Statement on the fiftieth anniversary of the Council of Europe issued on 5 May 1999 by the Presidency of the European Union

I. As the Council of Europe reaches its fiftieth anniversary, the European Union pays tribute to the achievements of this organization. It reaffirms its attachment to the fundamental values of the Council of Europe, reconfirmed by the second Council of Europe summit in 1997, of pluralist democracy, respect for human rights and the rule of law. As the community of European nations strives to build a Europe based on these principles, their gross and systematic violation in Kosovo is a brutal reminder that the endeavour is far from being completed.

The Treaty signed in London on 5 May 1949, four years after the end of a war which had torn Europe apart, was a genuine founding act. It was not limited to establishing links of friendship, interest or alliance between its parties; it aimed to safeguard and promote a number of values and principles shared by those parties through an international institutional framework capable of exerting influence on the development of societies in Europe.

The European Union expresses its appreciation for the key role played in the past 50 years by the Council of Europe, not least its contribution, through its rapid enlargement, to European reconstruction. The Council of Europe has played a major part in the recognition that fundamental human values should form the basis for the emergence of a democratic society throughout the European continent. Its enlargement as a response to the political changes in Europe has further enhanced the relevance of the organization. The Union welcomes Georgia's accession as forty-first member State. It hopes that the remaining applicant countries will soon bring their institutions and legislation into line with the requirements of the Council of Europe and resolve any conflicts between them so that they will also be able to join the organization.

The European Union stresses the importance of full compliance with membership obligations and expects that all member States of the Council of Europe will fulfil their commitments to the organization.

II. The Council of Europe has developed unique expertise and acquis in the field of democracy and human rights. The European Union underlines the essential standard-setting role in the field of human rights played by the Council, the only organization in Europe with a monitoring system for the protection of individual human rights which is binding under international law. Central to this system is the European Convention on Human Rights, as ratified by all member States. The Convention must remain the essential reference point for the protection of human rights in Europe as a whole in terms of both guaranteed rights and of judicial control of respect for those rights.

The Council of Europe has developed an original model in which the monitoring mechanisms of the Committee of Ministers and the Parliamentary Assembly complement the independent judicial control exercised by the European Court of Human Rights. The new European Court of Human Rights, inaugurated in November 1998, further consolidates this model. The European Union also welcomes the establishment of the post of a Council of Europe Commissioner for Human Rights and believes that the Commissioner will add to the effectiveness of the organization's monitoring structures. It looks forward to working with the Commissioner to promote awareness of and respect for human rights throughout Council of Europe member States.

The protection of persons belonging to national minorities forms a major part of the Council's acquis, as illustrated by the Framework Convention on Minorities, and an area in which the organization has demonstrated its ability to formulate standards to meet the particular needs of modern Europe. The importance of these standards is made even more obvious by the current situation in South-east Europe.

The European Union also seizes the opportunity offered by the fiftieth anniversary of the Council of Europe to underline the particular importance it attaches to Protocol No. 6 to the European Convention on Human Rights concerning the abolition of the death penalty. It calls upon all member States of the Council of Europe to abide by their commitment to establish moratoria on executions, to be consolidated by complete abolition of the death penalty.

The Council of Europe has important tasks, relevant for the whole of Europe, in the field of public health, cultural cooperation and social cohesion. The European Union recognizes the value and importance of these tasks.

III. The European Union and the Council of Europe share the same goals with regard to the protection and promotion of the principles of liberty, democracy and respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and the rule of law. The protection of these principles, enshrined in the Treaty on European Union, is further reinforced in the Amsterdam Treaty.

The Union is examining ways to reinforce its capacity to protect and promote human rights. The Declaration by the Union adopted on 10 December 1998 and endorsed by the Vienna European Council, on the fiftieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights identified avenues to that end.

The European Union and the Council of Europe join forces and complement their respective actions towards their shared goals, notably by implementing a number of joint programmes for cooperation and assistance to Central and Eastern European countries. The European Union welcomes the concrete results of those programmes and looks forward to their further development. The recent agreement between the European Community and the Council of Europe for close cooperation between the European Monitoring Centre against Racism and Xenophobia and the Council of Europe's European Committee against Racism and Intolerance is a further illustration of these joint efforts. Finally, the Council of Europe's experience will be useful for the European Union in its current enlargement process.

IV. The European Union encourages the work under way, on the basis of the report of the Committee of Wise Persons, to define the Council of Europe's priorities and objectives for the twenty-first century and to reorganize and make more efficient the council's structures and working methods. Based on the report to be presented to the Budapest Ministerial Council, the European Union will support action to implement the far-reaching reforms aimed at defining those priorities and will contribute actively to that process.

Future priorities in consolidating the place and role of the Council of Europe in Europe will include a reaffirmation of the essence of the Council as guardian of human rights and pluralist democracy through its normative and judicial activity to promote democratic security. They will also include the need for further development of relations between the Council of Europe and the European Union as well as other European and transatlantic organizations, in particular the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe. In this context, the European Union welcomes the efforts towards enhanced cooperation and complementarity between the Council of Europe and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe in the light of their common principles and goals.

The Union sees advantage in using to the fullest, in cooperation with other international institutions, the expertise and mechanisms of the Council of Europe to advance the objectives of upholding human rights standards and supporting pluralist democracy.
