, procurement of supplies from developing countries, United Nations system reports and information activities. The recommendations were forwarded to all organizations of the United Nations system.

Perez Guerrero Trust Fund

In October 1986, the General Assembly's Second Committee had before it a 15 September letter⁽²⁰⁾ from Yugoslavia, transmitting the final documents of the High-Level Meeting of the Group of 77 on Economic Co-operation among Developing Countries (Cairo, Egypt, 18-23 August). Recalling the contribution to the furtherance of economic co-operation among developing countries (ECDC) of the late Manuel Perez Guerrero, Minister of State for International Economic Affairs of Venezuela, the meeting decided to name the Trust Fund for ECDC/TCDC in his honour.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

In December, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted decision 41/457 without vote.

Perez Guerrero Trust Fund for Economic and Technical Co-operation among Developing Countries

At its 100th plenary meeting, on 8 December 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, having recalled its resolution 38/201 of 20 December 1983 and having taken note of paragraph 46 of the report of the High-Level Meeting of the Group of 77 on Economic Co-operation among Developing Countries, held at Cairo from 18 to 23 August 1986, decided, in recognition of the outstanding contribution made by the late Manuel Perez Guerrero to international co-operation for development, to name the Trust Fund for Economic Co-operation among Developing Countries/Technical Co-operation among Developing Countries the "Perez Guerrero Trust Fund for Economic and Technical Co-operation among Developing Countries".

General Assembly decision 41/457

Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/530Add.2) without vote, 28 November (meeting 36); draft by Yugoslavia, for Group of 77 (A/C.2/41/L.73), orally revised; agenda item 12.

Skilled workers

On 20 March 1986,⁽²¹⁾ the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General to prepare a study on the role of TCDC, particularly the exchange of skills in the transfer of technology, as recommended by the 1985 Meeting of Governmental Experts on Co-operative Exchange of Skills among Developing Countries⁽²²⁾ and submit it to the High-level Committee on the Review of TCDC at its 1987 session.

UN Capital Development Fund

In response to a 1981 General Assembly resolution, (1) the UNDP Administrator included in his annual report on the United Nations Capital Development Fund⁽¹⁾ a broad biennial policy review. In addition to describing the Fund's programme activities, policy developments, financial status and administrative matters, the report included UNCDF evaluation activities carried out in 1986.

UNCDF delivery and approval of new projects increased substantially (37.6 per cent and 23.8 per cent respectively) in 1986, thereby responding to the need for small-scale capital assistance in developing countries, particularly the least developed.

In 1986, UNCDF approved a total of $46.3 million in commitments, of which $43.7 million was for new projects and $2.6 million for grant increases in existing project budgets. Of the total amount approved, $44 million was funded directly from UNCDF general resources, while the remainder of $2.3 million was funded under joint financing arrangements. Outstanding commitments funded by general resources amounted to $139.2 million at the end of 1986. Total combined outstanding UNCDF commitments at year end, including joint financing arrangements, amounted to $151.8 million.

Project expenditures amounted to an estimated $25.1 million from general resources and $8.9 million from trust-fund and cost-sharing arrangements, or a total of $34 million, compared with $24.7 million in 1985.

Anticipated pledges for 1986 amounted to $24 million. With currency fluctuations, the pledges were valued at year end at $27 million. Contributions paid against those pledges amounted to $26.5 million, with an additional $0.2 million received against pledges from 1985 and prior years. As a result of the November 1986 Pledging Conference (see p. 416), contributions to the general resources of UNCDF for 1987 were expected to total $32.1 million, representing an 18.9 per cent increase over 1986 contributions.

A breakdown of contributions by Governments to UNCDF in 1986 and of pledges for 1987 was set out in the audited financial statements for 1986.⁽³⁾

New joint financing arrangements for $2.9 million were concluded during 1986, bringing the total of such arrangements entered into by UNCDF since 1981 to $35 million. During the year, $2.8 million was paid in against trust-fund and cost-sharing arrangements.

Outstanding project commitments at the end of 1986 of $139.2 million exceeded the available resources exclusive of the operational reserve of $95.3 million by $43.9 million. The outstanding commitments were expected to be covered by the resources pledged to the Fund for 1987 and by part of the anticipated contributions for 1988.

In 1986, UNCDF assisted 44 countries and $46.3 million from all funding sources was approved for 24 new projects and 27 grant increases. The new projects were largely in rural areas: 13 in Africa, 9 in Asia and the Pacific, 1 in the Middle East and 1 in the Caribbean. By sector, agriculture and irrigation received $16.8 million in funding (36.4 per cent); transport, $11.3 million (24.4 per cent); and drinking-water, $11.2 million (24.3 per cent). Industries, housing, education, health and energy received smaller shares. In planning UNCDF assistance, continued priority was given to the drought-affected areas in Africa. The Fund carried out 12 planning and project identification missions and fielded 22 review missions during the year.

The Administrator reported that UNCDF had actively sought collaboration with bilateral donors and other sources of funding and had succeeded in establishing co-financing under cost-sharing and trust-fund arrangements for 39 projects. In addition to parallel or co-financing arrangements with bilateral agencies and multilateral financing institutions, 23 more UNCDF projects received technical assistance financed from UNDP/IPF resources and from SMF/LDC, bringing a cumulative total of UNCDF projects with UNDP/IPF inputs to 112 at the end of 1986, as compared with 89 in 1985.

In accordance with a 1985 Governing Council decision,⁽⁴⁾ a concessional loan facility was introduced in 1986 at a modest level without staff increases.

During 1986, UNCDF continued to evaluate its projects on the basis of methodology which addressed the special features of the development co-operation activities of the Fund, such as the bipartite nature of its relationship with recipient Governments and its specific mandate as a supplementary source of concessional capital assistance. During the year, 23 UNCDF projects were evaluated in 10 beneficiary countries in the areas of rural water supply, agricultural credit, irrigation, health and various other sectors.

The Administrator recommended that the partial funding system of UNCDF be modified to include five years of anticipated contributions in the calculation of acceptable outstanding commitments, rather than two years. The proposed revision was aimed at reducing the liquidity that had been building up on the UNCDF balance sheet and expanding the volume of UNCDF assistance to meet the needs of a large number of developing countries.

Direct administrative costs of the Fund in 1986 amounted to $2 million and the cost of services rendered by UNDP was $0.7 million. Total administrative costs for 1986 met from UNDCF general resources amounted to $2.7 million and the cost of programme support services was $1 million.

The Administrator noted that the volume of Fund operations was expected to continue to expand, particularly if the financial control formula was modified. Staffing needs were expected to grow due to the increasing number of projects under implementation and the need to make UNCDF better known through information dissemination and expanding contacts. A minimum of two additional Professional and three more General Service staff were included by the Administrator in the 1988-1989 biennium budgetary request, which was to be presented to the Governing Council in 1987.

Chapter III

Economic assistance, disasters and emergency relief

Special economic assistance programmes continued to be conducted by the United Nations system for countries with severe economic difficulties. Most aid was targeted at reconstruction, rehabilitation and development, often following natural disasters. The United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) assumed responsibility in 1986 for implementing General Assembly resolutions on programmes for nine least developed African countries. On the recommendation of the Economic and Social Council (decision 1986/165), the Assembly (resolution 41/192) endorsed recommendations made by the Secretary-General on the overall efficiency and effectiveness of the special assistance programmes.

The critical economic situation in Africa was a focal point during 1986 as the General Assembly, at its thirteenth special session, adopted the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990—a five-year plan which provided a blueprint for national, subregional and regional action in Africa and covered a wide variety of sectors, with agricultural development a priority. The international community was called on to support the Programme through improving the quality and modality of external assistance and co-operation and supporting Africa's policy reforms (resolution S-13/2).

The United Nations Office for Emergency Operations in Africa was closed as of 31 October 1986 due to the improvement in drought-related emergency conditions in Africa. New arrangements to continue efforts in the region were announced by the Secretary-General. In October, the Assembly requested that the emergency situation which continued to affect some African countries be monitored and that the Secretary-General follow the situation closely (resolution 41/29).

The Assembly called for enhanced co-operation regarding economic assistance to Benin, the Central African Republic, the Comoros, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, the Gambia, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Madagascar, Nicaragua, Sierra Leone and Vanuatu (resolution 41/200). It also called for assistance to Chad (41/198), El Salvador (41/194), Mozambique (41/197) and Uganda (41/195).

The Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator (UNDRO) continued in 1986 to assist disaster-stricken countries, worked to strengthen national and international emergency management and undertook hazard mitigation measures. The Economic and Social Council (resolution 1986/47) and the Assembly (resolution 41/201) supported enhanced international co-operation with UNDRO.

In disaster-related action, the Assembly called for emergency assistance to El Salvador in the wake of an October earthquake (resolution 41/2) and for aid to Solomon Islands following a May cyclone (resolution 41/193). In December, the Assembly launched an appeal for international action against a locust and grasshopper infestation in Africa (resolution 41/185). In January, the Economic and Social Council appealed for resources to assist the drought-stricken areas of Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya, Somalia, the Sudan and Uganda (resolution 1986/45). The Assembly, in December, took note of a proposal that United Nations organizations be invited to assist Mauritania to prepare an action plan to combat desertification and drought (decision 41/456).

Both the Assembly (resolution 41/196) and the Council (resolution 1986/46) again requested emergency relief and assistance for Lebanon's reconstruction and development.

Economic assistance

In 1986, the United Nations continued to conduct special economic assistance programmes at the request of the General Assembly for countries with severe economic problems. Of the 17 countries covered by the programmes during the year, 15 were in Africa, 1 in Latin America and 1 in the Pacific. Twelve were classified by the United Nations as least developed countries (LDCs) (see p. 405) and three were land-locked developing countries. Following consultations between the United Nations Unit for Special Economic Assistance Programmes in the Office for Special Political Questions and the UNDP Regional Bureau for Africa, UNDP assumed responsibility for implementing General Assembly resolutions on special assistance programmes for nine of the African LDCs—Benin, Cape Verde, the Central African Republic, Chad, the Comoros, Equatorial Guinea, the Gambia, Guinea-Bissau and Sierra Leone.

In a May report⁽¹⁾ on the efficiency and effectiveness of the special economic assistance programmes, requested by the General Assembly in 1985,⁽²⁾ the Secretary-General said the programmes responded to special situations which either were outside the mandates of the various programmes of the United Nations system or required co-ordination because of the number of organizations involved. Since the formal initiation of the programmes with the adoption of a 1976 Security Council resolution⁽³⁾ a total of 38 countries had at one time or another been covered, expanding in terms of annual work-loads from 10 countries in 1976-1977 to a peak of 28 in 1984-1985.

The programmes were usually initiated in response to resolutions of the General Assembly, the Security Council or the Economic and Social Council. Examining the situations that had led those bodies to call for programmes, the report cited the following: the political situation in southern Africa; inadequate economic infrastructure at independence; reconstruction after internal strife or disruption, or after natural disaster; severe economic problems; and refugee- or returnee-related economic problems. Although the programmes were originally conceived as short-term operations, actual practice had varied widely, with some countries receiving assistance for only one or two years and others for as long as 11 years. A trust fund had been established to facilitate the channelling of contributions to the programmes by non-traditional donors, with funds earmarked in special accounts for specific countries. Total contributions to the trust fund from 1976 to 1985 totalled $3.1 million; expenditures totalled some $3.3 million.

The budget for the biennium 1986-1987 for the Unit for Special Economic Assistance Programmes totalled $1,969,900 compared with an approved budget of $1,569,200 for 1984-1985.

The Secretary-General recommended that the programmes should perform a catalytic role of limited duration in response to special situations, with interested parties ensuring that the circumstances requiring assistance did not fall within the competence of the system's regular programmes and that recipient countries should genuinely need assistance. In addition, the programmes should be terminated after review one or two years following their implementation, with any continuing responsibilities being transferred to the system's regular programmes. He also recommended that the trust fund be retained with more rapid disbursement of funds and that the programmes be undertaken in close co-operation with other interested entities of the United Nations system to ensure the efficient use of resources.

In a September report⁽⁴⁾ the Secretary-General summarized the main developments in the economies and assistance programmes of countries for which UNDP had assumed responsibility (see below), with the exception of Cape Verde, which was not included at the request of its Government.

Also in September⁽⁵⁾ the Secretary-General reported on those countries for which the Office for Special Political Questions had retained responsibility and which had agreed to provide information for a summary report to the Assembly on major economic developments in the period under review and on the status of special programmes. Those countries were Djibouti, Madagascar, Mozambique and Vanuatu. Guinea also agreed to provide information, but it was not received in time for the report. Reports on Mauritania, Nicaragua and Uganda, which preferred to have a review mission visit their countries, were submitted separately, as were reports of other countries receiving economic assistance (see below for details on individual countries).

UNDP activities. In a note⁽⁶⁾ to the special session of the UNDP Governing Council (New York, 19-21 February 1986), the UNDP Administrator proposed that Lesotho and Swaziland be considered as front-line States for the purpose of calculating country indicative planning figures (IPFs) for the fourth programming cycle (1987-1991).

On 21 February⁽⁷⁾ the Council decided that the supplementary criteria of a country's status as a front-line State for calculating IPFs for the fourth cycle, contained in a 1985 Council decision⁽⁸⁾ be rescinded. It decided that for purposes of calculating fourth cycle IPFs, one supplementary point should be awarded to countries which, because of their geographical location in southern Africa and their destabilization by South Africa, were economically disadvantaged. Those countries were Angola, Botswana, Lesotho, Mozambique, Swaziland, the United Republic of Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

In July, the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of its Third (Programme and Co-ordination) Committee, adopted decision 1986/165 without vote.

Special economic assistance programmes

At its 38th plenary meeting, on 22 July 1986, the Economic and Social Council decided to recommend to the General Assembly the adoption of the draft resolution annexed to the present decision.

ANNEX

Special economic assistance programmes

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on enhancing the efficiency and effectiveness of the special economic assistance programmes,

Affirming the validity of the concept of special economic assistance programmes and the need to enhance their efficiency,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Endorses the recommendation made by the Secretary-General that special economic assistance programmes should be limited to countries genuinely in need of such assistance and to special circumstances falling outside the competence of the regular programmes of the United Nations system and should be of limited duration;

3. Also endorses the recommendation that the special economic assistance programme for a country should terminate after the review mission and that any continuing responsibilities should then be transferred to the regular programmes of the system;

4. Recommends that efforts to transfer the implementation of the special economic assistance programmes to other United Nations bodies should be continued, if practicable;

5. Affirms that special economic assistance programmes should be drawn up in consultation with the recipient Governments concerned and recommends that the programmes should, as far as possible, be established and reviewed through the field offices of the United Nations system.

Economic and Social Council decision 1986/165

Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee (E/1986/124) without vote, 14 July (meeting 12); 5-nation draft (E/1986/C.3/L7), orally revised, and further orally revised on proposal of USSR; agenda item 18.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, adopted resolution 41/192 without vote.

Special programmes of economic assistance

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on enhancing the efficiency and effectiveness of the special programmes of economic assistance,

Affirming the validity of the concept of special programmes of economic assistance and the need to enhance their efficiency,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Endorses the recommendation made by the Secretary-General that special programmes of economic assistance should be limited to countries genuinely in need of such assistance and to special circumstances falling outside the competence of the regular programmes of the United Nations system;

3. Also endorses the recommendation that the special programme of economic assistance for a country should be of limited duration and should be terminated after the review mission and, where the special circumstances that gave rise to the special programme of economic assistance remain, any continuing assistance should then be channelled through the regular programmes of the system;

4. Recommends that efforts to transfer the implementation of the special programmes of economic assistance to other United Nations bodies should be continued, if practicable;

5. Affirms that special programmes of economic assistance should be drawn up in consultation with the recipient Governments concerned and recommends that the programmes should, as far as possible, be established and reviewed through the field offices of the United Nations system.

Critical economic situation in Africa

Special session of the General Assembly

The thirteenth special session of the General Assembly (New York, 27 May to 1 June) was devoted to considering in depth the critical economic situation in Africa. The special session, convened in accordance with a 1985 Assembly decision⁽⁹⁾ and originally scheduled to conclude on 31 May, ended on 1 June with the adoption of the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990 (UNPAAERD) (see p. 446). Debate on the main item of discussion—consideration of the critical economic situation in Africa to focus, in a comprehensive and integrated manner, on the rehabilitation and medium-term and long-term development problems and challenges facing African countries with a view to promoting and adopting action-oriented and concerted measures—took place between 27 and 30 May.

In his opening statement, the President of the General Assembly said the special session should agree on concrete, workable proposals to support the efforts of African Governments to develop fully the possibilities and potentials of their continent, and thus make a greater contribution to the prosperity and well-being of the world. That was not easy, however, as a great variety and complexity of problems faced the countries of Africa, particularly the emergency caused by the recent drought, which emphasized the continent's fragile situation. New, imaginative and creative approaches were necessary, but, he warned, time at the session was extremely limited. Commitment by the African Governments to do whatever was necessary to restore and accelerate the rate of economic and social development in their countries meant that they would have to make real sacrifices. External support would be necessary if the efforts of the Governments were to be successful without unnecessary delay and human suffering. He was, however, convinced that countries which had accepted previous Assembly resolutions on the critical economic situation in Africa had shown their determination to respond positively by providing the necessary assistance. A particular example was the genuine solidarity shown by the international community in response to the 1984-1985 drought-induced emergency.

The Secretary-General said the special session was taking place at a crucial juncture in the economic life of Africa. The gravity of the situation was a matter of profound concern; he had witnessed the tragedy when he visited the drought-affected regions. The session was an opportunity for the international community as a whole, in a joint effort with the African countries, to adopt urgently needed measures. It could not stand by and allow a further deterioration in the ability of the vast majority of African countries to meet their basic needs. Many of those countries found themselves crippled by their inability to maintain even minimal levels of essential imports on which their economic structures largely depended. At the same time, the African countries were fully aware that their economic recovery was primarily their own responsibility. The special session provided the opportunity for the international community to make a clear commitment to provide the necessary resources, as well as to undertake the necessary changes in aid practice and co-ordination, in order to maximize the efficiency and effectiveness of the assistance provided. It was essential that the African countries should receive a clear indication during the session of their partners' intentions, in order to plan their own development on a realistic basis. He appealed to all Governments represented at the session to make that new partnership a success.

The Chairman of the Organization of African Unity (OAU), Abdou Diouf, President of Senegal, said that a situation as serious as the one in Africa required structural change and medium- and long-term solutions, a new approach to development and improvement of the framework of international co-operation. Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery 1986-1990 (APPER), adopted by OAU in 1985⁽¹⁰⁾ was the very essence of the collective and individual resolve of African countries to undertake the continent's economic recovery, with agriculture as the central theme. Pointing out that 1986 was the International Year of Peace, he asserted that there would be no genuine and comprehensive peace as long as an entire continent was threatened by famine, sickness, ignorance and an uncertain future, as well as by acts of aggression and destabilization against the independent countries of southern Africa by South Africa's apartheid regime.

The Assembly, on 27 May, adopted the agenda for the special session (see APPENDIX IV) by decision S-13/23, designating procedural items to the plenary Assembly and allocating the major substantive item to the Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole (see p. 445), on the understanding that the general debate would take place in plenary meetings. The Committee would consider all proposals submitted under the main item, prepare a draft final document or documents and report to the Assembly.

On 30 May, by resolution S-13/1, the Assembly approved the report of the Credentials Committee⁽¹¹⁾ Following its adoption, several Member States explained their positions regarding the credentials of some delegations (see p. 380).

Reports of the Secretary-General. In accordance with the 1985 Assembly decision convening the special session⁽⁹⁾ the Secretary-General submitted a report⁽¹²⁾ prepared in co-operation with all relevant parts of the United Nations system, on the critical economic situation in Africa. The report covered the following areas: food and agriculture; environment, drought and desertification; infrastructure and industry, including transport and communications, energy and industry; human and social priorities; external resource needs, including resource flows, approaches to Africa's need for foreign capital, and the forms and terms of financial flows; and improving aid co-ordination. Those areas had been enumerated in the Assembly's 1984 Declaration on the Critical Economic Situation in Africa⁽¹³⁾ which called for emergency relief on a massive scale but also emphasized the need to support the recovery and rehabilitation of African economies, with particular attention to food production and agriculture; drought and desertification; transport and other infrastructure; human resources and social services; and external financial resources and the problem of external debt.

The report stated that when Africa's economic situation was considered sufficiently critical to summon a special session of the Assembly, it was not only because the situation was one of acute distress, but because the future development of the continent was at stake. The African continent was vast and diverse and tended to defy generalization. In 1984, for example, the per capita income in the Sahel region was $200, that of Algeria $2,100 and that of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya $7,800. Although remedies to Africa's problems needed to be adapted to conditions that varied from country to country, agricultural development was of supreme importance; there was a need to reverse policies neglecting the needs of small farmers, who were the mainstay of African economies.

Addressing the roots of the crisis, the report cited: inherited colonial structures; dependency on exports of primary commodities; weaknesses in food crop development, agriculture in general and domestic manufacturing; and policies pursued by African Governments, such as large public sectors with expenditures exceeding the revenue base, small farmers being deprived of incentives, domestic inflation giving rise to over-valuation of currencies and controversy over the need for devaluations, with their unsettling impact on income distribution, and interest rates being kept artificially low, reducing government charges on public debt but discouraging domestic savings.

In the preceding few years, the report noted, African Governments had examined the roots of the crisis and concluded that fundamental policy reforms were needed; many countries had already taken major steps towards structural institutional change. The OAU document submitted to the special session (see p. 445) detailed the policy reforms under way in African countries, aiming at greater incentives in the private sector and greater efficiency in public investment and resource management.

With regard to development assistance, insistence on project aid and competition among donors for attractive projects had made it difficult to use aid from different sources in ways conducive to effective development. Improved co-ordination among donors was necessary if long-term aid was to be effective.

Population growth was also an important aspect of the situation. In the drought-prone African countries in particular, the balance between population and resources was precarious and worsening from excessive pressure on the land. Mortality was high, but fertility even higher. Although the need for population policies to facilitate and encourage fertility decline had been recognized by an increasing number of African Governments, the scope of their activities was still limited. Others were unconvinced of the need for family planning services.

In suggesting action to move the priority area of agriculture to higher levels of output and productivity, the report stated that the task had to be approached on a broad front, starting with measures of high potential return in the following areas: establishment of early warning systems; higher public expenditure on agriculture; improved economic policies and higher incentives to increase agricultural capacity and productivity; increased use of inputs; animal disease control; water management; agricultural research; and reviving trade in agricultural products.

The report identified the following measures of special importance in the area of environment, drought and desertification: popular participation; regional co-operation; action to combat desertification; afforestation and soils policy; and water resources development.

With regard to infrastructure and industry, the report noted that the areas of transport and communications, energy, mining and manufacturing were of particular concern. In transport and communications, the deterioration of roads was particularly serious, with 25 per cent of paved roads in Africa requiring rehabilitation or reconstruction. Some railways and certain telecommunications infrastructure also needed to be totally rebuilt. Priority should be given to maintaining existing infrastructures, rehabilitating those that had deteriorated and better managing their operation. African Governments and their partner countries should also consider conducting a joint review of the concept of the transport system to make it serve African development better.

To deal with the precariousness of energy supplies in Africa, the report recommended that priority attention be given to: energy planning and assessment of energy resources; reforestation and forest management; conserving fuelwood (demonstration programmes of improved kilns for charcoal production and cooking-stoves); expanding geological, geophysical and other exploratory activities in fossil fuels, including formulating exploration and development agreements; strengthening institutions in energy production and distribution; rehabilitating electricity supply systems; and improving natural gas utilization.

The following principal needs of the mining sector in Africa were identified: in the short term, many existing mines and related infrastructure should be rehabilitated; in the longer term, geological studies and exploration should be strengthened and subregional co-operation evaluated and joint institutions established; and in exploitation, better regimes for co-operating with international mining companies or other sources of technical and marketing skills would have to be found if African mining was to make a greater contribution to export earnings.

With regard to manufacturing, the industrial sector had a critical role to play in supporting agricultural development with industrial inputs and incentive goods. Priority had to be given to finding solutions to the interrelated problems of capacity utilization and productivity in existing industries. In particular, measures had to be taken to reduce dependence of production on imported rather than domestically produced inputs.

Any economic recovery programme in Africa had to include a strong programme for human recovery, without which it would surely fail, stated the report. Four essential strategies for action were: making social services more cost-effective and restoring progress towards nation-wide impact; supporting productive work and increasing productivity; encouraging community action and releasing underused human potential; and making family planning information and services widely available. The objectives of meeting basic human needs and rebuilding the human foundation for sustained development called for attention to the following: food and nutrition; health; the search for water; human resource development; basic education and literacy; administrative and management capacities; the key role of women; policies towards refugees; and the human dimension in growth-oriented adjustment.

External resources would be needed to assist African Governments in their efforts to undertake fundamental policy changes, including exchange rate adjustments, fiscal and monetary reform, nationalization of public enterprise and population policies.

The report outlined two approaches to Africa's need for foreign capital: one for countries with a gross national product (GNP) per capita below $550 in 1984; and another for the remainder of sub-Saharan countries. For the former group—the 29 countries in sub-Saharan Africa eligible for International Development Association (IDA) credits, which received some 60 per cent of total official development assistance (ODA) to Africa—the report stated that the eighth replenishment of IDA (see PART TWO, Chapter VIII) was of immediate concern to financing their recovery, as IDA had been a major source of concessional finance in Africa. For other countries south of the Sahara, those with a per capita GNP above $550, the report warned that, although the need for external resources was not as severe, the sharp deterioration in their balance of payments posed a major threat to their adjustment and development.

The report emphasized the importance of debt rescheduling and debt relief to African countries and the need to support agreed rehabilitation and development programmes with a high component of fast-disbursing non-project aid to restore infrastructure and productive capacity, to complete projects and to support policy reforms and essential programmes of education and health.

Great improvements were needed in aid practices and co-ordination, the report said, because the past experience of development assistance in Africa had often been disappointing. Co-ordination was particularly important because of the increase in bilateral and multilateral donors in African countries, all of which had different objectives, criteria and procedures. The United Nations resident co-ordinator had been entrusted with overall responsibility for and co-ordination of operational activities carried out at the country level by organizations of the United Nations system. Proposals for enhanced aid co-ordination cited in the report had strongly emphasized policy reorientation and the elaboration of detailed programme and policy commitments; emphasis should also be placed on strengthening existing institutions rather than creating new ones. A number of guiding principles for action in the development assistance area were included in the report.

In another report⁽¹⁴⁾ the Secretary-General summarized information received from 12 United Nations bodies and 13 specialized agencies on their activities in relation to the critical economic situation in Africa. The initiatives and activities cited responded to the issues identified in the Declaration on the Critical Economic Situation in Africa⁽¹⁵⁾ APPER⁽¹⁶⁾ and other intergovernmental decisions.

Communications. On 18 April⁽¹⁵⁾ Uganda, on behalf of the African Group, transmitted an official OAU document entitled "Africa's submission to the special session of the United Nations General Assembly on Africa's economic and social crisis", which included analyses of APPER and subregional concerns and profiles of individual African countries. On 9 May⁽¹⁶⁾ Morocco transmitted a monograph on its economic situation since 1980 and its national recovery programme. On 26 May⁽¹⁷⁾ Israel submitted its view of economic development and transformation of African agriculture. On 27 May⁽¹⁸⁾ the USSR transmitted a document on its economic relations with the countries of Africa. In another 27 May communication⁽¹⁹⁾ the German Democratic Republic provided information on its economic assistance to African States.

On 28 May⁽²⁰⁾ the Secretary-General brought to the Assembly's attention a message addressed to its President by the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, welcoming the initiative taken by the Assembly in holding a special session on Africa's critical economic situation and expressing hope that arrangements for short- and long-term action by the international community would be adopted. Also on 28 May⁽²¹⁾ Czechoslovakia submitted information on its economic assistance to African countries during 1985. On 30 May⁽²²⁾ Poland transmitted a joint statement on Africa's critical economic situation by Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Mongolia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR.

Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole. By decision S-13/22 of 27 May, the Assembly established an Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole of the Thirteenth Special Session, which met on 27 and 29 May and 1 June⁽²³⁾. The Assembly allocated to the Committee the main agenda item, consideration of the critical economic situation and medium- and long-term development problems and challenges facing African countries with a view to promoting and adopting action-oriented and concerted measures. In addition to the reports of the Secretary-General and communications received (see above), the Committee had before it the report of the Preparatory Committee for the special session (see p. 455) and amendments to the draft UNPAAERD contained in that report proposed by Poland on behalf of Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Mongolia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR⁽²⁴⁾ The Ad Hoc Committee took no action on the proposed amendments.

The Committee also had before it a draft resolution⁽²⁵⁾ submitted by Mexico, by which the Assembly would have proclaimed the five-year period of 1986-1990 as the Quinquennium for International Economic and Technical Co-operation with Africa and urged all Member States, the United Nations system and the international community to co-operate with African countries in overcoming the problems which had their origin in the critical economic situation in that region. Following consultations on the draft, the Committee agreed to insert a new operative paragraph in the draft resolution on UNPAAERD, emphasizing the need to intensify economic and technical co-operation with African countries during and beyond 1986-1990. Following that action, Mexico withdrew its draft resolution. On 1 June, the Ad Hoc Committee recommended to the Assembly the adoption of the draft resolution to which was annexed the text of UNPAAERD.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 1 June, on the recommendation of the Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole, the General Assembly adopted resolution S-13/2 without vote.

United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 39/29 of 3 December 1984 and the Declaration on the Critical Economic Situation in Africa annexed thereto, as well as its resolution 40/40 of 2 December 1985, in which it decided to convene a special session to focus, in a comprehensive and integrated manner, on the rehabilitation and medium-term and long-term development problems and challenges facing African countries,

Welcoming the efforts of African countries towards their economic recovery and development, as evidenced in Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery 1986-1990 adopted by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity at its twenty-first ordinary session, held at Addis Ababa from 18 to 20 July 1985, in which the Governments of Africa reaffirmed their primary responsibility for the economic and social development of their countries, identified areas for priority action, and undertook to mobilize and utilize domestic resources for the achievement of these priorities,

Convinced of the need for concerted action by the international community in support of the efforts of African Governments to achieve economic recovery and development,

Emphasizing that the African development crisis is one that concerns the international community as a whole and that greater realization of the rich physical and human potential of the continent is an integral part of a common strategy to promote the economic and social advancement of all people,

Noting with appreciation the strong expression of support and commitment made by the international community during the thirteenth special session of the General Assembly,

1. Adopts the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990 set forth in the annex to the present resolution;

2. Emphasizes the need to intensify economic and technical co-operation with African countries during and beyond the period of the Programme of Action;

3. Urges all Governments to take effective action for the rapid and full implementation of the Programme of Action;

4. Requests the organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to participate fully in and support the implementation of the Programme of Action;

5. Calls upon all concerned intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, in view of their significant contribution to economic and social development in Africa, to support and contribute to the implementation of the Programme of Action;

6. Decides to conduct a review and appraisal of the implementation of the Programme of Action at its forty-third session, in accordance with paragraph 24 (a) of the Programme of Action;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to monitor the process of implementation of the Programme of Action and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its forty-second and forty-third sessions, as outlined in paragraph 24 (c) of the Programme of Action.

ANNEX

United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990

Analysis of Africa's critical economic situation

1. Africa's economic and social crisis has been a cause of grave concern to Africa and the international community alike. The crisis has not only jeopardized the development process of the African economies, but has also threatened the very survival of millions of Africans. The persistent economic crisis in Africa, exacerbated by drought and desertification, and the more recent tragic famine and hunger have strengthened the resolve of the African countries, individually and collectively, to take immediate and concerted actions to achieve sustained economic and social development of their countries in the medium term and long term.

2. The international community fully recognizes the pervasive and structural economic problems of the African continent. Some of these lie in the colonial past; some of these flow from the post-independence era; others are a combination of economic, political and endemic factors. The vulnerability and the fragile nature of the African socio-economic structures have now become fully apparent as a consequence of the dramatic effects of drought. The African Governments have initiated actions aiming at long-term structural transformation of their economies which is vital for breaking the vicious cycle of poverty and underdevelopment and for paving the way for self-reliant economic development. Notwithstanding past efforts, it is imperative that the international community intensify its co-operation and substantially increase its support for the African efforts.

3. The persistent economic crisis in Africa has been aggravated by a combination of exogenous and endogenous factors. The endogenous aggravating factors include deficiencies in institutional and physical infrastructures, economic strategies and policies that have fallen short, in some cases, of achieving their objectives, disparities in urban and rural development and income distribution, insufficient managerial/administrative capacities, inadequate human resource development, and lack of financial resources, the demographic factors and political instability manifested, inter alia, in a large and growing population of refugees. In addition to these factors, many African countries have to contend with severely adverse consequences of the policy of economic destabilization perpetrated by the racist minority régime in South Africa and by its illegal occupation of Namibia. The serious aggravating exogenous factors include the recent international economic recession, the decline in commodity prices, adverse terms of trade, the decline in financial flows, increased protectionism and high interest rates. The heavy burden of debt and debt-servicing obligations also constrains Africa's prospects for economic growth.

4. Urgent, far-reaching and imaginative economic policies are required to avert further deterioration in the economic conditions in Africa and to launch the continent on the path of dynamic self-reliant and self-sustained economic development in a favourable external environment. One immediate task of such efforts should be to increase substantially productivity in all sectors, particularly in the central sectors of food and agriculture. Achieving such a task would be extremely difficult without the amelioration of the external and internal factors that have aggravated the structural crisis and without simultaneously enhanced supportive measures by the international community.

5. Africa has taken the main responsibility for its own development. It has organized itself to undertake the necessary measures to overcome the current economic crisis on the basis of Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery 1986-1990, adopted by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity at its twenty-first ordinary session, held at Addis Ababa from 18 to 20 July 1985. The Programme aims at identifying areas for priority action for the rehabilitation and recovery of the African economies and mobilizing and fully utilizing domestic resources for the achievement of those priorities. However, given the dimensions of internal and external problems now facing the continent, it is obvious that in order to accomplish this complex task Africa must receive the full support of the international community.

6. The African development crisis is not an exclusive African problem but one that concerns mankind as a whole. Interdependence is today a living reality. A stagnant or perpetually economically backward Africa is not in the interest of the world community. Without durable and sustained economic development in the world's poor regions, of which Africa is a notable example, there is a real danger to international peace and security and an impediment to world economic growth and development. The international community recognizes the importance of genuine peace and security, as well as the strengthening of international co-operation, to African economic development.

7. It is consequently essential urgently to develop and implement an international strategy to complement the exceptional efforts that the African countries have themselves initiated to put their economies on course. In developing such a strategy, it is necessary to take full cognizance of the special problems and needs, not only those common to Africa as a whole, but also those of subregions and individual African countries in order to ensure balanced and equitable development. The international community must respond positively to the African call for a new era of co-operation based on a spirit of genuine and equal partnership, which is an essential element for harmonious and mutually beneficial economic co-operation in an interdependent world. Africa is convinced that, given the necessary support from the international community, it will be capable, in the not too distant future, of establishing national, subregional and regional structures which would ensure self-reliant sustainable economic development.

II

United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990

8. The United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990, based on mutual commitment and co-operation, consists of two central elements:

(a) The determination and commitment of the African countries to launch both national and regional programmes of economic development as reflected in Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery 1986-1990, adopted by the African heads of State and Government in July 1985;

(b) The response of the international community and its commitment to support and complement the African development efforts.

A. Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery 1986-1990

9. The African countries have fully committed themselves to the implementation of a sharply focused, practical and operational set of activities, priorities and policies, as elaborated in Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery 1986-1990. The successful implementation of the Priority Programme will lay the foundation for durable structural changes, improve levels of productivity and ensure the rapid recovery of the African economies while at the same time enhancing long-term development prospects.

10. The implementation of the Priority Programme should contribute to the realization of the Lagos Plan of Action for the Implementation of the Monrovia Strategy for the Economic Development of Africa, the Industrial Development Decade for Africa, proclaimed by the General Assembly in its resolution 35/66 B of 5 December 1980, the Transport and Communications Decade in Africa, proclaimed by the Assembly in its resolution 32/160 of 19 December 1977, and the Harare Declaration on the food crisis in Africa, adopted on 25 July 1984 by the Thirteenth FAO Regional Conference for Africa.

11. The Priority Programme stipulates the following priorities at the national, subregional and regional levels:

1. At the national level

(a) Agricultural development

The Priority Programme lays considerable emphasis on the food and agricultural sector. The Priority Programme seeks to revitalize the more dynamic and internally generated forces for growth and development. Primary focus will be on women farmers who contribute significantly to agricultural production.

(i) Immediate measures to combat food emergencies

The immediate objective will be to cope with future emergencies and catastrophes through the following measures:

- To create and sustain national emergency preparedness;
- To institute effective early-warning systems;
- To establish flexible and efficient regional networks of crop protection agencies;
- To establish national food security arrangements.

(ii) Medium-term measures

The main objective will be to give a new impetus to agricultural development in order to achieve increasing levels of productivity and production through:

- Raising substantially the level of investment in agriculture;
- Increased food production;
- Restoring, protecting and developing arable land and rendering it more productive;
- Establishment of remunerative produce pricing policies, establishment and strengthening of incentive schemes, eliminating pricing policies that have tended to discourage production and providing effective agriculture credit programmes;
- Development of livestock and livestock products through the utilization of agricultural by-products, improved management, and attention to animal diseases;
- Development of mechanization and the use of modern farm and processing machinery; increased use of fertilizers, improved seeds and pesticides;
- Improving and expanding the storage capacity, distribution and the marketing system;
- Development of agricultural research and extension through the creation of a network of agronomical research stations and extension for the design and diffusion of appropriate agricultural technologies;
- Placing at the disposal of small farmers necessary inputs for increased yields; better utilization and improvement in management of water resources and the establishment of low-cost irrigation schemes;
- Establishment of reforestation, drought and desertification control programmes, including firewood schemes; and improvement of agricultural implement maintenance capacity;
- Establishment of assistance programmes for small farmers, especially women food producers and rural youth;
- Improvement of the distribution of agricultural products.

The above measures should be applied in a suitable combination to achieve the expected results, taking into account the particular situation in each country. Other subregional and regional measures are also envisaged in the Priority Programme to complement national measures.

The total investment required for the implementation of this programme is estimated at $US 57.4 billion which is 44.8 per cent of the total cost of implementing the Priority Programme.

(b) Other sectors in support of agriculture

The success of Africa's effort in achieving the stated objectives for the development and growth of the agricultural sector will depend on the parallel development of the following agriculture support sectors:

(i) Rehabilitation and development of agro-related industries

Given the high dependency of Africa on imports of almost all industrial goods in general and agriculture-related goods in particular and the urgent need to increase Africa's capacity to increase food production, the following specific measures are to be taken, among others:

- Development of industries for production of agricultural tools and equipment, small-scale irrigation equipment and agricultural inputs;
- Processing of raw materials and intermediate inputs;
- Rehabilitation and upgrading of existing plants;
- Development of capacity for utilization of renewable sources of energy, especially bio-mass and solar energy;
- Establishment of engineering capacity for the production of spare parts and components;
- Provision of training in the above areas and the development of local capacity for project design and preparation.

(ii) Development of transport and communications

In this field the objectives are to improve access to production areas, facilitate the development of intra-African trade in agriculture, industrial raw materials and other goods and services in a complementary manner.

Action in this area will consist of:

- Maintenance and development of feeder, access and service roads, small bridges and desert roads;
- Identification of obstacles and rehabilitation and maintenance of existing modes of transport and communication;
- Utilization of labour-intensive techniques in the construction and maintenance of transport infrastructure;
- Production of spare parts for the overhaul, repair and maintenance of public vehicles, machinery and equipment;
- Participation in the development of multinational and intermodal transport networks.

Africa, in co-operation with the international community, will intensify its efforts in financing and implementing the Transport and Communications Decade in Africa.

(iii) Trade and finance

In the field of trade the objective is to improve the distribution channels for domestic trade, by improving market arrangements and reversing the present consumption pattern in favour of domestically produced goods through:

- Adoption of price incentives for agricultural products;

- Improvement of internal distribution channels;
- Identification and elimination of obstacles hindering trade expansion.

In the field of financial co-operation the following measures are envisaged:

- Increased utilization of existing clearing arrangements;
- Adoption of co-ordinated measures to establish financial markets at the national, subregional and regional levels;
- Intensification of efforts for the establishment of an African Monetary Fund.

The total cost for the implementation of the measures envisaged under the other sectors in support of agriculture is estimated at $60.1 billion.

(c) Drought and desertification

Although drought and desertification require a long-term approach, there is need for immediate action by the African countries at national, subregional and regional levels to implement a comprehensive programme for drought and desertification and to stem and control the effects of drought and desertification on both the ecological environment and the development process. African Governments are, therefore, committed to undertaking as soon as possible the following measures:

- Massive afforestation and reafforestation;
- Better management of water resources, including river basins and irrigation;
- Protection of common eco-systems;
- Development of alternative sources of energy to replace wood fuel;
- Stabilization of sand dunes;
- Measures to stop soil erosion;
- Measures against salination;
- Improvement of drainage in irrigated areas;
- Integrating measures for the protection of the environment in national development programmes and according them high priority;
- Full implementation of the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification approved by the General Assembly in its resolution 32/172 of 19 December 1977.

The total cost of measures envisaged for the implementation of the programme to combat drought and desertification is estimated at $3.41 billion.

(d) Human resources development, planning and utilization

African Governments fully recognize that central to the successful implementation of the proposed actions is the efficient development, planning and utilization of human resources and the full and effective participation of the people in the development process. In this regard, African Governments are adopting the following comprehensive policies for human resource planning, development and utilization with a view to integrating them in their overall national development policies and plans:

- Radically changing the educational systems at all levels to ensure that the skills, knowledge and attitudes that are relevant to Africa's developmental needs are generated;
- Intensifying efforts to promote mass literacy and adult learning programmes;
- Efficiently utilizing manpower resources, including measures to reverse the brain drain and ensure the guarantee of human rights;

- Reducing the present high level of dependence of most African countries on foreign experts to reduce foreign exchange leakage;
- Ensuring good working conditions;
- Encouraging the role and participation of women and youth, particularly those living in the rural areas, in the development process.

The total cost of measures envisaged in the human resources development sector is estimated at $7 billion.

(e) Policy reforms

In order to achieve the objectives of the Priority Programme, African Governments are undertaking a number of major policy measures while focusing attention on the need for policy reorientation. African countries are determined to undertake, individually and collectively, all measures and policy reforms that are necessary for the recovery of their economies and the revitalization of genuine development, particularly in the following areas at the national level:

(i) Improving management of the economy

African Governments recognize that genuine efforts must be made to improve the management of the African economies and to rationalize public investment policies, particularly since the public sector will have to continue to play an important role in the development of the region. Such efforts would require, inter alia, improvement of public management systems, institutions and practices; improvement of the performance of public enterprises; reforming the public services to make them more development-oriented services; greater mobilization of domestic savings; improvement of financial management, including debt and development aid, fiscal administration and control of public expenditure with a view to promoting the efficient use of resources and cutting wastage and resource misallocation; reduction of foreign exchange leakages. The positive role of the private sector is also to be encouraged through well-defined and consistent policies.

(ii) Other policy measures

In accordance with their respective policies and priorities, African Governments have demonstrated their determination to tackle their social and economic problems through, among others, appropriate adjustment measures that have been undertaken when needed. These measures have involved, inter alia, exchange rate adjustments, debt-relief arrangements, wage and salary reduction and public employment freeze. Though the tasks involved have often been difficult and painful, African countries have recognized the need to bear the burden and have made the necessary sacrifices to the extent possible. In the coming years short-term adjustment measures should give way to the medium-term and long-term structural transformation. Restructuring measures will be continued with prudence through appropriate monetary and fiscal reforms.

(iii) Population policy

Special importance will need to be accorded by each African country to a population policy that, on the basis of the Kilimanjaro Programme of Action for African Population and Self-Reliant Development, adopted by the Second African Population Conference, held at Arusha, United Republic of Tanzania, from 9 to 13 January 1984, will, inter alia, address issues of high fertility and mortality, rapid urbanization, rural-urban and rural-rural migration, the problems of children and youth and the protection of the environment in a manner that would ensure compatibility between demographic trends, appropriate land utilization and settlement patterns and the desired pace of economic growth and development. African countries should also push for the attainment, within the shortest possible time, of an agro-food production growth rate at least equal to the population growth rate.

(iv) Participation of the people in development

Special attention will be accorded to the role played by human resources. Policies will need to be pursued to ensure the effective development and utilization of human resources in all fields and sectors through:

- Ensuring the effective participation of the people in all dimensions of development;
- Developing indigenous entrepreneurial capabilities, both private and public;
- Establishing sound bases for political, economic and social justice.

In the food and agricultural sector, the focus of attention must be the peasant farmer with special reference to female farmers who dominate food production in most countries.

(v) Women and development

The role of women in development must be taken seriously into account in development planning and in the disbursement of resources, both as contributors to and beneficiaries of development efforts as recommended by the Arusha Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of African Women Beyond the United Nations Decade for Women, adopted by the regional intergovernmental preparatory meeting organized by the Economic Commission for Africa and held at Arusha, United Republic of Tanzania, from 8 to 12 October 1984.

In view of the importance accorded to food self-sufficiency and the acknowledged role of women in food production in the continent, the pivotal role of women in this sector must be recognized and encouraged.

2. Subregional concerns

In order to deal with the divergence and differentiations among African subregions and countries, the following actions are necessary, bearing in mind the unique problems which the groups of countries concerned face in their efforts to accelerate their economic growth rates:

(a) The areas most seriously affected by drought and desertification have diminishing opportunities of raising domestic resources for implementation of the Priority Programme. They also face problems in instituting recovery programmes because of the limited economic options available in the wake of severe climatic conditions. In fact, for some of these countries, especially those in the Sahel and the members of the Intergovernmental Authority for Drought and Development and the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference, the road to self-sufficiency in food production is paved with particular difficulties especially as they are not in a position to mobilize from domestic resources more than 4.21 per cent of their requirements, depending on external sources for the balance. Therefore, in order to tackle the environmental, development and human problems, in these countries, programmes for afforestation and reforestation, as well as for the development and utilization of water resources, will have to be put in place while special investments should be made to develop alternative sources of energy to wood fuel and charcoal in order to protect the ecology. This should include research and development of small gas, coal or oil stoves suitable for rural communities. In addition, drought-resistant crop varieties will have to be developed.

(b) With regard to the African island nations, these countries are virtually isolated from the mainland both in terms of transport and communications as well as trade and other factors, unlike their counterparts in the Caribbean which have access to the strong economies of North America. A special programme will need to be devised for these countries to develop trade and transport linkages with the African mainland as well as with the rest of the world. Additional resources are needed for programmes aimed at protecting them against the devastating effects of cyclones, typhoons and floods.

(c) Many countries in Africa are faced, inter alia, with the serious problems of being land-locked or semi-land-locked, and are among the least developed countries; furthermore, countries in southern Africa are subjected to externally engineered destabilization. These countries require special assistance in tropical and sub-tropical agriculture research. Hitherto, limited locally based agricultural research has been conducted in crop diversification, high-yield seeds and the control of pests. These countries also urgently need intensive research in methods to combat widespread animal and livestock diseases such as rinderpest, foot-and-mouth disease as well as to control the tsetse fly. At the same time, the problems of storage, transport and transit, equally acute, also require large investments.

(d) Some of the countries of the North African sub-region face substantial balance-of-payments deficits demonstrated by increasing debt-service burden. Agricultural development in some countries of the sub-region has been slowing down owing to drought, water shortage, mounting desertification and soil erosion. The widening food gap in the subregion is among the highest gaps in Africa.

(f) Refugees and displaced persons

- (i) The plight of 5 million refugees and returnees together with the adverse effects which the refugee burden continues to have on the frail economies of host countries are matters of high priority for many African States.
- (ii) The Second International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa, in its Declaration and Programme of Action, has confirmed the spirit of burden-sharing on a strategy for solving the problems of refugees in Africa, that the refugee problem in Africa is a matter of global responsibility, and that refugee aid and development aid must be regarded as complementary for any realistic solution to Africa's refugee problem. On their part, African Governments have clearly reaffirmed their commitment to do everything within their power to promote lasting solutions to the problem. The international community, for its part, has undertaken to join hands with African countries in the support of such lasting solutions and in meeting and promoting technical and capital assistance designed to strengthen the social and economic infrastructure of the affected countries.

- (iii) Concrete measures should be undertaken at national, regional and international levels with a view to preventing a new massive population exodus. In this connection, there is a need to accelerate implementation of the recommendations of the Second International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa.

3. At the regional level

(a) Strengthening the institutional framework

Proper social and economic management will only materialize if African countries urgently strengthen their social and economic institutions at all levels. To this end, African national and multinational institutions will be made more responsive to the challenges of development through the improvement of their management systems, rationalization of their activities and elimination of duplication of efforts.

(b) Consolidating African co-operation

Existing subregional organizations should be strengthened with a view to consolidating African co-operation in accordance with the objectives of the Lagos Plan of Action. Likewise, the establishment, whenever deemed necessary, of subregional organizations based on economic criteria, including natural resource criteria, should be encouraged with a view to attaining the above objectives.

4. Financial estimates for Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery 1986-1990

12. The full implementation of Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery 1986-1990 would require $US 128.1 billion during the period. In spite of severe constraints, the African countries commit themselves to provide $82.5 billion or 64.4 per cent of the total cost of financing the Priority Programme through the mobilization of domestic resources. There is a difference of approximately $46 billion between the total financial requirements for the implementation of the Priority Programme and the resources to be made available through domestic efforts. Accordingly, effective implementation of the Priority Programme will require $9 billion annually, on the average, through external resources.

Commitment to a common point of reference

13. Africa is committed to providing the necessary framework to launch long-term programmes for self-sustaining socio-economic development and growth. The international community is committed to assist Africa in achieving this objective. Such a framework of understanding will include, inter alia:

- (a) Necessary economic reform and structural adjustment as mentioned in Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery 1986-1990 as a basis for broad-based, sustained economic development;

- (b) Priority attention and increased resources commitment to the rehabilitation and development of agriculture based on durable structural changes as indicated in the Priority Programme;

- (c) Appropriate policies that promote development of sectors supportive of agriculture and rural development, namely, agro-related industry as well as essential consumption products, trade, transportation, health, education, environment and other social and commercial services;

- (d) Fundamental measures to address the problems of drought and desertification as an integral part of agriculture and rural development, with the active involvement of village and community groups, wherever applicable;

- (e) Efficient development and utilization of human resources with particular reference to the full and equal participation of women in order to maximize the benefit for and the contribution to national development;

- (f) Undertaking reforms in such a manner as to encourage the broadest possible participation in development and the productive use of scarce resources.

B. Response and commitment of the international community

14. The international community has noted with admiration the comprehensive and dynamic resolve of the African countries that are embarking upon an unparalleled action to break away from the clutches of underdevelopment and poverty as is reflected in Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery 1986-1990. It notes with particular appreciation that in the face of enormous difficulties the African countries, reaffirming their primary responsibility for the development of their continent, are fully mobilizing their domestic resources in order to implement successfully all measures and policy reforms required for the continent's economic rehabilitation, recovery and long-term development.

15. The international community is aware that the process of development being initiated by the African countries, as reflected in the Priority Programme, has to be supplemented by complementary actions of the international community through intensified co-operation and substantially increased support. In this context, it is also realized that lasting solutions to the serious exogenous constraints, over which Africa has no control, will have to be found since their persistence will impede the efforts of the African countries.

16. The African countries estimate that the full implementation of the Priority Programme would require total financial resources of $128.1 billion, of which the African countries intend to provide $82.5 billion through the mobilization of domestic resources, leaving the approximately $46 billion remaining to be met through external resources. The international community recognizes that the African countries need additional external resources. In this context, it commits itself to making every effort to provide sufficient resources to support and supplement the African development effort; it also appreciates that the realization of Africa's development efforts would be greatly facilitated if the flows of external resources were predictable and assured.

17. The international community recognizes the magnitude of Africa's debt and the severe and restrictive burden which this has placed on many African countries. It realizes that measures have to be taken to alleviate this burden and to enable those countries to concentrate on the full implementation of priorities. In addressing problems arising from such debt, existing mechanisms should respond flexibly and be improved as appropriate.

(a) Improving the quality and modality of external assistance and co-operation

While it is recognized that each bilateral or multilateral donor as well as recipient has its own rules and procedures, there are some general areas in which changes can be usefully made. For an effective support of Africa's efforts, it is realized that the quality and modality of external assistance and co-operation need to be improved along the following lines:

- (i) Greater emphasis on programme support in the priority areas of the recipient African countries, with a view to giving an indication of medium-term support;
 - (ii) Evolution of procurement policies and administrative procedures which would improve delivery of production inputs;
 - (iii) Speedier disbursement of funds;
 - (iv) Increase the concessionality, particularly the grant element of development assistance to African countries, with the purpose of improving the quality of aid to those countries;
 - (v) In planning and implementing programmes of assistance, special consideration shall be given to the indigenous competence, expertise, experience, local conditions, particularly local techniques and equipment, as well as to the training of qualified national personnel;
 - (vi) Develop more effective and efficient co-ordination methods in order to ensure a greater impact of aid policies;
 - (vii) Improve the effectiveness of technical assistance and make it more responsive to the needs and priorities of the African countries;
 - (viii) Donor countries and agencies should consider, as appropriate, measures to assist African countries in meeting recurrent and local costs of programmes and projects;
 - (ix) Donor countries, international institutions and recipients should take into account the recurrent and local costs of new programmes and projects to ensure their viability.
- (b) Improvement in the external environment

Many of the issues concerning the external factors that aggravate the African situation need to be addressed and examined in the competent forums. In the present context, there is a need for the international community:

- (i) To evolve and implement policies conducive to sustained, equitable and non-inflationary growth, including the expansion of trade through, inter alia, the elimination of protectionism, particularly non-tariff barriers, in accordance with existing commitments, the adoption of measures which encourage African exports and diversification programmes, and improved market access, especially for tropical products, within the framework of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade;
- (ii) To deal urgently with commodity issues, taking into account the special interests of the African countries, in the framework of an overall approach, embracing commodity agreements/arrangements and adequate compensatory financing, and also to increase the capacity of African countries to process, market, distribute and transport their exports; and in this context to stress the importance of sufficient ratifications of the Agreement Establishing the Common Fund for Commodities, for it quickly to become operational.

(c) Supporting Africa's policy reform

There is need for extensive international support for the priorities and policies that Africa has identified as necessary and on which many African countries have already embarked. African countries need assistance to enable them to achieve a speedier recovery and long-term development. In this regard, the international community, particularly the donor countries, keeping in mind the interests of all developing countries, agree on the importance of increasing official development assistance to Africa, its improved quality and effectiveness. They also agree to:

- (i) Placing greater emphasis on non-project aid, including balance-of-payments support, to African countries during the period 1986-1990;
- (ii) Evolving aid policies based on technical considerations and specific aid requirements of recipient countries;
- (iii) Enabling multilateral development institutions to increase their concessional assistance to African countries;
- (iv) In the case of countries concerned, work towards the rapid implementation of the International Monetary Fund Structural Adjustment Facility which provides longer-term concessional resources in support of adjustment efforts, including overall development objectives at the national level;
- (v) Urge the speedy eighth replenishment of the International Development Association and the fifth African Development Fund at levels which should take into account the need to support fully African recovery and development;
- (vi) Strive to ensure that no individual bilateral donor, during the period 1986-1990, becomes a net recipient of official capital flows from African countries that undertake adjustment programmes;
- (vii) Increase support, whenever possible, to the International Fund for Agricultural Development Special Programme for Sub-Saharan African Countries Affected by Drought and Desertification;
- (viii) Give special attention to financial and technical assistance requirements of countries affected by drought and desertification and in this context utilize the existing subregional organizations such as the Permanent Inter-State Committee for Drought Control in the Sahel, the Intergovernmental Authority for Drought and Development and the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference;
- (ix) Special efforts need also be made to increase resource flows to the least developed countries with a view to enabling them to achieve the objectives of their country programmes within the framework of the Substantial New Programme of Action for the 1980s for the Least Developed Countries and also to allow the African countries to solve the critical problems arising from negative or insufficient flows of resources;
- (x) Firmly invite those countries that have not done so to give priority consideration to the implementation of Trade and Development Board resolution 165(S-IX) of 11 March 1978 and note with satisfaction that a number of donor countries have responded favourably to that resolution.

(d) Economic recovery and debt constraints

The international community recognizes that the continued improvement of the external environment and a strong economic adjustment effort may not be sufficient to allow many African States to service their debt while establishing the basis for sustainable economic growth. In these cases, the international community is determined to assist African countries in their efforts to deal with their financial constraints.

18. The international community reaffirms its belief in the strategy for collective self-reliance among developing countries and reiterates its conviction that economic and technical co-operation among these countries should constitute a key element in the economic recovery of Africa and be of mutual benefit to developing countries, with due regard to the Caracas Programme of Action on economic co-operation among developing countries and to the Plan of Action to meet the critical economic situation in Africa, adopted by the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries.

19. In this connection, there is an urgent need for African countries, together with other developing countries, to strengthen more vigorously than ever before South-South co-operation and make greater efforts, through action-oriented measures, particularly in the priority areas of food and agricultural production. Technical co-operation at the bilateral, subregional and interregional levels in the following specific areas could contribute towards helping Africa tackle its food production, storage and marketing problems:

- (a) Water management and small-scale irrigation technology;
- (b) Dry-land farming;
- (c) Training in agricultural support services, including extension services for animal husbandry;
- (d) Institution building, development and management in the area of farm co-operatives;
- (e) Small-scale rural industrial development;
- (f) Rural energy production, including the development of new and renewable sources of energy;
- (g) Agricultural research;
- (h) Exchange of seed germplasm and assistance in seed production technology and in the production of fertilizers, pesticides and farm equipment;
- (i) Development of poultry, fisheries and other non-farm produce;
- (j) Exchange of information and experience on appropriate agricultural policies and strategies.

20. In addition to the above, South-South co-operation should focus on other development priorities, with particular reference to the following areas mentioned in Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery 1986-1990:

- (a) Exchange of information, technology and techniques for combating drought and desertification and protecting the environment;
- (b) Exchange of information on and co-operation in the production of equipment and other inputs for agriculture, industry and transport and communication;
- (c) Co-operation in the development of human resources;
- (d) Joint participation in the implementation of self-sustaining, self-generating and self-financing development projects;
- (e) Trade expansion.

Follow-up and evaluation machinery

21. The effective implementation of the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990 will require a continuous process of follow-up, evaluation and co-ordination at the national, subregional, regional and international levels. Such a process, based on joint efforts and co-operation, would enable the follow-up, evaluation and co-ordination of the actions of both the national Governments and the international donor community. The general principles underlying the establishment of any follow-up and evaluation mechanism are:

- (a) The sovereign right of each Government to formulate and implement its own programmes and development plans, and to determine appropriate follow-up mechanisms best suited to implementing the Programme of Action;
- (b) The need for such mechanisms to be simple, operational and not involving substantial additional expenditure;
- (c) The need for emphasis, as far as possible, on the utilization of existing mechanisms;
- (d) The need for donor countries and international organizations to enhance co-ordination of their activities and assistance with the recipient countries.

National level

22. Governments would, as appropriate, establish follow-up mechanisms, involving joint action with their development partners, within the framework of existing aid co-ordination machinery, such as round tables and consultative group meetings, as well as within the framework of intergovernmental agreements for economic co-operation. The terms of reference and other details pertaining to such mechanisms, which could take the form of joint committees or joint bilateral commissions, would be agreed upon among the parties concerned, keeping in mind the following elements:

- (i) Comprehensive and simultaneous consideration of all issues pertaining to the implementation of the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990;
- (ii) Review and evaluation of the process of implementation of the jointly agreed upon commitments, on the part of both national Governments and their development partners in the context of the Programme of Action;
- (iii) Implementation of the Programme of Action in the context of the long-term development needs and policies of African countries.

Regional level

23. For a cohesive and balanced implementation of the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990, systematic follow-up action is necessary at the subregional and regional levels. This process, which could be facilitated by the existing mechanisms at the regional level, would assist the African Governments in evaluating and assessing the progress made in the implementation of the Programme of Action, at the subregional and continental levels, and in taking appropriate action.

24. At the global level, the following actions are envisaged:

(a) A review and appraisal of the implementation of the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990 by the General Assembly at its forty-third session in 1988. For that purpose, the General Assembly, at its forty-second session in 1987, shall consider and establish such preparatory mechanisms as may be necessary;

(b) The Secretary-General shall co-ordinate the assistance and support of the organizations and agencies of the United Nations system for the effective implementation of the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990;

(c) The Secretary-General shall monitor the process of the implementation of the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990 and report thereon to the General Assembly at its forty-second and forty-third

Adopted without vote

Approved by Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole (A/S-13/15) without vote, 1 June (meeting 3); draft by Chairman (A/S-13AC.1/L.3), orally revised following informal consultations; agenda item 6.

Meeting numbers. GA 13th special session: Ad Hoc Committee 1-3; plenary 1-8.

Speaking in explanation of position, the United States said it would support Africa's economic recovery by focusing its assistance on four of the highest priorities: economic restructuring, agricultural growth, human resources development and preparation for famine.

On behalf of the Group of 77 developing countries, Yugoslavia said the international community now had a comprehensive instrument, having committed itself to assist the countries of Africa to move towards steady and speedy economic and social development. The Group of 77 would continue to support African efforts throughout the process that would follow the special session.

Poland, also on behalf of Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Mongolia, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, said the document had not analysed with sufficient clarity the external factors hindering African development, nor did it provide for the working out of recommendations for effectively overcoming the continent's unequal status in the world economy. The outcome of the session was the direct result of the persistent policy of the leading Western States to block the economic liberation of Africa, thwart balanced international economic co-operation and split the unity of African and other developing countries. The socialist countries condemned attempts to take advantage of the critical economic situation of the African countries in order to interfere in their domestic and foreign policies and the United Nations should not and would not be an accomplice to that policy.

China said the special session had been crowned with positive results, thus opening new prospects for African countries and the international community in their joint endeavours to revitalize the African economy. China would contribute to the best of its ability to Africa in such aspects as increasing its economic assistance, particularly agricultural aid, continuing to provide long-term preferential loans, strengthening personnel training and exchanging experience in policy-making.

Speaking on behalf of the European Community (EC), the Netherlands said the long negotiating process to achieve consensus on the adopted text was due to the complexity of the issue under consideration. The text was clear proof of the firm determination to do the utmost to give a new impetus to the development process in Africa. That positive result would not have been possible without the strong input of the African countries themselves.

Japan said UNPAAERD emphasized the importance of agriculture and food production, which were the same areas emphasized by the Japanese people as they worked for the economic and social development of their own country. Japan was prepared to increase substantially its co-operation in the form of grant aid, technical assistance and loans to Africa.

Canada said UNPAAERD marked a historic watershed by setting a new pattern for co-operation between Africa and the international community. The Programme was a starting-point and its results would be commensurate with the perseverance, determination and resoluteness of the commitments undertaken by the two partners.

Albania had reservations on the resolution, although it had joined in the consensus in support of the brother peoples of Africa.

Senegal, speaking on behalf of Africa, said the international community was lending Africa its support and backing by translating UNPAAERD into reality through pledges, cancellation or suspension of debts and replenishment of aid funds. Africa was grateful to the international community for having rallied to its side in response to its appeal and placed great hope in the implementation of UNPAAERD. The decisions at the session had been taken in an exemplary atmosphere of mutual confidence and would be given concrete form by both Africa and the international community. Africa had no choice but to act in accordance with its commitments, since its very survival and that of its peoples were at stake. It attached the highest priority to the follow-up and evaluation machinery that had been adopted; it hoped that the framework would enable Africa to translate into concrete action the determination for co-operation shown on all sides.

Preparations for the thirteenth special session

In the 1985 resolution⁽⁹⁾ by which it decided to convene the special session, the General Assembly established a Preparatory Committee to undertake preparations to ensure the session's success.

The Preparatory Committee of the Whole for the Special Session of the General Assembly on the Critical Economic Situation in Africa held 14 meetings in New York, on 23 and 24 January, 20, 24 and 25 February, 3, 4 and 23 April and 12, 13, 16 and 23 May, plus several informal meetings.⁽²⁶⁾

On 25 February, the Committee took note of the Chairman's statement, informing it of the results of informal consultations conducted by him. The text of the Chairman's statement was annexed to the Committee's report.

On 16 May, the Committee decided to submit to the Assembly recommendations regarding the organization of the special session's work, covering: the provisional agenda; the date and duration; the President and other officers; the General Committee; the Credentials Committee; the Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole; the rules of procedure; the level of representation; the allocation of items; the general debate; organizations to be invited to attend; and the schedule of meetings.

On 23 May, the Preparatory Committee decided to annex to its report the draft basic final document entitled "United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery, 1986-1990", which had been submitted to it by the United Republic of Tanzania on behalf of United Nations Member States that were members of the African Group.

On 27 May, the General Assembly, by decision S-13/21, endorsed the Preparatory Committee's report and recommendations.

Consideration at the General Assembly's regular session and related activities

Report of the Secretary-General. In an October report⁽²⁷⁾ to the General Assembly, the Secretary-General gave an update on his efforts to monitor the emergency situation in Africa, as requested by the Assembly in 1985.⁽⁸⁾ The report described the responsibilities of the United Nations Office for Emergency Operations in Africa (OEOA) throughout 1985 and 1986, the international response to needs in the region, lessons learned from the emergency, and future arrangements following the planned closure of OEOA.

OEOA had been set up in 1985 to promote co-ordination and co-operation in the response of the United Nations system to the African emergency crisis and to facilitate the gathering and diffusion of up-to-date, coherent and comprehensive information on the scope and evolution of the emergency. The Office also promoted and supported resource mobilization efforts on behalf of the affected countries and helped to expedite the delivery of emergency supplies by the entire international donor community, including non-governmental organizations (NGOs), to affected African countries.

The drought-related famine in Africa had virtually ended following two consecutive years of reasonably good rains, the Secretary-General reported. As a result, the number of countries facing an emergency had decreased significantly, but substantial relief assistance was still required. Several countries continued to face severe emergency conditions. The Secretary-General estimated that some 14 million people in Africa were in need of relief food and non-food aid. Over 3 million people remained displaced and needed help to resume productive lives, while tens of thousands of orphans or children separated from their families would need many years of dedicated assistance.

According to OEOA, emergency food-aid requirements for 1986 for countries still facing emergency conditions totalled some 2.1 million metric tons, most of which was covered by donor commitments. With regard to non-food emergency-related needs of some $544 million, donors had pledged $244 million. It was crucial that the remaining $300 million for such needs be provided to ensure an early transition to recovery and development. Those needs were in the areas of logistics, health, water supply and sanitation, relief and survival items, agricultural inputs and assistance to refugees and returnees.

Several of the African countries severely affected by drought prior to the 1985 rains were currently facing a new and potentially severe locust and grasshopper threat (see p. 483). The Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) had set up a special Emergency Centre for Locust Operations in order to co-ordinate the efforts of African and donor Governments in organizing and implementing locust control activities in the affected countries (see PART TWO, Chapter III).

The Secretary-General reported that among the lessons learned from the African emergency was the recognition of the need for an effective early warning system in countries and regions facing latent threats of drought, desertification or other natural disasters. Moreover, the organizations and agencies concerned with the emergency during the preceding two years should anticipate future similar situations. The relationship between emergency, recovery and rehabilitation activities needed to be clarified, he said, to reduce dependency in affected areas.

In an addendum to his report,⁽²⁸⁾ the Secretary-General outlined new arrangements for the United Nations response to emergencies of large magnitude in Africa, to be put in place as from 1 November 1986 following the 31 October closure of OEOA as a separate entity of the United Nations system. He noted that most situations could be addressed within existing structures of United Nations organizations and programmes, but the experience of OEOA had shown that there was a need for the Organization to maintain its capacity to deal with complex emergencies.

The new arrangements included the following: the OEOA Executive Co-ordinator would exercise, on a part-time basis, the functions of Director for Emergencies in Africa under the responsibility of the Under-Secretary-General for Special Political Questions; the Co-ordinator for Emergencies in Africa would concurrently be appointed by the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator as Director of UNDRP's New York Liaison Office; the inter-agency African Emergency Task Force would continue to function; and the Offices of the Special Representatives of the Secretary-General for Emergency Operations in Ethiopia and in the Sudan would close on 31 December 1986.

With regard to implementation of UNPAAERD, the Secretary-General at the end of August 1986 created a United Nations Steering Committee, composed of the executive heads (or their designated alternates) of the Economic Commission for Africa, UNDP, UNICEF, UNFPA, the Department of Technical Co-operation for Development (DTCD) and the Office for Special Political Questions. Stephen Lewis (Canada), who had served as the Chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole of the Thirteenth Special Session of the General Assembly, was appointed personal adviser to the Secretary-General.

ACC activities. The Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions (Operational Activities) (CCSQ(OPS)) (first regular session of 1986, Geneva, 18-21 March)⁽²⁹⁾ of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination discussed the linkages between emergency relief, rehabilitation and longer-term development, with particular reference to the situation in Africa. It recommended that the lessons learned in dealing with the emergency in Africa should be recorded and that key personnel concerned with emergencies in the affected countries should exchange and compare their experiences. Emergency arrangements should be converted into mechanisms and programmes for building up emergency preparedness and response capacity in the countries concerned.

The Joint United Nations Information Committee (JUNIC) (thirteenth session, Geneva, 8-11 April)⁽³⁰⁾ discussed the launching of information programmes on Africa and in support of the special session. The OEOA Chief of Information said a number of "travelling press seminars" in Africa, underwritten by various Governments, had been conducted during the preceding two years, with the participation of United Nations organizations. JUNIC members agreed that the African situation should continue to receive high priority both in individual information programmes and in collective efforts.

At its second regular session of 1986 (New York, 1-3 October),⁽³¹⁾ CCSQ(OPS) discussed the implementation of UNPAAERD. The Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation presented the Programme's main issues, emphasizing the need for all United Nations organizations and agencies to review their activities for Africa, the need to utilize existing co-ordination mechanisms at the country level and the need to focus on key development issues at the regional level.

Several specialized agencies described measures being taken by them for the economic and social development of Africa and expressed their willingness to contribute to the work of the Steering Committee (see above). In order to consolidate resources at the country level in Africa, CCSQ(OPS) decided to examine the extent to which current and proposed field programme activities by the United Nations system were related to countries' priority goals, thus assisting Governments and United Nations agencies to assess better specific actions required in various subsectors and improve field-level monitoring of UNPAAERD.

UNDP activities. The UNDP Administrator, in his report for 1986,⁽³²⁾ described the year as one of transition for Africa, as Governments and their aid partners turned to policy and economic issues underlying the struggle in the region to meet longer-term needs. During 1986, some 2,600 UNDP projects operating in Africa were concluded. Thirty-four of the 45 programmes for the fourth programming cycle (1987-1991) were formulated in close alignment with policy trends signalled in UNPAAERD. In particular, five themes emerged in programmes for the new cycle: improved economic planning and management; support for economic restructuring and policy reforms; increased agricultural output, notably in food production; aid co-ordination and resource mobilization; and the strengthening of human and institutional capacities.

In 1986, a number of African Governments sought UNDP assistance to carry out structural adjustment programmes, prompting UNDP to identify its potential contributions to this field: greater support for public sector reforms; reinforcement of administrative capacities in the public, production and social sectors; and the formulation of strategic policies for stimulating agriculture, industry, private investment and trade.

UNDP-assisted round tables and the National Technical Co-operation and Assessment Programmes continued to play an important part in recovery efforts.

A round-table conference was conducted for Cape Verde in 1986, which mobilized sizeable support from the donor community, and preparations were under way for conferences for Burkina Faso, the Niger and Sierra Leone. Sectoral consultations took place in Benin, the Gambia, Guinea-Bissau, Mali and Togo, following earlier round-table meetings for those countries.

As in 1985, Africa remained the largest arena for activities by the United Nations Volunteers (UNV) programme, accounting for 52 per cent of the 1,125 volunteers in service at the end of 1986. The volunteers, working in all but two countries in the region, participated in agriculture, rural development, education, health and sanitation and emergency/relief activities. Under its Domestic Development Services mandate, the UNV-executed African regional project completed its first phase with training courses aimed at increasing the effectiveness of 50 leaders of community self-help groups.

On 27 June,⁽³³⁾ the UNDP Governing Council authorized the Administrator to take action to implement UNPAAERD and to report to the Council in 1987. He was encouraged, in full consultation with the Secretary-General, to undertake an evaluation and co-ordination role at the national and regional levels, when African Governments so requested, and to formulate proposals on UNDP's possible contribution to implementing UNPAAERD, in particular in relation to technical co-operation programmes in Africa.

Communications. By a 5 May letter,⁽³⁴⁾ Morocco transmitted the texts of the final communiqué and resolutions of the Sixteenth Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers (Fez, 6-10 January), which included a call to its member States to support proposals to multilateral financial organizations for an increase in net capital inflow to Africa. On 15 May,⁽³⁵⁾ India forwarded the final documents of the Ministerial Meeting of the Co-ordinating Bureau of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries (New Delhi, 16-19 April), which included a review of the critical economic situation in Africa as part of its Economic Declaration. On 13 June,⁽³⁶⁾ Saudi Arabia transmitted a memorandum summarizing its ODA to African countries and world-wide. On 25 June,⁽³⁷⁾ Ethiopia conveyed the declaration and resolutions of the International Seminar on the Struggle for Peace and Progress (Addis Ababa, 7-9 June). In an 11 July letter,⁽³⁸⁾ Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, the Federal Republic of Germany, Iceland, Japan, Norway, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States described their contributions to the development activities of the United Nations system and included statistics on the funding of special economic activities. On 23 July,⁽³⁹⁾ the Ukrainian SSR transmitted the joint statement included in Poland's 30 May letter⁽²²⁾ to the special session (see p. 445).

The United Kingdom, in a 22 September letter,⁽⁴⁰⁾ enclosed a copy of a memorandum, which included a statement re-emphasizing the commitment of EC and its member States to supporting and supplementing the efforts of the African States. On 25 September,⁽⁴¹⁾ Algeria transmitted the resolutions adopted by the Council of Ministers of OAU at its forty-fourth ordinary session (Addis Ababa, 21-26 July) and the declarations, decisions and resolutions of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of OAU at its twenty-second ordinary session (Addis Ababa, 28-30 July). In a 26 September letter,⁽⁴²⁾ Italy summarized the proceedings of a 25 September meeting between its Minister for Foreign Affairs and the Ministers for Foreign Affairs or high-level representatives of sub-Saharan countries, at which they discussed operational follow-up to the special session. On behalf of the Group of 77, Yugoslavia, on 2 October,⁽⁴³⁾ communicated the declaration adopted on 1 October in New York by the tenth annual meeting of the Group's Ministers for Foreign Affairs, which included an appeal for mobilization of the funds needed for Africa's economic recovery. Zimbabwe forwarded the final documents adopted by the Eighth Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries (Harare, 1-6 September) on 30 September⁽⁴⁴⁾ and the final communiqué of the Meeting of Ministers and Heads of Delegation of the Non-Aligned Countries to the Forty-first Session of the General Assembly (New York, 2 October) on 9 October.⁽⁴⁵⁾

By decision 1986/166 of 22 July 1986, the Economic and Social Council took note of oral reports to its Third Committee on assistance to Djibouti, Guinea, Madagascar, Mauritania, Mozambique, Uganda and Vanuatu by the representative of the Under-Secretary-General for Special Political Questions, and on assistance to Benin, Cape Verde, the Central African Republic, the Comoros, Equatorial Guinea, the Gambia, Guinea-Bissau and Sierra Leone by the representative of UNDP.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 31 October, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/29 without vote.

Emergency situation in Africa

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 39/29 of 3 December 1984, 40/40 of 2 December 1985, and its resolution S-13/2 of 1 June 1986 containing the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the critical economic situation in Africa,

Noting with deep appreciation the efforts of the international community, which have contributed to the containment of the drought-related emergency in most of the affected African countries,

Noting also the continuing nature of the emergency situation,

Noting further with deep concern that many African countries are now facing or are threatened by a new and potentially severe infestation by locusts and grasshoppers,

Recognizing that the continuing emergency situation not only undermines the efforts of the African countries in carrying out their programmes for economic recovery and longer-term development, but also severely hampers those efforts,

1. Takes note with satisfaction of the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Expresses its appreciation to the international community for its valuable support with regard to the emergency situation in Africa and appeals to it to continue its efforts and to implement fully resolutions 39/29, 40/40 and S-13/2;

3. Commends the determined efforts of the Governments and peoples of Africa in responding to the challenge posed by the emergency situation;

4. Notes with deep concern that the emergency situation still exists in some of the affected African countries, that increased emergency assistance continues to be required and that non-food needs have yet to be met;

5. Appeals to the international community, the organizations of the United Nations system and non-governmental organizations urgently to pursue and intensify their efforts to satisfy the unmet emergency needs of the affected African countries as described in the report of the Secretary-General;

6. Urges the international community to make every possible effort to assist African countries in establishing early-warning systems in order to limit and control the grasshopper and locust infestation and to provide adequate assistance for dealing with its effects, and, in this connection, requests all States, the organizations of the United Nations system and non-governmental organizations to co-operate with the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations;

7. Welcomes the decision of the Secretary-General to continue, after the closure of the Office for Emergency Operations in Africa, his efforts in monitoring the emergency situation still affecting some African countries and in sensitizing the international community;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to follow closely the emergency situation in Africa and to include updated information thereon in the report to be submitted to the General Assembly at its forty-second session, in accordance with resolution S-13/2.

Benin

The Secretary-General, in his September 1986 report on special programmes of economic assistance,⁽⁴⁾ provided information on assistance to Benin, as requested by the General Assembly in 1985.⁽⁴⁶⁾

The programme's projects, said the report, had been integrated in the national investment plan and were being pursued through the donors' round-table process and the economic and social development plan for the period 1983-1987.

Benin, according to a later report of the Secretary-General,⁽⁴⁷⁾ was classified by the United Nations as least developed, having a per capita gross domestic product (GDP) per annum of under $300.

In 1986, Benin's economy was estimated to have grown by 3.3 per cent in nominal terms—a regression in real terms—compared with 9 per cent in 1985. Although the 1985/86 season showed an overall increase in agricultural output of 5 per cent over the previous one, with gains in both food-crop production and output of cotton and peanuts, the continued fall in world prices of raw materials and the decline in value of the United States dollar, in which the world market price of cotton was denominated, undermined those gains. As a result of an industrial accident in 1986, the State beverage company lost half of its production capacity, while a number of other State enterprises continued to work under unfavourable cost/price ratios and weak demand conditions, in addition to under-utilization of capacity in the sugar and cement industries. The industrial accident was followed by co-ordinated aid within the United Nations system, with technical expertise provided through the UNDP/United Nations Industrial Development Organization Special Industrial Services Programme.

Benin's current accounts deficit increased in 1986, with the overall balance-of-payments deficit amounting to some 10.2 per cent of the country's GNP. External debt represented almost 95 per cent of Benin's public debt. It was estimated that debt due in 1987 would be the equivalent of 70 per cent of that year's export earnings, well in excess of available resources.

The decline in State receipts in fiscal year 1985/86, caused by Benin's poor economic situation and reductions in world crude oil and cotton prices, necessitated a revision of the State budget for 1986/87, creating an adverse impact on health, education and other social services. Unemployment was another major concern as civil service recruitment was frozen and several State enterprises were liquidated.

In 1986, total external assistance to Benin in the form of technical assistance or financing of capital investment amounted to $133.5 million, of which $80.1 million represented capital investment or financial assistance provided by 17 donor agencies. Technical assistance to Benin in 1986 was valued at $53.4 million, of which the contribution by the United Nations system, including UNDP, amounted to over $10 million.

For General Assembly action regarding economic assistance to Benin, see resolution 41/200.

Central African Republic

The special programme of economic assistance for the Central African Republic, a land-locked LDC, was described in a September 1986 report of the Secretary-General,⁽⁴⁾ as requested by the General Assembly in 1985.⁽⁴⁸⁾ The country's economic situation was termed precarious, despite some progress in re-establishing economic stability. Its major development handicaps were its land-locked position, poor transportation, sparse population, small domestic market and largely untrained human resource base, according to a later report.⁽⁴⁹⁾ A slow-down in growth in 1986 resulted mainly from the drop in production for export of coffee. The overall value of exports—which also included diamonds, wood and cotton—dropped by 22.5 per cent, while the total value of imports declined by 12 per cent.

A preview meeting for a UNDP round table for the Central African Republic was held with donors at Bangui from 11 to 13 March 1986. The Government presented the broad outlines of its five-year (1986-1990) development plan. In support of its first-phase structural adjustment programme, the country received credits totalling $30 million in September 1986 from IDA and the World Bank's Special Facility for sub-Saharan Africa, to be disbursed over 18 months, in addition to an 18-month International Monetary Fund (IMF) standby arrangement covering July 1985 to December 1986.

The Central African Republic was one of the countries selected for an evaluation and programming exercise on technical assistance under the National and Technical Co-operation Assessment Programmes, organized by UNDP. Missions of international and national consultants were carried out in May and October 1986 to evaluate the ministries of planning, statistics and economic and financial co-operation, rural development, national education, and civil service and labour.

For General Assembly action regarding economic assistance to the Central African Republic, see resolution 41/200.

Chad

Economic and social indicators ranked Chad, a land-locked country, among the lowest of the countries classified as least developed in terms of life expectancy, literacy and health of its population. The Secretary-General, in a September 1986 report⁽⁴⁾ requested by the General Assembly in 1985,⁽⁴⁹⁾ said economic recovery in Chad had been unsteady, the country having suffered greatly from the effects of war and persistent drought. Chad had a per capita income of only $130 in 1985 and faced uncertainty given the collapse of cotton prices, problems with desertification, the continued foreign occupation of part of its territory, and its limited capacity to absorb economic inputs in the short term.

By the 1985/86 growing season, food production in Chad had almost recovered to pre-drought levels. However, several problems remained, such as the possibility of future drought, the need to avoid a premature return of displaced farmers and herdsmen to ecologically unstable areas of the Sahel, a badly deteriorated road network and a lack of agricultural support services. In 1986, Chad was able to make the transition from ad hoc emergency humanitarian and rehabilitation operations to longer-term development by adjusting its aid programmes to reflect national development priorities. A successful UNDP-funded economic rehabilitation project in 1986 was followed by several World Bank missions throughout the year, which concentrated on Bank action programmes in the agriculture, road transport, cotton, education and petroleum sectors. In February and October, IMF and the Government explored the possibility of an IMF-supported programme.

Two major sectoral consultations, on transport and on cotton, took place in 1986 in follow-up to the December 1985 round-table meeting at which the Government presented its interim plan (1986-1988) to donors. A complete review of the agriculture sector, including the livestock, forestry and fishery sub-sectors, was undertaken with the help of a UNDP-financed consultant from FAO and resulted in an integrated strategy for that sector, which was presented to donors at a December meeting at N'Djamena, Chad's capital.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December 1986, the Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 41/198 without vote.

Special economic assistance to Chad

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 40/218 of 17 December 1985 and its previous resolutions on assistance in the reconstruction, rehabilitation and development of Chad, emergency humanitarian assistance to Chad and special economic assistance to that country,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on special economic assistance to Chad, relating, inter alia, to the economic and financial situation of Chad, the status of assistance provided for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of the country and the progress made in organizing and executing the programme of assistance for that country,

Considering that the war and the drought are compromising all the reconstruction and development efforts of the Government of Chad,

Concerned at the recent invasion of locusts, which has aggravated the already precarious food and health situation in Chad, in particular that of the people displaced as a result of the war and the drought,

Taking note of the numerous appeals launched by the Government of Chad and governmental and non-governmental organizations regarding the food and health situation in Chad,

Recognizing the need for emergency humanitarian assistance to Chad,

Also recognizing the need for assistance in the reconstruction and development of Chad,

Welcoming the round table on assistance to Chad convened by the United Nations Development Programme at Geneva on 4 and 5 December 1985, in accordance with the arrangements agreed upon at the International Conference on Assistance to Chad held in November 1982,

1. Expresses its gratitude to the States and governmental and non-governmental organizations that responded and are continuing to respond generously to the appeals of the Government of Chad and of the Secretary-General by furnishing assistance to Chad;

2. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his efforts to make the international community aware of the difficulties of Chad and to mobilize assistance for that country;

3. Renews the appeals made to States, competent organizations and programmes of the United Nations system and international economic and financial institutions:

(a) To continue to provide the necessary humanitarian assistance to the people of Chad, who have suffered as a result of the war, the drought and the invasion of locusts and predators;

(b) To continue to contribute to the reconstruction of Chad;

4. Notes with satisfaction that a round table on assistance to Chad was held at Geneva on 4 and 5 December 1985, and invites States and agencies to take part in the sectoral meetings scheduled at the round table and to honour the commitments they made;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 41/192 of 8 December 1986:

(a) To continue his efforts to mobilize the necessary resources for an effective programme of financial, technical and material assistance to Chad;

(b) To assess, in close collaboration with the humanitarian agencies concerned, the humanitarian needs, particularly in the areas of food and health, of the people displaced by the war and the drought;

(e) To mobilize special humanitarian assistance for persons who have suffered as a result of the war, the drought and the invasion of locusts and predators and for the resettlement of displaced persons;

(d) To keep the situation in Chad under review and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its forty-second session.

Comoros

A number of factors negatively affected the economic situation of the Comoros, according to a September 1986 report by the Secretary-General,⁽⁴⁾ requested by the General Assembly in 1985.⁽⁵⁾ The Comoros, an LDC with no mineral resources and less than half its land suitable for agriculture, was highly dependent on external assistance. A later report of the Secretary-General⁽⁷⁾ cited the country's inadequate education and technical training programmes and deficient health services.

Agricultural production in the Comoros, which accounted for close to 40 per cent of GDP and almost all export earnings, relied on three main export crops—vanilla, cloves and ylang-ylang—all of which were subject to fluctuating prices on world commodity markets. The economy of the Comoros was estimated to have slowed from 4 per cent real growth in 1984 to about 2 per cent in 1986. Almost all of the large government budget deficit had been financed by external grants and loans, with estimates for 1986 indicating a reduction in the overall deficit to about 30 per cent of GDP. In 1986, the trade gap was reduced to $6 million from $10 million in 1985 as a result of increased export earnings. Capital inflows were estimated at $16.5 million in 1986. External debts, largely incurred after independence to help finance infrastructure development, totalled $156 million in 1986, the equivalent of 96 per cent of GDP. Debt-servicing due in 1986 totalled $5.5 million, representing almost 20 per cent of the country's revenues from the export of goods and services.

The special programme of economic assistance consisted of 19 projects in food self-sufficiency, communications, energy and water, health and training. Those projects were included in the interim economic and social development plan for 1983-1986 and in the investment programme for 1983-1990.

For General Assembly action regarding economic assistance to the Comoros, see resolution 41/200.

Djibouti

The special programme of economic assistance for Djibouti helped the country to cope with serious economic and social problems exacerbated by severe drought. The Secretary-General, in a September 1986 report⁽⁵⁾ requested by the General Assembly in 1985,⁽⁵¹⁾ described the numerous constraints to economic development in Djibouti, an LDC: a harsh, arid climate; dependence on food imports and external assistance; few natural resources; a heavy dependence on services concentrated in the capital (mainly provided to the international port of Djibouti and the airport); limited skilled and managerial workers; and high population growth.

In a later report,⁽⁴⁷⁾ the Secretary-General said that Djibouti had implemented a budget austerity programme as it faced rapid depletion of its reserves. France and Saudi Arabia provided about $14 million in additional budgetary support at the end of 1986. Debt-service payments had become a significant burden, with repayments of principal due in 1986 totalling $33 million. The presence of an estimated 23,000 refugees in Djibouti in mid-1986 also made it difficult for the Government to provide basic needs to its citizens.

UNDP and DTCD organized a consultation mission in 1986 to assist the Directorate of Planning in its activities, including those related to the co-ordination of aid. Regular contacts took place between United Nations agencies and bilateral aid donors in the areas of refugees, food assistance and health, and a number of informal consultations were held during 1986 among donors and the United Nations resident Co-ordinator.

For General Assembly action regarding economic assistance to Djibouti, see resolution 41/200.

Equatorial Guinea

A structurally deficient infrastructure and limited human resources continued to constrain development in Equatorial Guinea, according to a September 1986 report of the Secretary-General,⁽⁴⁾ requested by the General Assembly in 1985.⁽⁵²⁾

Agriculture accounted for 50 per cent of the country's GDP and virtually all of its main exports: cocoa, timber and coffee. A later report of the Secretary-General⁽⁴⁷⁾ indicated that for the crop year 1986/87 cocoa production was forecast to decrease 10 per cent compared with 1985 and by 37 per cent in comparison with 1984, reaching the lowest level since the country's independence in 1968. Climatic conditions, lower producers' prices on the world market, delays in delivery and the increased cost of inputs contributed to the decline in production. The value of cocoa exports fell by 24 per cent in 1986, causing a significant decline in tax revenues. During the year, in order to promote production, the Government established a system relating the level of export duties to world prices and introduced a classification system to improve quality. The decline in cocoa exports was more than compensated for by the value of timber exports, which rose by 50 per cent, due to a 25 per cent rise in timber production in 1986 over 1985 levels.

The country's trade deficit was reduced in 1986 as export revenues rose and import levels remained almost constant. Preliminary figures indicated that the global deficit in the 1986 balance of payments represented about 20 per cent of exports as compared with 60 per cent in 1985.

Equatorial Guinea's current account suffered from the fall in cocoa export duties, the adverse effect on tax revenues caused by serious liquidity problems in the banking sector and the country's foreign debt obligations. During the year, the two banking institutions operating in Equatorial Guinea experienced difficulties that culminated in an almost total lack of liquidity. A new joint banking enterprise, formed by the Banque internationale pour l'Afrique occidentale, the Government of Equatorial Guinea and private citizen investors from Equatorial Guinea, was established and expected to become fully operational in 1987.

In 1986, the country received some $30 million in external assistance, with 58 per cent of public consumption as well as 85 per cent of public investment financed by external sources.

For General Assembly action regarding economic assistance to Equatorial Guinea, see resolution 41/200.

Gambia

Reliance on one crop—ground-nuts—had caused growing economic and financial difficulties for the Gambia, classified as least developed with a per capita GDP well under $300, according to a September 1986 report of the Secretary-General,⁽⁴⁾ requested by the General Assembly in 1985.⁽⁵³⁾ Production of ground-nuts, which accounted for 85 to 90 per cent of the country's domestic exports, had shown a downward trend over recent years, while world prices for the commodity had fluctuated erratically.

A later report⁽⁴⁷⁾ stated that real per capita income in the Gambia was estimated to have fallen by 16 per cent between 1970 and 1985, as the economy slowed during the 1970s, GDP declined in the 1980s and the population doubled between 1965 and 1985.

In mid-1985, the Gambia had launched an economic recovery programme aimed at reversing the economic deterioration. The programme was extended in mid-1986 for three more years. Exchange controls were lifted in January 1986 and the national currency, the dalasi, was allowed to float, resulting in an initial depreciation of 100 per cent against the pound sterling to which it had previously been pegged. In subsequent months, the exchange rate stabilized.

Increases in producer prices, together with above-average rains, resulted in substantially higher volumes of ground-nut output. Efforts were also made, as part of the programme, to diversify agricultural production, through the promotion of rain-fed grains, swamp rice, and the development of livestock, fisheries and horticulture. Cereal production was, however, reduced in 1986 as a result of grasshopper infestation, blister beetles, mould and the early cessation of rains.

Government expenditures were expected to be considerably reduced as a result of retrenchment in public administration. The number of civil servants was cut by 3,400, more than 30 per cent of the total. An additional 1,200 posts were declared redundant during 1986.

The economic recovery programme was supported by a structural adjustment credit of $30 million approved by the World Bank in August 1986, of which the first tranche of $17 million was disbursed in December 1986. The credit was co-financed by the United Kingdom/Overseas Development Administration and the African Development Fund. In September, IMF approved the thirteenth stand-by arrangement for the Gambia, in close co-ordination with the World Bank's structural adjustment credit and directly supportive of the recovery programme. The Gambia also received IMF resources under the structural adjustment and compensatory financing facilities.

United Nations organizations and agencies supported the Gambia's recovery and development efforts, in some instances in co-operation with bilateral donors. UNDP support was extended to rangeland management, afforestation, horticulture, agrometeorology and hydrology, and economic planning. Rice development was supported by IFAD, and UNICEF participated in the country's expanded programme of immunization. In August, two mass vaccination campaigns were carried out in response to an outbreak of poliomyelitis. During the 1986 season, FAO responded to a request from the Gambia to protect crops from grasshoppers. The World Food Programme (WFP) provided cereals and other food items in early 1986, mainly in support of school feeding and rural development projects.

For General Assembly action regarding economic assistance to the Gambia, see resolution 41/200.

Guinea

Although the Secretary-General had been requested by the General Assembly in 1985⁽⁵⁴⁾ to report to it in 1986 on the special programme of economic assistance to Guinea, he was unable to do so as he had not received the necessary information from Guinea by the time of the report's publication in September 1986.⁽⁵⁾

In a later report⁽⁴⁷⁾ the Secretary-General described Guinea's economic situation in 1986 and its economic and financial recovery programme, 1985-1987. Despite vast resources of land and minerals, Guinea was classified as least developed, having a per capita GDP of less than $300. In 1985, the Government launched a 30-month recovery programme aimed at improving the economic and financial situation and introducing radical structural reforms in order to stabilize the economy and pave the way for a largely private-enterprise economic system, after a quarter of a century of almost entirely State-run economic activity.

The measures included: devaluation of the currency by 93 per cent in January 1986 and the establishment of a weekly auction market for foreign exchange; elimination of foreign exchange controls over merchandise imports; price increases for key commodities and public services to establish real-cost pricing for goods such as imported rice and gasoline; full decontrol of agricultural prices; removal of export controls on private traders; simplification and general lowering of the customs tariff to 10 per cent for nearly all imports; a raising of depositor interest rates and initiation of concessional lending to small and medium-sized enterprises; and reforms in the revenue system, broadening the tax base. In addition, Guinea reached agreement in April 1986 to renegotiate $201 million in payments due on its external debt.

Other structural reforms included: liquidation of all six State-owned banks and their replacement by three new privately managed banking ventures with foreign partners; liquidation of all non-viable State enterprises and rehabilitation of viable enterprises; restructuring by privatization and liquidation of the public industrial sector; liquidation of employment positions in government or State enterprises; and improvement of the skills of government employees. In the area of legislation and regulation in economic affairs, petroleum and mining codes were enacted during the year.

Early in 1986, Guinea signed a structural adjustment agreement with the World Bank for $42 million and a stand-by agreement with IMF for $39 million, in addition to mobilizing donor support of $180 million.

The impact of structural adjustment policies was viewed as largely positive, with the exception of the unfavourable social impact due to price changes and unemployment. The World Bank, with UNDP funding, had undertaken a study of the social impact of the new policies.

The Guinean authorities met with the country's principal non-project aid donors on 11 April 1986 in Paris, when they stated their intention to organize a consultative group under World Bank auspices.

For General Assembly action regarding economic assistance to Guinea, see resolution 41/200.

Guinea-Bissau

The Secretary-General, in a report⁽⁴⁾ requested by the General Assembly in 1985,⁽⁵⁾ said Guinea-Bissau's economy and financial stability had worsened since mid-1985. External debt and debt payment arrears had increased and continued to be the principal constraint to development. Guinea-Bissau, classified as least developed with a per capita GDP of less than $200, had also experienced a critical shortage of foreign exchange, resulting in a loss of import capacity and a reduction of fuel and spare parts supplies causing electrical black-outs and disruption to transport and to some agricultural activities.

In April 1986, the Government adopted a package of austerity measures, which included a freeze on salaries, cuts in civil service jobs, a tax increase, a reduction in the budget deficit, an increase in prices, a reduction in the ceiling for credit and a continued devaluation of the Guinea-Bissau peso. Assistance from the international community was indispensable to minimize the austerity measures' negative impact.

A later report of the Secretary-General⁽⁴⁷⁾ cited a gain of 2.6 per cent in the country's GDP during 1986. Nevertheless, Guinea-Bissau continued to face enormous structural obstacles to its development. Among those recognized by the Government and donors were: a poor production performance in the agricultural sector; a high level of both public and private consumption in relation to GDP; a public investment programme that had been difficult to manage effectively because of its size and that had contributed little to increasing output; a budget deficit financed by unsustainable levels of domestic and foreign borrowing; rapid money supply growth, due to the budget deficit which fueled inflation and led to price increases of 68 per cent in 1986; large foreign trade deficits; and a rapidly growing external debt, with $15 million of debt-service payments in 1986.

In the light of the above, Guinea-Bissau decided to prolong and greatly strengthen the stabilization programme for 1986-1989. Among measures undertaken were: re-establishment of parity between the official exchange rate and the parallel market rate; restriction of the money supply and control of inflation; restructuring of the credit supply in favour of the private sector; limitation of public investment expenditures to projects with a high rate of return; and reduction of other public expenditures and of public employment.

During the year, UNDP launched a total of 18 development projects in Guinea-Bissau, at a cost of more than $3 million. The projects were aimed at reducing the negative effects of the structural adjustment programme and included the following components: retraining of laid-off government officials; financing for a special programme of public works; aid for the creation of small enterprises; and a study of the social effects of the programme, in co-operation with the World Bank and the National Institute for Studies and Research.

Additional support to the country came from specialized agencies and other United Nations organizations, in support of the adjustment programme and the longer-term development strategy.

With UNDP assistance, Guinea-Bissau organized several meetings in 1986 in follow-up to the 1984 round-table meeting with donors.⁽⁵⁶⁾ In February, a sectoral consultation on health took place, enabling Guinea-Bissau to define its policies clearly and pave the way for donors to mobilize a targeted $10 million in funding for health infrastructure, equipment, training and supply of essential medicines.

For General Assembly action regarding economic assistance to Guinea-Bissau, see resolution 41/200.

Madagascar

A country of 10 million people with a per capita income of less than $300, Madagascar had faced a major economic crisis since the beginning of the 1980s. The decline in agricultural production, particularly of rice (the national food staple), the rise in oil prices, rapid population growth, the growing preponderance of the public sector in industry, trade and transport, shrinking public revenues and acute debt-servicing difficulties were key factors.

In a September 1986 report,⁽⁵⁾ requested by the General Assembly in 1985,⁽⁵⁷⁾ the Secretary-General noted Madagascar's continued economic constraints arising from a shortage of foreign exchange due to external debt and balance-of-payments difficulties. The country was at a critical stage in its economic development as it attempted to make the transition from retrenchment and stabilization to adjustment and growth.

In a later report,⁽⁴⁷⁾ the Secretary-General stated that a cyclone had hit the country's main port city and some crop areas in March. Damage to export crops and stocks was expected to cut projected export earnings by some $25 million (8 per cent), with added imports needed to repair or replace damaged infrastructure and equipment and to provide relief to the homeless. Immediate additional expenditures of $23 million out of an expected total of $50 million were required due to the cyclone.

Madagascar's national development plan, 1986-1990, called for an average annual GDP growth rate of slightly more than 3 per cent. The plan, through the infusion of additional external aid and in conjunction with further rescheduling of the external debt, would allow the country to import the materials and spare parts necessary to stimulate production, particularly for exports essential to obtain the foreign exchange needed to service the external debt. The principal measures envisaged as part of the plan were: liberalization of prices and tariffs for most agricultural and industrial products; progressive dismantling of subsidies; credit and fiscal incentive policies; implementation of the Investment Code and promotion of private foreign investments; promotion of agricultural and industrial exports, particularly in traditional commodities; rehabilitation and expansion of crops and industries whose products could serve for import substitution; rehabilitation of the road, railway, port, airport and telecommunications networks; promotion of employment; promotion of small and medium-sized businesses and cottage industries and strengthening of vocational training; and general improvement in the quality of life by strengthening legal initiatives in connection with community projects.

A public investment programme, 1986-1990, was outlined as part of the overall development plan, intended to be adjusted annually. Of the total amount of the programme—some $1.4 billion—55 per cent would be in foreign currency. By sector, 39 per cent would go to agriculture, 25 per cent to transport, 15 per cent to industry (including mining and energy) and 21 per cent to other sectors. In addition, the private sector would provide about $500 million.

The Consultative Group for Madagascar, organized on behalf of the Government by the World Bank, held its third meeting during 1986 (Paris, 24 and 25 April), with 22 countries and organizations in attendance. The cost of the successful effort to reduce fiscal and balance-of-payments deficits had been a reduction in consumption and investment, leading to increased unemployment and deteriorating social conditions. The Group agreed that renewed growth was urgent and that Madagascar needed substantial external support for its actions to strengthen the economy. Such support would have to be provided by a combination of a higher level of ODA, especially in the form of quick-disbursing aid, and debt rescheduling. Donors said they expected to provide more than $650 million during 1986 and 1987.

Mozambique

In a September 1986 report⁽⁵⁾ requested by the General Assembly in 1985,⁽⁵⁸⁾ the Secretary-General said that, although Mozambique was relatively richly endowed, it confronted severe obstacles in its efforts to promote economic and social development. Social and economic conditions had been steadily deteriorating since the early 1980s, particularly from 1982, when the country began to experience sabotage, terrorism and a major disruption in its social life as a result of externally supported acts of destabilization. Those conditions brought a decline in agricultural production of more than 50 per cent between 1981 and 1986.

As a whole, the country's economy exhibited a decline in GDP (in real terms) of 10.6 per cent per annum during the period 1981 to 1986. That corresponded to a decrease in per capita income of 12.8 per cent a year, meaning that per capita income had more than halved during that period and had been accompanied by worsening living conditions for the majority of the population. In real terms, private consumption declined by 14 per cent between 1981 and 1986 and public consumption by 24 per cent.

Among factors cited in the report which negatively affected Mozambique's development were: a colonial heritage of an economic structure geared to service other countries, resulting in neglect of domestic production for domestic consumption; a geo-political situation that had required sacrifices as well as the major expenditure of scarce resources in a continuing effort to achieve peace and security for its inhabitants; and several years of natural disasters, including droughts, floods and cyclones. The effects of the recent drought, which disrupted the lives and livelihood of more than 2 million people, continued to be felt. The internal security situation, characterized by attacks of armed insurgents, often against the internal logistics system, and the distribution of inputs necessary for agriculture continued to thwart many of the Government's development efforts.

More than 42 per cent of total government expenditures in 1986 were for defence and security, compared with 37.4 per cent in 1985. The 1986 plan and budget envisaged a 13 per cent GDP growth rate, with family agriculture growing by 29 per cent and industry by 7 per cent. Overall, private consumption was planned to reach its 1984 level, implying an increase of 40 per cent over 1985. Even if those targets for 1986 were met, the overall economy would not reach its pre-1984 levels.

The country had a critical balance-of-payments situation, reflecting the continuing economic deterioration of the country. Insurgency activities had led to severely disrupted marketing, resulting in shortages of agricultural inputs and consumer goods for sale in rural areas and administrative and transport problems.

In terms of food security, Mozambique expected, as at April 1986, to require 674,782 metric tons of cereal. That would be offset by 93,000 tons from internal marketing, 50,000 tons of commercial imports, 22,050 tons of food aid and an additional 121,400 tons of food aid pledges, leaving a gap of 388,332 tons of maize, wheat and rice.

An estimated 1.8 million people remained affected by adverse conditions in Mozambique, in addition to the 3 million people in urban areas who depended on food supplies.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 41/197 by recorded vote.

Assistance to Mozambique

The General Assembly,

Recalling Security Council resolution 386(1976) of 17 March 1976 and General Assembly resolutions 31/43 of 1 December 1976, 32/95 of 13 December 1977, 33/126 of 19 December 1978, 34/129 of 14 December 1979, 35/99 of 5 December 1980, 36/215 of 17 December 1981, 37/161 of 17 December 1982, 38/208 of 20 December 1983, 39/199 of 17 December 1984 and 40/232 of 17 December 1985,

Considering that Mozambique still ranks among the first fifteen countries most in need of international special assistance in the world, according to the report of the Secretary-General and the report of the Secretary-General on the activities of the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for the measures he has taken to organize an international economic assistance programme for Mozambique;

2. Also expresses its appreciation for the assistance provided to Mozambique by various States and regional and international organizations and humanitarian institutions;

3. Appeals to the international community to continue to provide adequate financial, material and technical assistance to Mozambique;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 41/192 of 8 December 1986:

(a) To continue his efforts to mobilize the necessary financial, technical and material assistance to Mozambique;

(b) To keep the situation in Mozambique under constant review, to maintain close contact with Member States, the specialized agencies, regional and other intergovernmental organizations, international financial institutions and other bodies concerned, and to apprise the Economic and Social Council, at its second regular session of 1988, of the current status of the special programme of economic assistance for Mozambique;

(c) To prepare, on the basis of consultations with the Government of Mozambique, a report on the development of the economic situation and the implementation of the special programme of economic assistance for that country in time for the matter to be considered by the General Assembly at its forty-third session.

8 December 1986 Meeting 100 152-1 (recorded vote)

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/936) without vote, 19 November (meeting 33); 53-nation draft (A/C.2/41/L.41), orally revised following informal consultations; agenda item 82.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Costa Rica, Cote d'Ivoire, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: United States.

Following the recorded vote, which was requested by the United States, Norway, also on behalf of Finland and Sweden, said they regretted the vote since the Second Committee had always approved the drafts on special economic assistance by consensus, and hoped that such action did not set a precedent for the Assembly's future work. Nicaragua stated that the United States breaking of the consensus in the Second Committee was an attempt to cover up its isolation in that Committee with regard to another matter, which had nothing to do with the draft resolution on assistance. The German Democratic Republic, also on behalf of Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Mongolia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, said that this and other draft resolutions concerned special programmes of assistance to developing countries which needed them and were in some cases among the least developed; that assistance should be given on the basis of objective criteria and not subjected to biased positions.

Sierra Leone

In a September 1986 report,⁽⁴⁾ requested by the General Assembly in 1985,⁽³⁹⁾ the Secretary-General said Sierra Leone had decided to introduce new corrective measures in 1986/87 in response to its serious economic difficulties.

A later report⁽⁴⁷⁾ described the annual income level of a large part of the population of Sierra Leone, classified as least developed, at well below $390. The level of social development was low as well, with an illiteracy rate of 80 to 85 per cent, a high rate of child and maternal mortality and low life expectancy at birth.

The country had the potential to achieve self-sustaining growth, according to the report, as much of the land was suitable for agriculture, having the advantages of high crop diversity and low population pressure. Agriculture provided employment for about 65 per cent of the work force, accounting for over 30 per cent of GDP and 35 per cent of export earnings. Sierra Leone was endowed with mineral deposits, including diamonds, bauxite and rutile. Iron ore had been mined in the past and there was a very modest output of gold. The mining sector accounted for 65 per cent of export earnings. Excellent possibilities for developing hydropower also existed.

After experiencing a growth rate of about 4 per cent per annum during the 1970s, Sierra Leone's economy had virtually stagnated since the global recession of the early 1980s. Although statistical data for the country were incomplete, they indicated trends of accelerating economic decline and increasing imbalances and distortions. Smuggling of diamonds and other exports had reduced the availability of foreign exchange to pay for essential imports and meet debt payment and commercial obligations, in addition to reducing government revenue from taxes on trade. Substantial fiscal and balance-of-payments deficits, hyperinflation, low morale among civil servants, low worker productivity, especially in agriculture, owing to an over-valued currency and low producer prices, a waning of investor confidence, a run-down condition of productive plants and a shortage of industrial inputs characterized the country's economy.

After negotiations with IMF, the Government reached agreement in mid-1986 to undertake a package of economic stabilization measures. Wide-ranging reforms in economic and fiscal policies were initiated as the country aimed for an annual growth rate of 3 per cent, a substantial reduction in the rate of inflation to some 10 to 15 per cent in 1988/89, and a reduction in the external account deficit from an estimated 4 per cent of GDP in 1986/87 to about 2 per cent in 1988/89.

The Government floated the national unit of currency, the leone, on 27 June, which resulted in a drop in the exchange rate against the United States dollar by year-end 1986. Other stabilization measures included: liberalization of the import licensing régime; elimination of subsidies; a successful rescheduling of external debt arrears; implementation of a flexible interest rate policy; expenditure control; increased producer prices; tax reform and fiscal reviews; and restructuring of public enterprises, including the establishment in August of a Public Enterprises Monitoring Unit.

ODA and multilateral concessional lending together accounted for about one third of Sierra Leone's total debt outstanding of about $670 million (as at year-end 1985), with use of IMF credit accounting for $78 million. The possibility of a stand-by arrangement and of a structural adjustment credit was being discussed with IMF and the World Bank, respectively. A number of major donors had continued to suspend loan disbursements for their development projects because of the country's failure to meet scheduled monthly payments on its debt obligations.

Sierra Leone initiated a three-year public investment programme for 1986-1989, for which total investment was estimated at $337 million at September 1986 prices and exchange rate. Almost 24 per cent of that investment was in the agricultural sector, with emphasis on expansion of output of food and commercial crops. A further 50 per cent of the total projected investment had been allocated to physical infrastructures, particularly electricity and roads, and some 10 per cent would be for the social sector, including health and education projects.

Sierra Leone continued discussions with the World Bank on the rationalization of aid co-ordination, an area that needed improvement due to the fragmented and diffused existing co-ordination mechanism within the Government.

For General Assembly action regarding economic assistance to Sierra Leone, see resolution 41/200.

Uganda

In a September 1986 report⁽⁶⁰⁾ requested by the General Assembly in 1985,⁽⁶¹⁾ the Secretary-General described a mission that visited Uganda in July/August 1986. The mission, led by the Under-Secretary-General for Special Political Questions and a special adviser to UNDP, reviewed the general economic situation and discussed actions undertaken by the Government to restore political stability and respect for human rights as well as to initiate economic reconstruction and development. Specific areas were identified, requiring, as a matter of priority, assistance from the international community, and conclusions and recommendations were made with regard to international support for Uganda's development efforts.

The new Government had a 10-point programme, which included broad-based support for human rights aimed at creating a peaceful and prosperous future for the people of Uganda. Substantial international support would be needed for the immediate problems of emergency relief and priority rehabilitation and to lay the basis for more long-term development. Prospects for a speedy economic recovery were particularly good in Uganda, the report said, due to a combination of favourable physical features, an abundant natural resource endowment and good human resource potential.

Uganda's war-shattered economy was characterized by physical destruction and the disruption of normal economic and social services, with much of the infrastructure and productive capacity having been destroyed. Thousands of Ugandans had fled into neighbouring countries and even more were displaced within the country.

The Government launched an Emergency Relief and Rehabilitation Programme in February 1986, which had three aims: to provide immediate assistance to displaced persons; to restore services which had been disrupted by war; and to make available emergency inputs for the production of essential commodities and services. Resettlement of refugees and displaced persons was emphasized.

The mission's report cited Uganda's exceptional potential for development, reflected in the fundamental strength of the country's economy, especially its capacity in normal times to achieve more than self-sufficiency in food production, as well as production of valuable cash crops for export. Food aid had actually played a relatively limited role in current emergency relief. Another asset was the enthusiasm of the Ugandan people to resume agricultural production and to participate in the informal sector, which was involved in the production of durable consumer goods in substitution for scarce imports.

Although fully supporting the Government's efforts to obtain full funding for the entire Programme, the mission, in consultation with the Government, identified certain priority areas for action: repatriation and resettlement of refugees and displaced persons; restoration of economic and social infrastructure, including emergency action to restore facilities in health, water and sanitation, education, housing and roads; and restoration of agriculture and livestock production as well as industrial enterprises.

The report concluded that the initial phase of economic recovery would be difficult and protracted, requiring great ingenuity by the Ugandan Government and people and a great deal of understanding and financial and material support from the international community. The Government had so far been able to facilitate the repatriation of refugees, relocate displaced persons and set the country on the road to economic recovery.

A later report⁽⁴⁷⁾ said government estimates indicated a fall in Uganda's GDP of 11 per cent in real terms between 1970 and 1985, a decline in agricultural output of 30 per cent and a drop in manufacturing of 50 per cent. Uganda, a former exporter of sugar, had come to import almost all of its sugar requirements and it was no longer able to export edible oil, fertilizers, textiles, ground-nuts and cotton-seed cakes. By January 1986, foreign exchange reserves had dwindled to the equivalent of less than two weeks of 1984/85 imports.

Industrial plants were idled by the shortage of raw materials, spare parts and equipment.

Growth in output and exports of coffee (from which 95 per cent of export revenues were derived) continued to be constrained by general shortages and transport bottle-necks. Coffee prices on the world market were expected to fall sharply, affecting export revenues from that commodity. Some 4,975 tons of processed tea were expected to be exported in 1986, more than four times as much as in 1985. The low level of cotton production in 1986, barely 10 per cent of the output of 1972/73, reflected difficulties being experienced by farmers as a result of pricing policies, marketing inadequacies, late payments, poor roads and other factors.

The budget for 1986/87 provided for a deficit of 6 per cent of GDP. Since financing of the deficit came mostly from the banking sector, the doubling of the money supply caused the 12-month inflation rate to reach 300 per cent by December 1986. For a brief period between June and August 1986, the country returned to dual exchange rates, but, by late August, the rate was unified and subsequently a parallel currency market developed.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December 1986, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/195 by recorded vote.

Assistance to Uganda

The General Assembly,

Recalling its previous resolutions and its decision 40/453 of 17 December 1985 on assistance to Uganda,

Recognizing that the Government of Uganda, which came to power in January 1986, is facing the arduous tasks of rehabilitation and reconstruction following years of conflict that have resulted in tragic loss of life, ravaging of the country's socio-economic infrastructure and uprooting of large segments of its population,

Taking into account the Emergency Relief and Rehabilitation Programme launched by the Government in February 1986 and the interim macro-economic measures announced in July 1986,

Noting that a special programme of economic assistance has been formulated covering short-term emergency and rehabilitation needs, including restoration of services such as health, water and sanitation, education, housing and roads, and rehabilitation of the agriculture and livestock sectors, as well as productive industrial enterprises,

Recognizing that Uganda is not only land-locked, but also one of the least developed and most seriously affected countries,

Noting the appeals made by the Secretary-General for assistance to Uganda,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General, presenting a special programme of economic assistance for international funding,

Reaffirming the urgent need for further international action to assist the Government of Uganda in its continuing efforts for national reconstruction, rehabilitation and development,

Encouraged that the economic policies of the Government of Uganda and the support assistance provided by the donor countries and international organizations have already produced positive signs of economic recovery,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for the steps he has taken to mobilize assistance for Uganda;

2. Also expresses its appreciation to those States and organizations that have provided assistance to Uganda;

3. Endorses the assessment and recommendations contained in the appendix to the report of the Secretary-General;

4. Invites the international community, the United Nations system and donor countries and organizations to make available more resources to implement the country's Emergency Relief and Rehabilitation Programme, the interim macro-economic measures and the special programme of economic assistance;

5. Urgently renews its appeal to all Member States, the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system and international economic and financial institutions to contribute generously, through bilateral and multilateral channels, to the reconstruction, rehabilitation and development needs of Uganda and to its emergency and rehabilitation requirements;

6. Requests the appropriate organizations and programmes of the United Nations system to maintain and increase in so far as possible their current and future programmes of assistance to Uganda and to report periodically to the Secretary-General on the steps they have taken and the resources they have made available to help that country;

7. Invites the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the United Nations Children's Fund, the United Nations Development Programme, the World Food Programme, the International Fund for Agricultural Development, the International Labour Organisation, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the World Health Organization, the World Bank and the United Nations Industrial Development Organization to bring to the attention of their governing bodies, for their consideration, the special needs of Uganda and to report the decisions of those bodies to the Secretary-General;

8. Requests the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to continue his humanitarian assistance programmes in Uganda, in particular the task of repatriation and resettlement, which involves the return of refugees and displaced persons to their former habitat and the emergency provision to them of, inter alia, food, medicine, clothing and shelter;

9. Requests the Secretary-General, in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 41/192 of 8 December 1986:

(a) To continue his efforts to mobilize the necessary resources for an effective programme of financial, technical and material assistance to Uganda;

(b) To keep the situation in Uganda under constant review, to maintain close contact with Member States, the specialized agencies, regional and other intergovernmental organizations and the international financial institutions concerned, and to apprise the Economic and Social Council, at its second regular session of 1987, of the current status of the special programme of economic assistance for Uganda;

(c) To report on the implementation of the present resolution to the General Assembly at its forty-second session.

General Assembly resolution 41/195

8 December 1986 Meeting 100 150-1 (recorded vote)

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/936) without vote, 19 November (meeting 33); 12-nation draft (A/C.2/41/L.38), orally revised following informal consultations; agenda item 82.

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 2nd Committee 18, 19, 22, 23, 26-29, 33; plenary 100.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Costa Rica, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: United States.

Following the vote, Uganda expressed surprise that the text, which had been approved by consensus in the Second Committee, had been the subject of a United States request for a separate vote in plenary. The text merely drew the Assembly's attention to the situation that existed in Uganda. Since no explanation had been given as to why there should have been a vote against the resolution, Uganda could only conclude that there had perhaps been an expression of displeasure regarding its position on international issues.

The German Democratic Republic, Nicaragua and Norway explained their positions in conjunction with the text that became resolution 41/197 (see p.465).

Countries in other regions

Democratic Yemen

In a June 1986 report⁽⁶²⁾ requested by the General Assembly in 1985,⁽⁶³⁾ the Secretary-General said unprecedented heavy rains throughout Democratic Yemen in March 1982 had caused the worst floods in many years and damage far exceeding that from flooding in 1981. There had been an estimated $950 million in damage, and the Government's Disaster Relief Committee cited some 482 deaths, 50,000 people left homeless, 25,000 houses destroyed and 50,000 livestock killed.

Immediate relief assistance was provided on a bilateral basis from 11 countries, from numerous Red Cross/Red Crescent societies and from five United Nations organizations. In response to the 1985 Assembly resolution.⁽⁶³⁾ extensive bilateral and multilateral rehabilitation or reconstruction programmes had been implemented and most of the long-term ones were either finished or nearing completion.

Civil disturbances in January 1986 unexpectedly delayed a number of flood-control and rehabilitation projects that were scheduled for completion during the year. Following Democratic Yemen's request for international assistance, UNDRO launched an appeal for first-aid and medical material. Following an assessment of relief needs and co-ordination of assistance by a five-member UNDRO team, the Office organized a special flight for the transport of relief supplies urgently needed to replenish stocks severely depleted by the civil strife.

For General Assembly action regarding economic assistance to Democratic Yemen, see resolution 41/200.

El Salvador

On 8 December 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 41/194 without vote.

Assistance to El Salvador

The General Assembly,

Bearing in mind its resolution 41/2 of 14 October 1986 concerning emergency assistance to El Salvador,

Recalling its resolution 3440(XXX) of 9 December 1975 on assistance in cases of natural disaster and other disaster situations, resolution 36/225 of 17 December 1981 on strengthening the capacity of the United Nations system to respond to natural disasters, and resolution 37/144 of 17 December 1982 on the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator,

Noting with satisfaction the support that Member States, the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system have given to the efforts of the Government of El Salvador to render immediate assistance to the population affected by the natural disaster,

Bearing in mind that, in recent years, the economy of El Salvador has been adversely affected by various events and natural disasters, such as the earthquake of 10 October 1986,

Considering that, despite the efforts of the Government and people of El Salvador, the country's economic situation has not returned to normal,

Deeply concerned that El Salvador is experiencing serious economic difficulties directly affecting its development efforts,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his efforts regarding immediate assistance to El Salvador;

2. Also expresses its appreciation to the States and organizations that have provided assistance to El Salvador;

3. Urges all Governments to continue contributing to the reconstruction and development of El Salvador through bilateral and multilateral channels;

4. Appeals to all States and appropriate organizations of the United Nations system, in particular the United Nations Development Programme, the World Food Programme, the United Nations Children's Fund, the World Health Organization, the United Nations Fund for Population Activities, the United Nations Industrial Development Organization and the World Bank, to continue and to increase their assistance in response to the humanitarian, reconstruction and development needs of El Salvador through existing mechanisms;

5. Invites regional and interregional organizations, as well as non-governmental humanitarian organizations, urgently to consider the establishment of programmes of assistance to El Salvador and to implement them as soon as possible;

6. Invites States and organizations concerned to examine the possibility of extending to El Salvador special assistance appropriate to its needs;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to take appropriate measures, in collaboration with the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme, to mobilize the technical, financial and material assistance required for the reconstruction, rehabilitation and development of El Salvador;

8. Also requests the Secretary-General to keep the question of assistance for the reconstruction and rehabilitation of El Salvador under review, and to inform the Economic and Social Council, at its second regular session of 1987, on the progress made in the implementation of the present resolution.

Haiti

The Secretary-General reported⁽⁴⁷⁾ that Haiti's new Government, which came to power in February 1986, had taken a number of measures to address the serious economic situation prevailing there. Haiti was the only country in the Americas classified as least developed, having a per capita GDP of some $300. With the aim of stimulating the economy and liberalizing trade, the Government removed quota restrictions on a number of import items, removed import monopolies and licensing requirements (except on sugar), and reduced or eliminated export taxes on a number of commodities.

Despite an increase in agricultural output between 1984/85 and 1985/86, both in respect of locally consumed food items and export crops, indications were that agricultural production fell in 1986/87. Although assembly production increased in the period following the political changes in response to stronger demand, private investors had shown caution in the face of uncertainties; private investment had declined and industrial restructuring needs were left unmet.

Haiti's debt service (interest and reimbursement) tripled between 1980 and 1986, with payments at an annual level of $65.6 million representing about 20 per cent of its export revenues.

With assistance from the World Bank and other United Nations organizations, the new Government formulated an interim programme of development, which presented its global strategy, priorities and objectives for 1986-1988 and identified 28 short-term, mainly labour-intensive, investment projects at an estimated cost of $43 million. Development of the agricultural sector and improvement of social services were the programme's main priorities. On the fiscal side, Haiti's economic recovery programme included reform of public enterprises, the restructuring of manufacturing through tariff reform and the improved management of public finances, with special emphasis on tax reform and expenditure control.

The Government presented the programme to representatives of donor countries and agencies at a meeting convened by the Secretary-General (New York, October). In November, an aid co-ordination meeting of the Haiti subgroup of the Caribbean Group for Co-operation in Economic Development took place in Paris. Delegations expressed strong support for Haiti's economic recovery programme and announced offers of financial aid in the form of balance-of-payments support and project and technical assistance.

In June 1986, the Secretary-General appointed a Special Representative to Haiti to strengthen the Organization's presence and to ensure the effectiveness of United Nations programmes.

For General Assembly action regarding economic assistance to Haiti, see resolution 41/200.

Nicaragua

In a September 1986 report⁽⁶⁴⁾ the Secretary-General reported on assistance provided to Nicaragua, as requested by the General Assembly in 1985.⁽⁶⁵⁾ The report showed that multilateral agencies and bilateral sources had pledged $756 million in 1985 and $3,497 million between 1979 and 1984. A total of $278,310,000 in external bilateral non-reimbursable assistance was given from 1980 to 31 May 1986.

In response to a request from the Secretary-General for information on assistance provided to Nicaragua, details of grants and loans provided to it were received from Czechoslovakia, Denmark, the German Democratic Republic and Italy. Total assistance provided by the organs, organizations and agencies of the United Nations system to Nicaragua from 19 July 1979 to 1 May 1986 amounted to $285,239,149. Assistance from May 1985 to May 1986 amounted to $26,709,869.

A later report⁽⁴⁷⁾ of the Secretary-General stated that Nicaragua's economy had been adversely affected by a number of events and natural disasters, including a drought in May, June and July 1986. A total of $231.3 million had been pledged in 1986 by multilateral agencies and bilateral sources and $271.4 million was donated in external bilateral non-reimbursable assistance.

For General Assembly action regarding economic assistance to Nicaragua, see resolution 41/200.

Vanuatu

In a September 1986 report⁽⁵⁾ requested by the General Assembly in 1985,⁽⁶⁾ the Secretary-General described the economic situation and special development projects of Vanuatu, an archipelagic LDC, in relation to its special programme of economic assistance.

In a later report,⁽⁴⁷⁾ the Secretary-General described Vanuatu's dualistic economy of agriculture and services, its geographical fragmentation and its demographic isolation as contributing to formidable development problems. During 1986, declines in real GNP were experienced as world prices for copra, Vanuatu's main export, decreased, tourism declined and marketing problems arose in the export of beef and fish.

High dependence on external trade led to a deterioration of Vanuatu's fiscal position in 1986, as it experienced a budget deficit of some 8 per cent of GDP during the year. The deficits were financed largely by a sizeable drawdown of government reserves and deposits in the banking system.

On 23 October, the national unit of currency, the vatu, was devalued in an effort to combat reduced export and tourism earnings, discourage imports and encourage investment.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/200 by recorded vote.

Assistance to Benin, the Central African Republic, the Comoros, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, the Gambia, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Madagascar, Nicaragua, Sierra Leone and Vanuatu

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 39/196 of 17 December 1984 on economic assistance to Haiti, as well as resolutions 40/215 on assistance to Democratic Yemen, 40/216 on assistance to Equatorial Guinea, 40/217 on assistance for the reconstruction, rehabilitation and development of the Central African Republic, 40/220 on assistance to Sierra Leone, 40/222 on special economic assistance to Benin, 40/223 on assistance to the Comoros, 40/224 on assistance to the Gambia, 40/225 on special economic assistance to Guinea-Bissau, 40/227 on assistance to Djibouti, 40/230 on assistance to Madagascar, 40/233 on economic assistance to Vanuatu, 40/234 on assistance to Nicaragua and 40/235 on special economic assistance to Guinea, all of 17 December 1985.

Having considered the relevant reports of the Secretary-General,

Noting with satisfaction the financial, economic and technical support that Member States, the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system and regional, interregional and intergovernmental organizations have provided to those countries,

Deeply concerned that those countries continue to face special economic and financial difficulties owing to a variety of factors,

Noting the efforts made by Democratic Yemen in its rehabilitation and reconstruction programmes in response to the devastating consequences of the floods in 1982,

Noting the particularly difficult problems faced by island developing countries in responding to negative and special economic circumstances, as referred to in General Assembly resolution 41/163 of 5 December 1986 on specific measures in favour of island developing countries,

Noting with concern that Vanuatu is an island developing country, that it is a geographically remote archipelago with a small but rapidly growing and unevenly distributed population, that it has a severe shortage of development capital and declining budgetary support from present donors, that its dependence on imports is overwhelming and that it has a scarcity of adequate transportation and communication links, all of which pose special development problems, making the provision of services difficult and entailing very high overhead costs,

Deeply concerned that Benin continues to experience serious economic and financial difficulties, characterized by a marked balance-of-payments disequilibrium, the heavy burden of its external debt and a lack of resources necessary for the implementation of its planned economic and social development programme,

Noting in particular that, despite the progress achieved recently in re-establishing economic stability, the situation in the Central African Republic remains precarious, as the Secretary-General emphasized in his report, which notes that the results achieved by the Government of the Central African Republic in the context of the national action programme it has adopted are encouraging, and that more external assistance is required to finance the remainder of the projects as indicated in table 2 of the report, and appealing to the international community, including international organizations, to participate at a high level of representation at the round table of the Central African Republic's development partners to be held at Bangui in December 1986,

Deeply concerned that the Comoros continues to face serious economic difficulties arising from its geographical isolation and scarcity of natural resources, compounded by the recent drought and frequent cyclones,

Noting also that adverse climatic conditions that impede any meaningful agricultural activities, the lingering effects of recurrent drought and the presence of large numbers of refugees have a devastating impact on the economic and social development of Djibouti,

Noting that the instability of export markets for the principal exports of Equatorial Guinea—coffee, cocoa and wood—has affected its ability to finance its pressing needs and bearing in mind that country's continuing need for international assistance to complement its own national development efforts,

Noting further that, owing to the lack of external financial assistance, the Government of the Gambia has not been able to implement the six projects recommended by the Secretary-General in his report submitted to the General Assembly at its thirty-ninth session,

Noting that Guinea continues to face serious difficulties in the implementation of its interim programme of economic rehabilitation for the period 1985-1987,

Noting in particular that, in spite of efforts of the Government of Guinea-Bissau to rehabilitate its economy, the economic and financial situation of the country, which has been worsened by drought and desertification, impedes the economic and social development process,

Noting that the Government of Haiti urgently requires international assistance to finance its interim programme of development to enable it to reinforce the productive capacities of the country, reduce unemployment, promote education, reinforce health coverage and strengthen public administration,

Noting that Madagascar's economic and social development efforts are being thwarted by the adverse effects of the cyclones and floods that afflict that country periodically, particularly those of December 1983 and January and April 1984, and that the implementation of reconstruction and rehabilitation programmes requires the mobilization of sizeable resources exceeding the country's real possibilities,

Noting also that, in recent years, the economy of Nicaragua has been adversely affected by various events and natural disasters, such as drought, the intense rains and floods of 1982, a sequence of natural disasters repeated during June, July, October and November 1985, and the drought of May, June and July 1986, all of which have worsened and impeded the normalization of its economic situation,

Noting further that the severe socio-economic problems experienced by Sierra Leone, manifested, inter alia, in a continuous decline, since 1980, in real gross domestic product per capita and in investments, are intractable without urgent and generous international economic assistance, and that the Government of Sierra Leone recently introduced far-reaching stabilization and structural adjustment measures, including floating the national currency from June 1986, eliminating subsidies for petroleum products and rice, liberalizing the import licensing regime, and increasing producer prices of major agricultural commodities as an incentive for greater production,

Noting that Benin, the Central African Republic, the Comoros, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, the Gambia, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Sierra Leone and Vanuatu are classified as least developed countries,

Having heard the statements of Member States at the forty-first session of the General Assembly on the situations currently prevailing in those countries,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for the steps he has taken to mobilize resources for carrying out the special programmes of economic assistance for those countries;

2. Also expresses its appreciation for the assistance provided or pledged to those countries by Member States, the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system and regional, interregional and intergovernmental organizations;

3. Further expresses its appreciation for the efforts made by the Governments of those countries to overcome their economic and financial difficulties;

4. Notes with concern that the assistance made available to those countries has fallen short of their urgent requirements and that additional assistance is still needed;

5. Reaffirms the need for all Governments and international organizations to honour the commitments undertaken within the framework of the Substantial New Programme of Action for the 1980s for the Least Developed Countries;

6. Appeals to Member States, international financial institutions, the specialized agencies and organizations and programmes of the United Nations system to respond generously and urgently to the needs of those countries as identified in the reports of the Secretary-General;

7. Invites the international community to contribute to the special accounts established at United Nations Headquarters by the Secretary-General for the purpose of facilitating the channelling of contributions to the countries facing special difficulties;

8. Urgently appeals to all international organizations, in particular the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system, regional organizations, humanitarian organizations and voluntary agencies to continue and increase, to the extent possible, their assistance in response to the reconstruction, economic recovery and development needs of those countries;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps in collaboration with the programmes, organs and agencies of the United Nations system, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 41/192 of 8 December 1986 on special programmes of economic assistance, to provide assistance for all disasters, natural or otherwise, striking those countries and to mobilize the necessary resources to enable them to meet their short-, medium- and long-term needs;

10. Further requests the Secretary-General to keep the question of assistance to those countries and their economic situation under review and to report to the General Assembly at its forty-second session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/936) without vote, 19 November (meeting 33); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/41/L55/Rev.D, based on informal consultations; agenda item 82.

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 2nd Committee 18, 19, 22, 23, 26-29, 33; plenary 100.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Costa Rica, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: None.

Abstaining: United States.

Separate votes were requested by the United States on the fifth, fifteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth preambular paragraphs of the draft resolution. Democratic Yemen objected to that request because the draft was comprehensive and a consensus had been reached in the Second Committee. Referring to the Assembly's rules of procedure, the President asked if Democratic Yemen wished to move to vote on the request that parts of the draft be voted on separately. Democratic Yemen formally moved to request a vote. The United States opposed the proposal, calling for separate votes on the paragraphs. The Syrian Arab Republic supported the proposal that no separate vote be taken on the paragraphs in question. Liberia supported the motion against the taking of separate votes. The motion against division was adopted by a recorded vote of 122 to 1, with 22 abstentions.

Speaking in explanation of vote, the United States said that, if given the opportunity, it would have voted against the fifth, fifteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth preambular paragraphs.

Democratic Yemen said the resolution was a landmark in a sense because for the first time the Second Committee had produced an omnibus resolution on economic assistance. The United States had not asked for a separate vote when the Committee had adopted the draft by consensus and it had been the understanding of all participating delegations that there would not be a separate vote.

Madagascar said the seventeenth preambular paragraph had merely noted the adverse effects of natural disasters which had struck it and it was a surprise that a separate vote had been requested.

The German Democratic Republic, Nicaragua and Norway explained their positions in conjunction with the text that became resolution 41/197 (see p. 465), while Uganda explained its position in conjunction with the text that became resolution 41/195 (see p. 468).

Disasters

During 1986, UNDRO continued to co-ordinate the response of the United Nations system to disaster and emergency situations. Activities related to disaster preparedness and prevention rose significantly during the year as UNDRO advised developing countries on strengthening their national emergency services.

The General Assembly (decision 41/455) and the Economic and Social Council (resolution 1986/45) called for assistance to deal with the needs of countries in East Africa affected by desertification and drought. The Assembly also requested United Nations organizations to assist Mauritania to prepare an action plan to combat desertification and drought (decision 41/456). Assistance to African countries in their fight against locust and grasshopper infestation was also called for by the Assembly (resolution 41/185).

Disasters in other regions elicited calls from the Assembly for emergency relief to El Salvador following an earthquake (resolution 41/2) and to Solomon Islands following a cyclone (resolution 41/193).

Office of the UN Disaster Relief Co-ordinator

UNDRO activities

During 1986, as in previous years, UNDRO covered all aspects of disaster relief as well as preparedness and prevention activities. In a report(1) on UNDRO activities for the biennium 1986-1987, the Secretary-General stated that, in addition to its involvement in African countries where emergency situations persisted, UNDRO was called on to act in a wide variety of other disaster situations, many of which caused extensive devastation and some of which were of a complex nature, including a number which were in part or entirely due to armed conflict. Special attention was given to relief needs unlikely to be covered locally, for which the Office acted in close consultation with governmental and non-governmental organizations both in the field and at Geneva where UNDRO had its headquarters.

The disaster relief co-ordination subprogramme constituted the core of UNDRO activities and received the highest priority in the allocation of human and financial resources. UNDRO's role in disaster situations was to mobilize and co-ordinate relief assistance, provide an independent assessment of damage and needs and keep the donor community informed of developments.

In order to reinforce co-operation with the national emergency relief services for foreign disaster assistance, and to make maximum use of their collective experience and advice, it was decided to hold meetings of heads of those services on a periodic basis. The first meeting was held at Geneva from 18 to 20 June 1986 with the heads of some 20 services responsible for mobilizing and co-ordinating their country's response to appeals for international assistance. Successes and weaknesses of a number of international relief operations were examined and suggestions were made on ways to improve the immediate assessment of damage and to identify emergency needs as well as to develop and carry out concerted relief programmes.

Contributions in 1986 for disasters in 26 countries which affected some 23 million persons totalled $888.1 million, as compared to $1,802 million in 1985. More than half ($551.6 million) of the contributions in 1986 were donated to Ethiopia in the wake of drought and civil strife occurring prior to that year.

Major disasters requiring the involvement of UNDRO in 1986 included: locust infestations in Africa (see p. 483); widespread flooding due to heavy rains in Bolivia, Haiti and Peru; an emission of toxic gas from volcanic Lake Nyos in Cameroon; an earthquake in El Salvador (see p. 482); drought in Ethiopia (see p. 479); a devastating fire in Haiti's capital of Port-au-Prince; continued fighting in Lebanon (see p. 485); and civil strife in Democratic Yemen (see p. 468).

A report of the Secretary-General on UNDRO activities in 1985(2) was submitted to the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly in May 1986.

UNDRO financing

UNDRO activities continued to be financed mainly from the United Nations regular budget and voluntary contributions to the UNDRO Trust Fund and the United Nations Trust Fund for General Disaster Relief. For the biennium 1986-1987, the General Assembly in 1985⁽³⁾ had appropriated an amount of $5,708,300.

Expenditures under the Trust Funds totalled $11,957,034 in 1986, which included $8,723,505 as disaster relief assistance to 32 countries. In addition, the UNDRO Trust Fund had sub-accounts for the strengthening of UNDRO, disaster relief assistance earmarked for certain countries or regions, and disaster prevention and pre-disaster planning. Contributions from 25 Governments totalled $8,013,286 in 1986.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July 1986, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1986/47 without vote, based on the recommendation of its Third Committee.

Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 2816(XXVI) of 14 December 1971, by which the Assembly established the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator and, inter alia, recognized the need to ensure prompt, effective and efficient responses, in times of natural disasters and other disaster situations, that would bring to bear the resources of the United Nations system, prospective donor countries and voluntary agencies,

Recalling also General Assembly resolution 36/225 of 17 December 1981, by which the General Assembly reaffirmed the mandate of the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator, called for the strengthening and improvement of the capacity and effectiveness of the Office, and stressed the need to ensure prompt delivery of concerted relief through an efficient and effective co-ordination system of humanitarian and disaster relief assistance,

Recalling further General Assembly resolution 37/144 of 17 December 1982 and other relevant resolutions and decisions, including Economic and Social Council resolutions 1983/47 of 28 July 1983 and 1984/60 of 26 July 1984, in which the Assembly and the Council, inter alia, stressed the need to strengthen and improve the capacity and effectiveness of the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator in order to attain an effective co-ordination system of humanitarian and disaster relief assistance, and recognizing that, as a result of those resolutions and decisions, there is now in place a workable system to promote, facilitate and co-ordinate relief activities carried out by the United Nations system, in co-operation with Governments and voluntary agencies,

Convinced that the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator is in a special position, with adequate staff and facilities, to provide a world-wide system of mobilizing and co-ordinating disaster relief, including the collection and dissemination of information on disaster assessment, priority needs and donor assistance,

Recognizing in this connection the importance of the contribution of the International Committee of the Red Cross, the League of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies and competent voluntary and non-governmental organizations,

Recognizing also that the primary responsibility for administration, relief operations and disaster preparedness lies with the Governments of affected countries and that the major part of the material assistance and human effort in disaster relief comes from the Governments of those countries,

Deeply concerned about the additional economic burden placed upon the developing countries by devastating natural disasters and other disaster situations, as well as the disruption of the development process in those countries,

Appreciating the contributions made by donors in supporting international relief operations, including those made to the Trust Fund of the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator,

Recognizing that shortage of resources has been one of the major constraints on an effective response of the United Nations to disaster situations and continues to hamper the full achievement of the aim of a rapid and effective response to the needs of countries affected by disasters and that, if the shortage is to be overcome, efforts will be required by the international community to provide both funds and assistance in kind,

Recalling in this regard General Assembly resolution 35/107 of 5 December 1980, in which the Assembly reaffirmed the necessity of ensuring a continued sound financial basis for the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator,

Noting with appreciation that the agreements between the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator and other organizations of the United Nations system, including the United Nations Development Programme, which define areas and means of co-operation, have helped to strengthen the collective response of the United Nations system to disasters,

1. Welcomes the decision of the Secretary-General to establish a working group to review the emergency response of the United Nations system, which is to make its recommendations by 31 August 1986;

2. Takes note with satisfaction of the report of the Secretary-General on the activities of the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator and of the statement made by the Co-ordinator before the Third (Programme and Co-ordination) Committee of the Council on 3 July 1986;

3. Reaffirms the sovereignty of individual Member States, recognizes the primary role of each State in caring for the victims of disasters occurring in its territory and stresses that all relief operations should be carried out and co-ordinated in a manner consistent with the priorities and needs of the countries concerned, and that the material and other assistance provided by the international community should be appropriate to the particular needs of the population of the disaster-affected areas;

4. Recognizes the importance of disaster preparedness and prevention activities, and calls upon the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator, Governments and organizations concerned to ensure that due priority attention is given to them;

5. Reaffirms the mandate of the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator, established by the General Assembly in resolution 2816(XXVI) as the focal point in the United Nations system for disaster relief co-ordination, and calls for reinforcing and improving the capacity and effectiveness of the Office;

6. Affirms that the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator plays an active role in executing United Nations Development Programme-assisted projects in the field of disaster preparedness;

7. Reiterates its call to all Governments and competent organs and organizations to co-operate with the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator in order to improve, in particular, the flow of information to Governments and organizations concerned, so that a more complete picture of relief activities, assistance received and further requirements may be provided to all concerned;

8. Calls upon those contributing assistance in kind to provide, when appropriate, special grants to cover the cost of transport and distribution of the assistance to and within the affected country;

9. Requests the Secretary-General and the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator to intensify their efforts to mobilize additional voluntary resources to meet the needs arising from disaster and emergency situations;

10. Appeals to Governments for urgent voluntary contributions, channelled directly or through the Trust Fund of the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator, to enable the Office to cover, inter alia, unforeseen expenses in connection with disaster relief operations;

11. Recommends that, as the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator phases out his responsibility for disaster relief co-ordination in a given country, he should contribute to ensuring the necessary transition to the rehabilitation and reconstruction phase by passing on relevant data to competent organs and agencies of the United Nations system;

12. Emphasizes the essential need for the work of the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator to be placed and kept on a sound financial basis, and calls upon the international community to respond positively and expeditiously to the appeal of the Secretary-General for contributions to the Trust Fund to meet natural disasters and other disaster situations;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report on the implementation of the present resolution to the General Assembly at its forty-third session, through the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session of 1988.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December, the Assembly adopted resolution 41/201 without vote, on the recommendation of the Second Committee.

Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 2816(XXVI) of 14 December 1971, by which it established the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator and, inter alia, recognized the need to ensure prompt, effective and efficient responses, in times of natural disaster and other disaster situations, that would bring to bear the resources of the United Nations system, prospective donor countries and voluntary agencies,

Recalling also its resolution 36/225 of 17 December 1981, by which it reaffirmed the mandate of the Office of the Co-ordinator, called for the strengthening and improvement of the capacity and effectiveness of the Office, and stressed the need to ensure prompt delivery of concerted relief through an efficient and effective co-ordination system of humanitarian and disaster relief assistance,

Recalling further its resolution 37/144 of 17 December 1982 and other relevant resolutions and decisions, including Economic and Social Council resolutions 1983/47 of 28 July 1983 and 1984/60 of 26 July 1984, in which the Assembly and the Council, inter alia, stressed the need to strengthen and improve the capacity and effectiveness of the Office of the Co-ordinator in order to attain an effective co-ordination system of humanitarian and disaster relief assistance, and recognizing that, as a result of those resolutions and decisions, there is now in place a workable system to promote, facilitate and co-ordinate, on a world-wide basis, relief activities carried out by the United Nations system, in co-operation with Governments and voluntary agencies, including the collection and dissemination of information on disaster assessment, priority needs and donor assistance,

Convinced that there is a clear distinction between immediate humanitarian emergency response and longer-term development assistance and that there is a need to respond to these in a co-ordinated manner, and noting in this regard the different nature and functions of the Office of the Co-ordinator and the United Nations Development Programme,

Noting that the number of disasters to which the United Nations system was called upon to respond has increased from twelve in 1980 to fifty-three in 1985,

Recognizing, in this connection, the importance of the contribution of the International Committee of the Red Cross, the League of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies and other competent voluntary and non-governmental organizations,

Recognizing also that the primary responsibility for administration, relief operations and disaster preparedness lies with the Governments of affected countries and that the major part of the material assistance and human effort in disaster relief comes from the Governments of those countries,

Deeply concerned about the additional economic burden placed upon the developing countries by devastating natural disasters and other disaster situations, as well as the disruption of the development process in those countries,

Appreciating the contributions made by donors to support international relief operations, including those made to the Trust Fund of the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator,

Recognizing that shortage of resources has been one of the major constraints on an effective response of the United Nations to disaster situations and continues to hamper the full achievement of the aim of a rapid and effective response to the needs of countries affected by disasters and that, if the shortage is to be overcome, efforts will be required by the international community to provide both funds and assistance in kind,

Recalling, in this regard, its resolution 35/107 of 5 December 1980, in which it reaffirmed the necessity of ensuring a continued sound financial basis for the Office of the Co-ordinator,

Noting with appreciation that the agreements between the Office of the Co-ordinator and other organizations of the United Nations system, including the United Nations Development Programme, which define areas and means of co-operation, have helped to strengthen the collective response of the United Nations system to disasters,

1. Takes note with satisfaction of the report of the Secretary-General on the activities of the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator and of the statement made by the Co-ordinator before the Second Committee on 21 October 1986;

2. Reaffirms the sovereignty of individual Member States, recognizes the primary role of each State in caring for the victims of disasters occurring in its territory and stresses that all relief operations should be carried out and co-ordinated in a manner consistent with the priorities and needs of the countries concerned, and that the material and other assistance provided by the international community should be appropriate to the particular needs of the populations of the disaster-affected areas;

3. Recognizes the importance of disaster preparedness and prevention activities, and calls upon the Office of the Co-ordinator, Governments and organizations concerned to ensure that due priority attention is given to them;

4. Reaffirms the mandate of the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator, established by the General Assembly in resolution 2816(XXVI) as the focal point in the United Nations system for disaster relief co-ordination, and calls for the reinforcement and improvement of the capacity and effectiveness of the Office, without prejudice to any decision taken by the General Assembly in the context of the review of the efficiency of the administrative and financial functioning of the United Nations;

5. Affirms that the Office of the Co-ordinator plays an active role in executing United Nations Development Programme-assisted projects in the field of disaster preparedness;

6. Reiterates its call to all Governments and competent organs and organizations to co-operate with the Office of the Co-ordinator in order to improve, in particular, the flow of information to Governments and organizations concerned, so that a more complete picture of relief activities, assistance received and further requirements may be provided to all concerned;

7. Calls upon those contributing assistance in kind to provide, when appropriate, special grants to cover the costs of transport and distribution of the assistance to and within the affected country;

8. Requests the Secretary-General and the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator to intensify their efforts to mobilize additional voluntary resources to meet the needs arising from disaster and emergency situations;

9. Appeals to Governments to make urgent voluntary contributions, directly or channelled through the Trust Fund of the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Co-ordinator, to enable the Office to cover contingency expenses in connection with disaster relief operations;

10. Recommends that, as the Co-ordinator phases out his responsibility for disaster relief co-ordination in a given country, he should contribute to ensuring the necessary transition to the rehabilitation and reconstruction phase by passing on relevant data to competent organs and agencies of the United Nations system;

11. Emphasizes the essential need for the work of the Office of the Co-ordinator to be placed and kept on a sound financial basis, and calls upon the international community to respond positively and expeditiously to the appeal of the Secretary-General for contributions to the Trust Fund to meet the needs arising from natural disasters and other disaster situations;

12. Welcomes the decision of the Secretary-General by which a working group was established to review the emergency response of the United Nations system in relation to the emergency situation in Africa;

13. Stresses, in this regard, the need to take into account the experience gained by the United Nations in responding to the emergency situation in Africa and other disaster situations, in strengthening the functioning and capacity of the United Nations in the area of emergency assistance;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report on the implementation of the present resolution, including a comprehensive review and assessment of the existing mechanisms and arrangements within the system for disaster and emergency assistance and co-ordination, to the General Assembly at its forty-second session, through the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session of 1987.

8 December 1986

Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/936) without vote, 28 November (meeting 35); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/41/L.69), based on informal consultations on draft by 83 developing countries (A/C.2/41/L.22); agenda item 82.
Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 2nd Committee 18, 19, 22, 23, 26-29, 33-35; plenary 100.

Co-ordination in the UN system

In his report covering UNDRO activities during 1986,⁽¹⁾ the Secretary-General said an inter-agency mission led by the Office in December 1986 demonstrated the growing concern for the establishment and/or the strengthening of links between emergency assistance and long-term programmes aimed at finding durable solutions for the affected people and the problems pertaining to displaced persons. The mission, in which WFP, FAO and IFAD also participated, assessed the immediate needs of displaced people from Mali and the Niger in the camps of the Algerian Sahara, and examined the prospects for settling displaced persons from Mali in their own country. Following the mission, programmes to promote the return of the displaced persons were initiated in Mali by the agencies concerned, while emergency assistance was provided in the Algerian camps.

The UNDRO warehouse at Pisa, Italy, became operational in early 1986, accommodating a wide range of standard relief goods in sectors such as shelter, logistics equipment and water supply. The full-scale use of the warehouse, made possible by the support of its main donor, the Government of Italy, greatly enhanced UNDRO's capacity to respond to emergency needs. The location of the warehouse at the Pisa airport, with facilities for any type of aircraft, made it suitable for dispatching relief supplies to disaster-stricken developing countries at short notice.

In a July report⁽⁴⁾ the Chairmen of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination (CPC) and the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC) (see p. 484) suggested that UNDRO could be re-established with a broader mandate as the central focal point for the United Nations system to deal with emergency situations. When catastrophes such as the African crisis occurred, they suggested that the Secretary-General take exceptional measures to enable the United Nations system to respond in a concerted manner.

Drought-stricken areas

In a June 1986 report⁽⁵⁾ on countries stricken by desertification and drought (see p. 659), the Secretary-General estimated that African populations living in areas undergoing desertification totalled almost 185 million, with 30 million immediately threatened by its consequences. Droughts had caused crop failures, water shortages, destruction to both animal and plant populations and famines. Despite the arrival of ample rains during the 1985/86 rainy season in various parts of Africa, some 19.2 million people, including 3 million displaced persons, continued to be affected by the emergency situation.

Sudano-Sahelian region

With the return of rains to Africa's Sudano-Sahelian region in 1986, emergency assistance tapered off. None the less, the region's underlying problems remained: low and erratic rainfall with the inevitability of recurrences of drought and fragile ecosystems subject to continual disturbances by the needs of their growing populations.

The United Nations Sudano-Sahelian Office (UNSO) continued in 1986, under the supervision of UNDP, to assist countries in medium- and long-term recovery and rehabilitation programmes and in implementing the 1977 Plan of Action to Combat Desertification.⁽⁶⁾ UNSO assistance was aimed at mitigating the effects of past and future droughts and helping all countries concerned to attain self-sufficiency in staple food production. Moreover, it worked to enhance the process of socio-economic development in drought-prone areas through activities geared to restoring or protecting the productive capacity of the land, and to arrest and reverse desertification.

In 1986, UNSO continued to undertake the construction, improvement and maintenance of a region-wide system of all-weather secondary roads in the Sahel. In that regard, it was involved in the continuing process of evaluating the medium- and long-term transport and communications requirements of the States members of the Permanent Inter-State Committee on Drought Control in the Sahel (CILSS), which covered nine West African countries—Burkina Faso, Cape Verde, Chad, the Gambia, Guinea-Bissau, Mali, Mauritania, the Niger and Senegal. By the end of the year, UNSO had supported national maintenance projects for roads constructed with its assistance in the Gambia, Mali and Senegal.

UNSO developed a regional co-operation programme to combat drought and desertification in the Sudano-Sahelian area in close collaboration with UNDP's Regional Bureaux for Africa and for Arab States. UNSO also worked with CILSS and the Intergovernmental Authority for Drought and Development (IGADD), which comprised six countries of eastern Africa—Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya, Somalia, the Sudan and Uganda. Ministers representing the IGADD countries met in Djibouti in January 1986 and presented the donor community with a regional and national action plan, consisting of 217 projects, 154 of them national projects, to provide for food security, early warning systems, desertification control and water resources development (see p. 665).

A conference held in May at Yamoussoukro, Côte d'Ivoire, on the interaction between forest and non-forest ecosystems in the Sudano-Sahelian area was supported by UNSO in co-operation with the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) and UNDP.

The UNSO programme of desertification control, carried out under a joint venture of UNDP and UNEP, emphasized several elements: combating deforestation, management of water resources, range-land management, soil protection and sand-dune fixation, and the planning needed to support those activities. As of 31 December 1986, the programme consisted of 110 ongoing projects, with a total funding of $84.9 million.

In 1986, UNSO continued its efforts to mobilize resources for the United Nations Trust Fund for Sudano-Sahelian Activities. During the year, it received firm pledges amounting to $21.2 million as contributions to the Fund earmarked for specific projects, $2 million for two projects under a standing trust-fund agreement with Sweden, and $4.9 million for UNSO general resources.

Under its drought-related mandate of recovery and rehabilitation, UNSO mobilized, in addition to the financing of regional activities from its own resources, over $3.7 million in 1986 through the Fund.

Expenditures under the Trust Fund in 1986 totalled $13,872,000 for programmes in 12 countries, a regional programme in Africa and global and inter-country components. Contributions to the Fund from 11 countries totalled $5,413,903 in 1986, while eight countries made pledges totalling $1,980,898 in 1986 for 1987 activities.

UNDP action. On 27 June,⁽⁹⁾ the UNDP Governing Council appealed to Governments to strengthen their support to UNSO and reaffirmed UNSO's role in co-ordinating United Nations efforts to help the States members of CILSS and IGADD in implementing their recovery and rehabilitation programme. The Council requested the UNDP Administrator to review the financial and staffing situation of UNSO and to continue to report annually on the programme's implementation and on the co-operation of the United Nations system in this area.

UNCTAD action. In a report⁽⁸⁾ on the drought and the external trade of the countries members of CILSS, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) said the drought had been an additional burden on the economies of those countries. It had depressed and disrupted agro-pastoral production, bringing lower than expected export earnings and a depressive effect on domestic food production. Increased spending on commercial food imports resulted, despite the donor response of food aid. The drought's increased severity and the cumulative effect felt in the 1980s meant that substantial recovery would be needed to reach the per capita output and growth levels of the early 1970s.

The report recommended domestic policy measures and regional arrangements to assist the CILSS members in economic recovery. The measures were in line with the objectives embodied in the Substantial New Programme of Action for the 1980s for the Least Developed Countries,⁽⁹⁾ which applied to six CILSS members.

On 21 March,⁽¹⁰⁾ the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board decided to submit the report and comments made on it at the Board's session to the General Assembly's special session on the critical economic situation in Africa (see p. 442) as one of UNCTAD's contributions to the session. The Board requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General to prepare a similar study on the countries members of IGADD.

Drought and desertification in Mauritania

In accordance with a 1985 General Assembly request,⁽¹¹⁾ the Secretary-General submitted in October 1986 a report on assistance to Mauritania,⁽¹²⁾ which included the report of an inter-agency mission to the country from 18 to 25 July. The mission, led by the Director of the United Nations Unit for Special Economic Assistance Programmes and including experts from UNCTAD, the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (UNCHS) and UNDP, studied the economy and analysed its needs.

Mauritania, classified as an LDC (see p. 405), suffered from the twin scourges of chronic drought and spreading desertification, which devastated its economy and critically affected the well-being of its people. With three quarters of the land being desert or semi-desert, Mauritania had the lowest population density (1.5 inhabitants per square kilometre in 1984) in West Africa. The annual population growth rate averaged 2.3 per cent from 1970 to 1982, with a life expectancy at birth of 43 years. The literacy rate, less than 5 per cent at independence in 1960, had reached approximately 25 per cent, but remained among the lowest in Africa.

The report attributed economic decline in Mauritania over the past decade to repeated droughts, recession in the industrialized countries, its involvement in the Western Sahara conflict and weak economic management by the Government throughout the 1970s. Mauritania's agricultural base was extremely poor, with domestic production covering only about one quarter of domestic needs. Crop production was seriously affected by drought, with virtually no growth during the decade. The mining sector had suffered from weak international demand for iron, resulting in reduced production and lower prices.

The mission noted that UNSO had formulated projects to deal with desertification and drought, but they had not been implemented because of lack of funding. The mission proposed that UNSO, FAO, UNDP, UNEP and UNCHS might consult with the Government on preparing a multisectoral action plan for presentation to the international community for financing. The plan could include programmes and projects aimed specifically at combating drought and desertification and would be a logical follow-up to UNPAAERD, adopted by the General Assembly in June (see p. 446).

With regard to other urgent development needs, the mission identified a number of projects in various sectors in which complementary action was necessary and for which external assistance was required. They were in the areas of: rural development and agriculture; urban development; rural and urban water supply; health and social welfare; and education and literacy.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

In December 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted decision 41/456 without vote.

Drought and desertification in Mauritania

At its 100th plenary meeting, on 8 December 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, took note of the report of the Secretary-General on assistance to Mauritania and of the proposal made by the inter-agency mission to Mauritania that the relevant organs and organizations of the United Nations system, including the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat), the United Nations Development Programme, the United Nations Environment Programme, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations and the World Bank, should be invited to consider assisting the Government of Mauritania in the preparation of a multisectoral action plan to combat desertification and drought that might be considered by the international donor community.

General Assembly decision 41/456

Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/930/Add.2) without vote, 19 November (meeting 33); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/41/L.56), based on informal consultations; agenda item 12.

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 2nd Committee 25, 27, 28, 33; plenary 100.

East Africa

In a June 1986 report⁽¹³⁾ to the Economic and Social Council, the Secretary-General described special assistance to the drought-stricken areas of Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya, Somalia, the Sudan and Uganda, as requested by the General Assembly in 1985.⁽¹⁴⁾ Details were provided on action taken by those countries and the General Assembly leading to the establishment in January 1986 of IGADD (see p. 665).

The Secretary-General said the UNDP Administrator had arranged for the establishment within UNSO of a unit entrusted with the responsibility of assisting the countries of IGADD. Despite the Assembly's appeal for contributions by Governments, United Nations organizations and other intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to provide the resources for funding the operational costs of the new unit and for implementing projects and programmes in IGADD countries, no additional funding had been provided. UNSO had, none the less, assisted the countries of IGADD, under its desertification control mandate. Substantial resources were needed for financing future projects aimed at combating desertification and recurring drought.

In his report on UNDRO activities,⁽¹⁾ the Secretary-General said the situation in Ethiopia had improved somewhat during 1986 after the devastating drought of 1984/85. During the year, UNDRO had organized a $1 million air-drop operation in co-operation with the Belgian Air Force, which delivered, within a period of two months, 1,872 metric tons of emergency food in northern Wollo for distribution by the Relief and Rehabilitation Commission and World Vision International. The food was required to assist a seriously famine-affected population of 135,000 people living in inaccessible areas.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 19 May, by decision 1986/118, the Economic and Social Council took note of the oral report on assistance to the drought-stricken areas of Ethiopia made on 5 May, on behalf of the Secretary-General, by the Director of the Monitoring and Evaluation Unit of OEOA, and decided to defer action thereon until its second regular session of 1986.

On 22 July, the Council adopted resolution 1986/45 without vote, as recommended by its Third Committee.

Assistance to the drought-stricken areas of Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya, Somalia, the Sudan and Uganda

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 35/90 and 35/91 of 5 December 1980, 36/221 of 17 December 1981, 37/147 of 17 December 1982, 38/216 of 20 December 1983, 39/205 of 17 December 1984 and 40/221 of 17 December 1985 and Economic and Social Council resolution 1983/46 of 28 July 1983 on assistance to the drought-stricken areas of Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya, Somalia, the Sudan and Uganda,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on assistance to the drought-stricken areas of those countries,

Deeply concerned at the serious effects of the prolonged and persistent drought in the region, which precipitated food shortages and famine and hindered the development efforts of the countries members of the Intergovernmental Authority on Drought and Development,

Stressing the need for practical regional arrangements for co-operation to promote the rehabilitation, recovery, and medium-term and long-term development of the countries of the region,

Appreciating the political will demonstrated by the countries members of the Intergovernmental Authority on Drought and Development to combat the effects of drought and other related natural disasters,

Bearing in mind the imperative need for the international community to render assistance to Member States in the event of natural disasters,

1. Reaffirms General Assembly resolutions 35/90, 35/91, 36/221, 37/147, 38/216, 39/205 and 40/221 and Economic and Social Council resolution 1983/46 on assistance to the drought-stricken areas of Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya, Somalia, the Sudan and Uganda;

2. Notes with appreciation the establishment of the Intergovernmental Authority on Drought and Development;

3. Commends the countries members of the Authority for the adoption of the development-oriented plan of action to tackle various aspects of drought and related problems;

4. Notes with appreciation the assistance provided by the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme and by the United Nations Sudano-Sahelian Office in the effort to establish the Authority, in line with the recommendations of the Secretary-General and pursuant to the resolutions of the General Assembly mentioned above;

5. Calls upon donor Governments and international organizations to participate at the highest level in the conference of donors for the countries members of the Authority, to be held in Djibouti in November 1986;

6. Appeals to all Governments, organizations of the United Nations system and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to contribute generously so as to provide the resources necessary for funding the operational costs of the unit within the United Nations Sudano-Sahelian Office entrusted with the responsibility of assisting the countries members of the Authority and for the implementation of the projects and programmes in those countries, and requests the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme to intensify his efforts in this regard;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session of 1987 on the progress achieved in the implementation of the present resolution.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/45

22 July 1986 Meeting 38 Adopted without vote

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted decision 41/455, by which it endorsed Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/45 and called on donor Governments and international organizations to participate at the highest level in the conference of donors for the countries members of IGADD, to be held in Djibouti in March 1987.

Related decision: GA 41/454.

Floods and storms

Generous assistance to Solomon Islands was urged by the General Assembly in December 1986 following extensive damage caused in May by cyclone "Namu" (see p. 481). The Secretary-General reported on assistance to Bangladesh, which, he said, withstood an onslaught of tropical cyclones and seasonal floods almost every year (see p. 481).

In Bolivia, heavy rains during the first quarter of 1986 led to widespread floods, affecting 250,000 people and damaging or destroying 10,000 homes and 44,000 hectares of crop land. Following identification of emergency needs, contributions of close to $3 million were reported. UNDR0 made a cash grant of $30,000 for the purchase of tents and tools. The United Kingdom channelled a total of $58,000 through UNDR0 for the purchase of relief supplies and medicines. In March, an UNDR0 delegate was assigned to co-ordinate relief efforts, at the request of the UNDR0/UNDP Resident Representative. A contribution of $60,000 from the Government of Italy was used to finance two projects.

In June, the south-western peninsula of Haiti was hit by serious flooding after several days of heavy rainfall, resulting in the devastation of 20,000 hectares of agricultural land. Road infrastructure and irrigation systems were heavily damaged, several thousand houses destroyed and 80,000 people affected. UNDR0 developed a project to protect populated areas and agricultural land from the negative impact of future flooding, for which a total of $690,000 was contributed.

UNDP activities. In his annual report for 1986,⁽¹⁵⁾ the UNDP Administrator said that UNDP Special Programme Resources (SPRs) (see p. 429) were made available to a number of countries struck by floods and storms during 1986. In Bolivia (see above), $30,000 was provided to purchase material for shelter, blankets, cooking-stoves and transport. That initial emergency allocation was followed up by $500,000 for a housing rehabilitation and construction project for the affected communities.

In April, more than 100 inhabited islands of Fiji were affected by cyclone "Martin" and subsequent torrential rains. UNDP financed the purchase of outboard motors for boats, which were used to distribute rations, rescue stranded islanders and assess damage. Funds were also provided for emergency rations and medical supplies, the total coming to $42,000.

In Jamaica, heavy rains associated with a tropical disturbance in May/June caused loss of life and widespread damage. UNDP provided $50,000 for vector-control equipment to control malaria, which was followed by a $750,000 allocation for rehabilitation of rural areas.

Following the May cyclone in Solomon Islands (see p. 481), UNDP was instrumental in co-ordinating the United Nations system's response, assessing the extent of damage and issuing reports. UNDP came forward with an immediate grant of $50,000 to cover the costs of chain-saws and light tools to help clear debris, and water tanks, mosquito netting, stoves and hurricane lamps were also purchased. A rehabilitation exercise costing $1.1 million was also under way to restore water supplies, prevent outbreaks of malaria, replace destroyed fishing equipment and reconstruct feeder roads.

Following severe floods in Uruguay in July/August, UNDP allocated $50,000 to rehabilitate five schools serving 400 children. There was an additional request for $350,000 to rehabilitate 11 schools benefiting 1,300 children.

At a cost of $580,000, UNDP financed recovery efforts in Vanuatu following cyclones in 1985. Reconstruction activities included repairs to damaged airfield buildings, post offices, houses, hospitals, clinics and schools.

Cyclone in Bangladesh

In a June 1986 report⁽¹⁶⁾ requested by the General Assembly in 1985,⁽¹⁷⁾ the Secretary-General described Bangladesh as one of the most disaster-prone of the South Asian countries. The coastal areas were particularly vulnerable to natural calamities such as tropical storms and high tidal bores, resulting in extensive human and material losses. The land area of Bangladesh was regularly subjected to widespread flooding each year during monsoon season, often repeatedly in the same year, with extremely adverse consequences on the country's economic development.

Referring to the cyclone which had struck in May 1985,⁽¹⁸⁾ the Secretary-General stated that both national and international responses had been spontaneous and very encouraging. Contributions for emergency relief in cash and in kind reported to UNDRO totalled over $14.7 million, in addition to the ongoing food-for-work programme for construction of flood dikes and irrigation channels, sponsored by WFP, which was extended for two to three years, totalling some $111.4 million.

Discussions had been held on the need to improve preparedness and prevention at national and district levels, and assistance was suggested for the construction and improvement of cyclone shelters, improvement of the cyclone warning system, construction of embankments, improved transportation (road and boat) in coastal areas and public education.

UNDRO offered assistance to the Government for a study on shelter, which would also recommend preparedness measures, specifically in regard to the need for additional shelters and a re-examination of the cyclone shelter and warning programmes. The shelters had been built in 1973 in the aftermath of the 1970 cyclone disaster. During a visit to Bangladesh, the Disaster Relief Coordinator re-emphasized UNDRO's offer to assist the Government to prepare for future similar disasters and to prevent, as far as possible, their adverse consequences on economic development.

On 8 December, the General Assembly, by decision 41/459, took note of the Secretary-General's report.

Cyclone in Solomon Islands

From 17 to 19 May 1986, cyclone "Namu" caused severe devastation in Solomon Islands, including loss of life and material damage.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/193 without vote, on the recommendation of the Second Committee.

Assistance to Solomon Islands

The General Assembly,

Deeply concerned at the devastation in Solomon Islands caused by cyclone "Namu" from 17 to 19 May 1986, which resulted in loss of life, destruction of housing and extensive damage to the economic and social infrastructures and to the agricultural, stock-farming, transport and industrial sectors,

Concerned at the negative impact of this damage on the development efforts of Solomon Islands,

Noting with appreciation the emergency assistance provided by several States, international and regional organizations, specialized agencies and voluntary agencies,

Noting the efforts of the people and Government of Solomon Islands to deal with the emergency situation and to initiate a reconstruction and rehabilitation programme,

Affirming the need for prompt and concerted international action to assist the people and Government of Solomon Islands in carrying out the reconstruction and rehabilitation of the affected regions and sectors,

1. Expresses its gratitude to the States, programmes and organizations of the United Nations system and intergovernmental, non-governmental and voluntary organizations that provided assistance to Solomon Islands during the emergency;

2. Urges all States to participate generously through bilateral or multilateral channels in projects and programmes for the reconstruction and rehabilitation of Solomon Islands;

3. Requests international organizations, in particular the relevant organs and bodies of the United Nations system, regional organizations and voluntary agencies to continue and increase their assistance in response to the reconstruction, rehabilitation and development needs of Solomon Islands;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps, in collaboration with the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme, to mobilize the financial, technical and material assistance needed for implementing the reconstruction, rehabilitation and development programme of Solomon Islands;

5. Further requests the Secretary-General to keep the question of assistance for the reconstruction and rehabilitation of Solomon Islands under constant review and apprise the Economic and Social Council, at its second regular session of 1987, of the progress made in the implementation of the present resolution.

General Assembly resolution 41/193

8 December 1986 Meeting 100 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/936) without vote, 12 November (meeting 28); 12-nation draft (A/C.2/41/L.23); agenda item 82.

Sponsors: Australia, Canada, Fiji, Japan, New Zealand, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Samoa, Solomon Islands, United Kingdom, United States, Vanuatu.

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 2nd Committee 18, 19, 22, 23, 26-28; plenary 100.

Papua New Guinea, introducing the draft resolution in the Second Committee on 4 November, said it was intended to place on record the Assembly's concern at the cyclone damage, acknowledge the assistance given to Solomon Islands since May and recognize the central role played by the United Nations system in the rehabilitation process. The resolution sought to build on arrangements already in place to assist the country. The entire economic base of Solomon Islands had been seriously weakened and it would take years to recover. Papua New Guinea also emphasized that strong support from the international community for Solomon Islands should continue.

Earthquakes

Earthquake in El Salvador

On 10 October 1986, El Salvador was struck by an earthquake which caused an estimated 1,200 deaths, injured more than 10,000 people and rendered some 50,000 families homeless. In a report on UNDRO activities during 1986⁽¹⁾ the Secretary-General said that, between 10 October and 5 November, UNDRO issued 14 situation reports and recorded contributions in cash and kind valued at $12.5 million. Subsequent contributions for rehabilitation and reconstruction brought the total to over $75 million. Within 48 hours, donors were informed that enough relief supplies to cover immediate relief needs and search and rescue teams were being rushed to San Salvador from bilateral and multilateral donors. UNDRO arranged for the dispatch of donated medical supplies and other relief goods and provided an emergency grant of $30,000 towards re-establishing the drinking-water supply in two hospitals of San Salvador.

In a 13 October letter to the Secretary-General,⁽¹⁹⁾ Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Nicaragua requested the inclusion in the agenda of the General Assembly's 1986 regular session of an item on emergency assistance to El Salvador, also requesting that it be considered on a priority basis.

UNDP activities. Immediately following the 10 October earthquake, UNDP dispatched a mission, jointly sponsored by the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean, to assist in managing the disaster situation. The sum of $50,000 was allocated to be used together with UNDRO funds to repair the drinking-water and sewage systems of three urban hospitals. UNDP also supported an assessment of rehabilitation and reconstruction requirements and would provide an SPR allocation of $500,000 for low-cost housing reconstruction, a seismic risk study and a Paediatric hospital.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 14 October, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/2 without vote.

Emergency assistance to El Salvador

The General Assembly,

Deeply distressed by the loss of lives, the number of afflicted persons and the destruction wrought by the earthquake which, on 10 October 1986, struck the city of San Salvador, capital of El Salvador, and adjoining villages,

Conscious of the efforts of the Government and people of El Salvador to save lives and alleviate the sufferings of the victims of the cataclysm,

Noting the enormous effort that will be required to alleviate the grave situation caused by this natural disaster, especially given the particular circumstances under which the people of El Salvador are living,

Conscious also of the prompt response being made by Governments, international agencies, non-governmental organizations and private individuals to provide emergency disaster relief,

Recognizing that the magnitude of the disaster and its long-term effects will require, as a complement to the effort being made by the people and Government of El Salvador, a demonstration of international solidarity and humanitarian concern to ensure broad multilateral co-operation in order to meet the immediate emergency situation in the affected areas, as well as to undertake the process of reconstruction,

1. Expresses its solidarity and support to the Government and people of El Salvador;
2. Expresses its appreciation to the States, international agencies and non-governmental organizations that are currently providing emergency relief to that country;
3. Calls upon all States to contribute generously to the relief and reconstruction efforts in the affected areas;
4. Requests the Secretary-General to mobilize resources in order to assist in the relief and reconstruction task undertaken by the Government of El Salvador, to co-ordinate the multilateral assistance and, in consultation with the Government of El Salvador, to identify the emergency and medium-term and long-term needs so as to contribute to the reconstruction of the affected areas.

Earthquake in Mexico

In response to a 1985 General Assembly request⁽²⁰⁾ the Secretary-General reported in June 1986⁽²¹⁾ on international relief to Mexico following two major earthquakes which shattered Mexico City and its surrounding areas in September

The Secretary-General stated that a second informal donors' meeting was held on 13 February 1986, following a mission to Mexico by the United Nations co-ordinator for assistance to Mexico following the earthquake; the purpose of the mission was to examine the extent to which Governments might provide financing for reconstruction and rehabilitation projects. It was noted at the meeting, in which Mexico's Minister for Foreign Affairs participated, that another severe disaster had befallen Mexico—the precipitous decline in the price of oil, a commodity which accounted for a very high percentage of the country's national budget revenues and export earnings.

The response of the international community, while appreciable during the initial emergency phase, had diminished significantly with regard to specific requirements. An additional problem stemmed from the failure of many Governments to provide the United Nations co-ordinator with information on contributions. The effective functioning of the co-ordinator's office had thus been impaired and information in the Secretary-General's report was incomplete with regard to contributions for rehabilitation and reconstruction work. Nevertheless, it was clear that the total response had fallen considerably short of the $375 million initially requested for the reconstruction phase, although that represented less than 10 per cent of the total estimated cost of the damage caused by the earthquake.

On 8 December, the General Assembly, by decision 41/459, took note of the Secretary-General's report.

Locust and grasshopper infestation in Africa

In his report⁽¹⁾ on UNDRO activities during 1986, the Secretary-General cited the return of rains after years of drought as having created ideal conditions for the reproduction of locusts and the development of infestations over wide areas of Africa in the middle of 1986. For the first time in half a century, all four species commonly found in Africa simultaneously invaded millions of hectares of crop land in approximately 20 countries of the eastern, central and southern parts of the continent.

Following the first FAO appeal in May 1986 (see PART TWO, Chapter III), UNDRO co-operated with the FAO Emergency Centre for Locust Operations (ECLO) to strengthen the mobilization and co-ordination of resources, record emergency needs and contributions and report to the international community on the development of the situation. During the second half of 1986, UNDRO issued 11 situation reports in English and French. To speed up the transfer of information, a computer-to-computer link allowing direct contact was established in September 1986 between the offices of FAO/ECLO at Rome and UNDRO at Geneva.

On UNDRO's recommendation, the Secretary-General issued on 14 August a statement drawing attention to the threat posed to Africa's food production by the locust infestations and pledging full United Nations support for FAO's efforts to assist the affected countries. UNDRO/UNDP resident representatives were also urged to reactivate the local emergency co-ordinating mechanisms which had functioned so successfully during the 1985 drought.

By a 25 September letter⁽²³⁾ Algeria transmitted to the Secretary-General the resolutions adopted by the OAU Council of Ministers (Addis Ababa, 21-26 July). In a resolution on the control of the locust invasion in Africa, the Council appealed to international organizations and the international donor community to provide adequate support urgently for the control of the locusts.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December, the General Assembly adopted without vote resolution 41/185, based on the recommendation of the Second Committee.

Fight against locust and grasshopper infestation in Africa

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution S-13/2 of 1 June 1986 on the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990, in which it noted the importance of, inter alia, increased food production to meet the needs of Africa, and its resolution 41/29 of 31 October 1986 on the emergency situation in Africa,

Recalling also the disaster in Africa resulting from the drought of 1984 and 1985, and conscious of the ongoing efforts to combat the adverse effects of the resulting famine,

Noting resolution CM/Res.1072(XLIV) adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its forty-fourth ordinary session, held at Addis Ababa from 21 to 26 July 1986,

Alarmed by the unrelenting destructive effects of the current locust and grasshopper invasion of many African countries and the potential spread of the infestation within Africa and beyond, and concerned at the economic and social consequences, including the reduction in agricultural production, which could continue for several years, the consequent displacement of affected populations, and, in particular, the effects on longer-term economic and social development,

Recognizing the potential problem created by billions of insects capable of devouring as much as 80,000 metric tons of cereal crops per swarm daily, of migrating great distances from points of origin and thus of denying agricultural production to millions of producers and ultimately consumers,

Noting that the resources of Africa are insufficient to control the locust infestation, which will need to be countered by concerted efforts at the national, regional and international levels,

Recognizing the efforts of the African countries, national and international organizations and the international donor community in support of the control of locusts and grasshoppers, especially the Global Information and Early Warning System on Food and Agriculture of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, and its role in identifying this potential disaster,

1. Expresses its appreciation to donor countries, organizations of the United Nations system and other competent institutions in their efforts to contain the infestation;

2. Urges the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations to strengthen its co-ordinating mechanisms and its technical and field operational support for locust and grasshopper control;

3. Endorses and encourages the continued co-operation of local, regional and global organizations and donors in the campaign to control the current threat to agriculture caused by locusts and grasshoppers, including the exchange and dissemination of information on pests and insects;

4. Encourages the donor community to continue to marshal its resources in support of the affected countries to bring locusts and grasshoppers under control;

5. Encourages also the affected countries to continue to ensure that adequate resources are made available to combat these recurrent crises, in particular by strengthening their national plant protection services;

6. Urges all parties concerned to establish and strengthen early warning systems in respect of the affected countries and to co-ordinate their efforts in this regard;

7. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Director-General of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, to take catalytic action in raising the consciousness of the world community regarding this potentially disastrous situation;

8. Invites the Director-General of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations to submit an up-to-date report on the locust and grasshopper infestation to the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session of 1987.

Disaster preparedness and prevention

Preparedness and prevention were the two primary components of the disaster mitigation component of UNDRO, said the Secretary-General in his report on UNDRO activities during 1986.⁽¹⁾

In January, the Asian Disaster Preparedness Centre was established at the Asian Institute of Technology at Bangkok, Thailand, as the focal point for those activities. The Centre provided training, information management, pre-disaster planning, the application of appropriate technology and public awareness programmes. In Latin America, a regional disaster prevention and preparedness programme was initiated in 1986, in response to requests from several countries, with activities focused initially on earthquake, volcano and tsunami hazards. Activities included workshops and field training courses on volcanic hazard mapping and on the recognition and mapping of active earthquake zones. Initially, the programme, financed principally by the Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance of the United States Agency for International Development, focused on Andean countries and planned to encompass other countries of Latin America in the future.

At the national level, UNDRO co-ordinated single-country activities and organized or contributed to various single- or multi-country disaster mitigation seminars and training activities.

CPC/ACC Joint Meetings. A review of the preparedness of the United Nations system for emergency situations, its co-ordination aspects, and links to longer-term development in the light of experience gained from the emergency operation in Africa was carried out by ACC and CPC at their annual Joint Meetings (Geneva, 1 and 2 July 1986).⁽²⁾ The Secretary-General, in his statement as ACC Chairman, underscored the lessons of the past years' experiences in emergency operations and said the time had come to broaden the system's capacity to respond to emergencies. The CPC Chairman drew attention to the need to improve co-operation among organizations and the information provided by them on emergency situations, cautioning against an individual organization defending its work without making it an integral part of the system's common objectives. He cited as important to the United Nations response capability support from the media, NGOs, the United Nations resident co-ordinators and UNDRO.

The Chairmen concluded that the primary responsibility for emergency preparedness lay with individual countries and that the responsibility of the United Nations system was to provide assistance on request. In complex emergency situations, the system should organize its response in a pragmatic and flexible manner. Timely and specific information on emergency situations, including details of needs and responses, was indispensable, as was timely detection of impending crises. The United Nations resident co-ordinators should be provided with the authority and capacity to discharge their responsibility for emergency matters. Emergency assistance should be organized so as not to generate unsustainable demands on future resources, undermine incentives to local producers or create new patterns of dependence among target populations; it should be provided with a view to its impact on development and include elements leading to rehabilitation and longer-term development. The system's capacity for emergency response, acquired during the African emergency, should be retained and the relevant mandates reviewed. Finally, the Chairmen emphasized that, for the threat of recurring emergencies to recede, longer-term structural problems should be addressed.

Emergency relief and assistance

Lebanon

As requested by the General Assembly in 1985,⁽¹⁾ the Secretary-General, in October 1986,⁽²⁾ reported on assistance for the reconstruction and development of Lebanon. A continuing lack of security throughout the country was the main factor affecting the capability of the United Nations system to provide assistance. The reduction of international staff due to hazardous conditions and the paucity of financial resources had adversely affected United Nations activities in Lebanon. In general, the country's economic situation reflected a marked downturn owing to the deterioration of the Lebanese pound, precipitating increased hardship for the people.

During the reporting period, many businesses closed their offices in Beirut and transferred operations to other countries. Public utilities began to encounter serious financial and operational difficulties. Lebanon's public debt rose in 1986 due to the inability of the Government to collect revenues. A continued rise in inflation was also expected, owing in part to the accelerated depreciation of the Lebanese currency, which lost 90 per cent of its value against the United States dollar during 1985 and the first half of 1986.

Emergency assistance remained a primary concern for the United Nations system in Lebanon, as military activities continued to cause destruction and the displacement of civilian populations. Few resources had, however, been made available to the United Nations Co-ordinating Committee in Beirut.

The Office of the United Nations Co-ordinator of Assistance for the Reconstruction and Development of Lebanon continued to co-operate closely with all parties involved in the effort. Co-ordination meetings were held regularly, bringing together Lebanese officials and representatives of NGOs, relief agencies and donors.

In the early part of 1986, UNDR0 granted $50,000 for emergency medicaments for relief in the southern part of the country. In an account of UNDR0 activities during 1986,⁽³⁾ the Secretary-General reported that by October the value of assistance given or reported through UNDR0 had reached some $41.5 million.

In 1986, UNICEF completed a $60,000 project funded by the Secretary-General's Trust Fund which was designed to rehabilitate the damaged water-supply system in the city of Tripoli. During 1985-1986, some 260,000 families (or 1.8 million persons) throughout the country benefited or would benefit from assistance by WFP at an approximate cost of $10 million. Emergency food aid provided by WFP in the Tripoli area was extended until 31 July 1986 to permit distribution of commodities. Three WFP development projects were operational at a value of approximately $3.7 million.

Basic services programmes at an estimated cost of $251,500 were under way or planned in Lebanon by UNICEF. They included immunization of all children up to age five; the training of and service delivery to field-workers; assistance to the Government; and provision of recreational and educational activities for children affected by the war. A major new project, budgeted at approximately $1.3 million for 1986-1987 and developed jointly between UNICEF and the General Directorate of Social Affairs, was designed to provide and consolidate innovative approaches in support of family-based assistance to widowed mothers and their children. Between June 1985 and June 1986, a total of 21 reconstruction projects were completed and, by June 1986, the implementation of 15 similar projects was under way. Other UNICEF-funded projects were in the fields of health, water, education and community self-help, with 31 completed at a cost of $1.9 million and 77 at a cost of $6.6 million under way. During the year, a new work plan of 114 projects was elaborated to rehabilitate 10 water-supply systems throughout Lebanon.

During 1986, the delivery of programmed UNDP technical co-operation activities continued to be adversely affected by the precarious security situation. The authorized budget level for UNDP programmes during 1986 was set at $750,000. UNDP operational projects during 1985/86 included activities for the improvement of agricultural productivity, animal health services and health laboratory services and a number of fellowship programmes related to civil aviation and other development needs.

Active in various regions in Lebanon, FAO executed four technical co-operation programme projects at a cost of $890,000; a joint project with UNDP totalling $203,921; a Trust Fund programme which provided equipment to strengthen the operational and technical capacity of the Ministry of Agriculture; and regional projects.

World Health Organization assistance for 1986, amounting to $294,900, focused on health systems infrastructure, health promotion and care, and disease prevention and control.

Emergency relief assistance to local populations was provided by the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon and the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (see p. 290).

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July, the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of its Third Committee, adopted resolution 1986/46 without vote.

Assistance for the reconstruction and development of Lebanon

The Economic and Social Council,

Referring to General Assembly resolution 40/229 of 17 December 1985 and the earlier resolutions of the General Assembly on international assistance for the reconstruction of Lebanon, by which the Assembly requested the specialized agencies and other organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to expand and intensify their programmes of assistance in response to the needs of Lebanon,

Recognizing that the present situation in Lebanon, owing to events, to the paralysis of economic activities and to the increase in the expenses of the State coinciding with the alarming fall in budget income, requires emergency assistance,

Appeals to all Member States and to all the organizations of the United Nations system to continue and intensify their efforts to mobilize all possible assistance to the Government of Lebanon in its efforts for reconstruction and development, in accordance with the relevant resolutions and decisions of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December, the General Assembly, acting on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 41/196 without vote.

Assistance for the reconstruction and development of Lebanon

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 33/146 of 20 December 1978, 34/135 of 14 December 1979, 35/85 of 5 December 1980, 36/205 of 17 December 1981, 37/163 of 17 December 1982, 38/220 of 20 December 1983, 39/197 of 17 December 1984 and 40/229 of 17 December 1985,

Recalling also Economic and Social Council resolutions 1980/15 of 29 April 1980, 1985/56 of 25 July 1985 and 1986/46 of 22 July 1986, and decisions 1983/112 of 17 May 1983 and 1984/174 of 26 July 1984,

Noting with deep concern the continuing heavy loss of life and the additional destruction of property, which have caused further extensive damage to the economic and social structure of Lebanon,

Noting with concern the serious economic situation in Lebanon,

Welcoming the determined efforts of the Government of Lebanon in undertaking its reconstruction and rehabilitation programme,

Reaffirming the urgent need for further international action to assist the Government of Lebanon in its continuing efforts for reconstruction and development,

Considering that filling the vacant post of United Nations Co-ordinator of Assistance for the Reconstruction and Development of Lebanon would facilitate the normal operations of international assistance to Lebanon,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General and of the statement made on 22 October 1986 by the Under-Secretary-General for Political and General Assembly Affairs,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his report and for the steps he has taken to mobilize assistance to Lebanon;

2. Commends the Under-Secretary-General for Political and General Assembly Affairs for his co-ordination of system-wide assistance for Lebanon;

3. Commends further the efforts undertaken by the Government of Lebanon in the implementation of the initial phase of reconstruction of the country, despite adverse circumstances, and of the steps it has taken to remedy the economic situation;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 41/192 of 8 December 1986, to continue and intensify his efforts to mobilize all possible assistance within the United Nations system to help the Government of Lebanon in its reconstruction and development efforts;

5. Invites the Secretary-General to consider the urgent need to nominate a United Nations Co-ordinator of Assistance for the Reconstruction and Development of Lebanon and the implementation of his functions therein;

6. Requests the organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to intensify their programmes of assistance and to expand them in response to the needs of Lebanon, and to take the necessary steps to ensure that their offices at Beirut are adequately staffed at the senior level;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-second session on the progress made in the implementation of the present resolution.

Chapter IV

International trade and finance

In 1986, the debt problems of developing countries and the need to address simultaneously the interdependent problems of trade, money, finance and development occupied a large part of the debate at both regular sessions of the Trade and Development Board (TDB) of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) and the general discussion at the second regular session of the Economic and Social Council in July. The General Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee convened in May 1986 to discuss ways in which those interdependent problems could be dealt with by the international community and to deal with business, left unfinished by the Assembly in 1985, on commodities, debt and the possibility of holding an international conference on money and finance for development. In June, the Assembly deferred consideration of those issues to its 1986 regular session (decision 40/474).

In his annual report on the work of the Organization (see p. 3), the Secretary-General stressed that, if the world economy was to return and hold to the path of healthy and well-spread growth and development, policy and systemic measures were necessary in the interrelated areas of money, finance, debt and trade.

In July, the Economic and Social Council drew the Assembly's attention to the alarming levels reached in the net transfer of resources from developing to developed countries and called on the international community to halt and reverse that transfer (resolution 1986/56). The Council's concern was echoed by the Assembly in December when it requested the Secretary-General to take into account the interrelationship between money, finance, debt, resource flows, trade and development in preparing a comprehensive report on the net transfer of resources (resolution 41/180).

Preparations for the seventh session of UNCTAD (UNCTAD VII) were discussed at both 1986 sessions of TDB. In December, the Assembly decided to convene UNCTAD VII at Geneva in July 1987 and called on UNCTAD States members to ensure that the session would make a significant contribution to multilateral action for revitalizing development, growth and international trade (resolution 41/169).

Following consultations on the outcome of the 1985 United Nations Conference to Review All Aspects of the Set of Multilaterally Agreed Equitable Principles and Rules for the Control of Restrictive Business Practices, the Assembly, in December 1986, decided to convene a further such conference in 1990 and that UNCTAD's Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Restrictive Business Practices would be the preparatory body (resolution 41/167).

During 1986, four additional States adhered to the 1980 Agreement Establishing the Common Fund for Commodities, fulfilling the second requirement for the Agreement's entry into force. The third and final requirement to be met was that concerning directly contributed capital. The problems facing commodity-producing countries due to the continuing fall in primary commodity prices were discussed by the Second Committee in May and by the Assembly later in the year. In December, the Assembly stressed the urgent need for action on the world commodity situation and urged countries to contribute at UNCTAD VII towards solving commodity problems, particularly those affecting the economies of developing countries (resolution 41/168). With regard to individual commodities, the United Nations Cocoa Conference culminated in July in the establishment of the International Cocoa Agreement, 1986. Also in July, the United Nations Conference on Olive Oil adopted the International Agreement on Olive Oil and Table Olives, 1986. The International Agreement on Jute and Jute Products, 1982, entered into force definitively in August when the requisite number of Governments had adhered to it. Progress was made at two sessions of the United Nations Conference on Natural Rubber towards completing a successor agreement to the International Natural Rubber Agreement, 1979, and it was decided that the Conference President and the UNCTAD Secretary-General would consult on efforts to establish the agreement. The United Nations Conference on Nickel also reconvened in May and adopted the terms of reference of an International Nickel Study Group. Meetings were held during the year to review the market situation of copper, iron ore and tungsten.

The international monetary situation was discussed in several United Nations bodies, including the Committee for Development Planning (CDP), TDB, the Committee on Invisibles and Financing related to Trade, the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly. In December, the Assembly requested the Secretary-General to prepare a report for 1987 on the current international monetary situation and to provide information on proposals for an international conference on money issues (decision 41/442). CDP and the Committee on Invisibles and Financing related to Trade paid particular attention to problems of external financing of economic development, with CDP calling for a doubling of development finance by the decade's end.

The Assembly considered the debt problems of developing countries at the resumed 1985 session of the Second Committee in May and at its regular 1986 session, when it had before it updated portions of the World Economic Survey 1986 relating to debt. In December (resolution 41/202), the Assembly agreed on a series of elements concerning debt and invited those involved to take them into account with a view to solving the problems of external indebtedness of developing countries.

At the request of the Economic and Social Council (decision 1986/119), TDB considered the scheduling of its regular session and, in September, decided to hold one such session a year in two parts.

International co-operation in trade and finance

The UNCTAD Trade and Development Report, 1986⁽¹⁾ stated that the deflationary pressures and other monetary and financial disturbances of the first half of the 1980s had impaired the capacity of the international financial and trading systems to contribute to growth and development and to foster the efficient use of resources.

The external financial stringency faced by developing countries since 1982 highlighted the connection between financing and payments arrangements and the growth and pattern of their trade. Increases in the day-to-day costs in developing countries' trade caused by external financial stringency had undoubtedly contributed to the slow-down in trade since 1982, and had also saddled with higher transactions charges much of the remaining trade of developing countries. An important effect in that context was the stimulus given to countertrade, a business arrangement under which an exporter undertakes to generate, or cause to be generated, benefits such as revenues for an importer.

Various types of external financial flows were used to finance international trade. Some, such as official development assistance (ODA), did not generally respond to changes in developing countries' external financial positions, but such responsiveness was characteristic of financing from private sources, in particular bank lending and suppliers' credits. Financing of trade, especially on the basis of short-term maturities, was often linked to payments arrangements, and hence their cost and availability could be adversely affected by external financial stringency.

The large imbalances in trade and payments that had characterized the world economy in recent years persisted in 1985 and early 1986, said the World Economic Survey 1986.⁽²⁾ There was a continued overall net transfer of resources from developing to developed countries. However, departure from the benign neglect of the unprecedented imbalances in the trade and financial relations of major industrial countries was an encouraging development in 1985. It was recognized that the only viable solution to the problem of imbalances required resumed growth and investment in the world economy as a whole, and in indebted developing countries in particular. It was also acknowledged that there was a need for guidance and some official intervention in foreign exchange markets and for concerted policy action by major industrial countries if frictions in international trade were to be reduced.

TDB action. TDB discussed the issue of the interdependence of trade, development finance and the international financial system and the debt and development problems of developing countries at both the first part of its thirty-second session (Geneva, 10-26 March 1986),⁽³⁾ and the first part of its thirty-third session (Geneva, 1-10 September and 3 October).⁽⁴⁾ At both sessions, the President's summary and conclusions on the debate were annexed to the Board's report to the General Assembly.⁽⁵⁾

Resumed session of the Second Committee. In accordance with a 1985 General Assembly decision,⁽⁶⁾ the Second Committee reconvened from 5 to 9 May 1986 to consider in depth ways in which international co-operation in the interrelated areas of money, finance, debt, resource flows, trade and development could be promoted effectively, and to deal with business left unfinished by the Assembly in 1985 on an international conference on money and finance for development,⁽⁷⁾ commodities,⁽⁸⁾ the external debt crisis and development,⁽⁹⁾ and debt and related issues.⁽⁹⁾

The Committee had before it two reports by the Secretary-General on international co-operation regarding money, finance, debt, resource flows, trade and development: one submitted to the Assembly in 1985;⁽¹⁰⁾ and the other,⁽¹¹⁾ prepared in response to the Assembly's 1985 decision,⁽⁶⁾ updating the earlier report and summarizing ideas put forward by heads of State and Government and foreign ministers at the Assembly's 1985 session. The first two sections of the latter report analysed key policy issues and discussed the world economic outlook within the broad framework of the first report. It was noted that recent events had brought further to the forefront of policy-oriented discussions the interrelationships between money, finance, debt, trade and resource flows for development. There had also been several policy initiatives which demonstrated that the key issues required not only national action, but also a strengthening of international co-operation through multilateral action.

The report's third section contained brief concluding observations and attempted to identify potential areas of convergence of views on the various interrelated issues and a possible agenda for action.

In addition to more system-wide issues in trade and monetary arrangements, the report said there were three basic sets of issues related to concern with the resumption of growth and investment: a substantial increase in net official flows to developing countries of both a concessional and non-concessional nature; the breaking of new ground in the area of commodity trade, including oil, if the new perceptions on the need for adjustment with growth were to be transformed into reality; and a broader view of the debt problem of developing countries with the need to agree on further reschedulings, restructurings, roll-overs and write-offs for poorer countries.

Annexed to the report was the requested summary of ideas and proposals put forward at the 1985 Assembly.

As requested in 1985,⁽⁶⁾ the Second Committee also had before it a report by the Secretary-General of UNCTAD on the Conference's ongoing work concerning the interdependence of trade, development, finance and the international monetary system.⁽¹²⁾ The report discussed how the interdependence of problems in the monetary, financial and trade spheres, and of countries, was treated in the design of the post-war system of trade and payments centred on the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the World Bank and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) and in the establishment of UNCTAD. It then related how the issue had been treated in UNCTAD by its membership and explained how the question had been analysed in recent issues of the Trade and Development Report. A brief outline was given of proposed intergovernmental and secretariat work.

An informal working paper on the interrelated issues of money, finance, debt, resource flows, trade and development was also before the Committee.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

In June, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted decision 40/474 without vote.

International co-operation in the interrelated areas of money, finance, debt, resource flows, trade and development

At its 133rd plenary meeting, on 20 June 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, decided to defer until its forty-first session consideration of and appropriate action on the following questions:

- International Conference on Money and Finance for Development (draft resolution A/C.2/40/L.30);
- External debt crisis and development (draft resolution A/C.2/40/L.52);
- Commodities (draft resolution A/C.2/40/L.81);
- Debt and related issues (draft resolution A/C.2/40/L.129).

General Assembly decision 40/474

Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/40/989/Add.15) without vote, 9 May (meeting 56); oral proposals by Yugoslavia, for Group of 77, and the Netherlands, for EEC; agenda item 84.
Meeting numbers. GA 40th session; 2nd Committee 53-56; plenary 133.

Also on the Second Committee's recommendation, the Assembly, on 20 June, adopted without vote three further decisions on the subject. By decision 40/475, it transmitted the revised informal working paper on the interrelated issues of money, finance, debt, resource flows, trade and development to the Economic and Social Council for consideration and negotiations so that it might report thereon to the Assembly at its forty-first session. By decision 40/476, it took note of the Secretary-General's reports on international co-operation regarding money, finance, debt, resource flows, trade and development, and the UNCTAD Secretary-General's report on interdependence. By decision 40/477, it deferred until its forty-first session the decision on including an item entitled "External debt crisis and development" in its agenda, on the understanding that the decision would be taken upon the request of interested countries, and asked the Secretary-General to submit to the session the relevant updated portions of the World Economic Survey 1986.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

In accordance with decision 40/475 (see above), the Economic and Social Council had before it at its July 1986 session the revised informal working paper on the interrelated issues of money, finance, debt, resource flows, trade and development.⁽¹³⁾ The paper summarized positions of Members during the general debate at the Second Committee's resumed session and gave a brief outline of recent trends in the world economy.

It was reported that, while disagreements remained, there was broad agreement on the basic elements of a strategy to meet immediate needs, which would involve: structural adjustment in all countries, with emphasis on diversification in primary-commodity export countries and admission of competitive imports by developed countries in accordance with GATT; containment and roll-back of protectionism; provision of adequate resources for the international financial institutions; an increase in ODA and encouragement of private financial flows to developing countries; and checking and reversing the unprecedented net overall transfer of resources from developing to developed countries.

Further, the Assembly should continue deliberations on: preparations for a new round of trade negotiations and implementation of the current GATT work programme; international commodity policy issues and solutions to the problems of commodity-exporting countries; approaches to the debt problems of different groups of countries; the replenishment of the International Development Association (IDA), the general capital increase of the World Bank and the need to augment IMF resources; long-term reform of the international monetary system and the need to convene an international conference on money and finance for development; and reductions of armament expenditures.

By decision 1986/172 of 22 July, the Council decided that no agreed conclusions had been reached on the revised informal working paper, and recommended that the Assembly consider and negotiate on the question at its forty-first session.

General Assembly consideration. The Assembly had before it at its 1986 regular session an October note by the Secretariat⁽¹⁴⁾ reproducing the draft resolutions, originally considered in 1985, on the following questions: an international conference on money and finance for development (see p. 512); the external debt crisis and development; debt and related issues (see p. 508); and commodities (see p. 502).

Net transfer of resources from developing to developed countries

During the Economic and Social Council's annual discussion of international economic and social policy, which took place in July 1986 (see p. 392), several Council members referred to the World Economic Survey 1986,⁽²⁾ which stated that, in 1985, the aggregate net transfer of resources from developing to developed countries exceeded $30 billion. That net transfer, said the Survey, was expected to be negative again in 1986 and 1987.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July 1986, the Council adopted resolution 1986/56 by roll-call vote.

Net transfer of resources from developing to developed countries

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 3201(S-VI) and 3202(S-VI) of 1 May 1974, containing the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order, 3281(XXIX) of 12 December 1974, containing the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, 3362(S-VII) of 16 September 1975 on development and international economic co-operation, and 35/56 of 5 December 1980, the annex to which contains the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Taking note with appreciation of the World Economic Survey 1986 and the report of the Committee for Development Planning on its twenty-second session,

Considering that, owing to the persistent structural imbalance of the world economy, the developing countries continue to face major problems in the areas of money, finance, debt, trade and resource flows and have even become net capital exporters,

Bearing in mind that this serious distortion impedes the development efforts of developing countries and adversely affects the implementation of the goals and objectives of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Noting with concern that this net transfer of resources from developing to developed countries has reached such proportions and is increasing at such a pace that concerted action is required on the part of the international community to halt and reverse the process,

Noting, furthermore, that developing countries face a large and growing financing gap in obtaining meaningful flows of resources over the next decade and that the reverse transfer of resources is seriously endangering the possibilities for development of developing countries and causing the living conditions of their peoples to deteriorate,

Bearing in mind that this dangerous process, far from being conjunctural or temporary, is a prolonged one which is intensifying, thereby undermining the development efforts of developing countries and causing a regression of serious consequences,

1. Draws the attention of the General Assembly and the specialized agencies to the alarming levels reached in the net transfer of resources from developing to developed countries as set out in the World Economic Survey 1986;

2. Emphasizes the need to reverse this trend, which adversely affects the development efforts of developing countries and runs counter to the goals and objectives of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade and international co-operation for development;

3. Stresses the fact that recent developments in the world economy had resulted in substantial gains for the developed countries because of declining prices of commodities, including oil, and that such benefits have been estimated at over $100 billion;

4. Emphasizes the need to redirect such benefits to promote the development of the developing countries;

5. Points out that, additionally, the net interest paid in external debt servicing by developing countries amounted to $54 billion in 1985 and the income outflow on foreign direct investment amounted to $13 billion, also in 1985;

6. Underlines the fact that while these huge transfers of resources from developing to developed countries are occurring, transfers from developed to developing countries have continued to decline and during 1985 amounted to $13 billion in loans and credit facilities,

$14 billion in official development assistance and $9 billion in direct investment, leaving a balance of immense proportions to the detriment of the developing countries;

7. Calls upon all States, specialized agencies and other competent organizations of the United Nations system to take appropriate and effective measures in the fields of money, trade and finance, including debt, in order to halt and reverse the net transfer of resources from developing to developed countries;

8. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the executive heads of the competent bodies and organizations of the United Nations system, to prepare a comprehensive analytical report on the net transfer of resources from developing to developed countries, on its impact on the development of developing countries, and on the measures to be taken within the framework of the United Nations system to halt and reverse that process, and to submit it to the General Assembly at its forty-second session, through the Economic and Social Council.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/56

22 July 1986 Meeting 38 39-9-4 (roll-call vote)

Draft by Yugoslavia, for Group of 77 (E/1986/L.34), orally revised; agenda item 3. Meeting numbers. ESC 35, 38.

Roll-call vote in Council as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Bangladesh, Brazil, Byelorussian SSR, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Djibouti, Egypt, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Guinea, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Jamaica, Morocco, Mozambique, Nigeria, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Romania, Rwanda, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Syrian Arab Republic, Turkey, USSR, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zimbabwe.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, France, Germany, Federal Republic of Italy, Spain, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Finland, Iceland, Japan, Sweden.

Explaining its vote, the United States said it did not feel that the text reflected a balanced approach, ignoring the $1,000 billion of inflows to the developing countries over past decades and other inflows such as foreign direct investment and trade flows. The United Kingdom, speaking on behalf of the member States of the European Economic Community (EEC), said they had difficulties with the concept of net transfer of resources as well as with the figures mentioned. Japan spoke similarly. Canada and the United States felt that the Council should seek to achieve a consensus by allowing sufficient time for informal consultations. Agreeing, Finland, also for Iceland and Sweden, thought the resolution was too sweeping.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 41/180 by recorded vote.

Net transfer of resources from developing to developed countries

The General Assembly,

Recalling Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/56 of 22 July 1986,

Profoundly concerned at the net transfer of resources from developing to developed countries, which is taking place at alarming levels and accelerating rates and which is adversely affecting the development efforts of developing countries and the living conditions of their people,

1. Reaffirms the urgent need to take appropriate and effective measures in the fields of money, finance, debt, resource flows, trade and development, in order to halt and reverse the net transfer of resources from developing to developed countries;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, in preparing the report called for in Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/56, also to take duly into account the inter-relationship between the issues of money, finance, debt, resource flows, trade and development.

8 December 1986 Meeting 100 125-10-10 (recorded vote)

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/930Add.1) by roll-call vote (107-10-10, 28 November (meeting 35); draft by Yugoslavia, for Group of 77 (A/C.2/41/L.20), orally revised; agenda item 12.

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 2nd Committee 19,23-25,27,28,34,35; plenary 100.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zambia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, France, Germany, Federal Republic of Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Portugal, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Austria, Canada, Denmark, Finland, Greece, Iceland, Ireland, Japan, Spain, Sweden.

Speaking in explanation of vote, the United Kingdom, for the member States of the European Community, said that the issues dealt with were highly complex and the concept of net transfer of resources was flawed.

Canada was concerned over the inability to find a text that focused on the need to identify the scope of the problem and shed more light on an obscure issue. Japan said a number of points needed clarification and further study; it did not believe in the efficacy and validity of adopting a comprehensive approach to such widely differing issues as money, finance, debt, resource flows, trade and development.

International trade

During 1986, international trade issues were discussed in several United Nations bodies, including CDP and TDB. A report, prepared by the UNCTAD secretariat for the Board's annual review of problems of protectionism and structural adjustment, concluded that despite general advocacy of the need for an improved, strengthened, open and expanding trading system, there had been no overall move towards liberalization in trade actions during the preceding year.

In May/June, the Special Committee on Preferences reviewed the implementation of the generalized system of preferences and technical assistance activities in connection with the system. Governments were urged to contribute to the UNCTAD trust fund for those activities.

The International Trade Centre (ITC), operated jointly by UNCTAD and GATT, continued to serve as the focal point for United Nations assistance to developing countries in formulating and implementing trade promotion programmes. In 1986, the value of ITC's technical co-operation activities climbed to over $21 million. The work of UNCTAD's Special Programme on Trade Facilitation also intensified in 1986, with over 70 missions in 32 countries.

Markets for primary commodities remained depressed in 1986 and, in December, the General Assembly urged States to contribute at UNCTAD VII towards solving short- and long-term commodity problems, particularly those affecting the economies of developing countries. Several conferences on individual commodities were held during the year, including those on cocoa, olive oil, nickel and rubber. Meetings were also held on copper, iron ore and tungsten. During 1986, sufficient ratifications were received to bring into force the Agreement Establishing the Common Fund for Commodities; the only remaining requirement to be met was that countries having ratified should represent two thirds of the Fund's directly contributed capital.

The Committee on Manufactures met in June to consider trends and policies in trade of manufactures and semi-manufactures.

Trade policy

The growth of world trade had slowed perceptibly in recent years, especially in relation to the growth of world income, which itself had slowed, according to the World Economic Survey 1986.(1) The decline in trade elasticity had been mildest in the centrally planned economies and sharpest among the energy-importing developing countries and the largest debtor countries. With regard to the developed market economies, the decline in responsiveness of imports to growth in income was relatively modest in the United States, more significant in the Federal Republic of Germany and steep in Japan. Globally, there were three major reasons behind the fall in the elasticity of trade, two of which were related to the changing structure of world trade and output and the third to the process of adjustment in indebted developing countries.

While the growth of merchandise trade had been sluggish, it was largely due to the stagnant or falling volume of trade in primary commodities. The growth of exports of agricultural products declined from the low annual rate of some 4 per cent during the 1960s to 2 per cent during the first half of the 1980s. Exports of minerals, mostly oil, increased at a rate of 7.5 per cent in the first period and declined at 4 per cent during the second. The rate of growth of exports of manufactures declined from around 11 per cent during the 1960s to 5 per cent during the first half of the 1980s, but was still higher than the rate of growth of commodity trade and higher than that of world income; in fact, the elasticity of trade in manufactures with respect to world income increased somewhat in the 1980s compared with the 1970s.

The rate of growth of world imports declined significantly in the first half of the 1980s with the volume of imports growing at an annual rate of barely 3 per cent during 1980-1985 compared with 5 per cent during the 1970s. In the developed market economies, import demand was generally weak and uneven in the 1980s. On average, imports grew by 3.5 per cent a year during the period 1980-1985, but the growth over the past two years was mainly concentrated in the United States, which accounted for 40 per cent of the total increase in imports for the group in 1984-1985.

Developing countries' imports had declined every year since 1982, except for 1984 when they registered a modest gain. While the largest declines in import volumes occurred among energy-exporting and highly indebted countries, the contraction in 1985 of nearly 4 per cent was fairly general, involving even countries in South and East Asia, which up to then had managed to keep their trade momentum. The loss of export earnings due to precipitous falls in primary commodity prices and sluggish export volume growth, along with heavy debt servicing obligations and dwindling net capital inflows, drastically reduced the import capacity of those countries.

Imports of the centrally planned economies were sluggish in 1981-1983, with actual declines registered in Eastern Europe in 1981 and 1982 and in China in 1982 and 1983, which were only partly offset by sustained import growth in the USSR. In 1984 and 1985, however, while import growth in the USSR remained below previous levels, in Eastern Europe imports picked up as those countries strengthened their external payments situation and regained access to international capital markets. In 1985, the volume of imports into China rose by nearly 50 per cent as a result of modernization efforts and liberalization of certain sectors of the economy.

In its analysis of the world economic situation and prospects, contained in the report on its March 1986 session,⁽⁵⁾ CDP stated that four inter-related factors explained the weak increase in trade volumes since the late 1970s: the slow-down of growth in world output; protectionist measures; the repercussions of increasing strains in the international financial system on the trade system; and the efforts of energy-importing countries to conserve energy and substitute domestic energy sources for fuel imports.

CDP observed that a more robust economic expansion in industrial countries leading to strengthened primary commodity prices would considerably improve the export earnings of developing countries, but concurrent actions to liberalize trade were required. It was important to take advantage of a new round of multilateral trade negotiations to arrest the drift towards protectionism and set the stage for more vigorous growth in world trade. Successful negotiations, said CDP, would be for the benefit of all, as an improved trading environment would smooth the long-term adjustments required by industrial and developing countries. However, action was needed to alter current trends and an immediate reduction of trade barriers was an important ingredient of an early revival of international trade.

International trading system

In accordance with a 1985 TDB decision,⁽³⁾ the UNCTAD secretariat submitted to TDB's September/October session a report on developments in the international trading system⁽⁴⁾ to assist TDB in its review of the subject, as called for by UNCTAD resolution 159(VI).⁽⁵⁾ The report summarized developments in the trading system, particularly its continued erosion, and attempted to identify those fundamental issues necessary to formulate proposals to improve and strengthen it. The report then identified the underlying economic and political factors affecting the trading system, which had provoked the developments described, and suggested steps to be taken towards the objectives of UNCTAD resolution 159(VI), particularly if undertaken in the context of multilateral trade negotiations.

Protectionism and structural adjustment

on Definitions and Methodology Employed in the UNCTAD Data Base on Trade Measures met at Geneva from 3 to 7 February 1986.⁽⁷⁾ In his summary of the Group's discussions, annexed to the Group's report, the Chairman stated that the main objectives of the Data Base were trade facilitation, transparency and the expansion of market access, particularly for the developing countries. The Group emphasized the need to cover all countries in respect of measures of both a product-specific and a general nature, using the same approach for all countries. Suggestions for increasing the coverage of measures included: subsidies, including those on production; voluntary export restraints, including those arrived at between firms; and economic sanctions. Coverage should also include measures which differentiated between imports from different sources.

TDB action. In March 1986, TDB undertook its annual review of protectionism and structural adjustment. In addition to the report of the Intergovernmental Group on the UNCTAD Data Base on Trade Measures (see above), the Board also had before it a note by the secretariat transmitting information provided by UNCTAD member States on protectionism and structural adjustment,⁽⁸⁾ and, as requested by TDB in 1985,⁽⁶⁾ a secretariat report on problems of agro-industrial production and trade.⁽⁹⁾

Also before the Board was a two-part secretariat report on problems of protectionism and structural adjustment. The first part⁽¹⁰⁾ dealt with restrictions on trade and structural adjustment, including developments in trade actions and trade legislation in 1985, an assessment of trade measures, and the imperatives and prospects for further trade liberalization. Its immediate conclusion was that, despite general advocacy of the need for an improved, strengthened, open and expanding trading system and further trade liberalization efforts, there had been no overall move towards trade liberalization during the preceding year. The prospect of success, said the report, would depend on the following elements for which efforts by member States would be required: recognition of the communality of interests derived from trade liberalization, as well as of the burden of protectionism on the national and international communities; implementation of past commitments under UNCTAD resolution 159(VI)(11) in product areas where protective trade actions had been especially intense; identification of further product areas of export interest to developing countries where substantial export growth was expected in the event of trade liberalization; encouragement and promotion of unilateral and autonomous reduction and elimination of tariffs and non-tariff distortions; increased transparency and strengthened multilateral surveillance of trade actions; and identification of other measures to assist the efforts of developing countries to promote and diversify their trade in specific product areas of export interest to them.

The report's second part⁽¹²⁾ surveyed trends and shifts in output, employment and trade in the world economy, including the main structural developments in the agricultural, manufacturing and services sectors. Individual chapters were devoted to manufacturing, services and structural adjustment, and structural adjustment policies.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

The Second Committee had before it a draft resolution⁽¹³⁾ on protectionism and structural adjustment, originally submitted in 1980 on behalf of the Group of 77⁽¹⁴⁾ and revised by the sponsors in 1981.⁽¹⁵⁾ It was considered in 1982,⁽¹⁶⁾ 1983,⁽¹⁷⁾ 1984⁽¹⁸⁾ and 1985, when it was referred to the Assembly's 1986 session.⁽¹⁹⁾

By the draft, the Assembly would urge the developed countries to limit protectionist policies and facilitate measures to increase the share of developing countries in international trade. A table containing suggestions by some developed countries for changes in the draft was annexed to it.

On 5 December, by decision 41/437, the Assembly, on the Committee's recommendation, deferred consideration of the draft until 1987.

Services

Following the 1985 TDB definition⁽⁶⁾ of a work programme for UNCTAD regarding services, which called for further in-depth studies of the role of services in the development process to enable countries to analyse the role of the service sector in their economies and its contribution to all aspects of the development process, the UNCTAD secretariat reported on the subject⁽²⁰⁾ to the Board's September/October 1986 session. The report addressed in greater detail areas covered in a 1985 report⁽⁶⁾ and concentrated on some of the most pertinent questions raised therein: the rise of enhanced producer services and their effect on trade and development; opportunities presented to developing countries by the process of transnationalization of services production; and possible objectives and policy measures aimed at strengthening the contribution of services to development and the implications for those objectives of proposals for international co-operation on services.

Trade preferences

Generalized system of preferences

TDB'S Special Committee on Preferences held its fourteenth session at Geneva from 26 May to 4 June 1986.⁽²¹⁾ It had before it the UNCTAD secretariat's tenth general report on implementing the generalized system of preferences (GSP),⁽²²⁾ which described changes and improvements in the system since the previous review in 1985,⁽²³⁾ gave updated information on the trade effects of the system and outlined elements of a study programme for evaluating the effects of GSP.

Improvements in beneficiary lists, product coverage and tariff cuts had been modest at best and there had been a tendency to restrict further the preferential limits on certain categories of products, said the report. With regard to the rules of origin, EEC had improved the method of calculation of originating inputs under its regional cumulation system. Other changes included: a New Zealand decision to reconsider reinstatement of preferential treatment on certain products from countries graduated from the scheme on the basis of a per capita income threshold; Spain's and Portugal's January 1986 accession to EEC, under the terms of which they would progressively apply the Community scheme of generalized preferences, leading to full implementation in January 1993; and Australia's introduction in July 1986 of a revised scheme based on a uniform tariff cut of 5 percentage points on all products from developing countries, resulting in reduced trade benefits, as a uniform tariff cut of 10 percentage points was the minimum necessary to maintain existing benefits.

The report stated that trade benefits of GSP continued to be constrained by the exclusion of key products of export interest to developing countries, the strict limitations on preferential imports under the major schemes and the stringency of origin rules. Since GSP covered only selected agricultural products, beneficiary countries with a broader industrial base and diversified industrial exports benefited more than those relying heavily on exports of agricultural raw materials. However, a number of beneficiaries had not fulfilled the notification requirements with respect to one or more preference-giving countries and had thus unwittingly disqualified themselves from such preferences.

The UNCTAD secretariat's study programme to examine how far the economic objectives of GSP had been achieved consisted of three parts: studies of the initial effects of preferential treatment on exports; research on industrialization and economic growth in beneficiary developing countries; and a synthesis of the results of previous studies which would draw general conclusions about GSP and future trade policy initiatives. With regard to the United States, the initial scheme chosen for analysis, three policy implications were drawn: the major beneficiaries needed the preferential treatment in that market if they were to maintain or increase their market shares; if GSP was to have a meaningful effect on the export earnings of developing countries, there had to be more certainty of preferential treatment; and competitive need exclusions had not spread the benefits to the lesser beneficiaries.

The Special Committee also considered a report⁽²⁴⁾ on technical co-operation activities in connection with GSP during 1985.⁽²⁵⁾

On 30 May⁽⁵⁾ the Special Committee reaffirmed the agreed conclusions adopted at its 1985 session⁽²⁵⁾ and urged full and expeditious implementation of the recommendations therein. It recommended that TDB reconvene the Working Group on Rules of Origin in 1987 and urged Governments, particularly those of preference-giving countries, to make cash contributions to the UNCTAD trust fund and/or to provide in-kind support for the technical assistance programme on GSP.

Technical co-operation

During 1986,⁽²⁶⁾ UNCTAD increased its delivery of technical co-operation on GSP and other trade laws affecting exports of developing countries in response to requests for such assistance.

Direct trust fund contributions in 1986 to the UNCTAD interregional project on GSP and other trade laws amounted to some $169,000 from seven countries. In addition, in-kind support amounted to some $189,000 during the year. Given the budgetary constraints facing the United Nations, it had become increasingly difficult to draw on regular budget allocations to maintain the Geneva GSP focal point activities.

During the year, 25 missions were undertaken in all regions of the world: 11 national and three regional GSP seminars, and 11 advisory and/or fund-raising missions. In all, 825 participants from the private and public sectors of 34 beneficiary developing countries were trained.

In addition to in-kind contributions from many preference-giving and preference-receiving countries which provided experts to participate in seminars, trust-fund contributions were made by the Federal Republic of Germany, Switzerland, the United States and EEC to finance regional and national seminars. Also, Japan, in the context of the UNDP/UNCTAD regional GSP project for Asia and the Pacific, had financed since 1982 and would continue to finance the salary and travel of an associate expert.

Project personnel and consultants updated GSP handbooks on the schemes of Canada, New Zealand and the United States and supervised their translation into French and Spanish.

Trade among countries having different economic and social systems

In accordance with a 1985 TDB decision⁽²⁷⁾ the UNCTAD secretariat included in its annual review of trends and policies in trade and economic co-operation among countries having different economic and social systems⁽²⁸⁾ a section on the implementation of UNCTAD resolutions 15(II),⁽²⁹⁾ 53(III)⁽³⁰⁾ and 95(IV).⁽³¹⁾ That section discussed developments in trade and economic co-operation between countries with different systems, gave an account of bilateral and multilateral consultations between interested member States of UNCTAD since their inception in 1969, and described technical assistance activities (see ITC below) and secretariat activities. Other sections of the report dealt with some aspects of the operation of the world trading system, UNCTAD's role in confidence-building and economic security, and proposals for further promotion of trade and economic co-operation among countries having different economic and social systems, with particular consideration given to the interests of developing countries.

The secretariat also submitted a separate document⁽³²⁾ elaborating on those proposals. In addition to summarizing UNCTAD activities in trade and economic relations among countries having different economic and social systems and analysing the international environment in which they were being implemented, the report: set forth the aims for expanding trade and economic co-operation and enhancing their role as an instrument in the structural adjustment of national economies; outlined the principles in accordance with which contacts were maintained and also measures which partners could take to expand trade and economic co-operation; listed steps to improve the institutional machinery and the forms of trade and economic co-operation; dealt with possible avenues of activity for UNCTAD to assist member countries in expanding trade; and proposed steps to increase the effectiveness of UNCTAD secretariat work in that area.

On 10 September⁽³³⁾ TDB remitted the informal text annexed to UNCTAD decision 145(VI)⁽³⁴⁾ to the next session of the Board dealing with matters concerning trade relations among countries having different economic and social systems.

Trade promotion and facilitation

During 1986, United Nations bodies continued to assist developing countries to promote their exports and facilitate the movement of goods in international commerce. The International Trade Centre was the main body for technical co-operation.

The Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Restrictive Business Practices met in October and, in December, the General Assembly decided to convene in 1990 a United Nations Conference to Review All Aspects of the Set of Multilaterally Agreed Equitable Principles and Rules for the Control of Restrictive Business Practices.

International Trade Centre

During 1986, ITC, under the joint sponsorship of UNCTAD and GATT, continued its technical co-operation activities, serving as the focal point for United Nations assistance to developing countries in formulating and implementing trade promotion programmes⁽³⁵⁾

The value of ITC's technical co-operation activities climbed from a fairly constant $15 million annually since 1980 to over $21 million in 1986. For the first time, the volume of UNDP-financed activities overtook that financed by trust fund contributions. A number of new trust fund contributions were recorded from developing countries as well as from developed countries and socialist countries of Eastern Europe.

The value of programme implementation in Africa rose to $4.9 million from $3.4 million in 1985. In Asia and the Pacific, implementation also rose from $4.4 million to $7 million. In Latin America and the Caribbean, implementation increased to $2.4 million from $2 million. In Europe, the Mediterranean and the Middle East, implementation rose to $1.6 million from $1 million. Interregional activities also rose from $4.3 million to $5.5 million.

ITC assistance to developing countries regarding institutional infrastructure for trade promotion at the national level was generally concentrated on establishing trade promotion organizations or on providing advice leading to the restructuring and strengthening of existing institutions. Consultations, round-table meetings, advisory missions on inter-institutional co-ordination, preparation of export promotion programmes and formulation of medium-term export development strategies were held in Algeria, Burundi, Chile, Costa Rica, Cote d'Ivoire, Cyprus, Djibouti, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Honduras, Jordan, Malawi, Paraguay, Rwanda, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Tunisia and Zimbabwe.

In export market development, close to 100 projects were operational in 1986, including several multiyear projects: on processed food products, citrus, cardamom, shrimp and shrimp products in Central America; on wooden furniture and silk products in China; on builders' woodwork and wood-based panels; on agricultural machinery in Argentina; on natural rubber products; and on cotton yarn in the Sudan. Export market development activities also included trade information services, establishment of links between exporters in developing countries and importers in industrialized countries and in other developing countries, and product and market development.

ITC activities in specialized national trade promotion services included export packaging, export finance services, costing and pricing for export, trade fairs and commercial publicity, export quality control, national commercial representation abroad, legal aspects of foreign trade, export co-operation schemes for small and medium-sized enterprises, trade in technical consultancy services, and international physical distribution of goods.

With regard to commodity promotion, ITC undertook in 1986 a limited programme in continuation of the jute market development projects implemented during 1981-1985. The programme consisted of concrete promotion actions designed to defend and strengthen the competitive position of jute and jute products in Japan, the United States and Western Europe. However, due to financial constraints, the scope of these activities was below the scale foreseen under the projects approved by the International Jute Council. Close contacts were maintained with the International Tea Promotion Association and the International Institute for Cotton to identify potential areas of co-operation, and a project proposal for a generic market promotion programme for pepper and pepper products was endorsed by the International Pepper Community.

ITC's programme of manpower development for trade promotion emphasized a two-pronged approach: in the short term, the organization of direct training activities to upgrade existing skills and introduce new skills and techniques; and, in the longer term, the strengthening of training institutions through the training of trainers and providing new, specialized training materials. ITC also carried out a continuing programme of research and development in support of those activities.

Activities in national import operations and techniques in 1986 included projects in Angola, Burundi, Colombia, Djibouti, Egypt, Ethiopia, Malawi, Mozambique, Rwanda and Zimbabwe. Among integrated ITC projects containing import components were those in Burkina Faso, Lesotho, Madagascar, Mauritania, Mauritius and the Niger.

In 1986, the number of national projects under the ITC special programme of technical co-operation with the least developed countries (LDCs) reached 29 and absorbed some 30 per cent of the Centre's programme resources. In addition, numerous programming and advisory missions were undertaken in those countries.

Activities under the programme of technical co-operation with national chambers of commerce largely concentrated on training and research, the latter leading to the publication of numerous monographs and guidelines. National seminars were organized with chambers of commerce in Pakistan and Sri Lanka on the legal aspects of foreign trade and similar training events were held in New Delhi, India, and Jakarta, Indonesia, for member countries of the South Asian Association for Regional Co-operation and the Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN), respectively.

Total ITC expenditure in 1986 was $34.9 million, of which technical co-operation activities accounted for $21.4 million. Trust fund contributions furnished $10.3 million of the 1986 amount for technical co-operation and the remainder was provided by UNDP. The Centre's 1986 budget of $10.6 million, covering operations at its Geneva headquarters, was contributed equally by the United Nations and GATT. As at 31 December, ITC had a headquarters-based staff of 76 Professionals and 136 in the General Service category. ITC assigned 805 experts to projects during the year.

JAG action. The Joint Advisory Group (JAG) on ITC (nineteenth session, Geneva, 7-15 April)⁽³⁶⁾ had before it the annual report on ITC activities during 1985,⁽³⁷⁾ an evaluation of the ITC sub-programme on export financial services,⁽³⁸⁾ a revision of the ITC section in the United Nations medium-term plan, 1984-1989,⁽³⁹⁾ and a report on the technical nature of discussions in JAG.⁽⁴⁰⁾

The Group made a general recommendation that the ITC Executive Director should implement the recommendations contained in its report,⁽³⁶⁾ which included: that ITC should continue to focus on helping Governments to overcome shortcomings facing national trade promotion organizations and should remain alert to possibilities of further improving its co-operation with those organizations; that further attention should be paid to more effective dissemination of ITC market surveys and reports, establishing linkages between ITC computerized trade statistical information services and those at import promotion offices in developed countries, streamlining preparations for ITC dissemination seminars in developing countries, reviewing the compilation of the list of market surveys from which ITC activities were selected, and strengthening ITC's capability to answer trade inquiries; that the trade information component should be more fully integrated within ITC national integrated assistance projects; that innovative mechanisms and substantial resources should be introduced for the effective implementation of ITC technical co-operation in support of small and medium-sized enterprises; that ITC's technical co-operation to LDCs should be further expanded, particularly in encouraging export-oriented investments; that a self-evaluation system for improving project performance should be introduced; that ITC should encourage economic and technical co-operation among developing countries within its technical co-operation projects; that ITC should expand its technical co-operation activities to enhance women's participation in trade promotion activities; that ITC should play an expanding role in the area of export financial services; that, on a trial basis, a meeting of specialists to review the report on the technical nature of discussions in JAG⁽⁴⁰⁾ should be held two to three months prior to the Group's next session and the experience of that mechanism would be reviewed by JAG; that, in view of the need to effect savings and make the annual report a more issue-oriented document, the JAG session should be held over five rather than seven days and that reduced documentation for the meeting should include a more concise annual report; and that ITC should consider ways of assisting developing countries in counter-trade and report to JAG in 1987.

Accounts for 1984-1985

Reporting in 1986 on its audit of ITC for the biennium 1984-1985,⁽⁴¹⁾ the United Nations Board of Auditors found that unliquidated obligations were retained beyond the financial period to which they related and that there were weaknesses in the recording and reporting at year-end of unliquidated obligations for project accounts. In addition, project documents did not always describe the reporting requirements clearly and the submission of progress reports was not always in line with the schedule. In one project, the Board noted a substantial increase in the equipment component, which was not a main objective of the project's activities, and it also noticed deficiencies in the timely settlement of the regular budget surplus account and in the budget estimates of interest income on investments.

The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions⁽⁴²⁾ had no comments regarding the Board's report.

Trade facilitation

During 1986, the technical assistance work of UNCTAD's Special Programme on Trade Facilitation (FALPRO) was particularly intense, with more than 70 missions to 32 countries.

Advisory services were provided through trust funds contributed by Finland for co-operation with the countries members of the Southern Africa Development Co-ordination Committee and of the Preferential Trade Area for Eastern and Southern African States. FALPRO activities were also organized in the context of projects executed by ITC and the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, with financing from UNDP, the European Development Fund, the Netherlands and Switzerland. Advisory missions, financed by Finland, were carried out in Botswana, Burundi, the Comoros, Ethiopia, Kenya, Lesotho, Malawi, Mauritius, Mozambique, Rwanda, Somalia, the Sudan, Swaziland, Uganda, the United Republic of Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe.

In co-operation with ITC, two missions were undertaken to Honduras within the framework of a Swiss trust-fund project. With financing from national UNDP project funds, technical assistance was provided to Guatemala, Haiti, Nepal, Nicaragua, Nigeria and Trinidad and Tobago.

The Netherlands and UNDP financed regional projects in Asia which enabled FALPRO to carry out technical assistance and training activities in Brunei Darussalam, Hong Kong, Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore, Sri Lanka and Thailand. Planning and programming missions were undertaken to Finland and to ASEAN members, as a result of which additional trust funds were obtained and a regional project for Asia was approved by UNDP.

Various manuals, directories and code systems in trade facilitation, established jointly by UNCTAD and the Economic Commission for Europe (ECE), were updated during the year. Four issues of Trade Facilitation News were published by ECE and FALPRO in 1986.

Restrictive business practices

The UNCTAD Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Restrictive Business Practices held its fifth session at Geneva from 15 to 24 October 1986.⁽⁴³⁾ The Group had before it a note by the UNCTAD secretariat⁽⁴⁴⁾ containing extracts of replies received from States and regional groups on their action to meet their commitments to the Set of Multilaterally Agreed Equitable Principles and Rules for the Control of Restrictive Business Practices (known as the Set), adopted in 1980.⁽⁴⁵⁾

In accordance with the Group's 1984 request,⁽⁴⁶⁾ the secretariat also submitted a note⁽⁴⁷⁾ giving outlines of proposed studies on: the concentration of market power through mergers, take-overs, joint ventures and other acquisitions of control and its effects on the markets of developing countries; the relationship of restrictive business practices control with industrialization policies and regional integration; the interaction of restrictive business practices and trade policy; and sectoral studies on the international film, book publishing and food industries. With regard to another 1984 request for the further development of studies on restrictive business practices in the services sector and on tied-purchasing practices, the secretariat noted that it had been unable to comply, due to the lack of response from Governments to a request for appropriate information.

Also before the Group were secretariat notes on the implementation of technical assistance, advisory and training programmes on restrictive business practices⁽⁴⁸⁾ and on preparations for a handbook on restrictive business practices legislation and for a revised draft of a model law or laws for the control of restrictive business practices.⁽⁴⁹⁾

On 24 October, the Group decided to annex to its report texts submitted by the Group of 77 developing countries and Group B (developed market economies). By the Group of 77 draft resolution, the Intergovernmental Group would have called on States to implement the Set and particularly on developed countries to refrain from authorizing or tolerating the use by enterprises under their jurisdiction of restrictive business practices having adverse effects on international trade of developing countries and on the economic development of those countries. It would have reiterated its invitation to international organizations and financing programmes, particularly UNDP, to provide resources to finance technical assistance activities envisaged in the Set, expressed gratitude to Norway and Sweden for contributions to the UNCTAD Restrictive Business Practices Trust Fund, and invited all countries, particularly developed ones, to contribute to the technical assistance programmes.

It would also have requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General to continue examining collusive tendering practices with a view to updating the study on the subject, reiterated its request to States to provide information on tied purchasing and restrictive business practices in the services sector, and requested the secretariat to proceed with compiling the handbook on restrictive business practices legislation. The UNCTAD Secretary-General would have been requested to prepare studies on: the interaction of restrictive business practices and trade policy measures; the relationship of restrictive business practices control with industrialization policies and regional integration; the concentration of market power through mergers, take-overs, joint ventures and other acquisitions of control and its effects on developing countries' markets; and restrictive business practices in the food industry. Further, it would have welcomed the secretariat's efforts to strengthen an information base on restrictive business practices and urged States to provide the secretariat with information to assist in its task of preparing the studies requested as well as the annual reports called for in the Set.

By the Group B draft text, the Intergovernmental Group would have adopted a set of conclusions by which it would have: called on States that had not adopted or enforced existing restrictive business practices legislation to do so in conformity with the Set; concluded that there was no evidence of significant anti-competitive practices in the area of restrictive business practices in the consulting services sector and that further work by the UNCTAD secretariat on its 1984 study⁽⁵⁰⁾ would not be required; considered that the secretariat should revise its 1984 study on tied purchasing⁽⁵⁰⁾ to confine its scope to the Set's subject-matter taking into account comments by Governments; agreed that, in preparing any future study, the secretariat should disseminate to Governments in advance of the Group's next session a detailed outline of the subject-matter and approach to be taken; requested the UNCTAD secretariat to prepare a detailed outline on the subject of the interrelationship between restrictive business practice control and industrialization and regional integration in developing countries, in the light of comments by regional groups during the session; urged international organizations and financing programmes, particularly UNDP, to provide resources for technical assistance activities; requested the UNCTAD secretariat to proceed with its compilation of a handbook on restrictive business practices legislation, taking account of comments by regional groups at the session; and called on the secretariat to continue its work on the model law or laws for developing countries, taking into account comments made at the Group's sessions.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

In September 1986,⁽⁵¹⁾ the UNCTAD Secretary-General reported to the General Assembly that, in accordance with its resolution⁽⁵²⁾ on the 1985 United Nations Conference to Review All Aspects of the Set of Multilaterally Agreed Equitable Principles and Rules for the Control of Restrictive Business Practices⁽⁵³⁾ he had consulted with representatives of regional groups and Governments. It had been agreed to recommend that the Assembly should convene in 1990, under the auspices of UNCTAD, a United Nations conference on the subject, and that the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Restrictive Business Practices, at its 1990 session, should serve as the preparatory body for that conference.

On 5 December, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the Assembly adopted resolution 41/167 without vote.

Restrictive business practices

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 35/63 of 5 December 1980, by which it adopted the Set of Multilaterally Agreed Equitable Principles and Rules for the Control of Restrictive Business Practices, and decided to convene, in 1985, under the auspices of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, a United Nations conference to review all aspects of the Set of Principles and Rules,

Having considered the report of the United Nations Conference to Review All Aspects of the Set of Multilaterally Agreed Equitable Principles and Rules for the Control of Restrictive Business Practices, together with the proposals made by regional groups, and the outcome of the consultations held in pursuance of General Assembly resolution 40/192 of 17 December 1985, reflected in the report of the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development,

1. Decides to convene, in 1990, under the auspices of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, a United Nations Conference to Review All Aspects of the Set of Multilaterally Agreed Equitable Principles and Rules for the Control of Restrictive Business Practices;

2. Decides also that the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Restrictive Business Practices, at its annual session in 1990, shall serve as the preparatory body for that Conference.

Commodities

The World Economic Survey 1986(1) stated that primary commodity markets, which had been depressed since 1980, remained so in 1985 when, even as measured in terms of a composite basket of currencies such as the SDK (special drawing right), prices declined by 8.6 per cent relative to average 1984 levels. In late 1982, minerals, agricultural raw materials and beverages had lost about one fourth of their 1980 value, while vegetable oils lost one third and foodstuffs almost half. The ensuing price rebound was shortest and weakest for metals, which regained only 5 index points before resuming their descent in the third quarter of 1983. They continued to drop until early 1985 and then stabilized at around 73 per cent of their 1980 level. By the end of 1985, agricultural raw material prices were 31 per cent below their 1980 level. On average, beverage prices dropped by 3.1 per cent a year since 1980. Vegetable oils and oilseeds showed the greatest price instability during the 1980s, losing one third of their 1980 value by the end of 1982, doubling in the course of the next year and a half, only to plunge again over the next 18 months to virtually the same level of late 1982. By far the worst overall price performance was that of foodstuffs whose prices dropped, on average, by 14.9 per cent each year since 1980. In real terms, food prices in April 1986 stood at their lowest level since the late 1940s.

Although specific factors were determinants of price trends in individual commodities, a number of general factors continued to affect different groups of commodities. These included a commodity glut which caused prices to fall, the appreciation of the dollar which acted as a damper on import demand in local currencies for several commodities and a policy-induced deflationary environment and slow-down in economic activity in industrialized countries.

The Trade and Development Report, 1986(54) said the weakness of commodity prices in recent years had reflected the expansion of supply in the face of stagnant or slowly growing demand, particularly for agricultural commodities. In 1984, total commodity production rose by 6 per cent, a record level. In 1985 a further substantial rise in output occurred.

The outlook for 1986, said the Report, was for some strengthening of commodity prices, reflecting mainly better growth in developed market-economy countries, the lower exchange rate of the dollar, and particular developments on the supply side, especially the impact of drought on supplies of coffee. The strengthening was expected to be uneven, however. As of early 1986, the minerals and metals markets continued to show weakness, reflecting in part the collapse of the tin market and its repercussions. The overall strengthening of commodity prices expected in 1986 was not likely to match that likely to occur for prices of manufactures exported by developed countries, so that the terms of trade of commodities relative to manufactures were expected to deteriorate further.

In accordance with 1985 conclusions of the Committee on Commodities⁽⁵⁵⁾ a Working Party on Processing, Marketing and Distribution, including Transportation, convened at Geneva from 29 September to 9 October 1986.⁽⁵⁶⁾ The Working Party had before it an UNCTAD secretariat report on technical assistance and human resources development in the area of processing, marketing and distribution of commodities⁽⁵⁷⁾ and a note by the secretariat⁽⁵⁸⁾ containing extracts of replies from international organizations on technical assistance and human resources development in that area.

The Working Party decided to annex to its report proposals of the Group of 77 and of Group B. The Group of 77 paper outlined draft principles on technical assistance and human resources development. In the area of training in processing, marketing and distribution, including transportation of commodities, developed countries would be called on to: provide information on, and ready access for nationals of developing countries to, training facilities in their countries and assist them in establishing their own training capabilities; and recommend to their enterprises involved in such activities to provide in-house training for personnel from developing countries and particularly with respect to repair and maintenance, adapting technology to local conditions, and managerial and marketing skills. International organizations would be invited to expand their training programmes in those areas, while the UNCTAD secretariat should facilitate the provision of information to developing countries on training facilities and materials and identify any needs not being met.

Developed countries would be called on to facilitate the supply of technical assistance, including experts and equipment, and to foster an exchange of personnel to enhance the level of skills and human resource training capabilities. International organizations would be invited to strengthen their technical assistance programmes and UNCTAD would be requested to facilitate exchanges of personnel by acting as a clearing-house for channelling requests and offers.

In the area of financing technical assistance and human resources development, developed countries would be requested to recommend to their enterprises that they sponsor personnel from developing countries for scholarships, training courses and workshops, and to increase financial resources. International organizations should emphasize processing, marketing and distribution, including transportation, of commodities in their training and technical assistance programmes and UNCTAD and other international organizations should collaborate in preparing technical assistance and training programmes for specific commodities.

In connection with research and development, developed countries should recommend to their enterprises that they make available to enterprises in developing countries the results of their research and development, assist in adapting technology to local conditions and assist in improving quality and grading of products. Technical assistance should focus on the scientific and technical capacity of developing countries in areas such as mineral exploration, mining and processing, development of new high-yielding plant varieties and employment of advanced processing technologies. Research and development capabilities in developing countries needed to be strengthened through the provision of expertise, exchanges of personnel and information, and assurance of regular funding from enterprises, Governments and international institutions.

The Group B paper said that further consideration by the Working Party of what constituted relevant technical assistance and human resources development in the context of processing, marketing and distribution of commodities was necessary. Work could be enriched by further submissions from the UNCTAD secretariat, member countries and international organizations on current systems and practices operating in developing countries and ways by which flows of technical assistance and human resources development could be enhanced, taking account of: the need for clarification of specific kinds of technical assistance required by developing countries, bearing in mind the extensive activities already in place; the need to have illustrations of some representative systems and practices operating in developing countries whereby processing industries obtained labour, management and marketing resources with the necessary qualifications and skills; and the need for suggestions on how systems and practices could be strengthened or improved and the roles that could be played by enterprises, Governments, international organizations and the academic community.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

In accordance with a 1985 decision⁽⁵⁹⁾ the General Assembly's Second Committee resumed in May 1986 to consider international co-operation in the interrelated areas of money, finance, debt, resource flows, trade and development (see p. 489) and to deal with some unfinished business, including a draft resolution on commodities submitted by the Group of 77 in 1985.⁽⁶⁵⁾ On 20 June, on the recommendation of the Committee, the Assembly (decision 40/474) deferred consideration of the draft to its 1986 session.

In October⁽⁶⁰⁾ the Secretariat transmitted to the Assembly the draft resolutions on which action had been deferred in 1985 and 1986, including that on commodities.

On 5 December, by decision 41/436, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the Assembly deferred until its forty-second (1987) session consideration of the draft resolution on commodities.

Also on that day, on the Committee's recommendation, the Assembly adopted resolution 41/168 without vote.

Commodities

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 3201(S-VI) and 3202(S-VI) of 1 May 1974, containing the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order, 3281(XXIX) of 12 December 1974, containing the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, 3362(S-VII) of 16 September 1975 on development and international economic co-operation, and 35/56 of 5 December 1980, the annex to which contains the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Recalling also United Nations Conference on Trade and Development resolutions 93(IV) of 30 May 1976, 124(V) of 3 June 1979 and 155(VI) of 2 July 1983 on the Integrated Programme for Commodities and 153(VI) of 2 July 1983 on the Common Fund for Commodities,

Expressing deep concern at the problems facing commodity-producing countries,

Bearing in mind Trade and Development Board decision 341(XXXIII) of 3 October 1986, as adopted, on the provisional agenda, place, date and duration of the seventh session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development,

1. Stresses the urgent need for appropriate and early action to address the present world situation in the field of commodities;

2. Urges all States to make the maximum effort to contribute to the achievement of positive results at the seventh session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, in solving short-term and long-term commodity problems, particularly those adversely affecting the economies of developing countries;

3. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to continue to monitor closely movements in international commodity trade, including long-term trends and prospects for primary commodities, in accordance with the mandate of the Conference;

4. Decides to review at its forty-second session the relevant outcome of the seventh session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and to give impetus to follow-up action in the field of commodities.

General Assembly resolution 41/168

5 December 1986

Meeting 98

Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/857Add.1) without vote, 28 November (meeting 35); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/41/L.70), orally revised, based on informal consultations on draft by Yugoslavia, for Group of 77 (A/C.2/41/L.47); agenda item 79 (a).

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 2nd Committee 19, 23-28, 33-35; plenary 98.

Common Fund for Commodities

During 1986, preparations continued on arrangements for the Common Fund for Commodities, a mechanism intended to stabilize the commodities market by helping to finance buffer stocks for specific commodities as well as commodity development activities such as research and marketing. During 1986, four additional States adhered to the 1980 Agreement Establishing the Common Fund for Commodities⁽⁶¹⁾ bringing the total adherents to 92, two above the number required for the Agreement to enter into force. The only remaining requirement to be met was that the countries having ratified represent two thirds of the Fund's directly contributed capital of $470 million. On 14 January, when Yemen became the ninetieth Government to ratify, those countries accounted for 57.87 per cent of the Fund's capital.

Signatures and ratifications

As at 31 December 1986, the 1980 Agreement Establishing the Common Fund for Commodities had been signed by 114 States and EEC, and 92 States had formally adhered by ratifying, accepting, approving or acceding to it.⁽⁶²⁾ Of these, one State (Uruguay) signed the Agreement during 1986 and four (Angola, Colombia, Democratic Yemen, Yemen) ratified it.

Agricultural commodities

Cocoa. On 25 July 1986, the United Nations Cocoa Conference, 1984, established the text of the International Cocoa Agreement, 1986.⁽⁶³⁾ By its final resolution, the Conference, which met from 10 February to 4 March and from 7 to 25 July 1986, having met twice in 1984⁽⁶⁴⁾ and once in 1985,⁽⁶⁵⁾ decided that the Arabic, English, French, Russian and Spanish texts of the Agreement should be equally authentic and requested that they be forwarded to the United Nations Secretary-General. He was asked to forward copies of the text to all Governments invited to the Conference and to arrange for the Agreement to be open for signature. The Conference drew the attention of Governments to the procedures laid down in the Agreement and invited them to deposit instruments of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession before 1 October 1986, or to notify that they would apply the Agreement provisionally.

The Conference also recommended that the International Cocoa Council, the body responsible for administering the Agreement, consider the application of Colombia and any other pending application to be included in an annex to the Agreement as soon as possible after its entry into force.

The principal aim of the Agreement, like that of previous ones, was to maintain the price of cocoa beans between an agreed set of prices. Distinctive features compared with previous Agreements included: incorporation of discretionary intervention prices; abandonment of the maximum and minimum prices; the withholding scheme to supplement the buffer stock; rules and procedures to revise price levels both at an annual review and at a special buffer-stock-related review; deletion of all references to borrowing; and the denomination of price levels in SDRs.

The Agreement was opened for signature from 1 to 30 September 1986. For it to enter into force definitively, the Agreement stated that instruments of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession must be deposited on behalf of Governments accounting for at least 80 per cent of total exports and 65 per cent of total imports of countries listed in annexes to the Agreement. If requirements for provisional entry into force were not met by 1 October, the Agreement provided that the United Nations should invite Governments to decide whether it should enter into force definitively or provisionally among themselves, in whole or in part, on a date to be determined by them. However, the decision to put the Agreement into force with effective market intervention measures could be taken only if Governments of exporting countries accounting for at least 80 per cent of total exports had deposited their instruments of ratification or notification of provisional application. Once entered into force, the Agreement would remain in force until the end of the third full cocoa year (from 1 October to 30 September inclusive), unless terminated earlier or extended by decision of the International Cocoa Council by special vote. The Agreement provided for a first extension of two years and a second of one year.

In September, the Council established standard conditions for accession from 1 October to 31

December 1986 and, in December, extended the standard conditions and the time-limit for deposit of instruments until 31 January 1987.

As at 31 December,⁽⁶²⁾ 27 countries and EEC had signed the Agreement, 14 of them having agreed to apply it provisionally. In addition, four countries had become party to it.

Jute. The International Agreement on Jute and Jute Products, 1982, the text of which was established by the United Nations Conference on Jute and Jute Products in 1982,⁽⁶³⁾ entered into force definitively on 26 August 1986, when the proper instruments of adherence had been deposited on behalf of Governments holding 85 per cent of net world exports and 65 per cent of net world imports. The Agreement had entered into force provisionally in 1984.⁽⁶⁴⁾

Olive oil. On 1 July 1986,⁽⁶⁵⁾ the United Nations Conference on Olive Oil, 1986 (Geneva, 18 June-1 July), having established the text of the International Agreement on Olive Oil and Table Olives, 1986,⁽⁶⁶⁾ requested the Executive Director of the International Olive Oil Council to arrange for the establishment of the Italian text of the Agreement. It decided that the texts in Arabic, English, French, Italian and Spanish should be equally authentic and requested that they be transmitted to the United Nations Secretary-General as the depositary of the Agreement. It drew the attention of Governments to the procedure for entry into force, particularly that it would be open for signature from 1 September to 31 December 1986.

The Agreement, which was to enter into force on 1 January 1987, replacing the International Olive Oil Agreement, 1979,⁽⁶⁷⁾ after its expiration on 31 December 1986, consisted of a preamble and 61 articles. Its aims were to: foster international co-operation for the integrated development of the world economy for olive products; maintain fair working conditions in the olive-growing and olive-products industry; foster co-ordination of production, industrialization and marketing policies for olive oil, olive-pomace oils and table olives and organize the market for those products; study and facilitate the application of measures for other products of the olive tree; continue and extend work done under previous Agreements; encourage research and development and the transfer of technology and training in the olive sector; and expand and standardize international trade in olive products.

As at 31 December,⁽⁶²⁾ four States (Algeria, Morocco, Tunisia, Turkey) had signed the Agreement and agreed to apply it provisionally, and EEC had signed it definitively.

Rubber. In accordance with its 1985 decision,⁽⁶⁸⁾ the United Nations Conference on Natural Rubber, 1985, reconvened from 5 to 23 May 1986 to prepare a successor agreement to the International Natural Rubber Agreement, 1979.⁽⁷⁰⁾ On 23 May,⁽⁷¹⁾ the Conference adjourned and asked the UNCTAD Secretary-General to arrange for it to reconvene in October. It urged exporting and importing countries to use the intervening period to make further progress on outstanding issues.

The Conference met again from 6 to 17 October 1986, adjourning on the latter date.⁽⁷²⁾ It noted that the Conference President, in co-operation with the UNCTAD Secretary-General, would undertake consultations towards establishing a successor agreement.

Minerals and metals

Copper. In accordance with a 1985 resolution of the Committee on Commodities,⁽⁷³⁾ the Ad Hoc Review Meeting on Copper met at Geneva from 8 to 12 December 1986.⁽⁷⁴⁾ The Meeting had before it an UNCTAD secretariat review of major trends and developments in the world copper market up to 1985,⁽⁷⁵⁾ which stated that, since the early 1970s, the market had been characterized by instability, slow growth and, recently, particularly depressed prices. In United States dollar terms, the price of copper had fallen sharply during the early 1980s and, taking inflation into account, had reached its lowest level for many decades. An imbalance between production capacity and demand was largely responsible for the low level of prices. This depressed price situation induced a number of producers to restructure or close down high-cost operations, as a result of which the country distribution of production had changed, with Chile replacing the United States as the world's largest producer of copper.

The Meeting also had before it a United States proposal for an intergovernmental producer-consumer forum on copper.⁽⁷⁶⁾ It agreed that the proposal should be considered further at a second ad hoc review meeting to be held during the first quarter of 1987. The UNCTAD Secretary-General was requested to make available to that meeting the terms of reference of the International Nickel Study Group and other documents to serve as a background for discussions. The Meeting welcomed the United States offer to submit additional material and invited other Governments to submit suggestions.

Iron ore. In accordance with a 1985 recommendation of the Fourth Preparatory Meeting on Iron Ore,⁽⁷⁷⁾ an Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Iron Ore held its first session at Geneva from 27 October to 6 November 1986.⁽⁷⁸⁾

Before it was an UNCTAD secretariat review of the current market situation and outlook for iron ore,⁽⁷⁹⁾ which described developments in the world iron ore market in 1984, 1985 and part of 1986. After the depressed levels of world production, consumption and trade in 1982-1983, the iron ore industry recorded a better performance in 1984 and 1985, thanks to the economic recovery in those years, particularly in the major steel-consuming countries. Production and trade increased by almost 12 per cent in 1984 and 2.5 per cent in 1985, when production reached some 892 million tons, the highest level of the 1980s. The volume of international trade in iron ore in 1985 was about 374 million tons, some 1 per cent higher than the preceding year, but still low compared with the record level of 412 million tons in 1974. In terms of net trade, developed market-economy countries experienced the sharpest decline with reduced levels of both imports and exports. Developing countries, on the other hand, increased both their export volume and their market share. They also increased their share as iron ore importers, reflecting the gradual shift of crude steel production away from the traditional producing centres of developed market-economy countries to the new producing areas of developing countries, particularly South America and South Asia.

The fragility of the existing price mechanisms and contractual arrangements became apparent during 1984 and 1985. They continued to be influenced by a buyer's market, where iron ore consumers were more inclined to diversify their sources of supply and negotiate tonnage advantages with sellers willing to accept unchanged or reduced prices in exchange for increased sales volumes. Marketing practices based on traditional long-term contracts containing flexible clauses for fixing both annual prices and quantities were also proving inadequate and the price level was greatly affected by the strengthening of the United States dollar.

The UNCTAD secretariat also transmitted to the Group a report containing statistics on iron ore from 1974 to 1985⁽⁸⁰⁾ and a report⁽⁸¹⁾ containing a draft questionnaire to be used for gathering iron ore data from Governments.

The Group reviewed the iron ore statistics and made suggestions for their improvement, particularly with regard to terminology and definitions. The first part of the draft statistical questionnaire was amended by the Group, which recommended that the revised questionnaire be sent to Governments for completion and comment on both parts.

With regard to the Group's 1987 session, suggestions for secretariat reports included: transport costs and freight rates; technical and economic limits for using potential substitutes for iron ore; the evolution of iron ore consumption, particularly the relation between crude steel production and iron ore consumption in terms of iron content; analysis of various scenarios for the future evolution of iron ore consumption; planned closures, expansions and new projects related to iron ore; a bibliography of studies, including those being prepared in other international organizations; and the impact and effect of energy costs in the consumption of metallics, such as scrap, pig iron and sponge iron.

Nickel. The United Nations Conference on Nickel, 1985,⁽⁷⁷⁾ reconvened at Geneva from 28 April to 2 May 1986. The Conference had before it a paper by Canada⁽⁸²⁾ discussing the advantages and disadvantages of an International Nickel Study Group sharing the secretariat of the International Lead and Zinc Study Group, on the understanding that the two would otherwise be separate and autonomous. Principal advantages were cost savings and perhaps faster realization of certain nickel statistical goals. Also, the expertise of the Lead and Zinc Group personnel could permit statistical work of the Nickel Group to begin quickly. On the other hand, it was possible that a joint secretariat would not permit the Nickel Group to realize its full potential. Lead and Zinc Group members would not be willing to see the Group's secretariat services decline to accommodate the Nickel Group, resulting in some activities, such as the monthly statistical publication, being given lower priority. Also, concern had been expressed that integrating nickel with lead-zinc could lead to actions to include other metals, such as copper, under the same secretariat, resulting in industry support and participation in the study groups being adversely affected.

A further Canadian document⁽⁸³⁾ put forward funding formula options for the Nickel Group.

On 2 May, the Conference⁽⁸⁴⁾ established the International Nickel Study Group, by which it adopted the Group's terms of reference, including those on which agreement had not been reached in 1985.⁽⁷⁷⁾ It requested the United Nations Secretary-General to forward them to all Governments invited to the Conference and urged them to notify him of their acceptance before 20 September 1986. The Secretary-General was also asked to open a bank account on behalf of the Group to accept advances against contributions to the Group's budget to cover the costs of its inaugural meeting, which the UNCTAD Secretary-General was requested to convene.

Tungsten. At its eighteenth session (Geneva, 3-7 November 1986),⁽⁸⁵⁾ the Committee on Tungsten reviewed discussions, proposals and work on stabilizing the tungsten market to enable producing and consuming countries to agree on market stabilization measures and the convening of a negotiating conference.

The Committee had before it an UNCTAD secretariat report on recent developments and the market's short-term outlook⁽⁸⁶⁾ a secretariat study on structural and technological change in the industry with reference to scrap recycling in Japan and the United States⁽⁸⁷⁾ and a secretariat note updating previous Committee reports on pricing indicators and trade in intermediate products⁽⁸⁸⁾

The Committee agreed that the UNCTAD secretariat should include in the documentation for its next (1987) session studies on: characterization of the current crisis of the market and of the primary tungsten and intermediate products industry; in-depth analysis of the origins of the crisis; changing patterns of production, trade and marketing of intermediate products; structural and technological change, particularly in the area of substitution and reduced use of tungsten, including related research and development and market promotion; and the relationship of exchange-rate variations and local currency prices to supply and demand trends. It was also agreed that the question of stabilizing the tungsten market be included in the next session's agenda.

Manufactures

The UNCTAD Committee on Manufactures held its eleventh session at Geneva from 2 to 19 June 1986,⁽⁸⁹⁾ the tenth having been held in 1983.⁽⁹⁰⁾

The main document before the Committee was a two-part UNCTAD secretariat report on the salient features of trends and policies in trade of manufactures and semi-manufactures⁽⁹¹⁾ Part I, comprising six chapters, dealt with trade in manufactures and semi-manufactures of developing countries and territories as at 1984. It reviewed patterns of trade in manufactures in aggregative terms for three main groupings of countries (developed market-economy countries, developing countries, and socialist countries of Eastern Europe and Asia) and reported that world trade in manufactures rose at an annual rate of 19.1 per cent between 1970 and 1980 but declined 1.2 per cent annually between 1980 and 1983. The value of exports of manufactures from developing countries rose at an annual rate for those periods of 26.5 per cent and 7.5 per cent, respectively. The share of developing countries in world exports of manufactures increased from 5 per cent in 1970 to 9 per cent in 1980 and in 1983 was just under 12 per cent.

Other chapters examined the export performance of developing countries in individual developed market-economy countries and dynamic and stagnant products in respect of changing patterns of comparative advantage in developing countries' exports of manufactures to developed market-economy countries. Also discussed were exports of manufactures from developed market-economy countries to developing countries, showing their importance as export markets for manufactures, trade in manufactures among developing countries, and trade in manufactures between developing countries and socialist countries of Eastern Europe and Asia.

Part II of the report, comprising five chapters, was a review of factors affecting exports of manufactures and semi-manufactures by developing countries. Following an introduction, the report discussed evidence of export performance of developing countries, and internal and external factors affecting their export performance. The final chapter was devoted to policy issues.

Statistics on trade of manufactures and semi-manufactures were annexed to the report.

Also before the Committee was an UNCTAD secretariat review of the Committee's work programme.⁽⁹²⁾

The Committee annexed to its report a draft decision submitted on behalf of the Group of 77. By that decision, the Committee would have requested the UNCTAD secretariat to submit to it further studies and revised previous studies, aimed at identifying problems in specific sectors of current and potential export interest to developing countries, such as textiles and clothing, leather and footwear, steel, copper products, petrochemicals including fertilizers and plastics, processed agricultural products, wood products and consumer electronics.

Finance

During 1986, several United Nations bodies focused on international financial and monetary issues and expressed concern at the continuing debt problems of developing countries. Draft resolutions on debt were considered at the resumed session of the General Assembly's Second Committee in May and sent to the Assembly's forty-first session later in 1986. In December, the Assembly agreed on a number of elements connected with the problems of external indebtedness and invited all those involved to take them into account with a view to reaching solutions.

At its 1986 session, CDP discussed the issue of development finance and proposed that flows of finance for development be doubled by the end of the decade. In December, the UNCTAD Committee on Invisibles and Financing related to Trade considered both external financing of economic development and trade financing for developing countries.

In July, an intergovernmental group of experts discussed compensatory financing of export earnings shortfalls.

Financial policy

In the report on its March 1986 session,⁽¹⁾ CDP said that developments in the world economic situation during 1985 had led many policy-makers to a somewhat complacent view of world economic prospects. However, the financial system was still fragile and a solution to the external debt problem was definitely not in sight. Nominal interest rates had declined sharply, but remained high in real terms, discouraging investment in many parts of the world.

For the United States, a reduction in the fiscal deficit was necessary to achieve lower real interest rates, to prevent interest payments on government debt from becoming explosive and to lessen uncertainties in international and domestic financial markets. However, the timing and size of the reduction could have adverse short-term consequences for the world economy. A cut in government spending of some $45 billion, as called for by the United States Congress, would imply a sizeable decrease in aggregate demand. Unless it was offset by a comparable increase in real purchasing power in Europe and Japan, a slow-down in the world economy in 1987 was a distinct possibility.

The reduction in the oil import bill would widen further the already large current-account surplus of several industrial countries, with rough estimates indicating a $15 billion saving in Japan and a $30 billion saving in the oil-importing countries of Western Europe. Unless there was a smooth recycling of that windfall, world trade, and the trade of developing countries as a whole, would be adversely affected. Another source of global instability was the transfer of resources from debtor developing countries to financial centres. Since 1983, interest-payment outflows in many developing countries had exceeded net capital inflows. It had been hoped that this reverse resource transfer would be a temporary phenomenon and that, as interest rates fell, exports would grow rapidly and debtor countries would regain credit-worthiness. However, the reverse transfer of resources appeared more permanent and, although some debtor countries could make such a transfer for a few more years, for the majority a transfer of the current magnitude seemed unsustainable in the long term.

The World Economic Survey 1986(2) said that, during 1985 and early 1986, there were major shifts in macro-economic policy in a number of developed and developing countries that would affect the output and inflation performance of those countries. Also, the centrally planned economies had unveiled their new five-year economic plans containing bold initiatives to improve their economic performance. Policies in developing countries remained dictated largely by external financial constraint. In many debt-ridden countries, efforts to narrow current-account deficits while reviving domestic economic growth were frustrated by the slow-down in international trade and their export performance. In some of them, including several net-energy exporters, efforts to reduce the government budget deficit and gain control over the expansion rate of domestic credit and prices were blunted.

Among developed market economies, the predominant objective of fiscal policies was to reduce government budget deficits and curb public sector spending. Monetary policy in most countries remained cautious, as its primary objective continued to be the control of inflation and inflationary expectations. In the latter half of 1985, co-ordination of the monetary policies of the major developed market economies became an element in the strategy for a collaborative reduction in interest rates and correction of exchange rate misalignments among key currencies.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

In December, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted decision 41/442 by recorded vote.

International conference on money and finance

At its 98th plenary meeting, on 5 December 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, requested the Secretary-General to prepare a report on the current international monetary situation, taking into account recent discussions and developments on the matter, for submission to the Assembly at its forty-second session, and, in this regard, to provide information on proposals that had been made in recent years by Governments, prominent persons and organizations for convening an international conference on money issues.

129-18-6 (recorded vote)

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/857Add.4) by roll-call vote (104-17-6), 28 November (meeting 35); draft by Yugoslavia, for Group of 77 (A/C.2/41/L46/Rev.1); agenda item 79.

Meeting numbers. GA 41 st session: 2nd Committee 19,23,27,28,35; plenary 98.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Cote d'Ivoire, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Fiji, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Austria, Finland, Israel, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden.

The United Kingdom, on behalf of the member States of EEC, noting the absence of consensus on the need to convene a conference on monetary issues, said there was no apparent need to ask the Secretariat to provide the information called for.

Debt problems of developing countries

According to the Trade and Development Report, 1986(3) the deterioration in the situation of many indebted countries caused debt-servicing difficulties to persist or re-emerge during 1985, reflecting the long-term nature of debt problems facing a number of developing countries. Almost none of those which had previously run into debt-servicing difficulties was able to meet its scheduled payments, and year-to-year rescheduling continued to be the prevailing response, particularly among official creditors.

The growth in total debt during 1985 was around 4.8 per cent, not significantly different from that of 1984. Medium- and long-term debt continued to increase faster than overall debt as short-term debt was consolidated. Interest payments declined only slightly, despite the decrease in interest rates, mainly owing to the gradual elimination of arrears. Because of reschedulings, amortization payments continued to increase slowly, remaining at around 55 per cent of scheduled repayments. However, since exports declined, the ratio of actual debt service to the exports of developing countries continued to increase. For some highly indebted countries experiencing large contractions in their exports, the increase in the ratio of their debt service to exports prompted decisions to tie debt payments to export performance by limiting them to a percentage of total export revenues.

The Group of Five developed market economies (France, Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, United Kingdom, United States) had recognized in 1985 that the dollar was over-valued, and that the monetary and fiscal policies of the major developed market economies needed to be made mutually consistent to correct international imbalances. It was also acknowledged that debtor developing countries had to grow faster to be able to service their debts. Also, a number of changes occurred in the world economy and thus in the international environment facing debtor countries. Interest rates declined in nominal terms but prices of non-fuel primary commodities continued to be weak, while prices of traded manufactures began to rise. However, the most notable change was the sharp decline in the price of oil which, if it were to persist, would redistribute payments and debt difficulties among developing countries. For some oil-importing debtor countries, the oil price change would ease the trade-off between meeting debt obligations and financing growth, while for oil-exporting debtor countries the consequences would call into question the capacity of some of them to meet interest payments even if highly restrictive measures were taken.

The World Economic Survey 1986(2) stated that, despite rescheduling, debtor countries were no closer to a permanent resolution of their debt problems. For a sample of 93 capital-importing developing countries, the ratio of total debt to the exports of goods and services in 1985 was estimated to have reached its highest level ever, almost 200 per cent, and was expected to rise still higher in 1986. To move from an unsustainable to a more manageable debt situation, debtor countries could act on only a limited number of variables. They could improve their trade balance or, more precisely, the balance on current account exclusive of interest servicing, and many countries could attain further progress through domestic policy actions. For many others, however, the opportunity for additional improvements would have to come from favourable developments in the international economy. Even so, countries that saw an improvement in net availability of foreign exchange would also need to consider relaxing restraints on import volumes needed for investment and growth.

In response to General Assembly decision 40/477 of 20 June 1986, the Secretary-General in October submitted a report⁽⁴⁾ containing updated portions of the World Economic Survey 1986 relating to the external debt crisis and development.

The report stated that, at year-end 1986, the total external debt of developing countries would be close to $1,000 billion, nearly twice the value of total exports of goods and services of those countries. Gross interest payments would be in the order of $65 billion.

Although some progress had been made with regard to a strategy to approach the international debt situation, world trade remained sluggish and the prospects for a faster rate of expansion were not bright. Commodity prices remained depressed, and the fall in oil prices had accentuated the large debt problems of oil-exporting countries.

Some basic reasons why more structured, wider and more comprehensive intergovernmental consideration of the debt issue was warranted were: the crisis was no closer to a resolution than four years earlier; the crisis was a global issue with more than 60 developing countries in arrears on debt payments or having to reschedule their debts, with their imports and investment sharply curtailed, reducing global demand and mortgaging part of their future growth potential; domestic adjustments and policy reforms in debtor countries were not enough, as adjustment with growth was only possible in a more dynamic global environment; the notion of shared responsibility for resolving the debt problem was becoming widely accepted, but a joint effort with the co-operation of all participants remained elusive; and, with the withdrawal of commercial banks from lending to debtor developing countries and their reduced exposure to those countries, the problem had become essentially a matter of public policy.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

In accordance with a 1985 Assembly decision⁽⁵⁾ the Second Committee resumed in May 1986 to consider international co-operation in the interrelated areas of money, finance, debt, resource flows, trade and development (see p. 489) and to deal with some unfinished business, including draft resolutions on the external debt crisis and development and on debt and related issues, submitted to the Assembly in 1985.⁽⁶⁾ On 20 June, on the Committee's recommendation, the Assembly, by decision 40/474, deferred consideration of the drafts to its forty-first (1986) session.

By decision 40/477, it also deferred until that session a decision on including an item entitled "External debt crisis and development" in its agenda, on the understanding that the decision would be taken upon the request of interested countries, and it asked the Secretary-General to submit to the forty-first session the updated portions of the World Economic Survey 1986 relating to those questions.

By a letter of 20 June,⁽⁷⁾ Yugoslavia, on behalf of the Group of 77, requested that a separate item entitled "External debt crisis and development" be included in the provisional agenda of the forty-first session. On 20 September, on the recommendation of the General Committee, the Assembly included the item in the agenda and allocated it to the Second Committee.

In October,⁽⁸⁾ the Secretariat transmitted to the Assembly the texts of draft resolutions on which action had been deferred in 1985 and 1986, including those on debt. In addition to the Secretary-General's report on the international debt situation in mid-1986⁽⁴⁾ (see above), the Second Committee also had before it communications on the debt crisis: one of 2 October⁽⁹⁾ from Yugoslavia, enclosing the 1 October declaration of the tenth annual meeting of the Group of 77's Foreign Ministers; from Romania, of 16 October,⁽¹⁰⁾ giving its position on solving the developing countries' external debt problem; from Peru, dated 21 October,⁽¹¹⁾ transmitting the Lima communiqué issued by the Latin American Council at its twelfth regular meeting (Lima, 16 and 17 October); and one of 28 November⁽¹²⁾ from India, forwarding the Bangalore declaration of the South Asian Association for Regional Co-operation (second summit, Bangalore, 16 and 17 November).

On 8 December, the Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 41/202 without vote.

Strengthened international economic co-operation aimed at resolving external debt problems of developing countries

The General Assembly,

Recalling its decision 40/474 of 20 June 1986, and the questions listed therein,

Recalling Trade and Development Board resolutions 165(S-IX) of 11 March 1978 and 222(XXI) of 27 September 1980,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General entitled "International debt situation in mid-1986",

Taking note of the statements made by Member States under this agenda item, particularly in the meetings held in the plenary and the Second Committee of the General Assembly during its fortieth and forty-first sessions,

Recognizing that debt servicing problems constitute a severe and continuing burden which restricts the economic and social development of many developing countries,

1. Agrees on the following elements and invites all those involved to take them into account in addressing the problems of external indebtedness of developing countries, with a view to reaching equitable, durable and mutually agreed solutions, taking into account the particular circumstances of each country:

(a) External indebtedness, viewed in an overall perspective, should be tackled within the framework of a strengthened and improved strategy of co-operation of the international community for sustained world economic growth and development, particularly for developing countries;

(b) Recognizing the competence of the multilateral financial institutions, as well as that of the relevant specialized agencies, organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system within their respective mandates, the interrelated issues of debt, money, finance, resource flows, trade, commodities and development should be addressed in the context of their close inter-relationship;

(c) In a spirit of common commitment and mutual co-operation, stronger growth and development in developing countries should be encouraged, involving the participation of all countries concerned, particularly creditor developed countries and debtor developing countries, multilateral financial institutions and international private banks, in addressing the debt problems of developing countries;

(d) A lasting solution to the debt problem also requires simultaneous and complementary actions in the areas of economic policy that are mutually supportive, and includes:

- (i) Effective national adjustment processes and structural changes, pursued within national development priorities and objectives, which should be growth-oriented; due regard should be paid to the economic, social and development needs of each country in the application of conditionality;
- (ii) Supportive policies that encompass, inter alia, the dismantling of protectionism and expansion of international trade, increased financial flows, lending programmes by the international financial institutions and commercial banks in support of growth-oriented measures, lower real interest rates, and improvements in commodity markets;
- (iii) Coherent and co-ordinated policies on the part of industrialized countries, including strengthened multilateral surveillance, that promote a supportive international economic environment conducive to sustained and non-inflationary growth and adjustments addressing the imbalances in the world economy, including the reduction of trade imbalances and the promotion of greater foreign exchange market stability;

(e) There is an important relationship between a country's mobilization and utilization of its resources, net inflow of development finance and capital and foreign exchange export earnings, and the possibility for the servicing of its external debt; in this context, due account should be taken of the investment and import requirements and the fundamental economic and social needs of a country's population;

(f) Debt-restructuring arrangements and innovative development-oriented financial agreements should continue to be worked out, wherever appropriate, on terms and conditions that take into account the internal and external factors affecting the economy of the country concerned;

(g) Special attention should be given to the implementation of specific relief measures in favour of the least developed countries such as, inter alia, those contained in the Substantial New Programme of Action for the 1980s for the Least Developed Countries and Trade and Development Board resolution 165(S-IX);

(h) Recognizes, in addition to the above elements, that in dealing with Africa's external indebtedness, the magnitude and the servicing of its debt constitute a severe and continuing burden which restricts its economic recovery and long-term development; the international community, particularly the donor developed countries, reaffirms its agreement to adopt concrete measures, and reaffirms the importance of increasing official development assistance to Africa in support of adjustment efforts for development of African countries, in accordance with the provisions of the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990;

2. Invites all those involved to take into account, as appropriate, the above in addressing the problems of external indebtedness of some other countries with serious debt-servicing problems;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its forty-second session an updated version of his report on the international debt situation and the indicators related to it, under the same agenda item, taking into account the present resolution.

General Assembly resolution 41/202

8 December 1986 Meeting 100 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/937) without vote, 28 November (meeting 36); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/41/L.71), based on informal consultations; agenda item 143.

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 2nd Committee 10-13, 15, 16, 36; plenary 100.

On 8 December, also on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the Assembly, by decision 41/460, deferred until its 1987 session consideration of the draft resolutions on the external debt crisis and development and on debt and related issues, originally submitted to it in 1985.

Development finance

At its March 1986 session,⁽¹⁾ CDP focused on the capital requirements of developing countries. Until the flow of development finance was restored, the Committee said, prospects for adequate growth and social progress in many of the world's poorest nations would remain negligible. CDP proposed that the flow of finance for development be doubled by the end of the decade by co-operative and mutually reinforcing actions by the multilateral financial institutions, Governments of developing and industrialized countries and the commercial banks. CDP's analysis of capital requirements indicated that, on top of the approximately $40 billion which was already flowing, no more than $4 billion in new foreign investment and an extra $2 billion in official transfers could be reasonably projected for the end of the decade, on the basis of existing policies. An additional $25 billion per year would be needed as the minimum necessary condition for restoring moderate, sustained growth in the developing world.

Industrialized countries, said CDP, had to promote an international economic environment with lower interest rates, sustained moderate growth and a dynamic receptiveness to developing country imports. They should increase bilateral assistance to the poorest countries, including wider adoption of debt relief and support for export credit, and improve the quality and co-ordination of their aid programmes. They should also provide the moderate amounts of resources required to expand the multilateral financial institutions.

With regard to multilateral institutions, CDP said that they, and particularly the World Bank, should rise more vigorously to the challenge and again become the primary source of international development finance. Of the $25 billion in new lending required annually, $8 billion should come from the World Bank and the regional development banks, and $4 billion from IDA and other concessional assistance. The expansion in World Bank lending could be accomplished by increasing the Bank's gearing ratio or expanding its callable capital. CDP called for a modest expansion of $2 billion beyond the resources already available to IDA and the Special Facility for sub-Saharan Africa. If Africa's special needs were to be met, new mechanisms had to be established to co-ordinate and support the transfer of substantial additional resources and to facilitate the associated policy dialogue. In addition to the quantity of lending, the multilateral institutions should improve its quality by increasing and sustaining their commitment to macro-economic programme lending, even at the expense of project loans. On top of long-term capital requirements, developing countries would have a need for foreign exchange reserves to support expanded trade; $15 billion more would be needed to support reserve requirements by 1990, of which $5 billion annually should come from a new selective allocation of SDRs by IMF. These would be a source of liquidity, not of long-term development capital (see below).

CDP stated that commercial banks would have to provide annually about $13 billion, or about half of the additional resources required by 1990. Although the large-scale flows of the 1970s should not be viewed as the norm to which policies should be directed, additional voluntary commercial lending of $3 billion annually should be feasible, largely through co-financing with the World Bank. For countries which were unlikely to attract voluntary bank finance, banks had to be induced to plough back into new lending a portion of the interest payments which they were receiving from developing countries. CDP recommended that $10 billion annually should be committed to such involuntary lending. Banks could also be expected to provide, through their ordinary commercial operations, the largest part of the developing countries' trade-related reserve needs. CDP suggested that normal short-term trade financing should increase by some $10 billion a year in line with the expansion of developing countries' imports and exports, which would be part of a growth-oriented global development strategy.

The developing countries themselves would have to formulate economic policies and budgetary plans aimed at promoting growth-oriented economic management, as well as financial prudence. Although conditionality was a sensitive subject as it impinged on national policy, Governments had to accept that no nation enjoyed full sway over its own economic circumstances in an interdependent world economy. What was needed was a new form of "growth conditionality", emphasizing longer time horizons, expansion of the supply of finance and greater participation of the debtor countries in specifying strategies tailored to their own particular cases.

At the first part of its twelfth session, the UNCTAD Committee on Invisibles and Financing related to Trade (see below) had before it an UNCTAD secretariat report on external financing of economic development.⁽¹³⁾ The report reviewed recent trends in financial flows to and from developing countries and stated that development finance had been in a state of crisis since 1982. By 1985, total net medium-term and long-term flows to developing countries had dropped to $82 billion, a decline of some $20 billion from the peak level attained in 1981. If short-term flows were taken into account, the overall contraction would amount to almost $40 billion. The collapse in new bank lending, foreign direct investment and export credits in the wake of the debt crisis were the most important contributing factors, but aggregate net transfers (net inflows minus interest payments and profit remittances) had also rapidly declined with the sharp increases in interest payments. Since 1983, net debtor developing countries had collectively experienced a negative transfer of resources reaching an estimated $16 billion in 1985. That burden had been particularly heavy in Latin America, where it totalled $106 billion over the period 1982-1985.

The report went on to discuss attendant changes in the external financial situation of developing countries and to identify the principal policy challenges that would have to be met if adequate financing of development was to resume in the future. Policy measures which could form part of an overall strategy to resolve the crisis of development finance and restore its central role included: enhanced multilateral co-operation involving developing countries, developed countries, multilateral institutions and commercial banks; the pursuit by developing countries of growth-oriented domestic policy reforms; improved economic performance by developed countries and a significant increase in capital flows through expanded bilateral ODA, official support for expansion in export credits, and increased capital contributions to multilateral lending institutions, without which those institutions were unlikely to meet the challenge of playing the leading role in development finance; and the provision by commercial banks of substantial additional flows, partly in the form of voluntary lending.

On 19 December, the Committee decided to annex to its report⁽¹⁴⁾ a draft resolution by the Group of 77. By that text, the Committee would have expressed concern about the decline of financial flows to developing countries and the rise of net outflows from a number of them to developed countries and international financial institutions, and about the adverse impact of such trends on the development process of all developing countries, heavily indebted and low income in particular, and especially of LDCs. The Committee would have agreed that: the elimination of negative net transfers of resources from developing to developed countries and international financial institutions, as well as the restoration and increase of net transfers to developing countries, were matters of common concern and called for urgent action by the international community; all forms of external financing flows had an essential role to play in restoring the development process; the resumption and increase of flows to developing countries should take place as part of the growth-oriented solution of the debt problems; and parallel actions were required to roll back protectionism, improve terms of trade of developing countries, strengthen commodity markets, lower real interest rates and promote greater exchange rate stability. The Committee would have welcomed the adoption of Assembly resolution 41/202 on strengthened international co-operation aimed at resolving external debt problems of developing countries, as a sign of increased readiness by the international community to tackle the problem of indebtedness. It would have invited Committee members to consider ways to implement the elements contained in the Assembly's resolution in the framework of UNCTAD's activities, particularly in view of UNCTAD VII, and recommended that TDB also consider those elements.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

In accordance with a 1985 Assembly decision⁽⁵⁾ the Second Committee resumed in May 1986 to consider international co-operation in the interrelated areas of money, finance, debt, resource flows, trade and development (see p. 489) and to deal with some unfinished business, including a draft resolution on an international conference on money and finance for development, submitted to the Assembly in 1985.⁽¹⁵⁾ On 20 June, on the recommendation of the Committee, the Assembly (decision 40/474) deferred consideration of the draft to its forty-first (1986) session.

In October, Yugoslavia, on behalf of the Group of 77, introduced an updated version⁽¹⁶⁾ of the draft resolution, by which reference was added to the Eighth Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries (Harare, Zimbabwe, September 1986) and references to the commencement of conference preparations and sessions of the Assembly and the Economic and Social Council were changed.

On 5 December, the Assembly, on the recommendation of the Committee, adopted decision 41/441 by which it transmitted to its 1987 session for consideration the draft resolution on an international conference.

Trade-related finance

At the first part of its twelfth session (Geneva, 8-19 December 1986),⁽¹⁴⁾ the UNCTAD Committee on Invisibles and Financing related to Trade had before it a study by the UNCTAD secretariat on trade financing for developing countries⁽¹⁷⁾ The study stated that the difficulties experienced by those countries since the outbreak of the debt crisis in 1982 had highlighted many key relationships between the availability of financing and levels of trade and activity world-wide on the one hand, and among types of international lending and payments arrangements on the other. The spread of external financial stringency after 1981 as a result of higher interest rates, depressed world markets and the contraction of international lending put pressure on Governments to deflate. Among the consequences had been marked slowdowns in trade among several of the major regions of the world economy, which had involved both trade between developed market-economy and developing countries and the mutual trade of the latter. The exports of a group containing most of the developed market-economy countries to developing ones were estimated to have fallen more than 16 per cent between 1981 and 1984, and exports in the mutual trade of developing countries by more than 11 per cent. Much of the contraction in the case of mutual trade was due to exports to Africa and the developing countries of America, both of which were severely affected by the debt crisis.

Experience since 1982 had also demonstrated the mutual dependence of different kinds of international lending to developing countries from private sources. Various types of financial flows, official as well as private, were used to finance international trade. Some, such as ODA, did not generally respond to changes in developing countries' external financial positions, but financing from private sources, particularly bank lending and suppliers' credits, had contracted sharply as a result of the debt crisis. The financing of trade, especially that at short-term maturities, was in many cases linked to payments arrangements, so that they too had been adversely affected by the spread of external financial stringency among developing countries. The prevailing situation was notable not only for contractions in developing countries' medium-term external payments financing but also for higher costs, and in some cases breakdowns, in the whole spectrum of payments and credit arrangements associated with their day-to-day international trade.

A section of the study contained a brief review of major features of the evolution of developing countries' external financial positions since the start of the debt crisis. It focused on the stagnation or contraction, not only of bank lending but also of export credits, and drew attention to the downward pressures on the latter which resulted from the modus operandi of export credit programmes in developed market-economy countries, and which led to falls in that form of lending alongside that from the banks.

Another section dealt with the nature of external liquidity squeezes and their relationship to financing and payments arrangements, to certain aspects of the lending regime for developing countries and to the rescheduling process for their official debts. The last section gave a brief recapitulation of features of the functioning of trade financing for developing countries connected to its contraction in response to adverse changes in economic conditions; this brought out the importance of a favourable overall economic environment to trade financing and served as a backdrop for a discussion of various policy proposals in that area. The proposals were taken up under three headings: those directed at the macro-economic environment and the overhang of developing countries' external debts; those concerned with specific aspects of trade financing and which were capable of providing relatively quick relief to the external liquidity squeezes experienced by developing countries; and those which could lead to longer-term improvements in such countries' trade financing. An annex to the study discussed the extent and growth of countertrade resulting from the interaction of breakdowns in developing countries' external financing and payments arrangements and of depressed demand in export markets.

Export earnings

In accordance with a 1985 TDB request,⁽¹⁵⁾ an Intergovernmental Group of Experts on the Compensatory Financing of Export Earnings Shortfalls met at Geneva from 7 to 18 July 1986.⁽¹⁶⁾

The Group had before it an UNCTAD secretariat report on commodities earnings shortfalls and an additional compensatory financing facility,⁽¹⁷⁾ which examined the legal and procedural implications of the preference stated by an expert group in 1984⁽¹⁸⁾ for locating any additional facility as a third account in the Common Fund for Commodities. The report stated that a protocol would be the most appropriate procedure to give effect to such a preference.

Also before the Group was a secretariat note⁽²¹⁾ giving extracts from replies received from UNCTAD member States, international organizations and regional commissions in response to a 1985 TDB request⁽¹⁵⁾ for comments on the 1984 expert group report.

The 1986 Group adopted agreed conclusions in which it stated that, in order to fulfil its mandate to ascertain the extent to which commodity export earnings shortfalls were not being met through existing mechanisms, it required further information. It asked the UNCTAD secretariat, with the co-operation of IMF, the World Bank and the Commission of EEC, for an analytical study containing: calculations of shortfalls applying varying formulae, lengths of reference periods and on a gross and net basis in United States dollars and SDR terms; information on the extent to which such shortfalls had been covered by existing mechanisms and their limitations; and the effects of shortfalls on economic development of developing countries using additional information on the situations in developing countries.

Taxation

At its first regular session of 1986, the Economic and Social Council had before it a report of the Secretary-General on the work of the Ad Hoc Group of Experts on International Co-operation in Tax Matters.⁽²²⁾ The report was prepared in response to a 1980 Council request⁽²³⁾ that he report on the progress of the Ad Hoc Group at the Council session following each Group meeting. The report therefore gave an account of the Group's 1985 meeting.⁽²⁴⁾

By decision 1986/120 of 19 May 1986, the Economic and Social Council took note of the Secretary-General's report on the work of the Ad Hoc Group and approved its recommendations.

Programme and finances of UNCTAD

Two sessions of the UNCTAD Working Party on the Medium-term Plan and the Programme Budget took place in 1986. In February, it discussed updating the UNCTAD section of the United Nations medium-term plan for 1984-1989 and, in October, it focused on UNCTAD's technical assistance activities and programme evaluation.

The question of the agenda, place, date and duration of UNCTAD VII was discussed at both 1986 TDB sessions. In December, on the Board's recommendation, the General Assembly decided to convene UNCTAD VII at Geneva in July 1987.

In September, TDB changed the pattern of its sessions in order that its annual report could be submitted to the Assembly through the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session each year.

UNCTAD programme

The Trade and Development Board—the executive body of UNCTAD—held two sessions in 1986, both at Geneva. The first part of the thirty-second session was held from 10 to 26 March and the second part on 16 and 17 June;⁽¹⁾ the first part of the thirty-third session was held from 1 to 10 September and on 3 October.⁽²⁾

The Board adopted 16 decisions during 1986. In March, one decision dealt with the co-operative exchange of skills among developing countries (see p. 437), one concerned operational activities for development (see p. 411), one dealt with implementation of the medium-term and long-term recovery and rehabilitation programme in the Sudano-Sahelian region (see p. 478), and another concerned the global review and appraisal of the implementation of the Substantial New Programme of Action for the 1980s for LDCs (see p. 406). By a September decision, the Board remitted to its next session an informal text dealing with trade relations among countries having different economic and social systems (see p. 496). The other decisions pertained to subjects dealt with in this sub chapter.

The TDB report on its thirty-second session⁽¹⁾ was considered by the Economic and Social Council, which took note of it by decision 1986/161 of 21 July. The report on the two 1986 sessions was considered by the General Assembly, which took note of it in decision 41/438 of 5 December.

Also on that day, the Assembly adopted two resolutions on aspects of the UNCTAD programme not covered in this chapter; they dealt with: specific measures in favour of island developing countries (resolution 41/163); and an international code of conduct on the transfer of technology (resolution 41/166).

Programme policy decisions

At its eleventh session (Geneva, 24-26 February 1986),⁽²⁾ the TDB Working Party on the Medium-term Plan and the Programme Budget reviewed the updating of the UNCTAD section of the United Nations medium-term plan for 1984-1989 and had before it a report by the UNCTAD Secretary-General on proposals for the plan's second revision.⁽³⁾ The revisions were required as some programme changes resulting from intergovernmental decisions and resolutions could not be accommodated within the existing objectives and strategies set out in the plan. The Working Party also discussed the need for cost-reducing measures in response to the Organization's financial emergency.

At its closing meeting, the Chairman noted that the Working Party had successfully dealt with the proposed revision of the plan, the question of economies and redeployment, and the provisional agenda for its twelfth session. The Working Party had taken note of the proposed revisions, which seemed to be justified and in accordance with United Nations rules. With regard to the financial emergency, it would urge the UNCTAD secretariat to make further efforts to make economies.

At its twelfth session (Geneva, 6-10 October),⁽⁴⁾ the Working Party focused on UNCTAD's technical assistance activities and their financing (see below), and on programme evaluation.

On 10 October, it adopted agreed conclusions by which it noted with appreciation the improvements introduced in the report on 1985 UNCTAD technical co-operation activities,⁽⁵⁾ and invited the UNCTAD Secretary-General, in preparing future reports, to include information taking into account comments and suggestions made at the Working Party's twelfth session. It noted with concern the implications of the continuing decline in resources available to UNCTAD for technical co-operation in 1985, particularly from UNDP. It welcomed the UNCTAD Secretary-General's intention to undertake a review of technical co-operation work and invited him to pursue efforts to expand co-operation with UNDP and other funding sources and to inform the Working Party in 1987 of progress made in both areas.

The Working Party took note with appreciation of the information contained in the UNCTAD Secretary-General's report⁽⁷⁾ on the secretariat's first round of internal evaluations and invited him to keep the Working Party informed of future secretariat work. It welcomed the implementation and development of a programme evaluation system in UNCTAD, combining self-evaluation with internal independent evaluation, and supported further strengthening of that process. It invited the UNCTAD Secretary-General to provide to TDB's main committees summaries of self-evaluation studies in areas of interest to them in connection with reviews of their work programmes. The Working Party took note of information provided by the UNCTAD Secretary-General on the implications of constraints imposed by the United Nations financial difficulties for UNCTAD's functioning, noted with appreciation measures taken by him to achieve economies and reiterated its interest in being informed of further developments.

Total UNCTAD project expenditure in 1986 for technical co-operation activities amounted to some $10.9 million, an increase of $3.8 million or 53 per cent in comparison with 1985. Allocations from UNDP totalling $8.9 million were the main source of funds and rose from $5.8 million in 1985. Activities were also funded from funds-in-trust ($1.9 million) and from the regular programme of technical co-operation ($0.22 million). In 1986, the total number of projects implemented was 117, compared with 107 in 1985. Activities remained predominantly intercountry-oriented. Project expenditures increased in all regions except Europe, with Africa continuing to receive the largest share, with a total delivery of $3.8 million, an increase of 26.6 per cent in relation to 1985. For Asia and the Pacific, expenditures increased to $1.8 million from $0.76 million in 1985, in Latin America and the Caribbean to $1.3 million from $0.8 million, and in the Arab States to $0.8 million from $0.3 million. In Europe, a national project to establish a management and operation system became operational in Malta. Expenditures for inter-regional projects increased by 50 per cent, from $2.1 million in 1985 to $3.2 million in 1986.

The main sectors in which UNCTAD provided assistance were: maritime and multimodal transport; economic co-operation among developing countries; assistance to least developed, land-locked and island developing countries; money, finance and development; manufactures and semi-manufactures; trade in commodities; transfer of technology; insurance and reinsurance; trade among countries having different economic and social systems; and trade facilitation and customs administration.

In addition, ITC continued to provide technical assistance for trade promotion (see p. 497).

The UNCTAD secretariat's annual report⁽⁸⁾ on technical co-operation activities reviewed UNCTAD's activities by region, by programme area and by source of funds. Part of the report was devoted to the results of a review of UNCTAD's technical co-operation work.

Organizational questions

Conferences and meetings

UNCTAD VII

By a decision of 21 March 1986,⁽⁹⁾ TDB took note of an oral report by its President on consultations held by him on the place, date and duration of UNCTAD VII and asked the UNCTAD Secretary-General to hold further consultations and report thereon at the resumed session in June to enable TDB to make a recommendation on the subject to the General Assembly.

Also on 21 March,⁽¹⁰⁾ TDB requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General to continue his informal consultations with a view to submitting a draft provisional agenda for UNCTAD VII and proposals on its organization and related matters. It also decided to resume its thirty-second session on 16 and 17 June 1986 to adopt the provisional agenda and to take other decisions on its preparations.

On 17 June,⁽¹¹⁾ the Board, having heard the UNCTAD Secretary-General's oral report on his consultations, asked him to continue them, taking into account his paper entitled "Point of departure for the elaboration of the provisional agenda for the seventh session of the Conference: unifying theme and main areas of concentration", his earlier suggestions and the views expressed by regional groups and UNCTAD members. He was also asked to start informal consultations on the organization of UNCTAD VII and to report thereon at TDB's September/October session. Also on 17 June,⁽¹²⁾ he was asked to continue consultations and to report thereon at that session to enable TDB to recommend to the Assembly the place, date and duration of UNCTAD VII.

On 3 October,⁽¹³⁾ the Board adopted the provisional agenda, contained in an annex to the decision, together with understandings contained in a second annex. It recommended to the Assembly that UNCTAD VII be held at Geneva for three weeks between 6 and 31 July 1987, including a final phase of one week at which the session's work would be concluded by Ministers. It took note of the desire of the Latin American Group to hold the eighth session of the Conference in a Latin American country on the understanding that the final decision on the venue would be taken at the appropriate time, in which connection it noted the interest of Cuba in hosting that session. The Board recommended to the Assembly that it accord priority to UNCTAD VII in relation to other United Nations activities at Geneva. Substantive items of the provisional agenda were a general debate and revitalizing development, growth and international trade, in a more predictable and supportive environment, through multilateral co-operation: assessment of relevant economic trends and of global structural change, and formulation of policies and measures, addressing key issues in the interrelated areas of resources for development, including financial and related monetary questions, commodities, international trade and problems of LDCs.

The understandings annexed to the decision stated that: in assessing relevant economic trends, attention should be paid to the role of the private sector in development; the reference to "a more predictable and supportive environment" was intended to subsume the interest expressed in referring to the need for security, dependability and confidence-building in the world economic environment, as well as for equity and justice in international economic relations; monetary questions would be considered in the context of the UNCTAD mandate and without prejudice to the competence of IMF and other international financial institutions; and the sub-item on international trade included issues arising in trade relations among countries having different economic and social systems.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 5 December, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 41/169 without vote.

Seventh session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 1995(XIX) of 30 December 1964, as amended, on the establishment of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development as an organ of the General Assembly, and its resolutions

3201(S-VI) and 3202(S-VI) of 1 May 1974, containing the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order, 3281(XXIX) of 12 December 1974, containing the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, and 3362(S-VII) of 16 September 1975 on development and international economic co-operation,

Recalling also its resolution 35/56 of 5 December 1980, the annex to which contains the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, and its decision 40/438 of 17 December 1985 concerning the review and appraisal of the implementation of the Strategy,

Recalling further its resolutions 38/155 of 19 December 1983 on the report of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development on its sixth session, and 40/189 of 17 December 1985,

Having considered Trade and Development Board decision 341(XXXIII) of 3 October 1986, as adopted, on the provisional agenda, place, date and duration of the seventh session of the Conference, and noting the recommendation contained in that decision to accord priority to the seventh session of the Conference in relation to other United Nations activities at Geneva,

1. Notes the adoption by the Trade and Development Board, in its decision 341(XXXIII), of the provisional agenda for the seventh session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the related understandings reached;

2. Decides to convene the seventh session of the Conference at the United Nations Office at Geneva from 9 to 31 July 1987, the final week to be devoted to the conclusion of the work of the session at the ministerial level;

3. Requests the Trade and Development Board to undertake the necessary intergovernmental preparations for the Conference and, at the second part of its thirty-third session, to agree on organizational arrangements for the Conference that will encourage ministerial participation, particularly in the conclusion of its work;

4. Invites the Secretary-General to ensure that the necessary facilities and resources are allocated so that adequate substantive preparations and logistic arrangements may be made for the seventh session of the Conference;

5. Calls upon all States members of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to continue and intensify, through consultations among themselves, their preparations for the seventh session of the Conference, with a view to ensuring that the session makes a significant contribution to multilateral action for the revitalization of development, growth and international trade;

6. Notes the desire of the Group of Latin American States to hold the eighth session of the Conference in one of the countries of Latin America, on the understanding that the final decision on the venue would be taken at the appropriate time, and notes the interest of the Government of Cuba in acting as host to the eighth session of the Conference.

5 December 1986 Meeting 98 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/857/Add.1) without vote, 28 November (meeting 35); draft by Yugoslavia, for Group of 77 (A/C.2/41/L.53), orally revised; agenda item 79 la).

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 2nd Committee 19, 23-28, 33-35; plenary 98.

Calendar of UNCTAD meetings

On 26 March,⁽¹⁴⁾ TDB approved a calendar of meetings for the remainder of 1986 and a tentative schedule for 1987. On 3 October,⁽¹⁵⁾ it approved revisions to the 1986 calendar.

Scheduling of TDB meetings

On 7 February 1986, the Economic and Social Council adopted decision 1986/105 by which it welcomed the 1985 TDB decision⁽¹⁶⁾ to establish an informal working group to consider all aspects of the scheduling of its regular sessions and requested TDB to transmit its recommendations to the Council's April/May 1986 session.

On 21 March,⁽¹⁷⁾ TDB, having considered the group's report,⁽¹⁸⁾ mandated its President to consult the Council President on the possibility of rearranging the Council's regular sessions and to report thereon to TDB. It requested the Assembly, at its 1986 regular session, to allow the Board to report on its second regular session directly to the Assembly, as had been the practice since the discontinuance of the resumed second regular session of the Council, and decided to resume its study of rescheduling its sessions, after having received its President's report.

Also on 21 March,⁽¹⁹⁾ TDB took note of the informal working group's progress on certain issues, particularly a perceived emerging convergence of views on holding one annual TDB session, divided into two parts, under a single President, and decided to mandate the group to continue its efforts on rationalizing the Board's sessions and to report to it in September/October 1986.

By a 3 April letter,⁽²⁰⁾ the TDB President transmitted the texts of the 21 March decisions to the Council President.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

In May 1986, the Economic and Social Council adopted decision 1986/119 without vote.

Scheduling of the sessions of the Trade and Development Board

At its 15th plenary meeting, on 19 May 1986, the Economic and Social Council, having considered the letter dated 3 April 1986 from the President of the Trade and Development Board addressed to the President of the Council in pursuance of Council decisions 1984/161 of 25 July 1984 and 1985/106 of 8 February 1985 on the scheduling of the sessions of the Board, decided:

(a) To invite the Trade and Development Board to pursue its efforts to find a flexible and practical approach to the resolution of this issue;

(b) To consider, at its second regular session of 1986, the report of the Board on its thirty-second session;

(c) To request the Secretary-General, without prejudice to further consideration of the present arrangements by the Council at a future session, to transmit the report of the Board on its thirty-third session directly to the General Assembly.

Economic and Social Council decision 1986/119Adopted without vote

Oral proposal by President; agenda item 1.

On 9 September 1986,⁽²¹⁾ TDB, having taken note of the informal working group's report,⁽²²⁾ decided to change the pattern of its sessions as of the current session. It would hold one regular four-week session a year in two parts, the first to be held in September and the second in March/April of the following year, the length of each to be determined through consultations between the UNCTAD Secretary-General and regional group co-ordinators. Normally, the second part would be longer than the first. It also decided that the agenda items relating to trade relations among countries having different economic and social systems and to protectionism and structural adjustment would be allocated to sessional committees at the session's second part; the allocation of all other items would be determined through consultations between the Secretary-General and the co-ordinators. Normally, agenda items relating to interdependence of problems of trade, development finance and the international monetary system and debt and development problems of developing countries would be dealt with at the session's first part. It was also decided that the President's term of office would be for the duration of the regular session and that the President would be designated at the end of the second part. TDB recommended that the Assembly and the Council decide that Board resolutions and decisions requiring timely attention by the Assembly could be transmitted directly to it. The Board, therefore, amended its rules of procedure and decided to review the new arrangements in 1988.

Documentation and meetings servicing

At its September/October session, TDB had before it a report⁽²³⁾ by the UNCTAD secretariat on the timely issuance of UNCTAD documentation in all official languages and the rational use of conference resources. On 10 September,⁽²⁴⁾ the Board invited the UNCTAD Secretary-General to continue efforts to control the preparation of UNCTAD documents and to ensure that they, particularly the Trade and Development Report, were distributed in time in all official languages. He was also asked to examine arrangements with the Director-General of the United Nations Office at Geneva with a view to ensuring the availability of interpretation services during all meetings.

Chapter V

Transport

During 1986, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) continued to deal with international transport issues, particularly maritime transport. The Committee on Shipping of the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board met in November to review major issues in world shipping, especially merchant fleet development and the protection of shippers' interests. A major development in international maritime transport in 1986 was the adoption in February, after almost two years of negotiations, of the United Nations Convention on Conditions for Registration of Ships. In December, the United Nations General Assembly welcomed the successful outcome of the United Nations Conference on Conditions for Registration of Ships and invited all States to become contracting parties to the Convention (decision 41/435).

Two States became parties in 1986 to the 1974 Convention on a Code of Conduct for Liner Conferences, bringing to 68 the number of States parties.

Other maritime transport issues discussed during the year by the Committee on Shipping and subsidiary bodies established by it included maritime liens and mortgages, ports and maritime fraud.

In July, the Economic and Social Council considered a report by the Secretary-General on the work of the Committee of Experts on the Transport of Dangerous Goods. The Council invited him to take measures to widen the decision-making base of the Committee and invited Governments with expertise in the area to support the participation of interested developing countries in the Committee's meetings (resolution 1986/66).

A group of experts established by the Committee on Shipping to develop and recommend model rules for multimodal container tariffs met twice in 1986. In December, it adopted a set of model rules and requested the UNCTAD secretariat to conduct a pilot project on a reference library of tariff rules.

Maritime transport

The Review of Maritime Transport, 1986,(1) prepared annually by the UNCTAD secretariat in accordance with the work programme of the Committee on Shipping,(2) stated that in 1986 the total volume of international seaborne trade increased slightly to 3.38 billion tons—a 1.7 per cent rise over 1985. At the same time, the size of the world merchant fleet declined by 3.9 per cent, from 664.8 million deadweight tons (dwt) in mid-1985 to 639.1 million dwt by mid-1986.

Ownership of the world merchant fleet remained concentrated in the developed market-economy and open-registry countries, with a combined tonnage amounting at mid-1986 to 69.6 per cent of the total. The share of developing countries increased to 19.9 per cent in 1986 from 17.1 per cent in 1985. Socialist countries of Eastern Europe and Asia owned 9.5 per cent.

The participation of developing countries in the world merchant fleet (19.9 per cent of dwt) continued to be disproportionate to their share of international seaborne trade (35.9 per cent); developed market-economy countries owned 69.6 per cent of world tonnage while generating 57 per cent of world trade.

The supply/demand disequilibrium remained a serious problem in the world shipping industry in 1986, although surpluses decreased slightly as compared with the previous year, partly due to a mini-boom in the tanker freight market and a relatively high level of demolition of world merchant fleet tonnage, especially in the dry bulk sector. Average surplus tonnage was estimated at 131.7 million dwt (20.6 per cent of the world merchant fleet) as at 1 July 1986, with surplus tanker tonnage estimated at 77.8 million dwt (29.8 per cent of the world tanker fleet).

The proportion of freight charges to cost, insurance, freight import values for developing countries continued to be approximately twice as high as that for developed market-economy countries (9.55 per cent and 4.81 per cent respectively). Freight rate indices for dry cargo ships and for vessels engaged in liner shipping showed a significant declining trend in 1986, while tanker freight rate indices demonstrated a remarkable upward trend compared with 1985.

Shipping

At its twelfth session, held at Geneva from 10 to 21 November 1986,(3) the UNCTAD Committee on Shipping had before it a consolidated report by the UNCTAD secretariat on the structure of world shipping,(4) which responded to requests for specific information made at the sixth session of UNCTAD in 1983⁽⁵⁾ and by the Committee on Shipping at its 1982⁽⁶⁾ and 1984⁽⁷⁾ sessions. The report considered the continuing, large imbalance between supply and demand in almost all shipping sectors, including the overall size of the gap as well as investment and support policies adopted in shipping and shipbuilding and corrective measures taken or advocated to redress the situation. It also examined developments and issues in world bulk and liner shipping, particularly participation by developing countries in bulk shipping, ways of establishing shipbroking centres in developing countries on a regional basis and the introduction of container shipping services on a global scale and its possible implications for developing countries.

In its conclusions, the report stated that subsidized excess shipbuilding capacity was probably the major obstacle to a return to a more balanced situation in world shipping. The balance between supply and demand could not be restored unless world shipbuilding capacity was brought in closer relation to projected tonnage requirements. Action needed to be taken to promote accelerated scrapping of obsolete tonnage, and a reduction in new building orders and, most importantly, in world shipbuilding capacity. A return to a more balanced situation would require measures to be taken simultaneously in different areas and involving all parties concerned, particularly Governments and intergovernmental organizations and representative organizations of shipowners and operators, shipbuilders, labour unions and ship financing sources. The prolonged situation of subsidized overcapacity and instability in world shipping markets had been a major set-back for the long-term planning of merchant fleet development in developing countries. A preliminary investigation of possible ways to establish shipbroking centres in those countries on a regional basis suggested that it could be pursued in three stages through establishing regional and/or subregional pools of bulk cargo fleets, a regional shipbrokers' network, and a regional shipbroking co-ordinating centre. The report suggested that an ad hoc intergovernmental meeting might be appropriate to consider specific measures and joint actions to be taken by the international community which would contribute to bringing the supply and demand of world shipping tonnage in closer relation.

On 21 November⁽⁸⁾ the Committee on Shipping urged UNCTAD member States to consider taking national measures to bring about a more balanced situation in world shipping and shipbuilding, invited those in a position to do so to consider offering scrapping incentives for surplus tonnage, and recommended restraint in ordering new building of ships for which no viable commercial employment prospects could be foreseen. The UNCTAD Secretary-General was requested, in consultation with the Trade and Development Board, to convene the Committee's thirteenth session in early 1988 to consider primarily the imbalance between supply and demand in ocean shipping and to recommend measures to bring about a balanced situation in the shipping industry. He was also requested to invite interested intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to participate in the Committee's work and to prepare a report, supplementary to that on the structure of world shipping⁽⁴⁾ on the question of imbalance between supply and demand, including a survey of developments which had affected or could affect the excess capacity situation.

Future work of the Committee. On 21 November, following consideration of an UNCTAD secretariat report on the work programme on shipping and proposals for further work⁽⁹⁾ the Committee on Shipping⁽¹⁰⁾ requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General to convene in 1987 a meeting of an ad hoc intergovernmental group of senior officials on co-operation among developing countries in shipping, ports and multimodal transport. The UNCTAD secretariat was requested to prepare a study on the impact of the international carriage of goods by sea on developing countries' economies, taking account of co-operative solutions such as joint ventures and fleet operations. The Committee recommended that the secretariat assist regional commissions and organizations to harmonize intraregional and interregional shipping policy formulation.

UN Conference on registration of ships

The fourth and final part of the United Nations Conference on Conditions for Registration of Ships was held at Geneva from 20 January to 7 February 1986⁽¹¹⁾ in pursuance of a 1985 General Assembly resolution⁽¹²⁾ to consider an international agreement concerning the conditions under which vessels should be accepted on national shipping registers. The first part of the Conference took place in 1984⁽¹³⁾ and the second and third parts in 1985.⁽¹⁴⁾

On 7 February, the Conference adopted the United Nations Convention on Conditions for Registration of Ships⁽¹⁵⁾ together with resolutions on measures to protect the interests of labour-supplying countries and on measures to minimize adverse economic effects, and decided that the two resolutions should be annexed to the text of the Convention. At the same meeting, the Conference adopted its Final Act⁽¹⁶⁾

Action by the Committee on Shipping. On 21 November⁽¹⁷⁾ the Committee on Shipping invited all States that had not done so to consider signing the Convention and invited UNCTAD member States to consider ratifying or acceding to it. UNCTAD members were invited, when in the process of becoming contracting parties and in order to facilitate the Convention's implementation, to make efforts to refrain from taking steps not in conformity with the Convention's provisions when in force. The Committee requested the UNCTAD secretariat to provide guidance upon request to Governments concerning the Convention's possible implementation, to monitor progress made towards ratification and implementation of the Convention or its provisions, and to report periodically thereon to the Committee.

Report to the General Assembly. In an April 1986 report to the General Assembly⁽¹⁸⁾ the UNCTAD Secretary-General stated that all issues at the Conference had been resolved by consensus, taking into account the mandate contained in a 1982 Assembly resolution⁽¹⁹⁾ requiring that the views of all interested parties should be taken into account. Of the 97 States which participated in the fourth part of the Conference, 85 signed the Final Act.

The Convention was open for signature from 1 May 1986 until 30 April 1987 at United Nations Headquarters, and would thereafter remain open for accession. It contained both mandatory and recommendatory articles or provisions and related to all seagoing merchant ships of 500 gross registered tons and above, with some exceptions such as dredgers, tugs and fishing vessels. The Convention was to enter into force 12 months after the date on which not less than 40 States, the combined tonnage of which amounted to at least 25 per cent of world tonnage, had become contracting parties to it.

As at 31 December 1986,⁽²⁰⁾ five States (Bolivia, Cameroon, Mexico, Morocco, Senegal) had signed the Convention; none had ratified or acceded to it.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 5 December 1986, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, the General Assembly adopted without vote decision 41/435. The Assembly welcomed the successful outcome of the Conference and invited all States that had not done so to take the measures necessary to become contracting parties to the Convention.

Maritime liens and mortgages

In accordance with a 1985 recommendation of the Working Group on International Shipping Legislation⁽²¹⁾ the first session of a Joint UNCTAD/IMO Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Maritime Liens and Mortgages and Related Subjects was held at Geneva from 1 to 12 December 1986.⁽²²⁾ The Group had before it reports by the UNCTAD secretariat on a new approach to the international regime for maritime securities⁽²³⁾ and by the IMO secretariat on issues for its consideration⁽²⁴⁾

On 12 December, the Group adopted a common understanding covering its rules of procedure, membership, officers, official languages and secretariat, and approved the report of its Chairman on the work of a sessional group which had commented on the documents submitted by the UNCTAD and IMO secretariats. The Group decided to hold its second session in London from 11 to 15 May 1987.

Convention on a Code of Conduct for Liner Conferences

The United Nations Convention on a Code of Conduct for Liner Conferences⁽²⁵⁾ which entered into force in 1983⁽²⁶⁾ had 68 States parties as at 31 December 1986⁽²⁰⁾ Two States—Algeria and Kuwait—became parties during 1986.

In accordance with a 1984 request of the Committee on Shipping⁽²⁷⁾ the UNCTAD secretariat submitted to the Committee a report on implementation of the Convention⁽²⁸⁾ which reviewed the situation as of late 1985. Its findings were largely based on information received from 44 countries in response to requests from the UNCTAD Secretary-General, and on completed questionnaires received from liner conferences serving trades between countries contracting parties to the Code. The first part of the report discussed issues relating to the Convention's implementation. It placed the Code in the context of current liner shipping and analysed to what extent individual Code provisions had been implemented. The second part concerned the review conference to be convened in 1988 and summarized items identified by States members of UNCTAD as requiring the attention of that conference.

Guidelines towards the application of the Convention⁽²⁹⁾ were published by the UNCTAD secretariat in 1986.

By a 21 November resolution⁽³⁰⁾ the Committee on Shipping recommended that Governments of UNCTAD members should, where consistent with their obligations under the provisions of the Code of Conduct for Liner Conferences and/or with their national legislation: invite liner conferences to hold consultations with shippers' organizations on questions related to tariffs, rates, surcharges, port congestion and other issues; and invite liner conferences, when applying changes in freight rates or surcharges, to inform shippers or national authorities at the exporting end of a trade of the results of negotiations or consultations with importers and to provide round voyage information to enable shippers to assess the justification for proposed rate changes. The Committee invited shippers to co-operate at a national, regional or subregional level and invited Governments of UNCTAD members to encourage their shippers' organizations to establish contacts with such organizations at the other end of the trade and to encourage the relevant parties to agree on the calculation and operation of bunker and currency adjustment factors on the basis of equitable cost recovery. The UNCTAD secretariat was requested to assist shippers' organizations in developing countries to improve the effectiveness of the consultation machinery, and to prepare a report based on experiences in freight rate negotiations to assist shippers' organizations in determining means of preparing for and proceeding in negotiations with conferences.

Ports

In accordance with a 1984 decision of the Committee on Shipping,⁽³¹⁾ an Ad Hoc Intergovernmental Group of Port Experts met at Geneva from 25 February to 5 March 1986⁽³²⁾ to review problems relevant to the development, improvement and operation of ports, to consider ways in which technical co-operation between ports could be of mutual benefit and to make suggestions on how technical co-operation programmes could be instituted.

The Group had before it a summary of UNCTAD's work in ports,⁽³³⁾ prepared by the secretariat, as well as reports on port management training,⁽³⁴⁾ co-operation between ports,⁽³⁵⁾ port financing,⁽³⁶⁾ development of bulk terminals,⁽³⁷⁾ and trans-shipment ports.⁽³⁸⁾

The Group adopted and transmitted to the Committee on Shipping a number of general recommendations regarding issues to be drawn to the attention of Governments and possible future work by the Committee on the subject of ports, plus a list of subjects and areas in which the UNCTAD secretariat should be active in order to continue to be of the greatest benefit to the port industry. Those activities were grouped under: research and studies; training; advisory services; and dissemination and co-ordination.

On 21 November,⁽¹⁰⁾ the Committee took note of the Group's report and requested the secretariat to adapt its work programme in the light of the Group's recommendations. The Committee also requested a summary of the secretariat's work on ports and recommended that a meeting of the Group be convened in accordance with terms of reference to be established by the Committee. Governments were invited to provide continuing support for UNCTAD's port training activities and advisory services, which the Group considered to be most effective.

Maritime fraud

At its November 1986 session,⁽³⁾ the Committee on Shipping considered UNCTAD secretariat reports on various subjects concerning methods to combat maritime fraud. The reports, requested in 1985 by the Ad Hoc Intergovernmental Group to Consider Means of Combating All Aspects of Maritime Fraud, including Piracy,⁽³⁹⁾ covered: measures to improve the exchange of shipping information;⁽⁴⁰⁾ the prevention of documentary fraud associated with bills of lading—use of sea waybills;⁽⁴¹⁾ and measures to increase co-operation in the investigation and prosecution of maritime fraud.⁽⁴²⁾

On 21 November,⁽¹⁰⁾ the Committee requested the UNCTAD secretariat to promote the early establishment of a proposed Maritime Fraud Prevention Exchange by international non-governmental and commercial organizations, to monitor progress made by participating in the meetings of the preparatory working group of its founder members and operating companies set up for that purpose, and to report to the Committee. The secretariat was also requested to report on progress being made by international organizations on sea waybills and on progress made in developing a training programme on measures to combat maritime fraud. The Committee recommended that the Trade and Development Board endorse the UNCTAD non-mandatory model clauses on marine hull and cargo insurance and instruct the secretariat to circulate them to commercial parties concerned, and requested the secretariat to promote their use by preparing explanatory material. The Committee reiterated that UNCTAD States members should inform the UNCTAD and IMO secretariats of the commercial and economic consequences for their merchant ships resulting from port State control at a regional level, and requested the UNCTAD secretariat to inform the Committee of communications received.

Transport of dangerous goods

In response to a 1985 Economic and Social Council request,⁽⁴³⁾ the Secretary-General submitted in June 1986 a report on the participation of Member States in the work of the Committee of Experts on the Transport of Dangerous Goods.⁽⁴⁴⁾

The Secretary-General stated that Member States, when considering the question, should recall that there was an increasing volume of dangerous goods in world-wide commerce and a constant need to meet the growing concerns for the protection of life and property through their safe transport, while at the same time facilitating trade. In addition, specialized agencies and other international organizations relied almost completely on the work of the Committee to achieve internationally harmonized laws. Member States had also taken the Committee's recommendations into account in formulating their national requirements and regulations on the transport of dangerous goods.

The report outlined the Committee's terms of reference and main areas of work and then described its membership and composition. It was noted that currently the Committee consisted of experts from Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Japan, Norway, Poland, the USSR, the United Kingdom and the United States. The Committee had recommended that nationals of the Netherlands and Sweden should also be appointed as full members. In 1975,⁽⁴⁵⁾ the Economic and Social Council had decided to add five experts from developing countries to the membership. Iraq and Thailand had sent experts to only two Committee sessions and none to meetings of its subsidiary bodies. With regard to the participation of developing countries in the Committee's work, the report stated that their active participation would provide a broader decision-making basis and ensure that their interests would be adequately reflected. However, since the highly technical character and diversity of the Committee's work required substantial technical support for a governmental expert's participation to be effective, the Secretary-General suggested possible ways of assisting developing countries which wished to participate but required technical support: identifying interested developed countries willing to assist developing countries in technical preparations for meetings; inviting regional commissions to assist them; assisting them through the technical co-operation programme of the United Nations Department of Technical Co-operation for Development; and strengthening their national capacities through the country programmes of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP).

The Secretary-General hoped that the Economic and Social Council would widen the Committee's decision-making base by adopting measures to encourage developing countries' effective participation and acting on the Committee's recommendation to appoint experts from the Netherlands and Sweden as full members.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 July 1986, the Council, on the recommendation of its First (Economic) Committee, adopted without vote resolution 1986/66.

Work of the Committee of Experts on the Transport of Dangerous Goods

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1488(XLVIII) of 22 May 1970, 1974(LIX) of 30 July 1975, 1983/7 of 26 May 1983 and 1985/9 of 28 May 1985,

Reiterating the world-wide importance and practical value of the work of the Committee of Experts on the

Transport of Dangerous Goods constantly to develop and update internationally harmonized safety standards and regulations,

Taking into account the growing desirability of widening the decision-making base of the Committee through broader geographical representation by granting observers full membership in the Committee in view of their active participation in its work and by encouraging the participation of developing countries and other non-member countries in its future work,

Noting that the satisfactory functioning of the Committee is dependent upon an adequate level of technical support and servicing,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General concerning the work of the Committee of Experts on the Transport of Dangerous Goods, particularly questions of extended participation and membership;

2. Invites the Secretary-General, in the light of his report and further consultations with experts and observers participating in the work of the Committee, to take the following measures to widen the decision-making base of the Committee:

(a) Encouraging the participation of experts on a wider geographical basis;

(b) Welcoming, in particular, the participation of interested developing countries, upon request, as full members of the Committee;

(c) With respect to the active participation of observers in the work of the Committee, appointing experts designated by the Netherlands and Sweden as full members of the Committee, subject to confirmation by the Committee but not later than February 1987;

3. Invites Governments, in particular those of interested developed countries having expertise in the transport of dangerous goods, with the assistance of the Secretariat, to support the participation of interested developing countries, upon request, in the meetings of the Committee;

4. Repeats its request to the Secretary-General to maintain the regular work programme at the requisite level by the full implementation of Council resolutions 1983/7 and 1985/9;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare a report on the implementation of the present resolution for submission to the Council not later than at its second regular session of 1987.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/66

23 July 1986 Meeting 38 Adopted without vote

Approved by First Committee (E/1986/138) without vote, 17 July (meeting 15); 6-nation draft (E/1986/C.1/L.2), orally revised following informal consultations; agenda item 17.

Sponsors: France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Netherlands, Spain, Sweden, United Kingdom.

Committee of Experts. The Committee of Experts on the Transport of Dangerous Goods (fourteenth session, Geneva, 1-10 December),⁽⁴⁶⁾ noting the global increase in concern over the safety, during transport, of hazardous materials of all types, believed the highest priority should be given to its work and that no cuts in meetings or staff resources would be acceptable without a serious loss of efficiency.

As a result of the July 1986 Economic and Social Council resolution (see above), the Committee unanimously supported a proposal that observers from the Netherlands and Sweden should be made into full members of the Committee forthwith. The Committee continued to express the hope that representatives from other geographical locations and interested developing countries would participate actively in its work and that of its subsidiary bodies.

The need for rapid publication of the Committee's recommendations was again emphasized and it was also suggested that profits accruing from their sale should directly benefit the Committee's work.

The Committee's Group of Rapporteurs met at Geneva from 10 to 14 March⁽⁴⁷⁾ and from 5 to 8 August⁽⁴⁸⁾ its Group of Experts on Explosives met from 11 to 14 August⁽⁴⁹⁾

Multimodal and container transport

In accordance with a 1984 Committee on Shipping request⁽⁵⁰⁾ a Group of Experts to Develop and Recommend Model Rules for Multimodal Container Tariffs met at Geneva from 13 to 17 January 1986;⁽⁵¹⁾ it had before it a report by the UNCTAD secretariat on elements of such rules⁽⁵²⁾

The Group concluded that model container tariff rules should be flexible so that commercial requirements of individual trade routes could be taken into account. Flexibility could be ensured by making their application legally non-mandatory; their application would be through negotiation and consultation between suppliers and users of multimodal transport services. The Group examined aspects of container tariff rules, agreed on a number of definitions and developed some model rules with global application which it annexed to its interim report.⁽⁵¹⁾ It also designed some model rules applicable to both or either of the segmented systems and integrated systems of multimodal transport being used by commercial parties. The Group considered that a continuously updated reference library for multimodal tariff rules could be useful and requested the secretariat to prepare some proposals on how such a library could be established and maintained.

The Group held its second session at Geneva from 1 to 5 December 1986⁽⁵³⁾ and had before it UNCTAD secretariat reports on: a few examples of the comparison between the recommended model rules and existing tariff rules, in particular those covering point-to-point multimodal tariff rules⁽⁵⁴⁾ and an evaluation of various schemes for the setting up and maintenance of a reference library⁽⁵⁵⁾

On 5 December, the Group adopted the model rules for multimodal container tariffs. It also adopted the report of a subgroup which it had established to consider the setting up and maintenance of a reference library and endorsed its findings and recommendations. The model rules and the recommendations were annexed to the Group's final report.⁽⁵³⁾

In order for the Committee on Shipping to evaluate the usefulness of a reference library, the Group requested the UNCTAD secretariat to conduct a pilot project on such a library, which should consist of existing tariff rules using manual storage and retrieval. The Group also requested the secretariat to make an interim progress report to the Committee in 1988 and a final report in 1990, and, after the Committee's 1988 session, to test the possibilities of creating an electronic data processing-based reference library within existing resources.

Consideration by the Committee on Shipping. At its November session⁽³⁾ the Committee on Shipping had before it a summary report⁽⁵⁶⁾ by the UNCTAD secretariat on measures towards the implementation of the 1980 United Nations Convention on International Multimodal Transport of Goods⁽⁵⁷⁾ and the United Nations Convention on the Carriage of Goods by Sea, 1978 (Hamburg Rules)⁽⁵⁸⁾ The report dealt with the following issues: guidelines for the establishment of multimodal transport operators in developing countries; a standard form and model provisions for multimodal transport documents; implications of the Convention on multimodal transport and the Hamburg Rules; model rules for multimodal container tariffs; rights and duties of container terminal operators and users; and a review of developments in standardization of containers and related activities.

On 21 November⁽¹⁰⁾ the Committee invited States members of UNCTAD to consider ratifying or acceding to the two Conventions. It instructed the UNCTAD secretariat to elaborate a standard form and model provisions for multimodal transport documents and requested it to expedite its work on the economic and commercial implications of the two Conventions. It urged the UNCTAD Secretary-General to draw to the attention of the Secretary-General of the International Organization of Standardization the Committee's serious concerns regarding the technical and commercial consequences, particularly for developing countries, of the continuing increases in container dimensions and maximum growth mass. The secretariat was requested to: prepare a report on the feasibility of introducing a system for compiling statistics on the composition of the world container fleet; continue to examine technological developments in data processing, including development of the MULTISHIP programmes, and make recommendations to the Committee; complete the study of investment risk and operating services and facilities, co-operating with the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law on matters related to container terminals, especially in connection with that body's ongoing work on liabilities of operators of transport terminals; co-operate with the regional commissions on studies to identify and improve the role of freight forwarders in developing countries; prepare information material for shippers to make the most efficient use of multimodal transport; and report to the Committee on progress and results. UNCTAD members were invited to consider contributing to developing software programs to be used by multimodal transport operators of developing countries.

Technical assistance and training

A secretariat report on UNCTAD technical assistance and training in shipping, ports and multimodal transport, covering the period from mid-1984 to mid-1986,⁽⁵⁹⁾ stated that seminars conducted during 1986 covered: port operations (Odessa, Ukrainian SSR); container terminal management (Antwerp, Belgium); port finances (Le Havre, France); management of cargo operations (Buenos Aires, Argentina); and container terminal development policy (Kuantan, Malaysia, and Geneva).

By mid-1986, the TRAINMAR programme—a world-wide network of co-operating shipping and ports training centres linked by the use of common methods and the interchange of training materials, students and instructors—was made up of 13 interregional, regional or national projects. Since its inception in 1980 and up to the end of the first quarter of 1986, 2,149 managers in the port sector and 445 in the shipping sector as well as 165 course developers and 265 instructors had been trained through the programme. Courses prepared by the TRAINMAR programme as of March 1986 covered training technology, ports, maritime legislation, shipping and multimodal transport. Funding for the interregional, regional and national components of TRAINMAR was provided by UNDP. In some cases (Malaysia, Mexico, Morocco, Tunisia), funding was ensured by Governments, either entirely or partially through the cost-sharing scheme. Other local inputs in the form of counterparts, accommodation and secretarial support were provided by the participating institutions.

With funding from the Swedish International Development Authority, audio-visual and other training materials were prepared for use by ports and port training institutes in developing countries to conduct training courses under the broad heading of "improving port performance".

On 21 November,⁽¹⁰⁾ the Committee on Shipping requested the Trade and Development Board to find urgently the means to contribute, within the current work programme and existing resources, to continuing the activities of the TRAINMAR central support team. It invited UNDP, other financial institutions, donor countries and countries benefiting from the TRAINMAR programme also to contribute to the other resource requirements of the team. The UNCTAD secretariat was requested to continue to report to the Committee on technical assistance and training activities, and was urged to proceed to a comprehensive evaluation of the UNCTAD Shipping Division's technical assistance programmes with an indication of procedures and criteria followed in response to governmental requests for assistance. The Committee invited UNDP to continue and expand its programme of sectoral support advisory services in shipping, ports and multimodal transport in order to assist developing countries to assess their technical assistance requirements and to prepare future assistance programmes. It recommended that the UNCTAD secretariat, when defining and implementing technical assistance programmes, use local expertise where appropriate.

Chapter VI

Transnational corporations

Transnational corporations (TNCs) continued in 1986 to attract the attention of the international community in view of their role in shaping international economic development and trade, foreign direct investment and transfer of resources.

The Commission on Transnational Corporations (twelfth session, New York, 9-18 April) discussed, among other things, recent developments in TNC activities as they related to international economic relations, TNCs in South Africa and Namibia, international arrangements governing TNC activities, and technical co-operation. As in previous years, the Commission reconvened a special session (New York, 20-31 January)—and a resumed special session (14 April)—and examined the outstanding issues in the draft code of conduct on TNCs. The Commission's Intergovernmental Working Group of Experts (fourth session, New York, 3-14 March) discussed international standards of accounting and reporting.

In July, the Economic and Social Council agreed to the Commission's request for continued services of expert advisers (resolution 1986/55).

Draft code of conduct

Negotiations continued in 1986 on a draft code of conduct for TNCs, as the Commission on TNCs met in New York in a reconvened special session (20-31 January)⁽¹⁾ and a resumed special session (14 April) as authorized by the Economic and Social Council (decision 1986/109).⁽²⁾ In addition, informal consultations were held from 3 to 8 April with a view to reaching an overall solution to the major outstanding issues in the draft code, such as settlement of disputes, conflict of jurisdiction, non-interference in internal political affairs, transfer of payments and permanent sovereignty over natural resources. The Commission decided, in principle, to continue negotiations on the draft code, and recommended, on 14 April, that the special session be reconvened at an appropriate time.

On 22 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of the Commission's reports on its reconvened special session and the Secretary-

General's report on the question of expert advisers⁽³⁾ (decision 1986/169) (see also p. 526).

An informal high-level round table (Montreux, Switzerland, 3 and 4 October)⁽⁴⁾ organized by the United Nations Centre on TNCs, reviewed the status of negotiations on the draft code.

In a 22 October letter⁽⁵⁾ addressed to the Chairman of the General Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, Brazil asserted that many of the difficulties encountered in negotiations on the draft code seemed to emerge from the debate on issues irrelevant to the control of TNCs but concerned more with legal questions arising from national sovereignty. It held developed countries responsible for the opportunities lost in 1983 and 1985 to finalize the code, and urged those countries to submit specific proposals.

Definition of TNCs

The Commission⁽⁶⁾ continued its efforts, begun in 1975, at defining TNCs, a major issue of relevance to a draft code of conduct. A January 1986 report of the Secretary-General⁽⁷⁾ summarized the developments in the Commission at its 1985 sessions, relating to the definition of TNCs and the scope of application of the draft code.

Related resolution: ESC 1986/53.

Bilateral, regional and international arrangements relating to TNCs

The Commission on TNCs at its April session⁽⁸⁾ took note of the report of the Secretary-General on bilateral arrangements and agreements related to TNCs.⁽⁹⁾ The report examined bilateral investment protection and promotion agreements, highlighted the main differences in some key provisions of bilateral agreements, analysed the effectiveness of such agreements in terms of promoting and protecting foreign direct investment, and discussed the future of bilateral agreements in the context of the development of an international law on investment. In presenting the report to the Commission, the Executive Director of the United Nations Centre on TNCs stated that the number of bilateral investment agreements was on the increase in response to the growing importance of foreign direct-investment flows and to the absence of an international regime governing those flows. Host developing countries tended to view those agreements as one-sided in that they concentrated on the protection of the interests of the investors without including rules on their obligations and conduct in the host country.

Standards of accounting and reporting

The Intergovernmental Working Group of Experts on International Standards of Accounting and Reporting held its fourth session⁽¹⁾ in New York from 3 to 14 March 1986. The Group discussed the following on the basis of reports of the Secretary-General: current developments in the field of accounting and reporting by TNCs,⁽²⁾ accounting and reporting for investments,⁽³⁾ information disclosure concerning related party transactions and for transfer of technology,⁽⁴⁾ accounting for property and depreciation accounting,⁽⁵⁾ auditor's association with non-financial information⁽⁶⁾ and problems encountered in responding to requests for information on individual TNCs⁽⁷⁾ The Group's Chairman said the move towards privatization involving TNCs in a number of countries suggested the need to give greater attention to those issues.

The Group agreed and made recommendations on a number of points relevant to accounting and information disclosure, and agreed to consider in 1987 a proposal to have the Centre on TNCs conduct an international survey of financial statements published by TNCs.

In April, the Commission on TNCs⁽⁸⁾ took note of the Group's report.

Commission on TNCs

The Commission on TNCs, in addition to a reconvened special session (see p. 525), held its twelfth session in New York from 9 to 18 April 1986.⁽¹⁾ It discussed, among other things, recent developments related to TNCs and international economic relations, activities of the United Nations Centre on TNCs, research and information, and TNCs in South Africa and Namibia.

On 22 July, the Economic and Social Council approved the provisional agenda and documentation for the thirteenth (1987) session of the Commission (decision 1986/168). The Commission decided in 1986 to accept previous recommendations of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council that it meet biennially instead of annually, but the Council (decision 1986/117) and the Assembly (decisions 40/478, 41/452) postponed taking decision on the matter until 1987.

TNCs in South Africa and Namibia

For its consideration of TNCs in South Africa and Namibia, the Commission had before it reports of the Secretary-General on TNG activities in the region and the collaboration of such corporations with the racist minority regime⁽²⁾ and on the responsibilities of home countries with respect to TNCs operating in the region in violation of United Nations resolutions⁽³⁾ The Executive Director of the Centre informed the Commission that there were over 1,000 TNCs with operations in the area. The Secretary-General also submitted a note⁽⁴⁾ on the public hearings on TNC activities in South Africa and Namibia⁽⁵⁾ annexed to which were the report and recommendations of the 11-member Panel of Eminent Persons⁽⁶⁾ which had conducted the hearings in New York in September 1985.⁽⁷⁾ On 18 April, the Commission adopted a draft resolution for action by the Economic and Social Council, welcoming the Panel's recommendations and condemning those TNCs that continued collaborating with South Africa (see Council resolution 1986/1).

Expert advisers

In 1986, the Commission, which had used the services of expert advisers since its inception⁽⁸⁾ selected for a two-year term 15 advisers (with one more to be nominated later) from business, trade union, academic and other fields. In a June report⁽⁹⁾ subsequently taken note of by the Council in July (decision 1986/169), the Secretary-General noted that the Commission had expressed the wish to continue to rely beyond 1986 on the assistance of expert advisers—serving in their private capacity—and to increase their advisory functions in order to maximize use of their diversified knowledge in the Commission's work, such as on the draft code of conduct and in the work programme of the United Nations Centre on TNCs.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July, on the recommendation of its First (Economic) Committee, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1986/55 by roll-call vote.

Expert advisers to the Commission on Transnational Corporations

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolution 1913(LVII) of 5 December 1974, by which it established the Commission on Transnational Corporations and defined and authorized the institution of expert advisers to support the Commission,

Noting the satisfaction expressed by the Commission with the contribution of the expert advisers to its work and the desire expressed by the Commission to make fuller use of their diversified knowledge, Recommends that adequate provision for the continuation of the services of expert advisers to the Commission on Transnational Corporations beyond 1986 be restored to section 9 of the programme budget for the biennium 1986-1987.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/55

22 July 1986 Meeting 38 42-9-1 (roll-call vote)

Approved by First Committee (E/1986/130) by roll-call vote (41-8-2), 16 July (meeting 14); draft by Yugoslavia, for Group of 77 (E/1986/C.1/L.1); agenda item 9. Financial implications. S-G. E/1986/C.1/L.9.

Roll-call vote in Council as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Bangladesh, Brazil, Byelorussian SSR, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Djibouti, Egypt, Finland, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Guinea, Haiti, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Jamaica, Morocco, Mozambique, Nigeria, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Romania, Rwanda, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Turkey, USSR, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zimbabwe.

Against: Belgium, Canada, France, Germany, Federal Republic of Italy, Japan, Spain, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Australia.

In explanation of vote, Canada and the United Kingdom (on behalf of member States of the European Economic Community) said they could not support the proposed action at a time of unprecedented financial crisis for the United Nations (see also ADMINISTRATIVE AND BUDGETARY QUESTIONS, Chapter I). Similarly, the United States felt the additional expenditure of $121,300 required under the proposal was an extravagance that the United Nations could ill afford. Australia abstained for lack of a precise definition of the advisers' role. Yugoslavia, speaking on behalf of the Group of 77, expressed regret that the text did not command consensus, adding that the topic had been politicized unduly. Norway also regretted the absence of consensus action on the text which, it said, involved no additional financial implications in relation to previous years.

Centre on TNCs

In 1986, the United Nations Centre on TNCs, the main Secretariat unit for TNC-related matters, continued to develop an information system and conducted research and technical co-operation activities. It also assisted the Commission in formulating a code of conduct and prepared studies for the Intergovernmental Working Group of Experts on International Standards of Accounting and Reporting (see p. 526).

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July, on the recommendation of its First Committee, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1986/53 without vote.

Work of the United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolution 1913(LVII) of 5 December 1974, in particular the mandate of the Commission on Transnational Corporations, as well as the terms of reference of the United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations,

Aware of the growing interdependence of issues and of the roles of enterprises engaged in transnational operations, regardless of form or nature of ownership and country of origin, but with due regard to their relative weight and influence in the world economy,

Conscious of the relevance of the activities of such enterprises and the importance of minimizing their negative effects while maximizing their positive effects,

Requests the Secretary-General, without prejudice to the negotiations on the code of conduct on transnational corporations, to study ways and means by which the United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations can take account of the preamble to the present resolution in preparing research, analyses and information and in pursuing other activities, and to report thereon to the Commission on Transnational Corporations at its thirteenth session.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/53

22 July 1986 Meeting 38 Adopted without vote

Approved by First Committee (E/1986/130) without vote, 11 July (meeting 10); draft by Commission on TNCs (E/1986/27); agenda item 9.

Information system

The Centre on TNCs continued to update its comprehensive information system on TNCs and provided, upon request, statistical data on foreign direct investment and related flows obtained from Governments and intergovernmental organizations, as well as information on individual TNCs. In addition to data collected over the years on major TNCs in the manufacturing and extractive service sectors, the Centre began to gather data on the largest TNCs in the service sectors—an area of increasing importance to developing countries. The Centre continued to make progress in standardizing line-of-business and geographical classifications in its corporate relationships data base, collected and updated its collection of contracts and agreements between TNCs and host country entities, and responded to requests from government organizations for assistance in developing information systems to increase the efficiency and productivity of their work.

During the year, the Centre's information system received 1,507 requests for which the responses required some research; 799 of the requests were from Governments and intergovernmental organizations. In addition, 1,700 short-answer requests were received.

A January 1986 report of the Secretary-General(1) on management of information on TNCs described the work programme of the Centre in information acquisition, processing and provision.

Joint units with regional commissions

Joint units established between the Centre on TNCs and the United Nations regional commissions continued to operate in 1986 in Africa, Asia and the Pacific, Europe, Latin America and the Caribbean, and Western Asia. Each unit's work programme, tailored to the region's specific needs, included research on the economic, social and institutional issues of TNCs, information dissemination, and training and advisory services. Activities of the Centre and of the joint units between April 1985 and February 1986 were described in a report of the Secretary-General to the Commission at its 1986 regular session.(2)

The joint unit of the Centre and the Economic Commission for Africa focused its research activities on the role of TNCs in technology transfer in Africa, with particular emphasis on food-processing industries, and on the techniques of negotiation with TNCs. Work was initiated on a study of the impact of TNCs on social development in selected African countries, with special emphasis on infant-feeding practices as affected by TNC operations. It used the publications The CTC Reporter and Transnational Focus to disseminate information on TNC activities, and continued to computerize data on the main TNCs in the region.

The joint unit with the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific (ESCAP) completed case-studies dealing with, among other things, technology acquisition through alternate arrangements with TNCs, TNCs in the fast-food industry, and harmonization of investment policies and incentives. Research work began on the environmental aspects of TNC activities and their regulation in developing countries of the region.

The unit continued to monitor closely the technical assistance needs of ESCAP member States. It provided administrative and technical support to training workshops and advisory missions conducted by the Centre, and formulated proposals for the holding of seminars on joint ventures among firms from developing countries of the region and on economic co-operation among ESCAP member countries, as well as an international conference on TNCs and human resource development. The unit disseminated information through national focal points in several ESCAP member countries and received from them information on foreign direct investment and other TNC-related matters.

The joint unit with the Economic Commission for Europe focused its research activities on two projects undertaken in co-operation with the Centre—an ongoing interregional project on transnational banks and the fourth survey of TNCs in world development—and prepared studies on major changes that had taken place in the relevant fields, including those pertaining to deregulation and securitization in financial markets, and large-scale mergers and acquisitions. The joint unit assisted the Centre by providing information on technical expertise available in the region and of use to developing countries.

The joint unit with the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC) conducted case-studies on transnational banks and the external finances of Argentina, Colombia and Uruguay, and prepared a preliminary summary document on the relative negotiating strengths of Governments and transnational banks, the nature of the negotiating process and possible solutions. In addition, the unit published case-studies on the impact of TNCs on development in Argentina, Colombia and Paraguay. It assisted the Central Reserve Bank of Peru in analysing the external sector, the inflationary process and the problem of capital flight. It prepared notes for the ECLAC secretariat on the bargaining capacity of the Governments of the region with TNCs during the current period of international and national crisis and distributed to those Governments the first version of a new data base on foreign direct investment.

The joint unit with the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia made progress on the study of the impact of TNC operations on development in the Gulf Co-operation Council region. It continued to develop a project document for setting up a regional comprehensive information system on TNCs.

Research

The Centre's research activities continued to focus on securing a code of conduct and other international arrangements relating to TNCs; increasing the knowledge and understanding of the nature of TNCs and their impact on developing countries; strengthening the capabilities of host developing countries in their relations with TNCs; and examining TNCs' role in the overall development process.

The Centre issued three publications, on the United Nations code of conduct on TNCs⁽³⁾ and the questions of a reference, in the code, to international law⁽⁴⁾ or to international obligations.⁽⁵⁾ The Centre also prepared technical papers examining the key elements of regional and multilateral arrangements having relevance to TNC activities and bilateral investment agreements. As part of its analysis of international investment flows, the Centre published a report on foreign direct investment in Latin America.⁽⁶⁾ Preparatory work continued for an updated survey on TNCs in world development, aimed at examining changes in the nature of TNCs, in their patterns of activities and in their role in the world economy, in particular their impact on developing countries.

The Centre continued to expand its materials relating to laws and regulations, updated its general surveys of national legislation and regulations and examined related legal and regulatory régimes. Activities of TNCs in South Africa and Namibia were examined in publications issued in 1986 (see p. 526).

The Centre continued to study factors affecting the operations of, as well as allocations of responsibility to, TNCs regarding environmental protection and industrial safety.⁽⁷⁾ Other continuing research dealt with TNCs and international trade, industrialization, transnational banking, transborder data flows,⁽⁸⁾ foreign direct investment, technology transfer, and TNCs in selected industry sectors.

In April, the Commission⁽⁹⁾ took note of a report of the Secretary-General containing a summary of selected technical papers on TNC activities.⁽¹⁰⁾

TNCs and international economic relations

Research activities in 1986 also dealt with recent developments related to TNCs and international economic relations, and the Centre submitted to the Commission two reports on the topic. The first report⁽¹¹⁾ discussed some trends in TNC activities in the world economy and their impact on developing countries. It focused on the increasing concentration of foreign direct investment in the developed market economies and the corresponding decline in the relative importance of developing countries as hosts to TNCs; reviewed the debt crisis of developing countries and the role of transnational banks; and documented the increasing weight of transnational service corporations in world trade and investment and discussed some of the policy implications of that phenomenon. The second report, on data on foreign direct investment,⁽¹²⁾ compared the recognized importance of TNCs in the world economy with the paucity of accurate, timely and consistent information on the nature and extent of their operations. It briefly described the current availability of international data on the topic and suggested that greater attention should be given to producing such data in view of the increased role seen for foreign direct investment and TNCs in relations between developed and developing countries.

In April, the Commission⁽⁹⁾ requested the Centre to prepare for its next session another study on developments related to TNCs and international economic relations; it also asked the Centre to include, in its future work, information on developments relating to data on foreign direct investment.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July, the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of its First Committee, adopted resolution 1986/54 by roll-call vote.

Ongoing and future research on transnational corporations

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling the report of the United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations entitled Transnational Banks: Operations, Strategies and Their Effects in Developing Countries,⁽¹³⁾ prepared pursuant to the decision taken by the Commission on Transnational Corporations at its second session,

Taking note of the ongoing and future research of the Centre as reflected in the reports of the Secretary-General,

1. Requests the United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations to update the report entitled Transnational Banks: Operations, Strategies and Their Effects in Developing Countries, taking into account the changes in this field that have occurred during the 1980s;

2. Requests the Centre to include in that report an analysis of the following issues:

(a) Economic elements behind the determination of interest rates by transnational banks within the system of variable rates;

(b) The role of transnational banks in the transfer of resources from developing to developed countries;

(c) Differences and similarities in the recycling of international liquidity in the 1970s and the 1980s by transnational banks;

(d) Forms and procedures of negotiation of transnational banks vis-à-vis developing countries in relation to external debt;

(e) Interaction between the transnational banks and the International Monetary Fund and other agencies in the negotiation of the external debt of developing countries;

3. Requests the Centre to submit the report to the Commission on Transnational Corporations at its thirteenth session.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/54

22 July 1986 Meeting 38 39-12-1 (roll-call vote)

Approved by First Committee (E/1986/130) by roll-call vote (20-12-2), 11 July (meeting 10); draft by Commission on TNCs (E/1986/27); agenda item 9.

Roll-call vote in Council as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Bangladesh, Brazil, Byelorussian SSR, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Djibouti, Egypt, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Guinea, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Jamaica, Morocco, Mozambique, Nigeria, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Romania, Rwanda, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Syrian Arab Republic, Turkey, USSR, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zimbabwe.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Finland, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Italy, Japan, Spain, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Iceland.

In explanation of vote, the United States asserted that the Centre was not competent to engage in international financial issues of the sort envisaged in the text, and that such activity would intrude into and duplicate the activities of the specialized financial institutions.

Technical co-operation

During 1986, developing countries continued to make frequent and intensive use of technical assistance services of the Centre. Many of the requests involved either sectors and industries critical to the development of their economies, or a substantial revision of their policies, laws and regulations relating to foreign investment and a restructuring of the related institutional machinery. As in the past, the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) provided substantial funding.

The Centre initiated a regional project in Asia and the Pacific to deal with issues arising in negotiations between transnational petroleum corporations and host Governments on the treatment of gas finds, in order to facilitate exploration and development of hydrocarbon resources. It also assisted several countries in the region as well as in the Caribbean in streamlining their investment procedures for TNCs, and advised Governments on investment policies in tune with changing international market conditions.

The Centre undertook some 100 advisory and information projects in addition to training and fellowship programmes for government officials, executives of State enterprises and managers from the private sector of various developing countries. The Centre continued to assist national and regional academic institutions and management training institutes in developing indigenous capabilities for dealing with TNC-related matters, and provided advisory and information services to subregional and regional institutions concerned with TNC activities.

In a January 1986 report⁽¹⁴⁾ to the Commission, the Secretary-General examined the experience gained by the Centre in its technical co-operation programme, with particular reference to the natural resources sector and joint ventures in the manufacturing sector. The report described the major changes in the technical assistance requirements of developing countries in the context of changing conditions in the international markets for investment, technology, trade, finance and production.

Financing

The Centre's technical co-operation programme continued to be financed mainly by extrabudgetary resources from the Centre's Trust Fund and allocations from UNDP.⁽¹⁵⁾ Total extrabudgetary resources amounted to $2,932,400. Contributions to the Trust Fund were $777,487. The Fund's opening balance amounted to $1.04 million and interest income to $130,000; resources made available by UNDP amounted to $981,759.

Total 1986 expenditures amounted to $1,750,048, of which advisory projects accounted for $468,059, and workshops and other training activities, $513,585.

Chapter VII

Regional economic and social activities

The five regional commissions of the United Nations continued to promote economic and social co-operation during 1986.

Each commission held a regular intergovernmental session during the year: the Economic Commission for Africa (ECA), the twelfth meeting of its Conference of Ministers and the twenty-first session of the Commission at Yaounde, Cameroon (17-21 April); the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific (ESCAP), its forty-second session at Bangkok, Thailand (22 April-2 May); the Economic Commission for Europe (ECE), its forty-first session at Geneva (15-26 April); the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC), its twenty-first session at Mexico City (17-25 April); and the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia (ESCWA), its thirteenth ministerial-level session at Baghdad, Iraq (23 and 24 April). In addition, ECA held two special sessions—one to prepare for, and the other to consider the results of, the General Assembly's 1986 special session on the critical economic situation in Africa.

Among the resolutions adopted at the July 1986 session of the Economic and Social Council involving issues of concern to the regional commissions were: the Transport and Communications Decade in Africa (resolution 1986/62); the Industrial Development Decade for Africa (1986/63); membership of Israel in ECE (1986/67); strengthening United Nations technical co-operation in the Caribbean (1986/61); the relocation of ESCWA headquarters (1986/60); and the financial status of ESCWA (1986/59).

Regional co-operation

The executive secretaries of the five regional commissions, meeting in New York on 4 June 1986 under the chairmanship of the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation, reviewed progress made in promoting interregional economic and technical co-operation, as called for by the Economic and Social Council in 1983(1) and by the General Assembly in 1984.(2)

In reports to the Council on regional co-operation, covering the periods from mid-year to mid-year for 1985/86(3) and 1986/87(4) the Secretary-General described the work of the commissions and the meetings of the executive secretaries and drew attention to issues and decisions of the commissions calling for Council action or attention.

In the 1985/86 report, the Secretary-General said the commissions had taken concrete steps in recent years to expand arrangements to promote interregional co-operation and that the representatives of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) had drawn attention to the need to ensure that the commission's interregional projects did not overlap, but supplement and complement, projects being carried out by other United Nations bodies. Consultations among the commissions resulted in 1986 in 20 project proposals for the promotion of economic and technical co-operation among developing countries, with each regional commission except ECE assigned the role of lead agency for specific projects.(4) Financial requirements for project implementation were to be discussed later.

The Economic and Social Council, by decision 1986/110 of 7 February, invited the executive secretaries of the regional commissions, when submitting their joint recommendations concerning regional co-operation, to recommend any items of common interest to all regions, in addition to interregional activities in economic co-operation among developing countries/technical co-operation among developing countries (ECDC/TCDC). On 22 July, by decision 1986/176, the Council took note of the Secretary-General's 1985/86 report.

Also on 23 July, the Council, by resolution 1986/64, requested all in the United Nations system, including the regional commissions, to co-operate in the preparation of an updated world survey on the role of women in development (see p. 791). In an October report,(5) the Secretary-General described progress made in incorporating women's concerns in the work programmes of the regional commissions, as requested by the General Assembly in 1985.(6) (See below for developments by region.)

The Committee for Programme and Co-ordination (CPC) (twenty-sixth session, New York, 28 April-23 May)(7) considered, and recommended the approval of, the proposed revisions to the medium-term plan for 1984-1989,⁽⁸⁾ which included those affecting programmes or sub-programmes of EGA, ECLAC, ESCAP and ESCWA.

An overview of technical co-operation activities implemented by the regional commissions during 1986 was contained in a 1987 report of the Secretary-General.⁽⁹⁾

Africa

The Economic Commission for Africa held its twenty-first session (twelfth meeting of its Conference of Ministers) from 17 to 21 April 1986 at Yaounde, Cameroon⁽¹⁾ and examined the region's economic and social situation against the background of the 1980 Lagos Plan of Action for the Implementation of the Monrovia Strategy for the Economic Development of Africa and the Final Act of Lagos.⁽²⁾ Twenty-six resolutions were adopted by the Conference of Ministers, dealing with, among other things, the Transport and Communications Decade in Africa, the Industrial Development Decade for Africa, food and agriculture, tourism, trade and finance, women and development and the environment.

For the first time in its history, the Commission and the Conference of Ministers held two special sessions, at Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, in connection with the thirteenth special session of the General Assembly on the critical economic situation in Africa (see p. 442). At the first (28-30 April)⁽³⁾ the Commission examined the draft submission to the Assembly, as prepared by the Organization of African Unity (OAU), and transmitted, in the form of a resolution⁽⁴⁾ its report and contribution to the OAU Council of Ministers. At its second special session (13-16 October)⁽⁵⁾ the Commission assessed the outcome of the Assembly's special session; approved the UNDP-assisted fourth-cycle regional programme for Africa (1987-1991); considered the implications of the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990 (UN-PAAERD), adopted at the Assembly's special session, for linkages between country and regional programmes during UNDP's fourth programming cycle (1987-1991); and discussed the problem of technical co-operation in Africa and implementation of the Substantial New Programme of Action (SNPA) for the 1980s for the Least Developed Countries (LDCs)⁽⁶⁾

Major ECA meetings during 1986 included the Conference of African Ministers of Transport, Communications and Planning (fifth meeting, Harare, Zimbabwe, 10 and 11 March), the Conference of Ministers of African LDCs (sixth meeting, Yaounde, 15-17 April), the Conference of African Ministers of Finance (second meeting, Libreville, Gabon, 18-21 June) and the Conference of African Ministers of Industry (eighth meeting, Bujumbura, Burundi, 17-19 September).

Economic and social trends

In its survey of economic and social conditions in Africa during 1985-1986⁽⁷⁾ ECA reported that the continent's economic performance in 1986 did not meet the expectations raised by the recovery of 1985 following the end of the drought. The economy suffered in particular from the collapse in the price of oil in July, which halved the export revenues of many African oil-exporting countries and dimmed prospects of economic growth. The region's output was estimated to have grown by only 1.2 per cent in 1986, as against a 2 per cent rate forecast. Oil-exporting countries recorded a fall of 0.3 per cent in gross domestic product (GDP), while the GDP of non-oil exporters increased by 4 per cent, due largely to government incentives to agricultural production and to lower energy costs. On a subregional basis, West Africa's economy suffered the most, with output falling by 0.5 per cent after growth of 4.4 per cent in 1985. In North and Central Africa, where a large number of oil-exporting countries are located, output grew by only 1.6 per cent. In East and southern Africa, a growth rate of 3.8 per cent was achieved, despite the less favourable performance of countries in southern Africa. The Sahelian countries recorded a 4.9 per cent growth in output, thanks to favourable weather conditions.

The debt issue intensified in 1986; it was estimated that debt outstanding and disbursed reached a total of $175 billion by the end of the year, with scheduled service totalling $24 billion.

Areas of social concern in 1986 included the development and utilization of human resources, health services, environmental protection and population policy. As a result of special attention given to the development of education, the number of students enrolled at all levels more than tripled between 1970 and 1986, to reach 121.3 million. The labour force, which had been growing at an annual average of 2.3 per cent since 1975, was anticipated to rise by at least 20 per cent over the coming five years in many African countries, as the large number of young people of school age entered the labour market, thus causing concern for greater unemployment.

The Economic and Social Council, on 23 July, took note of the summary of the survey of economic and social conditions in Africa, 1984-1985,⁽⁸⁾ among other documents, by decision 1986/182.

Activities in 1986

Development policy and regional economic co-operation

In his biennial report for 1986-1987,⁽⁹⁾ the ECA Executive Secretary stated that, while the countries in the region pursued domestic policy reform in 1986 as required by Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery, 1986-1990 (APPER), adopted by OAU in 1985, and UNPAAERD and implemented economic recovery programmes under the World Bank's auspices or on their own, those domestic efforts had not been matched by an adequate response from Africa's development partners. Meeting after the General Assembly's special session on the critical situation in Africa, the Conference of Ministers, on 15 October,⁽¹⁰⁾ urged ECA member States to implement the measures and policy reforms set out in UNPAAERD and APPER, including the establishment of follow-up machineries to meet the goals, and requested all African subregional and regional organizations to reflect UNPAAERD and APPER in their operations. The Conference welcomed the establishment by the United Nations Secretary-General of a high-level Steering Committee and the Committee's subsequent creation of an inter-agency task force to facilitate the implementation and monitoring of UNPAAERD.

ECA continued to engage in a wide variety of technical co-operation activities in 1986. An amount of $1.5 million in regular programme funds from the United Nations supported the services of 10 regional advisers and assistance to five ECA Multinational Programming and Operational Centres (MULPOCs), located in Cameroon, Morocco, the Niger, Rwanda and Zambia. Regional and subregional activities funded by the regular programme were carried out in economic co-operation, statistics, social development, manpower development, development of conventional and non-conventional sources of energy, public administration and finance, transport and communications, socio-economic research and administration and common services. UNDP funding of $6.5 million financed projects in statistics, industry, national accounts, transport and communications and the integration of women in development, as well as support to MULPOCs and ECA-sponsored regional centres. The United Nations Fund for Population Activities (UNFPA) financed regional population programmes amounting to $3 million, bilateral grants totalling $2 million were extended by Governments and organizations for expert services and bilateral technical assistance programmes, and the United Nations Development Fund for Women provided $180,000 for national efforts to integrate women in development and for support of the African Training and Research Centre for Women. The United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) provided $108,000 to the operational activities of the ECA environmental co-ordination unit. The United Nations Trust Fund for African Development made available $469,017 for the execution of projects in industry, agriculture, natural resources, public administration, trade, economic co-operation and socio-economic research and planning.⁽¹¹⁾

On 19 April,⁽¹²⁾ the Conference of Ministers invited ECA member States, in view of the financial crisis of the United Nations which had adversely affected the level of regular budget resources, to pay or increase, as a matter of urgency, their contributions to the Trust Fund. By another resolution of the same date,⁽¹³⁾ the Conference of Ministers asked MULPOCs to intensify their efforts to assist intergovernmental organizations and related national institutions in their subregions in identifying and promoting multi-country projects aimed at strengthening co-operation and integration among their member States. Also on 19 April,⁽¹⁴⁾ the Conference recommended that an evaluation be undertaken of ECA's role in Africa's development during 1958-1985, with emphasis on the 1975-1985 period, in the belief that ECA could benefit from such a review and appraisal. On 15 October,⁽¹⁵⁾ the Conference appealed to the United Nations system to assist the Indian Ocean Commission in strengthening the economic and social integration of the subregion.

Development planning

Development planning activities were carried out by the Pan-African Documentation and Information System (PADIS) and the African Institute for Economic Development and Planning (IDEP), while work continued towards the establishment of the African Centre of Meteorological Applications for Development (ACMAD), as conceived by the ECA Conference of Ministers in 1985.⁽¹⁶⁾

Through PADIS, whose central co-ordination office was located at Addis Ababa, on-line access was provided to development literature and industrial, agricultural and labour-related data bases. As PADIS prepared to enter its third phase (1987-1991), its activities focused on providing advisory assistance, increasing the diversity of training, expanding the quality and quantity of information products and services, and heightening public awareness of information systems development.

Algeria and Benin received advisory services in installing and testing hardware/software in their national documentation centres; a mission to Burkina Faso in November, at the Government's request, studied the feasibility of establishing a national information and documentation centre. Among a number of training activities conducted during 1986, PADIS, in collaboration with the ECA Statistics Division, organized a workshop on statistical data-base development for French-speaking member States (Addis Ababa, 24-28 November).

The Subregional Technical Committee meeting for the Eastern and Southern African Documentation and Information System (ESADIS) (Nairobi, Kenya, 28-30 April) discussed the operational modalities of the ESADIS centre, which was subsequently set up within the Lusaka-based MULPOC in Zambia. Other new developments in 1986 included the launching of an information service for social and economic development planners, decision-makers and researchers, and publication of quarterly newsletters to facilitate the exchange of experiences between member States and individual organizations and agencies.

On 19 April,⁽¹⁷⁾ the Conference of Ministers, having examined the recommendations of the Regional Technical Committee for PADIS (Yaounde, 11 and 12 April), requested the ECA Executive Secretary to negotiate with the League of Arab States on implementing the latter's agreement to host the North African Documentation and Information System for a three-year transitional period; called on African countries to approach the European Economic Community (EEC) for funding for that System and PADIS; and asked the UNDP Administrator to ensure that the North African System was established.

Work continued in 1986 towards the establishment of ACMAD,⁽¹⁸⁾ as a means of applying meteorology to development and, among other things, of combating drought. On 19 April,⁽¹⁹⁾ the Conference requested the Executive Secretary to consult with potential host countries on underwriting ACMAD and to prepare its draft constitution in collaboration with the World Meteorological Organization (WMO) and OAU. The ninth session of the WMO intergovernmental body of Permanent Representatives—Regional Association I (Africa)—(Harare, December) considered the report of an inter-agency expert consultation on the ACMAD draft constitution and recommended that a WMO/ECA assessment mission visit all potential host countries (Algeria, Egypt, Kenya, the Niger and Senegal).

The Conference of Ministers urged the ECA Executive Secretary, in a resolution adopted on 19 April,⁽²⁰⁾ to continue discussions with UNDP on funding IDEP—the only pan-African training body for planning experts—particularly in relation to making it ultimately an income-generating institution. It requested all African Governments to pay their arrears as well as annual contributions, and the IDEP Director to intensify his external fundraising efforts. African member States were invited to send more trainees to IDEP and to increase the provision, under their indicative planning figures or from other sources, for fellowships at the Institute.

Also on 19 April,⁽²¹⁾ the Conference of Ministers called on bilateral and multilateral donors, particularly UNDP, to provide financial assistance, including for the training of specialists, to individual African countries and to ECA for short-term economic forecasting systems, intended as early warning mechanisms to enable countries to respond to external and internal disturbances. ECA was requested to collaborate with national planning organs, African multilateral institutions and research institutions to ensure effective economic management by African countries.

Least developed countries

The Conference of Ministers of African Least Developed Countries (sixth meeting, Yaounde, 15-17 April)⁽²²⁾ discussed socio-economic conditions and SNPA implementation in African LDCs, food strategies, and ECA activities in 1984-1985 and its work programme for 1986-1987. The Ministers concluded that growth rates in LDCs had continued to decline due to poor agricultural performance and that efforts made to implement SNPA had been inadequate. They recommended that resources for development not be used in debt servicing, that for technical assistance countries make better use of national experts and South-South co-operation, and that a study be made of structural adjustments made.

International trade and finance

The Conference of Ministers, on 19 April 1986,⁽²³⁾ endorsed the resolutions of the 1985 meeting of the Conference of African Ministers of Trade,⁽²⁴⁾ urged African Governments to participate in all international negotiations to ensure an effective and co-ordinated African position, and requested the ECA Executive Secretary, together with the OAU Secretary-General and its Permanent Steering Committee, to ensure effective African participation in the seventh (1987) session of UNCTAD and to assist ECA member States in promoting trade with Eastern Europe and with China through expansion of trade flows, trade missions and business tours. The Conference also urged member States to expand domestic trade and promote production, marketing and distribution of locally produced goods, especially agricultural products, as a means of attaining national self-reliance; to promote intra-African trade; and to support the Association of African Trade Promotion Organizations and other organizations as a means of achieving collective self-reliance at the subregional and regional levels. Further, it urged that the Federation of African Chambers of Commerce be made operational; appealed to all donors to encourage the promotion and expansion of African trade as an essential element of development; and appealed to UNDP to increase financial assistance to ECA so that it could assist its member States in promoting trade as a means of increasing their foreign exchange earnings.

The findings and recommendations of case-studies on domestic trade structure, mechanisms and distribution channels in the Niger, Senegal and Sierra Leone were presented at the ninth meeting of the Niamey-based MULPOC Policy Organs (Lome, Togo, February). Case-studies were initiated on domestic trade in selected Central, Eastern and southern African countries.

As regards the Preferential Trade Area (PTA) for Eastern and Southern African States, the Secretary-General reported to the General Assembly in October⁽²⁵⁾ that, despite the Assembly's 1985 request⁽²⁶⁾ detailed information on assistance provided to PTA could not be obtained from financial institutions of the United Nations system and from donor Governments due to time constraints. He noted that UNCTAD advised the PTA secretariat and member States on modalities for implementing the treaty establishing PTA, that ECA assisted PTA in drafting protocols for relaxing and eventually eliminating visa regulations within PTA and in finalizing the charter of the PTA Trade and Development Bank. In March, the Council of Plenipotentiaries of the North African MULPOC reviewed an ECA study on trade promotion in North African countries and a draft declaration of intent and commitment towards the establishment of a North African PTA.

ECA continued to assist its member States in enhancing their trade and economic prospects with non-African countries, by conducting advisory missions and studies and providing other technical assistance.

Financial and monetary policies

In 1986, ECA efforts focused on two proposed projects—an African Monetary Fund and an international conference on Africa's external indebtedness.

The Intergovernmental Group of Experts from Ministries of Finance, Central Banks and Legal Departments on the Establishment of an African Monetary Fund (third meeting, Yaounde, April; fourth meeting, Libreville, June) reviewed outstanding issues and the draft Articles of Agreement, and endorsed the outline of a study on Africa's external debt situation, to be prepared jointly for the international conference by ECA, OAU, the African Development Bank (ADB) and the African Centre for Monetary Studies (ACMS). The outstanding issues concerned: whether, and in what proportion, external participation should be allowed in the Fund's capital; whether the contributions to the capital should be in convertible and national currencies; and the number of Executive Directors to represent African countries in the Fund.

The second meeting of the Conference of African Ministers of Finance and governors of central banks (Libreville, 18-21 June)⁽²⁷⁾ in addition to considering a progress report on preparations for the proposed conference, established an ad hoc "Committee of Libreville"—comprising Gabon, Sierra Leone, Tunisia, Uganda and Zambia—to resolve the outstanding issues relating to the Fund and asked it to report to the next Conference of African Ministers of Finance in 1987. In December, ECA, OAU, ADB and ACMS held consultations at Brazzaville, Congo, to prepare further for the conference.

In other 1986 activities, an ECA mission assisted the Central African Clearing House in exploring ways to expand its services to all the member countries of the Economic Community of Central African States. The Africa Trade Centre continued to process information on trade and published six issues of Flash on Trade Opportunities and three issues of African Trade Bulletin.

Transport and communications

Transport and Communications Decade in Africa (1978-1988)

In June 1986, the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council his annual report⁽²⁸⁾ on the implementation of the objectives of the Transport and Communications Decade in Africa, proclaimed by the Assembly in 1977.⁽²⁹⁾ Africa's continuing economic crisis adversely influenced the implementation of all development projects, including those connected with the Decade, the Secretary-General reported, adding that the financing of the Decade's programme was similarly affected as world attention continued to focus on Africa's economic crisis. As at the end of 1985, of the 578 second-phase (1984-1988) projects in the transport sector, 38 (6 per cent) had been completed and 106 (18 per cent) were under implementation; of the 472 second-phase projects in the communications sector, 24 (5 per cent) had been completed and 72 (15 per cent) were under implementation. Of a total of $3,790 million raised thus far, representing 20 per cent of the programme cost of $18,255 million, $2,326 million, or 61 per cent, had been received from African Governments and 39 per cent from external sources. National projects continued to attract more funding than purely regional and subregional projects, where progress in implementation remained modest.

On 19 April,⁽³⁰⁾ the ECA Conference of Ministers endorsed the recommendations of the Conference of African Ministers of Transport, Communications and Planning (fifth meeting, Harare, 10 and 11 March),⁽³¹⁾ which had reviewed progress made in implementing the Decade's programme and had requested that ECA evaluate the Decade's performance in co-operation with ADB, the World Bank and UNDP and report the results in 1988. The Conference thanked the General Assembly, UNDP and others for their continued support of the Decade's activities, and requested the Assembly to allocate the means ECA needed to evaluate the Decade programme in accordance with the 1985 recommendations of the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU)⁽³²⁾ and to organize and service meetings of the Technical Committee on Air Transport. The Conference urged ECA member States, among other things, to inform ECA of the financing and execution of their projects, intensify efforts to obtain external financing for their Decade projects and endeavour to co-ordinate the various modes of transport within and between subregions to facilitate trade.

By the end of the year,⁽³³⁾ the number of projects monitored in 1986 stood at 560, as compared to 381 in 1985, and a total of $4,643 million was reported secured up to the end of 1986, a 22 per cent increase from the 1985 level of $3,793 million. The great majority of the railway projects implemented were regional projects—the first instance in which the rate of implementation of regional projects exceeded that of national projects. Among Decade programmes, the Regional African Satellite Communications System had secured funds for a feasibility study estimated to cost $6 million; member States continued to upgrade the Pan-African Telecommunications Network; and a combined meeting of the trans-African highway authorities (Addis Ababa, October) recommended that the Trans-African Highway Bureau at ECA be reactivated to replace the bureaux of the individual highway authorities. According priority attention to transport and communications activities, UNDP, in preparing for the fourth programming cycle (1987-1991), allocated $5 million specifically for Decade projects. In addition, the World Bank, in association with ECA, formulated a two-year transport project for sub-Saharan Africa.

CPC action. Due to lack of time, CPC at its April/May 1986 session⁽³⁴⁾ decided not to consider the 1985 JIU report on the Decade and the comments of the Secretary-General thereon.⁽³²⁾

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July, on the recommendation of its First (Economic) Committee, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1986/62 without vote.

Transport and Communications Decade in Africa
The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling resolution 291(XIII) of 26 February 1977 of the Conference of Ministers of the Economic Commission for Africa, Economic and Social Council resolution 2097(LXIII) of 29 July 1977 and General Assembly resolution 32/160 of 19 December 1977 proclaiming the Transport and Communications Decade in Africa,

Recalling also resolution 487(XIX) of 26 May 1984 of the Conference of Ministers of the Economic Commission for Africa, by which the Conference of Ministers endorsed the programme for the second phase of the Decade, and resolution 544(XX) of 29 April 1985 of the Conference of Ministers, by which the Secretary-General was requested to provide the Commission with resources to enable it to organize the fifth session of the Conference of African Ministers of Transport, Communications and Planning, as well as meetings on co-financing arrangements,

Referring to Economic and Social Council resolution 1984/68 of 27 July 1984 and General Assembly resolutions 38/150 of 19 December 1983 and 39/230 of 18 December 1984 on the Transport and Communications Decade in Africa,

Referring also to the report of the Secretary-General on the Transport and Communications Decade in Africa submitted to the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session of 1985 and to the General Assembly at its fortieth session,

Noting the annual reports for 1984 and 1985 on the implementation of the programme for the Decade, the report of the Joint Inspection Unit on the Decade and the report of the Inter-Agency Co-ordinating Committee on the Regional African Satellite Communications System,

Appreciating the efforts made by the Executive Secretary of the Economic Commission for Africa to mobilize resources and to secure international assistance for implementing the second phase of the programme,

Noting that financial resources have been allocated by the General Assembly for the activities envisaged in its resolutions 38/150 and 39/230, including studies on harmonization and co-ordination of the various modes of transport and on manpower and training needs in transport and communications,

Noting with satisfaction that certain projects related to trans-African axes included in the programme for the Transport and Communications Decade in Africa have been implemented using national resources of African countries members of the Economic Commission for Africa,

1. Endorses the report and the resolutions adopted by the Conference of African Ministers of Transport, Communications and Planning at its fifth session, held at Harare on 10 and 11 March 1986;

2. Notes with satisfaction the achievements by all African countries in the implementation of all the resolutions previously adopted by the Conference of African Ministers of Transport, Communications and Planning within the framework of the Transport and Communications Decade in Africa, which achievements shall be included among the accomplishments of the Decade;

3. Welcomes the role played by the Inter-Agency Co-ordinating Committee on the Regional African Satellite Communications System, under the Economic Commission for Africa as the lead agency, in co-ordinating activities towards the attainment of the objectives of the Decade;

4. Appreciates the continued financial support of Member States for the activities of the Transport and Communications Decade in Africa;

5. Expresses its appreciation to the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme for his continuing support of the Decade through the financing of the Decade Co-ordination Unit and other Decade activities, and requests him to continue to provide funds to the Commission during the Programme's fourth programming cycle (1987-1991) for the realization of the development process which was accepted during the Decade;

6. Expresses its thanks to donor countries and financing institutions for the financial assistance provided for the implementation of the programme for the Decade, and urges them to continue and intensify their support for the programme and for the strengthening of the Co-ordinating Committee for the Decade;

7. Requests the General Assembly to allocate, within the limits of available resources, the necessary means to enable the Commission:

(a) To carry out an in-depth evaluation of the programme for the Decade in accordance with the recommendations contained in the report of the Joint Inspection Unit on the Decade;

(b) To organize and service meetings of the Technical Committee on Air Transport;

8. Requests the Executive Secretary of the Economic Commission for Africa to draw the attention of the member States to the recommendations contained in the present resolution, taking into account the views expressed in the Economic and Social Council on the subject, and to report to the Commission as soon as possible on the matter.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/62

22 July 1986 Meeting 38 Adopted without vote

Approved by First Committee (E/1986/129/Add.1) without vote, 17 July (meeting 15); draft by ECA (E/1986/98 & Corr.2), orally amended by Vice-Chairman following informal consultations; agenda item 8.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, the General Assembly, by decision 41/453, took note of several documents, including the Secretary-General's June 1986 report⁽²⁸⁾ on the Transport and Communications Decade in Africa.

Development of tourism

On 19 April 1986,⁽³⁵⁾ the Conference of Ministers endorsed the recommendation made by the 1984 Regional Conference on Intra-African Tourism Co-operation at Niamey, Niger⁽³⁶⁾ relating to the establishment of an ECA Conference of Ministers of Tourism and guidelines for a regional co-operation strategy for tourism development in Africa. The ECA Executive Secretary was requested to follow up on the implementation of the Niamey decisions in collaboration with OAU and United Nations organizations and to submit annual progress reports.

Transport and trade of Zaire

In an October 1986 report,⁽³⁷⁾ prepared in response to a 1985 Assembly request,⁽³⁸⁾ the Secretary-General stated that an ECA mission to Zaire had discussed with national authorities arrangements for a donors' meeting on the financing of that country's transport projects. However, after having considered the possibility of holding such a meeting in 1986, the national authorities, in consultation with the World Bank, UNDP and ECA, decided to postpone it until 1987, for technical reasons.

Industrial development in Africa

In 1986, ECA, in collaboration with OAU and the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO), continued its activities in support of the Industrial Development Decade for Africa (IDDA) (1980-1990).⁽³⁹⁾ Those activities included the preparation of documentation for the North African MULPOC Follow-Up Meeting on the Initial Integrated Industrial Promotion Programme within the Framework of IDDA (Algiers, 10-15 March), and of the fifth progress report⁽⁴⁰⁾ on IDDA for presentation to the ECA Conference of Ministers in April and to the General Assembly.

ECA continued to assist member States in enhancing policy formulation and planning capabilities. Advisory missions visited MULPOCs in Cameroon, Rwanda and Zambia to discuss industrial policies and plans, promote industrial co-operation and develop indigenous capabilities and infrastructural capacities. The Commission's support to the African Regional Centre for Engineering Design and Manufacturing included organizing a study tour in Hungary (September/October) and preparing instructional materials for a seminar at Arusha, United Republic of Tanzania (November).

In specific industries sectors, ECA reviewed the status of supply and demand for iron and steel products and made proposals for an integrated development strategy for the iron and steel industries in the West African subregion. ECA worked to upgrade the engineering industry in selected East and southern African PTA countries. In the chemical industry, ECA aimed to strengthen subregional chemical industries in Guinea, Sierra Leone and Togo. Missions were undertaken to appraise chemical plants in Burkina Faso, Côte d'Ivoire, the Niger and Nigeria. Advisory services were provided to Guinea on the rehabilitation of an agro-based industry, and to Botswana, the Comoros, Kenya, Madagascar, Mauritius, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zambia on policy formulation and strengthening of small-scale industries. Profiles on successful industrial and small-scale cassava flour processing technology were prepared for meetings of the Councils of Ministers of the West, Central and Eastern and southern African MULPOCs.

On 19 April,⁽⁴¹⁾ the Conference of Ministers requested the ECA and UNIDO secretariats to increase assistance to African countries and subregional organizations with a view to promoting subregional industrial co-operation within the IDDA framework. It urged all African countries and organizations to devote increased financial and human resources to implementing the Decade's programme, expressed appreciation to UNIDO for allocating $8.6 million to the Decade in its 1986-1987 programme budget, and requested that the transformation of UNIDO into a specialized agency should not lead to a reduction of resources offered to the IDDA programme. Further, it appealed to the General Assembly to allocate $700,000 annually to ECA, and to the international community, multilateral funding agencies, particularly UNDP and the World Bank, and bilateral and investment institutions to increase the flow of investment and technical assistance resources to Africa's industrial sector. It urged all African Governments to participate in relevant international meetings to ensure that the Decade's programme continued to receive priority.

The eighth meeting of the Conference of African Ministers of Industry (Bujumbura, 17-19 September 1986)⁽⁴²⁾ reviewed the progress made towards industrialization, in particular in connection with the IDDA programme and the role of industry in the continent's economic recovery and development. The meeting of Ministers was preceded by a meeting of the Intergovernmental Committee of Experts of the Whole on Industrialization in Africa (Bujumbura, 10-15 September).

In the annual report of UNIDO for 1986,⁽⁴³⁾ it was reported that the $8.6 million originally allocated for IDDA in the 1986-1987 programme budget had been reduced to $2.7 million, due to the serious financial crisis faced by the organization. That amount covered only the commitments incurred on a limited number of technical co-operation projects initiated within the framework of the programme. The majority of projects developed with $8.6 million in anticipation—technical advisory services, the establishment of pilot demonstration plants, the training of industrial manpower, investment promotion, the adjustment of industrial strategies and policies and the promotion of intra-African industrial co-operation—were suspended.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July, on the recommendation of its First Committee, the Economic and Social Council adopted without vote resolution 1986/63.

Industrial Development Decade for Africa

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling resolution 532(XX) of 29 April 1985 of the Conference of Ministers of the Economic Commission for Africa, in which the Conference of Ministers called, inter alia, for the allocation of resources to make it possible to implement the programme for the Industrial Development Decade for Africa,

Cognizant of Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery, 1986-1990, adopted at the twenty-first ordinary session of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity, held at Addis Ababa from 18 to 20 July 1985,

Conscious of the fact that the implementation of the programme for the Decade and of the Priority Programme depends upon the availability of adequate resources and the full commitment of Governments at the national, subregional and regional levels, and of the international community,

Recalling its resolution 1985/61 of 26 July 1985, in which it called upon the General Assembly to consider the allocation in the programme budget for the biennium 1986-1987 of $700,000 to the Economic Commission for Africa, to be absorbed from the $5 million allocated to the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, under Assembly resolution 39/233 of 18 December 1984, for the implementation of the Industrial Development Decade for Africa,

Mindful of the fundamentally important linkage between industry and agriculture in Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery, 1986-1990, and of the vital contribution which the implementation of the programme for the Industrial Development Decade for Africa would make to food production and the rehabilitation of agriculture in Africa,

1. Reiterates the importance and priority which African countries accord to the industrial sector in view of its fundamental role in the implementation of Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery, 1986-1990, and the full attainment of the objectives of the Lagos Plan of Action for the Implementation of the Monrovia Strategy for the Economic Development of Africa and the Final Act of Lagos;

2. Commends the efforts made by African countries and organizations, as well as by the secretariats of the Economic Commission for Africa, the Organization of African Unity and the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, towards the implementation of the programme for the Industrial Development Decade for Africa;

3. Requests the secretariats of the Economic Commission for Africa and the United Nations Industrial Development Organization to increase their assistance to African countries and subregional organizations with a view to promoting subregional industrial co-operation within the framework of the Decade;

4. Expresses its appreciation to the United Nations Industrial Development Organization for allocating $8.6 million to the Decade in its programme budget for 1986-1987;

5. Urges the Programme and Budget Committee and the Industrial Development Board of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization to increase the allocation for the Decade in the programme budget for 1988-1989 in accordance with the high priority accorded to the programme by that organization;

6. Requests that the transformation of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization into a specialized agency should not lead to a reduction of the resources made available for assistance to African countries and organizations within the framework of the programme for the Decade;

7. Appeals to the international community, multilateral funding agencies, especially the United Nations Development Programme and the World Bank, and bilateral and investment institutions to increase the flow of investment and technical assistance resources to the industrial sector in Africa to make it possible to implement national and subregional investment and support projects.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/63

22 July 1986 Meeting 38 Adopted without vote

Approved by First Committee (E/1986/129Add.1) without vote, 17 July (meeting 15); draft by ECA (E/1986/98 & Corr.2), orally amended by Vice-Chairman following informal consultations; agenda item 8.

Natural resources and energy

During 1986, ECA provided technical and administrative assistance to the Eastern and Southern African Mineral Resources Development Centre at Dodoma, United Republic of Tanzania, and the Central African Mineral Resources Development Centre at Brazzaville. It also responded to the requests of Botswana and Mozambique in identifying employment opportunities in the mineral sector within those countries for their nationals currently employed in South Africa and facing threats of expulsion. A regional survey on aluminium and copper deposits continued, with focus in Botswana, Kenya and Mozambique. Other ECA activities included a study on the possibility of establishing phosphates industries in the Sahelian countries of West Africa, a seminar and study tour on new exploration methods (USSR, November), and a symposium on the application of remote sensing to mineral exploration (Zaire, December).

Cartography and remote sensing

In collaboration with OAU, ECA commemorated 1986 as the Year of Cartography and Remote Sensing in Africa,⁽⁴⁴⁾ with the official launching of the Year on 9 May at OAU headquarters. Missions were undertaken to Benin, Burkina Faso, Mali, Kenya and Swaziland in connection with the Year. Work continued on the merger of the African Remote Sensing Council and the African Association of Cartography. ECA provided technical support to the Regional Centre for Services in Surveying, Mapping and Remote Sensing (Nairobi) and the Regional Centre for Training in Aerial Surveys (Ile-Ife, Nigeria); among other things, it assisted them in seeking external funding through the UNDP fourth programming cycle for Africa and a five-year remote sensing project (1986-1991) funded by the United States Agency for International Development.

The sixth United Nations Regional Cartographic Conference for Africa (Addis Ababa, 10-17 November⁽⁴⁵⁾) recommended that regional centres and national mapping institutions of member States organize seminars and workshops for decision-makers, economic planners and researchers on the use of cartography and remote sensing in planning and development. The Conference recommended, among other things, that member States form one organization responsible for co-ordinating cartography and remote sensing activities for an integrated national economic development; and that the ECA Executive Secretary convene a ministerial conference on surveying, mapping and remote sensing and assist in organizing a seminar on building a geographic information data base.

Marine and water resources

ECA completed, in January 1986, a study on Africa's technical capabilities for exploration, exploitation, development and management of sea resources. Country papers on the topic were prepared for Cameroon, Cote d'Ivoire, Ethiopia, Gabon, Kenya, Liberia, Mauritius, Morocco, Nigeria, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Togo and the United Republic of Tanzania.

The Regional Meeting on Socio-Economic and Policy Aspects of Water Resources Management in Africa—organized jointly by ECA and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) (Addis Ababa, 2-6 June)⁽⁴⁶⁾—discussed the problems and constraints facing African countries in developing and managing water resources, and considered ways to channel resources into priority areas and to build up national capabilities for accelerated programmes. At UNDP's request on behalf of Ghana, ECA undertook missions in February and September to prepare for a donors' conference on rural and urban water supply programmes in that country. Advisory services were provided to Burkina Faso, Mali and the Niger on the assessment of surface and ground water availability and on developing capabilities for water resources exploitation.

Energy

A regional consultative meeting for the mobilization of financial resources for the development of new and renewable sources of energy (NRSE) in Africa (Addis Ababa, 25-27 November)⁽⁴⁷⁾ opened a way for African countries, donor countries and international institutions to begin consultations on financial and technical assistance. Participants recommended, among other things, the encouragement of NRSE projects geared to rural development, multilateral arrangements and assessment of environmental considerations in energy-related projects.

Advisory services on exploration and development of conventional energy sources and NRSE were provided during 1986 to Algeria, Burundi, Egypt, Nigeria, Rwanda and Zaire. A study of ocean energy resources of West African coastal States was presented to the Niger-based MULPOC. ECA continued to identify African researchers, engineers and technicians for training in solar energy studies in France. The Governing Council of the African Regional Centre for Solar Energy met at Bujumbura in June; the Centre's work programme and budget were prepared by ECA in August.

On 19 April,⁽⁴⁸⁾ the ECA Conference of Ministers urged African countries to promote the peaceful uses of nuclear science and technology for socio-economic development. It requested the Executive Secretary and the heads of relevant bodies and specialized agencies of the United Nations system to help create an association of African nuclear scientists; to provide technical and financial assistance to intra-African projects on the introduction of nuclear technology in various socio-economic sectors; and to involve African countries in nuclear research and development activities at an early stage, rather than merely providing them with finished nuclear technology.

Food and agriculture

In 1986, ECA continued to concentrate on agricultural development planning and policies, conservation and management of forest resources, promotion of integrated rural development, strengthening of agricultural institutions, harmonization and co-ordination of livestock policies and programmes, prevention of food losses and promotion of food security.

In February,⁽⁴⁹⁾ ECA reported that, although food production levels had normalized in most of the countries previously affected by drought, some still faced emergency situations and that, in addition to foreign aid, those countries would need technical assistance. In another February report,⁽⁵⁰⁾ ECA assessed the contributions made to rural development by agricultural co-operatives and small farmers' associations, and suggested measures for improving co-operative performance at the national and regional levels. The Commission reviewed in a March report⁽⁵¹⁾ the programmes and strategies of intergovernmental institutions for reduction of post-harvest food waste and losses in Africa, and recommended that greater emphasis be placed on crop protection, research on alternative methods of pest control, extension and training services and improvement of related facilities. In addition, ECA prepared technical publications on: agricultural development planning for government policy-makers, planners and administrators; harmonization of livestock development policies in North Africa; subregional co-operation in the production and distribution of veterinary products in West Africa; and agricultural marketing and related human resources development.

On 19 April,⁽⁵²⁾ the Conference of Ministers urged member States to fulfil the APPER recommendations on food and agriculture, in particular the commitment to increase the share of public expenditure allocated to agriculture, and called on them to apply science and technology to agriculture, develop manpower and physical and social infrastructure, build institutions, conserve and make rational use of natural resources including forest resources, maintain ecological balances and adopt appropriate policy measures to increase agriculture and food production. It called on the international community to provide, in addition to emergency aid, increased support for the rehabilitation and long-term development of food and agriculture, and requested the developed countries to create favourable conditions for African export commodities. Further, it called on ECA, in collaboration with the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), to assist countries so requesting in drawing up sound food and agricultural policies and to strengthen programmes designed to promote food security. All ECA members were urged to give priority to intra-African trade so as to encourage food production and promote greater collective food self-sufficiency in the region.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

In May 1986,⁽⁵³⁾ the Secretary-General proposed that the Economic and Social Council postpone, until 1987, consideration of a report he had been requested to submit, in response to a 1983 General Assembly resolution⁽⁵⁴⁾ and a 1985 Council decision,⁽⁵⁵⁾ on an international year for the mobilization of financial and technological resources to increase food and agricultural production in Africa. He made the proposal so that the report could take into account the outcome of the Assembly's special session on the critical economic situation in Africa (see p. 442).

On 23 May, by decision 1986/149, the Council requested the Secretary-General to submit the report to the Assembly in 1987 through the Council at its second regular session that year.

Science and technology

The ECA secretariat carried out a number of missions, including an advisory mission to Burundi, Rwanda and Zaire (12-30 August) to examine their status of scientific and technological research; to the African Regional Centre for Technology (Dakar, Senegal, 16-22 June) to advise on its activities; and to the African Network of Scientific and Technological Institutions (Nairobi, 6 and 7 October) to analyse progress made in identifying institutions which conducted engineering training. The Commission organized and serviced two subregional working group meetings on science and technology, in collaboration with OAU (Cairo, Egypt, 15-19 June; Lusaka, Zambia, 30 September-2 October); and an ad hoc expert group meeting to examine the Advance Technology Alert System for Africa (Addis Ababa, 8-10 December). Experts from nine member States attending the ECA Regional Expert Consultation on the Impact of Technology on Rural Development in Africa (4-8 August) recommended, among other things, that national technology policies have well-defined objectives consistent with a country's stage of development; that allocations for science and technology be targeted at 1 per cent of GDP; and that the irrigation potential of the region be fully exploited. ECA assisted the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund by participating in a mission to the Comoros (17 November-30 December) to propose measures for its economic recovery. The Government of India assisted ECA with work at the Rural Technology Demonstration Centre at Dakar (November). A joint ECA/UNESCO workshop on production of school science equipment (Addis Ababa, 27-30 May) was attended by experts from 14 member countries.

The Conference of Ministers, on 19 April,⁽³⁶⁾ congratulated the sponsors of a scientific meeting, held at Dakar in March 1986, on the establishment of an African chair of technology programme in food processing, biotechnologies and nutrition and health, appealed to the United Nations system and other organizations to support the programme and asked donors to contribute to its foundation. It also encouraged the African Regional Centre for Technology and the co-sponsors of the programme to continue to collaborate with OAU, ECA and other regional and international organizations in developing technologies for African food self-sufficiency.

On 15 October,⁽³⁷⁾ the Conference of Ministers thanked the Government of Cameroon for deciding to organize in the near future an international scientific conference on the problems of natural toxic and lethal gas leaks, such as the Nyos disaster that had occurred in that country. The Conference asked the ECA Executive Secretary and the UNDP Administrator to assist Cameroon in organizing the conference and urged UNDP to allocate resources for it. The Conference of Ministers appealed to a number of regional and international organizations to support the conference and urged the international community and bilateral and multilateral donors to assist countries affected or likely to be affected by similar natural disasters in setting up an early warning system. The Executive Secretary was requested to report to ECA at its next session on the results of the scientific conference.

Human resources and social development

ECA continued in 1986 to concentrate on social policy, planning and research, youth and social welfare, education, training, labour management, employment and integrated rural development as part of Africa's overall development process.

A draft African Charter for Social Action, a comprehensive guide to policy and action in the continent's social field, was prepared at an intergovernmental committee meeting organized and serviced by ECA from 27 to 31 October, in preparation for presentation at the 1987 meeting of the Conference of African Ministers of Social Affairs. ECA continued to co-operate with the African Centre for Applied Research and Training in Social Development, participating in the sixth meeting of its Governing Board (Nairobi, January) and the first meeting of its Technical Advisory Committee (Tripoli, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, November).

The Commission focused on follow-up to International Youth Year (1985)⁽³⁸⁾ and the implementation of the African Regional Plan of Action on Youth. Advisory missions to the United Republic of Tanzania and Zambia assisted in strengthening policies and programmes on youth.

The Commission participated in the launching of the African Rehabilitation Institute for Disabled Persons, as part of its support for the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons (1983-1992).

Experts discussed the objectives, structure and financing of a proposed United Nations African Institute for the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders (Vienna, 17-19 March; New York, 10-12 September).⁽³⁹⁾

Ghana, Guinea, Kenya, Nigeria and Sierra Leone received ECA advisory services in identifying and facilitating the return of African experts living outside the continent. Under the return-of-skills programme, advisory services were also provided to the Universities of Botswana, Kenya, Lesotho, Malawi and Zimbabwe on staff development, and to Botswana and the United Republic of Tanzania on employment planning and programmes. National and subregional training workshops were held in a number of countries on organizational arrangements for occupational testing, career planning and programming, guidance and counselling.

ECA continued efforts to mobilize resources for the placement of trainees in technical, vocational, scientific, socio-economic and management education both within and outside Africa. Meetings on tax administration were held in Egypt and national training workshops on public financial management and improvement in taxation policies and administration were held in Botswana, Malawi and Zambia. A national training workshop in procurement and supply management, held at Port Louis, Mauritius, resulted in a consultancy mission to that country in December.

Cultural and natural heritage. In a report transmitted by the Secretary-General to the Economic and Social Council in November 1985,⁽⁶⁰⁾ the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) discussed the United Nations contribution to conservation and management of cultural and natural heritage in Africa.

The Inspector found that United Nations efforts in that regard were extensive and that UNESCO, by virtue of its mandate, was most directly involved. He made a number of recommendations, including the need to raise additional funds, train more national personnel, strengthen institutional infrastructure, provide more equipment and co-ordinate and harmonize the United Nations system activities with those of non-governmental organizations and donor countries. In addition to suggestions concerning the management of museums, parks, and seas and oceans, the Inspector recommended that the United Nations should intensify efforts at overcoming the effects of desertification and drought.

In his March 1986 comments, the Secretary-General stated that, while the recommendations were non-controversial and fully acceptable, the report treated the problem of heritage conservation in isolation, without close reference to the development process, and that the information was vague or incomplete in some instances.

Population

The 1986-1987 population programme dealt with demographic policies and development planning, demographic analysis, and regional training and research. As in the past, emphasis was placed on the provision of advisory services, including assistance in evaluating and analysing demographic data and family planning programmes.

The fourth Joint Conference of African Planners, Statisticians and Demographers and a review meeting on World Fertility Survey data for African countries took place at Addis Ababa in March 1986. Activities under the Population Information Network for Africa (POPIN-Africa) included a training workshop (Addis Ababa) and the issuing of population newsletters. Six representatives of POPIN-Africa took a study tour to Asian population information centres and facilities (6-23 July). ECA continued to manage the Regional Institute for Population Studies (RIPS) in Ghana, the Institut de formation et de recherche démographiques (IFORD) in Cameroon, and the Sahel Institute in Mali.

On 19 April,⁽⁶¹⁾ the Conference of Ministers thanked UNFPA, member States and other donors for assisting RIPS and IFORD, recommended that African Governments progressively take over the financing of the two institutes and appealed to UNFPA for continued interim funding. The ECA Executive Secretary was invited to restructure the two institutes, based on the recommendations of the joint session of their governing councils.

Environment

Environment programme activities continued to focus on alleviating the impact of drought and desertification control, in order to mitigate the current social and economic crisis. The Commission's assistance in solving and managing environmental problems included the presentation of a study on industrialization and pollution control to the North African MULPOC in March and the organization of two workshops on human resources development in environmental matters. A workshop for trainers (Nairobi, 8-19 December), held jointly with UNEP and the Eastern and Southern African Management Institute, prepared a project document on training an Institute staff member for one year as an environmentalist.

On 19 April, the Conference of Ministers,⁽⁶²⁾ noting the results of the 1985 meetings of the Joint Intergovernmental Regional Committee on Human Settlements and Environment⁽⁶³⁾ and the African Ministerial Conference on the Environment,⁽⁶⁴⁾ recommended that the national standards bodies in each African country have overall responsibility for the development of environmental standards, that ECA and the African Regional Organization for Standardization work with international organizations to examine environmental-protection standards before application to the African environment and that a study be made to identify difficulties experienced by African countries in implementing international treaties on the environment. Further, it recommended that ECA, UNEP and other international organizations provide technical assistance to African countries to increase their participation in protecting their environment; endorsed the institutionalization of the African Ministerial Conference on the Environment to meet biennially to review the 1985 Cairo Programme for African Co-operation on the environment and eco-development,⁽⁶⁴⁾ with the Joint Intergovernmental Regional Committee on Human Settlements and Environment serving as its technical advisory board.

Also on 19 April,⁽⁶⁵⁾ the Conference of Ministers recommended continued collaboration between ECA and the Permanent Inter-State Committee on Drought Control in the Sahel (see p. 477).

Human settlements

During 1986, ECA prepared or published studies concerning integration of human settlements policies and programmes into national socio-economic development planning, evaluation of building construction needs of the African region, promotion of institutionalized public participation systems in human settlements, establishment or strengthening of personnel training facilities, and an institutional mechanism for formulating and implementing human settlements policies in Africa.

On 19 April,⁽⁶⁶⁾ the Conference of Ministers endorsed the report and recommendations adopted at the 1985 meeting of the Joint Intergovernmental Regional Committee on Human Settlements and Environment⁽⁶³⁾ and the conclusions of MULPOC meetings in 1986. It urged member States to implement the recommendations of the Regional Committee; commended UNDP, UNIDO and other donor agencies for their assistance in promoting local building materials and construction industries in Africa; and requested the ECA Executive Secretary to ensure that research into the development of local building materials and industries received adequate donor assistance.

Women in development in Africa

During 1986, ECA provided advisory services and technical assistance to national machineries to promote the integration of women in development and to ensure that women's issues were incorporated in national planning and programming exercises. Assistance focused on inclusion of women's concerns in indicative planning figure (IPF) country programming, donor round tables and National and Technical Co-operation Assessment Programmes. ECA organized workshops on women's effective participation in activities of the United Nations Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade (1981-1990) (Lilongwe, Malawi, January) and on the role of women in the use of modern appropriate technology related to foodstuffs production, processing, conservation and marketing (Yaounde, February). Subregional seminars were held on the role of women in foodstuffs marketing (Bangui, Central African Republic, October) and on the role of co-operatives in the integration of women in development (Cotonou, Benin, December). Research on women in development in Africa included a survey on the implementation of the 1979 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women⁽⁶⁷⁾ and a study on the strengthening of national machineries. Other workshops to enhance women's management and entrepreneurial skills focused on small agro-industries (Nairobi, October); training (Kenya, January-March; Arusha, June/July) and management (Arusha, July/August). National training seminars in project planning and evaluation were conducted in Burundi, Guinea-Bissau and Rwanda. Women from island and drought-affected countries were the subject of studies in Ethiopia, Madagascar and Mauritius.

The Africa Regional Co-ordinating Committee on the Integration of Women in Development (Yaounde, 3-5 April) discussed the activities of subregional committees in the integration of women in development, and a regional meeting on socio-economic and policy aspects of water resources management in Africa (Addis Ababa, 2-7 June) discussed women's role in the planning and administration of water supply and sanitary projects. The regular meeting of the Great Lake Subregional Committee on the Integration of Women in Development (Bujumbura, March) discussed the activities planned for the year. The African Training and Research Centre for Women published a comprehensive study on women refugees and displaced persons, in addition to other publications.

Due to the United Nations financial crisis and measures taken to freeze all recruitments on the regular budget, ECA was unable to increase the number of African women working under the regular budget.

On 19 April,⁽⁶⁸⁾ the Conference of Ministers appealed to African Governments to continue to include the women's component in national development plans, to encourage the implementation of specific programmes and projects for women, to mobilize funds to implement the Arusha Strategies⁽⁶⁹⁾ and the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women⁽⁷⁰⁾ and to place an official in charge of women's affairs in their diplomatic missions abroad. It also called on African Governments and the United Nations to recruit more African women to regular budget posts and promote African women to decision-making posts in ECA and at the United Nations. The Conference appealed to African Governments to ensure the allocation of funds from their IPFs to finance projects for integrating women in development. ECA was urged to recruit African women as consultants and to continue preparation of a directory of this group. Further, the Conference asked UNDP for continued support to all five MULPOCs, to the Eastern and Southern African Management Institute and to the Africa Regional Co-ordinating Committee for the Integration of Women in Development. It requested the United Nations Development Fund for Women to collaborate with MULPOCs and asked the ECA Executive Secretary to mobilize new financial resources for MULPOCs and to ensure that the Africa Regional Co-ordinating Committee for the Integration of Women in Development and the African Training and Research Centre for Women participated in the meetings of planners, statisticians and demographers in order to sensitize them on the Arusha and Nairobi Strategies.

In other action on 19 April,⁽⁷¹⁾ the Conference of Ministers called on ECA and OAU to reiterate the key role of women in African development at the special session of the General Assembly on the critical economic situation in Africa (see p. 442), and called on member States, the United Nations and others to allocate a percentage of funds made available for Africa's economic recovery to the socio-economic needs of women as producers.

Statistics

During 1986, ECA continued to assist African countries in developing and strengthening their demographic and social censuses and surveys, international trade statistics and related activities. The African Household Survey Capability Programme, the Statistical Training Programme for Africa, the National Accounts Capability Programme, the Regional Advisory Service in Demographic Statistics and the development of statistical data bases responded to the needs of national statistical services.

The fourth session of the Joint Conference of African Planners, Statisticians and Demographers (Addis Ababa, 3-12 March 1986)⁽⁷²⁾ made a number of recommendations to the ECA Conference of Ministers, including those on collaboration between ECA and the Permanent Inter-State Committee on Drought Control in the Sahel, the African Institute for Economic Development and Planning, the African demographic training institutes and PADIS.

Seminars were held on the review of the United Nations System of National Accounts (Addis Ababa, 29 September-30 October) and on statistical data base development for French-speaking African countries (Addis Ababa, 24-28 November). Workshops took place on household surveys for French-speaking African countries (Addis Ababa, 20-24 October) and on health interview surveys (Harare, 10-28 November).

The Conference of Ministers, on 19 April,⁽⁷³⁾ urged African Governments to give high priority to statistical training and to earmark an adequate number of fellowships for training at centres participating in the Statistical Training Programme for Africa. It asked the ECA Executive Secretary to ensure co-ordination of assistance to the Portuguese-speaking African countries in statistical training, and bilateral and multilateral donors to support national and regional statistical training programmes in those countries.

Programme, organizational and administrative questions

ECA work programme and sessions

Portuguese as a working language

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

An ECA proposal for inclusion of Portuguese among its official working languages, considered by the Economic and Social Council⁽⁷⁴⁾ and the General Assembly⁽⁷⁵⁾ in 1985, was taken up by the Council again in 1986, when it adopted decision 1986/106 of 7 February, thereby asking ECA to clarify, and report to the Council at its second regular session of 1986, the meaning of "official working language". No follow-up action was taken in 1986.

Work programme

On 19 April,⁽⁷⁶⁾ the Conference of Ministers decided to modify the ECA 1986-1987 work programme and priorities in the light of updated information on available resources.

In related action on the same date,⁽⁷⁷⁾ the Conference of Ministers endorsed the proposals on the second updating of and revisions to the medium-term plan (1984-1989) and urged CPC to recommend, through the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session of 1986, their adoption by the General Assembly later that year.

In another resolution,⁽⁷⁸⁾ the Conference took note of the 1984-1985 report of the ECA Executive Secretary, invited member States to contribute to the United Nations Trust Fund for African Development in view of the level of regular budget resources adversely affected by the United Nations financial crisis, and appealed to UNDP for increased financial allocations.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July, the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of its First Committee, adopted without vote resolution 1986/58.

Proposals for updating the programme of work of the Economic Commission for Africa for the biennium 1986-1987 in the light of appropriations approved by the General Assembly and the availability of extrabudgetary resources

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling resolution 554(XX) of 29 April 1985 of the Conference of Ministers of the Economic Commission for Africa on the programme of work and priorities of the Economic Commission for Africa, 1986-1987,

Having examined the proposals for updating the programme budget of the Commission for the biennium 1986-1987,

Concerned about the declining resources available to the Commission for the effective implementation of its programme of work and activities,

Convinced that the programme of activities of the Commission should reflect available resources,

1. Decides to update the programme of work and priorities of the Economic Commission for Africa for the biennium 1986-1987 in accordance with the above-mentioned proposals;

2. Expresses its gratitude to the members of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination for their support of the programme of work and priorities of the Commission for the biennium 1986-1987;

3. Requests the Executive Secretary of the Commission to revise the relevant programmes of the Commission for the biennium 1986-1987 in accordance with the updated programme of work and priorities;

4. Calls upon the Secretary-General to take the above-mentioned proposals into account when preparing the report on programme performance for the biennium 1986-1987.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/58

22 July 1986 Meeting 38 Adopted without vote

Approved by First Committee (E/1986/129) without vote, 15 July (meeting 13); draft by ECA (E/1986/98 & Corr.2); agenda item 8.

UNDP assistance

On 19 April,⁽⁷⁹⁾ the Conference of Ministers decided to meet in special session to review and approve the draft of the UNDP-assisted fourth regional programme for Africa, 1987-1991, prepared jointly by ECA and UNDP, prior to its submission to the UNDP Governing Council in 1987. The Conference approved the programme on 15 October 1986.⁽⁸⁰⁾

In other action on 19 April,⁽⁸¹⁾ the Conference of Ministers, at the request of the Economic Community of the Great Lakes Countries, urged UNDP to release funds originally allocated during the third (1982-1986) programming cycle for the implementation of seven projects before that cycle ended.

At its second special session, the Conference assessed, on 15 October,⁽⁸²⁾ the outcome of the thirteenth special session of the General Assembly and considered the implications of UNPAAERD for linkages between country programmes and the regional programme during the UNDP fourth programming cycle.

Also on 15 October,⁽⁸³⁾ the Conference of Ministers requested UNDP to give technical and financial assistance to African regional and subregional organizations of economic integration and to give priority to their projects and programmes in accordance with UNPAAERD and APPER.

In another resolution,⁽⁸⁴⁾ the Conference appealed to UNDP, in allocating its resources, to take into account the special needs of Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference (SADCC) member States struggling against South Africa's "destabilization" activities. It asked UNDP to assist SADCC members in developing alternative transport routes and trading outlets to those currently passing through South Africa, and in developing the required human resources and technical skills to cope with the problem.

ECA-sponsored institutions

The sixth conference of chief executives of ECA-sponsored institutions (24-27 January)⁽⁸⁵⁾ discussed the rationalization, co-ordination and merger of their activities and the securing of financial support.

In a March 1986 report,⁽⁸⁶⁾ the Commission detailed the work programmes and budgets of ECA-sponsored regional and subregional institutions for 1986-1987, adding that the modest plans resulted from lack of financial support for, or lack of membership in, those bodies.

The Conference of Ministers, on 19 April,⁽⁸⁷⁾ appealed to member States of those institutions to reaffirm their interest, and to pay arrears as soon as possible. African States and institutions, together with the United Nations and other funding institutions, were urged to use technical services and expertise provided by ECA-sponsored bodies.

Asia and the Pacific

The Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific held its forty-second session at Bangkok, Thailand, from 22 April to 2 May 1986. The session concluded with the adoption of 13 resolutions, among them a Plan of Action on National and Regional Initiatives for Human Resources Development: Its Technological Dimensions. In its annual reports for the periods 30 March 1985-2 May 1986⁽¹⁾ and 3 May 1986-30 April 1987,⁽²⁾ ESCAP reviewed the development of the region and appraised the implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade (the 1980s)⁽³⁾ and of the Substantial New Programme of Action for the 1980s for the Least Developed Countries.⁽⁴⁾ Consideration was also given to the programmes of the Transport and Communications Decade for Asia and the Pacific (1985-1994).⁽⁵⁾

The Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, the Federated States of Micronesia, the Republic of the Marshall Islands and the Republic of Palau, four components of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands (previously admitted as one associate member), were admitted as individual associate members of ESCAP, thus bringing Commission membership to 38 member States and 9 associate members in 1986.

Other action included revision of the ESCAP work programme and priorities for 1986-1987; preparation for its fortieth anniversary in 1987; and a review of its special regional projects and institutions.

Ministerial meetings took place, at Bangkok, on trade (16-18 June) and on industry and technology (22-24 September). ESCAP committees discussed food and agriculture; transnational corporations; industry, technology and human settlements; environment; international trade; natural resources and energy; population; shipping, ports and inland waterways; transport, communications and tourism; social development; and statistics.

Economic and social trends

The annual Economic and Social Survey of Asia and the Pacific 1986(6) contained two parts: a survey of economic developments in the region in the light of global economic events, and a study on human resources development.

In 1986, depreciation of the United States dollar, crumbling oil prices and declining interest rates necessitated economic diversification in the region and a flexible response to rapid shifts in the global economy. Most ESCAP countries continued to face an unfavourable economic environment, difficult adjustments and scarce resources.

The economies of India and Pakistan, two of the major developing countries in the South Asia sub-region, continued to grow in 1985-1986. Sri Lanka experienced a 4 per cent real GDP growth, its lowest rate since 1977. The trade-oriented countries of East and South-East Asia showed a mixed performance in 1986, falling into one of three categories: oil exporters, which suffered a growth set-back; newly industrializing countries, which experienced marked acceleration in growth due to exchange rate adjustment and oil price declines; and others, which improved their economic performance through restructuring. LDCs in the region grew at rates well below the 7.2 per cent yearly target envisaged by SNPA (see below). Official development assistance to the LDCs and Pacific island countries of the ESCAP region (Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Maldives, Nepal, Samoa, Vanuatu) continued to be inadequate. Pacific island economies remained unstable due to frequent changes in the external environment, resulting in disruptions in development planning and management and frequent discontinuity in fiscal and financial policies. Australia, Japan and New Zealand experienced an aggregate real GNP growth rate of only 1.6 per cent in 1986, a considerable decline from the rate of 6 per cent in 1984.

The Survey's special section on human resources noted that there was a strong need for policy-oriented research in the underlying relationships between human resources development and social and economic development, that human resources development was of paramount importance in the developing countries of the ESCAP region, where some 2.6 billion people, representing 54 per cent of the world population, resided. The Survey focused on population, health and nutrition, and education, and examined the potentialities, problems and policies in each sector, highlighting their interrelationships and suggesting possibilities for regional co-operation. (See also p. 552.)

The Economic and Social Council, by decision 1986/182 of 23 July, took note of, among other documents, a summary⁽⁷⁾ of the Economic and Social Survey of Asia and the Pacific 1985.⁽⁸⁾

Activities in 1986

Development policy and regional economic co-operation

In a review of the implementation of the International Development Strategy,⁽⁹⁾ ESCAP said progress in that regard had been painfully slow in the developing countries of the region, and solutions to the problems of trade policies, money and finance, and debt had been particularly intractable. It noted that, despite some progress, eliminating hunger and malnutrition by the end of the century looked difficult unless growth rates in all countries rose continuously. Public and private external resources were needed, as was a healthier environment in international economic relations.

On 2 May,⁽⁹⁾ the Commission, noting with concern the decline in the flows of financial resources into developing countries of the region, asked the International Development Association to reach agreement on the eighth replenishment (see p. 1152).

The Committee on Development Planning (sixth session, Bangkok, 4-10 November)⁽¹⁰⁾ discussed development issues such as problems faced by LDCs, special measures in favour of island developing countries, macro-economic modelling and projections, training courses in development planning techniques, and interregional, regional and subregional co-operation.

Development planning activities in 1986 included: workshops on mobilization of domestic savings (Maldives, February; Bhutan, October) and external debt management (Bangkok, May); training courses on economic and mathematical methods in development planning (Moscow and Kishinev, May/June), project preparation and planning (Bhutan, September; Maldives, September/October); and agro-industrial complexes (Moscow, September/October); a seminar on development experience (China, May/June); meetings on the feasibility of establishing an institute of public finance (Bangkok, March/April and August); and a World Project LINK meeting (Bangkok, September). ESCAP also provided advisory services and produced a number of technical publications and studies, including some aimed at assistance to the Pacific island countries.

In 1986, the Asian and Pacific Development Centre completed 31 projects in its second-phase work programme (1985-1986), including research, study and consultation on regional issues; exchange and transfer of experience on development practice; and training courses and seminars. International issues such as technology transfer, trade and economic co-operation were added to national issues of concern to the Centre—rural poverty, human resources development, women in development and energy planning and management. The Centre's General Council held its fourth session at Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, from 8 to 10 September.

Implementation of SNPA for LDCs

In 1986, the ESCAP Development Planning Division reviewed economic and social development in the region's eight LDCs in the context of SNPA, for inclusion in the Economic and Social Survey of Asia and the Pacific 1986, and stated that, more than five years after the adoption of SNPA, many of its targets for the region's LDCs, with a total population of 120 million and an average per capita income of about $150, remained unfulfilled. In addition to fluctuations in the weather which affected agricultural output, those LDCs suffered from a fall in global commodity prices, reduced exports and tourism, and a stagnation in external funding.

The Division's LDCs Section monitored and reviewed the progress in SNPA implementation, studied problems of concern to LDCs in the region and provided technical assistance.

On 2 May,⁽¹¹⁾ the Commission called on the international community to provide increased transfer of resources and commercial policy support measures to LDCs in the region; at the same time, it urged LDCs to continue to mobilize domestic resources to implement SNPA.

Mekong River basin development

The Interim Committee for Co-ordination of Investigations of the Lower Mekong Basin held its twenty-second session at Bangkok from 13 to 17 January and its twenty-third session at Chiang Mai, Thailand, from 30 June to 5 July. At a special session, held at Bangkok on 6 October, the Committee considered assistance to its development action programme for 1987-1989.

The Committee's 1986 work programme comprised 111 projects under six programme sectors—hydrology and meteorology, basin planning, land and water resources development, navigation improvement, agriculture and fisheries, and power, industry and minerals—requiring an initial investment of some $307 million. According to the Committee's annual report for 1986,⁽¹²⁾ by the end of that year, the Committee had an extensive network of 431 hydrologic and 339 meteorological stations to collect field data.

Technical co-operation activities

In 1986, ESCAP responded to requests for technical and advisory services from 15 countries in the region through 44 missions carried out under the United Nations regular programme of technical co-operation⁽¹³⁾

As the region prepared for the fourth UNDP programming cycle (1987-1991) through programme assessments and consultative reviews, a meeting of the aid co-ordinators of the island developing countries of the South Pacific (Suva, Fiji, February) finalized a list of 29 projects for the subregion for inclusion in the fourth-cycle inter-country programme, and the third meeting of aid co-ordinators (Bangkok, 8-11 October) reviewed and endorsed a draft inter-country programme for Asia and the Pacific and discussed improvements in the delivery of UNDP assistance.

During 1986, the UNDP global and interregional programme supported research and training activities at the International Rice Research Institute (Los Baños, Philippines) and the International Centre for Research in the Semi-Arid Tropics (Hyderabad, India), as well as major projects in water and sanitation, energy, maritime transportation and other sectors.

In a June note⁽¹⁴⁾ by the Secretary-General to the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly for their 1986 policy review of operational activities (see p. 411), ESCAP reported that it had hired experts and other project personnel for technical co-operation activities from developing countries and utilized local or regional sources for procurement of material equipment and services. Moreover, an ECDC/TCDC service aimed at increasing the catalytic role and support for the process of TCDC was established under the Office of the ESCAP Executive Secretary. In addition, ECDC/TCDC focal points were established in all substantive divisions and units, and the concept was incorporated into project documents at an early stage. The Commission's technical co-operation activities sought to promote the participation of women in development, including the provision of training fellowships.

International trade

A meeting of Ministers of Trade from the ESCAP region (Bangkok, 16-18 June)⁽¹⁵⁾ reviewed current trends in international and regional trade and prospects for trade expansion and economic development. The Ministers adopted a declaration on 18 June on steps to be taken regarding trade and monetary co-operation, commodities, trade promotion, trade in manufactures, joint ventures and investment opportunities, human resources, the generalized system of preferences, services, LDCs and a trade co-operation group.

In a 2 May resolution⁽¹⁶⁾ on the 1985 Asia-Pacific International Trade Fair⁽¹⁷⁾ the Commission requested the Executive Secretary to help organize a regional trade fair at appropriate intervals, preferably every three to five years, to promote economic co-operation and trade expansion among countries of the region.

In another action on 2 May⁽¹⁸⁾ the Commission requested the Executive Secretary to submit a paper on the possible causes of the debt crisis in terms of external trade, industrialization, rise in world interest rates, economic and debt management policies of debtor countries and financial policies of creditor countries. The Commission appealed to multilateral financial institutions to continue to assist in alleviating the crisis by supporting adjustment measures in debtor countries consistent with long-term growth perspectives.

During 1986, ESCAP-sponsored trade-related meetings at Bangkok included: a training course on trade information services (May); workshops on the establishment of a computerized system of data collection and analysis for the study of costs of production and farm-gate prices of jute/kenaf fibres (July), on a computerized trade information system and data base management (September)—for trade promotion organizations (November) and for chambers of commerce (December)—and on application of analytical tools for production planning and marketing strategies for jute and jute products (November). The second round of negotiations under the Bangkok Agreement (Seoul, Republic of Korea, October) adopted a plan of action to promote trade co-operation. ESCAP participated in a review mission on an UNCTAD project concerning assistance to the least developed land-locked countries of the Asian region (July/August).

Transport and communications

The Commission noted the need for an integrated approach to the planning of transport and communications, in view of that sector's interdependence with social, cultural and economic development. A note by the ESCAP secretariat⁽¹⁹⁾ on the urban transport crisis and approaches to its resolution advocated a balanced and evolutionary multimodal transport system aimed at integrating land-use and transportation planning. In another note⁽²⁰⁾ on the planning and development of the local transport system in rural areas, where an estimated 80 per cent of the region's population lived, the secretariat suggested the setting of guidelines on local transport and quality control in building roads; studies on the selection of new roads and low-cost techniques for road construction and maintenance; and preparation of teaching aids for training local officials.

Seminars, workshops and study tours were conducted on Asia-Pacific railway co-operation (China, May), rail transit systems (Federal Republic of Germany, May/June), guideway transport (France, June), use of energy in transport (Federal Republic of Germany, June), urban and suburban railway transport (USSR, August/September), railway track maintenance (China, September), environmental impact assessment of road transport development (Bangkok, November), road traffic accident prevention (Japan, October), road maintenance management (Bangkok, November) and tourism development in Pacific island countries (Fiji, December).

Transport and Communications Decade for Asia and the Pacific

At its 1986 session, the Commission suggested that the strategy for the Transport and Communications Decade for Asia and the Pacific (1985-1994)⁽⁶⁾ should focus on human resources development; transfer of technology; promotion of intra- and interregional co-operation; optimum utilization of infrastructure, including maintenance; and transport and communications improvement in rural and isolated communities.

In a May report to the Economic and Social Council⁽²¹⁾ the Secretary-General discussed the objectives and strategy, action programmes, organizational framework and major activities undertaken by the secretariat in support of the Decade, with ESCAP acting as the lead agency. He reported that, of the 47 project profiles developed, 35 were in nine high-priority areas and 12 others in seven regular-priority areas, and that the total estimated cost stood at $14.9 million.

By decision 1986/176 of 22 July, the Council took note of the Secretary-General's report on the Decade.

In support of the Decade, ESCAP convened in 1986, in co-operation with the USSR, a seminar on rail transport (USSR, August/September); a seminar/study tour on port pricing and investment in co-operation with Australia (April); an expert group meeting on port tariff structures (Philippines, December); and a seminar on port computer needs and organization of facilities (Hong Kong, February/March). Held in co-operation with the Federal Republic of Germany were a seminar/study tour on the feasibility of urban light rail transit systems in developing ESCAP countries (Federal Republic of Germany, May/June); a seminar on environmental impact assessment of road transport development (Bangkok, November); and a study and advisory services in the telecommunications sector (October).

In June 1986⁽²²⁾ the UNDP Administrator requested the UNDP Governing Council for authorization to earmark and allocate, for the Decade's priority projects, $6 million from the contingency amount of fourth-cycle Special Programme Resources. The Governing Council, on 27 June⁽²³⁾ issued the authorization.

Shipping, ports and inland waterways

The Committee on Shipping, and Transport and Communications (Shipping, Ports and Inland Waterways Wing) (tenth session, Bangkok, 8-12 December⁽²⁴⁾ reviewed the level and structure of liner freight charges, merchant marines and shipping services, port development, inland water transport, inland waterways and dredging, shippers' organizations and co-operation, the impact of new maritime technology and containerization in the region, regional maritime strategy and new directions in the port management information system.

In March⁽²⁵⁾ the ESCAP secretariat outlined a number of problems facing the maritime sector, among them, loss of revenue and over-tonnage in capacity in the shipping industry due to the world economic recession, the need for new strategies for the development of ports and national shipping lines in the developing countries of the region, outdated maritime legislation and a lack of adequate shipping statistics.

Industrial development

In 1986, Ministers of Industry and Technology (Bangkok, 22-24 September)⁽²⁶⁾ examined new policy initiatives for industrial and technological progress in the region and measures to promote regional co-operation; it also prepared for the 1987 General Conference of UNIDO. A meeting of senior officials (17-19 September), prior to the Ministers' meeting, cited slow recovery, falling commodity prices, growing protectionism and the trade-distorting effects of subsidized agricultural exports as posing serious threats to the region's further industrialization. The officials recommended measures to counteract negative economic factors, including placing greater emphasis on public enterprises in the industrial sectors of the developing countries, an evaluation of privatization programmes and the development of a regional perspective.

Among the 1986 activities related to industrial development were meetings on energy conservation in small- and medium-scale industries (Bangkok, February; Nepal and Thailand, July), promotion of business collaboration in that sector (Thailand and Federal Republic of Germany, April), technology and management needs for industrial development (Bangkok, July/August) and the production and use of machine tools in the engineering industries in ESCAP developing countries (Singapore, November).

Transnational corporations

In 1986, ESCAP and the United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations conducted a training seminar on support to institutions of higher learning in Asia and the Pacific (Bangkok, January); a seminar, with the National Economic and Social Development Board of Thailand and UNDP, on the role of transnational corporations in Thailand (Pattaya, August); and a Thai/International Development Research Centre/Intergovernmental Bureau for Informatics/ASEAN regional seminar on transborder data flow impacts (Bangkok, November).

Natural resources and energy

The Committee on Natural Resources (thirteenth session, Bangkok, 14-20 October)⁽²⁷⁾ discussed water, energy, mineral and marine resources, cartography and remote sensing. The draft programme of work and priorities for 1988-1989 and changes in the 1986-1987 work programme were also considered.

Water resources. The Committee cited significant progress in the implementation of the 1977 Mar del Plata Action Plan for the development of water resources⁽²⁸⁾ and noted regional efforts to achieve the goals of the International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade (1981-1990) and to promote TCDC in water-related activities. The Committee endorsed a number of secretariat recommendations, including establishment of a central mechanism for co-ordinating the competing uses of water, formulation of a national master water plan and adequate water legislation, and revision of pricing structures. The Committee also underlined the importance of integrating environmental considerations into water resources development projects.

The Inter-agency Task Force on Water for Asia and the Pacific met at Bangkok in July and November to promote regional co-operation in water investigation, development and management. ESCAP sponsored a meeting on the establishment of a regional network for training in water resources development (Bangkok, May) and a workshop on the application of remote sensing techniques to water resources development (Seoul, October/November). A regional network for training in water resources development—comprising 14 participating institutes nominated by ESCAP member Governments—was established in 1986.

Mineral resources. In 1986, the Mineral Resources Section initiated a study of geology for land-use planning in urban areas, with particular emphasis on knowledge of natural hazards in advance of development. During the year, the Regional Mineral Resources Development Centre conducted two assessment surveys, four technical advisory service missions and four group training activities. The Centre received, in 1986, cash contributions of $37,985, far below the goal of $150,000. Since the target was not met within the six-month time limit prescribed by the Commission at its 1986 session, the Executive Secretary proceeded, as authorized, to close the Centre.

The Committee for Co-ordination of Joint Prospecting for Mineral Resources in Asian Offshore Areas (twenty-third session, Madang, Papua New Guinea, November) discussed hydrocarbon resources, an offshore and coastal geophysical survey and the Quaternary geology programme. The Committee for Co-ordination of Joint Prospecting for Mineral Resources in South Pacific Offshore Areas held its fifteenth session at Rarotonga, Cook Islands, in September. ESCAP support continued for the South-East Asia Tin Research and Development Centre.

In 1986, seminars were held on the application of remote sensing techniques for geological mapping and mineral prospecting (Moscow, June) and geological mapping in the urban environment (Bangkok, October). A training course was held on the economic aspects of coal exploration, evaluation and exploitation (Bandung, Indonesia, January).

Energy resources. In 1986, the activities scheduled for the second phase (1984-1986) of the UNDP-funded regional energy development programme⁽²⁹⁾ with ESCAP as the main executing agency, were completed in: energy planning, conservation and pricing; natural gas utilization and transport; coal utilization and development; and rural energy and hydropower planning. The subregional Pacific energy development programme concentrated on overall national energy planning assistance; planning and legislation in the electricity sector; petroleum policy, supply and pricing; and energy auditing and management, mainly through information exchange and training. The Regional Network on Biomass, Solar and Wind Energy, supported by Australia and Japan, continued to provide advisory and information services through a network of focal points and publications of ESCAP Energy News.

During the year, training courses on coal utilization (Republic of Korea, April/May; India, December) and techniques of energy planning (Nepal, June; Bangladesh, November) were held. Held at Bangkok were an expert group meeting on the evaluation, design and implementation of solar photovoltaic systems in developing countries (June), an expert group meeting (September) and a high-level meeting (November) on trans-country power exchange and development, and a workshop on natural gas utilization (September/October). Also held at Bangkok were the second meeting of focal points on NRSE and a consultative meeting on the NRSE development programme (September) and an Asian forum on energy policy (October).

Cartography and remote sensing. The regional remote sensing programme, funded by UNDP and executed by ESCAP in association with FAO and the United Nations Department of Technical Co-operation for Development (DTCD), was completed on 31 December 1986. An evaluation mission fielded in June by UNDP recommended the extension of the project for a second-phase period of five years (1987-1991).

Other 1986 activities included a meeting of the directors of the remote sensing centres/programmes in the ESCAP region (Colombo, Sri Lanka, May) and a regional seminar on the application of remote sensing techniques to coastal zone management and environmental monitoring (Dhaka, Bangladesh, November).

Food and agriculture

During 1986, the ESCAP/FAO/UNIDO Fertilizer Advisory, Development and Information Network for Asia and the Pacific held a round-table meeting on fertilizer marketing in Asia (Singapore, February), a training course for fertilizer retailers in Thailand (Bangkok, April; Pattaya, October/November), a regional training workshop on fertilizer information transfer (Bangkok, November), and a training course on negotiation techniques for fertilizer importers (Bangkok, November). It also dispatched a team of three experts from the Asian region to Panama in July to examine a Latin American multinational fertilizer marketing enterprise with a view to establishing a similar system in Asia.

Other activities included a seminar on the responsibility system in agricultural production in China (Huang District, August/September); an expert consultation on the economics of dry-land and rain-fed farming (Bangladesh, November); and a TCDC study tour for Burmese fertilizer-sector executives to India, Indonesia, Malaysia, Singapore and Thailand (November/December).

The Regional Network for Agricultural Machinery ended its third phase of operation (1985-1986) in which it focused on, among other things, formulating enhanced policies and strategies for agricultural mechanization and the strengthening of national networks; mechanization studies, including socio-economic impact; and assistance to member countries for local mechanization plans.

The Network's Governing Body (ninth session, Bali, Indonesia, 18-21 November) approved the draft project document for its 1987-1991 programme.

During 1986, the Regional Co-ordination Centre for Research and Development of Coarse Grains, Pulses, Roots and Tuber Crops in the Humid Tropics of Asia and the Pacific (CGPRT Centre) provided technical assistance to member countries in initiating studies of socio-economic constraints to, and prospects for, developing CGPRT crops. The Centre's Governing Board (fourth session, Bogor, Indonesia, February; fifth session, Bangkok, December) reviewed the Centre's operations and work programme. In 1986, seven countries pledged a total of $316,492 for institutional support, but only four countries made contributions totalling $309,492 by year's end, far short of the $400,000 target set by the Commission.

Science and technology

The Commission considered the implementation of the 1984 Tokyo Programme on Technology for Development in Asia and the Pacific⁽³⁰⁾ and expressed satisfaction with the initiation of co-operative projects in research, development and demonstration; identification of technological needs; practical ways of sharing information; regional co-operative activities to create a favourable technological climate; and technological development of the least developed, land-locked and island developing countries.

In a February report on the implications of new technological advances for developing countries,⁽³¹⁾ ESCAP suggested a number of initiatives it could take to assist those countries in the region in preparing micro-electronic-related schemes and projects and in developing biotechnology to promote national development.

The first session of the Governing Board of the Asian and Pacific Centre for Transfer of Technology was held at New Delhi, India, on 28 and 29 November. During the year, the Centre conducted missions on technology utilization, disseminated information packages and serviced technical queries, held training workshops and completed preparatory work for the country profiles data collection. In 1986, eight countries contributed some $160,000 for institutional support to the Centre, far short of the financial target of $250,000 set by the Commission.

A seminar/study tour on science and technology policy, planning and management (Beijing, July/August) examined technology for development; a framework for science and technology policies, plans and management; human resources development for technology; and regional co-operation.

Social and cultural development

The Commission gave importance to the consideration of social problems arising from industrial and technological development, and urged that new approaches be devised to deal with the social dimensions of development.

ESCAP activities during 1986 included the eighth regional seminar on basic community services through primary health care (Thailand, January/February); for youth, the eleventh Asian-Pacific forum for community development (Palau, Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, March), a training workshop on income-generating activities (Thailand, March), an international course on management of youth organizations (Malaysia, August) and the third meeting of agencies and NGOs concerned with youth development in the ESCAP region (Bangkok, December); and for the disabled, a regional fellowship programme for national personnel responsible for planning and organizing disability prevention and rehabilitation services (Philippines, June) and the third regional inter-agency consultation on disability-related concerns (Bangkok, June). Several advisory missions and training workshops were also held.

Human resources development

On 2 May 1986, the Commission adopted the ESCAP Plan of Action on National and Regional Initiatives for Human Resources Development: Its Technological Dimensions⁽³²⁾—which had been recommended by an intergovernmental meeting on human resources development and technology (Bangkok, 29-31 January).⁽³³⁾ The Plan of Action contained recommendations for action at the national and regional levels and outlined the role of ESCAP; action at the national level dealt, among other things, with identifying needs and priority areas, strengthening planning and research mechanisms, promoting innovative policies, and creating a favourable environment for nurturing technological human resources. The Commission invited member countries, on the basis of the Plan of Action, to undertake specific programmes in human resources development at the national and subregional levels as an integral part of their respective social and economic development programmes, and to provide financial and other assistance for implementing regional co-operative projects.

On 1 May,⁽³⁴⁾ the Commission invited all members to co-operate on the forecasting, planning and development of technological human resources, and asked the Executive Secretary to assist them in their activities and to mobilize extrabudgetary resources for a 1987 regional seminar, country studies and a study mission.

Women in development

On 2 May,⁽³⁵⁾ the Commission called on its member Governments to implement the Regional Plan of Action and the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women adopted by the 1985 World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women,⁽³⁶⁾ with a view to ensuring full integration of women in political, economic, social and cultural life. Governments were invited to include in their national development plans specific target programmes on the advancement of women. The Commission requested its Executive Secretary to encourage the sharing of national experiences, to prepare a study on the status of women and their role in socio-economic development in the region as a follow-up to the Nairobi Strategies, and to incorporate the interests of women in the Commission's work programme.

In 1986, ESCAP held a subregional course on women and the management of development, in co-operation with the Asian and Pacific Development Centre and ASEAN (Kuala Lumpur, July); a meeting on participatory action research to promote organization among women piece-rate workers (Thailand, October); and a regional seminar on the development of a women's information network for Asia and the Pacific (Japan, December).

In an October report to the General Assembly,⁽³⁷⁾ the Secretary-General stated that ESCAP had established various internal mechanisms, including an inter-divisional Task Force on the Integration of Women into ESCAP Priority Concerns, to ensure that the policy on integrating the concerns of women in its development work for 1984-1989 was consistently applied.

Rural development

The Commission, on 2 May,⁽³⁸⁾ called on Governments to examine the social impact of rural development policies and requested the Executive Secretary to pay particular attention in future studies to public and/or private efforts in areas such as agrarian reforms, co-operatives, rural development planning, the role of women in development, strengthening the role of national personnel in rural development and encouraging popular participation in rural development. It also asked the Executive Secretary to organize a regional seminar on the social aspects of rural development and to consider strengthening the secretariat's co-ordination and monitoring mechanism on the question.

By April 1986,⁽³⁹⁾ nine Governments had responded to the ESCAP request for papers on their national policies, programmes and experience in solving problems related to the social aspects of development.

In addition to a meeting of national liaison officers on integrated rural development (Bangkok, June), activities in 1986 included training courses for youth in rural development (Nepal, January/February) and on the participation of young women and men in rural social development (China, July).

Population

During 1986, the ESCAP Committee on Population organized meetings at Bangkok on: comparative study of demographic-economic interrelationships (March); analysis of trends and patterns of mortality (May); strategies for strengthening linkages between the WHO Health Literature and Library Information Services and Asia-Pacific population information networks (June/July); knowledge and attitudes of grass-roots family planning workers about contraceptive methods (July); aging (September); and training in the use of microcomputers for demographic analysis, survey data processing and family planning evaluation (November). Other meetings dealt with the role of community communications networks in the acceptance and continuance of family planning practice (Thailand, September); mortality and health issues (China, October); and population information networking (China, October).

ESCAP also awarded fellowships for demographic training at the International Institute of Population Studies (Bombay, India) and conducted training programmes, research and information activities.

Environment

The Commission urged its members to implement the 1985 Declaration and Framework for Action Plans for the Management of the Asian Environment⁽⁴⁰⁾ and suggested that the ESCAP secretariat assist them in that regard.

During 1986, the Committee on Industry, Technology, Human Settlements and the Environment held a meeting on the environmental and socio-economic aspects of tropical deforestation (Bangkok, January/February); a conference of the forum for environmental journalists of Bangladesh (Dhaka, February); a seminar on environmental awareness and communication (Kuala Lumpur, April); a seminar and study tour on integrated control of desertification (China, June); a roving seminar on environment and media (China, June); an intergovernmental meeting on a regional network of research and training centres on desertification control (Bangkok, September); and a high-level consultative meeting on problems and prospects of environmental management in Asia and the Pacific (Bangkok, November).

Typhoons

The Typhoon Committee, at an extraordinary session held on 21 March at Manila, Philippines, examined and endorsed a regional co-operation programme on meteorology and discussed the hydrological and disaster prevention and preparedness sectors of its work.

At its nineteenth session (Bangkok, 28 October-3 November),⁽⁴¹⁾ the Committee reviewed the implementation and funding of its 1986 programme and confirmed that it operated in conjunction with the World Meteorological Organization.

Human settlements

On 2 May,⁽⁴²⁾ the Commission reaffirmed the need for special attention, during the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless (1987), to securing renewed international commitment to improving the shelter and neighbourhoods of the poor and to providing shelter for the homeless. The Commission welcomed the organization of subregional meetings to promote the objectives of the Year and noted with appreciation the efforts made by countries in the region towards reconstructing residential areas and cities and rehabilitating and resettling war-stricken people.

In 1986, the Committee on Industry, Technology, Human Settlements and the Environment held meetings/seminars on grass-roots participation in human settlements (Bangkok, February), low-cost shelter projects in Sri Lanka (September/October), and managing civic services in intermediate-sized cities (Bangkok, October).

A regional working group met to discuss the 1990 World Population and Housing Census Programme (Bangkok, November) and recommended that greater attention be paid to providing information of use in solving problems of substandard shelter and the homeless. It also emphasized the importance of providing housing data for small geographic areas and cross-tabulating data on structures which included the socio-economic characteristics of occupants.

Statistics

On 1 May,⁽⁴³⁾ the Commission recommended that its members improve and strengthen their statistical services as a source of information in effective planning and implementation of development plans, utilize guidelines and standards and participate in capability-building programmes. It requested the United Nations system to support and co-ordinate technical co-operation, assist in evolving and revising international standards and guidelines, and accord priority to the special training needs of the least developed, land-locked and island developing countries.

The Committee on Statistics conducted training courses at New Delhi on sampling and household survey methodology (February-May) and on electronic data processing (August-November); a seminar on review and development of national accounts (Bangkok, July); and working group meetings, both at Bangkok in November, on the 1990 World Population and Housing Census Programme and of statistical experts.

The Statistical Institute for Asia and the Pacific continued to train statisticians in government services. The Institute's Advisory Council (first meeting, Tokyo, 12-14 November) made recommendations concerning the Institute's statistics, computer-based and in-country courses.

International Year of Peace

In a resolution adopted on 2 May,⁽⁴⁴⁾ the Commission urged all members and associate members to intensify their efforts for achieving the objectives of the International Year of Peace (1986), asserting that peace was a prerequisite for economic and social development.

ESCAP, in co-operation with the Korean National Commission for UNESCO and the Korean National Council for Youth Affairs, organized a regional workshop on the role of youth in the promotion of peace (Seoul, October).

In a 24 April letter to the ESCAP Executive Secretary,⁽⁴⁵⁾ the USSR conveyed a joint statement by Afghanistan, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia, the USSR and Viet Nam on the contribution of ESCAP to the attainment of the Year's goals and objectives through promotion of improved international economic relations.

Programme, organizational and administrative questions

Amendment of terms of reference

The Commission, noting that the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, the Federated States of Micronesia, the Republic of the Marshall Islands and the Republic of Palau had become individual associate members of ESCAP, unanimously approved a draft resolution for action by the Economic and Social Council to amend the Commission's terms of reference listing its membership.

In an April note,⁽⁴⁶⁾ ESCAP reported that the Cook Islands, an associate member since 1972, had reiterated its desire for full membership. The ESCAP Office of Legal Affairs, on 25 March, determined that the Cook Islands was a self-governing territory in free association with New Zealand and would be considered for associate membership only. At the 1986 Commission session, the Cook Islands stated that it would not pursue the matter further at that session.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July, the Economic and Social Council, by resolution 1986/57, noted that the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, the Federated States of Micronesia, the Republic of the Marshall Islands and the Republic of Palau had become associate members of ESCAP in place of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands. The Council decided to amend the ESCAP terms of reference accordingly.

Programme co-ordination and evaluation

In a February 1986 report,⁽⁴⁷⁾ the ESCAP Executive Secretary proposed that the Advisory Committee of Permanent Representatives and Other Representatives Designated by Members of the Commission (ACPR) function in part as a programme co-ordination committee and that it hold a special meeting prior to Commission sessions.

The ESCAP secretariat, in a March note,⁽⁴⁸⁾ proposed the addition to the medium-term plan for 1984-1989 of a new subprogramme, on special measures in favour of island developing countries (see below), and revision of the existing subprogrammes on social development in the region and on health and development.

On 2 May,⁽⁴⁹⁾ the Commission requested the Executive Secretary, in consultation with ACPR, to recommend measures to bridge the gap between programming and performance, for rationalization and improved efficiency.

During a series of meetings in 1986, ACPR discussed ways of improving the conduct and organization of future Commission sessions.

CPC review. At its April/May 1986 session,⁽⁵⁰⁾ CPC reviewed ESCAP's 1984-1985 performance, took note of the Secretary-General's report⁽⁵¹⁾ on the topic and stressed the need to improve the programme implementation rate. Due to the late issuance of the report, however, CPC did not undertake a systematic review of each section.

Activities in the Pacific

During 1986, ESCAP formulated a new subprogramme on special measures for island developing countries; the General Assembly subsequently approved its inclusion in the revised medium-term plan for 1984-1989 (resolution 41/203).

The ESCAP Pacific Operations Centre at Port Vila, Vanuatu, continued to provide technical assistance in response to government requests from the developing Pacific island countries; organized a training course under a UNDP-funded project on training in public administration (Kosrae, Federated States of Micronesia, July/August); and undertook 21 advisory missions.

ESCAP acted as the executing agency for the Pacific energy development programme, providing 18 consultancy services during 1986, most of them relating to petroleum energy and electric power, to nine Pacific island economies.

Fortieth anniversary of ESCAP

On 2 May,⁽²⁾ the Commission requested the Executive Secretary to co-ordinate its activities in connection with preparations for the fortieth anniversary of its founding, in 1987, and encouraged its members to send high-level delegations to its jubilee session.

Europe

The Economic Commission for Europe held its forty-first session at Geneva from 15 to 26 April 1986. In its annual reports covering 28 April 1985 to 27 April 1986⁽¹⁾ and 28 April 1986 to 10 April 1987,⁽²⁾ the Commission reviewed the economic situation in the region, discussed its activities and those of its subsidiary bodies, and approved plans for future work. On 26 April, it adopted a resolution and nine decisions pertaining to various aspects of its work.

By the resolution,⁽³⁾ the Commission called on member Governments to continue to take full advantage of its potential as an instrument for dialogue and for strengthening economic relations and multilateral co-operation in the region. It noted the importance to that end of full respect for the principles guiding relations among States set out in the Helsinki Final Act of the 1975 Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe (CSCE)⁽⁴⁾ and in the Concluding Document of the 1980 Madrid meeting of representatives of the States participating in CSCE.

Economic trends

The annual growth rate of total output in the ECE region remained around 3 per cent in 1986. According to a summary of the Economic Survey of Europe in 1986-1987,⁽⁵⁾ the slower than expected pace of growth was due to developments in the market economies of the United States and Western Europe; in the centrally planned economies, economic performance improved.

In the market economies, earlier optimism that the collapse in oil prices would boost the growth rate proved unfounded; by the end of the year, GDP growth averaged 2.8 per cent—virtually the same as in 1985. The gap between strong domestic demand and output widened to an unexpected degree in Western Europe and began to narrow in the United States only towards the end of the year. Private consumption—the main force behind the growth of domestic demand—was boosted by a rise in real income and by falling interest rates, and rose by more than 3.5 per cent in Western Europe and 4 per cent in the United States. The price of material inputs bought by Western European manufacturing industries fell on average by 9 per cent in the first three quarters of 1986, with final output prices falling by only 0.7 per cent; the increased margins contributed to the rise in corporate profits. Partly because of the depreciation of the dollar, prices of material inputs in the United States fell much less than in Western Europe; nevertheless, with a considerable reduction in wage pressure and competition lowering producer prices, overall disinflation was particularly rapid in 1986. The unemployment rate in Western Europe stood at 9.6 per cent of the total labour force, numbering about 12.8 million people (excluding southern Europe), while employment increased on average by less than 1 per cent. In the United States, unemployment fell below 7 per cent of the labour force and employment rose by just over 2 per cent.

In six countries of Eastern Europe (Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Poland, Romania) and the USSR, economic developments proceeded generally as envisaged in the annual plan targets. Net material product (NMP)—national income originating in sectors of the material sphere—grew by 4.6 per cent in the Eastern European countries in 1986, almost one percentage point more than in 1985, and by more than 4 per cent in the USSR, compared to 3.5 per cent in 1985. The simultaneous strong expansion in the centrally planned economies brought their combined NMP growth rate to 4.5 per cent, the highest since 1979, though the figure varied widely among individual countries, ranging from 0.5 per cent in Hungary to over 7 per cent in Romania. In both Eastern Europe and the USSR gross industrial production increased about 5 per cent, due in part to increases in energy production and greater output in branches supplying raw materials. Good weather made 1986 the first year in a decade when agricultural performance increased in all seven countries. Gross investment in Eastern Europe expanded at the same rate (3.9 per cent) as in 1985, but it rose sharply in the USSR, by 8 per cent, the highest rate since 1975.

The volume of world trade increased by some 4 per cent in 1986, marginally better than in 1985, though developments generally were overshadowed by changes in key international prices, such as the collapse and subsequent partial recovery in oil prices and the depreciation of the United States dollar against other major currencies. Among the developed market economies, export growth was more than halved to below 2 per cent in 1986, reflecting the contraction of import demand in the developing countries and in the centrally planned economies. In real terms, the exports of the European centrally planned economies increased moderately, whereas imports stagnated and trade surpluses generally narrowed. In East-West trade, the fall in the prices of Eastern fuel exports and the rise in the United States dollar price of Eastern manufactured goods led to an 8 per cent deterioration in the terms of trade of Eastern Europe with the developed market economies and a 33 per cent fall in those of the USSR. The impact of those losses was mitigated by a substantial recovery in the volume of Eastern exports to the West—a 17 per cent rise in the USSR and 4 per cent in the Eastern European countries—and by most Eastern countries allowing their current account to deteriorate in the early part of 1986.

The Economic and Social Council, by decision 1986/182 of 23 July, took note of the summary⁽⁶⁾ of the Economic Survey of Europe in 1985-1986,⁽⁷⁾ among other documents.

Activities in 1986

Regional economic co-operation

The Senior Economic Advisers to ECE Governments (twenty-second session, Geneva, 17-21 February)⁽⁸⁾ discussed economic developments in their countries, giving special attention to energy price and currency exchange rate movements in the world market and the new five-year (1986-1990) plans in the centrally planned economies. They accepted a general outline of the proposed core document for the overall economic perspective to the year 2000, comprising an introduction, a brief overview of past trends and their future projection, potential resources and factors of growth (demographic prospects, natural resources and environment, science and technology prospects), common economic problems and policy objectives, and conclusions.

In April,⁽⁹⁾ ECE noted the progress made in the perspective's preparation and invited the Advisers to improve its qualitative side. The Commission also reiterated the hope that the Advisers would give special attention to the exchange of information and joint consideration of economic trends and prospects on the long-term implications of national economic policies.

As part of the perspective's preparation, a seminar was organized on consumption trends and policy issues (Helsinki, Finland, September).

Co-operation among Mediterranean countries

In April, ECE⁽¹⁰⁾ requested the Executive Secretary to continue his co-operation with the secretariats of ESCWA and ECA and with non-ECE Mediterranean countries on subjects of common interest to those countries and within the competence of ECE.

International trade

The Committee on the Development of Trade (thirty-fifth session, Geneva, 1-5 December)⁽¹¹⁾ reviewed trends in intra- and interregional trade, trade promotion through industrial co-operation, removal of obstacles to trade and improvement of international trade procedures, as well as trade problems of member countries which were developing from the economic point of view. It also considered, among other things, the results of a special meeting of experts on prospects for East-West trade in the 1980s (Geneva, March) and a symposium on East-West business opportunities and trade prospects (Thessaloniki, Greece, September). The Working Party on Facilitation of International Trade Procedures (March and September) adopted a recommendation on codes for cargo, packages and packaging materials, and the Group of Experts on International Contract Practices in Industry (July and December) completed a guide on drawing up international contracts for services relating to maintenance, repair and operation of industrial and other works.

In April,⁽¹²⁾ ECE called on its member Governments to promote favourable conditions for developing trade and industrial co-operation in the region, and requested the Committee to continue its work to that end, taking into account the Final Act of CSCE and the Madrid Concluding Document.

Transport

The Inland Transport Committee (forty-seventh session, Geneva, 3-7 February)⁽¹³⁾ discussed the application of transport agreements of interest to ECE member States, analysed the transport situation in the region and emerging development trends, and reviewed the activities of its subsidiary bodies.

Groups of experts met on standardization of technical requirements for vessels and of ships' papers (February and August), customs questions affecting transport (March, July and October), construction of vehicles (March, June and October), standardization of rules of the road and signs and signals in inland navigation (April), transport of dangerous goods (April/May), road traffic safety (May and October), combined transport (June), transport of perishable foodstuffs (August and October), transport trends and policy (September), transport economics (October) and transport statistics (December).

Industry

The Chemical Industry Committee (nineteenth session, Geneva, 8-10 October)⁽¹⁴⁾ considered a draft annual review (1985) and endorsed the report of a group of experts on the periodic survey of the chemical industry (October) and those of two groups of rapporteurs, on olefins and aromatic hydrocarbons. It also endorsed a study on additives for thermoplastics and reviewed the progress of work on the studies on recycling of used tyres and rubber wastes and on disposal and use of wastes from phosphoric acid and titanium dioxide production. A seminar on biotechnology in the chemical industry (Varna, Bulgaria, 1-5 September) and a study tour to the Federal Republic of Germany (11-17 October) were attended by experts. The Committee adopted its work programme for 1987-1991 and agreed on a list of possible topics for future studies or seminars: automation and robotics, application of lasers and radiation, the effects on environment and health of chemical production, trends in energy requirements, standardization of packaging and labelling, the importance of the fertilizer sector, possibilities and limitations of technology transfer, trends and developments in chemical household products, rational use of water and its treatment in the industry, and East-West trade in chemical products among ECE member countries.

The Working Party on Engineering Industries and Automation (sixth session, Geneva, 19-21 March)⁽¹⁵⁾ reviewed trends and prospects, current developments and selected issues in the engineering industries and automation. It decided, among other things, to prepare a further draft of a study on trends in electrical and electronic industries and their industrial application, and to set up a data bank on engineering industries and automation. Meetings held in 1986 dealt with digital image processing in health care, software for industrial automation, technical achievements in telecommunication equipment and implications for industry, and statistics in the field. Other meetings included a seminar on industrial robotics (Brno, Czechoslovakia, 24-28 February) and a preparatory meeting for a seminar on modern equipment for preventive medical treatment. In April, ECE⁽¹⁶⁾ approved the 1986-1990 work programme of the Working Party.

The Steel Committee (fifty-fourth session, Geneva, 29-31 October)⁽¹⁷⁾ considered trends in the steel market, structural changes in international steel trade and steel statistics. The Committee endorsed the report of the Third Ad Hoc Meeting for the Study on Structural Changes in International Steel Trade (June) and reviewed the work of its Working Party on the Steel Market (June) and the Working Party on Steel Statistics (October). Other 1986 meetings included a seminar on the requirements of steel industries in ECE countries developing from the economic point of view (Izmir/Cesme, Turkey, 5-9 May) and a preparatory meeting for a seminar on the economic aspects of secondary steel-making.

Energy resources

No date was set by ECE in 1986 for the next session of the Senior Advisers to ECE Governments on Energy. During the year, work of the secretariat and the subsidiary bodies of the Senior Advisers regarding general energy problems dealt with, among other things, energy demand and supply, conservation, statistics, and trade and co-operation. The third meeting of rapporteurs on common methodological guidelines to assess the comparative merits and prospects of various new and renewable sources of energy was held in January.

The Coal Committee (eighty-second session, Geneva, 29 September-2 October)⁽¹⁸⁾ considered current developments and future perspectives of the coal industry in the ECE region, world coal trade up to the year 2000, scientific and technological co-operation and environmental problems arising from coal industry activities. As part of its efforts to make its work more efficient in the light of the United Nations financial crisis, the Committee merged the Working Party on Coal Trade and the Group of Experts on Coal Statistics into the Working Party on Coal Trade and Statistics. Groups of experts met on utilization and preparation of solid fuels (June), productivity and management problems (June), and open-cast mines (September).

The Committee on Electric Power (forty-fourth session, Geneva, 13-17 January)⁽¹⁹⁾ reviewed the current electric power situation and future prospects, as well as problems related to energy efficiency, environment, statistics and standardization. Groups of experts met on the rational use of electricity and electricity distribution outside major urban areas (April), problems of planning and operating large power stations (May), electric power stations (October) and the relationship between electricity and the environment (November).

The Committee on Gas (thirty-second session, Geneva, 20-24 January)⁽²⁰⁾ discussed current developments, future prospects, environmental problems, and statistics and information. A symposium on the gas industry and the environment was held at Stuttgart, Federal Republic of Germany (27-31 October); groups of experts met on the use and distribution of gas (May), transport and storage of gas (May), and gas statistics and forecasting problems (November).

Water

In April, ECE adopted a set of recommendations⁽²¹⁾ for fostering and strengthening co-operation among riparian countries in the harmonious development, use and conservation of transboundary waters, focusing on the control and prevention of transboundary water pollution and flood management. The Commission invited its member Governments to apply the recommendations in formulating and implementing water policies.

A seminar on water management systems was held at Bratislava, Czechoslovakia, in September, and the Group of Experts on Aspects of Water Quality and Quantity met in May.

Agriculture and timber

The Committee on Agricultural Problems (thirty-seventh session, Geneva, 10-14 March)⁽²²⁾ reviewed agricultural developments in the region in 1985 and discussed trade in agricultural products and the market situation of grains, livestock and meat, and milk and dairy products. Groups of experts met on standardization of early and ware potatoes (January), of egg products (February) and of dry and dried produce (fruit) (April/May); and on co-ordination of standardization of fresh fruit and vegetables (June/July). The ECE/Codex Alimentarius Group of Experts on Standardization of Fruit Juices met in May at Rome, Italy. The Working Party on Standardization of Perishable Produce met in November, and a symposium reviewed recent developments in marketing and their impact on the standardization of livestock products (Braunschweig, Federal Republic of Germany, July).

The Timber Committee (forty-fourth session, Geneva, 13-17 October)⁽²³⁾ discussed the market situation and welcomed the 1986 publication of a study on European timber trends and prospects to the year 2000 and beyond.⁽²⁴⁾ Meetings in 1986 included the FAO/ECE/ILO Committee on Forest Working Techniques and Training of Forest Workers (Oosterbeek, Netherlands, 2-5 June) and an FAO/ECE/ILO seminar on methods and equipment for the prevention of forest fires (Valencia, Spain, 30 September-4 October).

Science and technology

The Senior Advisers to ECE Governments on Science and Technology (fourteenth session, Geneva, 22-26 September)⁽²⁵⁾ discussed developments and changes in overall policies and agreements on scientific and technological co-operation, trends in automation in various branches of the economy, interrelationships between economic and technological development, transfer of technology and other selected issues. They also reviewed the results of consultations with users on the manual of licensing procedures in the ECE region and convened a seminar on the importance of technology transfer in ECE member countries (Warsaw, Poland, 20-24 October).

In April, ECE⁽³⁾ reaffirmed the importance of co-operation in science and technology as one of its priority activities.

Environment

The Senior Advisers to ECE Governments on Environmental Problems (fourteenth session, Geneva, 4-7 March)⁽²⁶⁾ decided to prepare a preliminary draft of a regional strategy for environmental protection and rational use of natural resources to the year 2000 and beyond, and convened a consultation, with governmentally designated rapporteurs (September), and an ad hoc meeting of governmental representatives (December) to prepare the first and second drafts. The Advisers also endorsed the final report on the application of environmental impact assessment; the group of experts on the topic had met in January. The Working Party on Low- and Non-Waste Technology and Reutilization and Recycling of Wastes (January) added five new contributions to the Compendium on Low- and Non-Waste Technology, containing the descriptions of environmentally sound industrial technologies.

The Executive Body for the Convention on Long-range Transboundary Air Pollution (fourth session, Geneva, 11-14 November)⁽²⁷⁾ completed a major review of national strategies and policies for air pollution abatement,⁽²⁸⁾ summarizing the implementation of the Convention as reported by 31 parties. The Working Group on Air Pollution Problems met in June. The Working Group on Nitrogen Oxides (July and September) continued to elaborate a draft protocol to the Convention.

A seminar on the protection of flora, fauna and their habitats met at Nurmes, Finland (25-29 August).

Human settlements

The Committee on Housing, Building and Planning (forty-seventh session, Geneva, 15-19 September)⁽²⁹⁾ reviewed current trends and policies in the region and continued preparations for the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless (1987).

The Working Party on Urban and Regional Planning (March) discussed planning for recreation and leisure areas, while the Working Party on Building (May) continued work on environmental problems arising from construction activities, modern building technologies, and energy conservation policies. The Group of Experts on Urban and Regional Research met in January, and a seminar on rent policy (Amsterdam, Netherlands, 27-31 October) made recommendations on the role of rent policy in the context of overall housing policy.

Statistics

The Conference of European Statisticians (thirty-fourth session, Geneva, 16-20 June)⁽³⁰⁾ continued work on the development and harmonization of statistical concepts, classifications and nomenclatures, and on the co-ordination of statistical activities of intergovernmental organizations active in the region. Continued attention was paid to international comparisons of main economic aggregates, environmental statistics, and organization and operation of statistical services.

The seminar on integrated statistical information systems and related matters (Bratislava, 12-16 May) discussed requirements for data processing, administrative data and meta-information systems. The seminar on the role and functions of statistical services within the overall information system of a country (Paris, 8-12 September) examined technical, administrative and other aspects. The Working Party on National Accounts and Balances (March) discussed the basic structure of the revised System of National Accounts; an ECE/ILO seminar on statistics of consumer prices (June) considered problems in compiling and using statistics and indices of consumer prices; and the Study Group on Food and Agricultural Statistics in Europe (July)—convened jointly by the Conference, FAO and the ECE Committee on Agricultural Problems—reviewed the European supplement to the programme for the 1990 world census of agriculture.

Other 1986 meetings dealt with general energy statistics (February), statistical methodology (February), cultural statistics (March, jointly with UNESCO) and health statistics (October, jointly with WHO).

Standardization

The Ninth Meeting of Government Officials Responsible for Standardization Policies (Geneva, 12-15 May)⁽³¹⁾ reviewed recent developments in standardization and adopted a new recommendation on recognition of test results. The second ECE seminar on testing also met at Geneva on 15 May.

Programme, organizational and administrative questions

Membership

By a letter dated 2 May 1986,⁽³²⁾ addressed to the President of the Economic and Social Council, Israel, an observer to ECE, applied for full membership, asserting that it had economic relations with EEC and the United States and citing two previous cases in which the status of observer countries (Canada, Switzerland) had been converted to that of full member.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 July 1986, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1986/67 by roll-call vote.

Membership of Israel in the Economic Commission for Europe

The Economic and Social Council,
Noting the letter dated 2 May 1986 from the Permanent Representative of Israel to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Economic and Social Council, containing an application for admission to membership in the Economic Commission for Europe.

Noting the draft decision entitled "Membership of Israel in the Economic Commission for Europe", sponsored by the United States of America,

Conscious of the right of all States Members of the United Nations to be admitted to a regional commission as full members,

Recognizing that the members of a regional commission should be consulted before the admission of any new member,

Recognizing that the question of admitting Israel to a regional commission as a full member should be resolved at the earliest possible time,

1. Decides to transmit the draft decision regarding Israel's membership in the Economic Commission for Europe to the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session of 1987;

2. Requests the Executive Secretary of the Economic Commission for Europe to consult with States members of the Commission on the question of admitting Israel to the Commission and to report thereon to the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session of 1987, with a view to taking action on the question of Israel's full participation in the regional economic activities of the United Nations.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/67

23 July 1986 Meeting 38 26-5-20 (roll-call vote)

18-nation draft (E/1986/L.42), orally amended by Zimbabwe; agenda item 8.

Sponsors: Belgium, Canada, Costa Rica, Denmark, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Greece, Haiti, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, United Kingdom, United States.

Meeting numbers. ESC 37, 38.

Roll-call vote in Council as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Costa Rica, Egypt, Finland, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Haiti, Iceland, Italy, Jamaica, Japan/Panama, Papua New Guinea, Philippines, Romania, Spain, Sweden, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States, Venezuela, Zaire.

Against: Bangladesh, Iraq, Pakistan, Somalia, Syrian Arab Republic.

Abstaining: Brazil, Byelorussian SSR, China, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Guinea, India, Indonesia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nigeria, Peru, Poland, Rwanda, Senegal/Sierra Leone, Sri Lanka, USSR, Yugoslavia, Zimbabwe.

The Council's First Committee had received two drafts on the question. One, by the United States⁽³³⁾ would have had the Council amend the ECE terms of reference by adding Israel to the Commission's membership. The other, by Bulgaria⁽³⁴⁾ would have had the Council recall that Israel, because of its policy, had not been admitted to ESCWA, where it belonged geographically; invite the executive secretaries of the regional commissions to consult their respective member countries on the feasibility of admitting Israel to one of the commissions; and decide that decisions on the admission of new members to a regional commission should in principle be taken with the consent of its member countries. The Committee, due to lack of time, decided to refer the matter to the Council.

Before the resolution's adoption, the Syrian Arab Republic proposed the adjournment of the debate on the question until the second regular session in 1987. By a roll-call vote of 22 to 6, with 24 abstentions, the Council agreed to a motion by the United Kingdom and suspended the meeting until the following day. At the resumed meeting, the Council rejected the Syrian motion, by a roll-call vote of 19 to 15, with 13 abstentions, and decided, as proposed by the United States, to consider the 18-nation draft first. Zimbabwe then introduced oral amendments, on which the Council acted by roll-call vote. By 18 votes to 14, with 19 abstentions, the Council accepted new wording for the fifth preambular paragraph, which had recognized "the importance of resolving at the earliest possible date the question of admitting Israel to a regional commission as a full member"; by 21 to 13, with 17 abstentions, the Council rejected the proposal to delete paragraph 1; and by 23 to 18, with 10 abstentions, it agreed to delete from paragraph 2 the word "affirmative", which had qualified the action to be taken at the second regular session of 1987. Zimbabwe withdrew a fourth proposal, on adding a final operative paragraph by which the Council would have decided to consider the question of admitting Israel as a full member of a regional commission at that session.

Israel considered the resolution as a step in the right direction, despite its sense of frustration and disappointment over the postponement of consideration of its membership application; it upheld the principles of universality and sovereign equality of States, asked for non-politicization of its request, and stressed that, as a western Asian country, it was seeking a temporary assignment to ECE.

In explanation of vote, Iraq said that accepting Israel as an ECE member would be tantamount to approving "its designs on Arab territories", and warned, as did Haiti and Zimbabwe, against the case serving as a precedent for admission of South Africa to such membership.

Among those abstaining or voting in favour, importance on extensive consultations among ECE members was placed by the German Democratic Republic (also on behalf of the Byelorussian SSR, Poland and the USSR) and the United Kingdom (on behalf of the 12 member countries of EEC). Similarly, Egypt and Zimbabwe said the issue should be dealt with in a regional commission rather than in the Council. In addition, Senegal upheld the principles of universality and equity, accompanied by acceptance of obligations. Finland and Sweden also urged respect for the principle of universality.

Turkey felt the amended text struck an acceptable balance. Panama and the United States hoped that the Council, in recognition of Israel's rights under the Charter, would solve the problem without ECE having to discuss the issue further. Canada would have preferred a solution to a compromise, and, along with the EEC members, hoped that an equitable solution would be found by consensus. Nigeria urged that the Council President consult with the interested parties to arrive at a solution.

The observer for the Palestine Liberation Organization, saying it was inappropriate for an "outcast" from one region to be admitted into the commission of another region to which it did not belong, asserted that the United States had introduced political issues into the work of non-political United Nations bodies.

Programme of work

In April, ECE approved⁽³⁾ its programme of work for 1986-1987 and endorsed in principle, subject to review at its 1987 session, its long-term programme of work for 1986-1990.

It decided to celebrate, at that session, its fortieth anniversary,⁽³⁵⁾ requested the Executive Secretary to submit proposals in 1987 to incorporate activities focusing on the economic role of women in the overall work programme for 1988-1989,⁽³⁶⁾ and decided to convene a symposium on management training in 1987, in co-operation with

The Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean held its twenty-first session at Mexico City from 17 to 25 April 1986, away from its headquarters at Santiago, Chile. The main items of discussion were the implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade (the 1980s),⁽¹⁾ economic prospects for the region to the end of the decade, the region's external debt crisis, and the effect of structural adjustment policies on national economies.

The Commission adopted 13 resolutions at the session, dealing with, among other things, trade, development, external debt, women in development, water resources, human settlements and ECDC/TCDC. Under one, it decided to convene a special conference to discuss the economic crisis affecting Latin America and the Caribbean.

Biennial reports for the periods 7 April 1984-25 April 1986⁽²⁾ and 26 April 1986-27 April 1988⁽³⁾ covered the activities of the Commission's subsidiary bodies and special committees. Intergovernmental conferences of ECLAC during 1986 included two sessions of the Committee of High-level Government Experts (CEGAN).

Economic trends

According to a summary of the Economic Survey of Latin America and the Caribbean, 1986,⁽⁴⁾ the region's economy was marked by contradictory changes. While the rate of economic growth rose slightly to 3.9 per cent in 1986 (as compared with 2.7 per cent in 1985), unemployment and inflation slackened, the terms of trade worsened, the trade surplus fell and the balance-of-payments deficit increased sharply. GDP rose and unemployment dropped in Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Peru, Uruguay and Venezuela; however, the rise in GDP was insufficient to offset the impact of population growth in Bolivia, Mexico and Paraguay and in much of Central America and the Caribbean. Increased economic growth was attributable to a 7 per cent rise in the volume of imports of goods and services during 1986.

The sharp fall in inflation in the region, from 275 per cent in 1985 to 65 per cent in 1986, was due largely to the drop in the rate of consumer price increases in Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil and Peru. However, inflation remained a serious problem in most Latin American countries, reaching almost 750 per cent in Nicaragua.

External accounts worsened during the year as international oil prices collapsed, a downward trend in the prices of other primary products persisted and an excessive expansion of domestic expenditure in a number of countries took place; the value of exports fell by 15 per cent, resulting in the slashing of the trade surplus by half and thus continuing the downward trend begun in 1985.

Expansion of economic activity was concentrated in the non-petroleum-exporting countries, whose GDP grew by 6.7 per cent. In contrast, the product of the petroleum-exporting countries as a whole fell by 1.4 per cent, primarily due to Mexico's almost 4 per cent decline. Living conditions in the majority of Latin America's poorest economies continued to deteriorate.

Urban unemployment fell for the second year in a row, on the average declining in the 25 most heavily populated cities in Latin America to 6.4 per cent, the lowest level since 1981.

In 1986, the growth rate of external debt was slightly less than 4 per cent, with a year-end debt balance of $388 billion. The increase in debt was largely attributable to the revaluation of liabilities expressed in currencies other than the United States dollar, as a result of the latter's decline in value on international markets during the year. Official lending became the sole source of additional net credit, as lending by private banks slowed to a virtual halt. The International Monetary Fund emerged as a net recipient of funds from Latin America and the Caribbean, as amortization and interest payments on earlier stand-by loans exceeded fresh disbursements. The net transfer of World Bank funds to the region fell to $200 million, as compared with $1.2 billion during the previous fiscal year.

The Economic and Social Council on 23 July, by decision 1986/182, took note of, among other documents, a summary of the Economic Survey of Latin America and the Caribbean,

Activities in 1986

Development policy and regional economic co-operation

ECLAC continued in 1986 to examine the short-term economic evolution of all the countries of the region and to analyse and propose economic policies and strategies to promote strong, sustained, equitable and autonomous development. A report reviewing the development of Latin America in the 1980s and giving projections for 1985-1995⁽⁶⁾ examined the stagnation and contraction of economic activity, the deterioration of social conditions and the external dependence and vulnerability of the development of the countries in the region. In a report on the economic crisis,⁽⁷⁾ ECLAC analysed changes in the external environment and in domestic economic policy that would facilitate the recovery and growth of the economies of the region. Another report, on the problem of external debt,⁽⁸⁾ concluded there was need to introduce into the international monetary system some stabilizing elements which could reduce the negative impact on the developing countries of the economic policies adopted by the industrialized countries.

On 25 April,⁽⁹⁾ ECLAC decided to give priority attention to the external debt issue, including it as a major focus of its 1987 meetings, and requested the Executive Secretary to submit to those meetings the corresponding study on the implications of, and solutions to, the external debt, and to keep the member countries informed systematically of the situation. Also on 25 April,⁽¹⁰⁾ the Commission called for a study of short-term reactivation within a perspective of the region's medium- and long-term development and included the topic on the agenda of the twelfth session of CEGAN (see below).

CEGAN, at its eleventh session (Bogota, Colombia, 3-6 March),⁽¹¹⁾ considered the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, prospects for economic development in Latin America and the Caribbean, and the region's external debt situation. It adopted by consensus a regional position paper, which described the effects of the debt crisis—in the magnitude of $368 billion in 1985—on the region's development and set out guidelines for concerted action. At its twelfth session (Buenos Aires, Argentina, 1-4 December), the Committee examined strategies and policies designed to bring about the region's recovery, in preparation for the special conference of ECLAC scheduled for January 1987, and drafted and approved a declaration for adoption at the conference.

The Latin American Centre for Economic and Social Documentation continued to provide the region with technical support for economic and social development. The Latin American and Caribbean Institute for Economic and Social Planning (ILPES) continued to conduct training, research and advisory programmes and to promote co-operation among development planning organizations. It held an international seminar on new directions for planning in market economies (Santiago, 25-27 August) in preparation for a UNDP project on the elaboration and dissemination of new techniques for planning and programming public policies. ECLAC, by a resolution of 25 April,⁽¹³⁾ took note of the ILPES report⁽¹³⁾ on 1984-1985 activities and its programme of work for 1988-1989, and noted with approval ILPES efforts to modernize its administration.

The joint ECLAC/United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations unit continued to study the impact and influence of such corporations on the region's development and in sectors such as banking and food processing.

Meetings sponsored or co-sponsored by ECLAC in 1986 included an informal high-level meeting on debt, adjustment and growth in Latin America (New York, 13 January); seminars on regional stabilization policies (Montevideo, Uruguay, 28-31 October) and on peace, disarmament and development (Santiago, 13 and 14 November); and a course/workshop on alternative development strategies with regard to current problems and policies in Latin America (Mexico City, 8 September-28 November). Missions were conducted to Buenos Aires and Lima, Peru, at the request of UNICEF to evaluate urban development projects.

International trade and finance

On 25 April,⁽¹⁴⁾ ECLAC requested its secretariat to consult with the Governments of the region and collaborate with the regional bodies in preparation for a ministerial meeting of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade at Punta del Este, Uruguay, in September. It also requested the secretariat to assist those Governments in identifying options and modalities of negotiation, and to provide, at the request of Governments, statistical data and analyses relating to products of high export potential and interest.

During 1986, ECLAC organized seminars/workshops/meetings on: information services and systems on research in progress in Latin America and the Caribbean (Port of Spain, Trinidad, 20-24 January); agricultural planning systems and activities in English-speaking Caribbean countries (Port of Spain, 3-6 February); pharmaceuticals (Havana, Cuba, 14-19 March); the international role of the United States in its relations with Latin America (Santiago, 25 and 26 March); implications of new technologies for Caribbean development (Port of Spain, 7-10 May); Latin America and the Caribbean and the international economy (in conjunction with UNCTAD and UNDP) (Santiago, 21-23 May); a regional information system strategy for the Caribbean (Port of Spain, 27-29 May); Latin American responses to the crisis (in collaboration with the University of the Oriental Republic of Uruguay) (Montevideo, 12-14 October); and domestic financing and adjustment (Santiago, 30 and 31 October). A series of seminars on industrial property and patent information was conducted in the Caribbean region in June.

Technical co-operation

In 1986,⁽¹⁵⁾ ECLAC, including ILPES and the Latin American Demographic Centre (CELADE), provided technical assistance and co-operated with the Caribbean Community, the Latin American Integration Association and the Latin American Economic System (SELA).

Financed mainly by the regular programme, UNFPA and UNEP, technical co-operation was undertaken in areas such as information and documentation systems, economic integration and regional co-operation, international trade, international monetary and financial relations, trade promotion, and industrial and agricultural development strategies. TCDC projects were carried out in highland basin water resources management, interior cargo terminals and regional information systems (in collaboration with UNESCO). ECLAC strengthened its support of TCDC networks in social and economic planning, capital goods industries, development of mineral resources, international relations and rural development project management (in collaboration with FAO).

Regional training and advisory services by ILPES in socio-economic planning and policy formation, and by CELADE in population and demographic analysis, were funded by extrabudgetary contributions from UNDP, UNFPA, UNEP and several Governments. ILPES trained 119 fellows from 35 Latin American and Caribbean countries and held a seminar on the integration of women in development and planning in the region. CELADE awarded 24 fellowships to participants from 13 countries.

In a 25 April resolution,⁽¹⁶⁾ the Commission reaffirmed ECDC/TCDC as a viable means of strengthening national efforts to surmount the region's economic crisis and address development needs. It asked the Executive Secretary, among other things, to facilitate information dissemination, strengthen links with and between national focal points, increase the use of local currencies in project implementation, promote mechanisms and financial agreements for economic and technical co-operation, collaborate with UNDP in supplying up-to-date information to countries concerning the availability of funds from the Special Programme Resources, promote exchange and co-operation programmes in export credit guarantees and insurance, and intensify activities carried out in conjunction with the other regional commissions.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1986/61 without vote, taking note of volume II, concerning the Caribbean, of the report of JIU on United Nations technical co-operation in Central America and the Caribbean, and the comments of the Secretary-General thereon.⁽¹⁷⁾ In so doing, it urged the United Nations system to take into account, in consultation with States members of ECLAC in the region, the main conclusions and recommendations contained in the JIU report with respect to the provision of technical co-operation to the Caribbean region.

Transport

Work continued towards creating an international transport information system for countries to improve management of their foreign trade; promoting the exchange of experience among members of the Latin American Railways Association and collaborating with that body in studying international rail transport facilitation; and promoting, with the International Maritime Organization, the creation of a regional operative network among the maritime authorities in the region on information dissemination and mutual support. ECLAC and SELA worked together to create a regional forum for economic co-operation in maritime transport. ECLAC worked with the World Bank and the Chilean Ministry of Transport and Telecommunications to study the institutional and economic efficiency of the Chilean transport system.

Among the meetings held during 1986 were: the first academic-entrepreneurial meeting on Argentine-Chilean integration (Vina del Mar, Chile, 19-22 March); and seminars on the impact of telecommunications on the economic and social development of Latin America and the Caribbean (Santiago, 12-16 May) and on methodologies for analysing transport systems for the formulation of public-sector policies (Cordoba, Argentina, 19-25 May).

Industrial development

The Commission continued to assist Governments in analysing trends in the reorganization of world industry and the effect of those trends on national productive structures, and in redirecting industrial development and designing appropriate policies. Activities organized by ECLAC during 1986 included the third expert meeting on capital goods industries in Latin America and the Caribbean (Santiago, 7 and 8 July) and a training course on industrial and technological development problems and policies (Montevideo, May).

Natural resources, energy and environment

The Commission continued to promote and support co-operation among the countries of the region in mineral, water and ocean resources development. The Natural Resources and Energy Division prepared studies on energy planning and projections, while the joint ECLAC/UNEP unit promoted the incorporation of environmental concerns into regional development activities through advisory services, studies and meetings.

During the year, ECLAC organized the tenth meeting of the regional group on the interconnection of electricity systems (Panama City, 30 and 31 January) and an international seminar on integrated systems for the development and management of river basins in the Andean region (Lima, 24-28 November). Training courses on environmental management in development planning (Santiago, 9 June-18 July) and on planning and environment in the Andean region (Cuzco, Peru, 17 November-5 December) were held in conjunction with other institutions. ECLAC organized a regional seminar on environmental systems and strategies to extend the agricultural frontier in Latin America (Santiago, 28-30 October).

On 25 April⁽¹⁸⁾ the Commission recommended that the region promote more rational and efficient use of water resources and seek increasing participation by users in the planning, conservation and financing of water resource programmes. It also recommended that the secretariat continue its support for government activities related to implementing the objectives of the 1977 Mar del Plata Action Plan for water resources development.⁽¹⁹⁾

Food and agriculture

The ECLAC food and agriculture programme, with support from the ECLAC/FAO Joint Agriculture Division, focused on the economic crisis, the adjustment process and specific policies for agriculture; agricultural policies and rural development; food policy in the context of economic policy; and support for agricultural planning.

Training seminars or courses were carried out during 1986 on urban food supplies (La Paz, Bolivia, 6-23 January); computer programming for the analysis of agricultural projects (Santiago, 14-18 April); a computer system for agricultural planning (Santiago, 28 April-5 May); micro-regional development (Tarapoto, Peru, 7-15 June); integrated rural planning and development (Salvador de Bahia, Brazil, 9 June-24 October); analysis of agricultural projects (La Paz, 23 June-4 July); regional development planning and projects (Tucuman, Argentina, 30 June-26 September); regional agricultural planning (Balcarce, Argentina, 11 August-12 December); and rural development and urban food supply (Curitiba, Brazil, 1 September-19 December).

Science and technology

Activities aimed at strengthening technological capacity included a regional working group meeting, organized by ECLAC, UNIDO and the International Development Research Centre of Canada, on the creation and consolidation of technological capacity in Latin American industry (Buenos Aires, 25-27 June) and preparatory activities for a project on information technology at the service of the economic and social development of Latin America, organized in conjunction with UNIDO (Santiago, 28 August-2 September).

Social development and humanitarian affairs

The 1986-1987 ECLAC programme on social development and humanitarian affairs concentrated on styles of development and social change in Latin America and on the integration of women into development.

Meetings on social change and development, held in conjunction with other United Nations and regional entities, included a round table on development styles in Latin America and the challenges of the future (Santiago, 6-8 January); a meeting on possible measures to deal with the immediate and long-term impact on social development of the external crisis and the adjustment process (Lima, 25-28 November), which examined policies aimed at overcoming poverty in the framework of development change and equity; and an international expert seminar on youth in the Caribbean basin (Caracas, Venezuela, 3-5 December).

The subprogramme on women in development continued to review the implementation of the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women.⁽²⁰⁾ The Commission, on 25 April,⁽²¹⁾ called on Governments to allocate resources and adopt effective and appropriate measures to implement the Strategies.

In an October report,⁽²²⁾ the Secretary-General noted that the fourth regional conference on women's integration in Latin American and Caribbean development was scheduled for late 1987, and that current ECLAC activities relating to women's concerns dealt with research and studies on selected priority issues identified by Governments; budget studies on the financing of the social sector and its impact on women's situation; evaluation of household surveys for the measurement of women's labour force participation; development of new indicators on the status of women; and research carried out by ECLAC-affiliated institutions. Meetings in 1986 included an expert meeting on measuring the participation, income and production of women in the informal sector (Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, 13-17 October) and a course/workshop on women, development and planning in Latin America and the Caribbean (Santiago, 27 October-14 November).

The UNICEF Executive Director, in a January 1986 report⁽²³⁾ to the UNICEF Executive Board, recommended that the Board approve $750,000 from general resources for the regional programme for 1986-1989 for women's participation in development. In making the recommendation, he observed that there had been a growing awareness in the region about the importance of improving women's conditions of life as a prerequisite for development; available statistics indicated that a disproportionate share of the over 156 million poor people in Latin America were women, that women represented a high percentage of the region's illiterate population and that an increasing number of households were headed by women.

Human settlements

In conjunction with the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements, ECLAC studied the region's metropolitan areas and proposed planning and administrative mechanisms; reviewed housing norms and services, including makeshift settlements; carried out technical assistance missions; and co-ordinated information dissemination activities as part of the observance of the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless (1987).

The Commission conducted training workshops on urban planning (Brazil, September) and local management (Quito, Ecuador, December) and a seminar on critical poverty and housing needs (Santiago, October).

On 25 April,⁽²⁴⁾ the Commission reaffirmed the need for Governments in the region to promote new mechanisms and standards which would meet the population's needs in land, infrastructure, urban facilities and housing. Further, it emphasized the need for increased support for programmes to help improve the quality of life in rural settlements and stressed that ways must be sought of increasing the flow of concessionary external resources earmarked for solving the human settlements problems of the region, as well as of mobilizing additional domestic resources.

Population

The Latin American Demographic Centre (CELADE) conducted the ECLAC population programme through advisory services for analysis of population trends, integration of demographic variables into development planning, and the incorporation of population-related factors into plans and policies directed at specific groups.

In 1986, CELADE offered the second year of its two-year Master's programmes in demography and in social studies of population (1985-1986) at its Santiago headquarters, and awarded diplomas and certificates to 24 students from the region. The Centre's other activities included population courses or training workshops in demography (San Jose, Costa Rica, August-December); evaluation of census data and population projections (Port of Spain, May); population policy design in the English-speaking Caribbean (Bridgetown, Barbados, July); and quantitative methods and the use of models for problem analysis in the field of population and development (San Jose, July). The Centre, in conjunction with the Latin American Programme for Population Activities, held a seminar on the teaching of demography in Latin America and the Caribbean (San Jose, November), which reviewed CELADE's future role in the teaching of demography.

The Conference on Population and Small and Medium-sized Cities in Latin America and the Caribbean (Mexico City, 24-28 February), sponsored by UNFPA in co-operation with the Government of Mexico, in its Declaration of 28 February, recognized that the region had the highest urbanization rate of all the developing regions, that the current distribution of population in the countries of the region involved social inequalities, and that, to improve the quality of life, small and medium-sized cities should be created or strengthened to counteract the urbanization trend and consequences. The Conference called on countries of the region to work together to solve the region's economic crisis; examine the causes and consequences of demographic change; develop information systems and conduct research on the relationship between population and social and economic events; adopt balanced land development policies; and support the creation of rural service centres and regional development centres.

Statistics

ECLAC continued in 1986 to reinforce a system of regional co-operation between the directors of statistics of each of the Latin American and Caribbean countries; introduced technological innovations into the dissemination of statistics and in respect of computer systems; and co-operated with Governments in improving statistical systems, national accounts and household surveys.

During the year, ECLAC conducted an inter-regional seminar (Mexico City, 9-14 February) and a regional seminar (Santiago, 7-11 April) on national accounts, and a methodological seminar on the economic characteristics of the population in the 1990 censuses (Santiago, 27-31 October). Training courses were held on basic statistical techniques, economic statistics, national accounts and sample survey techniques.

Programme, organizational and administrative questions

Amendment of terms of reference

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

In July 1986, the Economic and Social Council, which had approved in 1984⁽²⁵⁾ the change of the name of the Commission for Latin America to Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean, further incorporated that change in the Commission's terms of reference by adopting decision 1986/175 without vote, on the recommendation of its First Committee.

Amendment of the terms of reference of the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean

At its 38th plenary meeting, on 22 July 1986, the Economic and Social Council decided to amend the terms of reference of the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean as follows:

(a) In the introductory sentence of paragraph 1, the words "Economic Commission for Latin America" shall be replaced by the words "Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean";

(b) In paragraphs 1 (a), 1 (b), 2 and 15, the words "Latin America" shall be replaced by the words "Latin America and the Caribbean"; in paragraphs 1 (a), 1 (e) and 2, the words "Latin American" shall be replaced by the words "Latin American and Caribbean";

(c) The first sentence of paragraph 3 (a) shall be amended to read: "Membership in the Commission shall be open to the Members of the United Nations in North, Central and South America and in the Caribbean area, and to France, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom.";

(d) Paragraph 4 shall be amended to read: "The geographical scope of the Commission's work comprises the Latin American and Caribbean States Members of the United Nations and participating territories in Central America and the Caribbean.";

(e) Paragraph 9 shall be amended to read: "The Commission shall co-operate with and take the necessary measures to co-ordinate its activities with the appropriate organs of the Inter-American System in order to avoid any unnecessary duplication of effort between those organs and itself; to this end the Commission is empowered to, and shall seek to, make working arrangements with the appropriate organs of the Inter-American System regarding the joint or independent study of economic problems within its competence and ways of solving them and regarding the fullest exchange of information necessary for the co-ordination of efforts in the economic field. The Commission shall invite the Organization of American States and other regional bodies to nominate a representative to attend the meetings of the Commission in a consultative capacity."

Economic and Social Council decision 1986/175

Adopted without vote

Approved by First Committee (E/1986/129) without vote, 15 July (meeting 13); draft by ECUAC (E/1986/98 & Corr.2); agenda item 8.

Rules of procedure

By a resolution of 25 April,⁽²⁶⁾ ECLAC, taking note of a secretariat note on rule 2 of its rules of procedure,⁽²⁷⁾ reaffirmed the principle of rotating the venue of its regular sessions among the countries of Latin America and the Caribbean and the practice of having the host country provide the facilities and local transport. In so doing, it recommended to the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly that the United Nations regular budget for each biennium include the resources needed for holding ECLAC regular sessions in the city where the Commission's headquarters was located. The Executive Secretary was asked to finance any additional expenditures for the session from the ECLAC regular budget through reallocation of funds.

On 22 July, the Economic and Social Council, by decision 1986/173, endorsed the ECLAC resolution.

ECLAC meetings and programme of work

The Commission, by a 25 April resolution,⁽²⁸⁾ decided to convene a special conference at Mexico City, at the invitation of the Government of Mexico, to discuss the pressing problems connected with the economic crisis affecting the region since 1982. Members of ECLAC were urged to participate in the conference at both the technical and ministerial levels. The conference, originally planned to be held in late 1986, was rescheduled subsequently for January 1987.

The Economic and Social Council, by decision 1986/174 of 22 July, approved the ECLAC resolution on the special conference.

In another 25 April action,⁽²⁹⁾ the Commission authorized the Executive Secretary to consult with member States on the place of the Commission's next session, in 1988, subject to the agreement of the Secretary-General.

The Commission, in other resolutions adopted on 25 April, approved the ECLAC calendar of conferences⁽³⁰⁾ for 1986-1988,⁽³¹⁾ and the draft programme of work of the ECLAC system⁽³²⁾ for 1988-1989.⁽³³⁾

Damage to ECLAC headquarters

In October 1986,⁽³⁴⁾ the Secretary-General reported to the General Assembly on the evaluation of the damage to ECLAC headquarters at Santiago, caused by a severe earthquake (7.4 to 7.6 on the Richter scale) on 3 March 1985 and by floods and repeated minor earthquake shocks in June 1986. Resources approved by the Assembly for 1986-1987 for maintenance at ECLAC ($121,600) had already been fully committed and no savings were anticipated to cover the estimated cost of emergency repair work. As a result, an additional appropriation of $410,000 was requested for design ($50,000), repair and construction ($130,000) and rehabilitation ($230,000).

In November,⁽³⁵⁾ the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions recommended approval of the Secretary-General's estimates, under section 32 of the programme budget for 1986-1987 (see p. 1027).

Western Asia

The Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia, holding its thirteenth session at ministerial level at its headquarters at Baghdad, Iraq, on 23 and 24 April 1986,⁽¹⁾ considered the external debt situation of ESCWA members and the impact of deteriorating oil prices in relation to the region's overall economic development, as well as regional co-operation, the United Nations financial crisis, industrial development and micro-electronics, international trade and development finance, energy policies, guest labour, and international finance and banking.

On 24 April, the Commission adopted 12 resolutions, on its 1986-1987 work programme, its financial status and secretariat staff vacancies, rules of procedure, relocation of its headquarters, telecommunications, the economic and social conditions of the Palestinian Arab people, energy, social welfare, operational activities for development and the International Year of Peace. In the two resolutions concerning the Palestinian Arab people, ESCWA expressed appreciation⁽²⁾ to its secretariat for including in its studies information relating to the economic and social conditions in the occupied Palestinian territories, and decided⁽³⁾ to publish the summary and recommendations contained in the report of the 1985 Intergovernmental Meeting on the General Study of the Economic and Social Situation and Potential of the Palestinian Arab People in the Region of Western Asia.⁽⁴⁾

The Technical Committee (fourth session, Baghdad, 19-22 April),⁽⁵⁾ the only ESCWA subsidiary body, considered the programme of work and priorities for 1986-1987 and items included on the agenda of the Commission's 1986 session.

Economic and social trends

The economies of the Western Asia region had been adversely influenced by a combination of factors, among them, the conflict between Iran and Iraq, entering its seventh year, and the persistent military and political disturbances in Lebanon, according to a summary of the survey of economic and social developments in the ESCWA region, 1986.⁽⁶⁾

The continuous fluctuation of oil prices in international markets since 1983 and the resultant decline and contraction of oil revenues had slowed down economic activity in most countries of the region, both oil-exporting and oil-importing. Movements of the labour force, due to migration from heavily populated countries to oil-exporting countries or return migration, were indicative of the close links among the region's economies, as was the flow of financial resources in the form of concessional loans, grants and investments from Gulf Co-operation Council (GCC) members (Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates) to other countries of the region.

Rising protectionism in international trade continued to hamper the expansion of the region's petrochemical industry. The decline in oil revenues, the ensuing restraint in financial policies and the resulting decrease in the financial resources needed for development were anticipated to worsen the balance-of-payments position of the non-oil-producing countries and exacerbate their external debt problems. Declining oil revenues also meant that major ESCWA oil exporters and members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries had diminished ability to aid other developing countries. The region's total estimated GDP of $265 billion in 1986 represented a decline by some 6 per cent, or $18 billion, from its 1985 level. Deterioration of current accounts in most ESCWA countries persisted in 1986. In an effort to curb imports, reduce pressures on balance of payments and stimulate growth, some countries were forced to devalue their currencies. Inflation rates varied from country to country, with a continuing drop in GCC members and increases of 20 per cent or more in others, such as Egypt, the Syrian Arab Republic and Yemen.

By sector, construction continued to record a negative growth rate in several Western Asian countries, due mainly to the completion of basic infrastructure projects and a decline in demand for housing. The agricultural sector did well, with favourable weather and policy measures facilitating increases in production; crop and live-stock production increased by 6 and 5.4 per cent, respectively, and total food production in the region rose by 7.6 per cent in 1986, with record harvests of cereals (17.3 million tons) and wheat (6.8 million tons) reported for the year. This, however, did not have a significant impact on food security in the region. At mid-1986, the total population of the ESCWA region had reached 108 million—representing some 2 per cent of the world population and 54 per cent of the Arab world; per capita agricultural and food production actually decreased by 0.65 and 0.35 per cent annually, respectively, during 1980-1986. The contribution of the manufacturing sector to regional GDP increased, to an estimated 10.7 per cent in 1986, mainly as a result of the industrialization drive initiated in the early 1980s. Efforts were intensified for better utilization of the water resources of the region.

On 23 July 1986, the Economic and Social Council, by decision 1986/182, took note of, among other documents, the summary of the survey of economic and social developments in the ESCWA region, 1985.⁽⁷⁾

Activities in 1986

Development policy and regional economic co-operation

The ESCWA programme on development issues and policies continued to focus on the implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade (the 1980s),⁽⁸⁾ medium- and long-term planning models for ESCWA countries, problems facing LDCs in the region, and economic and social developments.

In February,⁽⁹⁾ the Executive Secretary reported on ESCWA consultations and collaboration with ECA in preparation for the special session of the General Assembly on the critical economic situation in Africa (see p. 442). In March,⁽¹⁰⁾ he examined the international debt crisis as it affected the ESCWA region and outlined policy measures to be taken at the regional and global levels to deal with external debt.

In April,⁽¹¹⁾ the Commission requested the Executive Secretary to report to the Technical Committee on the conclusions of the 1986 triennial policy review by the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly of United Nations development activities (see p. 411) and to submit an evaluation report on the Commission's activity during the preceding two years. As requested by the Assembly in 1985,⁽¹²⁾ ESCWA provided its views in June 1986 on the system-wide policy issues affecting operational activities.⁽¹³⁾ It reported that the aims set out by the Assembly in 1977⁽¹⁴⁾ for the regional commissions to play a focal point in development activities had not been met in Western Asia, that the professional cadre of the ESCWA secretariat's substantive divisions needed strengthening, that an extensive survey of operational capacity had been undertaken within ESCWA to examine, among other things, the possibility of a greater role in developing technical co-operation projects, and that it engaged national experts and personnel and procured material, equipment and services from local or regional sources whenever possible.

Technical co-operation

In 1986, ESCWA continued to provide short-term regional advisory services and the monitoring and backstopping of technical assistance projects.⁽¹⁵⁾ It assisted member States in development planning, electronics and information processing, human resources development, industrial project identification, formulation and appraisal, household surveys, transport and communications, and new and renewable sources of energy.

As part of its work in promoting interregional ECDC/TCDC,⁽¹⁶⁾ ESCWA prepared draft project proposals on the development of the application of informatics in the Arab countries and on computer arabization research, aimed at wider dissemination and application of informatics, reduction of software cost and better use of information technology. In co-operation with UNDP, UNESCO, UNIDO, the League of Arab States, and Arab scientific and financial institutions, ESCWA conducted a number of seminars and workshops designed to harmonize regional studies in informatics and computer techniques. Among others, ESCWA provided assistance⁽¹⁷⁾ to the preparatory/organizational committee for the Second Baghdad Conference on Computer Technology and Applications (Iraq, 24-26 March); an expert meeting organized by the Arab Fund and the Arab League Educational, Cultural and Scientific Organization on television programmes for illiterates (Kuwait, 9-13 February); and a training course on industrial statistics (Kuwait, 18-31 October).

International trade and finance

During 1986,⁽¹⁸⁾ ESCWA reviewed and analysed developments in the external sector and collected information and statistics related to trade and production services. It completed studies of the region's external sector during 1975-1985 and of statistical developments relating to inter- and intraregional trade during that period. In co-operation with UNCTAD, ESCWA held a subregional seminar on trade and economic co-operation between the ESCWA countries and Bulgaria (Sofia, 6-10 October).

Transport and communications

In 1986, ESCWA studied or assisted in developing national and multinational merchant fleets, land transport links, and policy and planning strategies.

The secretariat submitted to the Commission at its 1986 session a report⁽¹⁹⁾ on an integrated transport development strategy for the region, based on a 1985 study on the topic; the strategy covered regional transport problems, current strategies, and future transport development prospects and trends.

Studies were initiated on regional transport policies and planning aspects and on development of multimodal transport in the region, and work on land transport harmonization and facilitation continued. A draft convention on a transit transport system for the member States of GCC, prepared at their request, was submitted to the GCC secretariat. In maritime transport, a study on the development of bulk fleets in Western Asia was finalized and published in April, while another study concerning break-bulk and container fleets was started. ESCWA also co-operated with ESCAP in implementing the activities for the Transport and Communications Decade for Asia and the Pacific (1985-1994).

A major project in regional co-operation among developing countries in the field of transport, the four-lane King Fahd Causeway, connecting the island State of Bahrain to Saudi Arabia, was officially opened for private cars and bus traffic in November. The Causeway, a 25-kilometre concrete structure, had five main bridges allowing the free passage of ships below them; the $1 billion project was financed by Saudi Arabia.

In April,⁽²⁰⁾ the Commission invited member States to accord, in their respective national development plans and programmes, sufficiently high priority to the telecommunications sector as an important factor in the region's socio-economic development, and urged organizations and institutions, particularly the International Telecommunication Union and the Arab Telecommunication Union, to support and contribute to the implementation of regional and national programmes.

Industrial development

ESCWA continued in 1986 to examine industrialization policies and strategies, financing, trade in strategic commodities, promotion and identification of regional projects in capital goods and other engineering industries, development of selected branches of industry and specialized industrial technologies.

Studies on the development of capital goods and of petrochemical industries were completed by ESCWA and the Arab Industrial Development Organization as they prepared a framework for a master plan for the development of technological capabilities in the Arab world. Among other studies completed was one conducted jointly with UNIDO on silicon foundry and design centres in Arab countries, which was discussed by a workshop (Algeria, 27-29 January) assessing the advantages and viability of establishing a pan-Arab integrated circuit design and fabrication base. An ad hoc expert group meeting, in January, discussed a study on the assessment of research and development needs in informatics in the Arab countries, which had been completed on the basis of joint missions conducted by ESCWA, UNIDO and the French Direction de l'industrie électronique et de l'informatique during 1984-1986.

Transnational corporations

The Commission, in co-operation with the United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations, studied the operations of such corporations, particularly banks, in Western Asia, and provided advisory and training services. Some project elements were curtailed due to manpower shortages.

Environment, natural resources and energy

In 1986, ESCWA organized a workshop on industrial pollution control in Western Asia (April), in co-operation with UNEP and the Iraqi Scientific Research Council, and prepared a number of reports, including one for submission to the First Arab Ministerial Meeting on Environment and Development (Tunisia, October).

Studies prepared in 1986 on energy-related topics included an evaluation of the effectiveness of existing energy institutions in Democratic Yemen and Yemen. An intergovernmental technical meeting on new and renewable sources of energy (Amman, Jordan, December) identified nine project proposals for future implementation. A seminar on small-scale solar and wind technologies for rural and remote areas (Amman, November/December) discussed technological, economic, social and environmental issues.

ESCWA participated in a workshop on issues and answers in implementing nuclear programmes in the Arab world and developing countries (Kuwait, November) and prepared a study on promoting regional and interregional co-operation in the peaceful uses of nuclear energy.

In April⁽²¹⁾ the Commission called on the countries of the region to send high-ranking representatives to the United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy (1987), urged financial and technical support for countries wishing to develop peaceful applications of nuclear energy, especially in generating electricity, and asked the ESCWA Executive Secretary to assist in promoting interregional co-operation.

As regards natural resources, ESCWA concentrated on implementation of the 1977 Mar del Plata Action Plan on water resources development⁽²²⁾ and the objectives of the International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade (1981-1990).⁽²³⁾

Food and agriculture

In 1986, ESCWA continued to review agricultural developments and improvement of agricultural information; to assist in planning and project formulation, including desertification control and training in project analysis; and to examine factors affecting food production and distribution, including the relationships between agrarian systems and the alleviation of rural poverty.

A study, conducted by the ESCWA/FAO Agriculture Division, on red meat, poultry and eggs in the ESCWA region⁽²⁴⁾ concluded that the region had become the world's largest importing area of such products, valued at over $2.5 billion in 1984. Greater regional co-operation was encouraged, in addition to better utilization, on the national level, of pastures, expansion of fodder production and better utilization of agricultural and agro-industries by-products. An intergovernmental technical meeting on food security (Baghdad, 3-5 November) reviewed studies prepared by the Division during 1986.

A joint ESCWA/FAO/UNEP mission to Jordan and Yemen in 1986, to assist them in preparing national action plans for desertification control, resulted in a national range-lands development programme in Jordan and a resource conservation and watershed management project in Yemen.

The Commission participated in training programmes—one on agricultural planning, held in Turkey and organized by the Statistical Economic and Social Research and Training Centre for Islamic Countries, and the other on a computerized system for agricultural and population planning and training, held in Egypt and organized by FAO and the Egyptian National Planning Institute.

Science and technology

In 1986, ESCWA initiated arrangements for establishing a regional advisory post in science and technology and assisted in the strengthening of local scientific and technological capabilities. Project proposals for co-operation in scientific research were formulated on desertification control, climatic design of buildings in the Arab region, fish farming and application of solar energy in agriculture.

Social development

In April⁽²⁵⁾ ESCWA requested the secretariat to prepare, for presentation at an interregional consultation scheduled for 1987 on developmental social welfare policies and programmes, a report reviewing the current situation of such policies and programmes in the region, as well as future strategies.

ESCWA continued research on social integration and change, the impact of socio-cultural changes among Arab women in the region, the development of national and regional programmes for women, and social aspects of rural development.

In October⁽²⁶⁾ the Secretary-General informed the General Assembly that ESCWA units—on women's training and research, natural resources, science and technology and energy—co-operated in a case-study on the introduction of biogas technology, funded by the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM). Similarly, the Social Development Division/Women's Unit had a substantive co-operating role in a UNDP-approved regional project on biogas demonstration plants for rural areas in selected countries of the ESCWA region. A UNIFEM-funded project on the role of women in economic development was executed in co-operation with the ESCWA Women's Unit and the Agriculture Division.

Population

Under UNFPA-funded regional advisory services, assistance was provided in the field of demography and in population statistics. ESCWA issued a publication on demographic and related socio-economic indicators for its member States during 1986, which for the first time included a section on the Palestinian population in the West Bank and Gaza. A training workshop (Kuwait, 8-20 November) on demographic software was held for two participants from each ESCWA member State.

On 13 October, a co-ordination and co-operation agreement was signed with the Arab Labour Organization (ALO), covering technical assistance to ALO in establishing an information unit in Somalia's Labour Ministry, and preparation with ALO of a methodological manual on employment and labour force information and of a project proposal to UNDP on human resources development.

At the request of GCC, a preliminary project proposal on education and labour markets needs in GCC member States was prepared in April.

Human settlements

In 1986, ESCWA concentrated on the integration of physical planning with economic and social planning, city management, building materials and the survey, analysis and evaluation of the impact and effectiveness of prefabrication.

Country profiles on human settlements in Egypt, Kuwait, Oman and the Syrian Arab Republic were completed in 1986; studies on Qatar and the United Arab Emirates were under way. A study on the role of state and local authorities in city management was initiated and a questionnaire was sent to major municipalities of the ESCWA region. Under an ESCWA/France project on urban environmental management, technical assistance was provided to Egypt and Jordan in preparation of such management schemes for the cities of Alexandria and Amman. Work continued on a joint project with the French Agency for the Conservation of Energy in the application of energy-saving architectural design to community buildings in Democratic Yemen and Yemen.

Statistics

ESCWA concentrated in 1986 on statistical development, national accounts and economic data, and social and environmental statistics. Technical co-operation projects included the National Household Survey Capability Programme and training courses, one on data processing for household surveys (Cairo, October) and the other on sampling techniques (Amman, November).

The 1986 issue of Prices and Financial Statistics in the ESCWA Region, covering 1976-1985, included for the first time a section on financial statistics, comprising statistical tables on government revenues and expenditures, balance of payments, money and banking. Other 1986 publications included the ninth issue of the ESCWA Statistical Abstract, for 1975-1985, covering the main statistical series on population, national accounts, agriculture, industry, energy, foreign trade, finance, social statistics, transport and communications. The fourth issue of the External Trade Bulletin of the ESCWA Region and a study on environmental statistics in the region, including a plan for developing this field, were completed.

International Year of Peace

In April⁽²⁷⁾ the Commission, expressing support for the International Year of Peace (1986), affirmed that a just solution should be found to the Palestine question in order that the Palestinians might exercise the right to self-determination under the leadership of the Palestine Liberation Organization; that the prolonged armed conflict between Iran and Iraq threatened not only peace but the interests of the peoples of the region in regard to economic and social development; and that the continuation of the current situation in Lebanon threatened that country's sovereignty, security and territorial integrity and had caused a deterioration in its economic and social situation. The Commission called on the international community to support efforts to solve those issues in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and in the spirit of the International Year of Peace.

Programme, organizational and administrative questions

Relocation of ESCWA headquarters

In April 1986,⁽²⁸⁾ the Commission—having considered the request of the Government of Iraq, the host country, that ESCWA headquarters should move from its current premises—recommended to the Economic and Social Council that the ESCWA Executive Secretary be authorized to discuss with Iraq the provision of new premises and the timing and financial arrangements regarding a move to a new location in Baghdad.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July 1986, the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of its First Committee, adopted resolution 1986/60 without vote.

Request for the relocation of the headquarters of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia

The Economic and Social Council,

Having taken note of resolution 152(XIII) of 24 April 1986 of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia on the request for the relocation of the headquarters of the Commission,

Recalling the generous offer made by the Government of Iraq, and accepted by the Economic and Social Council, to provide for the establishment of the permanent headquarters of the Commission in Baghdad, together with all the necessary support facilities for the Commission and its staff,

Also recalling the agreement of 13 June 1979 between the United Nations and the Government of Iraq relating to the headquarters of the Commission and the supplementary agreements concluded pursuant thereto, including the supplementary agreement of 30 June 1983 relating to the premises to be occupied as the permanent headquarters of the Commission,

Taking note of the wish of the host country that, for security reasons, the headquarters be relocated to other premises in Baghdad without incurring any cost or loss to the United Nations as a result of such relocation,

Expressing the conviction that the host country, in accordance with the considerable hospitality and generosity which it has always extended to the Commission, will wish to ensure that in any change of location the highest standards already secured for the Commission and its staff at its present location will be maintained,

Desiring to ensure that any change in location will be carried out without disruption of the work of the Commission and in full accord with the terms of the headquarters agreement and the supplementary agreements concluded pursuant thereto,

Authorizes the Executive Secretary of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia to enter into discussions with the Government of the host country on the following matters:

(a) The provision by the host country of the permanent headquarters of the Commission at a new location in Baghdad, on the understanding that the Commission will be provided with all the necessary facilities, including equipment, to enable it to perform its functions;

(b) Suitable timing for the move to a new permanent headquarters once adequate alternative facilities to those available at the present headquarters have been identified;

(c) The financial arrangements involved in any move, so that it is carried out without cost to the United Nations and without any financial loss resulting from improvements made or equipment installed in the present headquarters at the expense of the United Nations which cannot be transferred to a new location;

(d) The formulation of any revised supplementary agreement or agreements which may be necessary to give effect to the foregoing or to deal with any other pending matters which either party may consider it necessary to resolve.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/60

22 July 1986

Meeting 38

Adopted without vote

Approved by First Committee (E/1986/129) without vote, 15 July (meeting 13); draft by ESCWA (E/1986/98 & Corr.2); agenda item 8.

Financial status of ESCWA

The Commission, in April,⁽²⁹⁾ expressed deep concern at financial measures that would reduce the scope of ESCWA activities mandated for 1986-1987 and limit its ability to supplement the human resources necessary to implement the activities. It asserted that it had already cancelled 30 sub-programmes because of the lack of sufficient financial and human resources, and invited the Economic and Social Council to call on the General Assembly to strengthen and expand the Commission's role in the economic and social development of the region.

The secretariat informed the Commission at that time that the most important reduction, estimated at about $950,000 or 7 per cent of the 1986 budget, had resulted from the deferment of programme elements constituting 135 work-months or the equivalent of about 12 vacant posts.

The Trust Fund for ESCWA Regional Activities had received contributions totalling $1,008,864 since its inception in 1976 until 31 December 1986.⁽³⁰⁾ The activities financed from the Fund during the same period covered 50 projects at a cost of $1,309,368. Since commencement of the new biennium, 1986-1987, a total of $226,200 had been allotted for projects, leaving an unencumbered balance of $109,204 as at 31 December 1986.

During 1986, ESCWA made use of extrabudgetary resources, estimated at some $1,635,000, from a number of contributors in support of activities financed from the regular budget.⁽²¹⁾ The main contributors of extrabudgetary resources for 1986 were UNDP, UNFPA, UNIFEM, the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development and the Governments of France and the Netherlands. UNIDO, FAO, the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements and UNEP supported ESCWA by financing posts to strengthen specific programmes.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July, on the recommendation of its First Committee, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1986/59 without vote.

Financial status of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia

The Economic and Social Council,

Having examined resolution 149(XIII) of 24 April 1986 of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia on the financial status of the Commission,

Having taken note of the concern expressed by the members of the Commission at any measures aimed at curtailing any of the Commission's mandated activities for the biennium 1986-1987 or at restricting the ability of the Commission to supplement the human resources necessary to carry out those activities,

Noting the concern of the members of the Commission, in view of the special and unique situation of the Commission, at the serious shortage of the human resources that are a basic necessity if it is to carry out its mandated programmes and activities, especially since the Commission has already undertaken, in adopting its budget, to cancel 30 subprogrammes because of the lack of financial and human resources,

Calls upon the General Assembly to strengthen the positive and constructive role assumed by the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia in the economic and social development of the region so that it may make a more far-reaching contribution to promoting regional and national development plans and programmes.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/59

22 July 1986 Meeting 38 Adopted without vote

Approved by First Committee (E/1986/129) without vote, 15 July (meeting 13); draft by ESCWA (E/1986/98 & Corr.2), orally amended by Egypt; agenda item 8.

The text, as adopted, incorporated two oral amendments by Egypt. In the third preambular paragraph, the Council noted the ESCWA members' concern "in view of the special and unique situation of the Commission, at the serious shortage", instead of "at the application of the financial measures adopted by the United Nations Secretariat to all of its bodies indiscriminately, without regard for the special and unique situation of the Commission, particularly the shortage". In the operative paragraph, the words "and expand" after the words "to strengthen" were deleted.

1986-1987 programme of work

The Commission, in April,⁽²²⁾ endorsed changes in, and recommendations made by the Technical Committee on, the ESCWA programme of work and priorities for 1986-1987. It asked the Executive Secretary to give priority to those activities relating to the impact of changing conditions in the oil and currency exchange markets on economic policies and development prospects, on expatriate labour and on international financial and banking systems in the region. It also asked him to report to the Technical Committee in 1987 on the implementation of the Committee's recommendations.

Vacancies in the ESCWA secretariat

Citing the 1984 resolution⁽²³⁾ by which the General Assembly had noted the difficulties encountered by the ESCWA secretariat in recruiting qualified staff from unrepresented or under-represented States in the region, the Commission, in April 1986,⁽²⁴⁾ requested the Executive Secretary to fill the vacancies expeditiously and to take up the question with the United Nations Secretariat so as to enable the ESCWA secretariat to perform its role in the required manner.

Rules of procedure

In April 1986,⁽²⁵⁾ the Commission requested its secretariat to study the possibility and the consequences of amending rule 1 (a) of the Commission's provisional rules of procedure so that the session would be held every two years, with a view to providing more time to prepare for the ministerial-level meetings and thus ensuring optimum performance. In the mean time, the Commission amended part of rule 1 (a) to state that its sessions would be held in April. The fourteenth session of the Commission was scheduled for 4 and 5 April 1987.

Chapter VIII

Natural resources and cartography

After three consecutive years of decline, the expenditures of the United Nations Revolving Fund for Natural Resources Exploration—administered by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP)—more than doubled in 1986 to $6.9 million, financing a record number of projects at a time when mineral exploration financing, world-wide, was at a low point.

Training courses and other projects were implemented as part of the efforts to achieve the objectives of the International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade (1981-1990). Reflecting the shifting emphasis to a new, integrated approach to water resources management, the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) continued to promote environmentally sound management of inland waters.

General aspects of natural resourcesExploration*UN Revolving Fund for Natural Resources Exploration*Activities

The United Nations Revolving Fund for Natural Resources Exploration continued to assist developing countries in searching for new sources of both solid minerals and geothermal energy and bringing the results of previous discoveries to the investment stage. While most metal prices continued to be depressed, and reductions were made in the exploration budgets of many countries and in new mining ventures, the Fund provided assistance to more projects than ever—eight in mineral exploration (Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Haiti, Honduras, Kenya, Peru, Rwanda, Sierra Leone) and one in geothermal exploration (Saint Lucia).⁽¹⁾

In Argentina, where promising high-grade gold and silver deposits had been discovered, the Government requested $375,000 from the Fund for drilling and foreign currency expenditures during the first stage of a phased programme. In Benin, the Fund provided assistance in the possible commercial exploitation of kaolin, which had been found to be suitable for the production of tableware, sanitary fixtures and tiles. On-site field evaluation was completed in the Congo as part of the Fund's feasibility study project, jointly financed by France, on the use of phosphorite/shell in Congolese agriculture. A project for base and precious metals exploration in Côte d'Ivoire became fully operational, while in Haiti an intensive drilling programme continued to outline the boundaries of the gold-bearing veins with potential economic value. An exploration project for gold, silver and zinc in Honduras, which became operational early in the year, uncovered a gold/silver-bearing vein structure. Field operations in the search for gold commenced in Rwanda, continued in Peru and were completed in Kenya; similar operations in Sierra Leone concentrated on detailed follow-up investigations. All the preparatory work was completed prior to initiating exploration drilling in 1987 in Saint Lucia, where the Fund's first geothermal project was launched under joint financing with the United States Agency for International Development.

Contributions and expenditures

Project expenditures in 1986 were more than double those in the preceding year, at $6.9 million. Voluntary contributions totalled $418,373 from five countries. By year's end, the Fund had an estimated $8.6 million available for future years. Despite the recent increase in voluntary contributions, there was concern that the Fund's financial base would not grow sufficiently to keep pace with growing project demand.

By a 27 June 1986 decision,⁽²⁾ the UNDP Governing Council noted that all accumulated resources of the Fund had been committed and that no new projects could be considered without additional financial support. The Council again appealed to Member States to contribute to the Fund.

Committee on Natural Resources

In 1986, the Economic and Social Council examined the measures taken by the Secretary-

General, in response to its 1985 request⁽³⁾ for improving the Secretariat servicing and substantive support services for the Committee on Natural Resources, which meets biennially. The Committee's next session was scheduled for 1987.

By decisions 1986/104 of 7 February and 1986/157 of 21 July, the Council took note of oral reports made by Secretariat officials on measures taken in that regard.

Mineral resources

In May 1986, the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination (CPC)⁽⁴⁾ took note of the Secretary-General's report, submitted in 1985,⁽⁵⁾ containing a triennial review of the implementation of the 1982 CPC recommendations on the United Nations mineral resources programme⁽⁶⁾ Due to lack of time, CPC had postponed until 1986 consideration of the report, which included recommendations on the organization of evaluations, co-ordination at the intergovernmental and organizational levels, assessment of technical advisory services, modalities for post-exploration assistance and improvement of project implementation, as well as programme planning and design, and expansion and monitoring of documents distribution.

The Committee decided not to act on those recommendations having relevance to other issues under consideration or having been overtaken by time or by further development. However, it recommended a series of measures aimed at enhancing the usefulness of the mineral resources programme through improved technical advisory services, exploration follow-up, project implementation, application of existing planning and design criteria, and identification of intended end-users and distribution of documents.

In Latin America, the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean helped in organizing the First Latin American Mining Congress, of the Latin American Mining Organization, at Lima, Peru, from 21 to 23 November.

Technical co-operation

In addition to the Revolving Fund, the United Nations Department of Technical Co-operation for Development (DTCD) continued to assist countries in identifying mineral resources projects worthy of investment and in strengthening related infrastructure. More than 60 DTCD projects were operational in 1986, and over 70 advisory missions were undertaken, with funding from the United Nations regular programme of technical co-operation⁽⁷⁾

A large-scale airborne geophysical survey of Malawi was completed and a comprehensive interpretation of the resulting data set was initiated. Exploration for metals and minerals continued in Benin, Cameroon and Gabon; gold was under investigation in the northern part of Burundi. Exploration for non-metallic minerals was carried out in Jamaica, while similar activities in Paraguay resulted in geological, hydrogeological and metallogenic maps of the country. Gold exploration in Haiti led to the discovery of two economic gold deposits, and a volcano-monitoring system project continued in Saint Vincent and the Grenadines. Assistance was given to Colombia in formulating contract models for coal resources exploitation.

A project was begun to assist Ghana in strengthening its newly created Minerals Commission, and Greece, India, Malawi, Turkey and Viet Nam received assistance in strengthening similar government or academic institutions. During the year, 13 Namibian students were placed at several universities in the United States to study mining and mineral resources development.

Water resources

Added emphasis was given to the need to raise public consciousness as efforts to increase access to safe drinking water continued in 1986 in the context of the International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade (1981-1990). The UNDP Administrator recommended continuing the information support project, aimed at generating support for attaining the Decade's goals among those whose understanding and action had influence on the success of drinking water/sanitation programmes in developing countries⁽⁸⁾

On 27 June⁽⁹⁾ the UNDP Governing Council allocated $1,280,000 for the project during 1987-1990.

Inter-agency co-ordination

The inter-agency Steering Committee for Co-operative Action for the International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade (fourteenth meeting, Geneva, 4 and 5 September), organized by the World Health Organization, endorsed the value of regional consultations on the Decade.

The Intersecretariat Group for Water Resources, of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination, continued to promote co-ordination among the organizations of the United Nations system in the implementation of the 1977 Mar del Plata Action Plan.⁽¹⁰⁾ At its seventh session (Geneva, 8-12 September)⁽¹¹⁾ the Group discussed the water situation in Africa, taking into account, among other things, recommendations stemming from the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development, 1986-1990, adopted on 1 June 1986 by the General Assembly (see p. 446), and from the Regional Meeting on Socio-economic and Policy Aspects of Water Resources Management in Africa (Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, 2-6 June), convened by the Economic Commission for Africa (ECA) and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). The Group also discussed the role of non-governmental organizations, and co-ordination and co-operation in the implementation of ongoing programmes and field activities.

Technical co-operation

In 1986, DTCD activities in water resources management and development covered institution building and other technical assistance, with 116 projects under execution.⁽⁷⁾

Among 27 new and follow-up projects initiated during the year were those aimed at establishing a master plan for water resources development and management in Mauritania, and strengthening infrastructure for co-ordinating rural water-supply activities in Sierra Leone. Assistance was given to Argentina's National Institute for Water Sciences in upgrading its technical equipment and staff resources for applied research. Laboratories in India were provided with advanced instruments to evaluate, among other things, data for dam construction. A project in Pakistan, with $1.87 million in UNDP support, was launched to assist the International Institute of Waterlogging and Salinity Control in conducting or co-ordinating research.

Fifty-two interregional advisory missions were undertaken in response to requests from Governments for assistance in solving specific problems. Those included rural water development in Cameroon, technical advisory assistance in ground-water exploitation in Grenada, an analysis of water legislation in Guatemala, activities for increasing aquifer storage and establishing a ground water-monitoring network in Iraq, and efforts to overcome difficulties encountered in the water-well drilling programme in Mexico.

UNEP activities

A new comprehensive approach to water resources management continued to be promoted by UNEP in 1986, as it implemented its programme for the environmentally sound management of inland waters, with a view to assisting Governments to develop and implement action plans, providing training for experts and making a regular world-wide assessment of the state of the environment in inland water systems. Under a joint UNEP/UNESCO project on integrated environmental evaluation of water resources development, a meeting was held in Paris in March 1986 to discuss a draft classification system and methodological guidelines on integrated environmental evaluation of water resources development.

Training courses were offered as part of UNEP's continuing support to the International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade, among them, one on socio-economic aspects of community water supply and sanitation, for French-speaking African professionals (Sophia Antipolis, France, and Lomé, Togo, 6-31 October), and another on environmentally sound management of water resources (Harare, Zimbabwe, 20-31 October). As part of a drinking-water quality control project, development of three pilot sites in Indonesia, Peru and Zambia was completed.

UNEP activities also were aimed at protecting living marine resources (see p. 669).

Cartography

The sixth United Nations Regional Cartographic Conference for Africa was held at ECA headquarters at Addis Ababa from 10 to 17 November 1986—the year commemorated also as the Year of Cartography and Remote Sensing in Africa.

The United Nations Group of Experts on Geographical Names held its twelfth session at Geneva from 28 September to 7 October, and examined developments in cartographic activities since the Group's last session in 1984.

A total of 56 DTCD projects were operational in 1986, dealing with geodesy, topographical surveying, Photogrammetry, mapping, cartography, hydrography and cadastral surveying and registration, and map reproduction and printing. Two interregional meetings were held during the year: a seminar on hydrographie surveying and bathymétrie charting, and a training course on large-scale mapping for planning and cadastral purposes.

Chapter IX

Energy

During 1986, a number of United Nations bodies continued to focus on the energy problems of developing countries, whose ability to carry out energy programmes was hampered by financial constraints as well as the complexities of energy planning, by rapidly changing technology and by environmental factors.

The United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and the World Bank co-operated in energy development and assessments of countries' energy needs and options. The UNDP Energy Account supported the Energy Sector Management Assistance Programme, which was carried out with the co-operation of both organizations, as well as a number of other projects in technological assessment, resource assessment and development, training and information flow. Expenditures of the Account in 1986 totalled $6 million; $4.1 million for seven projects was approved during the year.

While nuclear power-generating capacity increased by 8.9 per cent, accounting for more than 15 per cent of the world's electricity generation, the environmental factors of nuclear energy were highlighted by the accident at Chernobyl, Ukrainian SSR, on 26 April, producing an upsurge of opposition to nuclear power in many countries. Shortly after the event, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) began to consider new national and international safety measures, and a governmental expert group was convened to draft two international conventions, on early notification of a nuclear accident and on assistance in the case of a nuclear accident or radiological emergency. By resolution 41/36, the General Assembly urged all States to strive for effective and harmonious international co-operation in carrying out the work of IAEA and welcomed the signing by a significant number of States of the two conventions.

In his report on the work of the Organization (see p. 3), the Secretary-General affirmed that IAEA was playing an essential role in enhancing international co-operation to prevent nuclear accidents or mitigate the effects of such accidents; meriting early, positive consideration were suggestions that IAEA's role and activities in nuclear safety be strengthened and expanded. The United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy, to be held in 1987, would take place under the favourable auspices of recently intensified contacts.

Preparations for the Conference continued, with the Preparatory Committee holding its last session in November 1986. By resolution 41/212 A, the Assembly took note of the Preparatory Committee's report, while in resolution 41/212 B, it appealed to all Governments to ensure the highest standards of safety in the design and operation of nuclear plants, and to take into account the interests of neighbouring countries when discussing nuclear energy matters at the Conference.

The Committee on the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy held its third session in June 1986. By resolution 41/170, the Assembly called for preparation of a new set of proposals on activities to be undertaken for consideration by the Committee, and it urged that greater attention be given to the development of new and renewable sources of energy for the rural sector.

General aspects

Energy resources development

Report of the Secretary-General. In a June 1986 report,⁽¹⁾ the Secretary-General analysed trends and future prospects in energy exploration and development, with emphasis on the energy-deficient developing countries. In his analysis, the Secretary-General paid special attention to activities in oil-importing developing countries, and emphasized trends in the oil and gas sectors, since they accounted for nearly 80 per cent of total commercial energy consumption in developing countries. He also considered new constraints and opportunities which might be provided by lower oil prices. Since 1985, oil prices had declined by 50 per cent; if maintained, the decline could profoundly affect both the level and geographical distribution of energy activities, and early effects, in the form of cuts in exploration budgets, were already being felt.

The Secretary-General concluded that, overall, energy exploration and development in developing countries had declined, caused by such factors as a continued concentration of effort in the developed market economies; a slow-down in the growth of energy demand; lower energy prices; and financial constraints affecting the developing countries, transnational oil corporations and multinational and bilateral programmes of assistance. Yet several of the energy-deficient developing countries had been successful in exploring and developing indigenous energy resources. Available evidence indicated that oil and gas exploration had been particularly favourable in developing countries, though additional financing would be required from multilateral and bilateral assistance programmes and transnational oil corporations in order to meet higher energy demand for economic growth. The Secretary-General also noted that collection of up-to-date information could be considerably improved, as the most important challenge to the international community was to reduce uncertainty about trends in energy exploration and development and to enhance the stability of world energy markets.

The Economic and Social Council, by decision 1986/160 of 21 July, took note of the Secretary-General's report, as did the General Assembly on 5 December by decision 41/439.

UNDP activities. The UNDP/World Bank Energy Sector Management Assistance Programme (ESMAP), initiated in 1983,⁽²⁾ continued to help developing and donor countries implement recommendations of individual energy assessment reports. In January 1986, UNDP and the World Bank convened in Paris a consultative meeting with high-level participation of donors and developing countries to review past ESMAP activities and its future scope. The meeting noted that, despite the decline in oil prices, the energy crisis continued, particularly in such regions as sub-Saharan Africa, where commercial energy use was limited; while lower energy prices might, in the short run, provide a measure of relief for oil-importing countries, there was reason to believe that prices would once again increase as a result of rising demand and declining exploration. Depletion of biomass through continued deforestation was noted with concern, and it was recommended that ESMAP pay attention to formulating household strategies in both urban and rural areas.

Consequently, ESMAP began to examine household energy use in Ethiopia, Morocco and the Niger, and to investigate in Liberia and Mauritius possibilities for enhancing the role of the private sector in energy production. In other countries, such as Bolivia, ESMAP was working to improve co-ordination among institutions in the energy sector; in Thailand and other countries, ESMAP was identifying measures to be taken by the Government in response to falling energy prices. With regard to energy supply, ESMAP continued to carry out pre-investment studies on peri-urban fuelwood plantations, the identification of potential natural gas reserves and the introduction of new and renewable energy technologies. On the demand side, ESMAP collaborated with the United Nations Development Fund for Women and the United Nations Sudano-Sahelian Office (UNSO) on a wood-stove programme in the Niger, with additional funding from the Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands and Norway. The project, in which a number of non-governmental organizations participated, led by mid-1986 to the distribution of some 25,000 improved stoves in urban areas. In the Sudan, a major fuelwood/forestry feasibility study was under way with the support of Denmark, Finland, the Netherlands and Norway. As ESMAP placed new emphasis on enhancing local human resources, an energy strategy study, with the support of Canada, was conducted in Colombia and largely entrusted to Colombian consultants; a study in Ghana, also Canada-supported, on prospects for utilizing sawmill and forest plantation wood-wastes for power generation and briquetting applied the same approach for data gathering.

While the major part of the resources of the UNDP Energy Account was utilized to support ESMAP, a number of other projects were undertaken by the Account in the areas of technological assessment, resource assessment and development, training and information flow.

In the area of technological assessment, two global programmes were being undertaken with the World Bank as executing agency: a gasifier programme with the objective of identifying projects and promoting investment in biomass technology that utilized for energy production waste biomass materials in developing countries; and a wind-pumping evaluation programme to summarize the status of that technology in 18 countries, leading to a handbook for decision-makers and practitioners. Other projects approved in 1986 included a mini-hydro feasibility study at Somo-Somo, Fiji, and an international training programme in coal technology.

UNDP activities in energy development were summarized in an April 1986 report of the UNDP Administrator⁽³⁾ and in his annual report for 1986.⁽⁴⁾

The UNDP Governing Council, on 27 June⁽⁵⁾ called on Governments to provide contributions and co-financing on an increasing basis to enable the Energy Account to initiate high-priority projects, including those in the field of new and renewable sources of energy, and called on the Administrator to continue to provide support for energy activities initiated under the Account and to report regularly on developments regarding the utilization of country and intercountry indicative planning figures/or the financing of energy projects.

Recognizing the need to strengthen the Energy Account, the Committee on the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy (see p. 581), in a June 1986⁽⁶⁾ resolution, invited the Governing Council to intensify efforts to attract additional contributions so that the Account could expand its activities in response to developing countries' needs in new and renewable energy sources development and utilization.

Voluntary contributions to the Energy Account in 1986 amounted to $109,413; cost-sharing and sub-trust funds reached $4,199,539. Expenditures from the Account totalled $6,129,000.

Other activities. The United Nations University continued to focus on aspects of energy development research. Work in the programme area of energy systems and policy aimed to develop a concept of integrated energy systems for rural areas of developing countries and methods of applying such concepts. Particular attention was given to problems in energy planning and to the wide dissemination of successful models of energy development. (For further information, see p. 643.)

The United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) continued to collect, study and disseminate information on the environmental impact of energy sources and to support energy conservation and environmentally sound ways of using energy in developing countries, according to the 1986 annual report of the Executive Director.⁽⁷⁾ By a 4 February letter,⁽⁸⁾ Mexico and Venezuela transmitted to the Secretary-General a joint statement, issued at Cancún, Mexico, on 30 January 1986, expressing concern at the situation and prospects of the world hydrocarbons market.

Technology transfer

UNCTAD activities. The Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD), in response to a 1985 resolution of the Trade and Development Board,⁽⁹⁾ convened at Geneva from 15 to 24 October 1986 a Meeting of the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on the Transfer, Application and Development of Technology in the Energy Sector, Paying Particular Attention to New and Renewable Sources of Energy.⁽¹⁰⁾ The Meeting considered studies on transfer, adaptation and diffusion of mature renewable energy technologies in developing countries,⁽¹¹⁾ and the technology policy implications for developing countries of the development and commercialization of new and renewable energy technologies.⁽¹²⁾

Discussing experiences of their own and those of regional and international organizations, the experts concentrated on six specific issues and adopted conclusions and recommendations for each. Concerning the identification of energy users' needs, motivation and popularization, and use of renewable energy to satisfy rural energy requirements, the Meeting stated that critical needs for fuel arose where fuelwood was used in an intensive way, contributing to serious ecological imbalance and environmental degradation. Since income-earning capacity of the rural population was extremely limited, schemes to improve the use of existing energy resources or to replace them would have to be accompanied by governmental subsidies.

Regarding problems of information, facilitation of information exchange and dissemination, establishment of networks and information on information, the experts stated that there was a need at the national level to promote training for personnel to handle information and strengthen linkages among entities and institutions involved; they recommended that the scope of existing information networks be modified and enlarged to facilitate exchange of detailed information on the technological and socio-economic results of application of renewable energy technologies.

The experts stated that moving from the pilot or experimental stage to the diffusion stage of mature technologies represented the most critical policy task in the area of new and renewable sources of energy; they recommended that cases of success and failure in diffusion be systematically analysed and the results made available to developing countries. Financing schemes for national and international diffusion should be studied, with a view to establishing mechanisms for financing projects based on mature renewable energy technologies in developing countries. The establishment of local equipment manufacture as a diffusion mechanism should be an essential part of national and international programmes; to promote large-scale utilization of mature renewable energy technologies, the concept of coupling energy projects with income- and employment-generating projects should be implemented as "seed projects" under varying local conditions.

Regarding means of energy production designed for remote areas (away from centralized energy supply systems), the Meeting recommended that the combining of different energy sources, including not only new and renewable but also conventional ones, be investigated and that subsidies or pricing policies be considered to permit affordable energy consumption.

Recognizing the importance of planning in determining future energy requirements and the necessity to integrate new and renewable resources in overall energy policy, the experts stressed the importance of relations between governmental authorities, enterprises and other sectors and recommended that complementarity be sought between State actions and initiatives of entrepreneurs. They recommended improving policy co-ordinating mechanisms to ensure adequate integration of energy policy in overall economic and social policy; improving forecasting mechanisms and cost assessments; and promotion of training in energy planning and renewable energy project design, testing and evaluation.

Complementarity should also be sought, the experts recommended, between regional and subregional co-operation on the one hand, and international co-operation, especially involving United Nations organizations, on the other. International projects should aim at building up domestic technological capability in developing countries, should focus on the generation, development, promotion and use of non-conventional energy, and should facilitate the transfer of technology through: full joint participation of national experts and organizations in project conception and execution; incorporation of training programmes enabling developing countries to operate and maintain equipment and ultimately design and manufacture it themselves; provision of improved access to technologies; and promotion of direct contacts of experts, research and development institutes and industry associations, between developing countries, and between developing and developed countries. United Nations organizations should pool their resources for promoting renewable energy technology projects in critical areas, such as rural development, particularly in the least developed countries.

The UNCTAD Committee on Transfer of Technology, on 13 November 1986,(13) noted the constructive outcome of the Meeting and requested that its recommendations be sent to the United Nations regional commissions for further consideration. The commissions were invited to inform the Committee of their response.

New and renewable energy sources

Implementation of the 1981 Nairobi Programme of Action

Throughout 1986, various United Nations bodies continued their efforts to implement the Nairobi Programme of Action for the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy, endorsed by the General Assembly in 1981.(1) Among them, the United Nations Department of Technical Co-operation for Development was responsible for disbursing about $10 million annually on projects in energy planning and conservation, solar, wind, biomass, geothermal energy and mini-hydropower. UNCTAD carried out policy-oriented research in two areas enumerated in the Nairobi Programme: research, development and demonstration of new technologies; and transfer, adaptation and application of mature technologies in the area of new and renewable energy sources. The International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women provided training to help alleviate the burden on women as energy producers and users, particularly in rural areas.

A major part of UNDP resources in the energy programme was committed to new and renewable energy sources, and the Energy Account increasingly provided support for projects in that field. Among them, the UNDP Energy Office convened in April the first in a planned series of information programmes on renewable energy; the inaugural events were two regional symposia and information workshops on the cost and applicability of photovoltaics in such sectors as health, water pumping and irrigation, education and development; one was held at Nairobi, Kenya, for East African countries, the other at Chiang-Mai, Thailand, for Asian countries. An important feature of those symposia and workshops was that, for the first time, UNDP and the private sector co-operated in creating awareness of renewable energy technology at decision-making levels in developing countries; six major international companies from the Federal Republic of Germany, the United Kingdom and the United States joined with the Energy Office in presenting the programmes. UNDP also pursued initiatives in other areas of renewable energy technology; among them was a coal technology training programme, in co-operation with the Australian Government, which started in 1986 with a nine-week training programme for 17 participants.

Energy programmes of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) dealt with efficient use of commercial and non-commercial energy and development of new and renewable energy sources; priority was given to the building of national capabilities and facilitating the exchange of information and experience. In its training activities, the International Labour Organisation (ILO) placed emphasis on labour-intensive technologies and popular participation.

In 1986, UNEP published a report entitled "Assessment of tools and methods for incorporating the environmental factor into energy planning and decision making". With full support from the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia, UNEP organized an expert group meeting (Bahrain, 1-6 February) on energy conservation in Western Asia. In Kenya, UNEP initiated a project to evaluate fuelwood stoves. Progress was made in a project on environmental impacts of fuelwood utilization in rural areas of Bolivia and Brazil. With funding from the Danish International Development Agency (DANIDA), UNSO was carrying out a project in the Sudan for the production of fuel briquettes from peanut shells and the waste products of cotton production. In Senegal, DANIDA financed a project to convert peat into fuel briquettes for domestic use and to distribute fuel-efficient cooking stoves. Such stoves were also taken in 1986 to Mauritania in a project financed by Norway, to Burkina Faso with funding from the Swedish International Development Authority, to Mali and the Niger with the help of Norway and to the Sudan with the support of DANIDA.

According to a March 1986 report of the Secretary-General on monitoring implementation of the Nairobi Programme of Action⁽²⁾ new and renewable energy sources made up 13 per cent of the total world energy supply and substantial activities were taking place in the priority areas identified in the Programme. Resources had been committed by the United Nations system and intergovernmental organizations and through bilateral co-operation. Domestic commitments had also been made by developing countries. However, further concerted effort was needed and the focus should be on the application of mature technologies (such as large and small hydropower, geothermal energy, small-scale wind power, specific applications of solar power for space and water heating, as well as crop drying, draught-animal power and peat). Special attention should be given to the development of energy supply for the rural sector and for low-income groups in developing countries, including an adequate response to the fuelwood crisis. To facilitate such activities, extensive support actions were needed in institution-building or strengthening, resource assessment for individual energy sources, technology assessment, information flows and training, and popular participation in the design and implementation of activities was called for.

Concerning the mobilization of financial resources for implementation of the Programme of Action, the Secretary-General noted in another report⁽³⁾ that consultative meetings recommended by the Programme had had limited impact, but had brought together donors and recipients, providing a forum for identifying areas for action and constraints. That had resulted in improved project proposals and provided an opportunity for co-ordinating co-operative projects. In preparing such meetings, emphasis should be on active participation of donors, recipients and other interested parties at an early stage; as to further ways of mobilizing resources, what was needed was increased funding through existing channels, including the UNDP Energy Account or a fund-in-trust arrangement.

A global consultative meeting on UNDP/World Bank energy programmes was held in Paris (15-17 January 1986) in order to generate financial support for the energy programmes of both organizations, utilizing whenever feasible the UNDP Energy Account. The programmes in question included the Energy Sector Assessment Programme, ESMAP, the Technology Assessment Programme and the Accelerated Energy Training Programme. Another global consultative meeting was held in March and a regional consultative meeting in Africa was planned.

The number of national focal points for information on new and renewable sources of energy had increased to over 115, and substantial progress had been made in collecting such information.

Committee on new and renewable sources of energy

Established as an intergovernmental organ by the General Assembly in 1982⁽⁴⁾ to promote the Nairobi Programme of Action, the Committee on the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy held its third session in New York from 9 to 13 June 1986.⁽⁵⁾ The Committee discussed three subjects based on reports by the Secretary-General on: monitoring the implementation of the Programme,⁽⁶⁾ mobilization of financial resources for its implementation⁽⁷⁾ and progress made⁽⁸⁾ in implementing projects and programmes outlined in 1982 by the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC).⁽⁹⁾ On 13 June, the Committee adopted two resolutions. By the first⁽⁸⁾ it decided to adopt a substance-oriented approach and place on the agenda of each session one or two specific themes to give depth to its deliberations. For the agenda of its next (1988) session, the Committee decided to include the themes: research, development and demonstrations; and systems of information in the field of new and renewable sources of energy. The Committee also invited Member States to inform it in 1988 of ongoing practical and scientific activities and/or evaluations with regard to those themes, and requested the Secretary-General to report on United Nations activities in that regard.

By the second resolution⁽⁹⁾ the Committee, reaffirming the continued validity of the Nairobi Programme of Action as the basic framework for multilateral co-operation in the area of new and renewable sources of energy, and expressing concern at the slow pace of the Programme's implementation, invited Governments, international financial institutions and United Nations organizations and bodies to intensify their efforts towards an accelerated and comprehensive implementation. It stressed the need to devote substantial attention to energy planning; to integrate energy strategies in overall economic and social development planning; and to improve multilateral co-operation in the field of new and renewable energy sources, reaffirming in that context the vital role of the United Nations but also recognizing the important role of bilateral activities. The Committee endorsed the importance of increasing inter-agency co-ordination to implement the Programme more effectively, stressed the importance of increasing co-ordination of development activities for new and renewable energy sources and called on the international community to assist developing countries in accelerating co-operation among themselves. It urged greater attention to the development of new and renewable energy sources for the rural sector, bearing in mind the depleting fuelwood supply in many regions; while developing such energy sources, emphasis should be given also to environmental protection and to finding non-polluting energy sources and energy-saving production methods.

The Committee emphasized the need to mobilize additional financial resources, stressing the importance of promoting investment in the development and utilization of new and renewable energy sources. It recommended that consultative meetings be prepared in such a way as to ensure efficient follow-up leading to mobilization of additional resources in support of specific projects and programmes; in that context, it invited United Nations support to developing countries in identifying projects and strengthening national frameworks. It further invited UNDP to report on its activities in that field.

On 21 July 1986, the Economic and Social Council, by decision 1986/159, took note of the Committee's report.

Inter-agency co-ordination

As requested by the Committee on new and renewable energy sources in 1984,⁽¹⁰⁾ the Secretary-General submitted to it in 1986 a report on progress made by the United Nations system in implementing projects and programmes within the framework of the Nairobi Programme of Action⁽⁶⁾ those projects and programmes corresponded to proposals outlined in a 1982 ACC report⁽⁷⁾ which had been considered by an interim committee in the same year.⁽¹¹⁾ Project and programme areas included energy assessment and planning; evaluation, research, development and demonstration; integrated rural energy development; energy and industrialization; human resources development; and information flows.

The Secretary-General stated that substantial progress had been achieved in implementing projects in energy assessment and planning; activities were initiated for country assessments, assessment of national exploration requirements, strengthening national planning capabilities and statistical information. While progress in some areas was quite good, it was not satisfactory in others, he said, largely due to the scarcity of financial resources and in a few cases to changed requirements; except for very few cases, many projects had to be implemented in reduced scale in view of insufficient funds. Resource mobilization for project implementation thus continued to be one of the major problems facing the Committee, the Secretary-General concluded.

The 1985 global consultative meeting⁽¹²⁾ considered 21 projects based on ACC's 1982 proposals, which had been updated and revised, with particular attention paid to a number of criteria, such as readiness of technologies for application; effective contribution to the solution of most urgent energy problems; promotion of energy conservation and waste reduction; impact on lower-income groups, particularly rural populations; and greater attention to the problems of the least developed countries. In addition, attention was paid to the projects' technical and economic feasibility and social adaptability and their applicability to developing countries. A list of those projects was annexed to the Secretary-General's report.

The Inter-Agency Group on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, established in 1983⁽¹³⁾ to increase United Nations responsiveness to the Nairobi Programme of Action, at its fifth session (Geneva, 19-21 February; New York, 9 June 1986),⁽¹⁴⁾ considered the Secretary-General's three reports to the 1986 Committee session; follow-up to consultative meetings; and collection of information on activities in the area of new and renewable energy sources. With regard to consultative meetings, the Group agreed that, while so far they had not resulted in any substantial mobilization of financial resources, their consultative function had proved useful. The Group also discussed the possibility of substituting a "consultative process" for that of a single-event meeting. In such a process, a meeting would be held at an early stage in order to define areas in which action was needed; projects in those areas would then be formulated by teams of specialists, country representatives and interested donor organizations. Concerning information on ongoing and planned activities, it was found that, except for some delays, reporting by United Nations organizations had generally taken place in a satisfactory manner. As for the collection of information on bilateral and domestic activities, it was noted that while most Governments had designated national focal points, the rate of response and the quality of information received left much to be desired. The Group discussed the initiative taken by UNEP to circulate a questionnaire to Member States and organizations requesting information on their projects and programmes in the area of new and renewable energy sources.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 5 December 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, adopted resolution 41/170 without vote.

Report of the Committee on the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 36/193 of 17 December 1981, 37/250 of 21 December 1982, 38/169 of 19 December 1983 and 39/173 of 17 December 1984,

Stressing that, while recent changes in the energy sector may have had a significant impact on the cost-effectiveness of some forms of new and renewable sources of energy, the importance of their continued development and efficient utilization is not diminished,

Taking into account the fact that new and renewable sources of energy constitute a significant share of world energy supplies, in particular in developing countries,

1. Takes note of the report of the Committee on the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy on its third session and endorses the resolutions and decision contained therein;

2. Reaffirms the significance and importance of the Nairobi Programme of Action for the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy as the basic framework for action by the international community and the United Nations system in that field;

3. Expresses concern at the slow rate of implementation of the Nairobi Programme of Action, and invites all Governments and the appropriate international financial institutions, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, and organs and bodies of the United Nations system to continue their support and intensify their efforts towards the accelerated and comprehensive implementation of the Nairobi Programme of Action, and, to this end, stresses the importance of increasing inter-agency co-ordination within the United Nations system as well as co-ordination of development activities for new and renewable sources of energy at all levels;

4. Recommends, in that regard, that the effective implementation of the proposals put forward by the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination be pursued and calls for the preparation of a set of updated or new proposals, within the framework of the Nairobi Programme of Action, for the consideration of the Committee on the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy at its fourth session, taking into account technological innovations as well as the conclusions and recommendations of technical panels and expert group meetings in that field, in order to help identify areas in which activities should be undertaken;

5. Endorses resolution 1(III) of the Committee on the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy, in which it decided to adopt a substance-oriented approach that would enable it, at each of its sessions, to give depth to its deliberations by placing one or two specific themes on the agenda, within the scope of its mandate, and calls for the increasing participation of experts at future sessions of the Committee and a more effective exchange of information on technology and experience regarding the development of new and renewable sources of energy;

6. Reiterates the need to utilize fully existing channels, including the United Nations Trust Fund for New and Renewable Sources of Energy, and actively to pursue ways and means of mobilizing adequate additional financial resources, commensurate with the needs of developing countries in the field of new and renewable sources of energy, and, in this connection, inter alia, emphasizes the importance of positive measures for promoting investment in the development and utilization of new and renewable sources of energy in accordance with national laws, regulations, plans and priorities, and invites the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme to intensify its efforts to attract additional voluntary contributions to the Energy Account of the Programme to enable it to expand its activities in responding to the needs of the developing countries for the development and utilization of new and renewable sources of energy;

7. Invites the appropriate organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to provide assistance to developing countries, upon request and within the context of their national policies, in identifying specific and viable projects in the areas of their most pressing needs and in strengthening their national frameworks for new and renewable sources of energy;

8. Urges that greater attention be given to the development of new and renewable sources of energy for the rural sector and to their integration into the overall rural economy, bearing in mind the depletion of the fuelwood supply taking place in many regions of the world;

9. Invites the Committee on the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy, at its fourth session, to review its working methods so as to ensure further improvement in the fulfilment of its mandate;

10. Invites all the organizations of the United Nations system concerned to take the necessary steps to contribute effectively to the preparation, convening and follow-up of consultative meetings at the national, subregional, regional and global levels for the appraisal of projects and the mobilization of additional financial resources for the implementation of the Nairobi Programme of Action;

11. Also invites the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination, in particular its Inter-Agency Group on New and Renewable Sources of Energy, and the appropriate intergovernmental bodies of the United Nations to take into account in their future work the relevant content of paragraphs 218 to 223 of the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women.

General Assembly resolution 41/170

5 December 1986 Meeting 98 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/857/Add.3) without vote, 19 November (meeting 33); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/41/L.32), orally revised, based on informal consultations on draft by Yugoslavia, for Group of 77 (A/C.2/41/L.10); agenda item 79 (c) and (d).

Nuclear energy

Total installed nuclear power-generating capacity in the world increased by about 8.9 per cent during 1986, reaching 273.7 gigawatts by the end of the year. Nuclear power plants accounted for more than 15 per cent of the world's electricity generation in 1986, at the end of which there were 397 nuclear power plants in operation.

The most important event in 1986 in the nuclear power field was the accident at Chernobyl, Ukrainian SSR, on 26 April, which produced an upsurge in public and political opposition to nuclear power in many countries, but did not cause the cancellation of any nuclear power programmes. The delays in some nuclear power projects and the slowing down of some programmes might however be attributable, at least partly, to the accident. The only nuclear reactor permanently shut down during 1986 was the Chernobyl No. 4 unit.

During the year, 23 new plants came on line, while the construction of two reactors (in the United States) was cancelled and that of one (Philippines) suspended. There was no general upturn in the ordering of new plants or in construction starts. With regard to advanced nuclear systems, the highlight in 1986 was the grid connection of the 1200-megawatt Super Phenix fast breeder reactor in France.

Communications. In 1986, the Secretary-General received several communications relating to the accident at Chernobyl. The Prime Minister of Greece, by a letter of 8 May⁽¹⁾ said that the accident was an obvious manifestation of the risks of nuclear catastrophe threatening mankind. Four measures should be taken immediately: the freezing of nuclear tests; transparency of control of all reactors; continuous and automatic exchange of information on any development occurring in nuclear plants; and the cessation of construction of breeder reactors.

On 14 May⁽²⁾ the USSR transmitted a television address of the same date by the General Secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, stating that the accident at Chernobyl was a painful experience for the Soviet people and had caused anxiety to the world at large. After describing the extent of the accident and measures taken to limit its effects, he said the charge by certain countries—in particular the United States—that information on the accident was inadequate was contrived and a political campaign was constructed around it. Peaceful atomic energy was of substantial benefit to mankind and there was a need for serious enhancement of co-operation under IAEA: by setting up an international system for the safe development of nuclear power generation, based on close co-operation by all States engaged in the field; convening of an ad hoc international conference under IAEA auspices; enhancing IAEA's role and capacity; and involving the United Nations and some of its specialized agencies more closely in the efforts to secure safe development of peaceful nuclear operations.

A statement on the implications of the accident, issued on 5 May at the Tokyo Economic Summit of the heads of State of seven major industrial nations and the representatives of the European Community (EC) and forwarded by Japan on 21 May⁽³⁾ affirmed that nuclear power, properly managed, would continue to be an increasingly widely used source of energy, that each country had full responsibility for the safety of its nuclear installations and that the countries participating in the summit were meeting exacting standards in that regard. Each nation was responsible for promptly providing complete information on nuclear emergencies and accidents, in particular those with potential transboundary consequences. The USSR was urged to provide such information. Noting the USSR's willingness to discuss the accident with the IAEA Director General, the statement welcomed the work of IAEA in seeking to improve international co-operation on the safety of nuclear installations and urged the early elaboration of an international convention committing the parties to report and exchange information in the event of nuclear emergencies or accidents.

By a letter dated 22 September⁽⁴⁾ the United Kingdom transmitted a memorandum on behalf of EC which dealt with, among other things, nuclear safety. Welcoming the successful negotiation of international conventions on early notification and mutual assistance in the event of nuclear accidents, the memorandum stated that the Chernobyl nuclear disaster, which spread radioactivity throughout Eastern and Western Europe, demonstrated the need to provide all facts promptly and for greater East/West co-operation. The USSR was urged to give IAEA and other competent international bodies all necessary information on the disaster.

IAEA report

The IAEA report for 1985 was transmitted to the General Assembly by the Secretary-General in August 1986.⁽⁵⁾

Presenting and updating the report in the Assembly on 11 November, the IAEA Director General underlined trends and activities and reviewed events that had taken place in 1986. The Chernobyl accident had prompted new activities and developments in the field of nuclear safety and raised public questions concerning the role of nuclear power, as it interrupted some 4,000 power reactor years of experience without any fatal radiation accident or major environmental contamination, he stated. Shortly after the accident, he had been invited to the USSR to discuss actions which could be taken within IAEA to enable all to learn from the accident and consider national and international safety measures. Among those actions was the convening of a governmental expert group in July/August to draft two international conventions, on early notification of a nuclear accident and on assistance in the case of a nuclear accident or radiological emergency. The two consensus texts which emerged from the four-week meeting were adopted at a special session of the IAEA General Conference, convened in September for the sole purpose of considering measures to strengthen international co-operation in nuclear safety and radiological protection. The conventions had been signed by some 60 States and the one on early notification had entered into force on 27 October. The consensus reached at the special session was that nuclear power would continue to be an important source of energy for social and economic development; that each country was responsible for securing the highest level of safety; that there was scope for further international co-operation in nuclear safety; and that IAEA had a central role in encouraging and facilitating such co-operation.

At a post-accident review in Vienna in August, more than 500 nuclear experts from all over the world discussed a comprehensive report by USSR experts. Some 30 persons had died of radiation from the Chernobyl accident and a substantial area of land around the plant was made uninhabitable, perhaps for several years. The health effects of the radiation which spread to other European countries did not appear significant, although contamination of land, in particular animal grazing areas, was significant in some regions, as in parts of Scandinavia. Many of the lessons learned from the accident were specific to the type of reactor used in the USSR, though some had broader bearing. A consensus report summarizing the results of the expert meeting and adding recommendations for action and programmes to strengthen nuclear safety was prepared by an international expert group. As a result of that report, a considerably expanded IAEA nuclear safety programme for 1987 was approved by the Board of Governors in December.

To improve inter-agency co-ordination with regard to radiation protection, IAEA, together with WHO, WMO and the United Nations Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation, began planning for the systematic collection of data. Those organizations, as well as FAO, ILO and UNEP, met to discuss action needed for improving accident response capabilities and established an Inter-Agency Committee for the Co-ordinated Planning and Implementation of Response to Accidental Releases of Radioactive Substances.

Taking up the question of the risks of nuclear power, the IAEA Director General pointed out that the current quantity of electricity generated—be it by hydro, coal, oil, gas or nuclear power stations—could never be generated without risk. Nuclear power through fission was a reality people must continue to live with, as no new sources were around the corner for the large-scale additional electricity generation the world would need to help raise standards of living and promote development. The continued and expanded use of nuclear power was needed until some other technology could provide large quantities of electricity at reasonable cost. A variety of constraints worked against the nuclear power option in many countries, however, and for developing countries the high initial capital investment was just one of many hurdles. Following requests made at the August/September 1985 Third Review Conference of the Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons⁽⁶⁾ and the IAEA General Conference held in September of that year, a senior expert group was established to advise the Agency on mechanisms to assist developing countries in promoting and financing nuclear power programmes.

A number of mechanisms might be further developed and used more extensively to foster nuclear safety and public confidence in IAEA. Among such mechanisms were the operational safety review teams; under that programme, IAEA sent teams of some 12 to 15 international nuclear safety experts to review the operational safety of nuclear power plants at the request of national authorities, in contrast to safeguards inspections which verified that peaceful nuclear installations were not used for military purposes.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 11 November 1986, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/36 without vote.

Report of the International Atomic Energy Agency

The General Assembly,

Having received the report of the International Atomic Energy Agency to the General Assembly for the year 1985,

Taking note of the statement of the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency of 11 November 1986, which provides additional information on the main developments in the Agency's activities during 1986,

Recognizing the importance of the work of the Agency to promote further the application of atomic energy for peaceful purposes, as envisaged in its statute,

Also recognizing the special needs of the developing countries for technical assistance by the Agency in order to benefit effectively from the application of nuclear technology for peaceful purposes as well as from the contribution of nuclear energy to their economic development,

Conscious of the importance of the work of the Agency in the implementation of safeguards provisions of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and other international treaties, conventions and agreements designed to achieve similar objectives, as well as in ensuring, as far as it is able, that the assistance provided by the Agency or at its request or under its supervision or control is not used in such a way as to further any military purposes, as stated in article II of its statute,

Recognizing the importance of the work of the Agency on nuclear power, nuclear safety, radiological protection and radioactive waste management, including its work directed towards assisting developing countries in planning for the introduction of nuclear power in accordance with their needs,

Emphasizing the need for the highest standards of safety in the design and operation of nuclear plants so as to minimize risks to life and health,

Commending the International Atomic Energy Agency for its recent speedy responses and initiatives in the field of nuclear safety, in co-operation with its member States and with other international organizations concerned, and for its timely and expeditious efforts in the conclusion of the Convention on Early Notification of a Nuclear Accident and the Convention on Assistance in the Case of a Nuclear Accident or Radiological Emergency,

Bearing in mind resolutions GC(SPL.I)/RES/1 and GC(SPL.I)/RES/2 adopted on 26 September 1986 by the General Conference of the Agency at its first special session, and resolution GC(XXX)/RES/468 adopted on 3 October 1986 by the General Conference at its thirtieth regular session,

1. Takes note of the report of the International Atomic Energy Agency;

2. Affirms its confidence in the role of the International Atomic Energy Agency in the application of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes;

3. Urges all States to strive for effective and harmonious international co-operation in carrying out the work of the International Atomic Energy Agency, pursuant to its statute; in promoting the use of nuclear energy and the application of the necessary measures to strengthen further the safety of nuclear installations and to minimize risks to health; in strengthening technical assistance and co-operation for developing countries; and in ensuring the effectiveness and efficiency of the Agency's safeguards system;

4. Welcomes the signing by a significant number of States of the two Conventions regarding nuclear accidents referred to above and calls upon those States that have not yet done so to become parties to them as soon as possible;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit to the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency the records of the forty-first session of the General Assembly relating to the Agency's activities.

Preparations for the 1987 Conference on nuclear energy

Communications. In a joint declaration transmitted to the Secretary-General on 22 January 1986,⁽⁷⁾ Argentina and Brazil reiterated their commitment to develop nuclear energy solely for peaceful purposes and their intention to co-operate in all aspects of the peaceful use of energy. To promote their relations in that area, further their development of nuclear technology and establish mechanisms to safeguard peace and security in the region, they decided to establish a joint working group.

The Eighth Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries (Harare, Zimbabwe, 1-6 September), in its Economic Declaration,⁽⁸⁾ underscored the need to continue to co-ordinate efforts with a view to promoting the interests of non-aligned and other developing countries in international forums, including IAEA, and to working towards a successful United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy.

Preparatory Committee activities. Established by the General Assembly in 1980,⁽⁹⁾ the Preparatory Committee for the United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy held its seventh and last session in 1986 (Vienna, 10-21 November),⁽¹⁰⁾ with the Conference to follow in 1987. An inter-sessional intergovernmental working group of the Committee, which had been established in 1985 under the guidance of the Committee Chairman to decide on the programme of work, assess the situation regarding international co-operation in the peaceful uses of nuclear energy and formulate options for enhancing such co-operation,⁽¹¹⁾ held its last session in October 1986 and briefly reconvened on 10 November. The working group was not able to approve a report for submission to the Committee which, according to the Committee Chairman, reflected lack of agreement on how to treat the documentation submitted to the Committee rather than absence of progress in the working group's deliberations. The group had agreed, however, on a proposed outline of the output document of the Conference, had made progress on the topics to be discussed in Conference Committee II and had agreed on procedures for the work of that Committee.

The Preparatory Committee decided to establish an open-ended contact group to continue the remaining work of the working group. The contact group focused mainly on recommendations on ways to promote international co-operation in the peaceful uses of nuclear energy, and on topics for the work of Conference Committee II. A preliminary discussion on principles universally acceptable for international co-operation took place, following a presentation by the Group of 77 developing countries of a draft set of principles. Based on the contact group's deliberations and conclusions, the Preparatory Committee developed four working papers for consideration by the Conference, which contained recommendations on ways to promote international co-operation, a proposed outline of the Conference output document and procedures and topics for the work of the two main committees of the Conference.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

The General Assembly, on 11 December 1986, adopted two resolutions on the Conference. It adopted resolution 41/212 A without vote.

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the principles and provisions of its resolution 32/50 of 8 December 1977,

Recalling its subsequent resolutions 33/4 of 2 November 1978, 34/63 of 29 November 1979, 35/112 of 5 December 1980, 36/78 of 9 December 1981, 37/167 of 17 December 1982, 38/60 of 14 December 1983, 39/74 of 13 December 1984 and 40/95 of 12 December 1985,

Noting with satisfaction that the Preparatory Committee for the United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy has successfully concluded its work related to the preparations for the Conference,

Recalling that the United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy, to be held from 23 March to 10 April 1987 at Geneva, represents a global effort under the auspices of the United Nations specifically for the purpose of promoting international co-operation in this field for economic and social development,

1. Takes note of the report of the Preparatory Committee for the United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy on its seventh and final session;

2. Expresses its appreciation to the Chairman and the members of the Preparatory Committee for the time and effort devoted to the preparation for the Conference;

3. Invites all States to participate in the Conference at an appropriately high level;

4. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-second session the item entitled "United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy".

General Assembly resolution 41/212 A

11 December 1986 Meeting 101 Adopted without vote

Draft by Yugoslavia (A/41/L.42/Rev.1); agenda item 34.

The Assembly adopted resolution 41/212 B by recorded vote.

The General Assembly,

Aware of the intensification of international co-operation in the peaceful uses of nuclear energy in order to ensure safer development of nuclear energy for the future,

Bearing in mind that the need to improve the safety of nuclear energy and the need for intensified international co-operation are in the forefront of public opinion,

Aware of the central role that the International Atomic Energy Agency is being given in this context,

Realizing that effects and consequences of possible nuclear accidents are of equal concern to all States, including those which may not be carrying out any nuclear activity on their territory,

Bearing in mind its resolution 41/36 of 11 November 1986 on the report of the International Atomic Energy Agency,

Convinced that it is in the interest of the international community that safety aspects be considered whenever nuclear energy is being discussed,

1. Appeals to all Governments to ensure that the highest standards of safety in the design and operation of nuclear plants are applied in order to minimize risks to life and health;

2. Further appeals to all Governments to take into account, when discussing nuclear energy matters during the United Nations Conference for the Promotion of International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy, the legitimate interests of neighbouring countries that could be affected by transboundary effects of the use of nuclear energy.

General Assembly resolution 41/212 B

11 December 1986 Meeting 101 119-0-28 (recorded vote)

Draft by Austria (A/41/L.47); agenda item 34.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Canada, Cape Verde, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Costa Rica, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Ethiopia, Fiji, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran, Ireland, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritius, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Algeria, Australia, Belgium, Benin, Brazil, Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Central African Republic, Chad, Congo, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Finland, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Guatemala, Iceland, Israel, Italy, Japan, Mauritania, Mexico, Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States.

Australia said it abstained because it considered a separate resolution on nuclear safety to be unnecessary and inappropriate. In the view of the United Kingdom, the text was contentious and drafted in general terms that could lead to misunderstandings about the future of nuclear energy; while the text acknowledged the central role of IAEA, the singling out of nuclear safety in the context of the forthcoming conference was unbalanced, detracting from IAEA's consideration of the subject and overlooking more important issues on the Conference agenda. Belgium felt that the resolution not only seemed to prejudge selectively the work of the Conference but also could, owing to excessively general terms which might give rise to confusion, cast doubt on the safety of the use of nuclear energy. A similar position was held by the Netherlands, which stressed that the text should have been of a purely procedural nature. France also would have preferred a single procedural resolution; questions of safety had been amply taken into account in the list of technical terms proposed for discussion in Conference Committee II. The Federal Republic of Germany held the view that IAEA was the appropriate forum for discussion of the issues addressed in the text, which itself recognized in the preamble the Agency's central role in that regard. Mexico felt that resolution was submitted for reasons not in accordance with the goals set by the Assembly nine years earlier⁽¹²⁾ In Algeria's opinion submission of a separate text tended to undermine the consensus that previous resolutions on the subject had enjoyed.

Norway explained that its positive vote reflected its emphasis on increased safety of nuclear installations and intensified international co-operation in that regard; it would, however, have preferred that only one procedural text had been put forward.

Introducing the draft resolution, Austria said it appeared essential that the international community face the risks and challenges arising from the use of nuclear power; problems in connection with nuclear safety must be dealt with through a common approach by the international community and must be taken into account whenever nuclear energy matters were being discussed. On the condition that the Assembly acted on its draft resolution, Austria agreed to withdraw an amendment⁽¹³⁾ to the text which became resolution 41/212 A; by that amendment, a preambular paragraph would have been included, emphasizing the need for the highest safety standards in design and operation of nuclear plants so as to minimize risks to life and health, and the need to take into account the interests of States which could be affected by transboundary effects of the use of nuclear energy.

Chapter X

Food

During 1986, the World Food Programme (WFP)—a joint undertaking of the United Nations and the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO)—shipped more food than in any previous year, mainly due to shipments for ongoing and newly approved development projects. Pledges to WFP's regular resources reached an all-time high, over $1.1 billion for 1985-1986, while contributions to the International Emergency Food Reserve amounted to 592,100 tons of food, of which 564,900 tons were in cereals, for a total value of $124.4 million. The value of WFP emergency assistance in 1986 was 21 per cent lower than in 1985 as good rains over most of sub-Saharan Africa ended years of drought. However, as emergency food aid for drought victims fell, WFP's emergency aid to refugees, returnees and displaced persons rose to the highest level ever, almost four fifths of the total. The Committee on Food Aid Policies and Programmes (CFA), WFP's governing body, held two sessions in 1986 and approved 37 new projects at a total cost of some $557 million.

The World Food Council (WFC)—the highest-level international body dealing with food problems—meeting at Rome, Italy, in June, reviewed the global food and development situation. The Council observed that, although food supplies were ample following record production in many regions, performance had been uneven, with many developing countries experiencing a deterioration in their food situation.

In December, the General Assembly affirmed that increasing food production in developing countries would contribute significantly to eliminating poverty and malnutrition and to attaining self-reliance, and recommended that higher priority be given to food production in the national development policies of those countries and that the agricultural sector be granted a larger part of resources devoted to economic and social development (resolution 41/191).

Food problems

The world food situation in 1986 gave rise to both satisfaction and concern. Although global food supplies were ample following record production in many regions, food production performance was uneven with many developing countries experiencing a deterioration in their food situation.

Good rains over most of sub-Saharan Africa ended the years of drought, at least temporarily, for all but a few countries and emergency aid scaled down in most areas. WFP became engaged in a new role—managing large trucking operations in Ethiopia and the Sudan to keep food aid moving to those still in need. The greatest ongoing emergency situation concerned refugees, returnees and persons displaced by internal strife. Over three quarters of total WFP emergency food assistance approved in 1986 was channelled to refugees. The largest continuing refugee situations remained in Pakistan and Somalia where WFP co-ordinated all food supplies to the refugees and worked to ensure a smooth flow in the delivery of commodities.

In its eleventh annual report,⁽¹⁾ CFA stated that WFP would continue to encourage the linking of food aid with increased participation in consultative groups headed by the World Bank and round tables led by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). Above all, it would seek better integration of food aid into recipient countries' development plans and policies.

In the report on its twelfth session (Rome, 16-19 June),⁽²⁾ WFC stated that, according to several delegations, hunger and malnutrition were the results of diminishing effective demand in the developing countries, which was the consequence of the international financial and trade crisis and an inequitable international economic order. The economic and financial situation of many developing countries, domestic and regional conflicts and international tension contributed to the deterioration of the food situation in parts of the developing regions. In the view of several delegations, a policy of disarmament in the industrialized countries as well as in the developing countries could release financial resources that could be employed towards solving food problems.

By decision 1986/158 of 21 July 1986, the Economic and Social Council took note of the report of WFC on its twelfth session⁽³⁾ and the eleventh annual report of CFA.⁽¹⁾

WFC activities. The 36-member WFC held its twelfth ministerial session at Rome from 16 to 19 June 1986⁽²⁾ and reviewed the global food and development situation. Deliberations focused on urgent measures for Africa's recovery, the difficult food, economic and financial situation in Latin America and the Caribbean and the lessons to be learned from Asia's food efforts. The Council discussed current disorders in international trade in foods and adopted measures designed to strengthen its role as the political forum of the General Assembly for food and hunger issues.

WFC expressed satisfaction that global food supplies were ample. However, it was concerned that the food situation in many developing countries had deteriorated, resulting in hunger and malnutrition, and attributed the decline to the international financial and trade crisis and to an inequitable international economic order. The Council also considered that, although the solution of food and development problems was primarily the responsibility of each country, national food objectives could not be achieved without the support of increased international solidarity and co-operation.

The Council noted that the food situation in Africa had improved during the preceding year but that millions of African people still needed emergency aid. Early warning and information systems should be promoted and international co-operation and solidarity were required to solve the problem and its causes.

WFC welcomed the adoption by the General Assembly, at its May/June 1986 special session on the critical economic situation in Africa, of the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990 (see p. 446), and stated that it would promote measures to translate the Programme into specific action and assist the Secretary-General and the Assembly in progress reviews. For its consideration of the food crisis facing Africa, the Council had before it a report by the WFC Executive Director on the imperative of food-centred development in Africa's programme for recovery⁽³⁾ and the summary report and conclusions of a workshop on statistics in support of African food strategies and policies (Brussels, Belgium, 13-16 May)⁽⁴⁾.

The Council endorsed the recommendations of three regional consultations held during the first half of 1986 to discuss strengthening regional and interregional co-operation. A ministerial colloquium on regional co-operation and food strategies in Africa (Dakar, Senegal, 30 January-1 February)⁽⁵⁾ identified areas for technical co-operation where significant immediate progress was feasible. It recommended that efforts to expand economic and trade co-operation focus initially on two areas: the harmonization of food and agricultural policies, especially price policies and the protection of regional markets; and the development of preferential mechanisms to increase intra-Africa trade in agricultural products and related inputs.

At the ministerial consultation on food policies and strategies in Latin America and the Caribbean (Buenos Aires, Argentina, 1-3 April)⁽⁶⁾ ways of encouraging regional co-operation in food trade and food security were explored, such as the initiative of the Presidents of Argentina and Uruguay for a regional treaty for assistance in emergency food situations. The Ministers emphasized their countries' efforts to protect the food and nutrition levels of low-income people during the difficult period of economic adjustment, and requested WFC to bring the critical problems affecting the agricultural economies of the region to the attention of the industrialized countries and international financial and credit organizations. WFC was also requested to point out the destructive effects of unfair and protectionist trade practices employed by developed countries on the production systems of the developing countries, and the need for the former to introduce adjustments in their agricultural policies.

A two-part workshop on exchange of experience between African and Asian food policy makers (New Delhi, India, 5-10 May, and Guangzhou, China, 12-17 May)⁽⁷⁾ demonstrated the potential for South-South co-operation in support of African food and development objectives. The workshop called on the donor community to facilitate, with financial support, co-operation between Africa and other developing regions.

For a survey of problems affecting the international agricultural commodity markets, the Council had before it a report by the WFC Executive Director on problems of stability and security in international food trade⁽⁸⁾. It noted with concern that the agricultural trade situation, marked by structural surpluses, growing protectionism, heavy subsidies and distortions in the use of resources, was not in the interest of developed or developing countries. The Council requested that the possibility of continuing discussions on the subject be examined by the different parties concerned, in particular with regard to the relationship between problems of trade and agricultural development.

For its discussion of practical measures to strengthen the role of WFC, the Ministers considered the recommendations and suggestions for the future put forward by an advisory group which met on 14 February 1986⁽⁹⁾. They agreed that WFC should continue to be a political catalyst and a forum for discussing policy ideas and proposals. It was recognized that the Council should not have an operational role but should continue to stimulate action, and every effort should be made to strengthen it through improvements in its organization, programmes and work methods.

With regard to its future work programme, the Council agreed that, in support of the African economic recovery and development Programme 1986-1990 and the efforts of countries in other regions to meet their food objectives, it would promote national and regional food strategies and intensify its efforts to mobilize political and financial support for the Programme's food and agriculture component. Since the recommendations of the Council's recently concluded regional meetings suggested specific areas for further action, the WFC secretariat was requested to investigate prospects for regional and South-South co-operation. The secretariat was also requested to report on the adequacy of ongoing activities regarding the consequences of economic adjustment measures for the food and nutrition levels of low-income groups, to suggest areas where WFC initiative might be of benefit, and to follow studies undertaken by the United Nations Centre and the Commission on Transnational Corporations and other bodies on the activities of transnational corporations in the food sector.

Communication. On 13 October,⁽¹⁰⁾ Australia transmitted to the Secretary-General the final document of the meeting of the Group of 14 Fair Trading Countries in Agriculture (Cairns, 25-27 August 1986). The Ministers of those countries (Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Fiji, Hungary, Indonesia, Malaysia, Philippines, New Zealand, Thailand, Uruguay) met to consider the crisis in world agricultural trade and to identify areas of co-operation and common strategies to bring about lasting solutions. They agreed that there was an urgent need to reform and liberalize agricultural trade to improve the economic prospects of all participating countries.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/191 without vote.

Food and agricultural problems

The General Assembly,

Recalling the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order, contained in its resolutions 3201(S-VI) and 3202(S-VI) of 1 May 1974, the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, contained in its resolution 3281(XXIX) of 12 December 1974, resolution 3362(S-VII) of 16 September 1975 on development and international economic co-operation, and the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, contained in the annex to its resolution 35/56 of 5 December 1980,

Reaffirming the Universal Declaration on the Eradication of Hunger and Malnutrition adopted by the World Food Conference,

Stressing the imperative need to keep food and agricultural issues at the centre of global attention,

Reaffirming that food and agricultural problems in developing countries should be considered in a comprehensive manner in their different dimensions and in their immediate, short-term and long-term perspectives,

Reaffirming also the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990, in which the African countries and the international community committed themselves, inter alia, to give priority attention and increased resources to the rehabilitation and development of food and agriculture in Africa,

Noting with concern that the present agricultural trade situation, marked by structural imbalances, protectionism, heavy direct and indirect subsidies and distortions in the use of resources, is detrimental to all countries, in particular the developing countries,

Noting the views expressed during its forty-first session on the issues of international agricultural trade,

Emphasizing the important role that a reliable and increasing supply of agricultural inputs and manpower development could play in enabling food-deficit developing countries, in particular the least developed countries, to increase domestic food production and thereby stimulate national economic growth and social progress in those countries, especially in Africa,

Reaffirming that the right to food is a universal human right which should be guaranteed to all people and, in that context, believing in the general principle that food should not be used as an instrument of political pressure, either at the national or at the international level,

Recalling Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/44 of 21 July 1986, entitled "Countries stricken by desertification and drought in Africa",

Reaffirming also that the maintenance of peace and security and the strengthening of international co-operation in food and agriculture are important for improved economic conditions and enhanced food security,

Welcoming the support given by the international donor community to agricultural development in developing countries, and the efforts of these countries in their food and agricultural developments,

Recognizing the positive efforts of developing countries to intensify regional and interregional co-operation to increase their food and agricultural production through such measures as the harmonization of pricing policies, the creation of preferential trade mechanisms and the accelerated promotion of regional and subregional food strategies,

1. Welcomes the conclusions and recommendations, as adopted, contained in the report of the World Food Council on the work of its twelfth ministerial session, held at Rome from 16 to 19 June 1986;

2. Affirms that increasing food production in developing countries will contribute significantly to the elimination of poverty and malnutrition and to the attainment of self-reliance, and recommends that higher priority be given to food production in the national development policies of those countries and that the agricultural sector be granted a larger part of resources devoted to economic and social development;

3. Stresses the need to continue and to intensify the support for programmes and policies for increasing food and agricultural production and raising nutritional standards in developing countries, in particular in Africa and the least developed countries, and in this context urges the international community, in particular the developed countries, to take further determined action, in support of the efforts of developing countries, to increase the flow of resources, in particular the concessional flow, by, inter alia, increasing their contributions to multilateral organizations;

4. Emphasizes, in this context, the particular need to increase the aid commitments to food and agriculture and for such assistance to be channelled through existing organizations and programmes;

5. Emphasizes also that the success of efforts of developing countries to solve their food and agricultural problems in immediate, medium-term and long-term perspectives depends overwhelmingly on their economic growth, which, in turn, requires an international climate favourable to development, and calls for further concrete international action towards that end;

6. Urges all Governments, organizations of the United Nations system and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to take effective action for the rapid and full implementation of the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990, in which the international community recognized that the African countries needed additional external resources and in that context committed itself to making every effort to provide sufficient resources to support and supplement the efforts of the African countries in achieving the growth and development of the food and agricultural sector through the promotion of national and regional food strategies, particularly taking into account the role that improvement in that sector could play in Africa's overall development and noting in this regard the four-point programme of action endorsed in September 1986 by the Fourteenth Regional Conference for Africa of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations;

7. Stresses the urgent need to provide the International Development Association with adequate financial resources for its eighth general replenishment in order to meet the increasing demand for assistance from that source, especially for the development of food and agriculture;

8. Appeals to the international community to contribute generously to the achievement of the target for World Food Programme pledges for the period 1987-1988, as set out in General Assembly resolution 40/176 of 17 December 1985, and urges the international community to fulfil the unmet food aid needs of the African countries affected by drought and famine;

9. Urges the international community to give its full and enduring support to the International Fund for Agricultural Development by providing it with a firm financial basis and, in this context, appeals for increased contributions for the implementation of the Special Programme for Sub-Saharan African Countries Affected by Drought and Desertification of the Fund;

10. Appeals to donor countries to increase, within and consistent with their development assistance programmes, the provision of essential agricultural inputs;

11. Welcomes the commitments agreed upon at the special ministerial session of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade held at Punta del Este, Uruguay, from 15 to 20 September 1986, on standstill and roll-back, also applicable to agricultural trade, and recognizes that the new round of multilateral trade negotiations, taking into account all the general principles governing those negotiations, including the principle of differential and more favourable treatment, embodied in part IV of the General Agreement, as well as other relevant provisions thereof, will address agricultural trade issues with the aim of achieving greater liberalization of trade in agriculture as well as in tropical products;

12. Recognizes that further consideration of the problems which impede liberalization of international agricultural trade is necessary, and requests the Secretary-General to keep these problems under review, to report orally to the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session of 1987 and to make available to the General Assembly at its forty-second session, through the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session of 1987, the relevant reports prepared by various competent organs, organizations and bodies within the United Nations system;

13. Stresses the importance of competent international organizations and agencies according high priority to human resources development with a focus on professional training in agricultural production and research and rural development, especially at the farm level;

14. Emphasizes the urgency of strengthening international co-operation in the field of transfer of agricultural technologies to developing countries and of enhancing research so as to allow constant innovation and technological improvement adaptable to climate, soil and agricultural systems, strengthening advisory services and increasing support in this regard to facilitate free exchange of information on experience and technology relating to food production, processing and storage;

15. Encourages efforts to increase productivity of small farmers and to optimize employment possibilities in rural areas through adoption, where appropriate, of labour-intensive technologies;

16. Stresses the need for promoting co-ordinated international action to tackle the longer-term problems of migratory pest control, particularly in Africa, and calls upon donors to continue to give high priority to the implementation and co-ordination by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations of emergency control programmes against grasshoppers and locusts at present affecting vast areas of Africa, and to remain prepared to provide assistance to affected countries at short notice, as necessary;

17. Supports the establishment of effective early-warning systems and national, subregional and regional food security arrangements in developing countries to combat future food emergencies;

18. Urges Governments to ensure and enhance the participation of women in the formulation and implementation of national food policies, plans and projects, in view of the importance accorded to food and the acknowledged role of women farmers in food production, marketing and family nutrition and in view of the consensus achieved on the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women;

19. Invites the World Food Council within its mandate:

(a) To assess the impact of economic adjustment policies in developing countries on the nutrition levels of low-income groups and to suggest, where necessary, remedial measures in this area, including ways to stimulate the provision of resources to alleviate the sufferings of these groups;

(b) To assess the impact of the present agricultural trade situation in all its aspects and to maintain an active interest in the progress and outcome of multilateral negotiations on agricultural trade issues;

(c) To assist in accelerating the promotion of regional and subregional food strategies by stimulating vigorous follow-up action with all parties concerned in order to implement the recommendations adopted at the regional and interregional consultations organized by the World Food Council in 1986;

(d) To stimulate progress in and contribute actively to the implementation of the food policy and programme components of the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990, particularly in increasing food production and reducing hunger, and to assist African Governments in implementing the mutually agreed food-sector priorities through concrete and accelerated assistance in support of food strategies and policies.

8 December 1986 Meeting 100 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/857/Add.2) without vote, 28 November (meeting 36); draft by Yugoslavia, for Group of 77 (A/C.2/41/L.11/Rev.1 & Rev.1/Corr.1), orally revised following informal consultations; agenda item 79 (b). Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 2nd Committee 19, 36; plenary 100.

Food aid

World Food Programme

In 1986, the World Food Programme continued to provide developing countries with food aid for development purposes and emergency relief.

CFA activities

At its twenty-first session, held at Rome from 26 May to 5 June 1986,⁽¹⁾ CFA—the WFP governing body—conducted its eleventh annual review of food aid policies and programmes. It also reviewed the WFP Executive Director's annual report covering 1985 activities⁽²⁾

CFA expressed satisfaction that 1986 commitments were expected to reach 1985 levels, reiterated its agreement with WFP's established priorities for allocating development assistance (least developed and low-income, food-deficit countries, while not excluding particularly poor people in other developing countries) and fully agreed with the continuing emphasis on sub-Saharan Africa. It welcomed the improved co-ordination of WFP food aid with other forms of development assistance, and encouraged the Executive Director to continue WFP participation in consultative group meetings led by the World Bank and round tables organized by UNDP in order to improve integration of food aid into national development programmes. The Committee requested the secretariat to continue efforts to increase the participation of women in such programmes, supported the Executive Director's plans to build up the training programme for WFP and recipient government counterpart staff, and supported triangular transactions. It invited WFP to renew efforts to increase the share of developing countries' vessels in transporting commodities. It was hoped that WFP would investigate ways to recover the $2 million in demurrage costs outstanding at the end of 1985.

CFA agreed that reviews and legislation of food aid policies and programmes in some major donor countries and organizations in 1985, together with the African crisis, had underlined five basic concerns in food aid: the need to understand the different ways in which food aid could be used in support of development policies, programmes and projects; the need to make it more flexible; the need to co-ordinate it with other forms of development assistance; the need to find ways to improve its effectiveness in times of emergency; and the need to assess its comparative cost and effectiveness in promoting development. The Committee urged recipient and donor countries and organizations to provide WFP with information on food aid. It agreed that there was need for a computerized, international data-sharing system to provide a better flow of information on food aid and logistical matters, to improve co-ordination and to permit a more detailed statement on world food aid to be produced. It requested WFP to establish such a system in consultation with beneficiary countries and donors.

The Committee approved 17 projects at a total cost of $258.5 million, in addition to five budget increases for approved projects, making a combined total of $276 million (equivalent to about 811,000 tons of food).

At its twenty-second session at Rome from 20 to 31 October⁽³⁾ CFA evaluated emergency operations and focused on lessons learned from the African food crisis. It stressed the importance of timely collection, co-ordination and assessment of information, greater recourse to local purchase and triangular transactions, the necessity for better contingency planning and the strengthening of emergency preparedness structures, and the need to link emergency assistance with rehabilitation and development. Cash and other non-food inputs were needed for an effective emergency response.

The Committee approved 20 projects, at a total cost of $298.7 million, and eight budget increases for approved projects. The combined value amounted to $309 million, equivalent to about 700,000 tons of food.

In addition, the Committee was informed that between 1 January and 30 June 1986, the Executive Director had approved six projects of up to $1.5 million each in food value at a total cost to WFP of $8.7 million.

WFP activities

By the end of 1986,⁽⁴⁾ WFP had shipped more food in one year than ever before. Shipments rose to over 2.2 million tons, on the strength of a more than 20 per cent jump in WFP commodities dispatched to development projects. Pledges to WFP's resources also reached an all-time high of over $1.1 billion for the 1985-1986 biennium. During 1986, WFP committed $629 million to development projects, representing 1.8 million tons of food, and $182.6 million to provide 550,967 tons of food to emergency operations.

With ample rain and good harvests in most African countries, WFP purchases of food from the region rose sharply in 1986, contributing to record purchases of 567,000 tons valued at $91 million. Of that amount, nearly 72 per cent, worth $65 million, was bought in developing countries.

With a reduced staff, and working in close liaison with the United Nations Office for Emergency Operations in Africa, the WFP Africa Task Force secretariat concentrated its special logistic-support activities on the remaining most seriously affected countries—Angola, Ethiopia, Mozambique and the Sudan. With the emergency over for most African countries, WFP continued to pursue its support for African development, primarily in rural areas. Development activities, amounting to some $1.4 billion, focused on forestry and soil conservation, the environment, desertification control, price stabilization and market restructuring, small-scale irrigation, rural road construction and human resource development. WFP worked in close collaboration with other agencies to support the objectives of the African Priority Programme for Economic Recovery and participated fully in the deliberations of the Steering Committee set up by the United Nations Secretary-General to co-ordinate the system's support for the Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990 (see p. 446).

Development assistance

In 1986, WFP's commitments to development projects amounted to $629 million, representing 1.8 million tons of food. Of the total, $541 million (86 per cent) financed 48 new projects, of which 37 (valued at $524 million) were approved by CFA and 11 (valued at $16 million) by the Executive Director under his delegated authority. Of the food committed, 84 per cent went to low-income, food-deficit countries; in value terms, the share of commitments for the poorest countries was 78 per cent. The share of WFP development assistance committed to the least developed countries was some 56 per cent, although their total population accounted for only about 10 per cent of the developing country populations served by WFP.

By region, Africa south of the Sahara received the highest share of commitments ($241 million or 38 per cent of the total), followed by Asia and the Pacific ($163 million or 24 per cent), North Africa and the Near East ($116 million or 20 per cent) and Latin America and the Caribbean ($110 million or 17 per cent).

In 1986, $510 million went to agricultural and rural development projects, focusing on forestry and agricultural development and settlement. Human resource development commitments amounted to $119 million, with assistance to mother and child health programmes receiving the largest share (9 per cent). Commitments to food reserves received their largest share ever of development resources (8 per cent) with the approval of a project in Madagascar involving regulatory grain stocks for agricultural sector adjustment operations.

Emergency operations

During 1986, WFP committed $182.57 million—including $146.4 million drawn from the International Emergency Food Reserve (IEFR)—to provide 550,967 tons of food to 50 new emergency operations in 24 countries. In dollar terms, the value of WFP emergency assistance was 21 per cent lower in 1986 than in 1985, and about 184,688 tons less food was provided. The almost record harvests in 1985 in many parts of Africa (particularly the Sahel) and the subsequent overall good harvest in 1986 in almost all of Africa considerably reduced the need for emergency food aid.

Although, at 50, the number of emergency operations was five less than in 1985, the number of beneficiaries remained constant at about 11 million because of the larger number of beneficiaries in the 1986 refugee operations (6.1 million compared with 4.3 million the year before).

Of the year's total emergency assistance, 46 per cent (in dollar terms) went for 24 operations in sub-Saharan Africa, 41 per cent for 14 operations in Asia, 8 per cent for eight operations in Latin America and the Caribbean and 5 per cent for four operations in North Africa and the Near East. Over three quarters of total WFP emergency food assistance approved in 1986 (428,523 tons) was channelled to refugees, returnees and persons displaced by internal strife. Of the 6.1 million beneficiaries in this category, the vast majority were refugees. WFP co-ordinated the bilateral and multilateral food aid distribution to refugees in Pakistan and Somalia and the displaced persons along the Thai-Kampuchean border (see also Chapter XX of this section).

Throughout 1986 considerable attention was given to ensuring speedy delivery of emergency supplies. In May, the speed of WFP's emergency response was tested by the urgent need for food when cyclone Namu, the worst storm in 15 years, struck Solomon Islands. The Government's request for assistance was approved in one day, and three days later the first 21 tons of WFP food aid reached the islands. Transport and logistics units, set up by WFP during the peak of the crisis in sub-Saharan Africa in 1985, functioned continuously throughout 1986 and were responsible for the transport of 520,600 tons of food for distribution to beneficiaries under WFP emergency operations and under government, bilateral and private agency programmes.

Throughout 1986, WFP, with the assistance of the FAO Global Information and Early Warning System, continued to monitor the food crisis in sub-Saharan Africa, adjusting its response to meet the changing needs as the food-supply situation gradually improved. By the end of the year, total special contributions from donors in support of the WFP food aid logistic and co-ordination response to the African food crisis reached about $25 million. WFP road-transport operations in Ethiopia and the Sudan contributed substantially to the delivery of relief assistance to the affected populations of those countries.

WFP resources

Total net WFP commitments in 1986, for development projects, emergency operations and administrative costs, were $823 million. Total expenditures amounted to $664 million.

Pledges and contributions

During 1986, combined total resources contributed or pledged to WFP through regular resources or under the 1980 Food Aid Convention⁽⁵⁾ or IEFR reached $1,480.4 million, including some 4.2 million tons of food. By 31 December 1986, 100 countries had pledged $1,117.7 million, amounting to 83 per cent of the target for regular pledges for the 1985-1986 biennium, set at $1.35 billion.

For the fifth time since its inception, IEFR's target of 500,000 tons of cereals was exceeded in 1986. By 31 December, announced contributions amounted to 592,100 tons of food, of which 564,900 tons were in cereals, for a total value of approximately $124.4 million. Of the total 1986 contributions, 96 per cent were channelled multilaterally through WFP. Seventeen donors, including three developing countries, contributed to IEFR in 1986.

At the twelfth WFP pledging conference, held in New York on 4 March 1986,⁽⁶⁾ pledges announced by 49 donors for WFP's regular resources for the biennium 1987-1988 amounted to $305 million, representing 22 per cent of the target of $1.4 billion for that period. Of the total pledges announced, the equivalent of $213 million was made in kind and $92 million in cash.

1986 Food Aid Convention

On 1 May, the Food Aid Convention, 1986, which, together with the Wheat Trade Convention, 1986, constituted the International Wheat Agreement, 1986, was opened for signature in New York. The Convention, concluded at the headquarters of the International Wheat Council, London, on 13 March, entered into force on 1 July 1986. By that date seven nations had become party to the Convention.⁽⁷⁾

Chapter XI

Science and technology

Science and technology, as a key instrument to enhance developing countries' development and strengthen their capabilities, continued to be an important issue for many United Nations bodies in 1986. Financial constraints and lack of resources, however, tended to lessen the enthusiasm that had grown from the 1979 Vienna Programme of Action on Science and Technology for Development,⁽¹⁾ with its purpose of supplying third world countries with tools to handle their problems. Following a pledging conference in April 1986 which failed to procure the minimum funds needed, the General Assembly, in resolution 41/183, terminated the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development and transferred its responsibilities and resources to a trust fund to be established within the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). The United Nations Centre for Science and Technology for Development continued to analyse and make policy recommendations for national and international action.

Consultations on an international code of conduct on the transfer of technology continued. The Assembly invited the President of the United Nations Conference on an International Code of Conduct on the Transfer of Technology and the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) to resolve the outstanding issues in the code (resolution 41/166). Transfer of technology continued to be a focus of operational activities of UNCTAD and the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO).

In his report on the work of the Organization (see p. 3), the Secretary-General stated that the continuing technological revolution had brought change to almost all aspects of human existence and provided hope that essential global development could be achieved. It also raised the question, however, of whether the international community had the ability to manage safely and to common advantage the inventions of the human mind. In that respect, the United Nations needed to pursue three broad objectives: to assist in bringing new technologies to all countries where they could be of use in promoting development; to encourage the widest possible co-operation in dealing with the dangers as well as the advantages inherent in technological advances; and to provide the multilateral structure for the management of possible adverse consequences of new technologies which might affect the international community as a whole. There had been promising multilateral achievements in each of those areas and they should be pursued and expanded.

Specific issues pertaining to human resources mobilization were examined by an Ad Hoc Group of Experts on Mobilization of Human Resources for Scientific and Technological Development in Developing Countries. The Secretary-General addressed human and financial resources in a report to the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development, whose Advisory Committee focused on mobilization of resources, among other issues.

Implementation of the Vienna Programme of ActionStrengthening the capabilities of developing countries

In a March 1986 report to the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development,⁽¹⁾ the Secretary-General discussed the mobilization of resources for science and technology for developing countries (see also p. 599), asserting that the mismatch between human and financial resources constituted a major impediment to a coherent strategy of technical development. Resource mobilization required a direct, explicit and strategic approach, if developing countries were to achieve endogenous scientific and technological development. The Secretary-General set out some specific proposals on the range of policy instruments designed to augment financial resources and to train and deploy skilled human resources more effectively towards such development, concluding that each country needed a set of policies designed to optimize the use of its resource endowments in their local context, as part of a coherent strategy of scientific and technological development.

Mechanisms for mobilizing human resources, he said, should include, at the national level, country-wide inventories of high-level scientific and technological personnel and pooling of human resources, i.e., for task forces of individuals from various institutions and sectors for government-selected and -supported priority activities, and an incentive and support system for scientists. Entrepreneurship should be promoted to catalyse opportunities created by science and technology into development activities, and special campaigns should be launched to popularize science and technology. Institutional arrangements for effective mobilization included the creation of linkages among universities, research and development institutes, government departments and the productive sector, so that scientific and technological activities of a country would respond to local needs. Financial institutions such as national research development corporations should be established to serve as a link between research and development and industry, and as a conduit for risk capital, and the United Nations Financing System (see p. 599), the only funding organization within the United Nations with the mandate to concentrate exclusively on science and technology, should be strengthened.

The Working Group on Building Endogenous Capacities in Science and Technology, established in 1985 by the Task Force on Science and Technology for Development of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC), held its second session at Geneva on 27 and 28 January 1986. Mandated to formulate terms of reference for policy-oriented studies on endogenous capacities, the Group set up a conceptual framework and broad guidelines for such studies (see also p. 603).

In a 6 June resolution⁽²⁾ on activities of the Centre for science and technology (see p. 603), the Intergovernmental Committee invited the Secretary-General to develop programmes to assist Member States so requesting in elaborating policies for creating and strengthening endogenous capacities in science and technology, in accordance with national development priorities. Programme implications of the 1985 Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women in the field of science and technology for development were dealt with in another Committee resolution of the same date (see p. 792).

Strengthening the capacities of African countries

Recognizing the important contribution that science and technology could make towards implementation of the priorities identified in the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990 (see p. 446), the Intergovernmental Committee, on 6 June,⁽³⁾ urged the international community and invited United Nations organizations and bodies concerned with science and technology to participate in the implementation of those priorities through specific programmes for strengthening the endogenous scientific and technological capacities of African countries. The international community was invited to improve its assistance to and co-operation with African countries in acquiring scientific and technological capabilities and the necessary resources. The Secretary-General was requested to report on progress achieved in that regard in his periodic reports on implementation of the Programme.

Technology and agricultural development

In an April 1986 report to the Intergovernmental Committee,⁽⁴⁾ the Secretary-General stressed the need for a reorientation of conceptual and practical approaches to agricultural policies and plans and for a more explicit focus on achieving food security in the sense of assured access to food at the household and individual level. Achievement of food security required an approach based on the recognition of the central role played by the small farmer/peasant in the food systems of developing countries and of the variation in agro-ecological conditions between different regions and zones. Central to the success of such food security policy was the development of technologies and technical knowledge which met the needs of the end-users and their dissemination by effective extension systems and services.

The Secretary-General said there was a need for a longer-term perspective in analysing food security problems, taking into account climate, population patterns, soil characteristics and other factors. Potential applications of new technologies for the benefit of small farmers must be explored, he said, with due consideration for possible negative implications. The flexibility and adaptability of new technologies to local conditions made them particularly suitable for developing countries.

An Ad Hoc Panel of Specialists on Science, Technology and Food Security (Harare, Zimbabwe, 7-13 January)⁽⁵⁾ made recommendations to the Committee on much the same lines as the Secretary-General, highlighting the need for new concepts for food security and stressing in that context the importance of neglected science and technology dimensions—a people's traditional knowledge and experience.

In order to develop a new perspective, a review of existing strategies and policies was recommended, and the Panel suggested the adoption and creative application of end-user approaches which took peasants and small farmers as the starting-point of the planning process. In developing those approaches, new and interdisciplinary scientific and research initiatives would be needed, along with the development of a widespread network to collect localized and seasonal data. The Panel suggested the concept of a "mixed food basket" strategy, which would encourage a mix of basic staple foods, taking into account crop structures, food requirements and habits of different countries and cultures.

Taking note of both reports, as well as that of a 1985 international workshop on the subject, the Intergovernmental Committee, on 6 June 1986,⁽⁶⁾ invited all countries, in defining their priorities and plans of national science and technology policies, to take due account of their agricultural policy objectives, and invited industrialized countries to dovetail their research and development efforts in agriculture and related fields, including joint research with developing countries. It recommended that, in order to increase developing countries' endogenous capacities and improve scientific and technological co-operation, bilateral and multilateral donors support them in science and technology in agriculture and related fields, and that United Nations organizations and bodies ensure co-ordinated support.

Technology in the context of agricultural development was also discussed by the Advisory Committee on Science and Technology for Development (see p. 602), with a focus on science, technology and food security, and application of science and technology for monitoring and combating drought and desertification.

End-of-decade review

In a March 1986 note⁽⁷⁾ to the Intergovernmental Committee, the Executive Director of the Centre for Science and Technology for Development suggested that the Committee devote its entire 1989 session to the end-of-decade review of the implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action. Outlining the steps for the review process, he suggested that it should include discussions with Governments and national and international organizations, and elicitation of views and experiences of professional non-governmental institutions. He proposed a methodology based on the results of the 1985 mid-decade review,⁽⁸⁾ and on consultations with the Advisory Committee and the ACC Task Force. Accordingly, the review would focus on the three main elements of the Programme of Action, i.e., strengthening the endogenous scientific and technological capacities of developing countries; restructuring the existing pattern of international scientific and technological relations; and strengthening the United Nations system's role in science and technology, as well as provision of increased financial resources.

The review process should: help mobilize national and international opinion in favour of science and technology for development; facilitate stimulation of national activities and identification of future programme orientation; stimulate international co-operation; aim to identify the reasons why implementation of the Programme had fallen short of expectations; highlight efforts and trends which could influence developments in the coming decade; and reflect on conditions which could enhance international co-operation.

The Intergovernmental Committee endorsed the proposed methodology for the end-of-decade review on 6 June 1986.⁽²⁾

Proposed global information network

The ACC Task Force on Science and Technology for Development (see p. 603), at its January 1986 session, continued to study a proposal to establish a global network for scientific and technological information. To facilitate gradual establishment of such a network, it recommended that a working group be set up which would also study the feasibility of applying the approach of the existing International Referral System for Sources of Environmental Information (INFOTERRA) of the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) (see p. 653).

The question of setting up a global network on science and technology had been examined in previous years,⁽⁹⁾ following a 1983 decision of the Intergovernmental Committee.⁽¹⁰⁾ The Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions (Programme Matters) (CCSQ(PROG)), at its April 1986 session,⁽¹¹⁾ decided that it would not currently be advisable to establish new machinery; it requested the Task Force to consider alternative arrangements, including the possibility of convening informal working groups during Task Force sessions. In October,⁽¹²⁾ CCSQ(PROG) postponed a decision on the proposal to set up a working group.

In December,⁽¹³⁾ the Task Force stated that since the concept of a global information network could not be accomplished at that juncture, United Nations efforts should focus on assisting countries in building national information systems; however, the goal of establishing a comprehensive network, of which the national systems would be the foundation, remained. A global referral system did not appear feasible at that time (the extension of INFOTERRA would require about $1.3 million).

Unresolved issues

The United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development in 1979 had been unable to reach agreement on several issues in the draft Programme of Action;⁽¹⁴⁾ they were placed before the General Assembly which referred them to the Intergovernmental Committee.⁽¹⁵⁾ The issues were considered by the Committee but no decisions had so far been taken. The issues concerned scientific and technological information systems; technology transfer, acquisition and assessment; financial arrangements; and scientific and technological co-operation.

Several of the unresolved issues were related to or covered by issues under negotiation in the proposed codes of conduct on technology transfer (see p. 606) and on transnational corporations (TNCs) (see p. 525), as well as by issues being negotiated for a revision of the 1883 Paris Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property; the status of those negotiations in other United Nations forums was periodically reported to the Committee. Little progress had been made, however, the Secretary-General stated in a March 1986 note to the Committee; the code of conduct on TNCs was still under negotiation and consultations were continuing with regard to the revision of the Paris Convention. With regard to the code of conduct on technology transfer, the UNCTAD Secretary-General would be holding consultations with member States, the results of which would be reported to the 1986 Assembly session.

Noting with concern the continuing delay in the negotiations, the Intergovernmental Committee, on 6 June,⁽¹⁶⁾ requested the Secretary-General, through informal consultations with Member States, to identify and group the unresolved issues and report on them to the Committee.

The UNCTAD Committee on Transfer of Technology, in a 13 November resolution, dealt with several of those issues (see p. 605).

Human and financial resources for science and technology

Resource mobilization

As one of two substantive themes for its in-depth consideration in 1986, the Intergovernmental Committee had selected in 1984⁽¹⁾ the mobilization of resources for science and technology in developing countries.

In a March 1986 report to the Committee,⁽²⁾ the Secretary-General considered human and financial resources in a symbiotic manner, outlining policy alternatives and possible measures for mobilization in order to assist States in policy formulation. Recommendations included integration of science and technology as a major dimension in the national macro-economic framework, educational and vocational training programmes, and various mechanisms for mobilizing human resources.

The Ad Hoc Group of Experts on Mobilization of Human Resources for Scientific and Technological Development in Developing Countries (New York, 29-31 January)⁽³⁾ outlined the nature of participation of different sections of society in the mobilization process and some mechanisms to facilitate mobilization of human resources for the effective application of science and technology to development.

The Group concluded that most developing countries did not have adequate human resources in science and technology, and that participative co-operation of scientists, technologists, development policy formulators and decision makers was a prerequisite for human resources mobilization, as was the setting of scientific and technological priorities. Complementary capabilities needed for effective utilization of scientific and technological resources included science and technology planning and management; training of middle-level technicians, skilled labour, entrepreneurial, financial and marketing experts; and development of consultancy firms, design engineers and information personnel. The Group considered it essential to ensure the participation of all potential science and technology recipients and to increase public awareness and support; institutional arrangements should be made more responsive to demands.

A number of key factors emerged from the Advisory Committee's discussions at its February 1986 session (see p. 602). The ultimate limitation on a country's ability to deploy science and technology for its own development was usually the scarcity of trained people, while the process of resource mobilization would be strengthened if there were a dear national commitment to objectives understood by the general public, the Advisory Committee stated. To mobilize human resources, special attention should be paid to adequate management skills among those who direct science and technology programmes, to the promotion of entrepreneurship, and to encouraging scientists and technologists to keep up to date in their respective fields. The Committee stressed the urgent need for extra efforts to mobilize science and technology resources to tackle the problems of the poorest and least developed segments of the world's population.

UN Financing System

In the fifth year since its establishment in January 1982,⁽⁴⁾ the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development (UNFSSTD) did not maintain its level of operations as originally envisaged in 1979.⁽⁵⁾ Contributions declined to a point where they failed to meet the original expectations. At a pledging conference held in New York on 22 April 1986, $6,748,900 (including in-kind commitments) was pledged by 41 countries as well as the private sector. Pledges for core resources amounted to $2.4 million, of which 42 per cent was from 32 developing countries and the balance from four developed countries.

In order to maintain a viable level of operations, the General Assembly had determined in 1985⁽⁶⁾ that total resources in 1986 should be approximately $10 million, with a reasonable balance between core and non-core resources. The UNDP Administrator termed the result of the pledging conference less satisfactory than hoped, considering the enthusiasm with which Governments had originally launched the System. At the end of the year, the status of funds for the System showed an income of $1,532,606, while expenditures were $2,434,063.

A review of total resources available to UNFSSTD for 1986 was undertaken immediately following the pledging conference, in consultation with Governments. From the results of the conference and subsequent consultations, several points emerged, the Secretary-General stated in a May report to the Intergovernmental Committee.⁽⁷⁾ There was insufficient support from major donor countries to maintain a separate Financing System; developing countries continued to give priority to the operational programme on science and technology for development; and there was substantial interest among Governments and in the private sector in collaborating with the United Nations on science and technology projects. It was generally agreed that the fundamental objective of long-term viability for UNFSSTD had not been achieved, although all Governments attached great significance to science and technology as an important means of achieving development goals, both for individual countries and for the global economy. It was concluded, therefore, that there was a need to consider how best the United Nations could contribute to meeting the objectives established by the 1979 United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development.

Alternatives with regard to the future of UNFSSTD included essentially three options: to continue trying to raise additional core resources while at the same time maintaining the pledges made at the April conference; to terminate the System totally by the end of the year; or to bring it to an end, but to request the UNDP Administrator to consider setting up within UNDP an operational focus on science and technology for development. Taking into account the results of the pledging conference and Governments' comments, the preferred approach was in the Secretary-General's view the last option.

The Advisory Committee on Science and Technology for Development, at its February 1986 session, noted that UNFSSTD had never developed to the scale envisaged. Means should be found, it suggested, to preserve within the United Nations system the activity to finance science and technology for development.

The Intergovernmental Committee, on 6 June⁽⁸⁾ concluded that the course of action proposed by the Secretary-General was unavoidable if the United Nations system was to continue to provide an operational focus for multilateral activities in science and technology for development. The Committee recommended that the necessary steps, including a review of the arrangements made, be taken by the General Assembly to terminate the System as at 31 December and transfer its remaining resources and responsibilities to a facility to be established within UNDP; it further recommended that the Assembly make arrangements to ensure that the Intergovernmental Committee would provide policy guidance and priorities for the proposed facility. Resources should continue to be allocated on the basis of Assembly resolutions on financial arrangements for UNFSSTD.⁽⁹⁾ The Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation (DIEC) and the UNDP Administrator were requested to establish a close working relationship between the proposed facility and the Centre for science and technology. Governments and the international community were urged to provide resources for the new facility, and the UNDP Governing Council was invited to take early action on the new arrangements.

The Governing Council decided on 27 June 1986⁽¹⁰⁾ that the Administrator should, on the basis of the Committee's recommendations, establish a trust fund for science and technology for development with effect from 1 January 1987, with the administrative costs borne by the fund itself and not charged to UNDP's general resources. The Council invited Governments to transfer their pledges to the trust fund with effect from 1 January 1987 and urged the international community to provide resources. The Administrator was requested to report in 1987 on the resource situation and prospects, and on his proposals for the fund's organizational structure, staffing and 1988-1989 budget.

In an October 1986 note to the Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee⁽¹¹⁾ the Secretary-General described arrangements for the new fund, as proposed by the UNDP Administrator in consultation with the DIEC Director-General in the light of the decisions by the Intergovernmental Committee and the Governing Council.

The fund's main objectives were to finance activities intended to strengthen developing countries' scientific and technological capacities and promote international co-operation, in collaboration with other multilateral and bilateral programmes and non-governmental entities. The needs of the least developed countries would be given special priority. The fund would be a focal point for science and technology within UNDP and would serve to provide advice and technical inputs to other UNDP activities with science and technology components.

Approximately $9 million in operational resources—committed to projects which were to be completed in 1987—would be transferred from the Finance System on 31 December 1986; the amount of resources available for new projects in 1987 depended on the extent to which Governments and private organizations reaffirmed their pledges, the Secretary-General stated.

Operational activities

Since 1986 was a transitional year for UNFSSTD, emphasis was placed mainly on the consolidation of ongoing activities rather than on new initiatives.⁽¹²⁾ At the beginning of the year, some 41 projects with a total value of $40 million were under implementation; by the end of the year, a balance of 25 projects valued at approximately $12 million remained to be implemented. One third of the projects were designed to support research and development activities to improve technologies in the productive sector, 20 per cent were in science and technology policy, and 15 per cent represented computer-related activities providing technical information and support to information systems. The rest dealt with a variety of activities designed to strengthen internal science and technology capacities. Projects covered a number of sectors, although agriculture, industry and energy were the primary focus, followed by science education, health and mineral resources.

At the interregional level, the Technological Information Pilot System moved into its operational phase; it linked 10 developing countries through existing telecommunication techniques to exchange technology information. A project to strengthen the Computer Faculty at the Asian Institute of Technology at Bangkok, Thailand, and to improve training in computer skills became fully operational; another project geared to the application of computer technologies and involving intensive training in China and Norway was a computer-based management training programme for China, implemented by the Chinese Enterprise Management Association under the sponsorship of the State Science and Technology Commission.

Projects aimed at improving agriculture and fostering rural development included one developing new technologies and disseminating proven ones to rural communities in Indonesia, operated within the framework of the Indonesian Institute of Science. Assistance to the Senegalese Institute for Agricultural Research was financed from core resources and was the central information system for all agricultural research in the country. Two projects, in Madagascar and Yemen, specialized in oceanographic research.

Among activities designed to improve food production and increase productivity was the National Food Technology and Quality Control Research and Development Centre in China; short-term training in food technology and quality inspection, as well as research on soya bean derivatives, was under way.

A unique initiative launched by UNFSSTD was the regional non-destructive testing network in Latin America which attracted important follow-up funding by other multilateral and bilateral resources; as of the end of 1986, 5,000 technicians had been trained, i.e., one fourth of an estimated 20,000 involved in the network's activities in the region. The Latin American network was being linked with a similar Asian network.

One of the most cost-effective initiatives of the System was science and technology policy activities, such as those carried out on a national level in Ethiopia or, on an international level, through the series of Beijing International Conferences on Strategic Orientation of Technology for National Development, the second of which took place in April.

UNFSSTD continued to foster collaboration with the private sector; in addition to its traditional partners—such as universities, research institutes and professional associations—private corporations, many of them multinationals, offered in-kind contributions which were channelled through the Fund to interested developing countries. Another private sector initiative under implementation was the creation of an African International Consulting Consortium, bringing together selected African and non-African engineering firms to broaden the opportunities for consulting and improve African capabilities in that area.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/183 without vote.

United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 34/218 of 19 December 1979 on the United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development,

Affirming resolution 6(VIII) of 6 June 1986 of the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development and decision 86/38 of 27 June 1986 of the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme,

Taking note of the note by the Secretary-General on the termination of the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development and the transfer of its resources and responsibilities,

1. Decides to terminate the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development as at 31 December 1986 and to transfer its responsibilities and resources to an identifiable facility entitled "United Nations Fund for Science and Technology for Development", to be established as a trust fund within the United Nations Development Programme;

2. Requests the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development to provide policy guidance and priorities for activities of the Fund within the framework of the Vienna Programme of Action on Science and Technology for Development;

3. Requests the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme, when identifying projects to be financed from the Fund, to take into account the policy guidance and priorities recommended by the Committee and to report to the Committee on their application;

4. Requests the Director-General for Development and International Economic Co-operation and the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme to establish close working relationships between the Fund and the Centre for Science and Technology for Development on programmatic and substantive matters, and requests the Secretary-General to inform the Committee at its ninth session about the arrangements made;

5. Requests the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme to inform the Committee at its ninth session on the arrangements made for the Fund;

6. Invites Governments and the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme to give greater emphasis to science and technology for development;

7. Urges all Governments and the international community as a whole to provide the Fund with adequate financial resources to enable it to carry out its functions.

General Assembly resolution 41/183

8 December 1986 Meeting 100 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/530/Add.1) without vote, 12 November (meeting 28); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/41/L.50), based on informal consultations and orally revised; agenda item 12.

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 2nd Committee 19, 23-25, 27, 28; plenary 100.

Institutional arrangements

Intergovernmental Committee

The Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development convened for its eighth session in New York from 2 to 6 June 1986. It adopted seven resolutions on: measures for increasing its role and effectiveness, as well as for strengthening the role of the Centre for science and technology; activities of the Centre (see below); the United Nations Financing System for Science and Technology for Development (see p. 599); strengthening the endogenous scientific and technological capacities of African countries (see p. 597); science, technology and agriculture (see p. 597); unresolved issues (see p. 598); and programme implications of the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women in science and technology for development (see p. 792).

The Committee also considered the activities of its Advisory Committee (see below).

By decision 1986/164 of 21 July 1986, the Economic and Social Council took note of the Intergovernmental Committee's report.⁽¹⁾

Advisory Committee

The 28-member Advisory Committee on Science and Technology for Development, established to provide policy and planning advice to the Intergovernmental Committee, held its sixth session in New York from 3 to 12 February 1986.⁽²⁾ Apart from discussing general themes, including the designing of technology for a specific context, the implications of the world economic crisis for science and technology, and the role of the productive sector, the Advisory Committee focused on the mobilization of resources for science and technology, technology and agricultural development, management and integration of new and emerging technologies, and enhancement of innovative capabilities. It also suggested guidelines for a comprehensive review in 1989 of the implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action (see p. 598) and criteria for the selection of discussion themes by the Intergovernmental Committee.

By a 6 June decision,⁽³⁾ the Intergovernmental Committee decided to consider in 1987, in conjunction with the discussion of the substantive themes for its 1988 session, the Advisory Committee's guidelines for their selection.

Centre for science and technology

In 1986, the United Nations Centre for Science and Technology for Development, with no mandate for undertaking operational projects, continued to analyse and develop policy recommendations for national and international action and for the United Nations system.

In a March report,⁽⁴⁾ the Secretary-General described current and prospective activities of the Centre. Its role in assisting the Intergovernmental Committee, the Advisory Committee and its panels, and the ACC Task Force provided a unique opportunity to formulate a broad perspective on different aspects of science and technology consistent with the objectives of the Vienna Programme of Action and necessary in keeping with the intersectoral and interdisciplinary nature of many of the development problems. Based on the knowledge and experience gained by the Centre, the focus of its future activities could be directed towards endogenous capacity-building in science and technology policy analysis, particularly towards technology assessment, choice and adaptation involving new and traditional technologies; that would involve specific activities initiated in co-operation with United Nations organizations as well as with Member States. Internal and external publications should be used effectively to disseminate science and technology information.

Taking note of the Secretary-General's report, the Intergovernmental Committee, on 6 June,⁽⁵⁾ requested the Centre to strengthen its activities connected with the Advance Technology Alert System—an experimental programme established in 1984 to alert developing countries to the positive and negative implications of new technologies⁽⁶⁾—and to carry out, in co-operation with Member States, specific studies on the impact of advanced technologies on individual countries to assist them in formulating policy guidelines for promoting science and technology for development. The Committee urged the Centre to increase its collaboration with national agencies and institutions concerned with science and technology, in an effort to create and enhance endogenous national capacities for policy analysis and science and technology management. Member States were invited to support the Secretary-General in his efforts to stimulate interest in strengthening co-operation among all countries, in particular among developing ones, in programme implementation. The Committee endorsed the proposed methodology for the proposed end-of-decade review of implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action (see p. 598), and recommended that the Secretary-General take follow-up action on the conclusions concerning the substantive theme of information systems for science and technology and that he continue the consideration of setting up a referral system for science and technology within national information systems.

In another resolution of the same date,⁽⁷⁾ the Committee requested the Centre's Executive Director to prepare a draft biennial programme of work for 1988-1989, taking into account the activities of other United Nations organizations, and transmit it to Member States prior to the 1987 Committee session.

Co-ordination in the UN system

ACC Task Force

Established by ACC to promote closer co-operation among United Nations bodies, the Task Force on Science and Technology for Development held two sessions in 1986, its seventh at Geneva (29-31 January)⁽⁸⁾ and its eighth in New York (16-19 December).⁽⁹⁾ It discussed the implementation of joint activities, information systems, the cross-organizational programme analysis of United Nations activities in science and technology (see below), mobilization of resources, a methodology for the end-of-decade review of the implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action (see p. 598) and proposals regarding the building of endogenous capacities.

In January, the Task Force endorsed the terms of reference for country studies on building endogenous capacities and a conceptual framework and broad guidelines for such studies adopted by its Working Group on Building Endogenous Capacities in Science and Technology, which had been established in 1985. The Group's report and the guidelines were annexed to the Task Force's report.

CCSQ(PROG), at its April 1986 session,⁽¹⁰⁾ concurred with the view of the Task Force's Chairman regarding implementation of joint activities; it considered that, in view of changed world conditions, there was a need for a thorough review of joint activities in order to concentrate efforts on projects that were most likely to be beneficial and feasible and therefore warranted priority. It was also necessary to avoid overlapping with other inter-agency activities. CCSQ(PROG) also acted on a Task Force recommendation on setting up a working group on the establishment of a global network for scientific and technological information (see p. 598).

In December, the Task Force broadly endorsed guidelines for a harmonization of science and technology policies of United Nations organizations and bodies; decided to review system-wide activities in selected countries (Colombia, Jordan, Kenya, Thailand); and recommended that the cross-organizational review of medium-term plans and programme analysis in science and technology for development (see below) should be finalized, taking into full account the Task Force's discussion on the topic. It decided that the first candidate countries for pilot studies on building endogenous capacity should be those whose needs were primarily intersectoral and cross-dimensional and that the priorities of the potential donor countries should also be taken into account. The Task Force decided to adopt a selective approach to joint activities and selected eight projects for immediate implementation.

Cross-organizational analysis

By decision 1986/110 of 7 February which dealt with its basic work programme for 1986, the Economic and Social Council decided to consider the question of science and technology for development as its topic for the cross-organizational review of the medium-term plans of the organizations of the United Nations system to be presented to the Council in 1987.

In a March 1986 report to the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination (CPC),⁽¹¹⁾ the Secretary-General outlined the scope and general approach of the cross-organizational programme analysis of United Nations activities in science and technology for development. Science and technology being a dimension of most issues addressed by the United Nations system, he said, a selective approach was required, for which the Vienna Programme of Action and subsequent legislative mandates provided a broad framework. The focus would be on programmes and operational activities explicitly directed towards the objectives of the Vienna Programme, as specified in the eight major programme areas of the operational plan for its implementation: science and technology policies and plans for development; creation and strengthening of scientific and technological infrastructure; choice, acquisition and transfer of technology; development of human resources for science and technology; financing of science and technology for development; scientific and technological information; strengthening of research and development in and for developing countries and their linkage to the production system; and strengthening of co-operation in science and technology among developing countries and between developing and developed countries.

At its April/May 1986 session (see Chapter XXIII of this section), CPC endorsed the scope and general approach for the preparation of the analysis as proposed by the Secretary-General. Noting the Economic and Social Council decision, CPC recommended that the cross-organizational programme analysis and the cross-organizational review of medium-term plans in science and technology be merged in a single report of the Secretary-General. That report, which would be reviewed by CPC in 1987 prior to its consideration by the Council, should present conclusions that would enable both bodies to make recommendations on the adequacy of the United Nations system's activities in relation to the legislative mandates and on the overall state of co-operation and co-ordination in the system. The CPC decision was brought to the Council President's attention in a 16 May 1986 letter from its Chairman⁽¹²⁾

Questions related to choice, acquisition and transfer of technology were again on the agenda of several United Nations bodies throughout 1986, particularly UNCTAD and UNIDO.

UNCTAD activities. The work of the UNCTAD secretariat, described in an August 1986 report to the Trade and Development Board⁽¹⁾ centred on formulation and implementation of technology policies, legal policies, and the Advisory Service on Transfer of Technology (ASTT).

New issues such as new and emerging technologies, mechanisms for promoting technological innovation, the role of small and medium-sized enterprises in the international transfer of technology, and issues related to the commercialization and utilization of results deriving from research and development activities funded by the United Nations system were examined; and several other issues that had reached a degree of maturity, including intergovernmental negotiations on such themes as the international code of conduct on the transfer of technology (see p. 606), co-operative exchange of skills, transfer, application and development of technology in the food processing sector, and new and renewable energy technologies, were considered in depth. Research was done on technological changes and their relation to trade and development, and technical and operational activities, including the holding of seminars and training courses in co-operation with developing and developed countries, were carried out.

ASTT, established in 1976 as the institutional basis of UNCTAD for technical and operational assistance in the field of technology⁽²⁾ conducted advisory services in co-operation with a number of countries and institutions around the world, organized and participated in programmes aimed at strengthening human resources in developing countries, and arranged seminars, workshops and working groups for that purpose. On the subject of institutional infrastructure, diagnostic reports were finalized and follow-up advice was provided to Mali, Nepal and Togo. Diagnostic reports on strategies, plans and policies were finalized with respect to Ghana and Zambia, and advice in project formulation was provided to Burundi, Kenya, Nepal and Zimbabwe; in addition, two regional programmes (Asia and Africa) were developed for funding from voluntary contributions or extrabudgetary resources. On the subject of training services and information exchange, a number of co-operative programmes with developing and developed countries, regional and international organizations were carried out or contributed to, including national seminars or working groups in seven countries, 13 training programmes for small groups and six regional/interregional events. ASTT also provided advice and assistance to developing countries on acquisition, transfer and utilization of technologies.

UNCTAD also intensified its co-operation with other organizations and participated in the ACC Task Force on Science and Technology for Development, acting as lead agency in two of its joint activities.

Two expert group meetings were convened at Geneva during the year: the Meeting of the Informal Group of Experts on Technology-related Policy Issues in the Food Sector (28 April-1 May)⁽³⁾ convened in co-operation with UNIDO and FAO and with World Bank participation; and the Meeting of the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on the Transfer, Application and Development of Technology in the Energy Sector, Paying Particular Attention to New and Renewable Sources of Energy (15-24 October) (see p. 579).

The Committee on Transfer of Technology, at its sixth session (Geneva, 27 October-13 November)⁽⁷⁾ discussed UNCTAD's work programme and future work and reviewed UNCTAD research on the impact of new and emerging technologies on trade and development.

On 13 November, the Committee adopted a resolution on various aspects of technology transfer and development⁽⁸⁾ Recognizing that technology in its various forms was a permanent and complex factor of the development process and that its rapid change presented one of the greatest challenges especially to developing countries, the Committee reaffirmed that to cope with those rapid changes, as well as to reap the benefits from conventional technologies, the international transfer of technology was to be encouraged and the technological capacity of developing countries needed to be strengthened, with special attention given to accelerating the technological transformation of the least developed countries.

Noting with appreciation the preliminary studies on the impact of new and emerging technologies on trade and development, the Committee urged the UNCTAD secretariat to continue such studies and ensure their wider dissemination, seeking the views of Governments; studies should be directed to ways in which developing countries could benefit from or overcome possible negative effects of those technologies. Work should focus on the relationship of those new technologies with economic development and structural change. The Committee encouraged further analysis of the contributions of new technologies to trade and development and of problems posed by them. In undertaking that work, special emphasis should be placed on improving the understanding of the relationship between technological change, production and trade, and its implications, particularly for the export possibilities of developing countries.

The Committee noted recent national and international efforts to provide adequate legal protection for rapid technological developments and called for continued attention to improving the legal environment for technology development and transfer. It also noted with interest UNCTAD studies on national policies, laws and regulations, requesting that they be brought up to date and expanded to cover more countries. It recommended that national laws and regulations conducive to acquisition and development of technology be studied in order to assist developing countries in elaborating a legal framework in that field.

The UNCTAD secretariat should continue to study the promotion and encouragement of technological innovation, assessing in particular the role of research and development activities, industrial property protection, and risk-taking. Recognizing that small and medium-sized enterprises represented an important source of technological know-how and innovation, the Committee recommended that the work on technology transfer by those enterprises should continue and that seminars and workshops be convened in co-operation with UNIDO and regional and other organizations. It noted the positive outcome of the two meetings of experts (see above), requesting that their recommendations be sent to the United Nations regional commissions for consideration. Recognizing the need for attention to developing countries' diverse and changing needs for technical and operational assistance, the Committee believed that UNCTAD's responsiveness to those increasing needs should be kept under review.

The Committee recommended that ASTT accord priority to training and retraining for the development of human resources and skills particularly of the least developed countries; workshops and seminars should be organized in close co-operation with UNIDO, Governments or other agencies. The UNCTAD Secretary-General was requested to report to the Committee in 1988 on technical and operational assistance by ASTT. The UNCTAD secretariat was invited to continue its work on the economic, commercial and developmental aspects of the industrial property system, and the UNCTAD Secretary-General was invited to convene a meeting of the Group of Governmental Experts on the Economic, Commercial and Developmental Aspects of Industrial Property in the Transfer of Technology to Developing Countries. Recognizing the critical importance of the capital goods sector, the Committee requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General to submit a summary of the main findings and conclusions of secretariat studies for consideration by the Committee in 1988.

The Committee recommended that UNCTAD as lead agency undertake further activities concerning utilization and commercialization of United Nations system-funded research and development for the benefit of developing countries. It requested that the UNCTAD secretariat strengthen co-operation with other United Nations organizations and invited the UNCTAD Secretary-General to intensify efforts to expand co-operation with UNDP and other funding sources.

UNIDO activities. As initiatives taken in earlier years began to yield concrete results, activities of the Division of Development and Transfer of Technology within UNIDO intensified in 1986, focusing on advanced technologies, technologies for new and renewable sources of energy and technology for rural and small industries.⁽⁶⁾

Significant results were achieved with regard to: promotion of the establishment of the International Centre for Genetic Engineering and Biotechnology; regional co-operation in micro-electronics in the Latin American and Arab regions; activities relating to small hydropower; plant-level co-operation in the transfer of technology; and the formulation of proposals for reorientation of Industrial and Technological Information Bank (INTIB) activities. Initiatives were taken with regard to: promotion of the establishment of a Consultative Group on Solar Energy Research and Applications; assessment of the implications of technological trends relating to expert systems for developing countries; elaboration of biotechnology safety guidelines; and joint discussions with the Licensing Executive Society and heads of technology transfer registries.

Within its programme of assistance to developing countries in the formulation of their technology policies, UNIDO organized a national seminar on technology transfer at Antananarivo, Madagascar, in March and assisted in the holding of national seminars on computer-aided design in Iraq and on information technology in Argentina. A compendium of technology policies and plans of selected developing countries was published, as was information from India and Yugoslavia on commercially available technologies. A variety of activities were undertaken to promote international research co-operation and strengthen technological capabilities of developing countries, an important aspect of these programmes being co-operative research and development between groups such as the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (United States), the Department of Food Technology of Korea University (Republic of Korea), the University of Minnesota (United States) and the Institute of Food Technology (Brazil). Biotechnology safety guidelines relating to research, manufacture and environment were examined, a study on the subject was published and a co-operative programme between UNIDO, WHO and UNEP was developed. A workshop on solar energy held at Vienna in December called on UNIDO to pursue further actions and convene a meeting for the establishment of a consultative group as a means of enhancing the effectiveness of solar energy research in developing countries and the commercialization of such research into industrial production.

The programme on plant-level co-operation for the transfer of technology to small- and medium-scale enterprises expanded in 1986 with a contribution by Poland to finance a new project which was to start in January 1987. In the field of technology acquisition, activities were intensified through: organization of training programmes on technology contract evaluation for the Nigerian Office of Industrial Property; and organization of or contribution to seminars and workshops on technology acquisition at Cairo (Egypt), Lagos (Nigeria), Lahore (Pakistan), Teheran (Iran) and Warsaw (Poland). Co-operation among developing countries in acquiring technology was strengthened under the Technological Information Exchange System (the members of which met at Warsaw in November); another milestone was the creation in 1986 of a similar body for the Association of South-East Asian Nations. Assistance and advice on technology transfer, acquisition and industrial technological information was provided to 10 African countries under a project on integrated assistance to the African Regional Centre for Technology (Dakar, Senegal). The advisory group of INTIB users held its second meeting in October and endorsed a number of proposals on a reorientation of INTIB, to put greater emphasis on the networking function.

Draft code of conduct

In October 1986, the UNCTAD Secretary-General reported to the General Assembly on the continuing negotiations on an international code of conduct on the transfer of technology⁽⁷⁾. The draft consisted of a preamble and nine chapters on: definitions and scope of application; objectives and principles; national regulation of transfer-of-technology transactions; restrictive practices; responsibilities and obligations of parties to transfer-of-technology transactions; special treatment for developing countries; international collaboration; international institutional machinery; and applicable law and settlement of disputes. Most of the issues outstanding concerned restrictive practices (chapter 4) and applicable law and settlement of disputes (chapter 9).

Pursuant to a 1985 Assembly resolution⁽⁸⁾ the UNCTAD Secretary-General and the President of the United Nations Conference on an International Code of Conduct on the Transfer of Technology established an informal, open-ended group of representatives of all regional groups to serve as a channel of communication and a forum for consultations in order further to clarify conceptual approaches to issues outstanding in the draft code. The group met several times between April and October 1986, reviewing the progress of consultations conducted by the UNCTAD Secretary-General and the Conference President at the bilateral and multilateral levels and exchanging views on the outstanding issues; it was not in a position, however, to enter into substantive discussions.

Consultations with Governments and regional groups were ongoing; they covered a wide range of subjects and included the consideration of various alternatives for the continuation or discontinuation of negotiations on an international code of conduct. Extension of the process for another year appeared to enjoy widespread support among Governments; that option, the UNCTAD Secretary-General believed, would provide further opportunity to consider in depth the possible solutions already discussed and to prepare the ground for reconvening the Conference. On the basis of the experience gained during consultations, however, it was the UNCTAD secretariat's view that that would necessitate the establishment of a more structured consultative mechanism, with clearer terms of reference and a clear indication of the time frame for completion of the consultations. In addition, a definition should be given of the goals to be attained within such a time frame, such as the convening of the Conference with a view to completing the draft code.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

The General Assembly, on the Second Committee's recommendation, on 5 December 1986 adopted without vote resolution 41/166.

International code of conduct on the transfer of technology

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 40/184 of 17 December 1985, in which it invited the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the President of the United Nations Conference on an International Code of Conduct on the Transfer of Technology to consult, as appropriate, with regional groups and Governments, taking into account the need for balanced geographical representation, with a view to identifying appropriate solutions to the issues outstanding in the code of conduct,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development on the consultations held in 1986 relating to the negotiations on an international code of conduct on the transfer of technology;

2. Notes that the consultations have not been completed and that further work is required in the search for possible solutions to the outstanding issues in order to complete successfully the negotiations on a code of conduct;

3. Invites the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the President of the United Nations Conference on an International Code of Conduct on the Transfer of Technology to continue and to finalize in 1987, on the basis of a more structured consultative mechanism, their consultations with regional groups and interested Governments with a view to identifying appropriate solutions to the issues outstanding in the code of conduct;

4. Further invites the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to report to the General Assembly at its forty-second session on the progress made in the consultations referred to in paragraph 3 above;

5. Decides to take, at that session, in the light of the consultations, further action on the negotiations on the code of conduct, including the possible reconvening of the United Nations Conference on an International Code of Conduct on the Transfer of Technology, preferably in 1988.

Chapter XII

Social and cultural development

In 1986, social progress, cultural development and measures to fight crime were dealt with by several bodies of the United Nations system.

In the world at large, social progress was still inadequate, as the General Assembly acknowledged in resolution 41/152. Seventeen years after the adoption and proclamation of the Declaration on Social Progress and Development, the Assembly said in resolution 41/142, its main objectives—the elimination of unemployment, hunger, malnutrition and poverty, the eradication of illiteracy, the assurance of the right to universal access to culture, health protection for the entire population, free and universal education, and the promotion of human rights and social justice—had not been universally realized.

A year after the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, which had established a blueprint for comprehensive action at various levels, the organizations of the system were especially concerned with follow-up. The Economic and Social Council, in resolution 1986/10, suggested measures for implementation of the Congress's conclusions and recommendations.

In a report to the Assembly, the Secretary-General said that 1986 had witnessed a further escalation of crime and violence throughout the world, and, in spite of efforts to stem them, international drug trafficking and abuse continued to impair the social fabric and dissipate human resources urgently needed for development. A similar view was expressed in his annual report on the work of the Organization (see p. 3). While the framework for effective international co-operation against crime was largely in place, the engine and momentum to make the system really work was what was needed, the Secretary-General concluded. Taking note of the report by resolution 41/107, the Assembly reaffirmed the need for concerted international efforts towards more effective crime prevention and criminal justice strategies and for co-ordinated practical action to give effect to the conclusions and recommendations of the 1985 Congress.

An initial review of the United Nations work programme in crime prevention and criminal justice was submitted by the Secretary-General; to achieve closer co-operation and co-ordination among United Nations bodies and other entities concerned, he offered a number of recommendations which were endorsed by the Economic and Social Council in resolution 1986/11.

The review was also considered by the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control at its ninth session (Vienna, 5-14 March 1986). Also discussed were preparations for the Eighth Congress on crime, to be held in 1990, and the third quinquennial survey of crime trends, operations of criminal justice systems and crime prevention strategies. The Council, by resolution 1986/12, recommended that the questionnaire for the survey be simplified and abbreviated and that the survey include data and recommendations concerning the national use of information systems in crime prevention and administration of justice.

The General Assembly, in resolution 41/187, proclaimed 1988-1997 the World Decade for Cultural Development. To be observed under the auspices of the United Nations and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), the Decade's four main objectives were acknowledging the cultural dimension of development, affirming and enriching cultural identities, broadening participation in culture, and promoting international cultural co-operation.

Social aspects of development

Social aspects of development became increasingly a focus of action by United Nations bodies. The Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions (Programme Matters) (CCSQ(PROG)) of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC), at its October 1986 session,⁽¹⁾ suggested that the ACC Task Force on Long-Term Development Objectives should focus to a larger extent on social issues as an integral part of development. By resolution 41/152, the General Assembly acknowledged that greater progress was necessary in improving the world social situation and confirmed the need to ensure opportunities for all in respect of employment, health, education, culture, rest and social security.

The Economic and Social Council, by resolution 1986/14, reaffirmed the important role of the Commission for Social Development and requested it to give more attention to the principles, objectives, means and methods of the 1969 Declaration on Social Progress and Development.⁽²⁾ Reaffirming the Declaration's continued importance, the General Assembly, by resolution 41/142, urged Governments to take its provisions into account in their bilateral and multilateral relations and recommended that international agencies consider it in formulating development strategies and programmes.

The United Nations Research Institute for Social Development completed its research on food systems, popular participation, social conditions of refugees, and improvement of development data and methods of analysis and monitoring. Its Board approved a new medium-term research perspective for 1986-1991.

Social progress and development

Improvement of social life

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

The General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, adopted without vote resolution 41/152 on 4 December 1986.

Improvement of social life

The General Assembly,

Bearing in mind that the Members of the United Nations have undertaken in the Charter of the United Nations to promote social progress and better standards of life in- larger freedom,

Recalling the principles proclaimed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in the Declaration on Social Progress and Development,

Mindful of the need to establish a harmonious balance between scientific, technological and material progress and the intellectual, spiritual, cultural and moral advancement of mankind,

Considering that the improvement of social life must be based on respect for and the promotion of all human rights and particularly on the elimination of all forms of discrimination,

Aware that freedom of expression, worship and association, and the ensuring of equality of rights and opportunities for all the people on an equal footing in respect of employment, health, education, culture, rest and social security, in particular, also contribute to the improvement of social life,

Considering that healthy recreational, cultural and sports activities contribute to the achievement of a proper level of physical and mental health,

Considering also that the improvement of social life must take place in a continuous and uninterrupted manner,

1. Acknowledges that the progress achieved is still inadequate and that greater progress is necessary in the world social situation despite the efforts made, and that efforts to this end should be continued;

2. Confirms the need to ensure the well-being of everyone and the enjoyment of all the other basic human rights, particularly freedom of expression, worship and association, and the ensuring of equality of rights and opportunities on an equal footing for all the people in respect of employment, health, education, culture, rest and social security;

3. Reiterates that it is the right of everyone to enjoy the greatest possible degree of physical and mental health;

4. Emphasizes that participation in cultural, sports and recreational activities and the use of leisure without discrimination of any kind promotes the improvement of social life;

5. Decides to resume consideration of the question of the improvement of social life at its forty-second session.

Approved by Third Committee (A/41/874/Add.2) without vote, 28 November (meeting 61); 5-nation draft (A/C.3/41/L.92), orally revised by sponsors and further orally amended by Peru; agenda item 12.

Sponsors: Bulgaria, Cuba, Lao People's Democratic Republic, United States, Venezuela.

Meeting numbers. GA 41 st session: 3rd Committee 57, 61; plenary 97.

Introducing the text on behalf of the sponsors, Cuba said they hoped it would be developed into an important instrument in the social field.

Implementation of the 1969 Declaration

A draft resolution recommended by the Economic and Social Council in 1985(3) was adopted by the General Assembly in 1986.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

The Assembly, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, adopted resolution 41/142 on 4 December 1986 without vote.

Implementation of the Declaration on Social Progress and Development

The General Assembly,

Recalling the Declaration on Social Progress and Development, based on the Charter of the United Nations and solemnly proclaimed on 11 December 1969,

Recalling also its resolutions 2543(XXIV) of 11 December 1969 and 34/59 of 29 November 1979 on the implementation of the Declaration,

Recalling further its resolutions 3201(S-VI) and 3202(S-VI) of 1 May 1974, containing the Declaration and the Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order, 35/56 of 5 December 1980, the annex to which contains the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, 33/48 of 14 December 1978 on world social development, and 34/152 of 17 December 1979 and 37/54 of 3 December 1982 on the world social situation,

Convinced that international peace and security, on the one hand, and social progress and economic development, on the other, are closely interdependent and influence each other,

Bearing in mind that the ultimate aim of development is the constant improvement of the social situation of entire populations and ensuring their full participation in the process of development and the fair distribution of the benefits therefrom,

Reaffirming that social progress and development shall be founded on respect for the dignity and value of the human person and shall ensure the promotion of human rights and social justice,

Aware of the fact that, seventeen years after the adoption and proclamation of the Declaration on Social Progress and Development, its main objectives, embodied also in the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade, which include, the elimination of unemployment, hunger, malnutrition and poverty, the eradication of illiteracy, the assurance of the right to universal access to culture, the provision of health protection for the entire population, the provision of free, universal education at the primary level and the promotion of human rights and social justice, have not yet been universally realized,

Recalling that the peoples of the United Nations expressed in the Charter of the United Nations their determination to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom,

Fully conscious of the urgent need to intensify the efforts by the international community and the relevant organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to achieve the objectives set forth in the Declaration on Social Progress and Development and in the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

1. Reaffirms the lasting validity and importance of the principles and objectives proclaimed in the Declaration on Social Progress and Development;

2. Urges all States and the relevant organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to take the Declaration resolutely into consideration and, in their policies, plans, programmes and implementation machinery, to take increasingly into consideration, as far as they are concerned, the principles, objectives, means and methods of the Declaration;

3. Urges all Governments to take into account the provisions of the Declaration in their bilateral and multilateral relations in the field of development;

4. Recommends that international organizations and agencies concerned with development should consider the Declaration as an important international document in the formulation of strategies and programmes designed to achieve social progress and development, and that it be taken into consideration in the drafting of instruments that the United Nations may undertake in the field of social progress and development;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare a substantive report on possible ways and means of increasing the contribution of the relevant organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, as far as they are concerned, to achieving the full realization of the principles and objectives contained in the Declaration and to submit it, through the Commission for Social Development and the Economic and Social Council, to the General Assembly at its forty-fourth session;

6. Also requests the Secretary-General to prepare a draft framework of the above-mentioned substantive report and to submit it to the Commission for Social Development at its thirtieth session in order to allow the Commission to make suggestions in regard to the preparation of that report;

7. Further requests the Secretary-General to continue to inform the General Assembly, in a summary form in annexes to the reports on the world social situation, of the measures adopted by Governments-not included in other reports provided on a regular basis-and by the international organizations concerned with a view to the realization of the provisions of the Declaration and the implementation of the present resolution.

General Assembly resolution 41/142

4 December 1986 Meeting 97 Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee (A/41/874/Add.1) without vote, 25 November (meeting 57); draft recommended by Economic and Social Council (A/C.3/41/L.1), amended by 3 nations (A/C.3/41/L.78); agenda item 12.

Sponsors of amendments: Byelorussian SSR, Poland, Viet Nam.

Meeting numbers. GA 41 st session: 3rd Committee 54, 57; plenary 97.

The amendments to the original text added paragraph 6 and, in paragraph 5, the Secretary-General was requested to submit his report in 1989, rather than in 1987.

A representative of the United Nations Department of International Economic and Social Affairs pointed out that the programme budget for 1986-1987 contained no provision for the preparation of the report requested in paragraph 6; nevertheless, it was the Secretary-General's intention to prepare the draft framework within existing resources.

Commission for Social Development

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 21 May 1986, the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of its Second (Social) Committee, adopted resolution 1986/14 without vote.

Improvement of the work of the Commission for Social Development

The Economic and Social Council,

Noting the Declaration on Social Progress and Development, based on the Charter of the United Nations and solemnly proclaimed on 11 December 1969, Reaffirming the lasting validity and importance of the principles and objectives set forth in the Declaration.

Bearing in mind General Assembly resolutions 2543(XXIV) of 11 December 1969 and 34/59 of 29 November 1979 on the implementation of the Declaration, in which all Governments and appropriate organizations of the United Nations system were urged, in their policies, plans, programmes and implementation machinery, to continuously take into consideration the principles, objectives, means and methods of the Declaration on Social Progress and Development, and to take due account of its provisions in their bilateral and multilateral relations in the field of development,

Recalling its resolutions 10(II) of 21 June 1946 on the Temporary Social Commission, 830 J (XXXII) of 2 August 1961 on the strengthening of the work of the United Nations in the social field and 1139(XLI) of 29 July 1966, in which it adopted the present mandate and present designation of the Commission for Social Development,

Taking into account its resolution 1985/36 of 29 May 1985 on the progress of work of the Commission for Social Development,

Noting that the Commission is experiencing difficulties in giving proper attention to all items of its agenda owing principally to lack of time,

Taking note of General Assembly resolution 40/98 of 13 December 1985 on improvement of the role of the United Nations in the field of social development, in which the Assembly invited the Economic and Social Council to consider, at its first regular session of 1986, existing ways and means of improving the work of the Commission,

Taking into account the deliberations of the Economic and Social Council at its first regular session of 1985 and at its present session on the work of the Commission for Social Development,

Mindful of the need to find appropriate measures, including measures relating to the frequency and duration of meetings, to enable the commissions of the Council to discharge properly their important functions,

1. Reaffirms the important role of the Commission for Social Development within the United Nations system in the field of social development;

2. Requests the Commission to give more attention in its deliberations to the principles, objectives, means and methods of the Declaration on Social Progress and Development;

3. Requests the Commission for Social Development to consider, at its thirtieth session, specific proposals concerning ways and means of improving its work;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare, on the basis of the discussion at the first regular session of 1986 of the Council and the conclusions of the Commission, a report on measures to strengthen the Commission for Social Development in the discharge of its functions, to be submitted to the Economic and Social Council for consideration at its first regular session of 1987.

UN Research Institute for Social Development

In 1986, the United Nations Research Institute for Social Development (UNRISD) completed research on food systems, popular participation, social conditions of refugees, and improvement of development data and methods of analysis and monitoring. A new medium-term research perspective 1986-1991 was approved by the UNRISD Board in July;⁽⁴⁾ it identified the following priority research areas: national food strategies and food security, the social impact of adjustment policies, the social situation of refugees, trend analysis 1960-1980 and social aspects of the urbanization process.

In April 1986, the principal UNRISD submission to UNDP, an overview report on the problems of food security in developing countries, based on country studies, was sent for comments to about 60 specialists. In May, the Institute organized an expert meeting on people affected by uprootedness, which examined the concepts of refugees, economic migrants and disaster victims, analysed the conditions of those groups and discussed policy suggestions.

The Institute continued its collaboration with United Nations agencies dealing with various aspects of social development, including UNDP, UNICEF, FAO, ILO, UNESCO, UNHCR and UNEP. In addition, it had collaborative arrangements with research institutions and researchers in developing countries.

Total income of UNRISD in 1986 amounted to $1,483,902, including $1,148,491 in contributions from seven Governments, while expenditure was $1,394,193.

Trust funds

As at 31 December 1986, the Trust Fund for Social Development which financed training and research activities totalled $123,130; income during the year was $18,888, including $11,000 from Sweden. The Trust Fund for European Social Development, having received no contributions during the year, had a balance available of $2,382 as at 31 December.

Crime prevention and criminal justice

Follow-up to the 1985 Congress

Crime was becoming increasingly internationalized and sophisticated, impairing the quality of life and nullifying some of development's hard-won gains, the Secretary-General stated in a September 1986 report on crime prevention and criminal justice.⁽¹⁾ During the first half of the 1980s, some major steps had been taken to ensure more effective policies against crime, and the Milan Plan of Action, the Guiding Principles for Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice in the Context of Development and a New International Economic Order and other recommendations adopted by the Seventh (1985) United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders⁽²⁾ established a blueprint for comprehensive action at the national, regional and international levels. The Committee on Crime Prevention and Control, at its March 1986 session, and the Economic and Social Council outlined the modalities by which that blueprint could be translated into concrete terms and put into practical effect.

Measures were undertaken by the Committee, the United Nations Trust Fund for Social Defence, the network of United Nations institutes for crime prevention and criminal justice, the regional commissions and other United Nations bodies, as well as intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations (see below), as the Secretary-General outlined in his report. The General Assembly in 1985 had requested the Secretary-General to initiate, in his report to the Committee, a review of the functions and work programme of the United Nations in crime prevention and criminal justice, including regional and interregional institutes.⁽³⁾

The Milan Plan of Action and the Guiding Principles had underlined the overriding importance of technical co-operation and called for urgent strengthening of the United Nations capacity to extend such co-operation to developing countries, particularly in respect of training, planning, information exchange and dissemination, and the reappraisal of legal systems in relation to changing socio-economic conditions.

Upon Member States' requests, the United Nations Interregional Adviser in crime prevention and criminal justice undertook advisory missions to Argentina, the Bahamas, Cuba, Egypt, Mexico, Panama and Uruguay. Areas of assistance to countries included measures to combat various forms of transnational criminality, including illicit drug traffic, improvement of national planning and co-ordination in crime prevention and criminal justice; training of criminal justice personnel; upgrading the performance of the criminal justice systems; assistance in preventing juvenile delinquency, with special reference to educational and vocational training for juveniles in conflict with the law; de-institutionalization of offenders through community-based alternatives; and computerization of criminal and judicial statistics. Taking into account the expanded demands of Member States for interregional advisory services which, according to the Secretary-General, far exceeded current resources, it had become imperative to adopt measures to improve and strengthen technical assistance modalities; it was necessary to follow up the Adviser's recommendations for national action and assist in the formulation of national policies and programmes. Further efforts would be made through the Trust Fund for Social Defence and the regional and interregional institutes.

Through its publications, the International Review of Criminal Policy, the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Brief and the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Newsletter, the Secretariat was serving as a clearing-house for advancing knowledge, policy and practice. A double issue of the Newsletter, on capital punishment, appeared in November 1986. The Secretariat also continued to strengthen its collaborative efforts with government-appointed national correspondents in the field of crime prevention and control, who numbered nearly 300 from 128 countries; assisting in programme implementation and serving as a research resource, the correspondents contributed to the preparation of reports and questionnaires, providing evaluations and gathering data.

Following adoption in May of Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/10, a number of substantive programme areas for study, research and the formulation of policies, guidelines and norms were identified; the Secretariat initiated research aimed at developing specific proposals for international action against forms of crime with international dimensions, particularly organized crime and terrorism. In its research, the Secretariat concentrated a significant proportion of its efforts on examining the workings and management of criminal justice systems, and on ways of improving their efficacy and the quality of service they rendered to society. In addition, it gathered data on extra-legal, arbitrary and summary executions and measures for their prevention. In line with a more integrated approach, there was a need to give further attention to the observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms in crime prevention and criminal justice administration.

The second United Nations survey of crime trends, operations of criminal justice systems and crime prevention strategies was in preparation. A manual for the development of criminal justice statistics had been prepared for the use of Governments and practitioners in the field.

The Secretariat was also developing policy approaches for the application of the 1985 United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (the Beijing Rules),⁽⁴⁾ focusing on early prevention and protective intervention and treatment, including formulation of international standards for prevention, alternatives to institutionalization and care and protection of juveniles at risk. Work was in progress to develop implementation mechanisms and strategies for the other standards and principles adopted in 1985, including the formulation of integrated frameworks for their application and incorporation into national legislation. Collaborative projects were to be developed, especially at the regional level, as well as new standards and model agreements in priority areas. In pursuance of existing mandates, specific areas were identified for further work, including measures for the reduction of prison population; alternatives to imprisonment and the social integration of offenders; the status of prisoners; the transfer of criminal proceedings; the transfer of the supervision of foreign offenders conditionally sentenced or conditionally released; the role of lawyers in the criminal justice system; and the independence of the judiciary.

Because of recommendations and conclusions of the 1985 Congress, as well as General Assembly resolutions, the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination, at its 1986 session, recommended approval of a number of revisions to the medium-term plan for 1984-1989.

In his conclusions, the Secretary-General said the success of the United Nations programme in crime prevention and criminal justice in implementing the recommendations of the 1985 Congress required concerted action at various levels; the seriousness of and increase in criminality in many parts of the world and the demands for improving the means of combating it required greater responsiveness.

Based on the results of the initial review of the functions and programme of work of the United Nations in crime prevention and criminal justice (see p. 619), a number of directions for policy and action had been formulated; further proposals, particularly with regard to the modalities of implementing the 1985 resolutions of the Congress, the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly, were to be included in a comprehensive programme review to be submitted to the Council in 1987.

Efforts aimed at an effective United Nations programme were to proceed along the following lines: more sharing of information and knowledge among United Nations entities; promotion of action-oriented research on the relationship between crime and socio-economic aspects of development and other priority issues, with a view to formulating guidelines and policy options; concerted action to prevent and control new forms and dimensions of crime, especially transnational crimes, including model agreements and practical arrangements; development of strategies for the standards and principles adopted in 1985, including guidelines for their incorporation in national legislation and collaborative projects, especially at the regional level, as well as formulation of new standards in priority areas and application of United Nations standards and norms; strengthening technical co-operation through backstopping and inter-institute/United Nations programme co-ordination, including pilot and demonstration projects, workshops, training modules and joint strategies among countries, with special emphasis on technical co-operation among developing countries and the utilization of indigenous approaches; strengthening the United Nations Trust Fund for Social Defence and formulating projects for submission to prospective donors; co-ordination to promote the involvement and complementarity of various entities and organizations and to ensure an interdisciplinary approach; mobilization of broader support from the non-governmental and professional community; and wide dissemination of the 1985 instruments and resolutions to promote their implementation.

The growth of transnational crime in increasingly complex and sophisticated forms raised urgent questions about the efficacy of existing crime control mechanisms, the Secretary-General stated; the response could not afford to lag behind such developments or to tackle the interacting aspects of crime problems in a piecemeal fashion. The pervasiveness of crime and violence called for concerted, wide-ranging strategies utilizing the parameters suggested, and the effective implementation of such strategies called for the active collaboration of the international community.

Regional and interregional activities

Regional crime prevention institutes

The network of United Nations institutes for crime prevention and criminal justice could be regarded as the main infrastructure for regional and interregional technical co-operation activities related to research, data collection, information exchange, training and seminars. The United Nations Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs and the institutes collaborated to develop joint programme activities on key policy issues of mutual concern. The United Nations Social Defence Research Institute (UNSDRI), established in Rome, Italy, in 1968,⁽⁵⁾ aligned its work programme with that of the Secretariat in order to provide further support to implementation of the 1985 Congress recommendations on research priorities and the organization of research workshops; UNSDRI also sought to strengthen further its co-operation with the Interregional Adviser in implementation of specific technical co-operation projects.

The second annual joint meeting of the heads of the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Branch of the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs, UNSDRI and the United Nations regional institutes, hosted by the Arab Security Studies and Training Centre (Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, 20-22 January 1986), was a step forward in ensuring closer co-ordination and joint programme planning and implementation of the 1985 resolutions and recommendations, which significantly enlarged the scope of the Organization's activities, adding new mandates and amplifying the modalities of ongoing work. The meeting identified priority areas for research and policy attention, based on the directives of the 1985 Congress and countries' needs; those areas included information exchange and data collection, drug trafficking and other forms of transnational crime, and juvenile justice and prevention of delinquency.

In co-operation with the Centre at Riyadh, a number of joint programme and project activities had been initiated; they included the first United Nations regional survey on juvenile crime and prevention and treatment modalities, 1970-1983; application of the Beijing Rules at the regional level; implementation of principles, guidelines and priorities with respect to research on youth crime; and development of guidelines for delinquency prevention.

The United Nations-affiliated Helsinki Institute for Crime Prevention and Control (Finland) organized an expert group meeting (9-11 April 1986) on information and statistical systems on crime and criminal justice, focusing on the preparation of the third United Nations crime survey. The Institute also organized a second course for junior government officials and researchers on United Nations criminal policy (Vienna, September).

A major activity in which the Secretariat was actively involved was the preparatory work for the establishment of an African Institute for the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, which had been requested by the Economic and Social Council in 1979;⁽⁶⁾ pursuant to a Congress request that the Institute be established as a high priority, a preparatory expert group meeting was convened at Vienna from 17 to 19 March 1986. The meeting outlined the prospective modalities for the Institute's operation, which were being finalized in accordance with recommendations of an intergovernmental African expert group meeting (New York, September).

The United Nations Asia and Far East Institute for the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders at Fuchu, Japan, continued to conduct regional training courses and seminars on a variety of crime prevention and criminal justice issues and collaborated with the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific (ESCAP) on technical co-operation projects. The Institute conducted an ad hoc international seminar on drug problems, which was held consecutively from 4 to 22 August at five venues (Bangkok and Chiang Mai, Thailand; Hong Kong; Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia; Tokyo) and was attended by 37 participants from 17 countries, ESCAP, the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control and the International Criminal Police Organization.

The United Nations Latin American Institute for the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders at San José, Costa Rica, continued to organize regional and national training courses, workshops and seminars and to disseminate information on human rights in the administration of justice. Studies were being conducted on new crime trends and crime prevention strategies in the context of development in the region, measures against drug abuse, the rights of prisoners, alternatives to imprisonment, formal and informal methods of social control and protection of cultural patrimony. The Institute also initiated a region-wide project for the collection of criminal statistics and was organizing, in co-operation with UNICEF and the Defense for Children International, a training course on children in detention, within the framework of the Beijing Rules.

Regional commissions

The possibility of developing technical co-operation projects as well as pilot schemes in priority areas for each region was explored by the United Nations Secretariat; those activities were to be initiated and carried out jointly with the regional commissions and in co-operation with the regional institutes. Among the regional commissions, ESCAP carried out a joint programme with the United Nations Asia and Far East Institute and the United Nations Secretariat; one of the programme activities involved the implementation of the first United Nations regional survey of juvenile offenders, 1970-1983. The same model of co-operation was being used in the Latin America and Caribbean and the Arab regions.

The Secretariat was continuing its efforts to strengthen further its collaboration with the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean and the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia, as well as with the Economic Commission for Africa in connection with the African Institute for the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders (see above).

Intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations

The United Nations Secretariat co-operated closely with intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in giving concrete effect to the conclusions of the 1985 Congress. Among the NGOs, the New York Alliance of Non-Governmental Organizations in Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice, in co-operation with the Vienna Alliance and the United Nations Secretariat, initiated a project on alternatives to imprisonment. Consultations between the two Alliances and the United Nations were in progress with a view to organizing an international meeting of experts to elaborate, as a follow-up to the 1985 Congress,⁽⁷⁾ draft model agreements on the transfer of criminal proceedings and on the transfer of the supervision of foreign offenders who were conditionally sentenced or released.

To advance implementation of the 1985 Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power,⁽⁸⁾ the International Institute for Higher Studies in Criminal Sciences at Siracusa, Italy, in co-operation with the United Nations, organized an international experts meeting (14-17 May 1986), and the World Society of Victimology, also with United Nations cooperation, convened an international workshop on the subject (Dubrovnik, Yugoslavia, 22 and 23 May).

Strengthened international co-operation in crime prevention and criminal justice was also the focus of the Seventh International Congress on Social Defence convened under United Nations auspices (Buenos Aires, Argentina, 27 October-1 November). Intensified collaboration was under way with other NGOs, such as the International Association of Judges, on implementation of the Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary,⁽⁷⁾ and with the Howard League for Penal Reform and the International Prisoners' Aid Association on the status of prisoners and implementation of the 1955 United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners, endorsed by the Economic and Social Council in 1957,⁽⁹⁾ and for whose effective implementation the Council in 1984 had adopted certain procedures.⁽¹⁰⁾ The International Association of Juvenile and Family Court Magistrates, the International Commission of Jurists, the International Catholic Child Bureau and Defense for Children International were collaborating with the Secretariat in activities relating to juvenile justice, prevention of delinquency and implementation of the Beijing Rules.

United Nations Trust Fund for Social Defence

The United Nations Trust Fund for Social Defence had a total income in 1986 of $800,935, including $557,137 in pledged contributions, while total expenditures amounted to $806,852. Actual collections during the year totalled $599,590. Most contributions were earmarked and used mainly to finance UNSDRI activities and, more recently, those of the Helsinki Institute.

Despite the Fund's inclusion in the annual United Nations pledging conference for development activities (see Chapter II of this section), contributions remained low; the 1985 Congress had invited Governments to contribute through the Fund to United Nations technical assistance supported by, among other organs, the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Branch of the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs and to the development of the activities of the United Nations interregional and regional institutes specializing in crime prevention and treatment of offenders. Ways had to be found, the Secretary-General stressed in his February 1986 review of the functioning and programme of work of the United Nations in crime prevention and criminal justice,⁽¹¹⁾ to augment the Fund's resources in order to permit a broadening of its activities.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 21 May 1986, on the recommendation of its Second Committee, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1986/10 without vote.

Implementation of the conclusions and recommendations of the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders
The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 40/32 of 29 November 1985, in which the Assembly, inter alia, endorsed the resolutions unanimously adopted by the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders and invited the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control to make specific recommendations on the implementation thereof in its report to the Economic and Social Council at its first regular session of 1986,

Recalling the Milan Plan of Action, in which the Seventh Congress emphasized its conclusion that, of all the actions proposed by the Congress, it was imperative that priority be given to combating the most serious forms of crime of international dimensions,

Recalling also General Assembly resolution 40/146 of 13 December 1985 on human rights in the administration of justice, in which the Assembly, inter alia, acknowledged the important work accomplished by the Seventh Congress, in particular in relation to the formulation and application of United Nations standards and norms in the administration of justice,

Recalling further General Assembly resolutions 40/33 of 29 November 1985, containing the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (the Beijing Rules), 40/35 of 29 November 1985 on the development of standards for the prevention of juvenile delinquency and 40/36 of 29 November 1985 on domestic violence,

Bearing in mind General Assembly resolution 40/34 of 29 November 1985, containing the Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power,

Also bearing in mind General Assembly resolution 40/143 of 13 December 1985 on summary or arbitrary executions,

Recognizing the need, in making specific recommendations on the implementation of the conclusions of the Seventh Congress', to take into account the capabilities of the United Nations and the financial implications,

Serious forms of crime

Urges the Secretary-General to accord priority to the development of specific proposals to co-ordinate concerted international action against the forms of crime identified in the Milan Plan of Action, and to submit such proposals to the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control at its tenth session;

II

Juvenile justice and the prevention of juvenile delinquency

1. Invites Member States to inform the Secretary-General every five years, beginning in 1987, of the progress achieved in the application of the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (the Beijing Rules) and requests the Secretary-General to report regularly thereon to the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control, beginning at its tenth session;

2. Also invites the United Nations regional and interregional institutes for the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders to become actively involved in the application of the Beijing Rules and in the reporting process;

3. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) To assist Governments, at their request, in adapting legislation, policies and practices to the Beijing Rules and in developing alternatives to institutionalization;

(b) With the assistance of the United Nations institutes for the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders, regional commissions and specialized agencies, to develop standards for the prevention of juvenile delinquency; to formulate measures for the effective implementation of the Beijing Rules; and to formulate standard minimum rules for the treatment of juveniles deprived of their liberty;

(c) To submit to the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control at its tenth session a progress report on the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 40/33 and 40/35 and resolutions 19, 20 and 21 of the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, including draft standards for the prevention of juvenile delinquency;

4. Urges intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and other entities concerned to become actively involved in this work and to report to the Secretary-General on steps taken in this regard;

5. Decides to include an item entitled "Juvenile justice and the prevention of juvenile delinquency, including the principles, guidelines and priorities with respect to research on youth crime" in the provisional agenda for the tenth session of the Committee;

6. Requests the Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders and the preparatory meetings for the Congress to consider these questions, in particular the draft standards for the prevention of juvenile delinquency and the draft standard minimum rules for the treatment of juveniles deprived of their liberty, with a view to their adoption;

III

Basic principles of justice for victims of crime and abuse of power

1. Recommends that continued attention should be given to implementation of the Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power with a view to developing the co-operation of Governments, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and the public in securing justice for victims and in promoting integrated action on behalf of victims at the national, regional and international levels;

2. Recommends that the Secretary-General should seek the active involvement of United Nations regional and interregional institutes for the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders and competent intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, in consultation with interested Member States, in promoting the implementation of the Declaration;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control at its tenth session, and at its eleventh session if it occurs before the Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, a report that includes a synthesis of reports received from Member States on measures taken to implement the Declaration, including progress achieved since the Seventh Congress;

IV

Domestic violence

1. Urges the Secretary-General:

(a) To convene, subject to the availability of extrabudgetary funds, a round-table meeting on domestic violence, with a view to the intensification of research and the formulation of action-oriented strategies, inviting the co-operation of the United Nations institutes for the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders, specialized agencies and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, and to report the results of the meeting to the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control at its tenth session;

(b) To submit to the Committee at its tenth session a note on progress with respect to General Assembly resolution 40/36;

2. Decides to include an item entitled "Domestic violence" in the provisional agenda for the tenth session of the Committee;

3. Invites the preparatory meetings for the Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders to consider the question, with a view to consideration and action by the Eighth Congress;

V

Basic principles on the independence of the judiciary

1. Invites Member States to inform the Secretary-General every five years, beginning in 1988, of the progress achieved in the implementation of the Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary, including their dissemination, their incorporation into national legislation, the problems faced in their implementation at the national level and assistance that might be needed from the international community, and requests the Secretary-General to report thereon to the Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders;

2. Appeals to all Governments to promote seminars and training courses at the national and regional levels on the role of the judiciary in society and the necessity for its independence;

3. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) To provide Governments, at their request, with the services of experts and regional and interregional advisers to assist in implementing the Basic Principles and to report to the Eighth Congress on the technical assistance and training actually provided;

(b) To report to the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control at its tenth session on the steps taken to disseminate the Basic Principles;

(c) To include the Basic Principles in the United Nations publication entitled Human Rights: A Compilation of International Instruments;

4. Encourages the United Nations regional and interregional institutes for the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders to assist in the implementation of the Basic Principles and to pay special attention to this question in their research and training programmes;

5. Urges intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and other entities concerned to become actively involved in this process and to inform the

Secretary-General of the efforts made to disseminate and implement the Basic Principles and the extent of their implementation, and requests the Secretary-General to include this information in his report to the Eighth Congress;

6. Requests the Committee to consider this question at its tenth session;

7. Requests the Eighth Congress and the preparatory meetings for the Congress to consider this question;

VI

Extra-legal, arbitrary and summary executions and measures for their prevention and investigation

1. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control at its tenth session a report on extra-legal, arbitrary and summary executions, wherever and under whatever circumstances they may occur, prepared on the basis of information provided by Member States, competent United Nations offices, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and other sources, in the light of the guidance on the matter provided by the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders and taking into account work previously done;

2. Requests the Committee at its tenth session to consider the question of extra-legal, arbitrary and summary executions with a view to elaborating principles on the effective prevention and investigation of such practices;

3. Requests the Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders and the preparatory meetings for the Congress to consider this question;

VII

Transfer of criminal proceedings

1. Requests the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control to formulate a model agreement on the transfer of criminal proceedings for possible consideration by the Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, taking into account previous work done in this area;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the United Nations regional and interregional institutes for the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders, as well as intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, to assist the Committee in its task by, inter alia, further studying the principles on which such a model agreement could be based and by preparing a preliminary report for consideration by the Committee at its tenth session;

VIII

Transfer of supervision of foreign offenders who have been conditionally sentenced or conditionally released

1. Requests the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control to formulate a model agreement on the transfer of supervision of foreign offenders who have been conditionally sentenced or conditionally released for possible consideration by the Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, taking into account work previously accomplished in this area;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the United Nations regional and interregional institutes for the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders, as well as intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations concerned, to assist the Committee in its task, inter alia, by studying the principles on which such a model agreement could be based and by preparing a preliminary report for consideration by the Committee at its tenth session;

IX

Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement Officials

1. Invites Member States:

(a) To take into account and respect the Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement Officials⁽¹²⁾ within the framework of their national legislation and practice and to bring it to the attention of all persons concerned, particularly law enforcement officials and correctional personnel;

(b) To pay particular attention, in informing the Secretary-General of the extent of the implementation and the progress made with regard to the application of the Code, to the use of force and firearms by law enforcement officials, and to provide the Secretary-General with copies of abstracts of laws, regulations and administrative measures concerning the application of the Code, as well as information on possible difficulties in its application;

2. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) To prepare every five years, beginning in 1987, an independent report on progress made with respect to the implementation of the Code, on the basis of information received from Member States, and to submit the report to the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control at its tenth and subsequent sessions for consideration and further action, as required;

(b) To take into account, in preparing the above-mentioned report, information received from specialized agencies and competent intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations in consultative status with the Economic and Social Council;

(c) To disseminate the Code and to ensure the widest possible reference to and use of the text of the Code by the United Nations in all its relevant programmes, including technical co-operation activities;

3. Requests the Committee at its tenth session to consider measures for the more effective implementation of the Code, in the light of the guidance on the matter provided by the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders;

4. Urges the United Nations regional and interregional institutes for the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders to organize seminars and training courses on the Code and to conduct research on the extent to which the Code is implemented and on the difficulties encountered in its implementation;

5. Requests the Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders and the preparatory meetings for the Congress to consider these questions;

X

Safeguards guaranteeing protection of the rights of those facing the death penalty

1. Urges Member States that have not abolished the death penalty to adopt the safeguards guaranteeing protection of the rights of those facing the death penalty, approved by the Economic and Social Council in its resolution 1984/50 of 25 May 1984, and the measures for the implementation of the safeguards, approved by the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control at its tenth session:

(a) A report on the implementation of the safeguards, drawing on information provided by Member States and competent United Nations offices and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations;

(b) A study on the question of the death penalty and new contributions of the criminal sciences to the matter, subject to the availability of extrabudgetary funds;

XI

Alternatives to imprisonment

1. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) To prepare a report on alternatives to imprisonment and on the reduction of the prison population for the Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders and to report to the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control at its tenth session on progress in this matter, including preparations for a global survey to be initiated in 1988;

(b) To study this question with a view to the formulation of basic principles in this area, as well as minimum safeguards for persons subject to alternatives to imprisonment, and to report thereon to the Committee at its tenth session;

2. Invites the United Nations regional and inter-regional institutes for the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders to assist the Secretary-General in these tasks and to pay special attention to this question in their research and training programmes;

3. Urges intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and other entities concerned to become actively involved in this process;

4. Requests the Committee to consider this question at its tenth session;

5. Requests the Eighth Congress and the preparatory meetings for the Congress to consider this question;

XII

Role of lawyers

1. Requests the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control, in carrying out its mandate under resolution 18 of the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, to pay particular attention to the following:

(a) The need to provide for effective access to legal assistance for all groups within society;

(b) The need to ensure that all those charged with criminal offences have the right to communicate freely and confidentially with counsel of their own choosing; to defend themselves in person or through legal assistance of their own choosing; to be informed, if they do not have legal assistance, of these rights; and to have legal assistance assigned to them, in any case where the interest of justice so requires, without payment by them if they do not have sufficient means to pay for it;

(c) The need to educate the public on the important role lawyers play in protecting fundamental rights and liberties;

(d) The need to ensure that lawyers have appropriate training and qualifications; that they are individuals of integrity and ability; and that there is no discrimination with respect to entry into the legal profession on the grounds of race, colour, sex, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or status;

(e) The role of Governments, bar associations and other professional associations of lawyers in ensuring that lawyers are entitled to give legal assistance and that they are able to perform effectively their proper role, in particular to counsel and represent their clients in accordance with the law, established professional standards and their judgement, without any undue interference from any quarter;

(f) The right of lawyers to undertake the representation of clients or causes without fear of repression or persecution and to carry out their functions to the best of their ability;

(g) The obligation of lawyers to keep communications with their clients confidential, including the right to refuse to give testimony on such matters;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to study these questions with a view to assisting the Committee in its task and to prepare a preliminary report for consideration and further action by the Committee at its tenth session;

3. Invites the United Nations regional and inter-regional institutes for the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders to pay special attention to these questions in their research and training programmes;

4. Urges intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and other entities concerned to become actively involved in this process;

5. Requests the Committee to consider these questions at its tenth session;

6. Requests the Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders and the preparatory meetings for the Congress to consider these questions.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/10

21 May 1986 Meeting 16 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (E/1986/92) without vote, 16 May (meeting 141; draft by Committee on crime (E/1986/25), amended by United States (E/1986/C.2/L.6), orally revised; agenda item 12.

The United States amendments added the second preambular paragraph and section I.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 4 December 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, adopted resolution 41/107 without vote.

Crime prevention and criminal justice

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the need for concerted and systematic efforts by the international community towards more effective crime prevention and criminal justice strategies and policies and, in particular, for co-ordinated practical action to give effect to the conclusions and recommendations of the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders,

Recognizing the pivotal role of the United Nations, through its programme activities and congresses on the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders, in promoting the exchange of expertise and experience and closer international co-operation in this field,

Recalling its resolution 40/32 of 29 November 1985 and Economic and Social Council resolutions 1986/10, 1986/11 and 1986/12 of 21 May 1986,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on crime prevention and criminal justice;

2. Urges Member States and the Secretary-General to make every effort to translate into action, as appropriate, the respective recommendations, policies and conclusions stemming from the Milan Plan of Action and other relevant resolutions and recommendations adopted unanimously by the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders and to ensure that they are adequately followed up;

3. Reaffirms the importance of the United Nations congresses on the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders and of adequate and timely preparations for such congresses by the Secretary-General and by Member States at national, regional and interregional levels;

4. Requests the Economic and Social Council at its first regular session of 1987 to examine in depth the functioning and programme of work of the United Nations in crime prevention and criminal justice, taking into account the results of the review undertaken by the Secretary-General;

5. Invites Member States and the Secretary-General to ensure timely preparations for the Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders;

6. Also invites Member States and the Secretary-General, in the performance of his duties, in implementing the results of the Seventh Congress, to accord priority attention to the forms of crime identified in the Milan Plan of Action;

7. Requests the United Nations Development Programme and the Department of Technical Co-operation and Development of the Secretariat to maintain effective support to the United Nations regional crime prevention institutes and, in this regard, takes note with satisfaction of the measures taken to establish an African regional institute for the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders, and requests all those concerned to co-operate fully so that this project may be put into effect as soon as possible;

8. Invites Member States to contribute to the United Nations Trust Fund for Social Defence in order to facilitate appropriate technical co-operation and exchange of information and experience in the field of crime prevention and control;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly, at its forty-third session, on the implementation of the present 'resolution';

10. Decides to consider at its forty-second session that part of the report of the Economic and Social Council concerning its examination of the review, under the item entitled "Crime prevention and criminal justice".

General Assembly resolution 41/107

4 December 1986 Meeting 97 Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee (A/41/802) without vote, 31 October (meeting 32); 20-nation draft (A/C.3/41/L.27), orally revised; agenda item 91.

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 3rd Committee 16-22, 27, 32; plenary 97.

Initial review of the United Nations programme

As requested by the General Assembly in 1985,⁽³⁾ the Secretary-General presented to the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control in 1986 an initial review of the functioning and programme of work of the United Nations in the field of crime prevention and criminal justice.⁽¹³⁾ The main United Nations activities relating to crime consisted of action-oriented research and policy development; collection, exchange and dissemination of information and experience; standard-setting, i.e., formulation of recommendations, norms and principles; provision of technical assistance; convening of international governmental and expert meetings; and other ways of promoting regional and interregional co-operation. The two main organs providing policy guidance for these activities were the quinquennial United Nations congresses convened under the aegis of the General Assembly, and the Committee on crime, an Economic and Social Council body.

In reviewing the congresses' role and achievements, the contribution made by the regional and interregional preparatory meetings should, according to the Secretary-General, also be noted, in view of the opportunities they provided for dialogue among countries of various regions and with different systems, and for achieving a measure of consensus on the problems faced and the most viable policies for dealing with different aspects of crime prevention and control. The preparatory meetings also proved useful in sustaining the momentum for progress between congresses and further defined and developed regional and scientific approaches to crime prevention and control, in co-operation with the regional institutes and some regional commissions.

Following an overview of the Committee's role and activities, the Secretary-General said it might wish to consider arrangements and methods of work in order to fulfil its expanded responsibilities in the most efficient way, including collaborative arrangements with other bodies and mandates in other areas; the experience of other committees in designating special rapporteurs and convening working groups, for example, might be relevant.

With regard to research activities, they must be interdisciplinary and multisectoral, where necessary; collaborative initiatives, involving UNSDRI and the United Nations regional institutes, would be taken wherever possible.

Concerning formulation and implementation of standards and guidelines, the Secretary-General regarded the Guiding Principles and the Milan Plan of Action as a blueprint to be translated into practice; to that end, national, regional and international action was required and measures must be taken to ensure implementation of the other principles and guidelines adopted in 1985 by the Congress and the General Assembly. Periodic surveys should provide an operational yardstick to gauge both the achievements of individual countries and common progress towards postulated goals.

The Secretary-General saw a need to ensure proper linkages between a crime information network and other development-oriented information systems, including those of UNDP, UNICEF and UNITAR, as well as regional information systems. Closer operational linkages with specialized agencies, particularly ILO, UNESCO, ICAO and WHO, as well as with bodies such as the United Nations University, UNRISD and the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women, should also foster more effective information exchange. Efforts needed to be intensified to inform the public about United Nations norms in criminal justice and other aspects of its work on crime.

There was a need for increased technical assistance; the number of requests received for the Interregional Adviser's services had revealed the extent of that need. The Adviser's work also required substantive and logistical support and adequate follow-up. The relationship of crime prevention to major developmental concerns must be elucidated and drawn to the attention of planners and UNDP resident co-ordinators, so that provisions could be made in time, through special projects or by incorporating appropriate components in related areas, such as education or community development.

NGOs fulfilled a vital role in international crime prevention efforts and their contribution could be further enhanced through information-sharing, scientific co-operation and full integration into the United Nations crime prevention network. Proper linkages between regional activities would further help to strengthen international co-operation.

To achieve closer co-operation and co-ordination among United Nations bodies and other entities concerned, the Secretary-General offered a number of suggestions, most of which were taken up again in his September 1986 report to the General Assembly (see p. 613).

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 21 May, on the recommendation of its Second Committee, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1986/11 without vote.

Initial review of the functioning and programme of work of the United Nations in crime prevention and criminal justice

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling the responsibility assumed by the United Nations in the field of crime prevention and criminal justice under Economic and Social Council resolution 155 C (VII) of 13 August 1948 and General Assembly resolution 415(V) of 1 December 1950, in particular with regard to the convening of the quinquennial United Nations congresses,

Concerned at the escalation of crime and violence in many parts of the world, requiring the constant attention of the world community,

Bearing in mind the importance of the role of the United Nations in raising the awareness of the international community of crime problems and the urgent need for more effective policies and strategies in crime prevention and criminal justice,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 35/171 of 15 December 1980, in which the Assembly endorsed the Caracas Declaration and urged the Secretary-General to implement the conclusions concerning the new perspectives for international co-operation in respect of crime prevention adopted by the Sixth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders,

Reiterating the necessity for the international community to make concerted and systematic efforts to strengthen technical and scientific co-operation in crime prevention and criminal justice and to formulate fair, humane and effective policies directed towards crime control in the context of different political and cultural systems and different stages of economic and social development,

Stressing the urgent need to improve regional, inter-regional and international co-operation and co-ordination and to make concerted efforts to combat crime in its multifaceted aspects,

Recalling Economic and Social Council resolution 1979/19 of 9 May 1979 on the functions and long-term programme of work of the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control,

Recognising the important contributions of the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control in elaborating draft instruments, model agreements and guidelines in crime prevention and criminal justice,

Noting the continuous increase in the work-load of the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Branch of the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs of the United Nations Secretariat, particularly in relation to the mandates approved by the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 40/32 of 29 November 1985, in which the Assembly requested the Secretary-General, in his report to the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control, to initiate a review, as a matter of urgency, of the functioning and programme of work of the United Nations in the field of crime prevention and criminal justice, including the United Nations regional and interregional institutes, paying special attention to improving the co-ordination of relevant activities within the United Nations in all related areas,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the initial review of the functioning and programme of work of the United Nations in the field of crime prevention and criminal justice;

2. Reaffirms the importance of the quinquennial United Nations congresses on the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders, the productive results of which have been widely recognized and endorsed by Member States, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and the academic community;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to make the necessary arrangements to ensure the optimal functioning of the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control, including more active inter-sessional involvement of the Committee members at the national, regional and interregional levels in considering priority questions and preparing recommendations thereon, without additional cost to the United Nations;

4. Urges the Secretary-General to look critically at the existing structure and level of management of the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Branch of the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs, with a view to strengthening its capacity and status commensurate with its responsibilities, including the possibility of providing additional expertise to enable the Branch to respond more effectively to mandates given by the legislative bodies concerning new programme areas, taking into account current budgetary constraints and the need to redeploy resources, as necessary;

5. Endorses the recommendations made by the Secretary-General in paragraph 82 of his report, urges the Secretary-General and the entities concerned to initiate the implementation of those recommendations and, in particular, invites the Secretary-General to make all efforts, within the existing resources allocated to the Branch and any extrabudgetary resources that may become available:

(a) To establish, in co-operation with the United Nations institutes and other entities concerned, a global crime and criminal justice information network, with the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Branch serving as a focal point, including a mechanism for the centralization of inputs from non-governmental organizations and scientific institutions;

(b) To strengthen the critically needed interregional advisory services in the field of crime prevention and criminal justice; to provide technical and regional advisers as well as additional interregional advisers as quickly as budgetary resources permit; and to strengthen the professional capacity of the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Branch to support, follow up and develop technical assistance projects and to co-ordinate the activities of the regional and interregional institutes in this regard;

(c) To ensure the full co-ordination of activities relating to crime prevention and criminal justice in the United Nations system, with a view to maximizing it and avoiding duplication, taking into account the pivotal role played by the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control in pursuance of Economic and Social Council resolution 1979/19;

(d) To strengthen public information activities to promote the dissemination of the Milan Plan of Action, the Guiding Principles for Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice in the Context of Development and a New International Economic Order and other international instruments and resolutions adopted by the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders and the General Assembly at its fortieth session;

6. Requests the United Nations funding agencies, particularly the United Nations Development Programme, to provide the United Nations institutes with the necessary resources to assist them in carrying out their programmes, and appeals to Governments of the respective regions to contribute generously and systematically to technical co-operation activities undertaken by the institutes;

7. Appeals to Governments to contribute financially, through the United Nations Trust Fund for Social Defence, to the development of technical assistance activities and action-oriented research and training, particularly in the developing countries;

8. Takes note with satisfaction of the steps taken towards the establishment of an African institute for the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders, urges the Secretary-General and all organizations and agencies involved in this project to take further steps to ensure its prompt creation, if possible before the end of 1986, and appeals to Governments in that region to co-operate fully in this respect and to promote the establishment of regional institutes in regions where they do not yet exist;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report to the Committee at its tenth session and to the General Assembly at its forty-third session, taking into account the views of the Committee and containing specific proposals on the implementation of the present resolution.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/11

21 May 1986 Meeting 16 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (E/1986/92) without vote, 16 May (meeting 14); draft by Committee on crime (E/1986/25), orally amended by United Kingdom: agenda item 12.

The United Kingdom's amendments added the final phrases in paragraphs 4 and 5, concerning budgetary resources.

Third survey of crime trends and criminal justice

The Committee on Crime Prevention and Control, at its March 1986 session, discussed preparation of a third survey of crime trends, operations of criminal justice systems and crime prevention strategies. The second survey had been submitted in 1984.⁽¹³⁾ In the same year, the Economic and Social Council had requested⁽¹⁴⁾ the Secretary-General to maintain and develop the United Nations crime-related data base by continuing to conduct quinquennial surveys and to report periodically to the Committee on the progress made. Before the Committee in 1986 was a preliminary assessment by the Secretary-General of crime prevention and criminal justice in the context of development, on the basis of the results of the second survey.

An expert group meeting was held at the Helsinki Institute (9-11 April) with a view to selecting the most appropriate format for the third survey.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 21 May 1986, on the recommendation of its Second Committee, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1986/12 without vote.

Crime prevention and criminal justice in the context of development

The Economic and Social Council,

Having considered the report of the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control concerning crime prevention and criminal justice in the context of development,

Recalling its resolution 1984/48 of 25 May 1984 on crime prevention and criminal justice in the context of development,

Taking into account resolution 9, on the development of crime and criminal justice information and statistical systems, adopted by the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders,

Emphasizing again the importance of the collection and analysis of crime-related data at the national and international levels as a basis for informed decision-making with regard to crime prevention and the effective and fair administration of justice,

Noting with appreciation the progress made by the Secretary-General in the establishment of a United Nations crime-related data base,

Recognising the need to increase the response rate of Member States to the periodical surveys of crime-related data in order to broaden the understanding of crime and its prevention as well as the operations of criminal justice systems throughout the world,

1. Recommends that the questionnaire for the next United Nations Survey of Crime Trends, Operations of Criminal Justice Systems and Crime Prevention Strategies should be abbreviated and simplified, to the extent practicable without materially reducing its scope and utility, so as to increase the response rate from Member States;

2. Invites the United Nations regional institutes for the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders to encourage and assist Member States in their regions in completing the next Survey and to render such assistance as requested by the Secretariat in the analysis and publication of the data, within existing resources;

3. Recommends further that the work of the next Survey should include the collection and analysis of data and of information and recommendations concerning the national use of information systems in crime prevention and the administration of justice in Member States;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to strengthen, as far as possible within existing resources, the capacity of the Secretariat to collect and analyse action-oriented recommendations on crime prevention and the administration of criminal justice, as well as crime data.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/12

21 May 1986 Meeting 16 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (E/1986/92) without vote, 16 May (meeting 14); draft by Committee on crime (E/1986/25); agenda item 12.

Preparations for the Eighth Congress

At its March 1986 session, the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control discussed preparations for the Eighth (1990) Congress. The Committee reached agreement on the following items to be discussed by the Congress: crime prevention and criminal justice in the context of development-realities and perspectives of international co-operation; criminal justice policies in relation to problems of imprisonment, other penal sanctions and alternative measures; effective national and international action against organized crime and terrorist criminal activities; prevention of delinquency, juvenile justice and the protection of the young—policy approaches and directions; and United Nations norms and guidelines in crime prevention and criminal justice i —implementation and priorities for further standard-setting.

By a 14 March resolution, the Committee, considering that the reintegration of offenders into the community was one of the questions that would be before the Eighth Congress, called on Governments to consider including re-education and rehabilitation of offenders as an important component in their national plans on crime prevention and treatment of offenders.⁽¹⁵⁾

Following discussion of a note by the Secretary-General on the review of the rules of procedure for United Nations crime congresses,⁽¹⁶⁾ the Committee decided on 5 March⁽¹⁷⁾ to defer consideration of the question to a future session.

Committee on crime prevention

The Committee on Crime Prevention and Control held its ninth session at Vienna from 5 to 14 March

By decision 1986/107 of 7 February, the Economic and Social Council had referred to the Committee the 1985 General Assembly resolutions on the development of standards for prevention of juvenile delinquency⁽¹⁸⁾ and on domestic violence,⁽¹⁹⁾ and the 1985 Congress resolutions on research on youth, crime and juvenile justice and on standard minimum rules for protection of juveniles deprived of their liberty.⁽²⁰⁾

In its report to the Economic and Social Council,⁽²¹⁾ the Committee recommended live draft resolutions for the Council's adoption: implementation of the conclusions and recommendations of the 1985 Congress (draft resolution I); initial review of the functioning and programme of work of the United Nations in crime prevention and criminal justice (draft resolution II); resources and procedure for implementing United Nations work in crime prevention and control (draft resolution III); preparations for the Eighth Congress (draft resolution IV); and crime prevention and criminal justice in the context of development (draft resolution V).

The Committee also adopted a resolution and two decisions which were brought to the Council's attention.

The Council, by decision 1986/130 of 21 May, took note of the Committee's report and approved the provisional agenda and documentation for its tenth (1988) session, as recommended by the Committee.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

In May, on the recommendation of its Second Committee, the Economic and Social Council adopted decision 1986/129 without vote.

Report of the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control

At its 16th plenary meeting, on 21 May 1986, the Economic and Social Council decided:

(a) To reaffirm the importance of the activities of the United Nations in crime prevention and criminal justice and the need to maintain the resources currently provided to the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Branch of the Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs to enable it to continue to discharge its mandated responsibilities;

(b) To take note of draft resolution III contained in the report of the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control on its ninth session and to request the Secretary-General to take it into account in the preparation of the urgent review of the functioning and programme of work of the United Nations in the field of crime prevention and criminal justice requested by the General Assembly in its resolution 40/32 of 29 November 1985;

(c) To take note of the special relevance of the review, notably with respect to resource constraints and the need for priority-setting in the programme of work of the United Nations in crime prevention and criminal justice;

(d) To take note of draft resolution IV contained in the report of the Committee and to request the Secretary-General to include within the urgent review an examination of the arrangements for periodical congresses, including their objectives and results, periodicity, duration, cost and method of preparation;

(e) To transmit draft resolutions III and IV contained in the report of the Committee to the Economic and Social Council at its first regular session of 1987 for consideration, so that the Council may take into account the report of the Secretary-General.

Economic and Social Council decision 1986/129

Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (E/1986/92) without vote; 16 May (meeting 14); 2-nation draft (E/1986/C.2/L.4/Rev.1); agenda item 12.

Cultural development

Proclamation of the World Decade for Cultural Development

In a 20 June 1986 note,⁽¹⁾ the Secretary-General brought to the attention of the Economic and Social Council a message from the Director-General of UNESCO proposing inclusion of a supplementary item on the proclamation of a World Decade for Cultural Development in the agenda of the Council. The Director-General had been invited by the UNESCO General Conference in 1985⁽²⁾ to take the necessary steps for the proclamation to be submitted to the General Assembly. The Secretary-General also forwarded to the Council a revised draft plan of action for the Decade;⁽³⁾ the plan was to be finalized in the light of possible comments to be made in the Council and the Assembly.

The Executive Board of UNESCO, in May 1986, had invited the Director-General to transmit the plan to the Assembly and to continue consultations with a view to expanding it. The Board's decision and the 1985 General Conference resolution on the Decade, were annexed to the Secretary-General's June note.⁽¹⁾

At its April 1986 session,⁽⁴⁾ CCSQ(PROG) considered UNESCO's proposals regarding the co-ordination of activities within the United Nations system relating to the Decade and decided that it would be responsible for co-ordinating those activities. Meanwhile, it was ensuring the exchange of information and co-ordination of activities relating to the Decade with the activities of the system in related areas.

At CCSQ(PROG)'s October session,⁽⁵⁾ a UNESCO representative noted that the modalities of co-ordination of Decade-related activities, as well as the setting up of an intergovernmental programme and the establishment of a permanent secretariat in UNESCO, would be considered in the light of action taken by the Assembly.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

By decision 1986/152 of 2 July 1986, the Economic and Social Council decided to consider the question of the proclamation of the Decade under the item on international co-ordination in the United Nations system, on the understanding that no substantive decision would be taken, but only a procedural decision to transmit the draft plan of action to the Assembly.

On 23 July, on the recommendation of its Third (Programme and Co-ordination) Committee, the Council adopted resolution 1986/69 without vote.

World decade for cultural development

The Economic and Social Council,

Having been informed of recommendation No. 27 adopted by the World Conference on Cultural Policies organized by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation at Mexico City in 1982, in which it recommended that the General Conference of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization propose to the General Assembly of the United Nations the proclamation of a world decade for cultural development,

Having also been informed of the matter by the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in conformity with resolution 11.10 adopted by the General Conference at its twenty-third session and decision 5.4.1 adopted by the Executive Board of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization at its one hundred and twenty-fourth session,

Taking note of the draft plan of action for the decade submitted by the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization,

Recalling that the subject was raised in a preliminary manner at its second regular session of 1984 and that, by its decision 1984/176 of 26 July 1984, it took note of the proposal, Recommends that the General Assembly take a decision at its forty-first session on the question of the proclamation of a world decade for cultural development.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/69

23 July 1986 Meeting 38 Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee (E/1986/126/Add.1) without vote, 17 July (meeting 16); draft by Chairman (E/1986/C.3/L.21), orally revised; agenda item 20.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December 1986, the General Assembly, acting on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, adopted resolution 41/187 by recorded vote.

Proclamation of the World Decade for Cultural Development

The General Assembly,

Considering recommendation No. 27 adopted by the World Conference on Cultural Policies convened by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization at Mexico City in 1982, in which it recommended that the General Conference of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization propose to the General Assembly of the United Nations the proclamation of a world decade for cultural development,

Considering also resolutions 11.20 of 25 November 1983 and 11.10 of 8 November 1985 adopted by the General Conference of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization at its twenty-second and twenty-third sessions, respectively,

Recalling Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/69 of 23 July 1986, in which the Council recommended that the General Assembly take a decision at its forty-first session on the question of the proclamation of a world decade for cultural development,

Taking into account the interest that the international community, including the organizations of the United Nations system, have shown in the proposed decade,

Recognising that voluntary efforts at the national level by interested individuals and non-governmental and governmental organizations are principal vehicles for advancing the objectives of the decade,

Taking note of the draft plan of action for the world decade for cultural development, submitted by the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization,

1. Proclaims the period 1988-1997 the World Decade for Cultural Development, to be observed under the auspices of the United Nations and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization;

2. Approves the four main objectives of the Decade: acknowledging the cultural dimension of development; affirming and enriching cultural identities; broadening participation in culture; promoting international cultural co-operation;

3. Invites all States, intergovernmental and international non-governmental organizations, and interested individuals to take an active part in the fulfilment of the objectives of the Decade and, for that purpose, to make available, on a voluntary basis and taking into consideration their particular situation, priorities and means, the necessary intellectual, human and financial resources;

4. Encourages the organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system participating in the fulfilment of the objectives of the Decade to do so in a manner that is in accordance with established programme priorities and does not entail additional financial implications for non-voluntarily funded programmes;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure, through the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination, that activities undertaken by the United Nations system in support of the Decade are co-ordinated in such a manner as to avoid duplication and overlap;

6. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to report biennially to the General Assembly, through the Economic and Social Council at its second regular session, on the progress of the World Decade for Cultural Development.

8 December 1986 Meeting 100 146-1-2 (recorded vote)

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/930/Add.2) by roll-call vote (122-1-2). 28 November (meeting 35); draft by Vice-Chairman, for Group of 77 (A/C.2/41/L.49/Rev.2), orally revised; agenda item 12.

Meeting numbers. GA 41 st session: 2nd Committee 25,27,28,33-35; plenary 100.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Germany, Federal Republic of, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zambia.

Against: United States.

Abstaining: Israel, United Kingdom.

According to the United States, the plan of action had few concrete goals and, given the current financial crisis of the Organization, the time was inappropriate for launching a new decade based on a vague concept. Also voicing reservations to the plan of action and terming it unrealistically ambitious, as well as to the dirigiste philosophy implied by certain parts of it, the United Kingdom considered it unfortunate that it had been impossible to reach full agreement on the co-ordination arrangements for and financial implications of the proposed Decade.

The sponsors' willingness to accommodate many delegations' concerns enabled it to vote in favour, New Zealand explained, and the request for voluntary contributions in paragraph 3 had been a major factor in obtaining its support. Over-use of the concept of United Nations-sponsored decades should be avoided, and Decade activities should not detract from existing programmes; also, periodic assessments of the Decade should be conducted to ensure that the spirit and letter of the adopted text were respected.

Speaking also on behalf of Bulgaria, the Byelorussian SSR, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Mongolia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, Czechoslovakia said their positive votes were based on their approach to the cultural activities of the United Nations and in particular of UNESCO; the Decade would provide ample opportunity for activities that would contribute to the implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade (the 1980s).⁽⁶⁾

Yugoslavia, speaking for the Group of 77, said observance of the Decade was of major importance for all countries; its proclamation had been inspired by a desire to promote culture and raise educational standards.

Centenary of the Berne Convention

Noting that 9 September 1986 was the one hundredth anniversary of the adoption of the Berne Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works, the World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO), in 1985,⁽²⁾ had invited all States to consider adhering to the Convention and requested that its resolution be brought to the attention of the Economic and Social Council in 1986 for the adoption of an appropriate recommendation.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

By decision 1986/108 of 7 February 1986, the Economic and Social Council decided to consider the WIPO resolution at its second regular session of 1986.

On 23 July, following the recommendation of its Third Committee, the Council adopted resolution 1986/68 without vote.

Centenary of the Berne Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works

The Economic and Social Council,

Referring to article 27, paragraph 2, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which provides that everyone has the right to the protection of the moral and material interests resulting from any scientific, literary or artistic production of which he is the author,

Bearing in mind that, in accordance with Article 62, paragraphs 1 and 2, of the Charter of the United Nations, the Economic and Social Council may make recommendations with respect to international economic, social, cultural, educational and related matters and may make recommendations for the purpose of promoting respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all.

Recalling that 9 September 1986 will be the one hundredth anniversary of the adoption of the Berne Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works,

1. Notes with satisfaction that, in the first century of the existence of the Berne Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works, the number of countries of the Union created by that Convention had increased from nine to seventy-six;

2. Declares its conviction that the Berne Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works, by providing at the international level for the protection of the rights of authors in as effective and uniform a manner as possible, contributes to the practical implementation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and to cultural, social and economic development in all countries of the Berne Union;

3. Recommends that all States not yet members of the Berne Union treat 1986, the year of the centenary of the Berne Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works, as an occasion for considering the possibility of adhering to that international Convention.

Chapter XIII

Population

The work of the United Nations system in population matters during 1986 continued through demographic analysis and research and through the provision of information and technical assistance to Member States. The United Nations Fund for Population Activities (UNFPA) approved 355 new technical assistance projects, amounting to $25.3 million; it continued to focus on the needs of the 53 countries given priority status, which received 68.5 per cent of country programme resources. In June, the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP)—the Fund's governing body—urged the UNFPA Executive Director to increase the attention given to countries of sub-Saharan Africa.

Having considered a report by the Secretary-General on follow-up to the 1984 International Conference on Population, the Economic and Social Council, in May, requested the Secretary-General to implement those recommendations falling within the competence of the United Nations Secretariat and urged the international community to strengthen further the resource base of UNFPA through greater contributions (resolution 1986/7).

The fourth annual United Nations Population Award went to Mexico's National Population Council for its work in integrating demographic planning with economic and social development programmes. In December, the General Assembly amended the annex to its 1981 resolution which established the Award so that it could be shared by an individual and an institution (decision 41/445).

Follow-up to the 1984 Conference on Population

In accordance with a 1984 General Assembly resolution,⁽¹⁾ the Secretary-General submitted to the Assembly and the Economic and Social Council a report⁽²⁾ on follow-up to the 1984 International Conference on Population.⁽³⁾ As requested by the Council in 1985,⁽⁴⁾ the Secretary-General, in preparing the report, took into account views expressed at the 1985 Population Commission session⁽⁵⁾ and in communications from or consultations with Commission members, the UNDP Governing Council, specialized agencies, regional commissions, non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and population experts.

The report concluded that consolidating the diverse activities of the United Nations in population and establishing a separate entity to combine the functions of research and analysis, data collection, technical co-operation, and monitoring and evaluation did not appear feasible at the current stage. The Secretary-General therefore put forward recommendations to improve the efficiency of the system in the field of population within the framework of existing institutions and arrangements.

With regard to the Economic and Social Council, he recommended that population questions be considered at its second regular session each year when it reviewed the reports of the UNDP Governing Council and the regional commissions and addressed co-ordination issues. Noting that there was a clear need to improve the flow of information between the Governing Council and the Population Commission, the Secretary-General recommended that each should receive reports on the other's work, that the Commission should be enabled to advise the Economic and Social Council on improving co-operation and co-ordination within the system, and that the Governing Council should devote greater attention to UNFPA issues.

With regard to the regional commissions, it was recommended that they be enabled to co-ordinate the activities of United Nations organizations and the specialized agencies within the regions, that increasing attention be given to strengthening their activities when the financial situation improved, that both the Population Commission and the UNDP Governing Council receive regional commission inputs on population matters, and that the commissions be more actively involved in the monitoring, review and appraisal of the 1974 World Population Plan of Action.⁽⁶⁾

Measures recommended to strengthen UNFPA activities included: strengthening UNFPA's resource base; reviewing its work more comprehensively by enabling the UNDP Governing Council to give adequate attention to UNFPA matters and providing the Population Commission with information on UNFPA work and Governing Council consideration; ensuring that technical and professional expertise available in the United Nations system was used by UNFPA to formulate, develop, execute, appraise and approve projects; improving delivery of assistance by UNFPA; improving co-ordination between UNFPA and executing agencies; and reinforcing the field presence of UNFPA.

The report also recommended that co-ordination be improved in relation to efforts at the national level, technical co-operation in the field and inter-agency collaboration. Collaboration with NGOs should also be improved by preparing, in the first instance, a comprehensive and updated list of NGOs.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 21 May 1986, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1986/7 without vote.

Population questions

The Economic and Social Council.

Recalling General Assembly resolution 39/228 of 18 December 1984 on the International Conference on Population,

Recalling also Council resolution 1985/4 of 28 May 1985,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the follow-up to General Assembly resolution 39/228, which suggests steps to be taken with regard to the relevant recommendations of the International Conference on Population, in particular recommendation 83 relating to the further strengthening of the United Nations Fund for Population Activities so as to ensure the more effective delivery of population assistance, taking into account the growing needs in the field of population;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to implement those recommendations that fall within the competence of the United Nations Secretariat, bearing in mind the need to strengthen and improve, within their respective mandates, existing institutions and arrangements and to secure more effective interaction between them in an effort to reinforce international co-operation in the field of population;

3. Decides to consider the report of the Population Commission and relevant chapters of the report of the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme, together with relevant inputs from the regional commissions, at its second regular session, under an item entitled "Population questions", bearing in mind the overall responsibilities and policy functions of the Economic and Social Council in population matters;

4. Reaffirms the importance of the research activities and policy analysis of the United Nations in the field of population;

5. Invites the Population Commission to act upon the recommendations contained in paragraph 70 of the report of the Secretary-General;

6. Invites also the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme, as the governing body of the United Nations Fund for Population Activities:

(a) To use reports of the Population Commission for greater exchange of information on population questions;

(b) To give adequate consideration to Fund matters, bearing in mind the importance of population issues and the separate identity of the Fund as stated in paragraph 3 of General Assembly resolution 3019(XXVII) of 18 December 1972:

(c) To continue to organize its work programme in a manner that will facilitate the consideration of Fund matters before relevant budgetary and administrative issues are taken up in the Budget and Finance Committee of the Governing Council;

7. Reaffirms the aims and purposes of the United Nations Fund for Population Activities as set out in Council resolution 1763(LIV) of 18 May 1973;

8. Urges the international community to strengthen further the resource base of the Fund through greater contributions, in order to meet the increasing needs of the developing countries for assistance in population activities;

9. Emphasizes the need to elaborate a co-ordinated, effective and efficient strategy for the United Nations and the United Nations system to address population issues;

10. Stresses that effective co-ordination in the field of population can be achieved through efforts of Governments at the national level and through improved inter-agency collaboration at all levels;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to inform the General Assembly at its forty-second session, through the Economic and Social Council, on the implementation of the present resolution;

12. Also requests the Secretary-General to keep under review the follow-up to General Assembly resolution 39/228 and to include a separate section on the subject in the overview report requested in paragraph 6 of Council resolution 1985/4, taking into account the comments made by delegations at the first regular session of 1986 of the Council, the thirty-third session of the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme and the forty-first session of the General Assembly.

Meeting numbers. ESC 11-13, 15, 16.

UNDP Council action. On 27 June 1986,⁽⁷⁾ the UNDP Governing Council took note of the Secretary-General's report on follow-up to the Conference. It decided to utilize Population Commission reports during its discussion of Fund-related questions, to review at its 1987 organizational meeting the number of meetings to be allocated to UNFPA questions, and to continue organizing its work programme to facilitate consideration of Fund-related items in plenary meetings before taking up budgetary and administrative questions.

UN Fund for Population Activities

UNFPA activities

In 1986, the United Nations Fund for Population Activities continued to focus on the priority programme areas outlined by the UNDP Governing Council in 1981:⁽¹⁾ family planning; communication and education; basic data collection; utilization of population data and research for policy formulation and development planning; and multisectoral activities. Work also continued on special programme interests: women, population and development; youth; and the question of aging. Details of 1986 activities and other aspects of the UNFPA programme were described by the UNFPA Executive Director in his annual report to the UNDP Governing Council.⁽²⁾

UNFPA income in 1986 totalled $140 million, compared with $142.9 million in 1985. Project allocations totalled $116 million, including an $18 million carry-over from 1985, compared with $141.4 million in 1985. Expenditures were $132.2 million ($148.9 million in 1985) and included $71.8 million for country programmes, $29.9 million for intercountry programmes, $5.9 million for field office costs and $15.9 million for the administrative budget. Agency support costs totalled $8.7 million in 1986 ($7.8 million in 1985).

At year's end, UNFPA was assisting 2,887 projects—2,275 country, 262 regional, 168 inter-regional and 182 global. In 1986, 135 projects were completed, bringing the cumulative total to 2,392.

UNFPA assistance for maternal and child health and family planning (MCH/FP) programmes totalled $59.4 million or 51.2 per cent of total allocations. To ensure effective programme development and implementation, much attention was given to developing a solid human resource base, particularly in countries which had only recently begun to make MCH/FP services available. Emphasis was placed on the training of trainers and preparation of managers through short- and long-term training, the latter quite often through master's degree programmes in public health.

UNFPA sought to promote the concept of management-related research as a key to extending the accessibility and improving the quality of family planning services. Although support for operational and biomedical research was limited in most countries to assistance for one or two relatively modest-scale investigations, resources were made available in China, Egypt and Indonesia for rather large-scale programmes comprising many separate investigations. In order to improve programme management, UNFPA provided assistance for workshops on improving managerial skills and on priorities in operations research. It also focused on improving the quality of services through training at the country level, especially in Africa where the need for personnel to deliver MCH/FP services was particularly acute, as well as contraceptive and family planning research. In support of its policy of encouraging countries to offer as broad a range of contraceptive methods as possible, UNFPA provided equipment for sterilization, oral and injectable contraceptives, intrauterine devices and NORPLANT subdermal contraceptive implants. It also continued to support projects aimed at natural family planning methods.

Support for population education and communication activities totalled $18 million, or 15.5 per cent of all allocations. Projects were aimed at enabling those making decisions related to population to do so in as informed a manner as possible. Project personnel training continued to receive high priority at the regional and country levels and new emphasis was placed on improving the relevance and usefulness of prototype teaching materials developed regionally for use at the country level. There was increased interest in population education and communication in 1986, with 17 countries in sub-Saharan Africa, the Middle East and Latin America requesting UNFPA funding for new projects. There was considerable project growth in Africa where, in January 1985, there had been only one UNFPA-funded population communication project operational, with funds totalling $1.2 million. By the end of 1986, there were 7 funded projects in operation and 10 under preparation, with funds amounting to some $6 million. A set of policy guidelines for UNFPA support to population education were issued in 1986, outlining activities UNFPA would support in education programmes and providing operational guidelines for the components for which it would assist in population education projects.

Some $10.9 million, or 9.4 per cent of all allocations, was devoted to basic data collection. During 1986, UNFPA assisted 59 countries for work on population censuses, 26 countries for undertaking population surveys, 28 countries for establishing or strengthening civil registration and vital statistics systems and 3 countries for other data collection activities.

A total of $21.4 million or 18.5 per cent of UNFPA assistance was devoted to programmes on population dynamics, formulation and evaluation of population policies and programmes and policy implementation, which were aimed at increasing the capacity of countries to undertake research and analysis and to set up the institutional structures required for effective population policies. Activities to which support was provided included: analysis of demographic and socio-economic data; research on the determinants and consequences of fertility, mortality and migration; studies on the social and economic consequences of population trends; urbanization; demographic estimates and projections; the interrelationships between population, environment, resources and development; the integration of population factors into national development strategies; and the formulation and evaluation of population policies.

Multisector activities totalled $3.8 million, or 3.2 per cent of total programme allocations. This category comprised activities aimed at building and strengthening national, regional and global capabilities to respond to needs in the population field, including research, training in programme development, workshops, seminars and dissemination of information.

Support for special programme interests, totalling $2.5 million or 2.2 per cent of total programme allocations, included issues of women, population and development, youth, and the question of aging. In 1986, UNFPA approved 39 projects, with allocations of nearly $4 million, designed to improve the situation of women. Most of the projects were at the country level and dealt with education, training and skills development or institution-building, often supporting the activities of women's organizations. A special unit was established for women and youth as the focal point for all UNFPA activities aimed at the inclusion of women in population activities. UNFPA continued to support projects dealing with population education in and out of schools and with strengthening family life education and family planning services for youth. It also supported a variety of projects which attempted to analyse population dynamics underlying the trend towards increasing numbers and proportions of older persons, their distribution and policy implications.

Following consideration of the Executive Director's report on UNFPA's 1985 activities,⁽³⁾ the UNDP Governing Council, on 27 June 1986,⁽⁴⁾ urged the Executive Director, in the light of the General Assembly's special session on the critical economic situation in Africa (see p. 442), to give increased attention to countries of the sub-Saharan African region and to submit to the Council in 1987 a strategy for Fund assistance to that region, taking into account those countries' needs, the activities of other United Nations organizations and the catalytic role which the Fund could play in addressing those needs. The Council urged the Executive Director to continue to strengthen co-ordination in population matters with all organizations concerned, particularly the United Nations Children's Fund, the World Health Organization (WHO), the World Bank and the regional banks involved in population matters, to ensure complementary efforts to build up an infrastructure for health and population activities. The Council also requested him to present in 1987 an internal implementation strategy to strengthen the Fund's capacity to deal with issues of women in development.

International Conference on Population and the Urban Future. The International Conference on Population and the Urban Future was convened by UNFPA at Barcelona, Spain, from 19 to 22 May 1986. This second major international conference on urbanization—the first having taken place in 1980⁽⁵⁾—was co-sponsored by Spanish national, regional and local authorities, including the Metropolitan Corporation of Barcelona which hosted the meeting, the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements and the International Union of Local Authorities, an NGO in consultative status with the Economic and Social Council.

On 22 May, the Conference unanimously approved the Barcelona Declaration on Population and the Urban Future 1986. The Declaration's preamble stated that more than 40 per cent of the world population lived in urban areas and, by the early twenty-first century, that figure would rise to more than half. In 1970, the total urban population of the developed countries was 3 million more than in the developing countries, whereas by 1985 the urban population of the developing countries was 300 million more than that of the developed. By the year 2000, the urban population of developing countries would be almost double that of the developed and 25 years after it would be almost four times as large. In the developed countries, however, there was a trend towards deconcentration.

The Declaration contained a series of recommendations, for implementation at the city, national and international levels, in the areas of: policy formulation and planning; services; and data collection, research and training.

In co-operation with the Government of Mexico, UNFPA sponsored a Conference on Population and Small and Medium-sized Cities in Latin America and the Caribbean (Mexico City, 24-28 February) (see Chapter VII of this section).

On 27 June,⁽⁴⁾ the UNDP Governing Council, taking note of the Barcelona Declaration on Population and the Urban Future and the Mexico Declaration on Population and Small and Medium-sized Cities in Latin America and the Caribbean, requested the UNFPA Executive Director to continue Fund support for research, training and other programme activities, including the holding of technical meetings in the areas of migration, urbanization and population distribution, and to persevere in efforts relating to maternal and child health, family planning and changes in the age structure of populations in both rural and high-density areas.

Country and intercountry programmes

In 1986, UNFPA continued to focus on the needs of countries given priority status in 1982,⁽⁶⁾ of which 30 were in Africa, 16 in Asia and the Pacific, 5 in the Middle East and the Mediterranean and 2 in Latin America and the Caribbean. Of the total resources allocated to country programmes and projects in 1986 ($84 million), $57.4 million or 68.5 per cent was allocated to those 53 countries.

In a March report to the UNDP Governing Council,⁽⁷⁾ the UNFPA Executive Director reviewed the system of priority countries and outlined some programme guidelines for priority and non-priority countries. He called for action on the part of the Council to strengthen further the system of priority countries. On 27 June,⁽⁴⁾ the Council agreed that the system of priority countries should be continued and that the Executive Director should have flexibility in implementing programme guidelines with due attention to per capita delivery of programme resources in those countries, and requested him to submit in 1988 a further report on the Fund's experience in using the existing set of criteria, with suggestions for modifications to them, if necessary.

Intercountry programmes (regional, interregional and global) amounted to $32 million in 1986, or 27.6 per cent of total allocations. Activities covered were technical assistance and backstopping, training, research, and information exchange activities through clearing-houses and population information networks.

In response to a 1984 Governing Council decision,⁽⁸⁾ the UNFPA Executive Director submitted a report⁽⁹⁾ in which he clarified the definition of intercountry activities and reviewed the possibility of revising the definition and the target. The report did not suggest a new definition of intercountry activities, but proposed a new target of 20 per cent of programmable resources, but no less than $25 million. Regional and interregional advisory services would be exempt from the target since advisers were multi-country experts.

By a 27 June 1986 decision,⁽⁴⁾ the Governing Council requested the Executive Director, beginning in 1987, to report on the level of support to intercountry activities and technical advisory services for the previous year, to develop a system for attributing intercountry activities to countries receiving that assistance, identifying and assigning administrative activities charged to intercountry programmes to the administrative budget, and to present the system to the Council in 1987. The Council decided to assist the who Special Programme of Research, Development and Research Training in Human Reproduction and also decided that the number of technical advisers should remain at 1986 levels or decline in all regions, except for Africa, where an additional three advisers were approved.

By the same decision, the Council approved Fund assistance to large-scale country and intercountry programmes included in the Fund's 1987-1990 work plan, the level of assistance to be determined by the Executive Director depending on the availability of resources. He was authorized to seek multilateral and bilateral support should resources not become available for the entire funding of proposed programmes for the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Egypt, Jordan, Mozambique, Pakistan, the Syrian Arab Republic and Zaire, and for the establishment of the International Centre for Training and Research in Population and Development in association with the United Nations at the Catholic University of Louvain, Belgium.

Work programmes

The UNFPA work plan for 1987-1990, prepared by its Executive Director, comprised two alternative scenarios: the higher assuming a contribution by a major donor of UNFPA (the United States); the lower with no contribution from that donor. Under the higher scenario, a total income of $728.3 million was expected—$165 million for 1987, $175.8 million for 1988, $187.5 million for 1989 and $200 million for 1990. Under the lower scenario, the expected income totalled $608.3 million—$135 million for 1987, $145.8 million for 1988, $157.5 million for 1989 and $170 million for 1990. After deductions for operational costs and additions to the operational reserve, programmable resources were expected to total $558 million for the four years under the higher scenario ($125.7 million for 1987, $134.2 million for 1988, $142.9 million for 1989 and $155.2 million for 1990) and $454.6 million under the lower scenario ($104 million for 1987, $109.6 million for 1988, $116.3 million for 1989 and $124.7 million for 1990).

The report also contained the Executive Director's final review and reassessment of the UNFPA programme for 1982-1985. The actual income for those years amounted to only $547.5 million, compared with the original estimate of $629 million. Although year-end 1985 project allocations amounted to $141.3 million, available resources totalled only $131.6 million. Thus, 1985 allocations showed an over-programming of $9.7 million above available resources, which was 8.5 per cent of new programmable resources, while the maximum permitted over-programming was 5 per cent, or $5.7 million. The excess over-programming of $4 million was attributable to one major donor (the United States) having paid $10 million less than it had pledged. The report also gave information on distribution of resources between country and intercountry activities and allocations to country programmes and projects during that period.

In the report, the Executive Director submitted new country programmes and projects to the UNDP Governing Council, which approved them on 27 June (see above).

Also on 27 June,⁽⁴⁾ the Governing Council approved the final report of the Executive Director on the review and reassessment. It also gave its approval to: a revised programme ceiling for 1986 of $108 million, including an increase in over-programming to 10 per cent above new programmable resources; and the borrowing of $5 million in 1986 and $3 million in 1987 from the operational reserve for programme purposes. The Board approved the Fund's 1987-1990 work plan at the higher scenario, on the understanding that the Executive Director would implement the plan in accordance with the lower scenario until the resources of the higher scenario became available. The Council authorized the net additional approval authority in accordance with the 1987-1990 work plan at the higher scenario in the amounts of: $49.3 million for 1987, bringing the total to $165 million; $46.6 million for 1988, bringing the total to 75 per cent of the 1987 level, or $123.7 million; $43.9 million for 1989, bringing the total to 50 per cent of the 1987 level, or $82.5 million; and 25 per cent of the 1987 level, or $41.2 million, for 1990.

Monitoring and evaluation

During the first half of 1986, four independent, in-depth evaluations were undertaken of UNFPA-assisted programmes and projects in Burkina Faso, Mali, Somalia and the Syrian Arab Republic, the results of which were presented to the UNDP Governing Council.⁽²⁾

In November, guidelines were issued on monitoring and evaluation of UNFPA-supported projects and programmes for a one-year period of field testing. The guidelines included revised instructions for tripartite reviews and country reviews and new minimum reporting requirements for internal evaluations. Training for users of the guidelines was envisaged for 1987.

In a report to the Governing Council,⁽¹¹⁾ the UNFPA Executive Director presented comparative results of all evaluations undertaken between 1979 and mid-1985 by major work plan categories and of activities related to women. On 27 June,⁽⁴⁾ the Council endorsed the continuation of the Fund's efforts to strengthen the system of in-depth evaluation and improve the use of evaluation results through their comparative analysis and feedback into Fund policies and programmes. It requested the Executive Director to report in 1987 on the development and institutionalization of procedures ensuring such feedback and the use of lessons learned from evaluations.

Financial and administrative questions

Financial situation

On 1 January 1986, UNFPA's balance was $7,555,709. During the year, the Fund received income of $140,025,693 and had expenditures of $132,092,348, which resulted in an excess of income over expenditure of $7,933,345. The Fund's balance as at 31 December was $15,489,054; unspent allocations totalled $14,424,117.

Budget for 1986-1987

In April 1986,⁽¹²⁾ the UNFPA Executive Director submitted to the UNDP Governing Council revised budget estimates for the 1986-1987 biennium, which took into account the financial implications of the new staffing pattern (see below) established by the Council in 1985.⁽¹³⁾ On a gross basis, the revised 1986-1987 budget for administrative and programme support services (APSS) amounted to $40,419,400, comprising $36,643,700 approved by the Governing Council in 1985⁽¹⁴⁾ and $3,775,700 for new costs associated with the APSS budget; on a net basis, it amounted to $36,419,400 after the deduction of estimated credits and extrabudgetary income of $4 million.

In May,⁽¹⁵⁾ the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) noted that a number of the 42 project-funded posts which the Executive Director proposed to transfer to the APSS budget were to be financed from overhead income. ACABQ pointed out that such income was subject to variation and, in view of the uncertain overall income prospects for the Fund in 1986-1987, the Executive Director might need to implement further economy measures. It therefore recommended that, should the Governing Council approve the transfer of those 42 posts to the APSS budget, they should all be established only as temporary posts.

On 27 June,⁽¹⁶⁾ the Governing Council approved revised gross appropriations for 1986-1987 in the amount of $40,300,400 to finance the APSS budget, and agreed that overhead credits available in the amount of some $3,700,000 and income from trust funds for support services amounting to some $300,000 should be used to offset the gross appropriations, resulting in net appropriations of $36,300,400. It authorized the Executive Director to transfer credits between programmes within reasonable limits, with the concurrence of ACABQ. The Council approved the establishment of two new Professional and two new General Service posts in the Geneva Liaison Office and, subject to availability of resources, the establishment of up to 41 new General Service posts at headquarters, of which 10 were to be regular posts and the remaining 31 temporary posts. The Executive Director was requested to introduce further savings and economies in all categories of expenditure, including staffing, especially in the event that no contribution was received from a major donor country, and to report to the Council in 1987.

Contributions

During 1986, 78 countries and Territories paid a total of $156.4 million in voluntary contributions to UNFPA, compared with $122.1 million from 86 countries and Territories in 1985.⁽¹⁷⁾ This figure, together with additions and adjustments to pledges for prior years, exchange-rate and currency revaluation adjustments, interest, donations and other miscellaneous income, gave a total 1986 income of $140 million. Pledges for 1987 and future years totalled $101 million from 75 countries and Territories.

On 27 June,⁽⁴⁾ the UNDP Governing Council strongly urged all countries able to do so to increase their contributions in 1986 and future years and to make their contribution payments as early as possible in the year for which the pledge was made.

Accounts for 1985

Following the audit of the UNFPA financial statements for the year ended 31 December 1985, the Board of Auditors made a series of observations and recommendations.⁽¹⁸⁾

By resolution 41/176 of 5 December 1986, the General Assembly accepted the UNFPA financial report when it accepted other 1985 financial reports and audited financial statements and requested that remedial action be taken as required.

Staffing

In accordance with a 1985 Governing Council request,⁽¹⁹⁾ the Executive Director submitted in March 1986 a comprehensive report on personnel management.⁽²⁰⁾ The report gave the historical background of UNFPA personnel policies and contained chapters on human resources planning and management, recruitment, promotion, career development, rotation, orientation and training, the link between workload and the personnel structure, and priorities to strengthen specific areas of the Fund. The Executive Director then presented for the Council's consideration a number of recommendations, which involved continuing some current practices, shifting emphases and introducing some changes, but with no fundamental deviations from the broad policy framework of the United Nations common system.

Pursuant to another 1985 Council request,⁽¹³⁾ the UNFPA Executive Director submitted a report on draft guidelines for determining project-related and administrative-related personnel expenditures.⁽²¹⁾ The report distinguished between administrative-, programme- and project-related expenditures and costs; reported on a variety of definitions of "project" and "project personnel"; and presented to the Council for approval suggestions as to possible guidelines for use in determining what should be regarded as project-related personnel expenditures and what should be regarded as administrative- or programme-related personnel expenditures and consequently budgeted as such.

The Executive Director also submitted a report⁽²²⁾ on the filling of newly established posts at headquarters and in the field and the abolition of project posts, both Professional and General Service, at headquarters. He concluded that the Council's 1985 decision regarding recruitment of candidates to fill the newly established posts had been carried out in strict accordance with the Council's wishes as well as United Nations Staff Rules and UNDP personnel policies and procedures.

On 27 June,⁽¹⁶⁾ the Governing Council approved the guidelines set forth in the Executive Director's report with regard to administrative and programme support personnel but exclusive of some additional considerations relating to long-term assignments. The Council decided that the Executive Director should provide detailed information annually on the use of project funds for headquarters-based activities and that his report should include information on project symbol, title, duration and budget, and title and duration of posts lasting more than six months. The Council also took note of the Executive Director's other two reports on staffing questions.

Establishment of an endowment fund

The UNFPA Executive Director, in May 1986,⁽²³⁾ informed the UNDP Governing Council of his intention to establish an endowment fund, which was reported to ACABQ on 30 April. He pointed out that, in line with comments made by ACABQ, the creation and administration of the endowment fund would not lead to additional costs to the regular administrative budget. Any additional administrative costs would be charged to income from the endowment fund. All donations to the fund would conform to UNFPA's established financial regulations, which required that donations over $25,000 would be accepted only with the prior approval of the Council. The Executive Director indicated that the income from the endowment fund would be used to finance regular activities within the UNFPA mandate.

Other population activities

Evaluation

In April 1986,⁽¹⁾ the Secretary-General submitted to the Committee for Programme and Coordination (CPC) an in-depth evaluation of the United Nations population programme. The report sought to analyse the effectiveness, relevance and impact of activities carried out from 1978 to 1983 and covered programme activities undertaken by a number of organizational entities at the Headquarters and regional levels. It was based on information from desk reviews, interviews with programme managers and opinions of end-users, including Member States, Population Commission members, experts, national project personnel and field office staff of UNDP and UNFPA.

The report contained findings and recommendations pertaining to: programme content in the areas of research and policy analysis, operational activities and record-keeping for evaluation; programme planning and implementation in the areas of programme planning and design, end-users, mailing lists, distribution and feedback, and evaluation methodology; and the subprogramme themes of demographic analysis and population trends, population and development, population policies, dissemination of population information, demographic statistics and operational activities.

On the basis of the evaluation, CPC, at its April/May session,⁽²⁾ made recommendations concerning: measures to be taken by the Secretariat to increase the use of research and policy analysis outputs; ways, in the area of operational activities, to increase the usefulness and impact of country projects and related regional advisory services; changes to be made in record-keeping procedures with regard to operational activities; and measures to be adopted by the Secretariat with regard to mailing lists, distribution and feedback in order better to reach end-users.

In connection with programme planning, CPC recommended that particular attention should be given to improving programme design when formulating the medium-term plan for the period 1990-1995 and the related programme budgets.

CPC requested the Secretary-General to transmit the findings in his in-depth evaluation of the population programme, together with CPC's conclusions and recommendations, to the UNDP Governing Council and to the 1987 session of the Population Commission.

UN Population Award

In August 1986,⁽³⁾ the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly a report by the UNFPA Executive Director on the United Nations Population Award for 1986.

The Committee for the Award had received 31 nominations. At its meetings on 19 and 20 February, the Committee selected Consejo Nacional de Población de México (CONAPO)—Mexico's National Population Council—as laureate for the 1986 Award. Established in 1974, CONAPO was responsible for integrating the country's demographic planning with economic and social development programmes. Its aims included improving Mexico's population distribution, bringing women into the development process, and increasing knowledge of population through education. It was also involved in tackling urbanization and population problems, specifically working to stem the flow of migration from rural areas to Mexico City. The 1986 Award—a diploma, a gold medal and $25,000—was presented by the Secretary-General at a ceremony on 27 May at United Nations Headquarters.

The Trust Fund for the United Nations Population Award—administered by the UNFPA Executive Director on behalf of the Secretary-General—amounted to $448,523 as of 1 January 1986. During the year, interest income totalled $34,284 and expenditures $34,885. As at 31 December 1986, the balance of the Trust Fund stood at $447,922.

At its February 1986 meeting, the Committee for the Award decided that the General Assembly should be requested to amend the annex to its 1981 resolution establishing the Award⁽⁴⁾ and that the Economic and Social Council should amend its 1982 decision⁽⁵⁾ containing the Committee's rules of procedure, so that an individual and an institution could share the Award.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

In December 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, adopted decision 41/445 without vote.

United Nations Population Award

At its 98th plenary meeting, on 5 December 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, took note of the note by the Secretary-General transmitting the report of the Executive Director of the United Nations Fund for Population Activities on the United Nations Population Award, and decided to amend General Assembly resolution 36/201 of 17 December 1981 and the annex thereto in the manner indicated below:

(a) Paragraph 1 of the resolution was amended to read:

"Decide to establish an annual award, to be named the United Nations Population Award, for the most outstanding contribution to the awareness of population questions or to their solutions, by an individual or individuals, by an institution or institutions or by any combination thereof, to be presented through the United Nations;"

and 4 of the annex to the resolution were amended to read:

Article 2, paragraph 1

"The Award shall be presented annually to an individual or individuals, to an institution or institutions or to any combination thereof, for the most outstanding contribution to increasing the awareness of population questions or to their solutions. No staff member, organ or organization of the United Nations system shall be eligible for the Award."

Article 2, paragraph 3

"The recipient or recipients of the Award shall be announced by the beginning of March each year, and the Award shall be presented by the Secretary-General in the middle of June."

Article 4, paragraph 1 (chapeau)

"The recipient or recipients of the Award shall be selected, from among those nominated under article

5 below, by a Committee for the United Nations Population Award, to be composed of:"

General Assembly decision 41/445

Chapter XIV

Health and human resources

The United Nations system continued to promote health and human resources development during 1986, a year marked by difficulties exacerbated by the deteriorating economic situation, and health- and environment-threatening accidents.

In view of the rapid world-wide spread of acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS), the Director-General of the World Health Organization (WHO), in November, declared AIDS to be a global health priority and reaffirmed WHO's commitment to its prevention and control. Among other health concerns addressed were prevention and control of a number of specific diseases, nutrition improvement, and development of health care and research infrastructure. Throughout the world, 1,100 million and 1,700 million people were without water supply and sanitation facilities, respectively.

Efforts continued to implement the World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons, and the Economic and Social Council called on United Nations bodies and organizations to ensure representation in them of disabled persons and to take the concerns of the disabled into consideration in their overall programme planning objectives (resolution 1986/16). The General Assembly invited Member States to reinforce national committees as focal points for the 1983-1992 United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons (41/106).

The Assembly recommended the restructuring of the United Nations Institute for Training and Research, in view of its financial difficulties, to focus mainly on training; at the same time, it requested the Secretary-General to review the management, staff and administrative and financial arrangements of the Institute to ensure that the restructured programme was carried out in a cost-effective manner (41/172).

Activities of the United Nations University (UNU) continued to cover nine programme areas: peace and conflict resolution; the global economy; energy systems and policy; resource policy and management; the food-energy nexus; food, nutrition, biotechnology and poverty; human and social development; regional perspectives; and science, technology and the information society. The World Institute for Development Economics Research, at Helsinki, Finland-the first UNU research and training centre-completed its first year of operation, while progress was made for construction of a UNU permanent headquarters building in Tokyo. In December, the UNU Council agreed to establish the second UNU research and training centre-the Institute for Natural Resources in Africa-in Côte d'Ivoire. The Assembly noted the Council's decision to undertake an evaluation of UNU's work during its first 10 years (41/173).

The Economic and Social Council (1986/6) and the Assembly (41/175) took note of the activities of the University for Peace and requested the Secretary-General to consider the possibility of establishing an agreement of co-operation between it and the United Nations.

Health

Human and environmental health

In 1986, human and environmental health questions were dealt with by several United Nations agencies and bodies, including WHO, the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP), the International Labour Organisation (ILO) and the World Bank.

During the year, WHO continued to promote improved health system infrastructure, protection and promotion of the health/nutrition of specific population groups, promotion of mental health and environmental health, advancement in rehabilitative technology, and prevention and control of specific diseases.

The thirty-ninth World Health Assembly (Geneva, 5-16 May), the WHO governing body, reviewed and approved the global report on the first evaluation of the Strategy for Health for All by the Year 2000, based on information received from 146 of WHO's 166 member States; the report-the broadest assessment of the world health situation ever-was published subsequently in seven volumes (one global and six regional).

In response to a dramatic increase in the number of reported cases of AIDS, the World Health Assembly called for intensified efforts to combat the disease through mobilization of extrabudgetary resources; in November, the WHO Director-General declared AIDS to be a global health priority and reaffirmed WHO's commitment to its prevention and control.

Data on water supply and sanitation services at the end of 1985—mid-point of the International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade (1981-1990)—were collected and analysed in 1986, revealing that over 1,100 million and 1,700 million people were without water supply and sanitation, respectively.

Following a nuclear reactor accident on 26 April at Chernobyl, Ukrainian SSR, WHO facilitated the exchange of information, convened a meeting (Copenhagen, Denmark, May) on the potential health effects of the accident, and assessed the radiation dose in Europe. Similarly, UNEP⁽¹⁾ called on the authorities for information in order to assess the impact. The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) convened a special session of its Board of Governors, followed by a session of its General Conference at Vienna; an inter-agency working group met during the Conference and formulated plans for instituting and implementing measures within the United Nations system to protect human health and the environment and make nuclear energy safe.

In 1986, 10 reports in the environmental health criteria series were published by WHO with ILO and UNEP support. The reports evaluated the risk to human health and the environment associated with exposure to chemicals, thus providing a basis for regulatory activities. The computerized data files of the International Register of Potentially Toxic Chemicals continued to expand, and a registry of chemicals currently being tested for toxic effects was published in April (see also p. 656). A chemical spill from the Sandoz plant near Basel, Switzerland, on 1 November and the resulting pollution of the Rhine River also drew UNEP attention.

The WHO/UNDP/World Bank Special Programme for Research and Training in Tropical Diseases continued to promote research and human resources development in endemic countries, with emphasis on malaria control. A project on organizational patterns and institutional arrangements for occupational health and safety at the national level was implemented by ILO and WHO.

The United Nations Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation reported on genetic effects of radiation, dose-response relationships for radiation-induced cancer, and biological effects of pre-natal irradiation.⁽²⁾ The report, with its scientific annexes, was prepared by specialists and expert delegates to the Committee, assisted by a small scientific staff and consultants appointed by the Secretary-General; technical documents, received between November 1982 and April 1986 from Member States and members of the specialized agencies and of IAEA, were listed in an appendix.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

In December 1986, the General Assembly, by decision 41/450, endorsed the July Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/72 on protection against products harmful to health and the environment (see p. 653).

Health and nutrition

In 1986, the United Nations University⁽³⁾ (see p. 643) continued research, training and information dissemination relating to food, nutrition, biotechnology and poverty, with special attention to the food situation in Africa. UNU accepted lead-agency responsibility for organizing the International Dietary Energy Consultancy Group, which would summarize information on human adaptation to chronic energy deficiency and its social and economic consequences; in that connection, an organizing meeting was held at WHO headquarters (Geneva, September). UNU supported the evaluation of research on the consequences of chronic energy deficiency in a number of countries. A project on food and nutrition in Africa was organized jointly with the Association of African Universities, with funding from the European Development Fund of the European Community; the first phase concentrated on research and development in post-harvest food conservation and processing technologies.

To strengthen the capacity of developing-country institutions for research, training and policy formulation in food and nutrition, 70 fellowships were awarded in 1986 to persons from 48 institutions. In its eighth year of publication, the UNU quarterly Food and Nutrition Bulletin was distributed to more than 5,000 institutions and individuals. The International Network of Food Data Systems project (INFOODS) completed a monograph on users and needs for food composition data, and guidelines for the production, management and use of food composition data systems; it also organized regional meetings in Asia, Eastern Europe and Latin America. An advisory board was appointed for a proposed INFOODS quarterly publication, The Journal of Food Composition and Analysis.

The Sub-Committee on Nutrition of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC) met at UNU headquarters in Tokyo (twelfth session, 7-11 April),⁽⁴⁾ holding, as part of the session, a symposium on the nutritional consequences of adjustment policies during a period of recession. The Sub-Committee reported to ACC that the economic recession, resulting among other things in unemployment and reductions in public expenditure on health and other basic services, had had a detrimental impact on nutrition; it recommended that nutrition objectives for the poor should form an explicit part of adjustment policies and programmes of Governments with a view to providing an adequate level of nutrition for vulnerable groups. It also discussed recommendations made in February by its Advisory Group on Nutrition, including the issuance of annual reports on the world nutrition situation.

In annual overview reports for 1985/86⁽⁵⁾ and May-December 1986,⁽⁶⁾ ACC stated that the Sub-Committee, in carrying out inter-agency work, had focused on five priority areas: assessment of the world nutrition situation, expansion of nutritional surveillance, co-ordination of an agreement on research on the major nutrition deficiencies (protein-energy, vitamins A and D, iodine, iron), convening an international symposium on nutrition programmes, and dissemination of information. A 10-year plan of action on iodine deficiency disorders, for which WHO had been designated as lead agency, was being drafted by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations. The Sub-Committee also co-ordinated the efforts of the United Nations system to include nutritional considerations in agricultural and rural development programmes, activities by international agricultural research centres, food aid and the development of primary health care systems. The Sub-Committee continued to monitor the negative effects of economic adjustment on the nutrition of the poor, and recommended that renewed attention be paid to preventing those effects.

As in previous years, WHO assisted its member States in strengthening their capabilities to prevent malnutrition, focusing on: integration of nutrition priorities within primary health care and overall development planning, training and education; food and nutritional surveillance; and preventing and controlling specific nutritional deficiencies and dietary excesses. The nutrition support programme, conducted jointly with the United Nations Children's Fund, promoted the protection and improvement of the nutritional status of young children and women of child-bearing age. The WHO international breast-feeding data bank-information collected in 126 countries over 20 years-was formally established in 1986 as part of the global nutritional surveillance programme, and the second edition of Guidelines for Training Community Health Workers in Nutrition was issued.

Disabled persons

Implementation of World Programme of Action

The United Nations undertook several measures in 1986⁽⁷⁾ to implement the 1982 World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons⁽⁸⁾ within the context of the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons (1983-1992).

Co-ordination of activities by the United Nations system was considered at the fourth inter-agency meeting on the Decade (Vienna, 5-7 March)⁽⁹⁾ and by the Acc Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions (Programme matters) (Geneva, April). The latter endorsed the inter-agency recommendations, including the usefulness of establishing an information network within the Vienna-based Centre for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs (CSDHA) of the United Nations Department of International Economic and Social Affairs (DIESA), for locating and retrieving disability information available within the United Nations system.

Activities of CSDHA during the year included completion of studies on various aspects of disability-situation, strategies and policies-as well as publication of Disabled Persons Bulletin. The World Programme was publicized in the official languages of the United Nations and in English Braille. The DIESA Statistical Office continued work on disability statistics and prepared a technical publication on the use of household surveys to collect disability-related statistics.

The Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific (ESCAP) organized a regional fellowship programme for national personnel responsible for planning and organizing disability prevention and rehabilitation services (Philippines, June) and a regional seminar on national training programmes concerning disability (Indonesia, November). The third ESCAP regional inter-agency consultation (Thailand, 3 June) agreed that the Asia-Pacific inter-organizational task force on disability issues should meet at least twice a year.

Among non-governmental organizations, the International Fund Sports Disabled co-financed with the United Nations Fund (see below) a training workshop for sports instructors for disabled persons in francophone Africa (Algeria, 19-30 April). Rehabilitation International, with CSDHA sponsorship, organized an expert group meeting on legislation on equalization of opportunities for disabled persons (Vienna, 2-6 June); it also organized an International Rehabilitation Week in New York City during April to promote public awareness of the Decade. The International Initiative against Avoidable Disablement (IMPACT) continued to promote disability prevention and rehabilitation, with new emphasis on preventing hearing disabilities through assistance in establishing regional centres for ear specialists.

Trust funds

Voluntary Fund for the Decade

Since the observance of the International Year of Disabled Persons in 1981,⁽¹⁰⁾ the flow of contributions had fallen below the level required to respond to incoming project requests. The 1986 income of the Voluntary Fund for the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons—which granted seed-money to catalytic and innovative activities—totalled $161,000, while its expenditures amounted to $381,000. The Fund participated at the 1986 United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities, during which 10 countries made pledges totalling some $62,000.

During the 19 months ending July 1986, the Fund provided $562,375 to support 23 projects, a 71 per cent increase in the level of Fund activities from that prevailing during the first four years of operation.⁽⁷⁾ At the same time, the contributions received had been some one tenth of its disbursements during the period, prompting the Secretary-General to note that, if the trend continued, the Fund's resources could be depleted by the mid-point of the Decade, in 1987.

Following an initiative proposed during the thirty-third session of the UNDP Governing Council (Geneva, 2-27 June), concerning the mobilization of additional resources for disability prevention, IMPACT and UNDP, in collaboration with CSDHA and others, explored the possibility of launching worldwide fund-raising and publicity activities.

Trust Fund for Norway's Contribution to the International Year

In 1986, the income of the Trust Fund for Norway's Contribution to the International Year of Disabled Persons was $32,000, while expenditures totalled $91,000.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 May 1986, the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of its Second (Social) Committee, adopted resolution 1986/16 without vote.

United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 40/31 of 29 November 1985, urging international implementation of the World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons and the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons, 37/52 of 3 December 1982, by which it adopted the World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons, 37/53 of 3 December 1982, by which, inter alia, it proclaimed the period 1983-1992 the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons, 38/28 of 22 November 1983, in which it recognized the United Nations Trust Fund for the International Year of Disabled Persons as an important instrument for the implementation of the World Programme of Action and the desirability of its continuation throughout the Decade, and 39/26 of 23 November 1984, by which it adopted further specific measures for implementation of the World Programme of Action,

Recalling also Council resolution 1985/35 of 29 May 1985, in which, inter alia, the Secretary-General was requested, in order to facilitate contributions by Governments, to include, on an annual basis, the United Nations Trust Fund for the International Year of Disabled Persons among the programmes for which funds are pledged at the United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities,

Noting with satisfaction the concrete measures already carried out by the Governments of Member States, the bodies and organizations of the United Nations system and non-governmental organizations to implement the objectives of the World Programme of Action within the framework of the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons,

Noting with appreciation the steps taken by the United Nations system and by concerned non-governmental organizations to establish a monitoring procedure and prepare a consolidated questionnaire to monitor the implementation of the World Programme of Action,

Noting with concern that, in spite of a number of contributions made by Governments between 1981 and 1985 and constant appeals by the General Assembly and other United Nations organs to contribute to the financing of activities for the disabled, progress towards the improvement of the situation of the disabled in the developing countries has been slow,

Noting with serious concern the alarming situation of disabled persons in developing countries and the critical economic situation in a number of countries, in particular in Africa and Latin America and in the least developed countries,

Mindful that, since developing countries are experiencing difficulties in mobilizing resources, international co-operation should be encouraged to assist national efforts in implementing the World Programme of Action and the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons and the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons,

Expressing its appreciation to Member States and organizations, in particular to the twenty-five States that have donated $1.6 million over the past few years,

Expressing its appreciation of the useful role played by the United Nations Trust Fund for the International Year of Disabled Persons in implementing the World Programme of Action,

1. Urges all bodies and organizations of the United Nations system to take into account the World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons in the formulation and implementation of their programmes;

2. Calls upon all bodies and organizations of the United Nations system to take appropriate steps to ensure that, to the extent possible, disabled persons are represented in those bodies and organizations, and that assistance programmes administered by those bodies and organizations take into account the concerns of disabled persons in their overall planning objectives;

3. Reiterates the need to give greater publicity to the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons, and calls upon all bodies and organizations of the United Nations system, Member States, national committees and non-governmental organizations to assist in publicizing the Decade by all appropriate means within existing resources;

4. Requests that the activities of the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons be incorporated in the plans for other United Nations observances, including the Third United Nations Development Decade, the International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade and the International Year of Peace;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to make all appropriate efforts to mobilize international support and action for the Decade.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 4 December, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, adopted resolution 41/106 without vote.

Implementation of the World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons and United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons

The General Assembly,

Recalling all its pertinent resolutions, including resolution 37/52 of 3 December 1982, by which it adopted the World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons, and resolution 37/53 of 3 December 1982, by which, inter alia, it proclaimed the period 1983-1992 the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons,

Recalling its resolution 40/31 of 29 November 1985 and reaffirming all of its relevant provisions,

Noting with satisfaction the concrete measures already carried out by the Governments of Member States, the bodies and organizations of the United Nations system and non-governmental organizations to implement the objectives of the World Programme of Action within the framework of the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons,

Noting with appreciation the steps taken by the United Nations system and by non-governmental organizations concerned to monitor the implementation of the World Programme of Action,

Mindful that, since developing countries are experiencing difficulties in mobilizing resources, international co-operation should be encouraged to assist national efforts in implementing the World Programme of Action and achieving the objectives of the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons,

Eking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons and the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons,

1. Once again invites Member States to reinforce national committees as focal points for the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons, to stimulate activities at the national level, to mobilize public opinion on behalf of the Decade, to participate in the implementation of disability projects with regard to the International Year of Disabled Persons and to assist in monitoring and evaluating the implementation of the World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons;

2. Renews its invitation to all States to give high priority to projects concerning the prevention of disabilities, rehabilitation and the equalization of the opportunities of disabled persons within the framework of bilateral assistance;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to administer donated funds, using them for projects under the present structure of the Voluntary Fund for the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons,* and, in addition, to continue to make new provisions in order to offer a selection of projects to donor countries that might be willing to finance a particular programme under the "Special Purpose Contributions";

4. Reaffirms that the resources of the Voluntary Fund should be used to support catalytic and innovative activities in order to implement further the objectives of the World Programme of Action within the framework of the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons, with priority given, as appropriate, to programmes and projects of the least developed countries;

5. Invites Governments and non-governmental organizations to continue their contributions to the Voluntary Fund and calls upon Governments and non-governmental organizations that have not yet done so to consider contributing to the Fund;

6. Welcomes the offer of the Government of Sweden to act as host in 1987 to a meeting of experts, consisting largely of disabled persons, in conformity with the relevant provisions of resolution 39/26 of 23 November 1984;

7. Takes note with appreciation of the status of preparations for the forthcoming meeting of experts;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-second session on the implementation of the present resolution and on the outcome of the meeting of experts;

9. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-second session the item entitled "Implementation of the World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons and United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons".

*Formerly known as the United Nations Trust Fund for the International Year of Disabled Persons.

Human resources

Human resources development

In recognition of human resources development as an objective of development itself, the UNDP Governing Council, in June 1986,⁽¹⁾ called on UNDP to ensure that adequate attention was given to that aspect in its programmes and co-ordinating activities. It invited the Administrator to assist the Governments of developing countries so requesting in promoting human resources development through surveys, training and strategies; noted his initiative in organizing workshops on the topic; and requested him to submit to the Governing Council in 1988 a detailed analysis of the UNDP experience since 1970 in the field of human resources development.

Two UNDP workshops were held in 1986 on human resources development. At the workshop in Tokyo (2-5 April),⁽²⁾ held with financial support of Japanese agencies, there was general agreement that development had suffered from the passive acceptance of alien development models and value systems which detracted from production based on innate skills and locally available resources. The participants expressed the view that the role of technical co-operation was to assist in creating an endogenous capacity to analyse needs, plan programmes, determine investment priorities and, most importantly, deal with the problems of implementation.

The regional workshop at Buenos Aires, Argentina (8-11 December),⁽³⁾ held in collaboration with the Bariloche Foundation, discussed human resources development in Latin America and the Caribbean. Asserting that regional technical co-operation programmes should aim at mobilizing domestic talent in the search for innovative approaches that took national realities into consideration, the workshop recommended a number of ways for UNDP to assist the countries in the region in developing their human resources.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 July 1986, the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of its Third (Programme and Co-ordination) Committee, adopted resolution 1986/73 without vote.

Development of human resources

The Economic and Social Council,

Reaffirming the crucial role of human resources in the socio-economic development process,

Recalling the importance attached to the development of human resources in the International Development

Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade,

Recalling also General Assembly resolutions 2083(XX) of 20 December 1965 on the development and utilization of human resources, 2542(XXIV) of 11 December 1969, containing the Declaration on Social Progress and Development, and 40/213 of 17 December 1985 on the role of qualified national personnel in the social and economic development of developing countries,

Recalling further Economic and Social Council resolutions 1090 A (XXXIX) of 31 July 1965 and 1274(XLIII) of 4 August 1967 on the development and utilization of human resources,

Considering that it is for each developing country to decide the possible content of a national programme for the development of human resources,

Welcoming the activities of States which place increased emphasis on co-operation for the development of human resources in the developing countries,

Taking into account the increasing importance of United Nations activities in the development of human resources, as envisaged for future years, and convinced of the need for greater co-ordination of those activities,

Noting with appreciation decision 86/14 of 27 June 1986 of the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme on the role of the Programme in the development of human resources,

1. Reaffirms the need for an integrated and multidisciplinary approach to all aspects of the development of human resources in the programmes of work of the United Nations and the other organizations of the United Nations system;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, taking into account earlier studies and the discussions to be held at the twenty-second series of Joint Meetings of the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination and the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination, to submit a report on human resources development and on the activities of the United Nations system as a whole in this field, with conclusions and recommendations, to the General Assembly at its forty-second session, through the Economic and Social Council, for consideration and appropriate action;

3. Calls upon all organs and organizations of the United Nations system to implement the present resolution and to convey their views on the question to the Secretary-General.

UN Institute for Training and Research Activities of UNITAR

The United Nations Institute for Training and Research (UNITAR), an autonomous institution within the United Nations system, continued its programmes aimed at enhancing the effectiveness of the Organization. Its 1986 activities were described by the Executive Director in two reports to the General Assembly—covering the periods July 1984 to June 1986⁽⁴⁾ and July 1986 to June

The UNITAR training programme focused on three components: international co-operation and multilateral diplomacy, economic and social development, and research on training. Training courses and seminars in multilateral diplomacy dealt with orientation to the United Nations, drafting of international legal instruments, development issues, and resolution of international economic disputes. Courses launched in 1986 focused on: foreign policy analysis and planning for senior African diplomats; management of natural resources and the environment, jointly with UNEP; debt management, in co-operation with the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development; and geographic information systems technology for managers of natural resources and environment from developing countries (funded by Switzerland).

In observance of the International Year of Peace in 1986, UNITAR organized a high-level meeting on the United Nations and the maintenance of international peace and security, and published a study on The United Nations and Collective Management of International Conflict.⁽⁶⁾

Under the research programme, financed mainly through special purpose grants, work continued in the two UNITAR/UNDP bodies: the Information Centre for Heavy Crude and Tar Sands (New York) and the Centre on Small Energy Resources (Rome, Italy).

Other 1986 activities included organizing an international conference on the future of Latin America (Caracas, Venezuela, September), and publishing a study on the International Civil Service Commission.

Finances

income and expenditures in 1986

In 1986, UNITAR's General Fund income-from government contributions and other sources-totalled $2,470,614 and its expenditures $2,273,729.⁽⁷⁾ The income of the Special Purpose Grants Fund was $2,264,234, including $1,853,300 in grants; expenditures amounted to $2,415,190.

Surplus space in the five-storey UNITAR building in New York was being rented to increase the Institute's income.

Accounts for 1985

In June 1986, the United Nations Board of Auditors submitted to the General Assembly the financial statements of UNITAR for 1985.⁽⁸⁾

Commenting on the Board's remarks, the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, in September,⁽⁹⁾ expressed doubt on UNITAR's ability to be involved in the activities envisaged for the Small Energy Resources Centre and questioned the need to continue the Institute's Geneva office.

The Assembly, by resolution 41/176 of 5 December, accepted the 1985 financial report and statements.

Future status of UNITAR

The long-term financing and future of UNITAR in view of its financial difficulties were considered in 1986 by its Board of Trustees (twenty-fourth session, 7-11 April) and by the Secretary-General, in response to a 1985 General Assembly request.⁽¹⁰⁾

Having studied the two options raised by the Assembly-closing down or restructuring the Institute-the Board accepted the UNITAR Executive Director's proposal for restructuring and concentrating on training and research aimed at enhancing the effectiveness of the United Nations system. The Board also examined his proposal on possible construction of a taller building on the current UNITAR headquarters site with a view to generating rental income; subsequently, in May, the Secretary-General set up a committee to study some of the legal difficulties associated with the proposal. Further, the Board examined the size and composition of its membership in relation to the financial crisis.

In an August report to the Assembly on UNITAR's future,⁽¹¹⁾ the Secretary-General proposed that a restructuring plan be implemented for 1987-1989, on the assumption that Governments would commit themselves to contributing at least $1.3 million for 1987 to justify maintaining an autonomous Institute; at the end of the three-year period, the Assembly would decide on the future course of action.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 5 December 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, adopted without vote resolution 41/172.

Restructuring plan for the United Nations Institute for Training and Research

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 40/214 of 17 December 1985, in which it requested the Secretary-General to prepare comprehensive specific plans for the future of the United Nations Institute for Training and Research based on the options of either closing down or restructuring the Institute, including: a blueprint for a specific scheme for the long-term and stable funding of the Institute and specific suggestions for the improvement of administrative arrangements to ensure cost-effectiveness,

Recalling also its resolutions 37/142 of 17 December 1982 and 38/177 of 19 December 1983, in which it called upon the Secretary-General to submit a report on long-term financing arrangements for the Institute that would place its financing on a more predictable, assured and continuous basis,

Recalling further its resolution 39/177 of 17 December 1984, in which it requested the Secretary-General to prepare a comprehensive study on the Institute, its activities in training and research, its funding and its future role,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General and the report of the Executive Director of the United Nations Institute for Training and Research,

Recognizing the continuing importance and relevance of the mandate of the Institute, particularly at a time when improvement of the effectiveness of the United Nations is a major preoccupation of Member States,

Noting with regret that the 1985 United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities was unable to provide the General Fund of the Institute with the level of resources required to maintain it as a viable entity during 1986,

Noting with concern the lack of a sufficiently broad base of donor countries supporting the Institute,

Noting further with regret that voluntary contributions to the Institute have so far been insufficient to guarantee the level of resources needed to maintain it as a viable entity and that it has not been possible to reach agreement on any of the three options for long-term financing arrangements for the Institute recommended by the Board of Trustees, namely, setting up a reserve fund, adopting a replenishment system or establishing an endowment fund,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General and the report of the Executive Director of the United Nations Institute for Training and Research;

2. Reaffirms the continuing relevance of the mandate of the Institute and takes note of the view of the Secretary-General that the mandate remains valid and useful;

3. Recommends that the Institute be restructured on the basis of the following parameters:

I. Programme

A. Training

1. Training shall be the main focus of the Institute's activities during the interim period, and that focus should be duly reflected in the budget allocations;

2. The core training programme financed from the General Fund shall concentrate on training for international co-operation and multilateral diplomacy at various levels and primarily on training of persons from developing countries;

3. Training programmes designed and conducted by the Institute for other United Nations bodies and specialized agencies shall not result in any financial obligations for the General Fund and shall be carried out on a fully reimbursable basis;

4. Training for economic and social development or any other training activities shall be funded from special purpose grants.

B. Research

1. Ongoing research projects shall continue until completed;

2. In future, priority shall be given to requests made by the Secretary-General for research and study to enhance the effectiveness of the United Nations; to this end, the Secretary-General is requested to make full use of the available expertise and facilities of the Institute;

3. Other research activities related to the mandate of the Institute, including new projects approved by the Board of Trustees, will be carried out according to the availability of resources;

4. Research and study falling within the mandate of the Institute may be financed from special purpose grants on a full-cost basis;

5. Research-cum-training in negotiating techniques.. international law and economic and social development shall be funded from special purpose grants.

C. Projects financed from special purpose grants

1. Special purpose grants shall be welcome as long as they are made for activities that relate directly to the mandate of the Institute and do not overlap with work carried out elsewhere in the United Nations system;

2. Special purpose grants shall cover, in addition to full costs, at least 13 per cent of project support costs;

3. The Executive Director of the Institute shall make available to all States, specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system and non-governmental organizations a complete list of training and research programmes that, for lack of financial resources, cannot be financed from the General Fund; donors may make special purpose grants for the execution of such programmes.

II. Finance and administration

In the light of the restructured programme set out above, the Secretary-General is requested to review the management, staff and administrative and financial arrangements of the Institute to ensure that the restructured programme is carried out in a cost-effective manner.

A. Budget

The budget estimates for 1987 as set out in the annex to the report of the Secretary-General and in the proposed allocations for 1987 prepared by the Institute are unbalanced, and administrative staff costs are disproportionate to programme delivery costs.

1. No salaries for posts or parts thereof shall be charged to the training or research programme allocations except for those of the Professional and General Service staff assigned to the two branches responsible for those programmes;

2. Allocations for programme and general operational costs shall correspond to the priority given to activities;

3. General operational costs shall be reduced to a minimum, particularly in the sections related to staff travel, fund-raising, furniture and equipment, communications and miscellaneous expenses;

4. Staff costs shall be reduced in relation to operational costs so that their ratio is equivalent to that of similar organizations of the United Nations system;

5. The Institute shall rely entirely on voluntary contributions;

6. The Institute shall consider ways of increasing its income, inter alia, rental income, through more efficient use of its premises.

B. Staff

The Secretary-General is requested to review the composition and grading of the staff, including the post of Executive Director, taking into account the necessity of securing the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity and paying due regard to as wide a geographical basis as possible, with a view to:

1. Diversifying the composition of the Professional staff to avoid limiting it to senior posts, and utilizing the experience and expertise of lower-level Professionals available in the Institute; in this regard, non-programme functions, such as external relations and administration and finance, of the restructured Institute can be undertaken by lower-level Professionals;

2. Distributing Professional and General Service staff among the various branches of the Institute in proportion to the work-load of and tasks entrusted to the branches in the restructured programme, and at a level that would enable the Institute to carry out a meaningful programme;

3. Giving priority, in the recruitment of personnel for the execution of projects financed from special purpose grants, to Professional and General Service staff of the Institute who may not be retained as members of the core staff paid from the General Fund, and considering those persons for employment with other organizations of the United Nations system which may draw on their skills, as appropriate;

4. Keeping a roster of consultants and experts and rotating staff whose services may be needed by the Institute for the execution of projects and programmes, at no cost or through financing from special purpose grants.

C. Board of Trustees

The Secretary-General is requested to ensure full compliance with the decision of the Board that no financial costs shall be charged to the budget of the Institute for the functioning of the Board, and that the selection of members of the Board of Trustees shall include government representatives who are knowledgeable about the work of the Institute and the United Nations;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to carry out the restructuring of the Institute as from 1 January 1987, in close consultation, as appropriate, with all States, in accordance with the recommendations set out above and with sufficient capacity to ensure the continuation of the Institute as a viable and autonomous entity, and to submit a report to the General Assembly at its forty-second session on the implementation of the present resolution and to include a comprehensive assessment of the experience with the interim solution in 1987 to enable the Assembly to evaluate the situation and reach a decision on the future of the Institute;

5. Further requests the Secretary-General, in case the necessary financing is not ensured by the implementation of the interim solution as defined above, to take steps with a view to phasing out, as appropriate, the activities of the Institute in the most cost-effective manner possible, and to submit to the General Assembly at its forty-second session a detailed proposal on the reallocation of the appropriate and essential activities of the Institute to other entities of the United Nations system;

6. Urges all States that have not yet contributed to the Institute to do so, calls upon all States to increase their contributions to the Institute at and following the 1986 United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities, in order to enable the Institute to implement the restructuring plan and continue to fulfil its important mandate, and appeals to those donors that do not intend to pledge contributions to consider contributing to the Institute at a level commensurate with their capacity;

7. Appeals to all States to provide appropriate special purpose grants to enable the Institute to implement the training and research programmes that cannot be financed from its General Fund, and calls upon intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to contribute to the Institute.

United Nations University

Activities of UNU

In 1986, the United Nations University,⁽¹²⁾ an autonomous academic institution within the United Nations system, carried out 73 research projects and additional exploratory activities and dissemination projects under nine programme areas: peace and conflict resolution; the global economy; energy systems and policy; resource policy and management; the food-energy nexus (FEN); food, nutrition, biotechnology and poverty; human and social development; regional perspectives; and science, technology and the information society.

Studies and workshops were conducted on peace and global transformation, security and development, and maintenance of outer space for peaceful purposes. As part of a project on regional peace and security, a workshop examined the topic as it related to Oceania (Auckland, New Zealand, April).

On the global economy, studies considered the ever-increasing problem of hunger, the balance and interaction of international and domestic economic constraints, the effectiveness of the stabilization and adjustment policies of international financial institutions, and development and technological transformation in traditional societies. A conference was held on debt, stabilization and development.

The journal ASSET (abstracts of selected solar energy technology) reached 1,250 members in 118 developing countries. Research and methodological work continued and a workshop was held jointly with the European Economic Community on the project network on energy planning and management (April, Argentina); exchange of research results continued through the Integrated Rural Energy Systems Association; and training was provided in energy research and technology assessment, including geothermal energy, plasma and laser technology, and renewable energy systems.

Research and training in agro-forestry systems dealt with, among other things, an alternative to the destruction of tropical forests, and deforestation and land-use in the humid tropics. A workshop focused on land resources management in tropical mountain regions (October, Ethiopia), and a study of resource-use conflict in the Himalayan-Ganges region was completed and presented at a workshop in April. Case-studies were carried out on resource use and ecological impacts of frontiers and pioneer settlements.

Among the 1986 activities under the FEN programme, focusing on food and fuel as strategically important elements of self-reliant development policies, a conference on FEN and ecosystems (February, New Delhi, India) and an international conference on equity, efficiency and sustainability in urban energy development (August, São Paulo, Brazil) were held; FEN-related collaboration began with the Asian and Pacific Development Centre.

The programme area covering food, nutrition, biotechnology and poverty continued to stress building the capacity of developing-country institutions for research, training and policy formulation (see also p. 636).

As part of ongoing research on perceptions of desirable societies in various religions and ethical systems, segments on Buddhism and Hinduism were in progress in 1986, with views on contemporary issues solicited from religious thinkers. Under a new project on economic aspects of human development, a workshop was held (September, Rome) and papers were commissioned on topics such as Gandhian economics, and economic rationality and human needs satisfaction. Training and research programmes included studies on household interactions with major transitions taking place in developing countries. Some 1986 meetings dealt with the impact of the development process on women's employment opportunities (April, Malaysia), the political economy of fiscal policy (July, Hawaii, United States), ethnic diversity and nation-building in the Pacific (August, Suva, Fiji), ethnic conflicts, development and human rights (October, Oslo, Norway), and social transformation, focusing on the origins of the Russian Revolution (October, Leningrad, USSR). In addition to continuing work on the global impact of human migration, and perspectives on youth, research began and a workshop was held on the issue of poverty and welfare resource allocation.

A European perspectives project was initiated in January, with research focusing on European identity, East and West European responses to global challenges, and interactions between Europe and the third world. Other regional perspectives projects included two workshops in Africa and a transregional workshop on crisis, conflicts and the non-aligned movement (August, Harare, Zimbabwe); a final symposium on Arab alternative futures (November, Cairo, Egypt); a regional workshop on alternative development perspectives in Asia (March, Bali, Indonesia); a meeting on development experiences and perspectives in Asia (May, Beijing, China); and a co-ordination meeting on Latin America (March, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil). A project was begun in 1986 to integrate the regional projects into a global perspective on current crisis issues and the third world response to them. Other activities covered areas such as international law, use of videotape as a development tool, and mastering of microprocessor technology. A survey was completed on current research on the diffusion and impact of technological innovations based on micro-electronics and biotechnology, as well as state-of-the-art assessment of those two fields.

The World Institute for Development Economics Research, at Helsinki-the first UNU research and training centre-completed its first full year of operation in 1986, with major themes of research on hunger and poverty; money, finance and trade; and development and technological transformation. Its five exploratory projects culminated in a series of research conferences in July and August, at which 89 research papers were presented and discussed. Preparations continued for the establishment of other research and training centres. In January, the Rector established a Japanese Scientific Advisory Panel to assist UNU in strengthening its programme activities in Japan in preparation for an institute for advanced studies associated with the University Centre in Tokyo. A UNU study, supported by the Netherlands, to assess the feasibility of a research and training centre on new technologies, mobility and regional development continued.

The number of associated institutions of the University stood at 39 in 1986; in addition, more than 100 units at institutions in over 60 countries co-operated with UNU. Training courses were completed by 197 University Fellows during the year; by year's end, 151 Fellows were in mid-course, including 89 in the field of food, nutrition, biotechnology and poverty.

Plans for the construction of a permanent headquarters building in Tokyo made progress. The basic design of the building was commissioned, and the University's Standing Committee on the Research and Training Centre, Japan, and the Permanent Headquarters Building met regularly with the parties involved throughout 1986.

Activities of the Council

The UNU Council met twice during 1986,⁽¹²⁾ holding its twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth sessions in Tokyo from 7 to 10 July and from 1 to 5 December, respectively.

At the July session, a public symposium on science, technology and society was held as part of the celebration of the tenth anniversary of the University programme. The Council endorsed the early establishment of a research and training centre in Japan as an institute for advanced studies.

In December, the Council agreed on the establishment of the second UNU research and training centre, the Institute for Natural Resources in Africa, to be located at Yamoussoukro, Côte d'Ivoire. The Council also considered the draft second medium-term perspective of the University for 1988-1993 and adopted the supplementary and revised programme and budget for 1986-1987.

The Economic and Social Council, by decision 1986/154 of 17 July, took note of the report of the UNU Council on the work of the University in 1985.⁽¹³⁾

Finances

As at 31 December 1986, a total of $187.7 million had been pledged to the Endowment and Operating Funds of UNU by 43 Governments; of that amount, $154.2 million had been received. During the year, 14 Governments pledged and/or contributed $17 million. The planned expenditures for 1986-1987 were estimated at $46.3 million.

In December, the General Assembly accepted the 1985 financial statements and the audit opinions of the United Nations Board of Auditors as they related to UNU (resolution 41/176).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 5 December 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 41/173 without vote.

United Nations University

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its previous resolutions on the United Nations University,

Having considered the report of the Council of the United Nations University on the work of the University in 1985,

Noting with appreciation the contributions of all countries that have supported the University,

Also noting with appreciation the continuing interest of the Government of Japan in, and its support for, the construction of a permanent headquarters building,

Expressing its appreciation to the Government of Finland for the continued financial and other support it provides to the first research and training centre established by the University, the World Institute for Development Economics Research,

Noting decision 5.2.4 adopted on 23 May 1986 by the Executive Board of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization at its one hundred and twenty-fourth session,

Noting with satisfaction that 1985 marked the tenth anniversary of the establishment of the University and that during its first ten years the University has developed a distinctive institutional identity within the United Nations system and the international academic and scientific community,

1. Welcomes the progress achieved by the University in implementing programmes of research, advanced training and dissemination of knowledge, as well as in implementing the activities planned within the framework of the first medium-term perspective (1982-1987);

2. Notes with appreciation the decision of the Council to undertake a comprehensive external evaluation of the work of the University during its first ten years, in order to assess the extent to which the University has fulfilled the objectives of its Charter, with a view to making proposals to strengthen its future performance and thus contributing significantly to the planning of its future endeavours;

3. Notes with satisfaction that the World Institute for Development Economics Research began operations at Helsinki in 1985 and that it has made considerable progress on the three research themes for its initial programme: "Hunger and poverty: the poorest billion"; "Money, finance and trade: reform for world development"; and "Development and technological transformation: the management of change";

4. Also notes with satisfaction the progress being made towards the establishment by the United Nations University of other research and training centres, particularly the proposed Institute for Natural Resources in Africa;

5. Requests the United Nations University, when drawing up its report to the General Assembly, to take into account the comments made by Governments in the Assembly on the manner in which the activities of the University are presented, in particular by strengthening the analytical content of the report;

6. Notes the continuing and intensified co-operative activities of the United Nations University with the United Nations, its bodies and the specialized agencies, on the one hand, and with the international academic and scientific community, including national research centres, on the other, which enhance the responsiveness of the University to global issues and problems and bring its work into closer relation with the concerns of the United Nations system and the world academic community with regard to those issues and problems;

7. Recognizes that the University needs to intensify its fund-raising efforts to build up its Endowment Fund and Operating Fund in order to increase its core income;

8. Earnestly appeals to all States to take cognizance of the progress made by the United Nations University and the relevance of its work to the concerns of the United Nations, to contribute urgently and generously to its Endowment Fund and its subsidiary institutes and, additionally or alternatively, to make operating contributions to the University to enable it to fulfil its mandate efficiently, in accordance with its Charter and with the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly.

University for Peace

In a March 1986 report to the Economic and Social Council,⁽¹⁴⁾ the Secretary-General described the activities of the University for Peace, a specialized international institution, located in Costa Rica, for postgraduate studies, research and dissemination of knowledge specifically aimed at training for peace. Covering the period since its establishment in 1980⁽¹⁵⁾ through December 1985, the report dealt with various aspects of the University's development, its network of support institutions, curriculum and specific programmes. As at the end of 1985, 29 States had signed the International Agreement for the Establishment of the University-16 from Latin America, 6 from Asia, 4 from Europe and 3 from Africa.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 21 May 1986, the Economic and Social Council adopted without vote resolution 1986/6.

University for Peace

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 33/109 of 18 December 1978, 34/111 of 14 December 1979 and 35/55 of 5 December 1980,

Considering that the primary task of the United Nations is the maintenance of international peace and security, in accordance with Article 1 of the Charter,

Bearing in mind that article 2 of the Charter of the University for Peace establishes that the University shall contribute to the great universal task of educating for peace,

Taking note of the report submitted by the University for Peace to the Secretary-General in compliance with Economic and Social Council resolution 1985/2 of 24 May 1985,

Considering also the important tasks carried out by the University for Peace since its inception, in fulfilment of its goals and purposes,

Taking note with satisfaction of the co-operation that the Government of the host country has extended to the University during its first stage,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the University for Peace for the report submitted;

2. Encourages Member States to adhere to the International Agreement for the Establishment of the University for Peace, particularly during 1986, the year solemnly proclaimed by the General Assembly as the International Year of Peace;

3. Invites Member States and non-governmental organizations to lend all possible material and other assistance that may contribute to the realization of the efforts carried out by the University for Peace;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to consider the possibility of establishing an agreement of co-operation between the United Nations and the University for Peace;

5. Invites the General Assembly to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-first session a sub-item entitled "University for Peace" under the agenda item entitled "Training and research".

The General Assembly, by resolution 41/175 of 5 December, endorsed the Council's resolution.

Chapter XV

Environment

In 1986, events such as the nuclear explosion at Chernobyl, Ukrainian SSR, the chemical poisoning and pollution of the Rhine River (Basel, Switzerland) and other environmental crises—desertification, climate change induced by greenhouse gases, depletion of the ozone layer and maltreatment of the marine environment—were some of the challenges confronting the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP).

In the light of the nuclear power accident at Chernobyl, the UNEP Executive Director called on USSR authorities to provide the world community with information about the accident in order to assess its impact. In an exchange of letters, the General Secretary of the Communist Party of the USSR stressed the importance of international co-operation in incidents such as Chernobyl and proposed the establishment of an international regime for the safe development of nuclear energy. UNEP vigorously supported the adoption of two international conventions, on early notification of nuclear accidents and on assistance in the case of a nuclear accident or radiological emergency, which were drawn up within the framework of the International Atomic Energy Agency (see p. 584).

At a seminar on industrial hazardous waste in November, the Executive Director proposed that UNEP take the lead in developing two conventions to help minimize the occurrence and harmful effects of chemical accidents and emergencies. He also proposed that a programme be developed to enable Governments, in co-operation with industry and local community leaders, to identify potentially hazardous industrial installations located in their communities, and to show them how to control and limit possible accidental releases and how to deal with a release or spill.

The International Register of Potentially Toxic Chemicals continued to expand its global information network. By resolution 1986/72, the Economic and Social Council urged Governments to provide for the Register updated information on national regulatory actions. The Council also decided that the consolidated list of products which had been banned, withdrawn, severely restricted or not approved should continue to be published as one document. The General Assembly, by decision 41/450, endorsed the Council's resolution.

Desertification and drought had created an emergency situation in Africa and, despite ample rains during the 1985/86 rainy season in various parts of Africa, 19.2 million people continued to be affected, principally in four countries. The United Nations Sudano-Sahelian Office (UNSO) continued its ongoing desertification control programme, with a total funding of $47.6 million. The Economic and Social Council, by resolution 1986/44, called for greater support to UNSO and urged increased UNSO assistance to the Sudano-Sahelian and adjacent regions to combat desertification and drought.

Other steps towards improving the environment included: the convening of the first Arab Ministerial Conference on Environmental Considerations in Development, which adopted a Declaration to provide a framework for national action and for regional Arab and international co-operation; and the adoption of a Convention for the Protection of the Natural Resources and Environment of the South Pacific Region with two protocols, on co-operation in combating pollution emergencies and the prevention of pollution by dumping.

The Global Environmental Monitoring System of Earthwatch, the assessment arm of UNEP, continued to monitor renewable resources, climate, health, pollutants and oceans. Other UNEP activities included world climate impact studies, management of tropical forests and soil resources, conservation of wildlife and protected areas, protection of the marine environment, research on genetic resources and linkages between environment and development, industry and human settlements.

For the first time in UNEP's history, its main intergovernmental legislative body, the Governing Council, did not meet.

Sixty new projects were approved by the Environment Fund in 1986, while 28 were closed. The Fund disbursed $15.51 million for programme activities; government contributions totalled $28.05 million.

Comprehensive information covering all aspects of UNEP's 1986 activities was given in the Executive Director's annual report.⁽¹⁾

UNEP programme

Revised programme policy

Of special significance to the UNEP programme in 1986 were structural changes, including the restructuring of the Office of the Environment Programme so that it functioned as a multidisciplinary team, and other management decisions by the Executive Director which were based on the results of an in-depth evaluation of all UNEP projects.⁽¹⁾ The administrative set-up of UNEP followed a triangular arrangement in keeping with the Action Plan for the Human Environment, adopted at the 1972 United Nations Conference on the Human Environment⁽²⁾—environmental assessment (or Earthwatch), environmental management and supporting measures.

One of the major shortcomings highlighted by the evaluation, which was carried out between September 1985 and August 1986, was that there had been little follow-up on the use of project outputs; coupled with poorly written project documents, that often led to projects not achieving the desired results. As a remedy, the Executive Director revised the UNEP manual for the design and approval of projects and an internal seminar was held on improving project design.

Also on the basis of the review, a report⁽³⁾ on the future orientation of UNEP's work was prepared, which recommended concentrating world attention on a limited number of the most serious environmental problems and the means to tackle them; setting time-limited environmental goals to be reached by Governments and the United Nations system by 1995; and setting subsidiary targets to be reached by UNEP by 1992, to allow a mid-term evaluation of the targets and progress towards them.

Environment and development

UNEP activities related to environment and development included the following: an integrated approach to environment and development; integration of environment in development planning and activities; energy; industry and transportation; environmental law and environmental machinery; and natural disasters.

Under its integrated approach to environment and development, UNEP provided decision makers with information and assisted development planners in acquiring the skills to enable them to incorporate environmental considerations into their development planning. During the year, high-level experts met and concluded that a selective approach was more practical than a general one and advocated focusing on a major environmental problem and then setting up the methodological, institutional and procedural elements to deal with it. In accordance with that approach, which included tackling problems country by country, Cyprus, in collaboration with UNEP and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), held a workshop at Nicosia to analyse local needs and draw up effective strategies and policies for environmentally sound planning. As a continuation of work started in 1985, UNEP, in co-operation with the World Bank, was developing an analytical framework and guidelines on how changes in stocks of natural resources and in the state of the environment could be reflected in accounting for national income and well-being. A workshop of experts held in Washington, D.C., explored to what extent national income accounts could be modified to include changes in environmental resources and conditions, and later in Paris discussed whether, and how, specific environmental elements might be introduced into an economic accounting framework.

Jointly with Australia, the Commonwealth Secretariat and the East-West Center (Honolulu, Hawaii), UNEP convened an international conference of experts at Canberra on the economics of dryland degradation and rehabilitation. A regional workshop for Asia and the Pacific (New Delhi, India, August) and a national workshop for China (Beijing, September) took place on the same subject. In the area of river basin management, UNEP collaborated with the United Nations Centre for Regional Development, the United Nations Department of Technical Co-operation for Development and the International Lake Environment Committee in preparing case-studies on regional development planning. In co-operation with Jamaica, UNEP began work on a plan to improve the environmental management of the Hope River basin.

Concerning integration of environment in development planning and activities, UNEP and the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean in collaboration with the Governments concerned prepared pre-feasibility studies of field projects designed to help alleviate the economic burden in the region and at the same time improve environmental planning and management. In collaboration with the World Health Organization (WHO), the United Kingdom Overseas Development Administration and the University of Aberdeen (Scotland), UNEP organized a training seminar and a three-month intensive course on principles and application of environmental impact assessment; UNEP supported the participation of representatives from 14 developing countries. With UNEP support, experts from Burundi, Kenya, Malawi, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe participated in a workshop on environmental planning and management for local and regional development, with a focus on training aspects derived from studies on inland water management (Otsu and Nagoya, Japan, November).

In May, the seventh session of the Committee of International Development Institutions on the Environment (CIDIE) conducted its annual review of progress by member institutions in implementing the 1980 CIDIE Declaration of Environmental Policies and Procedures relating to Economic Development, and discussed an evaluation of its achievements. The Committee also discussed a five-year programme of work aimed at the exchange of information and co-ordination among its members. During 1986, the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD) became the twelfth member of the Committee.

A report on the assessment of tools and methods for incorporating the environmental factor into energy planning and decision-making was published under UNEP's energy programme (for other details on UNEP activities in energy, see p. 580).

The UNEP Industry and Environment Office further expanded its computerized data base with 1,200 new bibliographical entries and nearly 100 files on pollution abatement and control technology. In November, representatives of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) and UNEP held their sixth annual consultation to review their co-operation towards environmentally sound industrial development. UNEP publications on alumina production formed a major input for an international workshop (Jamaica, October) on bauxite residues organized by UNIDO and the University of the West Indies. Guidelines for environmental management of aluminium smelters formed the basis of a multi-regional training workshop (Dubai, United Arab Emirates, December) sponsored by UNEP and the International Primary Aluminium Institute in co-operation with the Dubai Aluminium Company. The World Bank, WHO and UNEP co-operated in preparing a manual on the safe disposal of hazardous wastes. UNEP arranged for a number of industrial experts to visit developing countries to diagnose environmental problems of the iron, steel and aluminium industries.

Building on the 1985 Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer,⁽⁴⁾ a workshop on the control of chlorofluorocarbons was held in May and September 1986. The workshop provided inputs for the first session of the Ad Hoc Working Group of Legal and Technical Experts for the Preparation of a Protocol on Chlorofluorocarbons to the Convention (see also p. 658). A revised and updated version of the Register of International Treaties and Other Agreements in the Field of the Environment was prepared in 1986.

First Arab Ministerial Conference

One of UNEP's most significant achievements during the year was the convening of the first Arab Ministerial Conference on Environmental Considerations in Development (Tunis, October), organized jointly by UNEP, the League of Arab States and the Arab League Educational, Cultural and Scientific Organization. Delegations from 20 Arab Governments and a number of regional and international organizations attended. A five-point Arab Declaration on the Environment was adopted, providing a framework for national action and for regional Arab and international co-operation to protect the environment. The Conference also set up an Arab Ministerial Council on the Environment to draw up an Arab strategy to manage and protect the environment and an interim executive bureau to implement the decisions taken, including those leading to the institutionalization of the Conference. The last day of the Conference, 14 October, was designated Arab Regional Environment Day.

Environmental education and training

In 1986, UNEP and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) continued the joint International Environmental Education Programme (IEEP), which had become the major international vehicle for promoting environmental education. As in previous years, IEEP held conferences, seminars and workshops for teachers, teacher trainers, curriculum developers and educational administrators; for example, a consultative meeting (Singapore, March) on the incorporation of environmental education into curriculum and teacher training for industrial and agricultural schools was organized. IEEP ran subregional workshops on teacher training in environmental education for Arab States (Bahrain, January), for Latin America (Santiago, Chile, January) and for Africa (Nairobi, Kenya, April).

IEEP also published environmental education literature and provided technical assistance to Governments interested in incorporating environmental education into their systems. By the end of 1986, more than 140 countries, 10,000 educators and 250,000 pupils had been directly involved in IEEP. UNEP also supported two national workshops on environmental education for training primary school teachers (Dominican Republic, March).

During 1986, many activities contributed to UNEP's training goals. Among them was the continuation of the annual international post-graduate course on resource management and environmental impact assessment in developing countries, organized by UNEP, UNESCO and the German Democratic Republic at the University of Dresden. Under a UNEP/International Labour Organisation (ILO) project, a national seminar on the working and general environment (Nairobi, November) utilized for the first time modules prepared by ILO and UNEP for the environmental training of employers. Another UNEP/ILO project on the introduction of an environmental training component within ILO management development programmes included visits to Latin American countries to assess local problems and assist in planning future activities; efforts were also made to reinforce the use of environmental management training materials, adapt them to local conditions and translate them into Spanish. In August, UNEP signed a co-operation agreement with Mexico, under which the latter would finance for a two-year period the co-ordination machinery of a network of environmental training institutions for Latin America and the Caribbean. A regional co-ordinator was appointed to help compile information on courses, seminars and other activities and prepare a calendar of educational programmes.

Public information activities

As part of the ongoing reform of UNEP's Information Service and in order to increase awareness of major environmental events, a News and Data Team was established in July 1986, which provided the media with timely comments on major environmental events and responded to journalists' inquiries. It also monitored the media and evaluated trends in the coverage of environmental issues. The Team established a computerized data base on UNEP policy and environmental events, concentrating on soil loss, destruction of tropical forests, desertification, climate change, fresh-water supply and sanitation, and toxic chemicals.

Two journalist attachment programmes were held at Nairobi—the first in May for 14 journalists, 10 of whom visited anti-desertification projects in Ethiopia, generated 20 newspaper/magazine articles, two radio programmes and preparatory field work for a television film; the second was held in October in collaboration with the Union of African Journalists and brought 11 top journalists from 10 African countries to UNEP headquarters.

Six issues of UNEP News and four issues of The Siren, the bulletin of the regional seas programme, were produced in English, French and Spanish. Bilateral publications and information support projects continued with the USSR and China; the information and audio-visual support content of the UNEP/USSR project was enhanced and the UNEP/China project published the Chinese-language quarterly World Environment and 50,000 copies of Dr. Seuss's children's book The Lorox in Chinese.

The UNEP-sponsored Television Trust for the Environment focused on environmental issues of developing countries, such as soil erosion, human settlements, tropical deforestation and desertification. One of the Trust's major achievements was its involvement in a programme on acid rain, which was broadcast in nine European countries in November. The Trust also co-produced three films with Jordan Television and in May published a critical guide to environmental films and a study, commissioned by UNESCO, of television coverage of the Ethiopian famine.

United Nations co-ordination

Co-ordination of environmental activities continued to be monitored by the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC). Its annual report to the UNEP Governing Council,⁽⁵⁾ adopted in October 1986,⁽⁶⁾ dealt with co-ordination policy issues, environmental impact of development projects, nuclear hazards and joint activities. It also covered implementation of and follow-up to the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification (see p. 662).

Stressing the importance of UNEP's co-ordinating and catalytic functions and the important role of its Environment Fund in promoting multisectoral activities, ACC considered that environmental considerations needed to be integrated fully into development plans and projects. Taking note of the conclusions reached at an informal think-tank meeting on environmental co-ordination policy issues (Marsascala, Malta, January), which had been discussed by the Designated Officials for Environmental Matters (DOEM), ACC expressed support for DOEM in providing an effective co-ordination mechanism on environmental matters for the entire United Nations system and endorsed DOEM's view that the co-ordination process should include bilateral discussions on joint efforts between UNEP and agencies. ACC encouraged joint evaluation of major joint projects and evaluation of programmes as well as of the system-wide medium-term programme. It recommended that, in preparing for the medium-term programme for 1990-1995, efforts be made to respond to evolving perceptions of the environment and to deal with environmental problems which resulted from inadequate development policies.

In the light of the Chernobyl accident, ACC welcomed the drawing up, within the framework of IAEA, of two international conventions on early notification of nuclear accidents and on assistance in the case of a nuclear accident or radiological emergency (see p. 585).

Among several new topics which ACC's Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions (Operational Activities) decided to include in its work programme was the impact of operational activities on the environment. While much work had been done, particularly by UNEP, on environmental impact assessment and while guidelines for such assessment existed in many United Nations organizations, the Committee felt that the guidelines might not be sufficiently taken into consideration at the operational level and by those directly responsible for project identification, appraisal and implementation. Funding sources for technical co-operation activities increasingly required evidence that environmental considerations were reflected at various stages of the project cycle. In close co-operation with UNEP, the Committee planned to consider practical measures that could lead to a better integration of environmental considerations in the planning, identification and implementation of operational activities.⁽⁷⁾

Co-ordination with and among Governments

UNEP clearing-house mechanism

The clearing-house was established to expand UNEP'S ability to assist developing countries in specific environmental problems, while maintaining a co-ordinating rather than operational role; the main role of the clearing-house mechanism was to identify opportunities where the experience of UNEP could be combined with the experience and resources of the international community. UNEP's role was usually limited to project formulation, monitoring and evaluation, while financing and implementation were negotiated with donors.

By the end of 1986, UNEP, through its clearing-house mechanism, had helped in identifying 127 projects to deal with long-term problems or meet the short-term needs of 47 developing countries. Forty-five projects had been totally or partially financed from sources other than the Environment Fund, and 36 countries had benefited from activities undertaken with clearing-house financing. The following operational projects identified or prepared with clearing-house support were approved for financing in 1986: in Botswana, two projects for its long-term environment programme were approved by Sweden; in Peru, a project for its long-term environmental management programme in the Upper Selva region was approved by the Netherlands; in Bahrain, a project for pollution control was approved by the Arab Gulf Programme for United Nations Development Organizations (AGFUND); in Egypt and Lesotho, two desertification control projects received commitments from the Federal Republic of Germany and UNDP; and in Tunisia, six projects, which were part of a national desertification control strategy prepared with UNEP, received commitments from UNDP, Algeria, the Federal Republic of Germany and the European Economic Community (EEC). In addition, the clearing-house co-ordinated the preparation of a long-term programme relating natural resources and the environment in the Amazonian region of Ecuador. Long-term programmes designed to meet serious environmental problems were under way in Botswana, Indonesia, Jordan, Peru, Papua New Guinea and Tunisia.

The clearing-house identified through its long-term programming activities one additional operational project in Botswana, eight in Ecuador and 19 under the action plan for environmental management in the Zambezi River Basin. Project formulation missions were organized in the Sudan and Uganda as a first step towards implementing the recommendations of the first (1985) African Ministerial Conference on the Environment.⁽⁸⁾

Short-term advisory services were provided directly by donors under arrangements with the clearing-house or financed through trust funds to: Guyana (environmental impact study of a hydroelectric project); Togo (submission of an environmental code to the Government); Burundi (environmental impacts on the ecosystem in Lake Tanganyika); Uganda (environmental legislation); and the Association of South-East Asian Nations (management of hazardous wastes). Through two multilateral projects, five developing countries received advice on the establishment of national registers of potentially toxic chemicals and three were assisted in the establishment of national soil reference collections.

Total resources mobilized through clearing-house efforts during 1982-1986 amounted to some $15 million, of which $7.2 million was committed by donors during 1986.

At the end of 1986, some 82 projects which required approximately $80 million for full implementation awaited financing; in view of this large gap, the UNEP Executive Director convened a meeting (Geneva, September) on the financing of environmental programmes of developing countries, in which 16 Governments and two international organizations participated.

UNEP Fund

1986 income and expenditures

Expenditures of the UNEP Fund on programme and programme reserve activities totalled $15.51 million in 1986, compared to $23.53 million in 1985; the lower expenditure level reflected a lower level of project commitments. Disbursements were for: Earthwatch, $2.68 million; environmental awareness, $2.65 million; health and human settlements, $2.17 million; oceans, $1.99 million; regional and technical co-operation, $1.61 million; desertification, $1.31 million; environment and development, $1.26 million; terrestrial ecosystems, $1.23 million; water, $0.18 million; and the arms race and the environment, $0.09 million. In addition, $0.35 million was distributed under the programme reserve. Sixty new projects were approved by the Fund in 1986, three less than in 1985; 28 projects were closed. At the end of the year, 327 projects were open. Geographical distribution of Fund commitments was as follows: global, $10.5 million; regional, $3.8 million; and interregional, $1.2 million.

The downward trend in contributions to the Fund that had persisted since 1981 was reversed in 1986. As at 31 December, $28.05 million had been paid, while another $1.19 million had been pledged. A total of 91 countries were expected to contribute to the Fund for 1986; 27 of them either paid or pledged contributions higher than in 1985, and two countries—Bahrain and Haiti—contributed for the first time in 1986. Taken together, these 29 countries contributed an additional $1.82 million in 1986. Contributions were also paid on a more timely basis.

Additional sources of funding

In accordance with UNEP Governing Council requests in 1982⁽⁹⁾ and 1985,⁽¹⁰⁾ the Executive Director continued to seek additional resources. Additional pledges totalling $1,184,018 were secured as counterpart contributions for 29 projects in 1986. Twelve Governments contributed $1,074,417 for 1986, while six intergovernmental organizations, several non-governmental organizations and private industries contributed $836,238.

Trust funds

In 1986, one general trust fund was added to the nine other such funds administered by UNEP, and two new technical co-operation trust funds were established, bringing the number of those funds to 11.

Following approval by the Governing Council in 1985,⁽¹⁰⁾ the Regional Seas Trust Fund for the Eastern African Region was established for two years from 1 January 1986. Under agreements with Finland, two technical co-operation trust funds were established in July and August, respectively, one to provide consultancies to developing countries for 18 months and the other to provide experts to the secretariat of the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference.

1984-1985 accounts

In December 1986, the General Assembly, by resolution 41/176, accepted the financial report and audited financial statements, and the audit opinions of the Board of Auditors, on the Environment Fund for the biennium ended 31 December 1985.⁽¹¹⁾ In so doing, the Assembly also endorsed the comments of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions.⁽¹²⁾

Environmental activities

Environmental monitoring and assessment

Environmental monitoring continued to be one of UNEP's main tasks throughout 1986. Increased dialogue and exchange of experience and operational knowledge led to increased co-ordination among the various components of UNEP's environmental assessment programme, Earthwatch. The Global Resource Information Data Base (GRID) was designated as a special sectoral source for the International Referral System for sources of environmental information (INFOTERRA); the International Register of Potentially Toxic Chemicals (IRPTC) continued close co-operation with the health criteria programme of the International Programme on Chemical Safety and discussions continued among IRPTC, INFOTERRA and GRID on data release policy. In addition, outer limits (atmosphere) and environmental data were considered to be key components of Earthwatch and were merged into the Global Environmental Monitoring System (GEMS).

The Interaction Council of former heads of Government adopted at its fourth session (Tokyo and Hakone, Japan, 7-10 April) a final statement calling on Governments to reduce military and other non-productive spending and give priority to population, environment and development. It also urged industrialized countries to increase dramatically their financial assistance to developing countries. Noting that global destruction of the environment loomed, the Council called for specific national environmental protection programmes, international co-operation in educating people, free transfer of ecological know-how and the strengthening of international institutions.

The Eighth Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries (Harare, Zimbabwe, 1-6 September), in its Economic Declaration, expressed concern over the environment's continued deterioration and stressed the need for ecologically balanced development planning and the pooling of information on resource-conserving technologies. The non-aligned countries hoped that the documentation on the Environmental Perspective to the Year 2000 and Beyond, to be submitted to the General Assembly in 1987, would focus attention on the interrelated issues of environment and development. They called on States to refrain from endangering the marine environment and appealed to nations responsible for remnants of war to co-operate with the United Nations in supporting the demands of the affected countries. UNEP and specialized agencies were urged to increase their assistance to African countries to alleviate the effects of drought and desertification.

Environment information networks

Global Environmental Monitoring System

The activities of GEMS, a collective international effort to acquire the data needed for rational management of the environment, were divided in 1986 into seven interrelated monitoring areas: renewable resources; climate; health; long-range transboundary pollution; integrated monitoring (simultaneous monitoring of pollutants and ecosystems); oceans; and GRID (for details, see below).

Among GEMS projects in 1986 were: the twentieth annual International Symposium on Remote Sensing of the Environment (Nairobi, December), attended by more than 500 technicians, scientists and decision makers from 42 countries; a UNEP project on ecological monitoring of land degradation on the eastern slopes of the Peruvian Andes; and an integrated monitoring project in twin temperate broad-leaved biosphere reserves in Chile and the United States.

Global Resource Information Data Base

Designed as a data management service for the United Nations system, GRID, established in 1985 within GEMS, enabled environmental data to be transformed into information useful to decision makers. It integrated data on the basis of geographical location—an effective common denominator in environmental planning and management.

National applications of GRID were combined with training under a UNEP/United Nations Institute for Training and Research GRID programme sponsored by the Swiss Development Agency. GRID Control, a facility active in data base and methodology development, started operating in Nairobi early in 1986. During the year, nearly 20 global or regional data sets—ranging from political boundaries to vegetation—were compiled within GRID and supplied to a number of requesters.

INFOTERRA

UNEP's environmental information system and the world's largest—INFOTERRA—linking national and international institutions and experts, expanded its activities in 1986. The number of government-designated INFOTERRA national focal points reached 129, of which 106 were in developing countries, serving over 98 per cent of the world's population. Use of INFOTERRA continued to increase, the majority of queries coming from developing countries. User services were improved by the addition of six special sectoral sources, which provided bibliographical information and documentation on priority environmental issues, and by the establishment of three more regional service centres—in Chile, India and Morocco—to improve the flow of substantive information at the regional and subregional level.

The INFOTERRA computer programme and data base were converted for use on a microcomputer, to widen adoption and utilization of the data base and software. INFOTERRA published a multilingual specialized directory on wastes and their treatment and a revised operations manual in English, French and Spanish was distributed to all focal points which used those working languages; a Russian version was being prepared.

Protection against harmful products and pollutants

Registration of harmful products

In accordance with a 1984 General Assembly request⁽¹⁾ the Secretary-General submitted two reports in 1986 on products harmful to health and the environment.

In September⁽²⁾ he reviewed the mechanisms for information exchange within the United Nations system on such products; in establishing those mechanisms, United Nations bodies had compiled, evaluated and published scientific, legal and regulatory information relating to chemicals, pharmaceuticals, pesticides and drugs.

Among them, WHO had set up mechanisms for the timely and comprehensive exchange of information on the quality, efficacy and safety of pharmaceutical products and resulting regulatory measures. IRPTC (see p. 656) and the Provisional Notification Scheme for Banned and Severely Restricted Chemicals, both within UNEP, provided channels for information exchange on restrictive regulatory measures imposed on agricultural and industrial chemicals as well as notifications regarding their export. The ILO Occupational Safety and Health Hazard Alert System, part of ILO's International Programme for the Improvement of Working Conditions and Environment, focused specifically on chemical and physical hazards which might affect safety and health in the working environment. Under the FAO International Code of Conduct on the Distribution and Use of Pesticides, potential hazards in the distribution and use of pesticides were identified, standards of conduct established and responsibilities defined for those engaged in the distribution, regulation and use of pesticides.

Under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) notification procedure, countries were to notify GATT of any goods produced and exported by them but banned by their national authorities for sale on their domestic markets on grounds of human health and safety. The International Programme on Chemical Safety, a joint UNEP/WHO/ILO co-ordinating mechanism with the mandate to enhance consultation and collaboration between the three organizations, provided for the exchange of information on the risks to human health and the environment associated with exposure to harmful chemicals. The consolidated list of products whose consumption and/or sale had been banned, withdrawn, severely restricted or not approved by Governments (see below) grouped together regulatory actions on pharmaceuticals, chemicals and consumer products regulated on account of their chemical ingredients; it consolidated information collected by WHO and UNEP/IRPTC under their own mandates and information referred to them by other organizations.

The success of those information exchange schemes depended largely on the active participation of Governments; further evolution and strengthening of Governments' capabilities to use the schemes was an important factor. There was the possibility of a continuing harmonization of terminology and procedures, as the various schemes had not all reached the same stage of development, the report concluded. At the working level, regular contacts were maintained between the organizations responsible for the operation of those schemes in order to avoid duplication of work.

Consolidated list

In a May 1986 report,⁽³⁾ the Secretary-General described arrangements for the preparation of future issues of the consolidated list of products whose consumption and/or sale had been banned, withdrawn, severely restricted or not approved by Governments; the need for criteria for the inclusion of products; and the question of introducing into the list the legal, public health and commercial context of regulatory actions, as well as complementary information on the safe uses of products.

The first list, issued in 1983 and revised in 1984,⁽⁴⁾ was based on work done within FAO, WHO, ILO, UNEP, GATT, the United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations and other relevant intergovernmental organizations. The second edition of the list, being prepared for publication in 1987, contained regulatory information from 77 countries on nearly 600 pharmaceuticals, chemicals and consumer products.

The Secretary-General noted that the new arrangements for collaboration as agreed in memoranda of understanding between the United Nations, UNEP and WHO had worked well and had helped to avoid duplication of activities; as a result of that co-operative effort, the second issue of the list was more comprehensive and provided better access to internationally available scientific and technical data. The Secretary-General pointed out the importance of minimizing repetitive presentation of information, without detracting from the list as a catalogue of national decisions. Noting the difficulties in identifying some products by their trade names in the context of an international listing, he suggested that countries which had not done so might consider introducing a requirement that the active ingredients of pharmaceutical products and pesticides be identified on the label.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 July 1986, on the recommendation of its Third (Programme and Co-ordination) Committee, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1986/72 by roll-call vote.

Protection against products harmful to health and the environment

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 37/137 of 17 December 1982, 38/149 of 19 December 1983 and 39/229 of 18 December 1984,

Having reviewed the report of the Secretary-General on products harmful to health and the environment regarding progress in the development of the consolidated list of products whose consumption and/or sale have been banned, withdrawn, severely restricted or not approved by Governments,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his report on products harmful to health and the environment, describing work undertaken in preparing the consolidated list and in advancing work towards improvement of the list in future editions;

2. Commends the Secretary-General for initiating the memoranda of understanding between the United Nations and the World Health Organization and between the United Nations and the United Nations Environment Programme/International Register of Potentially Toxic Chemicals, and for developing constructive and appropriate delegation of responsibility for the preparation of the consolidated list;

3. Decides that the consolidated list of products which have been banned, withdrawn, severely restricted or not approved by Governments shall continue to be published as one document, including generic/chemical and brand names and the names of all manufacturers of such products;

4. Urges Governments to continue to co-operate with the United Nations Environment Programme/International Register of Potentially Toxic Chemicals and the World Health Organization in providing current, corrected and updated information on national regulatory actions.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/72

23 July 1986 Meeting 38 49-1-1 (roll-call vote)

Approved by Third Committee (E/1986/126/Add.1) by roll-call vote (43-1-1), 18 July (meeting 18); draft originally by United States (E/1986/C.3/L.19), amended by Argentina, Peru and Venezuela (E/1986/C.3/L.22); draft subsequently sponsored by Venezuela only, following oral revision of amendments by sponsors, later joined by Pakistan; agenda item 20.

Roll-call vote in Council as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Australia, Bangladesh, Belgium, Brazil, Byelorussian SSR, Canada, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Egypt, Finland, France, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Guinea, Haiti, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Morocco, Mozambique, Nigeria, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Romania, Rwanda, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Turkey, USSR, United Kingdom, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zimbabwe.

Against: United States.

Abstaining: Germany, Federal Republic of.

The Third Committee approved by a roll-call vote of 42 to 1, with 2 abstentions, orally revised amendments to the original draft. By those amendments, three paragraphs (taking note of the refinement of criteria to be used in future editions of the consolidated list, endorsing the Secretary-General's conclusions that future editions would include references to legal documents describing national regulatory actions and the health and environmental context in which those actions were taken, and would not include information on safe uses of products and related questions, and concurring with the plans described in the Secretary-General's report for the preparation of future editions) were deleted. The adopted paragraph 3 replaced one expressing agreement with the Secretary-General's conclusions that the task of including in the list commercial information about products would require efforts which significantly exceeded the capabilities of the United Nations, UNEP and WHO, and deciding that work done in connection with the list should be performed exclusively by UNEP and WHO, with the United Nations Secretariat playing a co-ordinating role. Also, the words "as appropriate" were deleted after WHO in paragraph 4. Following approval of the amendments, the United States withdrew its sponsorship, explaining that the resulting text bore little semblance to the original; it firmly believed that work should cease on the inclusion of commercial information about products.

Venezuela, which became the sponsor, felt that omission of the requirements relating to brand names would have removed much of the text's significance; the wording adopted responded to the concerns reflected in the Secretary-General's report and conformed to previous resolutions on the subject. The consolidated list would in future be simplified and thus more manageable; Venezuela recommended that the Secretariat prepare an alphabetical list and promptly establish machinery for computerization.

The Federal Republic of Germany did not support paragraph 3 and regretted the deletion of the three original paragraphs. It considered it inadvisable to publish data on generic/chemical and brand names or product manufacturers' names, in either the consolidated list or a separate one.

In Canada's view, the original draft had taken account of the real difficulties outlined in the Secretary-General's report; paragraph 3 failed to reflect the problems outlined by the Secretary-General with regard to the inclusion of commercial information on all products, a task that would require efforts in terms of data collection and verification significantly exceeding the capabilities of the United Nations, UNEP and WHO. Canada had therefore abstained in the Committee vote on the amendments; as it, however, continued to take an interest in the issues involved, it cast a positive vote on the resolution.

France, also speaking on behalf of Belgium, Italy, Spain and the United Kingdom, believed it essential that the list continue to appear as one document and be prepared in close collaboration between WHO, UNEP and the United Nations Department of International Economic and Social Affairs; the Centre on Transnational Corporations had no mandate to engage in such work and should not be involved.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

In December 1986, acting on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, the General Assembly adopted decision 41/450 by recorded vote.

Protection against products harmful to health and the environment

At its 100th plenary meeting, on 8 December 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, decided to endorse Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/72 of 23 July 1986 on protection against products harmful to health and the environment.

General Assembly decision 41/450

146-1-1 (recorded vote)

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/930/Add.1) by vote (136-1-1), 21 November (meeting 34); draft by Yugoslavia, for Group of 77 (A/C.2/41/L.14); agenda item 12. Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 2nd Committee 19, 23-25, 27, 28, 34; plenary 100.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zambia.

Against: United States.

Abstaining: Germany, Federal Republic of.

The Council had gone too far in incorporating into the list highly dubious and misleading information, the United States believed. The incorporation of the "reference list" of the Centre on Transnational Corporations, which provided trade names, names of manufacturers and other related data, discriminated against manufacturers in the Western industrialized countries which were open with their commercial and regulatory data, while protecting manufacturers in social and developing countries which did not make such information freely available.

Speaking on behalf of the EEC members, the United Kingdom said they would have preferred a completely integrated list, and they attached prime importance to universal product coverage, the need for consistent updating of brand names and the chemical composition of products and the maintenance of parts I and II as a single publication in future updated editions.

International Register of Potentially Toxic Chemicals

The UNEP International Register of Potentially Toxic Chemicals continued in 1986 to expand its global information exchange network on chemicals and their effects on health and the environment. The network included governmental and non-governmental institutions, international organizations, industry and others with a common interest in chemical safety. In 1986, IRPTC worked through a network of 115 national correspondents from 108 countries. IRPTC operated a query-response service and regularly published information on selected chemicals in its Bulletin or as special publications. During the year, 315 queries on chemicals were received (49 per cent from developing countries), most of them (i.e., 48 per cent) on agrochemicals. One issue of the IRPTC Bulletin was published in 1986 in English, French and Spanish, and distributed to 9,200 corporate and individual recipients world-wide.

The key activity of IRPTC was the preparation and dissemination of data profiles for chemicals which allowed the expert user to identify what was known about a particular chemical substance with regard to its chemical, physical, environmental and toxicological characteristics. In addition, the data profiles provided information on production and consumption, use, spills, treatment of poisoning and waste management, as well as recommendations and legal mechanisms for control of hazards posed by chemicals.

Legal data submitted to IRPTC had also been made available separately in 1983 as the IRPTC legal file, which contained data on regulatory measures and recommendations for hazard control on over 6,000 chemicals. A revised and expanded version—covering over 600 selected chemicals of international significance—was being prepared for publication in 1987. Using data in the legal file, the first phase of a joint study with the Commission of the European Communities on the identification and description of substances to which workers were exposed at the work-place and which were easily absorbed through the skin was completed.

Under UNEP's clearing-house mechanism (see p. 651) and with assistance from the Netherlands, IRPTC launched the second phase of a project to assist developing countries in establishing national information systems for chemicals. Brazil, China, Indonesia, Thailand and Zambia were involved in that exercise in 1986, which culminated in a three-week training course held in October at IRPTC in Geneva.

A training seminar (Moscow and Sochi, USSR, 23 September-3 October), organized jointly with the International Programme on Chemical Safety (IPCS) and the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance, focused on the protection of human health and the environment. An international expert meeting (Moscow, 1-5 December) discussed an updated version of the English/Russian glossary of selected terms in preventive toxicology and made recommendations for its finalization and publication in 1987.

Under a joint project with the USSR, IRPTC initiated an international survey on the use of classification systems for chemicals based on their toxicity and hazards; as at 31 December 1986, 42 respondents from 38 countries had provided detailed information on national experience with such systems. The survey was scheduled for completion in 1987.

IRPTC co-operated with the UNEP Industry and Environment Office in providing inputs for the UNEP/WHO/World Bank manual on disposal of hazardous wastes. In April, a registry of chemicals under testing for toxicity, developed jointly by IRPTC and IPCS, was published.

IRPTC also contributed to the consolidated list of products whose consumption and/or sale had been banned, withdrawn, severely restricted or not approved by Governments (see p. 654). An updated list of environmentally dangerous chemical substances and processes of global significance was prepared by IRPTC, with the aid of other UNEP units, IPCS and expert consultants; it was submitted to an expert group for scrutiny.

Provisional Notification Scheme for Banned and Severely Restricted Chemicals

Adopted by the UNEP Governing Council in 1984,⁽⁴⁾ the Provisional Notification Scheme for Banned and Severely Restricted Chemicals provided for the exchange of information on restrictive control actions taken with regard to the use or handling of chemicals and also for notifications on exports to importing countries of chemicals so regulated. The Scheme stated that when a country had taken control action to ban or severely restrict the use or handling of a chemical in order to protect human health or the environment domestically, or to refuse a required authorization for proposed first-time use of the chemical domestically, it should notify as soon as practicable the authorities in other countries of the action taken, in order to enable them to assess the risks associated.

As at 1 July 1986, 65 nominations had been received of national authorities designated by Governments for implementation of the Scheme. IRPTC continued to assist in implementing the Scheme by collecting and distributing information.

Prevention of chemical accidents

The chemical poisoning and pollution of the Rhine River following an accident at the Sandoz chemical plant near the Swiss city of Basel on 1 November 1986 made it clear that chemical accidents with potential transboundary impacts must be dealt with through international co-operation, the UNEP Executive Director stated in his report on major environmental events during 1986.⁽⁵⁾ Existing measures for the prevention of chemical accidents required improvement and the issues to be addressed were pertinent to risk management in chemical-related activities; they included the siting of installations handling hazardous substances, construction standards for manufacturing facilities and warehouses, and limitation of quantities of hazardous chemicals in stock.

At a seminar on industrial hazardous waste in November, the Executive Director proposed that UNEP take the lead in developing two conventions to help minimize the occurrence and harmful effects of chemical accidents and emergencies (see p. 670).

After the accident at Basel, representatives of countries bordering the Rhine met on 12 November and agreed on additional proposals for action by the International Commission for the Protection of the Rhine against Pollution and its member States. On 24 November, ministers responsible for the environment in the EEC countries agreed on a resolution designed to strengthen and improve existing rules and regulations pertaining to chemical handling, storage and transport. On 19 December, at the Seventh Conference of Ministers on the Pollution of the Rhine, with ministers from Rhineriparian States and a representative of the Commission of the European Communities, agreement was reached on the long-term ecological goal to restore the health of the Rhine by the year 2000 and, to that end, an action plan was being prepared.

Management of agricultural chemicals and residues

In 1986, the developing world saw continued interest in the use of pesticides in crop and livestock production, and considerable concern arose about direct toxic effects on humans, the buildup of resistance in organisms, the disruption of control by natural enemies and the appearance of pesticide residues in food, the Executive Director noted in his annual report. The most disturbing issue for developing countries was perhaps increased resistance in pests and disease-carriers.

Following preparatory meetings and inter-agency consultations involving UNEP, the FAO International Code of Conduct on the Distribution and Use of Pesticides was published in early 1986 (see p. 654). The Code set forth responsibilities and established voluntary standards of conduct for the distribution and use of pesticides, especially where there was inadequate law to regulate pesticides.

FAO and UNEP began an evaluation of their joint Global Programme on the Implementation and Development of Integrated Pest Control in Agriculture. They also discussed ways to strengthen the role of their Panel of Experts on Integrated Pest Control in project formulation, development, field implementation and evaluation, and fund-raising.

Under a UNEP project for the promotion of procedures to minimize pesticide applications in favour of non-chemical methods and strategies, 22 graduates from Ghana and Sri Lanka were trained in the safe and efficient use of pesticides.

With UNEP support, 20 participants from Cameroon, Guinea and Guinea-Bissau received training at the Regional Centre for Training in Plant Protection (Yaounde, Cameroon, November/December), to enable them to design practical programmes in integrated crop pest and livestock vector management in order to minimize the negative environmental effects of indiscriminate pesticide use.

The activities of the former UNEP/International Centre of Insect Physiology and Ecology group training course on components essential for ecologically sound pest and vector management systems continued under the sponsorship of the International Development Research Centre of Canada; the courses were designed primarily to acquaint scientists from developing countries with recent advances in environmental pest and vector control strategies.

A one-week meeting in April 1986 finalized the findings and recommendations of a team which had visited Botswana and Zambia in 1985 to review the status of tsetse control operations; environmental dimensions were included in the findings, which were expected to be extremely valuable in the implementation of the Zambezi Action Plan.

The first International Conference on Tropical Entomology (Nairobi, 31 August-5 September) was attended by some 400 participants; it stressed the shortage of trained manpower in all areas of entomology and the need for co-ordinated training efforts. A second International Conference on Plant Protection in the Tropics (Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, 17-20 March) was supported by UNEP and FAO.

IPCS provided exchange of information on two specialized aspects of harmful chemicals. Jointly with FAO, an evaluation was made of pesticides which might occur as residues as well as additives in food; information on the toxicological risks of those substances was reviewed and an evaluation made of the level at which they might be safely tolerated.

Other aspects of health-related monitoring

Health-related monitoring was one of the concentration areas of GEMS, whose global health-related monitoring networks had measurable impact on expanding and strengthening national monitoring programmes, particularly in developing countries. In 1986, GEMS urban air monitoring procedures were used to expand networks in China, India and Malaysia. An expert mission from Hong Kong to China and the establishment of a WHO regional collaborating centre in Sao Paulo, Brazil, were two more examples of co-operation among developing countries.

A regional network of scientific reference institutes was established in Latin America to assess toxic substances in surface and ground waters. National networks were created in India and Peru, and monitoring stations were set up in the Niger, Senegal and Zaire. In Brazil, GEMS analytical quality control procedures were applied to inter-calibration among national laboratories, and 250 laboratories world-wide participated in international quality control.

GEMS contributed directly to the control of food contamination in a number of countries, among them Brazil, China, India and Qatar. The Qatar Regional Centre for Food Contamination Monitoring provided expertise and assistance to neighbouring countries. The food contamination monitoring network expanded to cover 19 developing countries and the volume of dietary intake data collected by the GEMS project tripled during the year.

The GEMS/WHO Human Exposure Assessment Locations programme, in which four developing and three developed countries participated, assessed pollution-exposure risks to human health; in 1986, it began two monitoring studies, on DDT/hexachlorobenzene and on heavy metals.

IPCS provided a mechanism for the exchange of information on the risks to health and the environment resulting from exposure to chemicals; health, safety and environmental data on chemicals were provided at three levels, oriented to specific types of evaluation of specific chemicals or groups of chemicals in order to enable relevant authorities to establish policies for safe use of those chemicals and set regulations.

Monitoring of long-range transport of pollutants

The second phase of a project begun in 1984 with the Economic Commission for Europe (ECE)⁽⁴⁾ concentrated on assessing damage from atmospheric pollutants to forests in ECE countries. UNEP and ECE assisted in establishing two centres, in Czechoslovakia and the Federal Republic of Germany, which were to co-ordinate national monitoring activities and analyse incoming data. A draft manual on methodologies and criteria for harmonized sampling, assessment, monitoring and analysis of the effects of air pollution on forests was published.

Protection of the ozone layer

As at 31 December 1986,⁽⁶⁾ 27 States and ECE had signed the Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer, adopted in 1985;⁽⁷⁾ two States signed in 1986. Canada, Finland, Norway, Sweden and the United States ratified the Convention during the year and the Byelorussian SSR, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR accepted it. The Convention was to enter into force after 20 States had ratified or accepted it.

A workshop on the control of chlorofluorocarbons (Rome, 26-30 May; Leesburg, United States, 8-12 September) provided inputs for the first session of the Ad hoc Working Group of Legal and Technical Experts for the Preparation of a Protocol on Chlorofluorocarbons to the Convention (Geneva, December).

The UNEP Co-ordinating Committee on the Ozone Layer, at its eighth session (Nairobi, February), reassessed ozone layer modification, reiterating that compelling evidence indicated increases in the concentration of gases which controlled atmospheric ozone.

In June, UNEP and the United States Environmental Protection Agency organized a conference in Washington, D.C., on the effects of changes in stratospheric ozone and global climate. UNEP's Co-ordinating Committee met again in November to prepare a global assessment of the effects of ozone layer change, using the conference results.

Climate-related monitoring

GEMS activities

Major fluctuations in the global climate system were being monitored under a 10-year international programme, which also disseminated climate information internationally. In 1986, the programme was in its second year as part of GEMS climate system monitoring activities. GEMS issued its annual summary of climate events during the preceding year and the World Meteorological Organization (WMO) issued a monthly bulletin.

World Climate Programme

National bodies co-operating in the WMO/UNEP/International Council EPA of Scientific Unions World Climate Programme continued to address the issue of climate change induced by greenhouse gases. UNEP was supporting regional analyses of the social, economic and political implications of the future climate; it had targeted the development of a legal instrument for an organized global response to the threatening issue of climate change.

As a follow-up to a 1985 conference⁽⁸⁾ a seven-member Advisory Group on Greenhouse Gases met for the first time in July 1986; the Group reviewed research results obtained since the conference and agreed that some of the results, such as the dramatic thinning of the ozone layer over the Antarctic, heightened the urgency of the concern expressed at the conference.

An overview of the potential global sea-level rise resulting from the greenhouse effect was in preparation. Concern by the Pacific island States over possible inundation by sea water prompted the Oceans and Coastal Areas Programme Activity Centre to set up a team to examine the implications of expected climate changes for the South Pacific; GEMS was to provide the team with scenarios of probable climate change. Similar investigations were to be undertaken in the Mediterranean and Caribbean regions. Those and other activities under the World Climate Impact Studies Programme were discussed by the UNEP Scientific Advisory Committee at its fifth session (Warsaw, Poland, March).

In other follow-up to the 1985 conference, UNEP, WMO, the International Institute for Applied Systems Analysis and other organizations sponsored a task force meeting on policy-oriented assessments of the impact of climate variations (Laxenburg, Austria, July 1986). The participants made specific recommendations with regard to future research in climate scenario development, agriculture, water resources, fisheries, forestry and tropical biomes; special emphasis was given to the need to integrate sectoral studies at the regional level and to examine interactions between climate-induced impacts and other pressing policy problems, such as international migration, resource depletion and economic development in the tropics.

WMO, WHO and UNEP sponsored an International Symposium on Climate and Human Health, held with USSR support (Leningrad, September). The 28 countries represented considered the various aspects of the application of climatology to human health and the assessment of the impact of climate on health.

The latest series of UNEP-supported training courses in agrometeorology, organized by the USSR State Committee on Hydrometeorology (Alma-Ata, October), studied the impact of climate variability on agricultural production and desertification.

Terrestrial ecosystems

Desertification and drought control

In Africa, famine, malnutrition and deaths arising from drought and desertification continued. Populations at risk in the drylands numbered close to 185 million, with 30 million immediately threatened. Despite the arrival of ample rains during the 1985/86 rainy season in various parts of Africa, some 19.2 million people, including 3 million displaced persons, continued to be affected by the drought-induced emergency situation. As at 1 April 1986, 15 countries were severely affected by the emergency. The most seriously affected were Angola, Ethiopia, Mozambique and the Sudan.

A June 1986 final report on countries stricken by desertification and drought,⁽⁹⁾ submitted by the Secretary-General pursuant to a 1985 General Assembly request,⁽¹⁰⁾ concentrated on the severely affected countries in Africa, as had been suggested in the Economic and Social Council in 1985.

By defining desertification and drought, the report determined which countries were affected, pinpointed where the problems were most severe and specified what action was needed. Desertification was a man-made process of degradation of fragile ecosystems found in arid, semi-arid and sub-humid lands. Among its consequences were loss of topsoil and declines of land fertility and agricultural production, leading in extreme cases to crop failures, food shortages and famine.

Drought, on the other hand, was a natural phenomenon, defined in terms of extended periods—two years or more—of below-average precipitation. As to the extent of the territory af-affected by drought, WMO suggested that for any particular country or region, the meteorological criterion to identify drought conditions was 60 per cent or less of normal annual precipitation, for over two consecutive years, for over 50 per cent of the region. According to UNESCO, a country could be considered drought-stricken if serious drought conditions existed in more than 30 per cent of its area or in 20 per cent of that part of the country which had an average annual precipitation of more than 400 millimetres.

These criteria narrowed down the list of countries "stricken" by desertification and drought as contained in the Secretary-General's 1985 preliminary report;⁽⁸⁾ the final report concluded that the countries that were truly stricken and not just affected by those two factors were countries in Africa, where the combination of desertification and drought had had disastrous consequences. Recent droughts had caused crop failures, water shortages and destruction to both animal and plant populations, accelerating crop failures and famines. At the end of January 1986, the unmet relief needs of 16 affected countries, mainly for food and other emergency requirements, amounted to $881 million. Among the economic consequences was an increase in imports coupled with drastically decreased exports, which compounded the indebtedness problems of the countries affected.

As requested by the Assembly, the Secretary-General's report contained proposals for specific action. Among United Nations organizations, FAO cited its ongoing agricultural rehabilitation programme, which consisted of 262 short- and medium-term projects costing $245 million, as an example of prompt emergency aid and assistance for agricultural recovery. UNESCO suggested that national information and documentation centres be established covering water, soil and biological resources, and that the United Nations system support such centres. Also stressing the importance of data-gathering, diagnostic studies, research and training, WMO suggested plans for optimizing food production systems using weather and climate information; it also suggested the choice of crops and the timing of agricultural operations in accordance with annual rainfall patterns.

UNEP's major contributions were targeted up to 1990 along the following lines: 11 seriously affected countries in Africa (Botswana, Burkina Faso, Kenya, Mali, Mauritania, Niger, Somalia, Senegal, Sudan, Tunisia, United Republic of Tanzania) were earmarked for concerted assistance and would be helped in the formulation and implementation of national plans, including concrete measures to combat desertification; it planned to elaborate 6 to 10 pilot projects on the development and rehabilitation of traditional systems of rangeland utilization in those countries. The United Nations Conference on Trade and Development proposed that measures be taken to stimulate domestic production, promote better trade patterns and assist affected countries through increased external assistance, debt relief, export stabilization and access to protected markets. UNSO projects were aimed at combating deforestation and range deterioration, water resources conservation and sand dune fixation.

Outside the United Nations system, the OAU Special Emergency Fund for Drought and Famine in Africa had over 60 projects in the pipeline, and the Permanent Inter-State Committee on Drought Control in the Sahel (CILSS), the Intergovernmental Authority on Drought and Development (IGADD) and the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference had programmes dealing with desertification and drought.

The Secretary-General recommended that the bodies concerned within and outside the United Nations system enhance their co-ordination in order to bring in additional resources. Priority should be given to desertification and drought projects in development and assistance programmes, measures should be formulated to combat deforestation and schemes should be developed for water resources management, rangeland management and sand dune stabilization. Alternative and supplementary livelihood systems should be tried to lessen dependence on traditional land use systems. Data-gathering, studies and research should be strengthened and linkages established to act as a bridge between emergency relief operations, recovery and medium- to long-term development. The Secretary-General also encouraged popular participation in project planning, implementation and evaluation.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 21 July, on the recommendation of its First (Economic) Committee, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1986/44 without vote.

Countries stricken by desertification and drought in Africa

The Economic and Social Council,

Noting the commitment of African Governments, as expressed in the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990 annexed to General Assembly resolution S-13/2 of 1 June 1986, to continue to undertake as soon as possible measures to combat drought and desertification, including massive afforestation and reafforestation, better management of water resources, the protection of ecosystems, the development of alternative sources of energy, the stabilization of sand dunes, measures to stop soil erosion, measures against salination, the improvement of drainage, and other measures to protect the environment,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 39/208 of 17 December 1984 and 40/175 of 17 December 1985 on countries stricken by desertification and drought,

Recalling Economic and Social Council decision 1985/176 of 25 July 1985 on the preliminary report of the Secretary-General on countries stricken by desertification and drought,

Recalling also General Assembly resolution 40/209 of 17 December 1985 on rationalizing the consideration of drought and desertification issues in the United Nations,

Recalling further the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification adopted by the United Nations Conference on Desertification,

Noting also that, in addition to the efforts of African countries, the support of the international community, particularly the donor countries, will be required,

Recognizing that the priority areas covered by the Special Programme for Sub-Saharan African Countries Affected by Drought and Desertification of the International Fund for Agricultural Development, such as support for the development of drought-resistant traditional crops, support for small-scale water-control schemes, and the adoption of measures to protect the environment, including agro-forestry and soil conservation, correspond to the priorities for combating drought and desertification of the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990,

Noting further that, in the United Nations Programme of Action, the donor countries have, inter alia, agreed to increase support, whenever possible, to the Special Programme of the International Fund for Agricultural Development,

Considering that the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity at its twenty-first ordinary session, held at Addis Ababa from 18 to 20 July 1985, adopted a recommendation urging the international community to provide substantial assistance to the International Fund for Agricultural Development to enable it to achieve the target of $300 million for its special programme for sub-Saharan Africa,

Bearing in mind that the Special Programme for Sub-Saharan African Countries Affected by Drought and Desertification was adopted unanimously by the Governing Council of the International Fund for Agricultural Development at its ninth session, in January 1986,

Noting that the statutory conditions for the effectiveness of the Special Programme have been met as a result of the deposit of the instruments of contribution as required and that therefore the President of the Fund has declared the Programme effective as from 28 May 1986,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on countries stricken by desertification and drought,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General on countries stricken by desertification and drought, as it represents an important step towards an integrated and unified approach to the distinct but interrelated problems of desertification and drought;

2. Commends the Secretary-General for the thoroughness and comprehensiveness of the report he has prepared, with the assistance of the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme and the United Nations Sudano-Sahelian Office, synthesizing the existing information, experiences and proposals of organs, organizations and bodies both within and outside the United Nations system;

3. Takes note with satisfaction of the proposed specific action to be taken, as set out in the report of the Secretary-General, which is to be linked up with the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990 and the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification, and transmits it to the General Assembly at its forty-first session for consideration;

4. Expresses its appreciation for the role of the United Nations Sudano-Sahelian Office in helping, and in coordinating United Nations efforts to help, the States members of the Permanent Inter-State Committee on Drought Control in the Sahel and the Intergovernmental Authority on Drought and Development in their programmes of recovery, rehabilitation and medium-term to long-term development, as well as desertification control;

5. Urges the United Nations Sudano-Sahelian Office to increase its assistance to the Sudano-Sahelian and adjacent regions in combating desertification and drought, paying attention to the most severely affected countries;

6. Appeals to all Governments to increase their support to the United Nations Sudano-Sahelian Office to enable it to respond more fully to the level of need of the countries of the Sudano-Sahelian region;

7. Urges the international community to adopt an integrated approach to desertification problems and to give its full support to and provide adequate resources for the implementation of the Plan of Action on Tropical Forests of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations;

8. Welcomes with satisfaction the establishment of the Special Programme for Sub-Saharan African Countries Affected by Drought and Desertification of the International Fund for Agricultural Development;

9. Expresses its appreciation to all donor countries that have deposited with the Fund their instruments of contribution or otherwise notified it of their intention to contribute to the Special Programme;

10. Appeals urgently to the international community, particularly donor countries, which have all supported the Special Programme of the Fund, to contribute effectively to the Programme so as to enable it to achieve its target of $300 million as a further tangible sign of their support for the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990.

Meeting 37

Adopted without vote

Approved by First Committee (E/1986/137) without vote, 16 July (meeting 14); 10-nation draft (E/1986/C.1/L.3/Rev.1), orally revised; agenda item 16.

Sponsors: Algeria, Djibouti, Ethiopia, Ghana, Morocco, Nigeria, Senegal, Somalia, Sudan, Tunisia.

Other activities. The Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development had decided in 1985 that the application of science and technology to the study, prevention, monitoring and combating of drought and desertification and other natural disasters would be discussed in depth at its 1987 session. The Centre for Science and Technology for Development was asked to prepare, in consultation with other United Nations bodies and organizations, a background document on the subject. The Centre organized in September 1986, in co-operation with the University of Western Michigan (United States), an informal meeting of experts to recall various national and international approaches to drought and desertification and to raise policy, planning and implementation questions⁽¹¹⁾

In a May report on co-operation between the United Nations and the intergovernmental Agency for Cultural and Technical Co-operation⁽¹²⁾ the Secretary-General said UNEP was exploring the possibility of co-operation with respect to environmental protection, including desertification.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December 1986, by decision 41/454, the General Assembly deferred until its 1987 session consideration of a draft resolution on countries stricken by desertification and drought in Africa⁽¹³⁾. By the draft, the Assembly would have appealed to the international community to contribute effectively to the IFAD Special Programme for Sub-Saharan African Countries Affected by Drought and Desertification and to increase their support to UNSO. It would have requested the Secretary-General to report on the latest climatic developments and trends concerning the drought in Africa.

In postponing consideration of the draft, the Assembly followed a recommendation by the Second Committee which acted on an oral proposal by Senegal. Having introduced the draft on behalf of 14 African nations, Senegal proposed its deferral in order to conform to the biennial work programme of the Committee.

Related decisions: GA 41/455, 41/456.

Implementation of the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification

Land lost through various forms of desertification or degraded to desert-like conditions remained in 1986 at 6 million hectares a year, as reported at the United Nations Conference on Desertification in 1977,⁽¹⁴⁾ and large areas of the world faced a high or very high risk of desertification. Furthermore, 21 million hectares of land a year were reduced to zero or negative economic productivity. There was growing consensus among the international community and the countries affected by desertification that the proper response to the crisis was to be found in long-term sustainable development as a preventive measure. The action taken by the General Assembly at its special session on the critical economic situation in Africa (see p. 442) was a major demonstration of how that consensus could be translated into commitment to reinforce regional efforts, which in turn should form a strong base for national action. Several of the actions called for in Africa's Priority Programme for Economic Recovery 1986-1990, adopted by OAU, and the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990 interfaced very closely with the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification adopted at the 1977 Conference and with the Cairo Programme for African Co-operation, adopted in 1985.⁽¹⁵⁾

The Inter-Agency Working Group on Desertification (IAWGD) held its second ad hoc meeting (Vienna, March 1986) and its thirteenth regular meeting (Geneva, September); continuing desertification and the need to obtain additional and predictable financing for the implementation of the Plan of Action were identified as the main issues IAWGD should address.

Against the background of those action programmes, major efforts of UNEP were aimed at assisting selected countries in developing and implementing plans for combating desertification, as part of overall national development plans.

At the regional level, UNEP planned to reinforce desertification control through the Committee on Deserts and Arid Lands, one of the committees to be set up under the Cairo Programme, with members including OAU, the African Development Bank, the main subregional organizations in the three African deserts, river basin authorities, economic communities and the African Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs) Environment Network. The proposed priority activities for the Committee included development of subregional data bases and monitoring systems for each of the three deserts, and selection and implementation of regional priority projects in line with the Cairo Programme and the United Nations Programme of Action.

Other UNEP projects focused on stimulating and co-ordinating international action; building up a computerized desertification data base and disseminating information for use in desertification control; promoting co-operative action in training and research; and co-operating with national and regional institutions in assessing and monitoring desertification through the application of new methodologies within the means of developing countries.

In the Sudan, UNEP assisted in formulating a full-fledged national plan of action to combat desertification. A pilot project for desertification control in southern Tunisia was successfully completed in 1986; technicians of the Institut des Régions Arides, which implemented the project in co-operation with UNESCO, received training in satellite imagery analysis and cartography, and workers learned techniques of shrub-planting and sand dune fixation. National action plans were also prepared by UNSO on behalf of UNEP, for Benin, Burkina Faso and Senegal. Preparatory work on national plans was under way in Jordan, where an ESCWA/FAO/UNEP mission carried out field work, and in the Syrian Arab Republic, following discussions between UNEP and the Arab Centre for Studies of Arid Zones and Drylands.

Algeria, Benin, Egypt, Ethiopia, the Gambia, Kenya, Mali, Senegal, the Sudan, Zaire, Zambia and Zimbabwe indicated their willingness to participate in a programme agreed at Cairo for the development of pilot projects covering 150 villages (three per country) and 30 semi-arid stock-raising zones (one in each of 30 countries).

Pilot projects based on multi-purpose integrated village and family afforestation, financed by AG-FUND, continued to progress in Benin, Burkina Faso, Democratic Yemen and Djibouti. A 2,200-hectare pilot project on rangeland development and rehabilitation and protection of land around livestock-watering points, initiated in 1985 with UNEP support in the Gambia, continued throughout 1986.

Regional integrated development schemes for Mali and Peru were prepared with assistance from the USSR Commission for UNEP (UNEP/COM). With funds obtained from Norway through UNEP's clearing-house mechanism, the Sudan prepared feasibility studies and draft project proposals for three stock-raising zones. Similar studies and project proposals were prepared in Uganda.

With strong government support, a reforestation and training project in southern India resulted in the production of over 2 million tree seedlings, the planting of over a million trees and the creation of 21 nurseries and new schoolchildren's nurseries. Ten training courses were held for farmers and schoolchildren in five forest training centres.

Action was taken during 1986 to strengthen the African Non-Governmental Organizations Environment Network, by supporting NGO field projects in selected countries in line with the Cairo Programme; projects were identified in Burkina Faso, Mali and Senegal. In Latin America, UNEP financed preparatory work on a directory of NGOs engaged in desertification control in Argentina, Chile, Colombia, Peru and Uruguay.

An intergovernmental meeting (Bangkok, Thailand, September), attended by 13 countries and jointly sponsored by ESCAP, UNEP and UNESCO, considered the establishment and operation of a regional research and training network for the ESCAP region.

Concerning the establishment of afforestation and sand dune stabilization networks entrusted to FAO by IAWGD, progress was reported on a network covering Algeria, Democratic Yemen, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mauritania, Morocco, Tunisia, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen under a UNDP-funded project.

At the global level, UNEP's Desertification Control Programme Activity Centre continued training programmes under projects in co-operation with UNEP/COM, China, IAWGD members and regional training institutions. The programmes, which sought to create awareness of the threat of desertification and enhance the capabilities of technicians from developing countries to deal with desertification problems, were attended by 2,184 trainees in 1986.

During the year, UNEP took action to establish a desertification information system with the design and testing of five data bases; an annotated bibliography of publications and reports; a compendium of all UNEP and other United Nations desertification projects and activities; an annotated directory of over 500 institutions and organizations involved with desertification control work; a compendium of technical information related to wind erosion and particle transport and deposition; and a bibliography on wind erosion.

As part of its efforts to create awareness of the threat of desertification and of the Plan of Action, UNEP produced a number of films. A 30-minute television documentary, Tomorrow's Famine, was marketed world-wide. The Television Trust for the Environment and Central Independent Television in the United Kingdom produced, with partial funding from UNEP, a film, Crowded Desert, which was broadcast in India in June. UNEP also contributed to two other films by the Television Trust: a one-hour film about the Ethiopian famine entitled Seeds of Hope, the Village and China—Shifting Sands. Work was completed on the Arabic, English, French and Spanish versions of a commented slide presentation, "Harvest of dust".

As a follow-up to the 1985 session of the Consultative Group for Desertification Control,⁽¹⁶⁾ UNEP co-ordinated consultations in 1986 between potential donors and Democratic Yemen, Egypt, Guinea, Lesotho, Mali and the Syrian Arab Republic on the financing and implementation of project proposals; four projects were under implementation in Egypt, Guinea, Lesotho and Mali, with additional financing of $6.9 million secured.

An International Conference on the Economics of Dryland Degradation and Rehabilitation (Canberra, March) mobilized international action to develop a practical method for analysing the causes of desertification and quantifying the economic and social benefits of halting and reversing desertification; as a conference output, guidelines were to be produced and regional workshops held.

Implementation in the Sudano-Sahelian region. In 1986, normal rainfall returned to much of the Sudano-Sahelian region after a 17-year drought. Despite the rains, the UNEP Executive Director noted in his annual report, it could not be said that the drought had ended; after the initial western Sahelian drought of 1968-1973, substantial rainfall had returned in 1974 only to dwindle away again in the succeeding years.

UNSO was participating in drought recovery efforts; its work on behalf of UNEP was directed towards lasting solutions to the problems confronting the fragile ecosystems to the south of the Sahara Desert, by arresting—and where possible reversing—the tide of desertification affecting the region. UNSO's desertification control programme, carried out in accordance with the recommendations of the Plan of Action to Combat Desertification, was directed towards combating deforestation, water resources and rangeland management, soil protection and sand dune fixation, and the planning and research needed to support those actions. UNSO participated in regional activities aimed at co-operation and information exchange on drought and desertification. As at 30 September 1986, its ongoing desertification control programme was composed of activities with a total funding of $47.6 million. UNSO continued its efforts to mobilize resources for the United Nations Trust Fund for Sudano-Sahelian Activities; during the year, it raised some $21 million for specific projects and $5.4 million for UNSO's general resources.

At a cost of $890,491, Norway extended until 1991 a project in Burkina Faso for the regeneration of Acacia alba; it also financed a five-year project directed at the regeneration of gum arabic plantations in Mali. An extension of a Swedish International Development Authority (SIDA)-financed operation continued the regeneration of Acacia alba in the Niger; also there, the second phase of a project to establish and expand green belts around Niamey was initiated with funding from Norway. In Mauritania, funding from the Danish International Development Agency (DANIDA) continued to provide institutional support to the Ministry of Rural Development's Department for the Protection of Nature, which was engaged in forestry preservation.

To use fuelwood more efficiently, widespread distribution of fuel-efficient stoves began. In 1986, such stoves were distributed to Burkina Faso with SIDA funding, to Mali, Mauritania and the Niger with the help of Norway, and to the Sudan with support from DANIDA; also with continued financing from DANIDA, trained extension agents promoted the use of the new stoves.

In the area of water resources, a three-year project for the integrated development of the Lake

Faguibine system in Mali was launched in October; with $1.8 million from Norway, funding from UNDP and food worth $260,000 from the World Food Programme (WFP), the project aimed at achieving self-sufficiency in food through livestock-raising, lake fishing and intensified agriculture.

Under an ongoing project in the Gambia, financed by Australia with the participation of the United Nations Capital Development Fund, a diversion weir and irrigation works were being constructed to improve the productivity of a low-lying agricultural area. In Cape Verde, construction began on a desalination plant in Boa Vista. Throughout the region, UNSO was engaged in the construction of dams and irrigation projects, provision of access to underground aquifers, establishment of watering points for livestock and the investigation of hydrological problems.

In range management, funding of $430,000 from Norway and food contributions from WFP made possible the second phase of a project for integrated development of Mali's lake region. A new centre in Senegal for the monitoring of pastoral ecosystems started operations with funding from DANIDA.

The largest projects to stabilize moving sand dunes were under way in Mauritania, Senegal and Somalia, using advanced methods of fixing dunes by vegetation. For Mauritania, UNSO obtained $5 million from DANIDA for a four-year extension of a nation-wide sand dune stabilization programme. In Cape Verde, an integrated programme aimed at soil protection and financed by Norway entered its second phase. In Senegal, a programme for the regeneration of saline soils in irrigated areas was underwritten by Canada.

In May, UNSO sent a multidisciplinary planning and programme mission to the United Republic of Tanzania to provide technical assistance to the newest participant in UNSO's anti-desertification programme; 23 desertification control projects were identified there.

Following consideration of two reports of the UNDP Administrator—on implementation of the Plan of Action in the Sudano-Sahelian region⁽¹⁷⁾ and on implementation of the medium-term and long-term recovery and rehabilitation programme in the region⁽¹⁸⁾—the UNDP Governing Council on 27 June⁽¹⁹⁾ appealed to Governments to increase their support to UNSO and requested the Administrator to review UNSO's financial and staffing situation with a view to considering the need to strengthen it. The Administrator was also requested to continue to report annually on implementation of the medium-term and long-term recovery and rehabilitation programme in the Sahel region and on efforts to combat drought and desertification, as well as on United Nations cooperation in that area. The Council reaffirmed UNSO's role in co-ordinating United Nations efforts to help the States members of CILSS and IGADD (see below) implement their recovery and rehabilitation programme, with due regard to ecological considerations. Governments of the affected areas and United Nations agencies were urged to intensify their co-ordination to assure concerted efforts to combat desertification.

UNSO programme of assistance in eastern Africa. In January 1986, an Intergovernmental Authority on Drought and Development was established by six East African countries—Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya, Somalia, the Sudan and Uganda. IGADD comprised an Assembly of Heads of State and Government as the supreme body, a Council of Ministers and a secretariat. Its establishment had first been recommended by the General Assembly in 1980.⁽²⁰⁾

Under the UNSO desertification control mandate and in accordance with a 1985 Assembly request,⁽²¹⁾ the UNDP Administrator arranged for the establishment within UNSO of a unit responsible for assisting IGADD members. UNSO funding and contributions by the UNDP Regional Bureaux for Africa and for Arab States provided IGADD with consultants and helped convene intergovernmental meetings and draw up its statutes and plan of action.

IGADD's main objectives were to co-ordinate member States' efforts to combat drought and desertification, promote their development on medium- and long-term bases, help them prepare guidelines and action programmes, raise international awareness of drought problems, launch resource mobilization campaigns and identify projects for the region.

The Agreement on the Establishment of IGADD and its plan of action were adopted at the first summit meeting of the Heads of State and Government of IGADD member States (Djibouti, 14-16 January); the meeting also adopted the rules for the IGADD secretariat's structure and funding and agreed on the appointment of the IGADD Executive Secretary.

The plan of action covered measures and projects of immediate, medium-term and long-term time frames. Proposed measures included an early warning system, schemes for food security, agricultural production, livestock and fisheries, water resources management, energy development, desertification control, infrastructure development and research training. Annexed to the plan was a first-generation programme of subregional and national projects for which support of the international community was to be solicited.

In Djibouti, a pilot project to develop natural resources and combat desertification was financed by UNSO general resources, AGFUND, UNEP and Djibouti itself. Fuelwood plantations were established in Ethiopia with financing through the UNSO Trust Fund from DANIDA and the Finnish International Development Agency (FINNIDA); consultations were held in March between UNSO and the Government on working out a comprehensive drought and desertification assistance programme. DANIDA provided $5.5 million in 1986 for a major expansion of the reforestation campaigns in Ethiopia. UNSO formulation missions prepared programmes for rangeland management and development and for the development of agroforestry in areas of Kenya severely affected by drought and desertification.

In Somalia, UNSO assistance included three ongoing projects for sand dune stabilization, with contributions from Italy, DANIDA and AGFUND. In addition, UNSO received $3.19 million earmarked for forestry development and training from FINNIDA and $3.4 million for the establishment of fuelwood plantations from DANIDA.

In the Sudan, the second phase of a project financed by the Netherlands involved reforestation with Acacia Senegal, a drought-resistant species that stabilized the soil, provided a source of fodder and fuelwood and produced gum arabic as a source of cash income, including foreign exchange. The management of grazing resources around permanent water supplies at El Odaya was financed by SIDA. Another project involved assistance to the National Desertification Control Co-ordinating and Monitoring Unit. Two projects financed with $4.1 million from DANIDA included fuel briquette production from wood substitutes and the promotion of improved cooking stoves, and afforestation. An AGFUND-financed project was approved to restock the gum belt in the Darfur region.

To reduce the demand for fuelwood, UNSO continued working on alternative energy sources. With DANIDA funding, UNSO carried out projects in the Sudan, to produce fuel briquettes made from peanut shells and waste products of cotton production, in Senegal, to develop the use of peat for household fuel, and in Somalia, to utilize wind energy.

While UNSO activities in Uganda had been interrupted by developments in the country, 15 drought and desertification control projects were under continuous review by UNDP and UNSO.

The establishment of IGADD and UNSO assistance to its members were described in a June 1986 report of the Secretary-General.⁽²²⁾ The Economic and Social Council, in resolution 1986/45, noted with appreciation the establishment of IGADD and the assistance provided. IGADD members were commended for the adoption of the development-oriented plan of action. The Council resolution was endorsed by the General Assembly in decision 41/455.

The UNDP Governing Council, on 27 June,⁽¹⁹⁾ reaffirmed UNSO's role in co-ordinating United Nations efforts to help IGADD members in implementing their recovery and rehabilitation programme.

Soil management

Shortages of food and other agricultural products were expected to worsen over the next decade, the UNEP Executive Director concluded in his 1986 annual report. In many countries, growth in agricultural production did not keep up with population growth and, in others, poor distribution channels made it difficult for agricultural produce to reach the areas where it was most needed. In developing UNEP's 1982 Plan of Action for the Implementation of the World Soils Policy⁽²³⁾ through national soils policies, emphasis was placed on the identification of vulnerable areas and on action-oriented programmes to meet the needs of developing countries in particular. Also highlighted were research, training, education and transfer of knowledge and experience.

Experience in the formulation of national soils policies in developing countries was reviewed at an international symposium (Hamburg, Federal Republic of Germany, August) in conjunction with the thirteenth congress of the International Society of Soil Science. More than 40 soil scientists (20 from developing countries) from over 20 countries participated.

In 1986, UNEP, in co-operation with the International Crop Research Institute for the Semi-Arid Tropics in India, published guidelines on farming systems principles for improved food production and the control of soil degradation in the arid, semi-arid and humid tropics.

Lithosphere

Under a UNEP/UNESCO/USSR project on geology and the environment, the second session of the International Scientific Council on Geology and Environmental Problems (Paris, April) reviewed the preparation of international guidelines on geology and land-use planning. A workshop and working group in June (Tallinn, USSR) discussed the impact of mining on the environment.

Forest ecosystems

Tropical forests

In 1986, deforestation in tropical areas continued despite increasing global concern for the state of tropical forest ecosystems which found expression in numerous initiatives involving United Nations organizations and other international bodies.

As central Co-ordinator of the Tropical Forestry Action Plan, which was drawn up in consultation with the World Bank, UNDP and the World Resources Institute, FAO saw as its main task translating the Plan into national plans, programmes and projects. During the year, FAO forestry staff took part in a mission to Kenya, organized with UNDP a multi-donor team to visit Cameroon and planned other missions to Bolivia, Côte d'Ivoire, the Dominican Republic, Guinea, Guyana, Panama, Peru and Somalia. FAO provided direct assistance to Costa Rica, Honduras and Malaysia in the preparation of their forestry plans; it also had received requests to review plans from Mexico and Venezuela.

Under a UNEP/UNESCO project, a regional workshop on demographic analysis of lowland dipterocarp forests was held in Malaysia (4-16 August), and an international workshop on rain forest regeneration and management was held in Venezuela (24-28 November); work continued on projects in the Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Papua New Guinea and Venezuela. In collaboration with the International Union for Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources (IUCN), action was initiated to demonstrate the application of ecological guidelines for development in tropical forests, focusing on Kalimantan, Indonesia. IUCN continued work to identify the 12 most threatened species and finalized a paper on bio-energy tree plantations. The Forest Research Institute in Malaysia and the Centro de Datos para la Conservación in Peru received assistance under a joint FAO/UNEP project on in situ conservation of forest genetic resources. A regional training workshop on tropical forest management in South-East Asia was held (Kepong, Malaysia, 16 June-5 July). An umbrella project for national management of tropical and subtropical forest ecosystems, developed with the Centro Agronómico Tropical de Investigación y Enseñanza in Costa Rica, became operational; first steps were taken towards preparation of a management plan for the Río Macho forest reserve.

UNEP supported a World Resources Institute/Environment Liaison Centre initiative of organizing regional workshops in Africa, Asia and Latin America in order to expand the role of NGOs in national forestry programmes; an African workshop was held at Nairobi (24-28 November).

At France's initiative an international tree and forest conference was convened (Paris, 5-7 February).

Mountain ecosystems

Increased pressure on highland ecosystems and a consequent destruction of vegetation cover, combined with the natural instability of some of those geologically active areas, had resulted in disasters such as floods and landslides affecting infrastructure and human lives. A number of governmental and non-governmental organizations, including FAO and the Man and the Biosphere programme of UNESCO, had been or were becoming involved in integrated management of mountain ecosystems.

An integrated pilot project on the environmental management and protection of Andean ecosystems, started in 1985, became completely operational; financed by a trust fund of the Federal Republic of Germany, it aimed at improving the Andean farmers' living conditions in a demonstration area close to the city of Cajamarca, Peru. UNEP organized a training workshop on Andean agriculture (Cajamarca, 28 February-2 March 1986), co-sponsored by the Government of Peru.

Conservation of wildlife and protected areas

Protecting endangered species, managing national parks and creating national conservation strategies continued to be major concerns. UNEP and the Ecosystem Conservation Group—comprising FAO, UNESCO, IUCN and the World Wildlife Fund (WWF)—gave priority to preparing national conservation strategies. One of the countries selected for assistance was Uganda, where UNEP and the Government were working to develop a strategy. Over 30 countries reported that they had developed such strategies, which was seen as a positive response to the 1980 World Conservation Strategy.⁽²⁴⁾ A UNEP-supported World Conservation Strategy Conference (Ottawa, Canada, 31 May-5 June 1986), attended by 450 conservation scientists, government officials, academics, field workers and others, formulated recommendations and guidelines to update the Strategy.

UNEP was represented at the Third General Assembly of the Inuit Circumpolar Conference (Kotzebue, Alaska, July/August), which recommended the formulation of an Arctic Conservation Strategy to provide a framework for conservation policies in the circumpolar region, excluding the Soviet Arctic; this would be the first regional application of the World Conservation Strategy. As a first step, an inventory of the animals harvested for subsistence by the Inuit people was being prepared.

UNEP continued to assist Governments in improving the management of wildlife and protected areas by reviewing the existing protected area coverage of habitats and species and their management in order to ensure that critical habitats were protected and other measures taken to maintain the entire range of biological diversity. In Somalia, a wildlife and conservation review was undertaken. Under a joint UNEP/Kenya Wildlife Fund Trustees project, a national workshop (Nairobi, October) reviewed the wildlife extension and training needs of key wildlife areas in Kenya and draft guidelines for public participation in conservation programmes. UNEP planned to make the guidelines available for testing in other African countries, and later also in countries of Asia and Latin America and the Caribbean.

UNEP assisted Governments in Africa to improve the managerial skills of staff working in wildlife and national park resource management organizations through fellowships granted to nine trainees from eight African countries for courses at colleges in Cameroon and the United Republic of Tanzania.

International measures to conserve wild animals and plants and their habitats, such as the 1973 Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora (CITES), continued to receive support from UNEP, which also provided the CITES secretariat at Lausanne, Switzerland. In accordance with resolutions adopted at the 1985 conference of the parties to the Convention,⁽²⁵⁾ two UNEP/CITES consultants initiated surveys of the status of leopard populations in sub-Saharan Africa, and the Wildlife Trade Monitoring Unit in the United Kingdom was employed by the CITES secretariat to provide technical and scientific support through its international network. Belize, the Dominican Republic, Singapore and Spain became parties to the Convention in 1986, bringing the total membership to 95; in addition, two non-parties, Burundi and Ethiopia, formally notified the secretariat of their intention to register ivory stocks and conform to CITES ivory trade control procedures. At a seminar held in the United Kingdom in September, 56 participants from 23 CITES States, the International Criminal Police Organization (Interpol) and the Customs Co-operation Council made recommendations to improve enforcement of CITES regulations.

With support from the Federal Republic of Germany, UNEP also provided a secretariat at Bonn for the Convention on the Conservation of Migratory Species of Wild Animals. In accordance with a decision taken at the 1985 meeting of the conference of parties to the Convention,⁽²⁵⁾ UNEP established a trust fund and invited contributions from the 22 parties.

UNESCO's Man and the Biosphere programme approved proposals to extend four existing reserves in the International Biosphere Reserve Network and agreed on the designation and addition of nine sites. The ninth session of the International Co-ordinating Council for the programme (Paris, October) discussed progress made by FAO, IUCN, UNEP and UNESCO in joint activities to support the Action Plan for Biosphere Reserves adopted in 1983 at the first International Biosphere Reserve Congress.

In collaboration with IUCN, UNESCO and the International Waterfowl Research Bureau, UNEP

continued to promote implementation of the Convention on Wetlands of International Importance Especially as Waterfowl Habitat; the latest update of the list of such wetlands included 354 sites covering more than 200,000 square kilometres, marking a significant increase in the application of the Convention. UNEP and WWF were among the sponsors of an International Seminar on Wetlands Conservation and Sustainable Development in Latin America and the Caribbean (Brasilia, Brazil, December) which focused on the development of a wetlands strategy.

Genetic resources

The International Board for Plant Genetic Resources, supported by UNEP, continued the exploration, collection, evaluation and conservation of crop plant and tree genetic resources. More than 100 countries collaborated and over 100,000 samples of crop germplasm were deposited in the gene bank network established and co-ordinated by the Board to house the world base collections.

During 1986, with FAO and UNEP support, field activities started in Malaysia and Peru, to develop and test methodologies for in situ conservation of forest genetic resources. Under a joint FAO/UNEP project, pilot trials of animal genetic resources data banks in developing countries were completed; as a follow-up, plans were developed for the establishment of regional data banks in Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Caribbean, and the Near East.

Research activities of the UNEP-supported regional Microbiological Resources Centres in Brazil, Egypt, Guatemala, Kenya, Senegal and Thailand dealt with the application of microbial resources for increased soil fertility and food production, pest and vector control, bioconversion of agro-industrial wastes and biodegradation of persistent environmental pollutants. Each centre also organized training activities and provided fellowships for applied research.

Activities aimed at popularizing the use of biological nitrogen fixation technology to enhance soil fertility and increase legume protein production in small farms, while moving away from costly and potentially polluting nitrogenous fertilizers, included trials on Rhizobium strains and rhizobium/legume inoculants in Brazil, Kenya, Senegal and the Sudan. The Cairo Centre, in collaboration with various agricultural experimentation stations, screened programmes for control of the house-fly and mosquitoes, and for the biodegradation of pesticides used in agriculture in Egypt. At the Bangkok Centre, 1,500 litres of anhydrous alcohol per day were produced from cassava on a pilot scale using locally isolated microbial strains. A pilot plant consisting of a biogas digester was constructed in Guatemala for the bioconversion of polluting by-products of coffee-processing into biogas, organic fertilizers and animal feed.

Sufficient funds were received in 1986 to establish a secretariat for the International Microbial Strain Data Network at Cambridge University (United Kingdom). UNEP also provided support to expand and update the World Data Centre for Micro-organisms and its relocation from Australia to Japan.

In 1986, UNIDO, UNEP and WHO set up a joint Working Group on Biotechnology Safety which held two meetings to address concerns about genetic engineering and the release of genetically manipulated organisms in the environment.

Photosynthesis and bio productivity

In 1986, work continued on a joint UNEP/Kings College (London) project on primary productivity and photosynthesis in natural ecosystems of the tropics. Five regional centres in Brazil, China, Kenya, Mexico and Thailand collected data on photosynthesis productivity both above and below ground using standardized techniques and equipment.

Freshwater ecosystems

The most important objective of UNEP's new programme for environmentally sound management of inland waters was to introduce an integrated approach to the management and development of freshwater resources on a river or lake basin-wide scale. The programme also sought to assist Governments in developing and implementing environmentally sound water management programmes included in action plans, provide training for experts and establish a training network in developing countries, prepare guidelines for water management and assess the state of the environment in inland water systems on a regular and world-wide basis.

Preparation of an action plan for the environmentally sound management of the Zambezi River system continued in 1986 with the second meeting of a working group of experts (Lusaka, Zambia, March). Participants revised the first draft of a diagnostic study on the state of ecology and environmental management in the Zambezi River system, as well as the Zambezi action plan.

In February, the International Lake Environment Committee (ILEC) was inaugurated to promote sustainable development of lake basins and the environmentally sound management of lakes. In November, ILEC and the United Nations Centre for Regional Development organized a two-week workshop on environmental planning and management in Japan.

To promote the integration of environmentally sound management principles in the joint use and quality control of surface and ground-water resources, UNEP supported two symposia organized in connection with the Scientific Assembly of the International Association of Hydrological Sciences (Budapest, Hungary, July).

UNEP initiated a project to integrate environmental aspects in water resources engineering education; six UNESCO-sponsored water management and hydrological courses were organized in Argentina, China, Hungary, India, Ireland and Switzerland for that purpose.

Under a joint UNEP/UNESCO project, a meeting was held (Paris, March) to discuss a draft classification system and guidelines on integrated environmental evaluation of water resources development. An international symposium on the impact of large water projects on the environment (Paris, October) was organized by UNESCO, with the support of UNEP, the International Association of Hydrological Sciences and the International Institute for Applied Systems Analysis.

UNEP continued to support the objectives of the International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade (1989-1990) (see p. 575).

A regional workshop on treatment and reuse of sewage effluents for irrigation (Amman, August), organized by FAO and Jordan, concluded that waste water was an under-utilized resource.

Marine ecosystems

Protection of the marine environment

The marine environment was another life-support system subjected to ever increasing and more threatening pressures, the Executive Director noted in his annual report.

On 25 November 1986, 16 States adopted the Convention for the Protection of the Natural Resources and Environment of the South Pacific Region, along with two protocols on the prevention of pollution by dumping and on co-operation in combating pollution emergencies (see below). This Convention brought to nine the number of action plans adopted within UNEP's regional seas programme, eight of which had related protocols. Negotiation on a tenth was under way.

Through the Joint Group of Experts on the Scientific Aspects of Marine Pollution (GESAMP), UNEP continued work on the scientific justification for an integrated global ocean monitoring programme, the first attempt to interconnect marine biology, geology, chemistry and physical oceanography on a global scale. Under overall co-ordination of UNEP and with support of GESAMP sponsors, work continued on the preparation of a second review of the health of the oceans.

UNEP activities aimed at promoting implementation of the 1984 Global Plan of Action for the Conservation, Management and Utilization of Marine Mammals⁽²⁶⁾ focused on training marine-mammal scientists in developing countries, collection and distribution of information and co-ordination of national and international activities.

Regional seas programme

The regional seas programme encompassed nearly 130 countries around the world who were partners in an effort to protect and enhance the marine environment.

Mediterranean. The Mediterranean programme continued to develop in 1986. Thirteen States signed monitoring agreements or provided data, 102 laboratories participated in a total of 150 joint research projects, and 37 meetings, seminars, workshops and training courses were organized. The Centre for Specially Protected Areas began operating in Tunis, with technical support from IUCN. The centre in Split, Yugoslavia, developed a regional co-operative programme for earthquake-prone coastal zones which was approved by 11 States affected by earthquake risks. Pollution risks associated with offshore operations were identified through a technical meeting in preparation for a new protocol on such operations. The centre in Malta provided three courses on combating oil pollution, and the Blue Plan continued its pioneering work on scenarios for the Mediterranean basin for the year 2025. Voluntary contributions to the Mediterranean trust fund totalled $2,250,000, ensuring the programme's full liquidity.

Kuwait region. At the fifth meeting of the Council of the Regional Organization for the Protection of the Marine Environment held in October, UNEP proposals for assistance in reviewing projects and programmes, studying the causes of recent fish and dolphin mortalities, and establishing a central data bank were approved. In co-operation with the UNESCO International Oceanographic Commission, UNEP initiated the preparation of a regional review on the state of the region's marine environment.

Caribbean. In 1986, seven Governments ratified or acceded to the 1983 Convention for the Protection and Development of the Marine Environment of the Wider Caribbean Region and its Protocol concerning Co-operation in Combating Oil Spills.⁽²⁷⁾ Two more Governments ratified the Convention only. Projects approved by an intergovernmental meeting (Cancún, Mexico, April) were being implemented and were to be evaluated in 1987. In September 1986, the offices of the Regional Co-ordinating Unit for the Action Plan were opened in Kingston, Jamaica.

West and Central Africa. UNEP entered into negotiations with Côte d'Ivoire on a headquarters agreement for a Regional Co-ordinating Unit to be established in Abidjan, subject to the availability of funds.

Eastern Africa. In June, a multidisciplinary mission assisted Somalia in developing a national action plan for the protection, management and development of the marine and coastal environment.

East Asian seas. Implementation of six projects continued during 1986. A meeting of experts on the East Asian Seas Action Plan was convened (Bangkok, December) to evaluate achievements since 1977. The experts made recommendations to improve the Plan's implementation and agreed to form an association of scientists to review projects and act as a scientific advisory body to the Co-ordinating Body on the Seas of East Asia.

Red Sea and Gulf of Aden. UNEP held consultations with the secretariat of the Programme for the Environment of the Red Sea and Gulf of Aden at Jidda, Saudi Arabia, concerning the initiation of joint activities on monitoring the marine environment and on coastal area development. Under a project dealing with marine pollution monitoring, 18 laboratories were established. A project concerned with contingency planning for pollution emergencies continued.

South Pacific. Of the 16 countries—12 South Pacific island States (Cook Islands, Federated States of Micronesia, Fiji, Kiribati, Marshall Islands, Nauru, Palau, Papua New Guinea, Samoa, Tonga, Tuvalu, Vanuatu) plus Australia, France, New Zealand and the United States—which had adopted on 25 November 1986 at Noumea, New Caledonia, the Convention for the Protection of the Natural Resources and Environment of the South Pacific Region and two protocols, 7—Cook Islands, France, Marshall Islands, New Zealand, Palau, Samoa and the United States—went on to sign the instruments. The Convention committed signatories to preventing, reducing and controlling pollution in the Convention area from vessels, land-based sources, sea-bed activities, discharges into the atmosphere, dumping from vessels, aircraft or man-made structures at sea, and the storage of toxic and hazardous wastes. In particular, the parties agreed to prohibit the dumping and storage of radioactive wastes or other radioactive matter and to prevent, reduce and control pollution which might result from the testing of nuclear devices. Each party was to develop contingency plans for coping with pollution emergencies and immediately notify other countries likely to be affected should emergencies arise. The parties also committed themselves to assessing the potential effects of development projects on the marine environment, so that measures could be taken to contain them.

South-east Pacific. Implementation of the Action Plan for the Protection of the Marine Environment and Coastal Areas of the South-east Pacific continued, with the Permanent Commission for the South Pacific as the implementing organization. Emphasis was placed on the monitoring of marine pollution, in close co-operation with national institutions, training of marine scientists and the development of case-studies on environmental impact assessment.

South Asian seas. A meeting of experts (Bangkok, December) revised a draft action plan and a draft overview on the region's environmental problems, and identified six priority projects for implementation by UNEP, subject to the availability of funds.

Environmental aspects of political, economic and other issues

Arms race and the environment

UNEP's 1986 World Environment Day theme was environment and peace, to underline the contribution that environmental conservation could make to the goals of peace and security. UNEP continued to collaborate with the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute and published—on World Environment Day—a book, Global Resources and International Conflict, which showed how global deficiencies, coupled with an uneven distribution of natural resources, could lead to unlikely and therefore unstable alliances, national rivalries and even war. Another joint project included the preparation of a book, Cultural Norms in Relation to War and the Environment, which explored cultural norms regarding militarism and nature and the environment.

As a contribution to the World Disarmament Campaign, UNEP commissioned a publication, Disarmament, Environment and Sustainable Development: A Time for Action, which indicated that even a modest diversion of funds from military expenditure could help environmental problems through sustainable development.

Related resolution: GA 41/62 A.

Environment and industry

In 1986, UNEP continued to address—primarily through the provision of information and training—the growing concern in developing countries about harmful environmental effects of pursuing industrialization without regard to environmental management. Various sets of guidelines on environmentally sound industrial development were drawn up and information was collected for storing in the computerized data base of the UNEP Industry and Environment Office. The data base was further expanded by almost 1,200 new bibliographical entries and nearly 100 files on pollution abatement and control technology. The Office also arranged for a number of experts to visit developing countries to diagnose environmental problems of specific industries.

At a seminar on industrial hazardous waste (Cairo, November), the Executive Director proposed that UNEP take the lead, after close consultation with Governments, international organizations and industry, in developing two conventions to help minimize the occurrence and harmful effects of chemical accidents and emergencies. One would be on early notification in the case of an industrial accident or emergency having potential transboundary effects, and the other would provide for Governments to assist each other in the event of such accidents. In addition, the Executive Director proposed that a programme be developed to enable Governments, in co-operation with industry and community leaders, to identify potentially hazardous industrial installations in their communities, and to show them how to prepare measures to control and limit possible accidental releases and how to deal with a release or spill should it occur. The Executive Director's proposal was later circulated to Governments for their reactions, and United Nations organizations, such as WHO, WMO and UNIDO, as well as industry representatives, were invited to express their views.

Environment and human settlements

In large measure, homelessness was caused by natural and man-made environmental disasters. During 1986, UNEP focused on trends that contributed to displacement and homelessness, the impact of climatic conditions, and the crises of food, fuel and building materials. Preparations were completed for a 1987 workshop on shelter policies and programmes addressing the poor.

UNEP and the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements initiated a project in Democratic Yemen to demonstrate an environmentally sound planning approach to human settlements—particularly for low-income groups living in harsh climatic conditions; the project was designated a demonstration site for the 1987 International Year of Shelter for the Homeless. A joint UNEP/WHO project on environmental criteria for housing and urban planning developed four more sets of practical guidelines which were to be tested in selected countries before being widely distributed. A UNEP project initiated in 1983 concluded with the completion of a set of policy guidelines for the control of environmental pollution in human settlements of developing countries, which covered the management of solid, liquid and gaseous wastes. With resources from the Ministry of Research and Technology of the Federal Republic of Germany, UNEP undertook a feasibility study in Nairobi on how landfill gas could be used to meet the energy demand of low-income groups.

Chapter XVI

Human settlements

The United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (UNCHS), also known as Habitat, continued in 1986 to assist developing countries in all aspects of their human settlements activities by providing technical co-operation, research and development and information dissemination.

The first observance of World Habitat Day took place on 6 October 1986.

As lead agency in the United Nations system for co-ordinating activities for the 1987 International Year of Shelter for the Homeless (IYSH), the Centre continued to play a key role in its preparations. Those preparations were considered in 1986 by the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council and the Commission on Human Settlements. The Assembly, in resolution 41/190, urged the international community to demonstrate renewed political commitment to the shelter needs of the poor and disadvantaged by taking significant measures before 1987, and appealed for voluntary contributions to the programme of the Year. The Council, in resolution 1986/41, called for intensified efforts to help achieve the goals of the Year. The Council also requested the Secretary-General to submit to the Assembly in 1987 a comprehensive report on IYSH (decision 1986/162).

The Commission on Human Settlements, which held its ninth session at Istanbul, Turkey, approved various measures with regard to IYSH, adopted on 16 May 16 resolutions and one decision and decided that in future its regular sessions would preferably be held at Nairobi, Kenya. Two resolutions requiring General Assembly action concerned the Commission's tenth (1987) session and IYSH.

Commission on Human Settlements

At its ninth session (Istanbul, 5-16 May), the Commission on Human Settlements⁽¹⁾ considered several items related to IYSH, including the relationship between the objectives and tasks of the 1986 International Year of Peace (IYP) and IYSH, guidelines for a selective approach, and activities for the Year in the occupied Palestinian territories. Also considered were photographic and documentary exhibitions at the 1987 session of the Commission, on the occasion of IYSH (see below).

Other topics dealt with by the Commission included assistance to the Namibian people as well as to victims of apartheid, and participation of the community and particularly that of women in human settlements activities. As regards training and co-operation, the Commission requested the UNCHS Executive Director to accelerate the establishment of a specialized regional training centre for human settlements activities at Amman, Jordan;⁽²⁾ and recommended that he consider the possibility of unifying the Centre's representation in Latin America and the Caribbean in the search for greater administrative, technical and operational efficiency⁽³⁾

In a resolution on the work of the Centre between Commission sessions⁽⁴⁾ the Commission requested the Executive Director to increase efforts in providing its member States with information concerning implementation of its decisions and of the Centre's programmes, and to ensure efficient implementation of plans adopted by the Commission for biennial and longer periods.

The Commission decided⁽⁵⁾ that in future its regular sessions should be held at Habitat headquarters at Nairobi, taking into consideration, among other things, that it had met in practically all regions of the world. In addition, it suggested that the General Assembly appeal to all States to participate at the highest possible level in its 1987 session, commemorating the tenth anniversary of the establishment of the Commission and its secretariat, Habitat⁽⁶⁾

By decision 1986/163 of 21 July 1986, the Economic and Social Council, taking note of the report of the Commission on the work of its ninth session⁽¹⁾ recommended to the Assembly the adoption of the draft resolutions on the Commission's tenth session and on IYSH.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, adopted resolution 41/189 without vote.

Tenth session of the Commission on Human Settlements

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 32/162 of 19 December 1977, by which it made institutional arrangements for international co-operation in the field of human settlements, including the establishment of the Commission on Human Settlements and the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat), to provide institutional focus to the activities of the United Nations system in that field, as recommended by Habitat: United Nations Conference on Human Settlements, held at Vancouver, Canada, from 31 May to 11 June 1976,

Noting with utmost concern that, although some progress has been achieved in that field in the past decade, the living conditions of the majority of people in urban and rural slums and squatter settlements, especially in developing countries, continue nevertheless to deteriorate in both relative and absolute terms,

Recalling the important initiative taken by Member States to reverse that negative trend through the proclamation by the Assembly, in its resolution 37/221 of 20 December 1982, of the year 1987 as the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless, with the aim of securing renewed political commitment by the international community to the improvement of the shelter and neighbourhoods of the poor and disadvantaged,

Taking note with appreciation of the fact that over one hundred and thirty countries have responded positively to the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless by establishing national focal points for the Year and that over three hundred and sixty projects for improving the shelter and neighbourhoods of the poor and disadvantaged have been officially designated around the world in the context of the Year,

Recalling that, in its resolution 37/221, it designated the Commission on Human Settlements, in the framework of its regular sessions, to act as the United Nations intergovernmental body responsible for organizing the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless, and noting that 1987 will mark not only the observance of the Year but also the tenth anniversary of the establishment of the Commission,

Convinced that the tenth session of the Commission, commemorating its tenth anniversary and coinciding with the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless, provides therefore a timely and unique opportunity for the international community to assess the results of the efforts of the past decade, including the results of the many programmes and projects around the world identified as demonstration projects for the Year and, on the basis of such assessment, decide on new directions and approaches for national policies and strategies that will bring closer the objective of shelter for all by the year 2000,

Recognizing that universal participation by States in the commemorative session of the Commission will greatly enhance the significance and usefulness of the deliberations and conclusions of that session,

1. Appeals to all Member States of the United Nations or members of the specialized agencies, including the International Atomic Energy Agency, to participate at the highest possible level in the tenth session of the Commission on Human Settlements, commemorating its tenth anniversary, in order to highlight the significance of that session and the critical importance of the programme of the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless;

2. Decides that for the duration of the tenth session no distinction shall be drawn in the application of the rules of procedure between States members of the Commission and other participating States and for that purpose suspends for the duration of the session the operation of rule 56 of the Commission's rules of procedure.

Human settlements activities

International Year of Shelter for the Homeless (1987)

Preparations continued for the 1987 International Year of Shelter for the Homeless, proclaimed by the General Assembly in 1982(1) to improve the shelter and neighbourhoods of some of the poor and disadvantaged by the end of 1987, particularly in the developing countries, according to national priorities, and to demonstrate by the year 2000 ways and means of improving the situation.

Action by the Commission on Human Settlements. The UNCHS Executive Director reported to the Commission(²) that Governments, the United Nations system and other intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations were participating in a variety of activities related to the Year. He set forth recommendations for national action and for international support of such action by the United Nations system, bilateral aid agencies, multilateral funding institutions and others.

On 16 May 1986,⁽³⁾ the Commission recommended the adoption by the Assembly of a draft resolution urging Governments to renew their commitment to the shelter needs of the poor and disadvantaged by taking significant measures before 1987, including providing access to land and ensuring security of tenure in squatter settlements, adapting codes and regulations to the needs of the people, facilitating community participation, improving access to credit and loans and promoting local and affordable building materials. The draft also requested Governments to submit to UNCHS, before 31 October 1986, detailed reports on their activities for the Year and on their strategies for human settlements improvement by the year 2000, and appealed to them to make voluntary contributions to the IYSH programme.

By another resolution(⁴) the Commission urged the UNCHS Executive Director to select a limited number of innovative projects for the Year and to disseminate internationally their evaluation.

The Commission requested him to report to it at its 1987 session on a selected number of innovative demonstration projects as guidance for the future work programme, medium-term plan and activities of UNCHS.

Report of the Secretary-General. In a report to the Economic and Social Council on progress made up to May 1986 in preparing for IYSH,⁽⁵⁾ the Secretary-General noted that more than 130 Governments, United Nations bodies and other intergovernmental organizations, as well as some 1,200 non-governmental organizations, were actively involved and giving support to the implementation of the programme for the Year. More than 360 projects had been designated by them for the Year, in the eight IYSH action areas: shelter, services (such as water, electricity, sanitation), construction, employment, legislation and regulation, management and finance, research and education, and training and information.

National seminars were organized to increase public awareness of the issues of shelter and homelessness, and six subregional meetings, convened by the Centre and host Governments, were held: for Latin American and Caribbean countries (Bogotá, Colombia, 27-31 January); for East African countries (Nairobi, 10-13 March); for French-speaking central and eastern African countries (Bujumbura, Burundi, 19-21 March); for Eastern European countries (Kiev, Ukrainian SSR, 2-4 April); for Arab countries (Dubai, United Arab Emirates, 8-12 April); and for West African countries (Lagos, Nigeria, 21-23 April). Three other subregional meetings had been held in 1985.⁽⁶⁾

The report stated that the combined effect of national, international and non-governmental action in the preparatory period prior to the Year had already improved the prospects for some of the poor and disadvantaged. Some countries had devised in the process innovative approaches and solutions to issues which were previously considered insurmountable.

Although a promising start had been made, action, particularly at the national level, had to be intensified further to deal with the issues adequately. The Year called for bold new steps for curbing urbanization, so as not to endanger progress and social stability. A shortfall in the amount of voluntary contributions required to bring the planned activities to fruition in 1987 and outstanding pledged contributions were a source of great concern.

ACC consideration. In October 1986, the Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions (Programme Matters) of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC)⁽⁷⁾ noted that Habitat had pursued its task as the secretariat and lead agency for co-ordinating IYSH activities through bilateral consultations and co-operation with relevant organizations.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

By decision 1986/162 of 21 July 1986, the Economic and Social Council requested the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its 1987 session a comprehensive report on the Year, including recommendations for a human settlements agenda for the coming decade.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 8 December, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 41/190 without vote.

International Year of Shelter for the Homeless

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 37/221 of 20 December 1982, in which it proclaimed the year 1987 International Year of Shelter for the Homeless,

Noting with satisfaction that more than one hundred and thirty countries and many key United Nations agencies and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations are taking part in the programme for the Year and have designated more than three hundred and sixty projects for it,

Noting also that a large number of States have participated in the regional and subregional meetings for the Year, many at the ministerial level, which have resulted in constructive recommendations and commitments for renewed national action,

Expressing its appreciation to those countries that have made or pledged voluntary contributions to the Year,

Recognizing that the provision of adequate shelter is essential for the promotion and achievement of national economic and social development and human health,

Recognizing also that in order for Governments to address realistically the needs of the poor and disadvantaged, it is necessary to frame shelter policies that can mobilize all possible resources and policy instruments to meet the objectives of the Year,

Recognizing further that the Year provides an excellent opportunity for the United Nations and other international agencies to review their contributions to solving the problem of shelter for the homeless and for bilateral aid agencies and multilateral financial institutions to evaluate their role in this sector,

Recalling Commission on Human Settlements resolution 7/9 of 10 May 1984 and the information strategy for the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless, which had been submitted to the Commission at its eighth session,

1. Endorses the report of the Executive Director of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) on the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless and the Plan of Action for 1986-1987;

2. Urges Governments to demonstrate renewed political commitment to the shelter needs of the poor and disadvantaged by taking significant measures before 1987, including providing access to land and ensuring security of tenure in squatter settlements, adapting codes and regulations to the needs of the people, facilitating community participation, improving access to credit and loans and promoting local and affordable building materials;

3. Also urges Governments:

(a) To prepare or review shelter strategies, taking into consideration the options set out in the documentation for the Year;

(b) To prepare a programme to implement projects geared to their chosen shelter strategies;

4. Requests Governments to submit detailed reports on their activities in the Year to the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) as soon as possible, giving special attention to measures that will improve the shelter and neighbourhoods of some of the poor and disadvantaged during 1987 and to their strategies to improve the shelter and neighbourhoods of the poor by the year 2000;

5. Requests all Governments, bilateral and multilateral aid agencies and financial institutions to review their policies and raise the priority of shelter and settlements improvement programmes;

6. Appeals to all Governments to make or increase voluntary contributions to the Year and to all international agencies and financial institutions to provide effective financial and other support to the programme of the Year;

7. Decides to devote at least two plenary meetings at its forty-second session, in 1987, to issues related to shelter, in observance of the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless.

General Assembly resolution 41/190

8 December 1986

Meeting 100

Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/41/930/Add.2) without vote, 4 November (meeting 27); draft by Commission on Human Settlements (A/41/8), as reproduced in Secretariat note (A/C.2/41/L.4) and orally amended by Vice-Chairman; agenda item 12.

Human settlements and political, economic and social issues

By resolution 1986/41 of 23 May 1986, the Economic and Social Council—noting that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights⁽⁸⁾ and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights⁽⁹⁾ provided that all persons had the right to an adequate standard of living, including adequate housing, and that States should take measures to ensure the realization of that right—expressed deep concern that millions of people did not enjoy the right to housing. The Council called on all Governments and concerned institutions to intensify their efforts to help achieve the objectives and goals of IYSH. It decided to consider, at its first regular session of 1987, the question of the realization of the right to adequate housing, as contained in the International Covenant.

On 4 December, the General Assembly reiterated the call of the Council and requested the Commission on Human Rights and the Council to give special attention during the Year to the realization of the right to adequate housing (resolution 41/146).

Human settlements and peace

The Commission, on 16 May 1986,⁽¹⁰⁾ stressed that a prerequisite for the successful implementation of IYSH programmes was the maintenance and strengthening of peace.

The Executive Director's report on the Commission's contribution to IYP,⁽¹¹⁾ subsequently submitted to the General Assembly, focused on the objectives of IYP and some of the key relationships between human settlements, peace, economic and social stability and development. As the maintenance of peace depended significantly on reducing inequalities through accelerated economic and social development programmes focusing on the needs of the poor, it was considered appropriate that IYP would be followed immediately in 1987 by IYSH. The two international Years provided an opportunity for the world community to accelerate efforts in making the transition towards a more secure and equitable world.

Assistance to Africa

Assistance to victims of apartheid

On 16 May 1986,⁽¹²⁾ the Commission strongly condemned South Africa for its inhuman repression there and its illegal occupation of Namibia, as well as for its acts of aggression and destabilization against front-line and other neighbouring States and for its continuous forced removal of the African population from their homes. It commended the Organization of African Unity and others for supporting the struggle against apartheid and colonialism in southern Africa. In commending the Executive Director for efforts made in implementing its 1984 resolution on assistance to victims of apartheid,⁽¹³⁾ the Commission requested him to intensify those efforts and to continue providing additional assistance to countries in which human settlements had been disrupted by the South African régime.

The Executive Director noted that, in 1986, UNCHS had 14 projects under execution in the front-line States; additional projects had been prepared and awaited funding.⁽¹⁴⁾

Assistance to displaced Namibians

On 16 May 1986,⁽¹⁵⁾ the Commission again requested the Executive Director to strengthen all forms of assistance to Namibian refugee settlements and condemned any unilateral action by South Africa leading towards an internal settlement outside the terms of Security Council resolution 435(1978).⁽¹⁶⁾ In addition, it requested the Executive Director to report to the International Conference on Namibia and to the fourteenth special session of the General Assembly (see TRUSTEESHIP AND DECOLONIZATION, Chapter III) on assistance provided by the Centre to the Namibian people.

During 1986,⁽¹⁴⁾ UNCHS offered five fellowships to qualified Namibians for training in areas related to the construction industry.

Human settlements in territories occupied by Israel

The Commission, on 16 May 1986,⁽¹⁷⁾ deploring Israel's settlement policies in the occupied Palestinian territories, called for an immediate halt to any new settlements there and for the dismantling of existing ones. It also strongly opposed the demolition and sealing off of Palestinian houses. (See also POLITICAL AND SECURITY QUESTIONS, Chapter IX.)

The Commission requested the Executive Director to implement the 26 specific project proposals covering the eight IYSH action areas, as contained in his February 1986 report on activities for IYSH in the occupied Palestinian territories.⁽¹⁸⁾ It requested him to continue efforts to provide assistance to the Palestinian people in co-operation with the Palestine Liberation Organization, and to prepare, for submission in 1987, a comprehensive study on institutions needed for financing and implementing a housing programme in the occupied Palestinian territories.

Community participation

On 16 May 1986,⁽¹⁹⁾ the Commission, noting the importance of community participation in the planning, implementation and management of human settlements, urged Governments to focus attention on the self-help capacities of communities to deal with their human settlements problems, with a view to establishing appropriate mechanisms of support to those communities and improving their access to resources. It also urged Governments to develop administrative structures to strengthen local and sub-local governments, and to review human settlements legislation and procedures for planning and implementation in order to make them conducive to, and to promote, community participation. It called on Governments to encourage the establishment of community organizations and support partnerships with non-governmental organizations working in the field of human settlements development and to establish training programmes for community participation.

The Commission requested the Executive Director to develop further the Centre's expertise and increase its technical capacity in dealing with the large variety of human settlements development situations that required effective community participation. It also requested that he establish non-formal training guidelines for community development staff, community leaders and residents in support of community-level action.

Women and human settlements

On 16 May 1986,⁽²⁰⁾ the Commission recommended the maintenance of statistical programmes on the role of women and their participation in human settlements activities, and the adoption of all possible measures to avoid the marginalization of women in production and decision-making processes. It recommended that arrangements be made to enable women to combine successfully income-generating work with family care and that this be given high priority in UNCHS projects. It also recommended that regional or subregional seminars be organized within the framework of IYSH preparations in order to exchange experiences on the role of women in pilot projects.

Production of building materials

On 16 May 1986,⁽²¹⁾ the Commission, noting that small-scale production of building materials and components based on local demand and resources could bring about substantial economic multiplier effects, urged Governments to review their industrial policies and programmes to favour such production. It also called on them to promote the expansion of the small-scale building materials sector through wide-scale adoption of indigenous building materials in government-sponsored projects, bearing in mind the role of government as the single largest client of the building industry and the need to conserve foreign exchange reserves by import substitution policies. Other steps suggested for implementation in the areas of standards and specifications, industrial policies and programmes, research and development, transportation and taxation were outlined in the resolution.

Co-ordination

Cross-organizational programme analysis

In a follow-up to the 1984 cross-organizational programme analysis of the activities of the United Nations system in human settlements,⁽²²⁾ the Secretary-General reviewed, in a February 1986 report,⁽²³⁾ the status of implementation of recommendations made by the Committee for Programme and Co-ordination (CPC). The recommendations dealt with, among other things, increased co-ordination, a review of programme priorities, enhanced programme delivery through effective use of country-level co-ordination machinery, and optimization of financial resources for human settlements.

Noting that only partial implementation had been made, the Secretary-General stated that CPC conclusions and recommendations on subsequent cross-organizational programme analyses should be drafted in a manner that could be understood fully and followed up by the intergovernmental bodies concerned.

The Commission on Human Settlements, on 16 May,⁽²⁴⁾ taking note of the concern of CPC on the need for improved co-ordination and priority-setting in human settlements policies and programmes of the United Nations system, decided that a comprehensive study it had requested the Executive Director to prepare for 1987 should include an analysis of the Centre's problem-solving activities as it assisted the Commission in co-ordinating human settlements activities in the system.

CPC, at its April/May 1986 session⁽²⁵⁾ took note of the Secretary-General's report and the Commission's resolution. It felt that its recommendations on the cross-organizational programme analysis had not been implemented sufficiently and requested the Secretary-General to continue monitoring the follow-up.

Operational activities for development

On 16 May 1986,⁽²⁶⁾ the Commission adopted a resolution on a comprehensive policy review of operational activities for development; its statement on those policy issues was annexed to the resolution. The text was subsequently transmitted to the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly⁽²⁷⁾ for their 1986 policy review of operational activities.

In its statement, the Commission noted that while the United Nations system should continue its role as promoter and facilitator, especially through the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), the political will of and structures established by and among the developing countries themselves were the keys to greater use of indigenous resources and capacities in project implementation. The country level represented the most appropriate level at which to solve co-ordination problems and guarantee an integrated approach to development. The United Nations resident co-ordinators, backed by appropriate co-ordinating machinery, could contribute to harmonizing the system's operational activities for development. The Commission also recognized the need for a better match between the system's assistance and the significantly greater flow of bilateral aid, and suggested that bilateral donors make full use of the United Nations expertise and the co-ordination mechanisms established by it at the country level.

One future challenge facing the system's operational activities, the Commission stated, was that of rapid urbanization and the emerging problems of managing large urban concentrations in many developing countries. Urban and regional development planning management projects had multisectoral implications which helped to create effective co-ordination within the concerned Government. Assistance in training and institution-building was essential to help enhance a country's co-ordination capacity. More emphasis should also be placed on the role of women, who should be given training and opportunities to participate in human settlements development.

UNCHS (Habitat)

Activities of the Centre

The 1986-1987 work programme of UNCHS⁽¹⁴⁾ was based on eight subprogrammes: policies and strategies, settlement planning, shelter and community services, the indigenous construction sector, low-cost infrastructure, land, mobilization of finance, and institutions and management.

Under the first subprogramme, in 1986, the preparation of the Global Report on Human Settlements—reviewing the conditions of settlements throughout the world and outlining priority actions for Governments—reached the printing/production stage. Work began on establishing a human settlements statistical data base, and a monograph was prepared on an innovative housing information system in Colombia.

Under the settlement planning subprogramme, a joint report with the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP), Environment Impact Assessment of Urban Development in the Valley of Mexico: Basic Methodology, was submitted for publication and a paper was produced on spontaneous rural settlement formation. Reports on guidelines for national planning and physical planning for refugee settlements were also prepared.

As part of the shelter and community services subprogramme, continued support was given to the provision of technical assistance, monitoring and evaluation of four shelter demonstration projects in Sri Lanka; the output would be a manual for local authorities on ways to analyse the housing stock in inner-city areas. With the support of the Danish International Development Agency, a wide range of training materials continued to be produced on community participation for low-income shelter development, including those for initial use and testing in training courses in Bolivia, Sri Lanka, Venezuela and Zambia.

Publications were produced on building acts, regulations and codes in Africa, indigenous production factors, and the use of selected indigenous building materials such as earth, pozzolana and stone. Under preparation were a draft report on cyclone disaster mitigation, an outline for a compendium of local building materials and technologies, several technical notes on local building materials and data sheets for indigenous construction techniques.

Concerning low-cost infrastructure, a number of reports were issued on various aspects of energy consumption, saving and substitution. A report on refuse disposal services in low-income settlements was prepared, as were case-studies on the provision, operation and maintenance of low-cost water supply, sanitation and waste disposal facilities in Sri Lanka and Nepal. Other activities included development of a rational method for the design of septic tanks for warm climates, finalization of a technical manual on the design of shallow sewer systems, and participation in an expert group meeting on water supply and sanitation technologies at the World Health Organization headquarters at Geneva.

With regard to land, a manual on low-technology land registration techniques and plot allocation procedures was under preparation. Techniques of "land sharing" in central parts of cities were being evaluated with a view to outlining procedures for involving the private sector in low-income shelter development.

Under the mobilization of financial resources sub-programme, research was carried out in three areas: employment generation in low-income settlements, national finance systems, and the role of human settlements investment in economic development. Material was collected and the process of identifying suitable cases for detailed studies continued.

Under the institutions and management sub-programme, UNCHS initiated research activities aimed at strengthening local government capacity to execute human settlements policies and programmes, and continued its research programme on national human settlements institutional arrangements. The process continued for identifying intermediate cities and metropolitan areas to serve as case-studies of urban management practice. In June, UNCHS sponsored a meeting of a working group on international assistance strategies for human settlements training for developing countries, which made recommendations on the training activities of UNCHS, multilateral or bilateral sources and non-governmental organizations. It also co-sponsored, in June/July, a five-week training course on housing and urban development at Shanghai, China.

UNCHS information activities included the production of a variety of monographs, documents, posters and audio-visual presentations. Three issues of Habitat News were published. In the area of information systems, the Habitat Directory, the Habitat Awareness bulletin and the Trilingual Thesaurus in the Field of Human Settlements were produced in collaboration with organizations concerned with human settlements.

The first observance of World Habitat Day, on 6 October 1986, focused on IYSH and provided an opportunity for those involved in shelter provision to examine problems, opportunities and progress. Among the Day's activities were special messages by heads of State or Government, programmes and articles in mass media, audio-visual presentations and film shows, symposia and seminars.

Software development activities included the release of Urban Data Management Software, version 5.2., and preparation of a revised version of Housing Finance Software, incorporating savings as well as loan-account management. Available software relevant to human settlements planning and management was publicized through the Habitat Microcomputer Users Directory which encompassed over 500 individuals and agencies. A regular Habitat News column, "Macro Micro", was initiated, advising on practical applications of microcomputers in human settlements data management.

Resources available for special technical advisory services fell short of increasing demand, even though such services were limited to a few specific subjects and were provided for a maximum of four weeks per country. In 1986, 40 missions were undertaken.

Under the sectoral support programme, UNDP continued to provide modest resources to UNCHS which were used for preparatory missions and project documents. Demand for sectoral support missions far exceeded the available resources.

At the end of 1986, the Centre had under execution 160 projects in 77 countries in Africa, Asia (including Western Asia and the Pacific) and Latin America (including the Caribbean) with an overall budget of over $17 million for the year.⁽¹⁾ Ninety-eight projects were financed by UNDP and these accounted for approximately 66 per cent of the funds budgeted for technical co-operation during the year.⁽²⁸⁾ A total of 17 projects were also supplemented by trust funds and government and third-party cost-sharing arrangements. The United Nations Habitat and Human Settlements Foundation funded 44 small-scale projects designed to provide assistance in preparing project documents for submission to UNDP and donor Governments and agencies.

As part of its continued collaboration with other agencies, UNCHS promoted with UNEP environmentally sound human settlements development. Co-operation with the World Bank was strengthened by the development of a joint urban development strategies project. UNCHS collaborated with the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Coordinator and other organizations in establishing a programme for seismic risk reduction in the Mediterranean region. Co-operation also continued with the World Food Programme (WFP) and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR).

Financing

The UNCHS work programme was financed from the United Nations regular budget and from extrabudgetary resources. Extrabudgetary resources during 1986-1987⁽²⁹⁾ were expected from the following sources: programme support income from the execution of projects financed by UNDP and trust funds ($3,773,700); a subvention from WFP ($192,000); programme support from the UNEP Fund ($78,000); and programme support from UNHCR ($150,000). Estimated income for the United Nations Habitat and Human Settlements Foundation was $12,732,000 for its general fund and $2,130,800 for IYSH.⁽³⁰⁾

During 1986-1987, UNCHS expected project delivery amounting to $29,405,000, including projects financed by UNDP ($25,945,000), the UNEP Fund ($212,000) and other sources ($3,248,000). In 1986, a subvention from WFP ($96,000) was used to establish one post of human settlements adviser to support WFP projects with a human settlements component; $75,000 from UNHCR financed the post of one physical planning officer to assist UNHCR in planning refugee settlements in consultation with Habitat.

Contributions to the Foundation and to IYSH were made or pledged during the year, at a pledging meeting during the Commission's ninth session and at the November United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities. In 1986, a total of $2.35 million in contributions for the Foundation was received; pledges for future years amounted to $1.54 million. As at 31 December 1986, the status of voluntary contributions to IYSH stood at $946,415.

In December, the General Assembly, by resolution 41/176, accepted the financial report and audited financial statements, and the audit opinions of the Board of Auditors, on the Foundation for the biennium ended 31 December 1985.⁽³¹⁾ In so doing, the Assembly also endorsed the comments made on the Board's report by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions⁽³²⁾ concerning procedures governing the use of experts and consultants, and budgetary control of outstanding obligations.

Chapter XVII

Human rights

In 1986, the United Nations continued its efforts to foster human rights and fundamental freedoms world-wide. Progress was made despite the Organization's financial crisis which forced the cancellation of the 1986 session of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities and of one session each of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination and the Human Rights Committee. The drafting of an international convention on the protection of the rights of all migrant workers and their families continued, as did work on a draft Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention and Imprisonment. Elaboration of a convention on the rights of the child moved forward, as did work on a draft declaration on the rights of persons belonging to national, ethnic, religious and linguistic minorities. Work also progressed on the drafting of a declaration on the right and responsibility of individuals, groups and organs of society to promote and protect universally recognized human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Among economic, social and cultural rights, development received particular attention—the General Assembly adopted a Declaration on the Right to Development. The rights to adequate housing, ownership of property and education were also considered.

Protection of detained persons was again a substantial part of the United Nations work in the human rights field. The Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances continued to investigate cases of disappearances in several countries. The first report on torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment was submitted, and the Commission on Human Rights extended the Special Rapporteur's mandate for another year.

Situations involving alleged violations of human rights on a large scale in several countries were again examined. The Secretary-General stated that the appointment of special rapporteurs to look into specific country situations and alleged violations, such as torture, disappearances, summary executions and religious intolerance, signalled a slowly growing tendency towards co-operation by Governments (see p. 8).

Action on these and other human rights issues taken by the Commission on Human Rights at its forty-second session, held in New York from 3

February to 14 March 1986, was embodied in 64 resolutions and 10 decisions.

DiscriminationRacial discrimination*Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination (1983-1993)

Implementation of the Programme for the Decade

In 1986, United Nations efforts to implement the Programme of Action for the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination were carried out in accordance with the plan of activities for 1985-1989, submitted in 1984.(1)

Communication. On 19 February 1986,(2) the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya transmitted to the Secretary-General the so-called Tripoli Declaration, issued by the International Conference in Solidarity with Peoples under Racial Discrimination (Tripoli, 23-27 November 1985), which was organized by the Organization of African Lawyers in co-operation with the Guild of Libyan Lawyers and the General People's Congress in the Jamahiriya. In the Declaration, African States were called on to step up their financial, military and diplomatic assistance to national liberation movements and a number of suggestions were made for combating apartheid.

Human Rights Commission action. On 28 February 1986,(3) the Commission on Human Rights commended all States that had ratified or acceded to the international instruments relevant to the Decade and appealed to others to do the same. It urged co-operation from States and international organizations in implementing the plan of activities for 1985-1989 and appealed for generous contributions to the Trust Fund for the Programme for the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination. It welcomed a 1985 Economic and Social Council decision(4) to hold a seminar on international assistance and support to peoples and movements fighting against colonialism, racism, racial discrimination and apartheid (see p. 682). The Commission requested the Secretary-General to provide annual progress reports and reiterated its decision to consider each year a selected topic within the plan of activities for 1985-1989, choosing the main obstacles to the total elimination of racism, racial discrimination and apartheid as the topic for 1988. The Commission welcomed a 1985 General Assembly resolution(5) authorizing the Secretary-General to organize in 1988 a global consultation on racial discrimination.

CERD consideration. At its March 1986 session, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) (see p. 685) considered documents relating to the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade and entrusted its working group, set up in 1985 to study the feasibility of a number of activities that CERD could undertake to contribute to the Decade's aims and objectives, with the examination of proposals, particularly the suggestion to hold a three-day seminar during its regular session in March 1988 on international peace and racism and the implementation of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination. CERD agreed on arrangements for the seminar, as suggested by the working group. It also discussed other activities to be carried out during the Decade, such as studies on specific articles of the Convention and the production of a film by the United Nations Department of Public Information (DPI) highlighting the Committee's work and the Convention's objectives.

Reports of the Secretary-General. Pursuant to 1984 General Assembly requests,(6) the Secretary-General submitted in 1986 to the Economic and Social Council two reports related to the Decade. His annual report(7) summarized activities undertaken or contemplated by United Nations bodies, specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) to achieve the Decade's objectives; Bolivia also submitted information on its activities. A second report(8) summarized information received, as of 4 March, from 22 Governments on legislative, administrative and other measures they had taken to implement the Programme.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 19 May, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1986/2 without vote.

Implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination

The Economic and Social Council,

Reaffirming the objective set out in the Charter of the United Nations of achieving international co-operation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural or humanitarian character, and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion,

Recalling the proclamation by the General Assembly, in its resolution 38/14 of 22 November 1983, of the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination,

Recalling further the Programme of Action for the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination adopted by the General Assembly in its resolution 38/14 to achieve the objectives of the Second Decade,

Reaffirming the plan of activities for the period 1985-1989 adopted by consensus by the General Assembly in its resolution 39/16 of 23 November 1984,

Conscious of the responsibilities conferred upon it by the General Assembly for co-ordinating and, in particular, evaluating the activities undertaken in the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade,

Bearing in mind, in particular, its mandate under General Assembly resolution 40/22 of 29 November 1985 to submit an annual report containing, inter alia:

(a) An enumeration of the activities undertaken or contemplated to achieve the objectives of the Second Decade, including the activities of Governments, United Nations bodies, the specialized agencies and other international and regional organizations, as well as non-governmental organizations;

(b) A review and appraisal of those activities;

(c) Its suggestions and recommendations,

Having examined the reports of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade,

Deeply concerned that in their present form the reports provide an inadequate basis for discharge by the Council of the above-mentioned mandate,

Noting with concern the apparent lack of co-operation between the Centre for Human Rights and the office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to Co-ordinate Activities concerning the Second Decade,

Noting also that, despite the efforts of the international community, the first Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination and the first years of the Second Decade have not attained their principal objectives and that millions of human beings continue to this day to be victims of varied forms of racism, racial discrimination and apartheid,

Aware of the efforts of the international community to improve the protection of the human rights of migrant workers, including those from the developing countries,

1. Reaffirms the importance of achieving the objectives of the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its forty-first session a revised report on the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade, taking into account the relevant comments and observations made during the deliberations of the Council;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure effective co-operation between the Centre for Human Rights and the office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to Co-ordinate Activities concerning the Second Decade in the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade;

4. Further requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the Centre for Human Rights, in complying with the above request, shall abide by the letter and spirit of the relevant resolutions on the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade;

5. Reaffirms the necessity of co-ordinating the full range of programmes under implementation by the United Nations system as they relate to the objectives of the Second Decade;

6. Invites all Governments, United Nations bodies, the specialized agencies and other intergovernmental organizations, as well as interested non-governmental organizations in consultative status with the Economic and Social Council, to participate fully in the implementation of the plan of activities for the period 1985-1989;

7. Commends those Governments, United Nations bodies, specialized agencies and other intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations that have intensified and expanded their efforts to ensure the rapid elimination of apartheid and all forms of racism and racial discrimination and urges them to redouble such efforts;

8. Invites all Governments to take or continue to take all the necessary measures to combat all forms of racism and racial discrimination and to support the work of the Decade by making contributions to the Trust Fund for the Programme for the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination;

9. Decides to pay particular attention to the specific activities of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade that are directed towards the elimination of apartheid, in view of the present explosive situation in southern Africa;

10. Requests the Secretary-General, in his revised report, to pay special attention to the situation of migrant workers and members of their families;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to present, in his future annual reports to the Council on the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade, more detailed information on the relevant activities of all Governments, United Nations bodies, specialized agencies, intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations in consultative status with the Economic and Social Council.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/2

19 May 1986

Meeting 15

Adopted without vote

Draft by United Republic of Tanzania, for African Group (E/1986/L.19); agenda item 2. Meeting numbers. ESC 14, 15.

The United States did not join in the consensus, saying it had ceased to participate in activities related to the first and second Decades since the Assembly's 1975 resolution equating Zionism with racism.⁽⁹⁾ The Federal Republic of Germany said it joined in the consensus on the understanding that the references in the text to migrant workers did not mean that migrant workers were subject to racial discrimination as a rule.

Reports of the Secretary-General. Pursuant to a 1985 General Assembly request⁽⁵⁾ and Council resolution 1986/2, the Secretary-General submitted in September 1986 a report⁽¹⁰⁾ on United Nations activities to implement the Programme of Action for the Second Decade during the period 1984 to 1986. The report focused on efforts to combat apartheid; educational activities aimed at eliminating race and sex discrimination; dissemination of information and the role of the mass media in combating racism and racial discrimination; measures to promote and protect the human rights of minority groups, indigenous populations and peoples and migrant workers; recourse procedures for victims of racial discrimination; and progress in implementing the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (see p. 685) and other related international instruments. National legislation and institutions, seminars and studies, and international co-operation were also covered, as was information from 14 Governments, four specialized agencies and NGOs on their efforts to implement the Programme of Action.

Also in September,⁽¹¹⁾ the Secretary-General reported on the results of a study on the role of private group action to combat racism and racial discrimination. The report outlined activities by NGOs, which included financial, material and legal aid to victims of apartheid, assistance to political prisoners, disinvestment campaigns, campaigns to end bank loans to South Africa, education programmes and dissemination of information. Trade union activities provided another example of co-operation between United Nations bodies and private groups. Recommendations of United Nations experts and bodies stressed the media's responsibility to spread public awareness to eliminate all forms of discrimination; the importance of legislation and education in eliminating racial discrimination and prejudice was also emphasized.

Having presented a preliminary report in 1985,⁽¹²⁾ the Secretary-General reported in September 1986⁽¹³⁾ on a study on the effects of racial discrimination in education, training and employment as it affected the children of minorities, particularly those of migrant workers (for further information on migrant workers, see p. 691), summarizing information and views received from 10 Governments, three specialized agencies and NGOs. Their activities and recommendations concerned the areas of education, employment, legislation and social programmes. To assist the Assembly in its consideration of activities for dealing with the effects of racial discrimination on children, the report summarized recommendations made by United Nations experts which stressed education and promotion and protection of human rights of minorities.

International Seminar. In the framework of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade, a Seminar on International Assistance and Support to Peoples and Movements Struggling against Colonialism, Racism, Racial Discrimination and Apartheid was held (Yaounde, Cameroon, 28 April-9 May). Among its recommendations,⁽¹⁴⁾ which were adopted by consensus, was that the Assembly consider drafting a declaration or convention on such assistance and support. Aware of the dangerous use of mercenaries against the movements struggling against racial discrimination and apartheid, the Seminar recommended to the Commission on Human Rights that it consider preparing a draft convention on the suppression of the use of mercenaries.

The Seminar called on States, international organizations, private institutions and NGOs to increase their political and material assistance to the peoples struggling against colonialism, racism, racial discrimination and apartheid. It appealed for increased contributions to the Trust Fund for the Programme for the Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, the United Nations Trust Fund for South Africa, the United Nations Fund for Namibia and other relevant funds. It also called for comprehensive mandatory sanctions against South Africa and asked States whose transnational corporations conducted business with South Africa to end their dealings with it. The Seminar recommended that its conclusions and recommendations be made available to the World Conference on Sanctions against Racist South Africa (see p. 123).

The report of the Seminar was transmitted to the General Assembly by the Secretary-General in September.⁽¹⁵⁾

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 4 December 1986, acting on the recommendation of the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/94 without vote.

Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its objective set forth in the Charter of the United Nations to achieve international co-operation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural or humanitarian character, and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion,

Reaffirming its firm determination and its commitment to eradicate totally and unconditionally racism in all its forms, racial discrimination and apartheid.

Recalling the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid and the Convention against Discrimination in Education adopted by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization on 14 December 1960,

Recalling also its resolution 3057 (XXVIII) of 2 November 1973, on the first Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, and its resolution 38/14 of 22 November 1983, on the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination,

Recalling further the two World Conferences to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, held at Geneva in 1978 and 1983, respectively,

Taking note once again of the Report of the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination,

Convinced that the Second World Conference represented a positive contribution by the international community towards attaining the objectives of the Decade, through its adoption of a Declaration and an operational Programme of Action for the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination,

Noting with concern that, despite the efforts of the international community, the principal objectives of the first Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination were not attained and that millions of human beings continue to this day to be the victims of varied forms of racism, racial discrimination and apartheid,

Recalling its resolutions 39/16 of 23 November 1984 and 40/22 of 29 November 1985,

Emphasizing the necessity of attaining the objectives of the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General and the studies on the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade,

Convinced of the need to take more effective and sustained international measures for the elimination of all forms of racism and racial discrimination and the total eradication of apartheid in South Africa,

Aware of the importance and the magnitude of the phenomenon of migrant workers, as well as the efforts undertaken by the international community to improve the protection of the human rights of migrant workers and their families,

1. Resolves once again that all forms of racism and racial discrimination, particularly in their institutionalized form, such as apartheid, or resulting from official doctrines of racial superiority or exclusivity, are among the most serious violations of human rights in the contemporary world and must be combated by all available means;

2. Decides that the international community, in general, and the United Nations, in particular, should continue to give the highest priority to programmes for combating racism, racial discrimination and apartheid, and to intensify their efforts, during the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, to provide assistance and relief to the victims of racism and all forms of racial discrimination and apartheid, especially in South Africa and Namibia and in occupied territories and territories under alien domination;

3. Appeals to all Governments and to international and non-governmental organizations to increase and intensify their activities to combat racism, racial discrimination and apartheid and to provide relief and assistance to the victims of these evils;

4. Takes note of the report submitted by the Secretary-General containing information on the activities of Governments, specialized agencies, regional intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations, as well as United Nations organs, to give effect to the Programme of Action for the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination;

5. Acknowledges the further progress made in preparing the study on the effects of racial discrimination in the field of education, training and employment as it affects the children of minorities, in particular those of migrant workers, authorizes the Secretary-General to make further efforts to obtain additional information and views from Governments, specialized agencies, regional intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations in consultative status with the Economic and Social Council, and to solicit relevant information and views from those that have not yet replied, and requests him to submit the final study to the General Assembly at its forty-second session;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit his study on the role of private group action to combat racism and racial discrimination to Governments, specialized agencies, regional intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations in consultative status with the Economic and Social Council in order to obtain their views and an indication from them of further relevant materials, and to submit to the General Assembly at its forty-third session a final report on this topic;

7. Expresses its gratitude to the Government of Cameroon for acting as host to the Seminar on International Assistance and Support to Peoples and Movements Struggling against Colonialism, Racism, Racial Discrimination and Apartheid, held at Yaounde from 28 April to 9 May 1986;

8. Expresses its satisfaction at the convening of the Seminar and invites the Secretary-General to publicize widely the report of the Seminar;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare and issue as soon as possible a collection of model legislation for the guidance of Governments in the enactment of further legislation against racial discrimination;

10. Reiterates its invitation to the Secretary-General to organize in New York in 1987 a training course for legislative draftsmen with the aim of focusing on the preparation of national legislation against racism and racial discrimination;

11. Renews its invitation to the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to expedite the preparation of teaching materials and teaching aids to promote teaching, training and educational activities on human rights and against racism and racial discrimination, with particular emphasis on activities at the primary and secondary levels of education;

12. Reiterates its request to the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities of the Commission on Human Rights to consider the possible need for updating the study on racial discrimination;

13. Once again authorizes the Secretary-General to organize in 1988 a global consultation on racial discrimination involving representatives of the United Nations system, regional intergovernmental organizations and interested non-governmental organizations in consultative status with the Economic and Social Council, to focus on the co-ordination of international activities to combat racism and racial discrimination;

14. Requests the Economic and Social Council to envisage the organization, within the framework of its plan of activities for the period 1985-1989, of a seminar on cultural dialogue between the countries of origin and the host countries of migrant workers;

15. Emphasizes the importance of adequate recourse procedures for victims of racism and racial discrimination and therefore requests the Secretary-General, in the light of the results of the seminars held on this topic, to prepare and finalize, with the appropriate assistance of qualified experts if possible, a handbook of recourse procedures;

16. Reiterates its invitation to the Secretary-General to proceed with the implementation of the activities outlined in his report on the plan of activities for the period 1985-1989 and requests him to submit to the General Assembly at its forty-second session a report on the outstanding activities;

17. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Economic and Social Council, at its first regular session of 1987, a report on the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination outlining a proposed plan of activities for the period 1990-1993;

18. Considers that voluntary contributions to the Trust Fund for the Programme for the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination are indispensable for the implementation of the above-mentioned plans;

19. Strongly appeals to all Governments, organizations and individuals in a position to do so to contribute generously to the Trust Fund and, to this end, requests the Secretary-General to undertake appropriate contacts and initiatives to encourage contributions;

20. Requests the Economic and Social Council, during the period of the Second Decade, to submit annual reports to the General Assembly, containing, inter alia:

(a) An enumeration of the activities undertaken or contemplated to achieve the objectives of the Second Decade, including the activities of Governments, United Nations bodies, the specialized agencies and other international and regional organizations, as well as non-governmental organizations;

(b) A review and appraisal of those activities;

(c) Its suggestions and recommendations;

21. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-second session on the implementation of the present resolution;

22. Decides that the item entitled "Implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination" should be on its agenda throughout the Second Decade and should be considered as a matter of the highest priority at its forty-second session.

General Assembly resolution 41/94

4 December 1986

Meeting 97

Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee (A/41/785) without vote, 27 October (meeting 25); draft by Benin, for African Group (A/C.3/41/L.11), orally revised; agenda item 83. Financial implications. 5th Committee, A/41/832; S-G, A/C.3/41/L.22, A/C.5/41/27. Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 3rd Committee 4-15, 23, 25; 5th Committee 26; plenary 97.

Had the text been put to a vote, Israel said it would have voted against it because the Decade had been misused to promote and legitimize anti-Semitism. The United States stated that it had not participated in the activities of either the first or Second Decade since the 1975 Assembly resolution^(c) equating Zionism with racism. The Federal Republic of Germany expressed reservations concerning the last preambular paragraph on the grounds that the status of migrant workers was not necessarily a factor in racial discrimination; it also objected to the words "by all available means" in paragraph 1 which, it felt, implicitly endorsed the use of force, and to the singling out of South Africa in paragraph 2.

The Syrian Arab Republic believed that any reference in the text to racism also meant Zionism and understood the last phrase in paragraph 2 to include the occupied Arab territories; it also believed that the international organizations and NGOs referred to in paragraph 3 included the United Nations Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories and the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People (see POLITICAL AND SECURITY QUESTIONS, Chapter IX).

The United Kingdom, speaking for the 12 member States of the European Community (EC), welcomed the fact that a consensus had been maintained on the Decade.

Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination

Accessions and ratifications

As at 31 December 1986, there were 124 parties to the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, adopted by the General Assembly in 1965⁽¹⁶⁾ and in force since 1969.⁽¹⁷⁾

The same number of parties was given in the Secretary-General's annual report to the Assembly on the status of the Convention⁽¹⁸⁾ which listed States that had signed, ratified or acceded to the Convention as at 1 August 1986.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 4 December, acting on the recommendation of the Third Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/104 without vote.

Status of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination

The General Assembly,
Recalling its relevant resolutions, including resolution 40/26 of 29 November 1985,

Expressing its satisfaction at the entry into force, on 3 December 1982, of the competence of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination to receive and consider communications from individuals or groups of individuals under article 14 of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the status of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination;
2. Expresses its satisfaction at the number of States that have ratified the Convention or acceded thereto;
3. Reaffirms once again its conviction that ratification of or accession to the Convention on a universal basis and implementation of its provisions are necessary for the realization of the objectives of the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination;
4. Requests those States that have not yet become parties to the Convention to ratify it or accede thereto;

5. Calls upon the States parties to the Convention to consider the possibility of making the declaration provided for in article 14 of the Convention;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its forty-third session a report concerning the status of the Convention, in accordance with Assembly resolution 2106 A (XX) of 21 December 1965.

General Assembly resolution 41/104

4 December 1986 Meeting 97 Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee (A/41/793) without vote, 27 October (meeting 25); 18-nation draft (A/C.3/41/L9), amended by 13 nations (A/C.3/41/L24); agenda item 89 (b).

Sponsors of draft: Argentina, Australia, Bahamas, Barbados, Belgium, Bulgaria, Cuba, Cyprus, Egypt, Germany, Federal Republic of Hungary, India, Morocco, New Zealand, Portugal, Rwanda, Spain, Yugoslavia.

Sponsors of amendment: Costa Rica, Denmark, Ecuador, Finland, France, Iceland, Italy, Netherlands, Norway, Peru, Senegal, Sweden, Uruguay.

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 3rd Committee 4-15, 23, 25; plenary 97.

Prior to approving the text as a whole, the Third Committee adopted, by a recorded vote of 80 to none, with 45 abstentions, amendments adding the second preambular paragraph and paragraph 5.

Implementation of the Convention

CERD activities. The Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, set up under article 8 of the Convention, for the first time since its establishment in 1969 held only one session during the year, its thirty-third, in New York from 3 to 21 March 1986. Its thirty-fourth session did not take place at Geneva as scheduled from 4 to 22 August owing to the non-payment of assessed contributions by a number of States parties over several years and the grave financial crisis facing the United Nations, which prevented the Organization from advancing the necessary funds as it had done in previous years.

The tenth meeting of the States parties to the Convention, held in New York on 17 January 1986, was urged by the Secretary-General to take action to solve the problem. Despite repeated appeals by the Secretary-General and the CERD Chairman, the total of outstanding assessments and arrears, as at 30 September 1986, amounted to $207,948. In a note on CERD activities⁽¹⁹⁾ the Secretary-General informed the General Assembly of the circumstances leading to the postponement of the Committee's thirty-fourth session and stated that the Committee was unable to report to the Assembly on its 1986 activities, as required under article 9, paragraph 2, of the Convention.

Most of the Committee's work at its March session was devoted to examining reports by States parties on measures taken to implement the Convention's provisions. After considering reports by 19 States under article 9 of the Convention, the Committee provided, in its report to the Assembly on its 1986-1987 activities⁽²⁰⁾ a summary of its members' views on each country report and of statements made by the States parties concerned, and described action taken to resolve the problem of delays and non-submission of reports.

On 20 March 1986, the Committee took up, in conformity with article 15 of the Convention, consideration of petitions and reports, and other information related to Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted by the Trusteeship Council (see TRUSTEESHIP AND DECOLONIZATION, Chapter II) and by the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The Committee approved the appointment of members of its three working groups—Atlantic Ocean and Caribbean Territories, including Gibraltar; Pacific and Indian Ocean Territories; and African Territories—to examine documentation and to report to the Committee on their findings. On 11 August, the Special Committee, regarding the information requested of it under article 15 of the Convention and in a 1985 Assembly resolution,⁽²¹⁾ decided to request the administering Powers concerned to include the required information in their annual reports to the Secretary-General transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter (see APPENDIX II). The Secretary-General was subsequently informed that no petitions falling under the terms of article 15 had been received by the Special Committee during 1986.

As to the reporting obligations of States parties under article 9 of the Convention, the Secretary-General⁽²²⁾ drew to the attention of the tenth meeting of the States parties a 1985 Assembly resolution⁽²³⁾ by which it was recommended that the States parties suggest to CERD the adoption, as a general rule, of the practice already being followed by the Committee of considering two successive reports in one single text. On 20 March, the Committee noted that the States parties had decided to approve the Committee's practice of considering successive overdue reports in a single document.

Also in March, CERD continued to consider, in conformity with article 14 of the Convention, communications from individuals or groups of individuals claiming violation of their rights under the Convention by a State party recognizing CERD competence to receive and consider such communications. Twelve of the 124 States parties—Costa Rica, Denmark, Ecuador, France, Iceland, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Peru, Senegal, Sweden and Uruguay—had declared such recognition. By the end of the March session, work under the article had not reached the reporting stage.

The Assembly, in 1985,⁽²¹⁾ had requested the Secretary-General to ensure wider publicity of CERD work, so as to facilitate effective implementation of its functions under the Convention. In his note on CERD activities in 1986,⁽¹⁹⁾ the Secretary-General described steps he had taken pursuant to that request. DPI referred to CERD work in press releases and radio programmes and gave exposure to special occasions such as the annual International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (21 March).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 4 December 1986, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/105 without vote.

Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination

The General Assembly,

Recalling its previous resolutions concerning the reports of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination and resolution 41/104 of 4 December 1986 on the status of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, as well as its other relevant resolutions on the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination,

Mindful of the obligation of all States parties to comply fully with the provisions of the Convention,

Aware of the importance of the contribution of the Committee to the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination and to the elimination of all forms of discrimination based on race, colour, descent or national or ethnic origin,

Further aware of the need to intensify the struggle for the elimination of racism and racial discrimination throughout the world, especially the elimination of apartheid in South Africa and Namibia,

Having considered the note by the Secretary-General concerning the work of the Committee, which states, inter alia, that the Committee was unable to hold its thirty-fourth session in August 1986 as planned because of the lack of financial means, as a consequence of the failure of many States parties to the Convention to pay their contributions under article 8, paragraph 6, of the Convention,

Recalling the appeal made at the tenth meeting of the States parties to the Convention to States parties to honour their financial obligations under the Convention, as well as other appeals on the same subject,

1. Expresses its grave concern that, for the above reason, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination was unable to hold its thirty-fourth session and to carry out its obligations in the course of 1986 and that, consequently, it could not submit an annual report to the General Assembly at its forty-first session;

2. Commends the Committee for its work in the past with regard to the implementation of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination and the Programme of Action for the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination;

3. Calls upon States parties to comply fully with their obligation under article 9, paragraph 1, of the Convention and to submit in due time their periodic reports on measures taken to implement the Convention;

4. Appeals urgently to States parties to fulfil their financial obligations under article 8, paragraph 6, of the Convention so as to enable the Committee to resume its work;

5. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) To consider making an urgent appeal, by telex, to States parties to fulfil their financial obligations with regard to the Committee in order to enable it to resume its work;

(b) To transmit notices of assessment for 1987 to States parties as soon as possible, urging them to pay their contributions;

(c) To explore all appropriate avenues to enable the Committee to meet in 1987, even if for a shorter duration and at a reduced cost;

(d) To consider convoking, if necessary and within available resources, a meeting of States parties during the first regular session of 1987 of the Economic and Social Council, so that they can take stock of the level of assessed contributions and make recommendations on the future work of the Committee;

(e) To report on the situation to the General Assembly at its forty-second session.

General Assembly resolution 41/105

4 December 1986 Meeting 97 Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee (A/41/793) without vote, 31 October (meeting 32); 10-nation draft (A/C.3/41/L.10/Rev.1), orally revised; agenda item 89 (a).

Sponsors: Algeria, Australia, Cuba, Cyprus, Ethiopia, India, Nigeria, Pakistan, Rwanda, Yugoslavia.

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 3rd Committee 4-15, 23, 25, 32; plenary 97.

Measures against nazism and fascism

Human Rights Commission action. On 13 March,⁽²⁴⁾ the Commission on Human Rights again condemned all totalitarian or other ideologies and practices, including Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist, based on racial or ethnic exclusiveness or intolerance, hatred, terror, or systematic denial of human rights and fundamental freedoms. It called on States to ensure the thorough investigation and detection, arrest, extradition and punishment of war criminals and persons guilty of crimes against humanity. The Commission also called on specialized agencies, intergovernmental organizations and international NGOs to initiate or intensify measures against all totalitarian ideologies.

Report of the Secretary-General. In response to a 1985 Assembly request,⁽²⁵⁾ the Secretary-General submitted a report⁽²⁶⁾ summarizing comments received as at 12 September 1986 from nine States, three specialized agencies, one intergovernmental organization and five NGOs on ongoing and planned measures to eradicate nazism, fascism and related ideologies and practices.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 4 December 1986, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/160 without vote.

Measures to be taken against Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist activities and all other forms of totalitarian ideologies and practices based on racial intolerance, hatred and terror

The General Assembly,

Recalling that the United Nations emerged from the struggle against nazism, fascism, aggression and foreign occupation, and that the peoples expressed their resolve in the Charter of the United Nations to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war,

Aware of the determination proclaimed by the peoples of the world in the Charter to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom,

Deeply alarmed at the existence of groups and organizations which still propagate totalitarian ideologies and practices, including Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist ones, which violate human rights and fundamental freedoms, in particular the rights to self-determination, to life, liberty and security of person and to freedom from discrimination, and which thereby constitute a threat to the purposes and principles laid down in the Charter,

Expressing its concern that the proponents of Fascist, neo-Fascist and other totalitarian ideologies have, in a number of countries, intensified their activities and are increasingly co-ordinating them on an international scale,

Deeply concerned that in the contemporary world there continue to exist racist, colonialist and other forms of totalitarian ideologies, régimes and practices which entail contempt for the individual or denial of the intrinsic dignity and equality of all human beings and of equality of opportunity in civil, political, economic, social and cultural spheres,

Reaffirming that all totalitarian or other ideologies and practices, including Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist, based on racial, ethnic or other exclusiveness or intolerance, hatred, terror or systematic denial of human rights and fundamental freedoms, or which have such consequences, are incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter, may jeopardize world peace and constitute obstacles to friendly relations between States and to the realization of human rights and fundamental freedoms,

Mindful of the principles of international co-operation in the detection, arrest, extradition and punishment of persons guilty of war crimes and crimes against humanity, set forth in General Assembly resolution 3074(XXVIII) of 3 December 1973,

Reaffirming that the prosecution and punishment of war crimes and crimes against peace and humanity, as laid down in General Assembly resolutions 3(I) of 13 February 1946 and 95(I) of 11 December 1946, constitute a universal commitment for all States,

Recalling its resolutions 2331(XXII) of 18 December 1967, 2438(XXIII) of 19 December 1968, 2545(XXIV) of 11 December 1969, 2713(XXV) of 15 December 1970, 2839(XXVI) of 18 December 1971, 34/24 of 15 November 1979, 35/200 of 15 December 1980, 36/162 of 16 December 1981, 37/179 of 17 December 1982, 38/99 of 16 December 1983, 39/114 of 14 December 1984 and 40/148 of 13 December 1985,

1. Again condemns all totalitarian or other ideologies and practices, including Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist ideologies, based on racial, ethnic or other exclusiveness or intolerance, hatred and terror, which deprive people of basic human rights and fundamental freedoms and of equality of opportunity, and expresses its determination to combat those ideologies and practices;

2. Urges all States to draw attention to the threats to democratic institutions by the above-mentioned ideologies and practices and to consider taking measures, in accordance with their national constitutional systems and with the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenants on Human Rights, to prohibit or otherwise deter activities of groups or organizations or whoever is practising those ideologies;

3. Invites Member States to adopt, in accordance with their national constitutional systems and with the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenants on Human Rights, as a matter of high priority, measures declaring punishable by law any dissemination of ideas based on racial superiority or hatred and of war propaganda, including Nazi, Fascist and neo-Fascist ideologies;

4. Calls upon all States, in accordance with the basic principles of international law, to refrain from practices aimed at the violation of basic human rights;

5. Appeals to States that have not yet done so to become parties to the International Covenants on Human Rights, the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, the Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity and the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid;

6. Invites all States and international organizations to submit to the Secretary-General their comments and information on the implementation of the present resolution;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report, through the Economic and Social Council, to the General Assembly at its forty-third session in the light of the discussion that will take place in the Commission on Human Rights and on the basis of comments provided by States and international organizations.

General Assembly resolution 41/160

4 December 1986 Meeting 97 Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee (A/41/874/Add.2) without vote, 28 November (meeting 61); 14-nation draft (A/C.3/41/L.87); agenda item 12.

Sponsors: Afghanistan, Angola, Bulgaria, Byelorussian SSR, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia, Nicaragua, Poland, Ukrainian SSR, Viet Nam.

Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 3rd Committee 23-35, 40-43, 45, 46, 48-61; plenary 97.

The United States joined in the consensus although it believed that the text represented another effort by its sponsors to deflect criticism of their own human rights records, as well as a gross exaggeration of the threat posed by a few misguided individuals. Sweden, on behalf of the five Nordic countries, said their acceptance of the text did not mean they were prepared to allow unconstitutional restrictions on freedom of opinion, expression or the press; totalitarian ideologies were a threat to democratic societies and their institutions, but measures against such ideologies had to comply with national constitutions.

Other aspects of discrimination

Religious freedom

Report of the Secretary-General. Pursuant to a 1985 Commission request,⁽²⁷⁾ the Secretary-General submitted at its March 1986 session a compendium⁽²⁸⁾ of national legislation and regulations on freedom of religion or belief, highlighting measures taken to combat intolerance or discrimination in this area. The legislative and regulatory texts received from 31 countries dealt mainly with: protection of the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion or belief and related human rights; limitations imposed on those rights; protection of the right to manifest one's religion or belief in worship, observance, practice and teaching; prevention and elimination of discrimination as to religion or belief; observance of existing provisions regarding freedom of religion or belief and investigation of related discrimination; legal provisions against offences which infringed on religious belief, and protection of religious places, ceremonies and traditions; conscientious objection to military service; and educational matters, including religious instruction of children.

Communications. On 14 January 1986,⁽²⁹⁾ Turkey transmitted to the Secretary-General a resolution on the plight of the Turkish-Muslim minority in Bulgaria, adopted at the Sixteenth Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers (Fez, Morocco, 6-10 January), expressing solidarity with that minority and calling for restoration of their religious and cultural rights. Referring to 1985 communications from Bulgaria and Turkey,⁽³⁰⁾ Bulgaria, on 11 February,⁽³¹⁾ refuted allegations by Turkey of violence against the Turkish minority in Bulgaria and expressed the wish to seek a solution to bilateral problems. On 14 February,⁽³²⁾ Bulgaria transmitted a declaration of the Bulgarian Telegraph Agency (BTA), refuting allegations by Turkey concerning the demolition of mosques and encroachments on the Muslim religion. On 24 February,⁽³³⁾ Turkey transmitted a statement by a spokesman of its Ministry of Foreign Affairs, charging that BTA's declaration attempted to conceal the subjection of the 1.5 million Turkish Muslims to oppression and cultural genocide. On the same date,⁽³⁴⁾ Turkey transmitted material containing further charges of Bulgaria's oppressive policies against the Turkish minority. Similar charges were made by Turkey in a 12 March letter⁽³⁵⁾ to the Commission on Human Rights.

By a 19 May letter to the President of the Economic and Social Council,⁽³⁶⁾ Saudi Arabia affirmed its support of Council members who had expressed concern at the infringement of the rights of the Turkish-Muslim minority in Bulgaria.

Alleged desecrations by Israel of the Al-Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem were the subject of a number of communications, as were charges by Israel of anti-Semitic remarks made in United Nations forums (see p. 263).

Human Rights Commission action. As requested by the General Assembly in 1985,⁽³⁷⁾ the Commission on Human Rights continued in 1986 to consider measures to implement the 1981 Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief⁽³⁸⁾ On 10 March⁽³⁹⁾ the Commission urged States to provide constitutional and legal guarantees for freedom of thought, conscience, religion and belief and to examine the training of their educators and public officials to ensure that they did not in their duties discriminate against persons professing other religions or beliefs. The United Nations University and other academic and research institutions were invited to undertake programmes to encourage respect in matters relating to freedom of religion, and Special Rapporteur Elizabeth Odio Benito (Costa Rica) of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities was asked to submit in 1987 her final report on a study on the subject, prepared on the basis of information supplied by Governments, specialized agencies, intergovernmental organizations, NGOs and other sources, including the views expressed in the General Assembly and the Commission. The study had been authorized by the Economic and Social Council in 1984.⁽⁴⁰⁾ The Commission asked the Secretary-General to provide the Special Rapporteur with the assistance required for submission of the final report, to prepare an addendum to the compendium of national legislation and regulations on freedom of religion or belief and to report in 1987 on measures to implement the Commission's resolution.

Expressing deep concern about reports of incidents and governmental actions inconsistent with the 1981 Declaration, the Commission, also on 10 March⁽⁴¹⁾ by a roll-call vote of 26 to 5, with 12 abstentions, decided to appoint for one year a special rapporteur to examine those incidents and actions and to recommend remedial measures; he was requested to report in 1987. The Secretary-General was asked to appeal to Governments to co-operate with and assist the Special Rapporteur and to provide him with all other necessary assistance.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

In May 1986, the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of its Second (Social) Committee, adopted decision 1986/134 by recorded vote.

Implementation of the Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief

At its 19th plenary meeting, on 23 May 1986, the Economic and Social Council, noting Commission on Human Rights resolution 1986/20 of 10 March 1986, approved the Commission's decision to appoint for one year a special rapporteur to examine incidents and governmental actions in all parts of the world which are inconsistent with the provisions of the Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief and to recommend remedial measures, including, as appropriate, the promotion of a dialogue between communities of religion or belief and their Governments. The Council also approved the Commission's request to the Special Rapporteur to submit a report to the Commission at its forty-third session on his activities regarding questions involving implementation of the Declaration, including the occurrence and extent of incidents and actions inconsistent with the provisions of the Declaration, together with his conclusions and recommendations. It further approved the Commission's request to the Secretary-General to provide all necessary assistance to the Special Rapporteur.

Economic and Social Council decision 1986/134

30-3-18 (recorded vote)

Approved by Second Committee (E/1986/95) by recorded vote (30-4-15), 21 May (meeting 20); draft by Commission on Human Rights (E/1986/22); agenda item 9.

Recorded vote in Council as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Australia, Bangladesh, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Colombia, Costa Rica, Finland, France, Gabon, Germany, Federal Republic of, Guinea, Haiti, Iceland, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Philippines, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Spain, Sweden, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States, Venezuela, Zaire.

Against: Byelorussian SSR, German Democratic Republic, USSR.

Abstaining: China, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Morocco, Mozambique, Nigeria, Pakistan, Poland, Romania, Rwanda, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Syrian Arab Republic, Uganda, Yugoslavia, Zimbabwe.

In the Committee, the Byelorussian SSR orally proposed that the Council defer action on the text until its first regular session of 1987. The Committee rejected the proposal by a recorded vote of 27 to 8, with 15 abstentions.

Uganda considered the decision to appoint a special rapporteur inappropriate, saying his duties were already carried out by other bodies, including the Sub-Commission.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 4 December 1986, acting on the recommendation of the Third Committee, the General Assembly adopted without vote resolution 41/112.

Elimination of all forms of religious intolerance

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolution 36/55 of 25 November 1981, in which it proclaimed the Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief,

Recalling its resolution 37/187 of 18 December 1982 and subsequent resolutions, in which it made and reiterated requests to the Commission on Human Rights to consider what measures might be necessary to implement the Declaration,

Encouraged by the efforts being made by the Commission on Human Rights and by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities and their respective Special Rapporteurs to study relevant developments affecting the implementation of the Declaration,

Emphasizing that non-governmental organizations and religious bodies and groups at every level have an important role to play in the promotion of tolerance and the protection of freedom of religion or belief and inviting them to consider, in particular, what further role they could envisage playing regarding the dissemination of the text of the Declaration in national and local languages,

Aware that intolerance and discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief continue to exist in many parts of the world,

Believing that further efforts are therefore required to promote and protect the right to freedom of thought, conscience, religion and belief,

1. Reaffirms that freedom of thought, conscience, religion and belief is a right guaranteed to all without discrimination;

2. Urges States, therefore, in accordance with their respective constitutional systems and with such internationally accepted instruments as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, to provide, where they have not already done so, adequate constitutional and legal guarantees of freedom of thought, conscience, religion and belief;

3. Notes with appreciation that work has already begun in the Commission on Human Rights on the preparation of a compendium of the national legislation and regulations of States on the question of freedom of religion or belief;

4. Pledges its determination to encourage understanding, tolerance and respect in matters relating to freedom of religion or belief and recalls that a Seminar on this theme was held at Geneva from 3 to 14 December 1984 within the framework of the programme of advisory services in the field of human rights;

5. Requests the Commission on Human Rights to urge the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities to accord high priority at its thirty-ninth session to consideration of the study prepared by its Special Rapporteur, in accordance with the terms of Sub-Commission resolution 1983/31 of 6 September 1983, on the current dimensions of the problems of intolerance and of discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief, and to report on this matter to the Commission at its forty-fourth session;

6. Takes note of Commission on Human Rights resolution 1986/20 of 10 March 1986 and Economic and Social Council decision 1986/134 of 23 May 1986, pursuant to which a Special Rapporteur has been appointed for one year to examine incidents and governmental actions in all parts of the world that are inconsistent with the provisions of the Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief and to recommend remedial measures, as appropriate;

7. Urges all States to take all appropriate measures to combat intolerance and to encourage understanding, tolerance and respect in matters relating to freedom of religion or belief and, in this context, to examine where necessary the supervision and training of their civil servants, educators and other public officials to ensure that, in the course of their official duties, they respect different religions and beliefs and do not discriminate against persons professing other religions or beliefs;

8. Invites the United Nations University and other academic and research institutions to undertake programmes and studies on the encouragement of understanding, tolerance and respect in matters relating to freedom of religion or belief;

9. Invites the Secretary-General to continue to give high priority to the dissemination of the text of the Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief, in all the official languages of the United Nations, and to take all appropriate measures to make the text available for use by United Nations information centres, as well as by other interested bodies;

10. Requests the Commission on Human Rights to continue its consideration of measures to implement the Declaration and to report, through the Economic and Social Council, to the General Assembly at its forty-second session;

11. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-second session the item entitled "Elimination of all forms of religious intolerance" and to consider the report of the Commission on Human Rights under that item.

Indigenous populations

Human Rights Commission action. On 11 March 1986,⁽⁴²⁾ the Commission on Human Rights urged the Sub-Commission's Working Group on Indigenous Populations to intensify its efforts in developing international standards on the human rights of indigenous populations, expressing appreciation for the steps it had taken in 1985.⁽⁴³⁾

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 May 1986, the Economic and Social Council, acting on the recommendation of its Second Committee, adopted resolution 1986/34 without vote.

Study of the problem of discrimination against indigenous populations

The Economic and Social Council,

Mindful of its resolution 1982/34 of 7 May 1982, by which it authorized the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities to establish annually a pre-session working group on indigenous populations to review developments pertaining to the promotion and protection of the human rights and fundamental freedoms of indigenous populations, giving special attention to the evolution of standards,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 40/131 of 13 December 1985, by which the Assembly decided to establish the United Nations Voluntary Fund for Indigenous Populations with a view to securing a broad geographical representation of indigenous organizations in the future work of the Working Group,

Convinced of the need for the widest possible exchange of views in this field among Governments, specialized agencies, organizations of indigenous peoples and other non-governmental organizations,

Decides that the Working Group on Indigenous Populations shall meet for up to eight working days before the annual sessions of the Sub-Commission, the first three working days to be devoted to unserved meetings for the purpose of the preliminary drafting of international standards.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/34

23 May 1986 Meeting 19 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (E/1986/95) without vote, 21 May (meeting 20); draft by Commission on Human Rights (E/1986/22); agenda item 9.

Migrant workers

Draft convention

The drafting of an international convention on the protection of the rights of all migrant workers and their families continued in 1986.

Human Rights Commission action. On 13 March,⁽⁴⁴⁾ the Commission on Human Rights commended the Working Group on the Drafting of an International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Their Families for the progress it had made on the second reading of the draft convention. It invited all Member States to continue co-operating with the Group, reiterated its hope for a speedy conclusion of the convention and requested the Secretary-General to report on further progress in 1987.

Working Group activities. The open-ended Working Group, established by the General Assembly in 1979,⁽⁴⁵⁾ held its seventh session in New York from 24 September to 3 October 1986.⁽⁴⁶⁾

The Group adopted in second reading paragraph 2 of article 1 and articles 4 to 6 of part I, relating to the scope of and definitions in the convention. It also adopted article 7 of part II on non-discrimination with respect to rights, as well as articles 8 to 17 of part III on the human rights of all migrant workers and their family members.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 4 December 1986, acting on the recommendation of the Third Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/151 by recorded vote.

Measures to improve the situation and ensure the human rights and dignity of all migrant workers

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming once more the permanent validity of the principles and standards set forth in the basic instruments regarding the international protection of human rights, in particular in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenants on Human Rights, the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination and the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women,

Bearing in mind the principles and standards established within the framework of the International Labour Organisation and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, and the importance of the task carried out in connection with migrant workers and their families in other specialized agencies and in various organs of the United Nations,

Reiterating that, in spite of the existence of an already established body of principles and standards, there is a need to make further efforts to improve the situation and ensure the human rights and dignity of all migrant workers and their families,

Recalling its resolution 34/172 of 17 December 1979, by which it decided to establish a working group open to all Member States to elaborate an international convention on the protection of the rights of all migrant workers and their families,

Recalling also its resolutions 35/198 of 15 December 1980, 36/160 of 16 December 1981, 37/170 of 17 December 1982, 38/86 of 16 December 1983, 39/102 of 14 December 1984 and 40/130 of 13 December 1985, by which it renewed the mandate of the Working Group on the Drafting of an International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Their Families and requested it to continue its work,

Having examined the progress made by the Working Group during its seventh session, held from 24 September to 3 October 1986, during which the Group continued with the second reading of the draft convention,

Concerned at the fact that, owing to the current financial situation, the Working Group could not meet between sessions of the General Assembly in 1986, immediately after the first regular session of the Economic and Social Council, following the practice established for the Group by the General Assembly itself,

Taking note of the recommendation of the Working Group to the effect that its inter-sessional meeting should not be suspended again, so as to enable it to complete, as soon as possible, the second reading of the remaining articles of the draft convention,

1. Takes note with satisfaction of the report of the Working Group on the Drafting of an International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Their Families and, in particular, of the progress made by the Working Group on the drafting, in second reading, of the draft convention;

2. Decides that, in order to enable it to complete its task as soon as possible, the Working Group shall again hold an inter-sessional meeting of two weeks' duration in New York, immediately after the first regular session of 1987 of the Economic and Social Council;

3. Invites the Secretary-General to transmit to Governments the report of the Working Group so as to enable the members of the Group to continue the drafting, in second reading, of the draft convention during the inter-sessional meeting to be held in the spring of 1987, as well as to transmit the results obtained at that meeting to the General Assembly for consideration during its forty-second session;

4. Also invites the Secretary-General to transmit the above-mentioned document to the competent organs of the United Nations and to the international organizations concerned, for their information, so as to enable them to continue their co-operation with the Working Group;

5. Decides that the Working Group shall meet during the forty-second session of the General Assembly, preferably at the beginning of the session, to continue the second reading of the draft international convention on the protection of the rights of all migrant workers and their families;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to do everything possible to ensure adequate secretariat services for the Working Group for the timely fulfilment of its mandate, both at its inter-sessional meeting to be held after the first regular session of 1987 of the Economic and Social Council and during the forty-second session of the General Assembly.

General Assembly resolution 41/151

4 December 1986 Meeting 97 148-1-4 (recorded vote)

Approved by Third Committee (A/41/874/Add.2) by recorded vote (138-14), 28 November (meeting 61); 21-nation draft (A/C.3/41/L.79); agenda item 12.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Benin, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: United States.

Abstaining: Belgium, Canada, Germany, Federal Republic of, United Kingdom.

The United States opposed the idea of holding two meetings of the Working Group in 1987 for financial reasons; it also felt that the appropriate forum for a substantive discussion of issues relating to migrant workers was the International Labour Organisation (ILO). The United Kingdom expressed reservations as to the usefulness of the work done by the Group. Belgium and France reserved their right to reconsider their positions when the financial implications were taken up.

Mexico regretted that a vote had for the first time been requested on a text traditionally adopted by consensus.

Protection of minorities

Activities related to protection of minorities continued to focus in 1986 on the elaboration of a declaration on the rights of persons belonging to national, ethnic, religious and linguistic minorities. As in previous years, the Commission on Human Rights set up an informal open-ended working group which held meetings on 12, 14, 17 and 19 February and 7 March 1986. The group provisionally adopted draft article 1 of the declaration which was annexed to its report.⁽⁴⁷⁾ It considered the proposed text of draft article 2 and decided to continue consideration of that and subsequent draft articles in 1987. It postponed consideration of the definition of minority until a later stage and agreed that the United Nations Secretariat should be asked to prepare a compilation of the various proposals which had been made concerning that definition and to submit it in 1987 to the Commission to facilitate the working group's work.

On 13 March,⁽⁴⁸⁾ the Commission decided to set up another working group in 1987 to continue elaboration of the declaration and asked the Secretary-General to provide the group with all the assistance it needed.

Civil and political rights

Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and Optional Protocol

Accessions and ratifications

As at 31 December 1986, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the Optional Protocol thereto, adopted by the General Assembly in 1966⁽¹⁾ and in force since 1976,⁽²⁾ had been ratified or acceded to by 85 and 38 States, respectively. Argentina, the Niger, the Philippines and the Sudan became parties to the Covenant in 1986.⁽³⁾ Argentina and the Niger also acceded to the Optional Protocol, and Argentina and the Philippines made the declaration under article 41 of the Covenant recognizing the competence of the Human Rights Committee to receive and consider communications to the effect that a State party claimed that another was not fulfilling its obligations under the Covenant.

In his report to the Assembly on the International Covenants on Human Rights,⁽⁴⁾ the Secretary-General provided information on the status of the Covenant and the Protocol as at 1 August 1986 (see p. 739).

Implementation

Human Rights Commission action. The Commission on Human Rights, on 10 March,⁽⁵⁾ expressed appreciation for the Human Rights Committee's continued striving for uniform standards in implementing the Covenant and Optional Protocol and, on the occasion of the twentieth anniversary of their adoption, as well as the adoption of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights,⁽⁶⁾ appealed to States that had not done so to become parties to them and to consider making the declaration under article 41 of the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Emphasizing the importance of strict compliance with those instruments, it stressed the importance of avoiding the erosion of human rights by derogation and underlined the necessity of strict observance of the agreed condition and procedures for derogation from the Covenant. The Commission urged the Secretary-General to give more publicity to the Human Rights Committee and asked him to report in 1987 on the status of the Covenants and the Protocol.

Human Rights Committee activities. The Human Rights Committee, established under article 28 of the Covenant, held only two sessions in 1986: the twenty-seventh in New York from 24 March to 11 April and the twenty-eighth at Geneva from 7 to 25 July. The financial crisis of the United Nations caused the Committee to cancel the session that was to have taken place from 20 October to 7 November.

In 1986, the Committee considered reports and additional information submitted by four States—Czechoslovakia, the Federal Republic of Germany, Hungary and Mongolia—under article 40 of the Covenant. The Committee also adopted views on three communications from individuals claiming that their rights under the Covenant had been violated and that they had exhausted all available domestic remedies. The cases concerned Venezuela (1) and Zaire (2). The Committee decided that four other such communications were inadmissible.

On 25 July, the Committee unanimously adopted its tenth annual report to the Assembly.⁽⁷⁾

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

Pursuant to an interim arrangement of the Human Rights Committee agreed on in 1985,⁽⁸⁾ under which the Committee was to transmit regularly to the Economic and Social Council the general comments adopted by it and transmit its full annual report directly to the Assembly later in the year, the Secretary-General, by an April 1986 note,⁽⁹⁾ forwarded the Committee's general comments relating to the position of aliens under the Covenant, adopted by the Committee on 9 April. Taking note of the Secretary-General's note, the Council, by decision 1986/124 of 21 May, authorized the Secretary-General to transmit the Committee's annual report directly to the Assembly at its 1986 regular session.

State of siege or emergency

Human Rights Commission action. On 12 March 1986,⁽¹⁰⁾ the Commission on Human Rights stated that it looked forward to the first report on situations known as states of siege or emergency, to be submitted by the Sub-Commission's Special Rapporteur, Leandro Despouy (Argentina). It decided to examine the report in 1987 as a matter of priority. The report was to include a list of countries that proclaimed or terminated a state of emergency. An annual report by the Sub-Commission on compliance with national and international rules governing the legality of the introduction of a state of siege or emergency was to contain that information.

The decision to include in its agenda an item on implementation of the right of derogation (in states of emergency) as provided under article 4 of the Covenant had been taken by the Sub-Commission in 1983.⁽¹¹⁾ In 1984,⁽¹²⁾ the Sub-Commission had requested authorization to appoint a special rapporteur on the subject; that authorization was given by the Economic and Social Council in 1985.⁽¹³⁾

Suriname

On 5 December 1986,⁽¹⁴⁾ Suriname forwarded to the Secretary-General a decree of 1 December proclaiming a state of emergency for a part of its territory, on the grounds that public order, security of the State and the execution of the administration were seriously endangered. Suriname requested that the decree be circulated among the States parties to the Covenant.

Self-determination of peoples

Five resolutions adopted by the Commission on Human Rights in 1986 reaffirmed the right to self-determination for the people of Afghanistan,⁽¹⁵⁾ Kampuchea,⁽¹⁶⁾ Palestine,⁽¹⁷⁾ South Africa and Namibia,⁽¹⁸⁾ and Western Sahara.⁽¹⁹⁾ A sixth resolution adopted under the item pertained to the use of mercenaries to impede the exercise of the right of peoples to self-determination (see p. 700).

The Commission's actions and debate on the right of peoples to self-determination, as well as action taken by the Economic and Social Council in 1986, were summarized by the Secretary-General in a report to the General Assembly.⁽²⁰⁾ The report also contained a summary of responses from 23 Governments, five specialized agencies and five NGOs pursuant to the Assembly's 1985 request⁽²¹⁾ for information on their assistance to colonial Territories and peoples.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

Following the pattern of previous years, the General Assembly adopted in 1986 two resolutions on the right to self-determination, a right it repeatedly reaffirmed for individual Non-Self-Governing Territories (see TRUSTEESHIP AND DECOLONIZATION, Chapter IV).

On 4 December, acting on the recommendation of the Third Committee, the Assembly adopted resolution 41/100 without vote.

Universal realization of the right of peoples to self-determination

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the importance, for the effective guarantee and observance of human rights, of the universal realization of the right of peoples to self-determination enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations and embodied in the International Covenants on Human Rights, as well as in the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples contained in General Assembly resolution 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960,

Welcoming the progressive exercise of the right to self-determination by peoples under colonial, foreign or alien occupation and their emergence into sovereign statehood and independence,

Deeply concerned at the continuation of acts or threats of foreign military intervention and occupation that are threatening to suppress, or have already suppressed, the right to self-determination of an increasing number of sovereign peoples and nations,

Expressing grave concern that, as a consequence of the persistence of such actions, millions of people have been and are being uprooted from their homes as refugees and displaced persons, and emphasizing the urgent need for concerted international action to alleviate their condition,

Recalling the relevant resolutions regarding the violation of the right of peoples to self-determination and other human rights as a result of foreign military intervention, aggression and occupation, adopted by the Commission on Human Rights at its thirty-sixth, thirty-seventh, thirty-eighth, thirty-ninth, fortieth, forty-first and forty-second sessions,

Reiterating its resolutions 35/35 B of 14 November 1980, 36/10 of 28 October 1981, 37/42 of 3 December 1982, 38/16 of 22 November 1983, 39/18 of 23 November 1984 and 40/24 of 29 November 1985,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General,

1. Reaffirms that the universal realization of the right of all peoples, including those under colonial, foreign and alien domination, to self-determination is a fundamental condition for the effective guarantee and observance of human rights and for the preservation and promotion of such rights;

2. Declares its firm opposition to acts of foreign military intervention, aggression and occupation, since these have resulted in the suppression of the right of peoples to self-determination and other human rights in certain parts of the world;

3. Calls upon the States responsible for those acts to cease immediately their military intervention and occupation of foreign countries and territories and all acts of repression, discrimination, exploitation and maltreatment, particularly the brutal and inhuman methods reportedly employed for the execution of these acts against the peoples concerned;

4. Deplores the plight of the millions of refugees and displaced persons who have been uprooted by the aforementioned acts and reaffirms their right to return to their homes voluntarily in safety and honour;

5. Requests the Commission on Human Rights to continue to give special attention to the violation of human rights, especially the right to self-determination, resulting from foreign military intervention, aggression or occupation;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to report on this issue to the General Assembly at its forty-second session under the item entitled "Importance of the universal realization of the right of peoples to self-determination and of the speedy granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples for the effective guarantee and observance of human rights".

India said its non-opposition was without prejudice to its position on article 1 of the International Covenant and various Human Rights Commission resolutions.

Also on 4 December, on the Third Committee's recommendation, the Assembly adopted resolution 41/101 by recorded vote.

Importance of the universal realization of the right of peoples to self-determination and of the speedy granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples for the effective guarantee and observance of human rights

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its faith in the importance of the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples contained in its resolution 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960,

Reaffirming the importance of the universal realization of the right of peoples to self-determination, national sovereignty and territorial integrity and of the speedy granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples as imperatives for the full enjoyment of all human rights,

Reaffirming the obligation of all Member States to comply with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and the resolutions of the United Nations regarding the exercise of the right to self-determination by peoples under colonial and foreign domination,

Recalling its resolution 1514(XV) and all relevant resolutions concerning the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

Recalling also its resolutions on the question of Namibia, in particular resolutions 2145(XXI) of 27 October 1966 and S-14/1 of 20 September 1986, as well as all the relevant Security Council resolutions, in particular resolutions 385(1976) of 30 January 1976 and 435(1978) of 29 September 1978,

Recalling the Declaration adopted by the World Conference on Sanctions against Racist South Africa and the Declaration of the International Conference for the Immediate Independence of Namibia and the Programme of Action on Namibia,

Bearing in mind the outcome of the International Conference on the Alliance between South Africa and Israel, held at Vienna from 11 to 13 July 1983,

Welcoming the holding at Tunis from 7 to 9 August 1984 of the Conference of Arab Solidarity with the Struggle for Liberation in Southern Africa,

Recalling resolutions CM/Res.1052(XLIV)/Rev.1 on South Africa and CM/Res.1055(XLIV)/Rev.1 on Namibia adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its forty-fourth ordinary session, held at Addis Ababa from 21 to 26 July 1986,

Reaffirming that the system of apartheid imposed on the South African people constitutes a violation of the fundamental rights of that people, a crime against humanity and a constant threat to international peace and security,

Gravely concerned at the continuation of the illegal occupation of Namibia by South Africa and the continued violations of the human rights of the people in the Territory and of the other peoples still under colonial domination and alien subjugation,

Reaffirming its resolution 39/2 of 28 September 1984 and recalling Security Council resolution 554(1984) of 17 August 1984, in which the Council rejected the so-called "new constitution" as null and void, Council resolution 569(1985) of 26 July 1985, and the statement made by the President of the Security Council on 13 June 1986 on the nation-wide state of emergency in South Africa,

Deeply concerned at the continued terrorist acts of aggression committed by the Pretoria régime against independent African States in the region, in particular the unprovoked attacks against Zimbabwe, Zambia and Botswana,

Deeply indignant at the continued occupation of part of the territory of Angola by the troops of the racist régime of South Africa and the persistent, hostile and unprovoked acts of aggression and sustained armed invasions carried out by that régime in violation of the sovereignty, airspace and territorial integrity of Angola, in particular the armed invasion of Angola on 28 September 1985 and the premeditated attack on the port of Namibe on 5 June 1986,

Recalling Security Council resolutions 527(1982) of 15 December 1982 and 535(1983) of 29 June 1983 on Lesotho, and Council resolutions 568(1985) of 21 June 1985 and 572(1985) of 30 September 1985 on Botswana, Reaffirming the national unity and territorial integrity of the Comoros,

Recalling the Political Declaration adopted by the First Conference of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity and the League of Arab States, held at Cairo from 7 to 9 March 1977,

Recalling also its relevant resolutions on the question of Palestine, in particular resolution 40/96 of 12 December 1985,

Recalling further the Geneva Declaration on Palestine and the Programme of Action for the Achievement of Palestinian Rights, adopted by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine,

Considering that the denial of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people to self-determination, sovereignty, independence and return to Palestine and the repeated acts of aggression by Israel against the people of the region constitute a serious threat to international peace and security,

Deeply shocked and alarmed at the deplorable consequences of the Israeli invasion of Lebanon and recalling all the relevant resolutions of the Security Council, in particular resolutions 508(1982) of 5 June 1982, 509(1982) of 6 June 1982, 520(1982) of 17 September 1982 and 521(1982) of 19 September 1982,

1. Calls upon all States to implement fully and faithfully all the resolutions of the United Nations regarding the exercise of the right to self-determination and independence by peoples under colonial and foreign domination;

2. Reaffirms the legitimacy of the struggle of peoples for their independence, territorial integrity, national unity and liberation from colonial domination, apartheid and foreign occupation by all available means, including armed struggle;

3. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the Namibian people, the Palestinian people and all peoples under foreign and colonial domination to self-determination, national independence, territorial integrity, national unity and sovereignty without foreign interference;

4. Strongly condemns those Governments that do not recognize the right to self-determination and independence of all peoples still under colonial domination and alien subjugation, notably the peoples of Africa and the Palestinian people;

5. Calls for the full and immediate implementation of the declarations and programmes of action on Namibia and on Palestine adopted by the international conferences on those questions;

6. Reaffirms its vigorous condemnation of the continued illegal occupation of Namibia by South Africa;

7. Condemns once again the racist régime of South Africa for its installation of a so-called "interim administration" at Windhoek and declares that action to be illegal, null and void;

8. Further condemns the policy of "bantustanization" and reiterates its support for the oppressed people of South Africa in its just and legitimate struggle against the racist minority régime of Pretoria;

9. Reaffirms its rejection of the so-called "new constitution" as null and void and reiterates that peace in South Africa can only be guaranteed by the establishment of majority rule through the full and free exercise of adult suffrage by all the people in a united and undivided South Africa;

10. Strongly condemns the wanton killing of peaceful and defenceless demonstrators and workers on strike, as well as the arbitrary arrests of the leaders and activists of the United Democratic Front, National Forum, trade unions and other mass organizations, and demands their immediate and unconditional release, in particular that of Nelson Mandela and Zephania Mothopeng;

11. Strongly condemns South Africa for the imposition of the state of emergency under its repugnant Internal Security Act and calls for the immediate lifting of the state of emergency, as well as the repeal of the Internal Security Act;

12. Condemns South Africa for its increasing oppression of the Namibian people, for the massive militarization of Namibia and for its armed attacks launched against the States in the region in order to destabilize them politically and to sabotage and destroy their economies;

13. Strongly condemns the establishment and use of armed terrorist groups by South Africa with a view to pitting them against the national liberation movements and destabilizing the legitimate Governments of southern Africa;

14. Strongly condemns the repeated acts of aggression and the continued occupation of parts of southern Angola and demands the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of the South African troops from Angolan territory;

15. Strongly condemns the persistent, hostile and unprovoked acts of aggression and sustained armed invasions carried out by the racist régime of South Africa in violation of the sovereignty, airspace and territorial integrity of Angola, in particular the armed invasion of Angola on 28 September 1985 and the premeditated attack on the port of Namibe on 5 June 1986;

16. Strongly reaffirms its solidarity with the independent African countries and national liberation movements that are victims of murderous acts of aggression and destabilization by the racist régime of Pretoria, and calls upon the international community to render increased assistance and support to these countries in order to enable them to strengthen their defence capacity, defend their sovereignty and territorial integrity and peacefully rebuild and develop;

17. Reaffirms that the practice of using mercenaries against sovereign States and national liberation movements constitutes a criminal act and calls upon the Governments of all countries to enact legislation declaring the recruitment, financing and training of mercenaries in their territories and the transit of mercenaries through their territories to be punishable offences, and prohibiting their nationals from serving as mercenaries, and to report on such legislation to the Secretary-General;

18. Strongly condemns the continued violation of the human rights of the peoples still under colonial domination and alien subjugation, the continuation of the illegal occupation by the racist minority régime in southern Africa and the denial to the Palestinian people of their inalienable national rights;

19. Further strongly condemns the racist régime of Pretoria for its acts of destabilization, armed aggression and economic blockade against Lesotho and strongly urges the international community to continue to extend maximum assistance to Lesotho to enable it to fulfil its international humanitarian obligations towards refugees and to use its influence on the racist régime so that it would desist from its terrorist acts against Lesotho;

20. Strongly condemns the unprovoked and unwarranted military attack on the capital of Botswana and demands that the racist régime pay full and adequate compensation to Botswana for the loss of life and damage to property;

21. Denounces the collusion between Israel and South Africa and expresses support for the Declaration of the International Conference on the Alliance between South Africa and Israel;

22. Strongly condemns the policy of those Western States, Israel and other States whose political, economic, military, nuclear, strategic, cultural and sports relations with the racist minority régime of South Africa encourage that régime to persist in its suppression of the aspirations of peoples to self-determination and independence;

23. Again demands the immediate application of the mandatory arms embargo against South Africa, imposed under Security Council resolution 418(1977) of 4 November 1977, by all countries and more particularly by those countries that maintain military and nuclear co-operation with the racist Pretoria régime and continue to supply it with related matériel;

24. Calls for the full implementation of the provisions of the Declaration adopted by the World Conference on Sanctions against Racist South Africa and of the Declaration of the International Conference for the Immediate Independence of Namibia and the Programme of Action on Namibia;

25. Demands once again the immediate implementation of its resolutions ES-8/2 of 14 September 1981 and S-14/1 of 20 September 1986;

26. Reaffirms all relevant resolutions adopted by the Organization of African Unity and the United Nations on the question of Western Sahara, including General Assembly resolution 40/50 of 2 December 1985, and calls upon the current Chairman of the Organization of African Unity and the Secretary-General of the United Nations to continue their efforts to find a just and lasting solution to this question;

27. Urges all States, the specialized agencies, organizations of the United Nations system and other international organizations to extend their support to the Namibian people through its sole and legitimate representative, the South West Africa People's Organization, in its struggle to gain its right to self-determination and independence in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations;

28. Notes the contacts between the Government of the Comoros and the Government of France in the search for a just solution to the problem of the integration of the Comorian island of Mayotte into the Comoros, in accordance with the resolutions of the Organization of African Unity and the United Nations on this question;

29. Calls for a substantial increase in all forms of assistance given by all States, United Nations organs, the specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations to the victims of racism, racial discrimination and apartheid through national liberation movements recognized by the Organization of African Unity;

30. Demands the immediate release of women and children detained in Namibia and South Africa;

31. Strongly condemns the constant and deliberate violations of the fundamental rights of the Palestinian people, as well as the expansionist activities of Israel in the Middle East, which constitute an obstacle to the achievement of self-determination and independence by the Palestinian people and a threat to peace and stability in the region;

32. Demands the immediate and unconditional release of all persons detained or imprisoned as a result of their struggle for self-determination and independence, full respect for their fundamental individual rights and compliance with article 5 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, under which no one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment;

33. Urges all States, the specialized agencies, organizations of the United Nations system and other international organizations to extend their support to the Palestinian people through its sole and legitimate representative, the Palestine Liberation Organization, in its struggle to regain its right to self-determination and independence in accordance with the Charter;

34. Expresses its appreciation for the material and other forms of assistance that peoples under colonial rule continue to receive from Governments, organizations of the United Nations system and intergovernmental organizations, and calls for a substantial increase in this assistance;

35. Urges all States, the specialized agencies and other competent organizations of the United Nations system to do their utmost to ensure the full implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and to intensify their efforts to support peoples under colonial, foreign and racist domination in their just struggle for self-determination and independence;

36. Requests the Secretary-General to give maximum publicity to the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and to give the widest possible publicity to the struggle of oppressed peoples for the achievement of their self-determination and national independence and to report periodically to the General Assembly on his activities in this regard;

37. Decides to consider this item at its forty-second session on the basis of the reports on the strengthening of assistance to colonial territories and peoples that Governments, organizations of the United Nations system and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations have been requested to submit.

General Assembly resolution 41/101

4 December 1986 Meeting 97 126-18-12 (recorded vote)

Approved by Third Committee (A/41/809) by recorded vote (110-17-9), 27 October (meeting 25); draft by Benin, for African Group (A/C.3/41/L.13); agenda item 88. Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 3rd Committee 4-15, 23, 25; plenary 97.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussian SSR, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Cote d'Ivoire, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Democratic Kampuchea, Democratic Yemen, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, Gabon, Gambia, German Democratic Republic, Ghana, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, El Salvador, Finland, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Iceland, Israel, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Austria, Costa Rica, Equatorial Guinea, Fiji, Greece, Honduras, Ireland, Japan, Paraguay, Portugal, Samoa, Spain.

Speaking on behalf of the 12 EC members, the United Kingdom said they could not support the text—submitted without consulting the various groups—because it lacked balance by referring to certain violations but neglecting to mention the situations in Afghanistan and Kampuchea. The United States regretted what it called the politicization of United Nations activities regarding racial discrimination and the extreme language which, it said, prevented it from supporting relevant resolutions; such language did not facilitate peaceful change either in South Africa or the Middle East, but only encouraged more polarization and strife. Israel regretted that the struggle against apartheid was harnessed to the service of those who sought not only to tarnish Israel's image, but also to obliterate it as a State.

Austria, Spain and Uruguay objected to certain portions of the text, particularly the reference to armed struggle in paragraph 2. Spain also expressed reservations concerning paragraph 22, which implied that encouragement was being given to the South African regime, and paragraph 26, which referred to a regional organization to which it did not belong and to resolutions which it had not supported. Similarly, Morocco and Turkey reserved their positions on paragraph 26. Cote d'Ivoire said that if separate votes had been taken, it would have abstained on the seventh preambular paragraph and on paragraphs 21 and 22; it believed that the subjective selectivity in those paragraphs constituted interference in internal affairs.

Uruguay, raising objections to paragraph 33, believed that the Palestinian people should determine their sole and legitimate representative; in that connection, the role of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) was only provisional.

Costa Rica said it could have voted in favour of the text had it not been for the selective mention of a single country in paragraph 31.

Cameroon had serious reservations concerning paragraphs which made selective mention of certain countries. Ecuador, also being unable to agree with some wording it considered to be selective, expressed reservations on the tenth preambular paragraph and paragraphs 3 and 15. Mexico reiterated reservations on paragraphs 5 and 21, similar to those it had made in 1985.⁽²²⁾ Argentina voiced reservations on the wording of certain paragraphs.

Botswana reserved its position on paragraph 24, stating that it was incapable of imposing sanctions on South Africa, but would not stand in the way of those who decided to do so.

Afghanistan

On 10 March 1986⁽¹⁵⁾ the Commission on Human Rights, by a roll-call vote of 31 to 6, with 5 abstentions, reaffirmed its profound concern that the people of Afghanistan continued to be denied their right to self-determination, to determine their own form of government and to choose their economic, political and social system free from outside intervention, subversion, coercion or constraint. It called for a political settlement based on immediate foreign troop withdrawal from Afghanistan, full respect for the country's independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity and non-aligned status, and strict observance of the principle of non-intervention and non-interference. Affirming the right of the Afghan refugees to return to their homes, the Commission urged a settlement enabling the Afghan people to determine their destiny free from outside interference. Expressing support for the Secretary-General's efforts and the diplomatic steps he had initiated, the Commission requested him to continue to search for a political solution, urged all concerned to continue to co-operate with him, and appealed for humanitarian relief assistance to alleviate, in co-ordination with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), the hardships of Afghan refugees.

(See also p. 752 and, for details of the situation in Afghanistan, see p. 212.)

Kampuchea

During the year, a number of communications were addressed to the Secretary-General concerning the situation in Kampuchea and allegations of human rights violations there (see p. 202). A number of letters containing charges of violations or responding to such charges were also circulated as documents of the Commission on Human Rights.

Reiterating its condemnation of persistent human rights violations in Kampuchea, particularly the repeated attacks by the occupying forces against civilians along the Thai-Kampuchean border, the Commission reaffirmed, by a resolution adopted on 10 March 1986, by a roll-call vote of 30 to 9, with 2 abstentions⁽¹⁶⁾ that the continued illegal occupation of Kampuchea by foreign forces deprived Kampucheans of their right to self-determination and constituted the primary human rights violation in that country. The Commission emphasized that the withdrawal of foreign forces, restoration of Kampuchea's independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity, recognition of the Kampucheans' right to self-determination and a commitment by all States to non-interference were essential for a solution to the Kampuchean problem. It reaffirmed its call for a cessation of hostilities and an immediate withdrawal of foreign forces, to enable Kampucheans to exercise their fundamental rights free from foreign interference and to determine their future through free and fair elections under United Nations supervision, and to make possible the return of all refugees and efforts towards a political solution within the framework of the 1981 Declaration on Kampuchea.⁽²³⁾ The Commission asked the Secretary-General urgently to intensify efforts towards a political settlement and restoration of human rights in Kampuchea and requested the Ad Hoc Committee of the International Conference on Kampuchea (see p. 205) to continue its work.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

Acting on the recommendation of its Second Committee in May 1986, the Economic and Social Council adopted decision 1986/146 by recorded vote.

Right of peoples to self-determination and its application to peoples under colonial or alien domination or foreign occupation

At its 19th plenary meeting, on 23 May 1986, the Economic and Social Council fully endorsed Commission on Human Rights resolution 1986/25 of 10 March 1986, by which the Commission, inter alia, reaffirmed that the continuing occupation of Kampuchea by foreign forces deprived the people of Kampuchea of the exercise of their right to self-determination and constituted the primary violation of human rights in Kampuchea at present. The Council reaffirmed its decisions 1981/154 of 8 May 1981, 1982/143 of 7 May 1982, 1983/155 of 27 May 1983, 1984/148 of 24 May 1984 and 1985/155 of 30 May 1985 and reiterated its call for the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Kampuchea in order to allow the people of Kampuchea to exercise their fundamental freedoms and human rights, including the right to self-determination as contained in the Declaration on Kampuchea adopted by the International Conference on Kampuchea on 17 July 1981 and in General Assembly resolutions 34/22 of 14 November 1979, 35/6 of 22 October 1980, 36/5 of 21 October 1981, 37/6 of 28 October 1982, 38/3 of 27 October 1983, 39/5 of 30 October 1984 and 40/7 of 5 November 1985.

The Council expressed its grave concern at the unresolved dilemma of the approximately 250,000 Kampuchean civilians still stranded in Thailand as a result of the armed attacks by the foreign forces in Kampuchea on the Kampuchean civilian encampments along the Thai-Kampuchean border since 1984. The Council recalled the statements made by the Secretary-General on 27 December 1984 and 13 March 1985 which, inter alia, appealed to all concerned to avoid endangering the lives of those Kampuchean civilians and adding, to the misery and deprivation which already afflicted those most unfortunate people.

The Council also expressed its grave concern at the more than one thousand land-mines recently found planted in Thai territory near the Thai-Kampuchean border. The existence of those land-mines and other possible undiscovered minefields has prevented the Kampuchean civilians from exercising their inalienable right to return to their homeland and their right to self-determination. As at February 1986, the land-mines had claimed the lives of twenty-five Thai civilians and injured another one hundred and thirty.

The Council requested the Secretary-General to report to the Council any further violations of humanitarian principles perpetrated against Kampuchean civilian refugees by the foreign occupying troops along the border, and also requested him to continue to monitor closely the developments in Kampuchea and to intensify efforts, including the use of his good offices, to bring about a comprehensive political settlement of the Kampuchean problem and the restoration of fundamental human rights in Kampuchea.

The Council recalled the communiqués issued by the Ad Hoc Committee of the International Conference on Kampuchea on 17 January 1985 and 15 February 1985. The Council noted the visits undertaken by the Chairman and members of the Committee to a number of countries in 1985 in an effort to find a comprehensive political solution to the Kampuchean problem. The Council also noted with appreciation the ongoing efforts of the Committee and requested that the Committee continue its work, pending the reconvening of the Conference.

Economic and Social Council decision 1986/146

41-6-4 (recorded vote)

Approved by Second Committee (E/1986/95) by recorded vote (39-6-3), 21 May (meeting 20); 36-nation draft (E/1986/C.2/L.10); agenda item 9.

Recorded vote in Council as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Australia, Bangladesh, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Djibouti, Egypt, France, Gabon, Germany, Federal Republic of, Guinea, Haiti, Iceland, Indonesia, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Morocco, Nigeria, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Rwanda, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Zaire.

Against: Byelorussian SSR, German Democratic Republic, India, Poland, Syrian Arab Republic, USSR.

Abstaining: Finland, Iraq, Uganda, Zimbabwe.

In Viet Nam's view, the text grossly distorted the actual human rights situation in Kampuchea, failed to take into account the different views of the parties and constituted interference in the internal affairs of a sovereign State. Democratic Kampuchea said the overwhelming support for the text proved that the international community was not indifferent to flagrant violations of the right of Kampucheans to self-determination; Viet Nam's claims about the situation were propaganda to cover its crime.

Although supporting the text, Sweden said it did not subscribe to every formulation in the Commission's March resolution endorsed by the Council.

Palestinians

The Commission on Human Rights, by a resolution adopted on 10 March 1986 by a roll-call vote of 28 to 8, with 7 abstentions,⁽¹⁷⁾ condemned Israel for its non-compliance with United Nations resolutions, for its continued occupation of the Palestinian and other Arab territories, and its aggression and practices against the Palestinians, and demanded its immediate, unconditional and total withdrawal. The Commission reaffirmed the right of the Palestinians to self-determination, to an independent and sovereign State, and to return to their homes and property. It recognized their right to regain their rights by all means in accordance with the Charter, and reaffirmed that their future could be decided only with their participation, through their legitimate and sole representative, PLO.

The Commission rejected all partial agreements and separate treaties in so far as they violated Palestinian rights and contradicted the principles of a comprehensive Middle East solution, as well as any plan for "autonomy" which it considered a disregard of the right to self-determination. Reaffirming its support for the 1983 Geneva Declaration on Palestine⁽²⁴⁾ and for a proposed international peace conference on the Middle East under United Nations auspices (see p. 267), the Commission regretted the negative attitude of Israel and the United States towards such a conference. States, United Nations bodies and other international organizations were urged to support the Palestinians, through PLO, in the struggle to restore their rights.

(For other resolutions dealing with human rights violations in the occupied Arab territories, see p. 771; see also p. 317.)

South Africa and Namibia

On 10 March 1986, the Commission on Human Rights adopted, by a roll-call vote of 31 to 5, with 7 abstentions, a resolution⁽¹⁸⁾ calling on States to take steps to enable the dependent peoples of South Africa and Namibia to exercise fully and without further delay their right to self-determination and independence. It reaffirmed the right of Namibians to self-determination, freedom and independence in a united Namibia, as well as the legitimacy of their struggle and that of the oppressed people of South Africa by all means, including armed struggle. It urged States to assist them and called for the full implementation of the 1983 Paris Declaration and Programme of Action on Namibia.⁽²⁵⁾ Rejecting the so-called "new constitution" as null and void and reiterating that majority rule through full and free adult suffrage was the only guarantee of peace, the Commission demanded full respect for the human rights of all people detained or imprisoned in South Africa because of their struggle for independence, and demanded their immediate release.

It reaffirmed that continued colonialism in all forms and manifestations was incompatible with the Charter, the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights⁽²⁶⁾ and the 1960 Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.⁽²⁷⁾ It condemned South Africa's illegal occupation of Namibia, declaring it an act of aggression, and condemned its attempts to dismember the territory, its repression, torture and killing of workers, schoolchildren and other opponents of apartheid, and the policy of bantustanization.

The Commission condemned collaboration with South Africa, calling on Western and other countries to sever relations with the régime, and condemned the continuing activities of foreign economic and other interests impeding the implementation of the 1960 Declaration. Condemning South Africa's acts of aggression and destabilization against front-line and other neighbouring States, it demanded the withdrawal of South Africa's occupation forces from Angola. Reaffirming that using mercenaries against national liberation movements and States was a criminal act and that mercenaries were criminals, the Commission called on Governments to enact legislation declaring their recruitment, financing, training and transit to be punishable offences, to prohibit their nationals from serving as mercenaries and to report on such legislation to the Secretary-General.

Pursuant to a similar provision of a 1985 Commission resolution⁽²⁸⁾ on self-determination as it applied to South Africa and Namibia, seven Governments provided information on measures against mercenaries, which the Secretary-General summarized in a report⁽²⁹⁾ to the Commission in 1986.

(See also below; for details on a draft convention against mercenaries, see LEGAL QUESTIONS, Chapter II.)

In a related resolution of 28 February,⁽³⁰⁾ the Commission reaffirmed the inalienable right of the oppressed people of South Africa and Namibia to self-determination and independence (see p. 751); in another,⁽³¹⁾ it reiterated that that right could be legally exercised by the Namibians only in accordance with conditions determined by the Security Council in 1978.⁽³²⁾

(For human rights violations in South Africa and Namibia, see p. 745; for details on the situation in Namibia, see TRUSTEESHIP AND DECOLONIZATION, Chapter III.)

Western Sahara

On 10 March 1986,⁽³³⁾ by a roll-call vote of 29 to none, with 13 abstentions, the Commission on Human Rights reaffirmed that the question of Western Sahara was one of decolonization to be completed through the exercise of the people's right to self-determination, and that a political solution lay in the implementation of the 1983 resolution of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) quoted in an Assembly resolution of that year.⁽³⁴⁾ The Commission requested the parties to the conflict to negotiate directly towards bringing about a cease-fire and creating conditions for a referendum for self-determination, welcomed OAU and United Nations efforts to promote a just solution and decided to consider the question again in 1987. (See also TRUSTEESHIP AND DECOLONIZATION, Chapter IV.)

Mercenaries

On 10 March 1986,⁽³⁴⁾ the Commission on Human Rights, by a roll-call vote of 32 to 1, with 10 abstentions, condemned the increased recruitment, financing, training, assembly, transit and use of mercenaries, and so-called humanitarian aid used to destabilize and overthrow the Governments of southern African States and to fight against national liberation movements struggling for self-determination. While denouncing States which persisted in recruiting mercenaries or providing facilities to them, the Commission called on all States to ensure that their territory and other territories under their control, as well as their nationals, were not used for the recruitment, assembly, financing, training or transit of mercenaries and urged them to take legislative measures to ban mercenaries. The Commission invited the Secretary-General to prepare a report on mercenaries and decided to consider the question again in 1987 as a priority matter.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 May 1986, acting on the recommendation of its Second Committee, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1986/43 by recorded vote.

Use of mercenaries as a means to violate human rights and to impede the exercise of the right of peoples to self-determination

The Economic and Social Council,

Bearing in mind the need for strict observance of the principles of sovereign equality, political independence, territorial integrity of States and self-determination of peoples, as well as scrupulous respect for the principle of the non-use or threat of use of force in international relations, enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations and developed in the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations,

Reaffirming the legitimacy of the struggle of peoples and their liberation movements for their independence, territorial integrity, national unity and liberation from colonial domination, apartheid and foreign intervention and occupation,

Deeply concerned about the increasing menace which the activities of mercenaries represent for all States, particularly African States and other developing States of the world,

Recognizing that mercenarism is a threat to international peace and security and, like genocide, is a crime against humanity,

Recognizing also that the activities of mercenaries are contrary to fundamental principles of international law, such as non-interference in the internal affairs of States, territorial integrity and independence, and seriously impede the process of self-determination of peoples struggling against colonialism, racism and apartheid and all forms of foreign domination,

Bearing in mind the provision concerning mercenaries of Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions of 1949,

Recalling the resolutions of the General Assembly, particularly resolutions 1514(XV) of 14 December 1960, 2395(XXIII) of 29 November 1968, 2465(XXIII) of 20 December 1968, 2548(XXIV) of 11 December 1969, 2708(XXV) of 14 December 1970, 3103(XXVIII) of 12 December 1973, 34/140 of 14 December 1979 and 40/74 of 11 December 1985, in which the United Nations denounced the practice of using mercenaries, in particular against developing countries and national liberation movements,

Recalling also Security Council resolutions 239(1967) of 10 July 1967, 405(1977) of 14 April 1977, 419(1977) of 24 November 1977, 496(1981) of 15 December 1981 and 507(1982) of 28 May 1982, in which the Council, inter alia, condemned any State that persisted in permitting or tolerating the recruitment of mercenaries, and the provision of facilities to them, with the objective of overthrowing the Governments of States Members of the United Nations,

Welcoming the adoption by the Commission on Human Rights of resolution 1986/26 of 10 March 1986, in which the Commission condemned the increased recruitment, financing, training, assembly, transit and use of mercenaries,

Reaffirming the decision of the General Assembly, in its resolution 32/130 of 16 December 1977, to accord priority to the search for solutions to the mass and flagrant violations of human rights of peoples and persons affected by situations such as those resulting, inter alia, from aggression and threats against national sovereignty, national unity and territorial integrity,

Recalling the relevant resolutions of the Organization of African Unity and the Convention adopted by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity at its fourteenth ordinary session, held at Libreville from 2 to 5 July 1977, condemning and outlawing mercenarism and its adverse effects on the independence and territorial integrity of African States,

Deeply concerned at the loss of life, substantial damage to property and the long-term negative effects on the economy of southern African countries resulting from mercenary aggression,

Strongly condemning the racist régime of South Africa for its increasing use of groups of armed mercenaries against national liberation movements and for the destabilization of the Governments of southern African States,

1. Condemns the increased recruitment, financing, training, assembly, transit and use of mercenaries, as well as other forms of support to mercenaries, including so-called humanitarian aid, for the purpose of destabilizing and overthrowing the Governments of southern African States and fighting against the national liberation movements of peoples struggling for the exercise of their right of self-determination;

2. Denounces any State that persists in the recruitment, or permits or tolerates the recruitment, of mercenaries and provides facilities to them;

3. Calls upon all States to exercise the utmost vigilance against the menace posed by the activities of mercenaries and to ensure, by both administrative and legislative measures, that their territory and other territories under their control, as well as their nationals, are not used for the recruitment, assembly, financing, training and transit of mercenaries, or the planning of such activities designed to destabilize or overthrow the Government of any State and to fight the national liberation movements struggling against racism, apartheid, colonial domination, foreign intervention and occupation for their independence, territorial integrity and national unity;

4. Urges all States to take the necessary measures under their respective domestic laws to prohibit the recruitment, financing, training and transit of mercenaries on their territory and other territories under their control;

5. Encourages the Ad Hoc Committee on the Drafting of an International Convention against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries to make every effort to complete its mandate and to submit a draft convention to the General Assembly;

6. Urges the Commission on Human Rights to appoint a special rapporteur on this subject with a view to preparing a report for consideration at the forty-fourth session of the Commission;

7. Calls upon the General Assembly to pay due attention to the matter at its forty-first session;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report on this question to the General Assembly at its forty-first session.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/43

23 May 1986 Meeting 19 38-7-8 (recorded vote)

Against: Belgium, France, Germany, Federal Republic of, Italy, Japan, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Australia, Canada, Finland, Iceland, Jamaica, Spain, Sweden, Turkey.

Before acting on the text as a whole, the Council adopted paragraph 6 by a recorded vote of 34 to 13, with 6 abstentions; the Committee had approved that paragraph by a recorded vote of 31 to 13, with 6 abstentions. In addition, the Council adopted the fourth preambular paragraph by a recorded vote of 31 to 11, with 11 abstentions, following its approval in the Committee, also by recorded vote, of 30 to 11, with 8 abstentions.

Nigeria, on behalf of the sponsors, revised the text taking into account proposals by Pakistan, adding at the end of paragraph 3 the words "struggling against racism, apartheid, colonial domination, foreign intervention and occupation for their independence, territorial integrity and national unity". In the first preambular paragraph, the words "as well as scrupulous respect for the principle of the non-use or threat of use of force in international relations" were inserted, and the second preambular paragraph was added.

Pakistan had proposed adding, at the end of paragraph 3, the words "struggling against racism, apartheid, colonial or alien domination or foreign occupation". It had also proposed the inclusion of two preambular paragraphs which would have reaffirmed the purpose and principles of the Charter and the obligation of all States to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of any State; and would have recognized the legitimacy of the struggle of the peoples and their national liberation movements against racism, apartheid, colonial or alien domination or foreign occupation and for the realization of the right of self-determination.

Explaining its vote, the United Kingdom expressed views similar to those it voiced later in the General Assembly's Third Committee (see below), adding that it regretted that the Council was encouraging an overlap with the Assembly's work; it was not sensible for the Council to impose further burdens on the heavy agenda of the Commission on Human Rights by adopting a resolution which went further than the Commission's own resolution.

France regretted that the consensus reached by the international community had been abandoned when the Commission adopted its resolution; the Council text not only retained that resolution's exaggerated wording, particularly in the fourth preambular paragraph, but also called for a misuse of United Nations resources and overburdened the Commission by requesting the appointment of a special rapporteur. Japan considered the special rapporteur's mandate referred to in paragraph 6 to be very broad and ambiguous, and stressed that the financial implications of such an appointment needed consideration.

Australia, Brazil, Canada and Finland objected to the fourth preambular paragraph which recognized mercenarism as a crime against humanity. That paragraph purported to define mercenarism before there was an agreed definition of the term, the United Kingdom remarked. Brazil had doubts as to whether mercenarism could be equated with genocide; in Canada's view, equating those two different concepts diminished the horror the world felt at genocide.

Objections to the appointment of a special rapporteur were further voiced by Canada, Jamaica and Finland, the last speaking also on behalf of Iceland and Sweden. The Nordic members equally could not support paragraph 3, and pointed out that the Assembly's Sixth (Legal) Committee and the Ad Hoc Committee on the Drafting of an International Convention against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries (see LEGAL QUESTIONS, Chapter II) were considering the same issue,

As a member of the Ad Hoc Committee, Jamaica said it preferred to await the outcome of its deliberations before acknowledging the concepts set out in the fourth preambular paragraph. Turkey feared that the Council's text could adversely affect the Committee's work.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 4 December 1986, acting on the recommendation of the Third Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/102 by recorded vote.

Use of mercenaries as a means to violate human rights and to impede the exercise of the right of peoples to self-determination

The General Assembly,

Bearing in mind the need for strict observance of the principles of sovereign equality, political independence, territorial integrity of States and self-determination of peoples, as well as scrupulous respect for the principle of the non-use or threat of the use of force in international relations, enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations and developed in the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations,

Reaffirming the legitimacy of the struggle of peoples and their liberation movements for their independence, territorial integrity, national unity and liberation from colonial domination, apartheid and foreign intervention and occupation, and that their legitimate struggle can in no way be considered as or equated to mercenary activity,

Deeply concerned about the increasing menace that the activities of mercenaries represent for all States, particularly African, Central American and other developing States,

Recognizing that mercenarism is a threat to international peace and security,

Recognizing also that the activities of mercenaries are contrary to fundamental principles of international law, such as non-interference in the internal affairs of States, territorial integrity and independence, and seriously impede the process of self-determination of peoples struggling against colonialism, racism and apartheid and all forms of foreign domination,

Recalling all of its relevant resolutions, particularly resolution 40/74 of 11 December 1985, in which it denounced the practice of using mercenaries, in particular against developing countries and national liberation movements,

Recalling also Security Council resolutions 239(1967) of 10 July 1967, 405(1977) of 14 April 1977, 419(1977)

of 24 November 1977, 496(1981) of 15 December 1981 and 507(1982) of 28 May 1982, in which the Council, inter alia, condemned any State that persisted in permitting or tolerating the recruitment of mercenaries, and the provision of facilities to them, with the objective of overthrowing the Governments of States Members of the United Nations,

Welcoming the adoption by the Economic and Social Council of resolution 1986/43 of 23 May 1986, in which the Council condemned the increased recruitment, financing, training, assembly, transit and use of mercenaries,

Reaffirming its decision, in its resolution 32/130 of 16 December 1977, to accord priority to the search for solutions to the mass and flagrant violations of human rights of peoples and persons affected by situations such as those resulting, inter alia, from aggression and threats against national sovereignty, national unity and territorial integrity,

Recalling the relevant resolutions of the Organization of African Unity and the convention adopted by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity at its fourteenth ordinary session, held at Libreville from 2 to 5 July 1977, condemning and outlawing mercenarism and its adverse effects on the independence and territorial integrity of African States,

Deeply concerned at the loss of life, substantial damage to property and long-term negative effects on the economy of southern African countries resulting from mercenary aggression,

Strongly condemning the racist régime of South Africa for its increasing use of groups of armed mercenaries against national liberation movements and for the destabilization of the Governments of southern African States,

1. Condemns the increased recruitment, financing, training, assembly, transit and use of mercenaries, as well as all other forms of support to mercenaries for the purpose of destabilizing and overthrowing the Governments of southern Africa and Central America and of other developing States and fighting against the national liberation movements of peoples struggling for the exercise of their right to self-determination;

2. Denounces any State that persists in the recruitment, or permits or tolerates the recruitment, of mercenaries and provides facilities to them for launching armed aggression against other States;

3. Calls upon all States to exercise the utmost vigilance against the menace posed by the activities of mercenaries and to ensure, by both administrative and legislative measures, that the territory of those States and other territories under their control, as well as their nationals, are not used for the recruitment, assembly, financing, training and transit of mercenaries, or the planning of such activities designed to destabilize or overthrow the Government of any State and to fight the national liberation movements struggling against racism, apartheid, colonial domination and foreign intervention and occupation for their independence, territorial integrity and national unity;

4. Urges all States to take the necessary measures under their respective domestic laws to prohibit the recruitment, financing, training and transit of mercenaries on their territory;

5. Calls upon all States to extend humanitarian assistance to victims of situations resulting from the use of mercenaries, as well as from colonial or alien domination or foreign occupation;

6. Takes note of Economic and Social Council resolution 1986/43, in which the Council urged the Commission on Human Rights to appoint a special rapporteur on this subject with a view to preparing a report for consideration at the forty-fourth session of the Commission;

7. Decides to pay due attention to the matter at its forty-second session under the item entitled "Importance of the universal realization of the right of peoples to self-determination and of the speedy granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples for the effective guarantee and observance of human rights".

General Assembly resolution 41/102

4 December 1986 Meeting 97 120-11-23 (recorded vote)

Approved by Third Committee (A/41/809) by recorded vote (106-10-29), 5 November (meeting 36); 30-nation draft (A/C.3/41/L.14/Rev.1), orally revised, and amended by Pakistan (A/C.3/41/L.28, para. 1); agenda item 88.

Before acting on the text as a whole, the Assembly adopted paragraph 6 by a recorded vote of 108 to 24, with 17 abstentions; the Committee had approved that paragraph by a recorded vote of 95 to 27, with 17 abstentions. In addition, the Committee approved, by recorded votes, paragraph 1 by 94 to 17, with 25 abstentions, and the third preambular paragraph by 76 to 19, with 43 abstentions. Paragraph 1 incorporated amendments by Pakistan—inserting the word "all" after "as well as" and deleting the words "including so-called humanitarian aid" after "other forms of support to mercenaries"—which were approved by a recorded vote of 57 to 56, with 26 abstentions. The Committee rejected, however, amendments by Costa Rica, El Salvador and Honduras,⁽³⁵⁾ which called for deletion of the mention of Central America in paragraph 1 and in the third preambular paragraph.

The Committee ended its deliberations on the draft by adopting—by a recorded vote of 67 to 42, with 24 abstentions—a motion by Nigeria to close the debate. Following a procedural debate on the original draft and the proposed amendments by Pakistan, the Committee, on a proposal by France, had moved on 28 October to adjourn the debate by a recorded vote of 52 to 44, with 24 abstentions.

Speaking on behalf of the 12 EC members, the United Kingdom felt that the sponsors had ignored the fact that mercenarism was regularly on the Sixth Committee's agenda and that they had departed from the consensus language previously achieved, which would seriously undermine the chances of maintaining consensus in the Sixth Committee and would hardly facilitate the drafting of an international convention. The EC members objected to the fourth preambular paragraph which purported to define mercenarism when there was no agreed definition of the term; they also regarded as inappropriate the recommendation that the Commission appoint a special rapporteur on a question which was a matter concerning relations between States rather than human rights.

Several countries voiced similar concerns. In the view of the United States, the text was part of a campaign to inject extraneous political issues into human rights discussions and duplicate work in progress in the Sixth Committee. In the opinion of Denmark, speaking for the Nordic countries, as well as Japan, the Third Committee was not the proper place to consider the question of mercenaries; the text prejudged the outcome of the work of the Ad hoc Committee on the drafting of an international convention, Japan considered. Australia, Austria, Israel and Oman also pointed out that the Sixth Committee was dealing with the issue. Morocco wondered in which developing countries there was an increase in the use of mercenaries, as stated in paragraph 1; also, far from concentrating on the situation in southern Africa, the text brought in questions which were being discussed in more appropriate forums. Like Japan, Austria and Turkey felt that the text might have a negative impact on the work of the Ad Hoc Committee. Australia and Austria rejected paragraph 6, as they opposed the appointment of a special rapporteur.

France objected to the text's wording and to the way in which it had been drafted and negotiated; it regretted that the possibility of making comments had been denied.

The Sudan said its vote reflected its position taken in OAU—that Africa was the continent most seriously affected by the problem of mercenaries. Senegal condemned mercenarism anywhere, adding that Africa was one of its principal victims; it regretted that the sponsors did not consider all aspects of the question.

Mali had objected to the reference to humanitarian aid in paragraph 1 (subsequently deleted by an amendment). Iran said that, while it supported the principles of humanitarian aid, such aid had been misused for political reasons in some instances; the revised text took that into account and Pakistan's amendments were therefore unnecessary.

Having abstained on Council resolution 1986/43, Jamaica had reservations on the eighth preambular paragraph. Costa Rica, supported by Honduras, objected to the singling out of Central America. Argentina resolutely condemned the use of mercenaries anywhere. Chile declared it would not participate in the vote as the text's content had nothing to do with human rights. Peru supported the text on the understanding that the liberation movements mentioned were those struggling against colonial and foreign occupation and apartheid; it would have preferred a more precise definition of mercenarism.

Introducing the revised draft in the Committee, Nigeria stressed that, contrary to some statements, it did not duplicate the one on the drafting of an international convention to be submitted to the Sixth Committee; while the latter was dealing with the concept of mercenarism, the Third Committee, like the Commission on Human Rights and the Economic and Social Council, was considering the consequences of that concept on human life and survival. The text dealt with human rights and self-determination, questions well within the Committee's competence. In a spirit of compromise, the sponsors had agreed to delete, at the end of the fourth preambular paragraph, the words "and, like genocide, is a crime against humanity".

Rights of detained persons

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 4 December 1986, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 41/149 without vote.

Human rights in the administration of justice

The General Assembly,

Guided by the principles embodied in articles 3, 5, 9, 10 and 11 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, as well as the relevant provisions of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, in particular article 6, which explicitly states that no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his life,

Guided also by the relevant principles embodied in the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment and in the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination,

Calling attention to the Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power and the safeguards guaranteeing protection of the rights of those facing the death penalty, approved by the Economic and Social Council in its resolution 1984/50 of 25 May 1984 and endorsed by the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders,

Calling attention also to the Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary, the Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement Officials and the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners,

Considering the importance of progress with regard to the draft Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment,

Recalling its resolutions 2858(XXVI) of 20 December 1971, 3144(XXVIII) of 14 December 1973 and 40/146 of 13 December 1985 on human rights in the administration of justice,

Acknowledging the important work accomplished by the Committee on Crime Prevention and Control at its ninth session and by the Economic and Social Council, as reflected in Council resolution 1986/10 of 21 May 1986,

Convinced of the need for further co-ordinated and concerted action in promoting respect for human rights in the administration of justice,

1. Deplores the continued use of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, prohibited under international law, and strongly condemns the practice of summary or arbitrary executions;

2. Welcomes the recommendations made by the Economic and Social Council in its resolution 1986/10 on the more effective application of the Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power, the Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary, the Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement Officials and the safeguards guaranteeing protection of the rights of those facing the death penalty;

3. Welcomes also the recommendations made by the Economic and Social Council in its resolution 1986/10 on the prevention and investigation of extra-legal, arbitrary or summary executions and on new developments in the area of human rights in criminal justice and international co-operation, including the role of lawyers and model agreements in criminal justice;

4. Encourages the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities of the Commission on Human Rights to give urgent consideration to the issue of the independence and impartiality of the judiciary, jurors and assessors and the independence of lawyers, taking into account the report of its Special Rapporteur on this subject;

5. Reiterates its call upon Member States to spare no effort in providing for adequate mechanisms, procedures and resources so as to ensure the more effective implementation of existing standards, both in legislation and in practice;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to assist Member States, at their request, in implementing these standards;

7. Also requests the Secretary-General to continue to employ his best endeavours in cases where the safeguards guaranteeing protection of the rights of those facing the death penalty are violated and to give his full support to the Special Rapporteur of the Sub-Commission so as to permit him to respond effectively to such violations and to promote the safeguards;

8. Requests the Economic and Social Council and, through it, the Committee on Crime Prevention and

Control to keep these matters under constant review and to continue to give special attention to effective ways and means of implementing existing standards and to new developments in this area;

9. Invites the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system, as well as intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations concerned, to continue to co-operate with the Secretary-General in these endeavours;

10. Decides to consider at its forty-second session the question of human rights in the administration of justice.

Draft principles for the protection of detainees

In 1986, a Working Group open to all members of the General Assembly's Sixth Committee continued work on a draft Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment. The draft originated from a text adopted by the Sub-Commission in 1978,⁽³⁶⁾ which had since undergone revisions by a succession of working groups: of the Third Committee in 1980;⁽³⁷⁾ and of the Sixth Committee in 1981,⁽³⁸⁾ 1982,⁽³⁹⁾ 1983,⁽⁴⁰⁾ 1984⁽⁴¹⁾ and 1985.⁽⁴²⁾

The 1986 Working Group, established pursuant to a 1985 Assembly decision,⁽⁴³⁾ met in New York between 23 September and 21 November. In order to complete its first reading of the draft Body of Principles prepared by the Sub-Commission, the Group examined principle 22, paragraph 2, and principles 23 to 28, which covered: access to a detainee's medical records; admissibility of evidence; the right to obtain educational, cultural and informational material while imprisoned; prison inspection by a person not subject to the control of that prison's authority and the prisoner's right to speak freely and confidentially with that person; the specification by law and the publication of conduct constituting disciplinary offences, as well as a description of corresponding disciplinary punishment; the right to be heard before disciplinary action was taken; assistance to dependent family members of detainees; and the right to challenge the lawfulness of one's detention.

The Working Group provisionally adopted definitions of the terms "arrest", "detained person", "imprisoned person", "detention" and "imprisonment". It also provisionally adopted principle 13 concerning a prisoner's entitlement to receive information by the arresting authorities in a comprehensible language and to have free of charge assistance of an interpreter in connection with legal proceedings. The approved provisional texts of the articles were annexed to the Group's report to the Sixth Committee.⁽⁴⁴⁾

In December, on the recommendation of the Sixth Committee, the General Assembly adopted decision 41/418 without vote.

Draft Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment

At its 95th plenary meeting, on 3 December 1986, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Sixth Committee:

(a) Took note with appreciation of the report of the Working Group on the Draft Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment and of the progress achieved by the Working Group during the forty-first session of the General Assembly;

(b) Decided that an open-ended working group of the Sixth Committee would be established at its forty-second session in order to conduct a further examination of the draft Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment with a view to the completion of the principles;

(c) Requested the Secretary-General to circulate to Member States the report of the open-ended Working Group established at the forty-first session;

(d) Decided to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-second session the item entitled "Draft Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment".

General Assembly decision 41/418

Adopted without vote

Approved by Sixth Committee (A/41/896) without vote, 25 November (meeting 53); draft by Sweden (A/C.6/41/L.21), orally revised; agenda item 134. Meeting numbers. GA 41st session: 6th Committee 2, 53; plenary 95.

Torture and cruel treatment

Report of the Special Rapporteur. In February 1986, Special Rapporteur Peter H. Kooijmans (Netherlands), appointed by the Commission on Human Rights in 1985,⁽⁴²⁾ submitted a report on torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment,⁽⁴⁵⁾ based on information received from Governments and NGOs. Having received from different sources numerous materials containing allegations of torture, the Rapporteur decided to consider 33 country situations. Information from 43 countries concerning their domestic legislation was also taken into consideration. In addition, he held private consultations with government representatives, NGOs and individuals.

The Rapporteur concluded that torture was widespread and in some countries occurred systematically, while in others it resulted from passivity on the part of the authorities or was practised to stamp out all traces of opposition. In yet other countries, the infliction of severe physical pain was part of the penal system.

The Rapporteur recommended that: Governments ratify the 1984 Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment,⁽⁴⁶⁾ and enact legislation to prosecute and punish those who committed torture; incom-municado detention be limited to seven days, during which time the detainee should be visited regularly by a doctor and, after that period, have the right to see a lawyer and/or doctor of his own choice; a detained person be able to initiate court proceedings on the lawfulness of his detention; interrogation procedures be made subject to scrutiny by the authorities; interrogation of detainees be held at official interrogation centres; and all security and law enforcement personnel be provided with the 1979 Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement Officials⁽⁴⁷⁾ and receive instruction on its requirements.

He also advocated setting up a commission of government representatives, including law enforcement and prison authorities, the judiciary and professional groups, to inspect the conditions of detainees and make recommendations to the authorities. Personnel in the health field should be instructed on the 1982 Principles of Medical Ethics,⁽⁴⁸⁾ and police and security personnel should receive manuals containing specific material on the treatment of detainees and prisoners adapted to local circumstances. He recommended compensation to victims or their relatives and export regulations prohibiting the transfer of material and equipment used to practise torture.

Human Rights Commission action. Taking note of the report, the Commission on Human Rights, on 13 March 1986,⁽⁴⁹⁾ extended for another year the Special Rapporteur's mandate. In carrying out his mandate, he should continue to seek information from Governments, specialized agencies and inter- and non-governmental organizations. He was requested to report in 1987 on the occurrence and extent of torture, submitting also conclusions and recommendations. The Secretary-General was asked to assist him.

The Commission's decision and requests were approved by the Economic and Social Council on 23 May by decision 1986/138.
