On 6 June,(34) the Secretary-General reported to the Security Council on progress made in creating conditions for unimpeded delivery of humanitarian aid to Bosnia and Herzegovina, including the establishment of a security zone encompassing Sarajevo and its airport, as had been demanded by the Council in resolution 757(1992).

In keeping with the Council's request in that resolution that the Secretary-General continue using his good offices to achieve those objectives, the Commander of UNPROFOR sent Cedric Thornberry, UNPROFOR Director of Civil Affairs, on 2 June, to negotiate with the parties to the conflict. Mr. Thornberry, assisted by Colonel John Wilson, the Chief Military Observer at UNPROFOR headquarters in Sarajevo, engaged in intensive discussions over a three-day period with representatives of the presidency at that republic, leaders of the Croatian Democratic Party, Radovan Karadzic and other leaders of the self-proclaimed "Serbian Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina", as well as General Mladic.

The discussions centred on reopening Sarajevo airport for humanitarian purposes, under exclusive United Nations authority. On 5 June, an agreement to that effect was signed by all members of the presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and separately by Mr. Karadzic for the Bosnian S e r b s i d e ,

The agreement, the text of which was annexed to the Secretary-General's report, called for UNPROFOR to take over full operational responsibility for the airport, supervising operations, controlling its facilities and organization, facilitating the unloading of humanitarian cargo and ensuring the safe movement of cargo and related personnel. UNPROFOR would also verify the withdrawal of anti-aircraft weapons systems from within range of the airport and its approaches and monitor the concentration of artillery, mortar and ground-to-ground missile systems in specified areas. Such an additional mandate would require the consent of the Council, which would have to approve a corresponding increase in UNPROFOR's strength.

A four-phase plan was envisaged by the Force Commander to implement the agreement. In phase I, United Nations military observers would be deployed to Sarajevo to supervise the withdrawal of anti-aircraft weapons and the concentration of heavy weapons at agreed locations. Simultaneously, technical personnel would evaluate the airport's serviceability, the condition of its equipment and measures required to control and receive aircraft, unload stores and control the flow of humanitarian aid. In phase 2, an infantry battalion would be deployed to ensure the airport's security. During phase 3, civilian personnel required to operate the airport, as well as representatives of humanitarian agencies, would be deployed there. In phase 4, the air-port would be opened for humanitarian and official flights. The four phases were expected to take 10 days to implement, following a decision of the Council. The special regime would be maintained until normal conditions were restored to Sarajevo.

In order to undertake those tasks, the Force Commander proposed to establish a fifth UNPROFOR sector headquarters at Sarajevo, without prejudice to the re-establishment of UNPROFOR headquarters there as soon as security conditions permitted. The additional strength needed would require a reinforced infantry battalion of 1,000 persons; 60 military observers; additional military and civilian staff for Sarajevo Sector headquarters; 40 civilian police to supervise the functioning of the airport; and possibly some technical personnel, engineers and airport staff. Armoured personnel carriers and other vehicles, as well as communications equipment and defence stores, would also be needed.

Although only a first step towards fulfilment of the requirements of resolution 757(1992), the agreement represented a significant breakthrough in the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Secretary-General believed. In keeping with that resolution, he had requested the Force Commander to pursue negotiation of a broader security zone encompassing the city of Sarajevo as a whole.

The opportunity afforded by the willingness of the parties to agree to the reopening of Sarajevo airport should be seized, the Secretary-General said. Given that heavy weapons would remain in the hills overlooking Sarajevo and its airport, albeit supervised by UNPROFOR, the viability of the agreement depended on the parties, especially the Bosnian Serb party, scrupulously honouring their commitments. It would also be necessary to elaborate further the question of security corridors, initially between the air-port and city and in due course beyond; in order to permit the distribution of the humanitarian supplies Flown in.

The proposed operation involved significant risks, as many past agreements had been broken. However, the humanitarian emergency grew more severe by the day, creating an ever-increasing need to bring the fighting under control. Successful implementation of the 5 June agreement, which also reaffirmed the existing cease-fire agreement, would serve both humanitarian and political objectives.

The Secretary-General estimated that enlarging the mandate of UNPROFOR as recommended would cost an additional $20.1 million for the first four months until mid-October, and approximately $3 million for each month thereafter.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (8 June)

On 8 June, the Security Council convened to consider the Secretary-General's 6 June report and unanimously adopted resolution 758(1992).

security Council resolution 758(1992)

8 June 1992 Meeting 3083 Adopted unanimously
Draft prepared in consultations among council, members (S/24078).

Report of the Secretary-General (15 June). On 15 June,(35) the Secretary-General reported to the Council on implementation of the cease-fire of 12 April and other aspects of resolution 752(1992), as well as on the efforts to reopen Sarajevo airport, as requested by resolution 758(1992).

Following repeated cease-fire violations, a new cease-fire was negotiated by UNPROFOR on 1 June, which again was broken within hour-s of its signing. It was subsequently reaffirmed in the 5 June agreement on the reopening of Sarajevo airport, which too was not respected for several days.

As a result of the evacuation of JNA from the previously blockaded Marshal Tito barracks at Sarajevo, the Territorial Defence force of Bosnia and Herzegovina was reported to have acquired artillery which it used to try to extend the territory under its control. Bosnian Serb forces continued to use their own artillery to bombard Sarajevo, causing further severe damage. On 11 June, Mr. Karadzic, one of the signatories to the airport agreement, announced a further "unilateral cease-fire" effective 15 June, which President Izetbegovic denounced in a 13 June letter to the Secretary-General as an attempt to deceive the United Nations and world opinion. None the less, on 14 June both sides reaffirmed a new cease-fire as of 0600 hours on 15 June, which appeared to be generally holding.

With regard to cooperation with the EC efforts to bring about a negotiated political solution, the Secretary-General reported that the EC-sponsored talks on future constitutional arrangements in Bosnia and Herzegovina were suspended on 27 May, when the Muslim SDA Party withdrew in protest against the continued shelling of Sarajevo by Bosnian Serb forces. Subsequently, the leaders of SDA reiterated their unwillingness to return to the negotiating table and, by a letter of 8 June to Lord Carrington, President Izetbegovic expressed his inability to negotiate further with the Serbian SDS Party. In reply, Lord Carrington urged him to participate fully and expressed the hope that the President would attend the next round of discussions to be convened in the near future. Members of the presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina reaffirmed that they could resume participation in the talks only if the basis for discussion were changed. Mr. Karadzic, leader of the Serbian SDS Party, confirmed his willingness to participate in the talks and urged that they be reconvened immediately.

Throughout that process, the Secretary-General assured Lord Carrington of continued support for his efforts towards an overall political settlement and of his conviction that the strengthening of the political process was a sine qua non for finding a solution to the tragic impasse and for arresting further bloodshed and destruction. On 12 June, Lord Carrington reiterated his intention to resume the talks and announced that he and Ambassador Cutileiro would go to Sarajevo as soon as the airport was reopened.

Interference from forces outside Bosnia and Herzegovina had continued over the preceding two weeks, despite the Council's demand in resolution 752(1992) that such activities stop. Authorities in Belgrade and Zagreb insisted that they were not interfering militarily in the republic and that the armed Serbs and Croats there were citizens of Bosnia and Herzegovina and not under their authority. A matter of great concern remained that both sides had been permitted to retain control over their tanks, armoured personnel carriers, artillery, personal weapons and uniforms, and there was reason to believe that both Serb and Croat combatants continued to receive at least part of their financial and logistic support from outside.

Delivery of humanitarian assistance to an increasingly deprived population was gravely complicated by persistent fighting. On 24 May, UNHCR suspended deliveries of humanitarian relief supplies within the republic when it became clear that the security guarantees negotiated with political and military leaders were not respected by local gunmen manning a profusion of road-blocks. ICRC, having stopped its relief operations since the killing of one of its delegates on 18 May, negotiated a new security agreement with the parties to the conflict on 6 June at Geneva. Both organizations intended to resume operations in Bosnia and Herzegovina shortly.

Following the adoption of resolution 758(1992) regarding reopening of Sarajevo airport, the Force Commander on 10 June dispatched his Chief of Staff, Brigadier-General Lewis MacKenzie, to Sarajevo as Commander-designate of UNPROFOR's new Sarajevo Sector. General MacKenzie was accompanied by some United Nations military observers and Canadian reconnaissance elements. On 12 June, he was joined by a 50-person airport security team provided by France. A further 60 military observers, drawn from two existing peace-keeping operations, were to arrive at Sarajevo on 16 June. The task of General MacKenzie's advance party was to establish the cease-fire, start evaluating conditions at the airport and verify the withdrawal of anti-aircraft and heavy weaponry as provided for in the 5 June agreement.

For the first three days, it proved impossible for General MacKenzie's advance mission to reach the airport, partly due to widespread fighting in areas they had to cross en route, but also because they came under fire from Bosnian Serb elements who appeared not to accept the 5 June agreement and were seemingly not prepared to allow the airport to be placed under United Nations control.

On 14 June, however, General MacKenzie was able to achieve three of his immediate objectives: he obtained separate reaffirmations of the cease-fire from the presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina as well as from the Bosnian Serb side; the resulting cease-fire came into effect at 0600 hours on 15 June and, at least initially, appeared to be holding. With the cooperation of the Bosnian Serb side and under its escort, he was able to dispatch a 30-man reconnaissance team to the airport. Lastly, he made significant progress in discussing the withdrawal of heavy weapons from within airport range; a definitive agreement on that question was expected to be signed shortly.

In spite of the limited progress made in controlling and resolving the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Secretary-General believed that the international community should remain firm in its determination to put into effect the mechanisms it had established to end the fighting, relieve human suffering and broker a just and lasting political settlement. For the time being, the opposing parties displayed no willingness to honour the agreements they had signed or to utilize the problem-solving mechanisms provided by the international community.

Political negotiation offered the only real hope of restoring peace, the Secretary-General said. He therefore joined Lord Carrington in appealing to all concerned to return to the negotiating table.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (18 June)

Following consideration of the Secretary-General's report, the Security Council, on 18 June, unanimously adopted resolution 760(1992).

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 752(1992) of 15 May 1992, 757(1992) of 30 May 1992 and 758(1992) of 8 June 1992, and in particular paragraph 7 of resolution 752(1992), in which it emphasized the urgent need for humanitarian assistance and fully supported the current efforts to deliver humanitarian aid to all the victims of the conflict,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

Decides that the prohibitions in paragraph 4 (c) of resolution 757(1992) concerning the sale or supply to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) of commodities or products, other than medical supplies and foodstuffs, and the prohibitions against financial transactions related thereto, contained in resolution 757(1992), shall not apply, with the approval of the Committee established by resolution 724(1991) under the simplified and accelerated "no objection" procedure, to commodities and products for essential humanitarian need.

18 June 1992 Meeting 3086 Adopted unanimously
Draft prepared in consultations among Council members (S/24114).

Oral reports of the Secretary-General (26 and 29 June). Pursuant to resolution 758(1992), the Secretary-General made statements to the Security Council on 26 and 29 June(36) on the situation in Sarajevo and the most recent developments surrounding its airport.

The situation in the city had deteriorated considerably on 26 June, he said. Bosnian Serb forces had increased their bombardment of the area of Dobrinja, clearly attempting to capture that suburb of Sarajevo close to the airport. Tank and infantry attacks were carried out and heavy artillery was used against civilians, despite a public agreement of the previous day to stop shelling civilian areas. The forces of the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina retaliated, but UNPROFOR had no doubt that primary responsibility for the current bloodshed lay with the Serb forces.

The Secretary-General condemned the attacks and called for an end to them. A further military advance into Dobrinja was incompatible with the 5 June agreement, the basis for UNPROFOR's endeavour to open Sarajevo airport. Unless the current military offensive ended and there was evidence over the next 48 hours of actual relocation of heavy weaponry to areas of concentration supervised by UNPROFOR, the Secretary-General said he would have to reassess the feasibility of the Force's implementing the 5 June agreement; it would then be up to the Council to determine what other means would be required to bring relief to the suffering people of Sarajevo.

By 29 June, considerable progress towards UNPROFOR's assuming responsibility for the airport was reported by the Force Commander. Serb forces had been withdrawing from the airport and both sides had begun to concentrate their heavy weapons in locations to be supervised by UNPROFOR. An absolute cease-fire had yet to be achieved, but the Force Commander recommended that UNPROFOR seize the opportunity afforded by those developments. Accordingly, the Secretary-General requested the Council to grant him the authorization foreseen in resolution 758(1992) to deploy the additional UNPROFOR elements needed to secure the airport and make it operational.

If the Council agreed, the Secretary-General would instruct the Force Commander to redeploy to Sarajevo airport on an interim basis the Canadian battalion currently in Sector West of Croatia; request France to make available immediately the air-traffic and airlift control elements it had offered; and request the countries concerned to deploy three smaller battalions to Sarajevo. Those battalions would replace the Canadian battalion, which would return to its duties in Croatia.

In view of the pattern of recent fighting, the Secretary-General requested that the Council join him in appealing to the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina to exercise utmost restraint, in particular not to seek any military advantage from the Serb withdrawal; the humanitarian objectives of UNPROFOR's action must be kept firmly in mind by all parties. In that connection, President Mitterrand of France had informed the Secretary-General in advance of his visit to Sarajevo on 28 June and later briefed him on the results, stressing that his objectives coincided with those of the United Nations.

As requested by the Force Commander, the Secretary-General urged Member States to delay humanitarian flights to Sarajevo until the airport was fully under UNPROFOR control and all heavy weapons were concentrated at UNPROFOR-supervised locations. Arrangements for operation of the airport and for the reception and distribution of humanitarian supplies were not yet complete; he would report on 1 July on progress achieved in that regard.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (29 June)

The Security Council met on 29 June to consider the Secretary-General's oral reports in accordance with an understanding reached in prior consultations. The Council unanimously adopted resolution 761(1992).

Reaffirming its resolutions 713(1991) of 25 September 1991, 721(1991) of 27 November 1991, 724(1991) of 15 December 1991, 727(1992) of 8 January 1992, 740(1992) of 7 February 1992, 743(1992) of 21 February 1992, 749(1992) of 7 April 1992, 752(1992) of 15 May 1992, 757(1992) of 30 May 1992, 758(1992) of 8 June 1992 and 760(1992) of 18 June 1992,

Noting the considerable progress reported by the Secretary-General towards securing the evacuation of Sarajevo airport and its reopening by UNPROFOR and feeling the need to maintain this favourable momentum, Underling the urgency of a quick delivery of humanitarian assistance to sarajevo and its environs

1. Authorizes the Secretary-General to deploy immediately additional elements of the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR) to ensure the security and functioning of Sarajevo airport and the delivery of humanitarian assistance in accordance with his report dated 6 June 1992;

2. Calls upon all parties and others concerned too comply fully with the agreement of 5 June 1992 and in particular to maintain an absolute and unconditional cease-tire;

3. Appeals to all sides to cooperate fully with UNPROFOR in the reopening of the airport, to exercise the utmost restraint and not to seek any military advantage in this situation;

4. Demands that all parties and others concerned cooperate fully with UNPROFOR and international humanitarian agencies and organizations and take all necessary steps to ensure the safety of their personnel; in the absence of such cooperation, the Security Council does not exclude other measures to deliver humanitarian assistance to Sarajevo and its environs;

5. Calls upon all states to contribute to the international humanitarian efforts in sarajevo and its environs
6. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Security Council resolution 761(1992)
29 June 1992 Meeting 3087 adopted unanimously
Draft prepared in Consultations Council members (S/24199).

Communication and report of the Secretary-General (1 and 10 July). As indicated in his statement of 29 June, the Secretary-General reported to the Security Council in a letter of 1 July(37) on developments with regard to the reopening of Sarajevo airport. Fighting continued in the area around the airport and in the nearby suburb of Dobrinja, endangering the safety of both personnel and aircraft. The process of heavy-weapons concentration to locations supervised by United Nations military observers was not complete. There was debris on the runway, and mines remaining in several parts of the airport were susceptible to accidental detonation.

The Canadian battalion travelling from UNPROFOR Sector West in Croatia to rake up security functions at the airport had encountered unexpected difficulties and was expected to arrive on 2 July. Air-traffic and airlift control elements offered by France had arrived, as had an infantry company from France. An UNPROFOR convoy arriving from Belgrade had brought in movement-control and technical personnel as well as a detachment of marines who were being deployed at the airport. Rudimentary air-traffic control functions were being performed by a skeleton staff and manual discharging of cargo was raking place, while UNHCR was endeavouring to make the necessary arrangements for onward distribution of supplies that might be landed at the airport.

In order to avoid any slackening of the momentum generated by the withdrawal of Serb forces from the airport, UNPROFOR operated the airport within those constraints. Several French aircraft had been able to fly in under visual flight rules, bringing military personnel as well as some humanitarian aid, which was distributed under the auspices of UNHCR. Efforts continued to improve security, establish more complete air-traffic control and improve arrangements for the unloading and distribution of relief items.

On 10 July,(38) the Secretary-General reported that despite the endeavours of UNPROFOR's Sector Commander, General MacKenzie, the cease-fire agreed to on 1 June and reaffirmed on 5 June had not been fully established. Artillery, mortar, tank and small-arms exchanges had taken place each day since the United Nations Flag was raised on 29 June and the airport was opened by the first flight carrying humanitarian aid. Nor had the concentration of weaponry under UNPROFOR observation been completed. While humanitarian aid had been moved into the city by convoys of UNPROFOR and UNHCR, secure corridors had not been established.

On a number of occasions since 29 June, fighting had come very close to the airport, although installations, aircraft and airport personnel themselves had not been targeted. Such fighting had none the less been intense at times and sniper fire had been directed at UNPROFOR vehicles, although UNHCR aid vehicles were not attacked.

By 9 July at 2200 hours, more than 100 planes from 15 countries carrying over 1,000 metric tons of food and humanitarian aid had arrived at the airport. On some days, as many as 17 had landed; on 5 July, 300 tons of aid were brought in and unloaded, and, despite manual ground-handling only, 240 tons were moved that day to distribution points in the city, and many aircraft were able to depart within an hour of arrival. Such high standards had been maintained in spite of considerable constraints, as mentioned in the Secretary-General's July letter.

There had been a gradual buildup of UNPROFOR personnel in the Sector. The first group of 30 was deployed to the airport on 28 June. French troops began to arrive on 1 July and the Canadian battalion—which was to be replaced upon the arrival of battalions from Egypt, France and Ukraine around 20 to 25 July—arrived on 2 July. By 3 July, all available United Nations military observers and troops were deployed at the airport, with the two sides, and at other locations in Sarajevo. Current UNPROFOR personnel in the Sector, including military, UNCIVPOL and civilians, numbered 1,104.

UNHCR staff at the airport were working with UNPROFOR in the control of relief flights, having been granted by Governments the full facilitation of this coordinating role, as requested by the Secretary-General. UNHCR then ensured the expeditious dispatch of relief items to Sarajevo and its environs. Sadako Ogata, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, visited Sarajevo on 8 July to review the relief operations.

On 5 July, the Force Commander inspected the UNPROFOR operation in the Sarajevo Sector. He noted that despite highly difficult circumstances, General MacKenzie and the elements under his leadership were doing a magnificent job. As the operation was taking shape, however, it was apparent that the initial personnel estimates for an UNPROFOR rake-over of the airport, as put forward in the Secretary-General's 6 June report⁽³⁴⁾ and approved by the Council in resolution 758(1992), would not be enough. The updated estimate was 1,600 additional personnel—as opposed to the original 1,000—in order to provide for three small battalions rather than one reinforced battalion, as well as for air-traffic control and handling elements, an artillery-locating radar platoon, a helicopter unit, and a signals and a medical platoon. The revised staff costs would amount to $22.7 million instead of $20.1 million from mid-July to mid-October; thereafter the monthly cost would be approximately $3.8 million.

Despite an encouraging start of the operation, the Secretary-General warned that the surrounding circumstances remained worrisome. Three of the basic conditions of the 5 June agreement—cease-fire, complete concentration of heavy weaponry under UNPROFOR monitoring and establishment of security corridors—had not been complied with by either side. Several UNPROFOR military staff members had been slightly wounded by gunfire and one soldier lost part of his leg in a mine explosion on 9 July. Fighting continued, with only temporary lulls in Sarajevo and all around the airport itself. Forces opposed to those of the Serbian SDS Parry appeared to be seeking to leverage the advantage resulting from the transfer of the airport to UNPROFOR. SDS forces in turn continued to respond with heavy weapons into populated area A military advance by Croatian forces towards Sarajevo was reported by several sources, but could not be independently verified by UNPROFOR.

Due to limited resources and security, UNPROFOR was unable to respond to the many requests it had received for humanitarian evacuation. The situation at the airport, on the outskirts and in the city, coupled with operational considerations, made it impossible to consider initiatives for the evacuation by air of cases of special humanitarian concern. Nevertheless, options for the evacuation of critical medical cases were being reviewed; if feasible, they would take place in close coordination between UNPROFOR and UNHCR, in cooperation with ICRC.

At a meeting with the Force Commander, the UNPROFOR Director of Civil Affairs and the Sarajevo Sector Commander on 5 July, the President of Bosnia and Herzegovina continued to call for the establishment of a security zone around Sarajevo, but agreed that the basic conditions for implementing even the more limited airport agreement had not been fully satisfied. While he favoured demilitarizing the contested area of Dobrinja adjacent to the airport, he felt that other SDS-held neighbourhoods should be similarly demilitarized and placed under UNPROFOR control.

Serb forces were attempting to maintain a unilateral cease-fire, but were compelled to respond to the worst provocations of the opposing side, leaders of SDS and the Army Commander of the "Serbian Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina" told the Force Commander on 5 July. Allegations were made of a large Croatian military intervention. The SDS leaders said that their handing over of the airport to UNPROFOR had not led to peace; they were willing to negotiate directly with the President of Bosnia and Herzegovina but had been refused. The Force Commander noted those statements, but stressed that such issues lay outside UNPROFOR's mandate.

The situation in Sarajevo and the many reports on deteriorating conditions throughout Bosnia and Herzegovina were greatly perturbing, the Force Commander said. The current success of the airport operation was an outstanding tribute to all those participating in it; however, their endeavours had not stimulated a corresponding initiative from the conflicting parties to seek a political settlement.

The Secretary-General concluded that the Sarajevo airport operation was based on foundations of utmost fragility, as the continuing military conflict in the area could at any moment encroach on the airport and disrupt the arrival and distribution of relief goods. Meanwhile, the provision of humanitarian aid to the rest of the country was sparse, intermittent and hazardous. While efforts by humanitarian agencies to open up routes to other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina continued, vast areas of the republic remained in desperate need of assistance. Only urgent efforts of the international community to address the basic causes of the conflict, including negotiations with all the parties involved, could resolve what had emerged as one of the worst humanitarian emergencies.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (13 and 17 July)

The Security Council, meeting on 13 July, invited Bosnia and Herzegovina, at its request, to participate without the right to vote under rule 37a of the Council's provisional rules of procedure. The Council considered the Secretary-General's report and unanimously adopted resolution 764(1992).

Reaffirming its resolutions 713(1991) of 25 September 1991, 721(1991) of 27 November 1991, 724(1991) of 15 December 1991, 727(1992) of 8 January 1992, 740(1992) of 7 February 1992, 743(1992) of 21 February 1992, 749(1992) of 7 April 1992, 752(1992) of 15 May 1992, 757(1992) of 30 May 1992, 758(1992) of 8 June 1992, 760(1992) of 18 June 1992, 761(1992) of 29 June 1992 and 762(1992) of 30 June 1992,

Noting with appreciation the further report of the Secretary-General,

Disturbed by the continuing violation of the Sarajevo airport agreement of 5 June 1992, in which the parties agreed, inter alia:

—That all anti-aircraft weapon systems would be withdrawn from positions from which they could engage the airport and its air approaches;

—That all artillery, mortar, ground-to-ground missile systems and tanks within the range of the airport would be concentrated in areas agreed by the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR) and subject to UNPROFOR observation at the firing line;

—To establish security corridors between the airport and the city, under UNPROFOR's control, to ensure the safe movement of humanitarian aid and related personnel;

Deeply concerned about the safety of UNPROFOR personnel,

Cognizant of the magnificent work being done in Sarajevo by UNPROFOR and its leadership, despite the conditions of great difficulty and danger,

Aware of the enormous difficulties in the evacuation by air of cases of special humanitarian concern,

Deeply disturbed by the situation which now prevails in Sarajevo and by many reports and indications of deteriorating conditions throughout Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Commending the determination and courage of all those who are participating in the humanitarian effort,

Deploping the continuation of the fighting in Bosnia and Herzegovina which is rendering difficult the provision of humanitarian assistance in Sarajevo and its environs, as well as in other areas of the Republic,

Noting that the reopening of Sarajevo airport for humanitarian purposes constitutes a first step in establishing a security zone encompassing Sarajevo and its airport,

Recalling the obligations under international humanitarian law, in particular the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949,

Stressing once again the imperative need to find an urgent negotiated political solution for the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 10 July 1992;

2. Authorizes the Secretary-General to deploy immediately additional elements of the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR) to ensure the security and functioning of Sarajevo airport and the delivery of humanitarian assistance, in accordance with paragraph 12 of his report dated 10 July 1992;

3. Reiterates its call on all parties and others concerned to comply fully with the agreement of 5 June 1992, and to cease immediately any hostile military activity in Bosnia and Herzegovina;

4. Commends the untiring efforts and the bravery of UNPROFOR for its role in securing humanitarian relief in Sarajevo and its environs;

5. Demands that all parties and others concerned cooperate fully with UNPROFOR and international humanitarian agencies to facilitate the evacuation by air of cases of special humanitarian concern;

6. Calls all parties and others concerned to cooperate with UNPROFOR and international humanitarian agencies to facilitate the provision of humanitarian aid to other areas of Bosnia and Herzegovina which remain in desperate need of assistance;

7. Reiterates its demand that all parties and others concerned take the necessary measures to secure the safety of UNPROFOR personnel;

8. Security Council resolution 764(1992)

13 July 1992 Meeting 3093 Adopted unanimously

Draft prepared in consultations among Council members (S/24267), orally corrected.

Following the signing of a cease-fire agreement on 17 July, by representatives of the three opposing parties, at a meeting held in London within the framework of the Conference on Yugoslavia, the Security Council convened on the same date. The agreement was to be effective as of 19 July for a period of 14 days, during which time all parties would explore measures for strengthening the cease-fire in the longer term. They also agreed to place all heavy weapons under international supervision, under arrangements to be made by the Council. In addition, all refugees would be permitted to return to the places from which they had been expelled and civilians caught in military situations would be given freedom of movement.

The Council invited Bosnia and Herzegovina, at its request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote, under rule 37a of the Council's provisional rules of procedure. Following consultations, the President of the Council made a statement:(40)

Meeting number, SC 3097.

"The Security Council welcomes the agreement between the parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina, signed at London on 17 July 1992 within the framework of the Conference on Yugoslavia.

"The Council calls on the parties to comply fully with the agreement in all its aspects. In particular, it calls on all parties and others concerned to observe scrupulously the cease-fire throughout the entire territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

"The Council has decided in principle to respond positively to the request for the United Nations to make arrangements for the supervision by the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR) of all heavy weapons (combat aircraft, armour, artillery, mortars, rocket-launchers, etc.) in accordance with the agreement of 17 July 1992. It calls on the parties to declare immediately to the Force Commander of UNPROFOR the locations and quantities of the heavy weapons to be placed under supervision. It requests the Secretary-General to report by 20 July on the implementation and resource implications of this decision.

"The Council welcomes the provisions in the agreement concerning the return of all refugees and freedom of movement for civilians caught up in or trapped by the military situation. It also welcomes the efforts being made to mobilize international assistance in handling the refugee problem under the aegis of UNHCR. It invites the Secretary-General and the United Nations humanitarian agencies concerned to make the maximum use of the cease-fire now proclaimed to bring humanitarian relief and supplies to all parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

"The Council expresses its satisfaction that the talks on future constitutional arrangements for Bosnia and Herzegovina are to resume in London on 27 July 1992, and urges all the parties to contribute actively and positively to these talks so that a peaceful solution is achieved as soon as possible.

"The Council stresses the need for full compliance with all the requirements of the relevant resolutions of the Council towards which the agreement reached in London on 17 July 1992 is an important step. It reaffirms its decision to remain actively seized of the matter and to consider immediately, whenever necessary, further steps to achieve a peaceful solution in conformity with those resolutions."

Report of the Secretary-General (21 July). In accordance with the Council's decision in principle to respond positively to the parties' request for international supervision of all their heavy weapons, the Force Commander immediately instructed his Sector Commander at Sarajevo to contact the parties with a view to identifying the locations and quantities of heavy weapons to be supervised, the Secretary-General reported on 21 July.(41) However, no relevant information was made available by any of the parties, two of which had not responded at all. In those circumstances, the Force Commander submitted on 19 July a proposed concept of operations for UNPROFOR to supervise the parties' heavy weapons, on the basis of information available to him from public sources.

The concept, as outlined in an annex to the Secretary-General's report, envisaged the deployment of United Nations military observers throughout the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina, other than Sarajevo where separate arrangements were in effect. The observers would supervise the heavy weapons of all parties to the conflict. Some 1,100 of them would be required; they would be based in 62 equipment-collection points, grouped into seven patrol areas. Teams of six observers at each collection point would conduct patrols on a 24-hour basis. The observers would need vehicles, communications equipment, office equipment and working space, as well as technical and administrative support.

Based on the assumption that implementation of the 17 July agreement would open up access to many areas where there were pressing humanitarian needs and that UNPROFOR would be expected to help the agencies respond to those needs, the concept envisaged that the observers would have an important role in helping UNHCR and other humanitarian agencies identify requirements for humanitarian relief.

The success of such an operation depended on the cooperation of the parties, who would be required to declare all the heavy weapons in their possession and to cooperate with UNPROFOR in concentrating them at locations where they could be monitored. It would also be necessary for the parties to demonstrate a genuine commitment to a sustained cease-fire.

The Secretary-General felt that conditions did not exist for him to recommend that the Security Council accept the request to supervise the heavy weapons to be declared by the parties. The request called into question the relationship of the United Nations to regional organizations, which was set up in the Charter to allow for the Council to utilize such organizations, with no provision for the reverse. Also, the United Nations had not participated in the agreement and the respective roles of the United Nations and EC in its implementation were unclear. In addition, the 19 July cease-fire had not come into effect in Sarajevo, nor apparently anywhere else in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

UNPROFOR was already stretched to the breaking-point and could not assume functions beyond its current capability. The United Nations was already massively engaged in the former Yugosllavia, and continued extensive concentration on that problem might be at the expense of the Organization's ability to help resolve equally dangerous conflicts elsewhere.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (24 July and 4 August)

The Security Council met on 24 July to consider the Secretary-General's report. The Council invited Bosnia and Herzegovina, at its request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

Following consultations, the President made a statement on behalf of the Council:(42)

Meeting number. SC 3100.

"The Security Council recalls the statement of its President of 17 July 1992 concerning the Agreement signed in London on 17 July by the parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

"The Security Council takes note with appreciation of the Secretary-General's report submitted to it, in response to its request of 17 July 1992, together with a Concept of Operations.

"The Council invites the Secretary-General to contact all Member States, particularly the Member States of the relevant regional organizations in Europe, to ask them to make urgently available to the Secretary-General information about the personnel, equipment and logistic support which they would be prepared to contribute, individually or collectively, to the supervision of heavy weapons in Bosnia and Herzegovina as described in the Secretary-General's report.

"In the light of the outcome of these contacts, the Secretary-General will undertake the further preparatory work needed on the supervision of the heavy weapons in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

"Recalling the provisions of Chapter VIII of the United Nations Charter, the Council invites the European regional arrangements and agencies concerned, particularly the European Community, to enhance their cooperation with the Secretary-General in their efforts to help to resolve the conflicts that continue to rage in the former Yugoslavia. In particular, it would welcome the participation of the Secretary-General in any negotiations under European Community auspices.

"The Council further invites the European Community in cooperation with the Secretary-General of the United Nations to examine the possibility of broadening and intensifying the present Conference with a view to providing a new momentum in the search for negotiated settlements of the various conflicts and disputes in the former Yugoslavia.

"The Council underlines the importance of the parties to the Agreement signed at London on 17 July 1992 honouring fully the terms of that Agreement and calls on others concerned also to respect the Agreement. It emphasizes in particular the need for the parties to respect and maintain a cease-fire throughout the entire territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and for them to declare immediately to the Force Commander of UNPROFOR the locations and quantities of the heavy weapons to be placed under supervision. It further demands that the parties and others concerned cooperate fully with UNPROFOR and the humanitarian agencies and take all necessary steps to ensure the safety of their personnel.

"The Council stresses the need for full compliance with all the requirements of its relevant resolutions and stands ready to consider immediately, whenever necessary, further steps to achieve a peaceful solution in conformity with its relevant resolutions.

"The Council requests the Secretary-General to report back to it on the further work being undertaken and remains actively seized of the matter."

On 4 August, the Council met at the urgent requests of the United States(43) and Venezuela(44) over reports in the media on concentration camps and the torture of citizens in Bosnia and Herzegovina. That republic, at its request, participated in the meeting without vote under rule 37a of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.

Following consultations, the President made a statement on behalf of the Council:(45)

Meeting number. SC 3103.

"The Security Council is deeply concerned at the continuing reports of widespread violations of international humanitarian law and in particular reports of the imprisonment and abuse of civilians in camps, prisons and detention centres within the territory of the former Yugoslavia and especially in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Council condemns any such violations and abuses and demands that relevant international organizations, and in particular the International Committee of the Red Cross, be granted immediate, unimpeded and continued access to all such places and calls upon all parties to do all in their power to facilitate such access. The Council further calls upon all parties, States, international organizations and non-governmental organizations to make immediately available to the Council any further information they might possess regarding these camps and access to them.

"The Council reaffirms that all parties are bound to comply with the obligations under international humanitarian law and in particular the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and that persons who commit or order the commission of grave breaches of the Conventions are individually responsible in respect of such breaches.

"The Council will remain actively seized of this issue."

On the same date, the Council President made a statement to the press:(46)

"The members of the Security Council condemn the recent cowardly attack on UNPROFOR positions in Sarajevo resulting in loss of life and injuries among the Ukrainian servicemen. The members of the Council note that UNPROFOR has already commenced investigation of this incident.

"The members of the Council express their condolences to the family of the officer killed and to the Government of Ukraine.

"The members of the Council also express their condolences to the families of the two French officers of UNPROFOR killed in Croatia and to the Government of France.

"The members of the Council call upon all parties to ensure that those responsible for these intolerable acts are quickly called to account.

"The members of the Council reiterate their demand that all parties and others concerned take the necessary measures to secure the safety of UNPROFOR personnel."

Information contained in two UNPROFOR memoranda, on the evident existence of concentration camps, "ethnic cleansing" and other violations of international humanitarian law in Bosnia and Herzegovina, was transmitted by that republic's Government to the President of the Security Council on 5(47) and 7 August,(48) pursuant to the request made by the President in his 4 August statement. Five concentration camps holding Muslims and Croats in the republic were identified. The treatment of Muslims and other minorities in the camps was reported to be atrocious, with regular beatings, deprivation of food and water and poor shelter, among other things. The situation was deteriorating and even spilling over to the UNPAs. In an announcement published by the News Agency of Bosnia and Herzegovina on 1 August, annexed to the letter of 5 August, it was charged that, according to reliable information, similar detention camps existed in Serbia and Montenegro. Some 130,000 citizens of Bosnia and Herzegovina were estimated to be in 96 camps there.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (13 August)

On 13 August, the Security Council met at the urgent request of Bosnia and Herzegovina,(49) as well as of Bahrain,(50) the Comoros,(51) Egypt,(52) Iran,(53) Kuwait,(54) Malaysia,(55) Pakistan,(56) Qatar,(57) Saudi Arabia,(58) Senegal,(59) Turkey(60) and the United Arab Emirates.(61) In forwarding its request, Bosnia and Herzegovina cited serious violations of human rights and international law. It requested that the Council consider taking measures provided for in Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter to restore peace and security in the region.

The Council invited Bosnia and Herzegovina, at its request, to participate without vote under rule 37a of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.

The Council adopted resolution 770(1992).

Underlining once again the imperative need for an urgent negotiated political solution to the situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina to enable that country to live in peace and security within its borders,

Recognizing that the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina constitutes a threat to international peace and security and that the provision of humanitarian assistance in Bosnia and Herzegovina is an important element in the Council's effort to restore international peace and security in the area,

Commending the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR) for its continuing action in support of the relief operation in Sarajevo and other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Deeply disturbed by the situation that now prevails in Sarajevo, which has severely complicated UNPROFOR's efforts to fulfil its mandate to ensure the security and functioning of Sarajevo airport and the delivery of humanitarian assistance in Sarajevo and other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina pursuant to resolutions 743(1992), 749(1992), 761(1992) and 764(1992) and the reports of the Secretary-General cited therein,

Dismayed by the continuation of conditions that impede the delivery of humanitarian supplies to destinations within Bosnia and Herzegovina and the consequent suffering of the people of that country,

Deeply concerned by reports of abuses against civilians imprisoned in camps, prisons and detention centres,

Determined to establish as soon as possible the necessary conditions for the delivery of humanitarian assistance wherever needed in Bosnia and Herzegovina, in conformity with resolution 764(1992),

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Reaffirms its demand that all parties and others concerned in Bosnia and Herzegovina stop the fighting immediately;

Recalling the statement of the President of the Council of 4 August 1992,

1. Human Rights Commission action (13 and 14 August). By a letter of 5 August, the United States requested the convening of the Commission on Human Rights to discuss the dangerous situation in the former Yugoslavia. The majority of the Commission's members being in agreement, the Commission held its first special session on 13 and 14 August (see PART THREE, Chapter X), at which it adopted a resolution on the human rights situation in the former Yugoslavia, which was endorsed by the Economic and Social Council in decision 1992/305. The Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities dealt with human rights violations, including "ethnic cleansing", in a decision of 13 August. In accordance with the Commission resolution, a Special Rapporteur was appointed to investigate first-hand the human rights situation in the former Yugoslavia.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (25 August)

On 25 August, at its resumed forty-sixth session, the General Assembly adopted resolution 46/242 by recorded vote.

The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

The General Assembly,

Having considered the item entitled "The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina",

Reaffirming the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and guided by the need to implement them,

Aware of its responsibility to promote and encourage respect for international legitimacy,

Considering that the United Nations, pursuant to the provisions of its Charter, has a major role to play in, and responsibility for, the maintenance of international peace and security,

Recalling the relevant resolutions of the Security Council, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization and the Commission on Human Rights, as well as Economic and Social Council decision 1992/305 of 18 August 1992,

Noting that a large number of States have reserved their position regarding the succession of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro),

Deploring the grave situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the serious deterioration of the living conditions of the people there, especially the Muslim and Croat populations, arising from the aggression against the territory of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, which constitutes a threat to international peace and security,

Alarmed by the prospect of further escalation of the fighting in the region,

Expressing grave alarm at continuing reports of widespread violations of international humanitarian law occurring within the territory of the former Yugoslavia and especially in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including reports of mass forcible expulsion and deportation of civilians, imprisonment and abuse of civilians in detention centres and deliberate attacks on non-combatants, hospitals and ambulances, impeding the delivery of food and medical supplies to the civilian population, as well as wanton devastation and destruction of property,

Strongly condemning the abhorrent practice of "ethnic cleansing", which constitutes a grave and serious violation of international humanitarian law,

Recalling the report of the Secretary-General of 12 May 1992, in which he states that "all international observers agree that what is happening is a concerted effort by the Serbs of Bosnia and Herzegovina, with the acquiescence of, and at least some support from, the Yugoslav People's Army, to create 'ethnically pure' regions in the context of negotiations on the 'cantonization' of the Republic in the Conference of the European Community on Bosnia and Herzegovina",

Expressing grave concern that, despite the relevant resolutions of the Security Council, no effective measure has been implemented to stop the abhorrent practice of "ethnic cleansing", or to reverse and discourage the policies and proposals that might encourage it,

Appalled by the continuing reports of widespread, massive and grave violations of human rights perpetrated within the territory of the former Yugoslavia and especially in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including reports of summary and arbitrary executions, forced disappearances, torture, rape and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, as well as arbitrary arrest and detention,

Expressing grave concern that, despite repeated demands by the Security Council, the cease-fire agreed upon by all parties has not been respected,

Concerned that other demands made by the Security Council in its relevant resolutions, especially resolutions 752(1992) of 15 May 1992, 757(1992) of 30 May 1992, 764(1992) of 13 July 1992 and 770(1992) and 771(1992) of 13 August 1992, have not been complied with,

Reaffirming the necessity of respecting the sovereignty, territorial integrity, political independence and national unity of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and rejecting any attempt to change the boundaries of that Republic,

Reaffirming also the inherent right of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina to individual or collective self-defence in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter,

Underlining the imperative need for an urgent peaceful solution to the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, in conformity with the Charter and the principles of international law, in particular the principles of respect for sovereignty and territorial integrity of States, non-recognition of the fruits of aggression and non-recognition of the acquisition of territory by force, and welcoming in this context the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, scheduled to be convened in London on 26 August 1992,

Commending the efforts of the Secretary-General, the Security Council, United Nations agencies, including the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and other international and relief organizations, including the Organization of the Islamic Conference, the European Community, the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and the International Committee of the Red Cross,

Commending also the United Nations Protection Force for its continuing action in support of the relief operation in Sarajevo and other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Deeply concerned about the safety of the personnel of the United Nations Protection Force and expressing sympathy for the losses suffered by them,

1. Demand that all parties to the conflict immediately stop fighting and find a peaceful solution in line with the Charter of the United Nations and the principles of international law, in particular the principles of respect for sovereignty and territorial integrity of States, non-recognition of the fruits of aggression and non-recognition of the acquisition of territory by force;

2. Demands also that all forms of interference from outside the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina cease immediately;

3. Demands further that those units of the Yugoslav People's Army and elements of the Croatian Army now in Bosnia and Herzegovina must either be withdrawn, or be subject to the authority of the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina, or be disbanded and disarmed with their weapons placed under effective international monitoring, and requests the Secretary-General to consider without delay what kind of international assistance could be provided in this connection;

4. Reaffirms its support for the Government and people of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina in their just struggle to safeguard their sovereignty, political independence, territorial integrity and unity;

5. Urges the Security Council to consider, on an urgent basis, taking further appropriate measures, as provided in Chapter VII of the Charter, to put an end to the lighting and to restore the unity and the territorial integrity of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina;

6. Condemns the violation of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina as well as the massive violations of human rights and international humanitarian law, in particular the abhorrent practice of "ethnic cleansing", and demands that this practice be brought to an end immediately and that further steps be taken, on an urgent basis, to stop the massive and forcible displacement of population from and within the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, as well as all other forms of violation of human rights in the former Yugoslavia;

7. Affirms that States are to be held accountable for violations of human rights which their agents commit upon the territory of another State;

8. Calls upon all States and international organizations not to recognize the consequences of the acquisition of territory by force and of the abhorrent practice of "ethnic cleansing";

9. Demands that the International Committee of the Red Cross be granted immediate, unimpeded and continued access to all camps, prisons and other places of detention within the territory of the former Yugoslavia and that all parties ensure complete safety and freedom of movement for the International Committee and otherwise facilitate such access;

10. Demands also the safe, unconditional and honourable repatriation of the refugees and deportees to their homes in Bosnia and Herzegovina and recognizes their right to receive reparation for their losses;

11. Calls upon organs of the United Nations and all international relief agencies to facilitate the return of the displaced people to their homes in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, as well as their rehabilitation;

13. Urges all parties and others concerned to take the necessary measures to secure the safety of the United Nations Protection Force and all other United Nations personnel;

14. Urges all States to support the ongoing efforts to be taken in accordance with the relevant Security Council resolutions to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance to all parts of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina;

15. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-seventh session on the implementation of the present resolution;

16. Decides to remain seized of the matter and to continue its consideration of this item at its forty-seventh session.

An amendment by the Russian Federation,⁽⁶²⁾ which would have included in the eleventh preambular paragraph reference to a statement in the Secretary-General's report of 30 May⁽³³⁾ that international observers did not, however, doubt that portions of Bosnia and Herzegovina were under the control of Croatian military or paramilitary units, was rejected by 69 votes to 9, with 50 abstentions, following a motion by Turkey.

Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) said it supported the resolution's call for an immediate and effective cease-fire, as well as the condemnation of human rights violations and "ethnic cleansing". Regrettably, the resolution contained some statements which distorted facts and some of its portions were not consonant with the real wish to restore peace. The sixth preambular paragraph contained a statement that had no connection to the item under discussion. The seventh preambular paragraph was discriminatory, emphasizing the serious deterioration of living conditions of Muslims and Croats, but excluding the Serbs, who constituted one third of Bosnia and Herzegovina's population. The fact that neither side in the civil war was blameless with regard to human rights violations and "ethnic cleansing" should have been clearly reflected in the eleventh preambular paragraph. With regard to paragraph 3, JNA had ceased to exist and not a single soldier of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia remained on the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The dangerous request for military intervention would result in more bloodshed and destruction. In addition, the resolution failed to support strong negotiations and a peaceful settlement between the three constituent nations living in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

In a letter of 2 September to the Security Council,⁽⁶³⁾ the President of the General Assembly summarized the views prevailing in the Assembly during its debate on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina. While commending the role being played by the Secretary-General, the Council, UNPROFOR and United Nations agencies, it was felt that the United Nations as a whole could do much more to find an urgent solution, to safeguard the republic's sovereignty, territorial integrity, political independence and national unity, and to put an end to the fighting and the grave violations of international humanitarian law. A great number of Member States also felt that the arms embargo precluded Bosnia and Herzegovina's inherent right to self-defence and that action should be taken to rectify that. Further, it was stressed that the time factor was vital, as it was working against the victims and to the advantage of the Bosnian Serbs. Those views were reflected in several provisions of the Assembly resolution.

The Assembly President expressed the hope that the Council would take urgent action on the resolution, which represented the collective will of an overwhelming majority of the United Nations membership.

Replying on 14 September,(64) the Council President said the Council had dealt with the problems in former Yugoslavia virtually on a continuous basis over the past 12 months and would do its utmost to bring about an end to them.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (9 September)

Following an incident on 3 September that cost the lives of four Italian airmen delivering humanitarian aid to Sarajevo and an attack on a humanitarian aid convoy on 8 September, during which two French soldiers were killed and five others wounded, the Security Council President, after consultations on September, made the following statement on behalf of the Council:(65)

Meeting number. SC 3113.

"The Security Council has noted with deep concern the attack which cost the lives of two French soldiers of UNPROFOR near Sarajevo, during which five other soldiers were wounded. It conveys its deep-felt sympathy and condolences to the Government of France and to the bereaved families. It strongly condemns this deliberate attack against UNPROFOR personnel.

"The Council invites the Secretary-General to inform it as soon as possible on the findings of the inquiry into the circumstances of this attack as well as other similar incidents involving the United Nations activities in Bosnia and Herzegovina, in particular the incident which cost the lives of four Italian airmen in charge of the transportation of humanitarian relief to Sarajevo airport. It invites him also to pass on to it any information which he could gather on the responsibility for these incidents.

"The serious incidents underline the urgent need for reinforcing the security and protection of UNPROFOR personnel as well as of all personnel involved in the United Nations activities in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Security Council expresses its readiness to adopt without delay measures to this end."

In a statement of 10 September,(66) Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) strongly condemned the attack on the French soldiers, saying that it endangered the ongoing peace process. It pointed out that it had fulfilled its obligations and secured free and safe passage of the convoy on the road from Belgrade to Sarajevo.

Report and communication of the Secretary-General (10 September). Proposals for the delivery of humanitarian assistance under the protection of UNPROFOR to Sarajevo and other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina were outlined by the Secretary-General in a report of 10 September.(67) Following adoption of resolution 770(1992) on 13 August, the Secretary-General explained, a number of its co-sponsors had communicated to him their views on how the delivery of such assistance could be facilitated through protective support by UNPROFOR, a function that could be added to UNPROFOR's mandate and carried out by military personnel, under the UNPROFOR Commander. Some of the Member States concerned indicated their readiness to provide the necessary military personnel, equipment and logistic support at no cost to the United Nations. The Secretary-General welcomed that approach, especially with regard to its financial aspects.

The proposals recognized UNHCR as lead agency for humanitarian activities in the former Yugoslavia. UNPROFOR's task, under its enlarged mandate, would be to support and protect the efforts of UNHCR, which would determine priorities and schedules for the delivery of relief, organize the convoys, negotiate safe passage along intended routes (with UNPROFOR assistance as required), and coordinate requests from non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and other agencies wishing to join its convoys. UNHCR would establish regional storage and distribution centres at 11 locations in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including Sarajevo, which would be accessible from Croatia and/or Serbia and Montenegro. UNPROFOR would protect convoys moving to the regional centres and to local distribution points; it would also protect United Nations facilities, including UNHCR storage centres. Additional military elements would include a transport battalion to be used when UNHCR determined specific routes to be particularly difficult; in other cases, UNHCR trucks would be escorted by UNPROFOR military vehicles and personnel.

Operational decisions relating to a protected convoy, including action to be taken in the event of obstacles to delivery, would be made by the UNPROFOR escort commander, in consultation with the senior UNHCR representative. In providing protection, UNPROFOR troops would follow normal peace-keeping rules of engagement and would thus be authorized to use force in self-defence, including in situations where attempts were made by armed persons to prevent its troops from fulfilling their mandate.

Overall command and control of the operation would be exercised by the Force Commander. A new Bosnia and Herzegovina Command, based at Sarajevo, would assume responsibility for all peace-keeping operations in the republic. The Command would consist of Sector Sarajevo, which would continue to carry out the tasks outlined in Council resolutions 758(1992) and 761(1992), and four or five new zones to be defined after further consultation with UNHCR. Each zone would be assigned an infantry battalion group and civilian staff to undertake political, information and liaison functions.

If approved by the Security Council, the proposals would require a fourfold or fivefold increase in the number of troops and other UNPROFOR personnel currently in the republic. Upon Council approval, the Secretary-General would ask the Member States contributing additional elements to UNPROFOR to form a joint planning team and then finalize implementation arrangements together with the Force Commander and UNHCR.

The outlined concept seemed to provide the best possibility for ensuring increased deliveries of humanitarian relief to the suffering population of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Secretary-General said. It would assure the Council's control of the operation, while avoiding additional financial burdens on the Organization.

By a letter of 10 September,(68) the Secretary-General informed the Council that he had been requested by Mr. Vance to seek Council authorization to use existing UNPROFOR resources to protect some 4,000 or more Muslim and Croat detainees who were expected to be released shortly from Serb detention camps at Manjaca and Trnopolje in the northern part of Bosnia and Herzegovina and to be taken to transit facilities in Croatia. Such assistance, the Secretary-General noted, would have to await the deployment of additional units he had recommended in his report.

The Council President, on 12 September,(69) conveyed the Council's agreement to the proposal.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (14 September and 6 October)

On 14 September, the Security Council convened to consider the Secretary-General's report. The Council invited Bosnia and Herzegovina, at its request, to participate in the discussion without vote under rule 37a of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.

The Council adopted resolution 776(1992).

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 743(1992) of 21 February 1992 and all subsequent resolutions relating to the United Nations protection Force (UNPROFOR),

Expressing its full support for the Statement of Principles adopted and other agreements reached at the London Conference, including the agreement of the parties to the conflict to collaborate fully in the delivery of humanitarian relief by road throughout Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Having examined the report of the Secretary-General of 10 September 1992,

Noting with appreciation the offers made by a number of States, following the adoption of its resolution 770(1992) of 13 August 1992, to make available military personnel to facilitate the delivery by relevant United Nations humanitarian organizations and others of humanitarian assistance to Sarajevo and wherever needed in other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina, such personnel to be made available to the United Nations without cost to the Organization,

Reaffirming its determination to ensure the protection and security of UNPROFOR and United Nations personnel,

Stressing in this context the importance of air measures, such as the ban on military flights to which all parties to the London Conference committed themselves, whose rapid implementation could, inter alia, reinforce the security of humanitarian activities in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Authorizes, in implementation of paragraph 2 of resolution 770(1992), the enlargements of UNPROFOR's mandate and strength in Bosnia and Herzegovina recommended by the Secretary-General in that report to perform the functions outlined in the report, including the protection of convoys of released detainees if requested by the International Committee of the Red Cross;

3. Further urges Member States, nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, to provide the Secretary-General with such financial or other assistance as he deems appropriate to assist in the performance of the functions outlined in his report;

4. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter in particular with a view to considering, as required, what further steps might be necessary to ensure UNPROFOR's security and to enable it to fulfil its mandate.

On 6 October, the Council, in accordance with the understanding reached in prior consultations, met again to consider the issue of human rights violations in Bosnia and Herzegovina. An urgent meeting had been requested on 5 October by the Contact Group of OIC,(70) representing 47 States members and mandated by the Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers to follow up the situation in Bosnia-and Herzegovina and to keep developments in the former Yugoslavia under review.

The Council invited Bosnia and Herzegovina as well as Croatia, at their request, to participate without vote under rule 37a of the provisional rules of procedure.

The Council had before it, among other documents, a report on the situation of human rights in the former Yugoslavia by the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights (see PART THREE, Chapter X), transmitted by the Secretary-General on 3 September.(71)

The Council adopted resolution 780(1992) unanimously.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 713(1991) of 25 September 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Recalling paragraph 10 of its resolution 764(1992) of 13 July 1992, in which it reaffirmed that all parties are bound to comply with the obligations under international humanitarian law and in particular the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and that persons who commit or order the commission of grave breaches of the Conventions are individually responsible in respect of such breaches,

Recalling also its resolution 771(1992) of 13 August 1992, in which, inter alia, it demanded that all parties and others concerned in the former Yugoslavia, and all military forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina, immediately cease and desist from all breaches of international humanitarian law.

Expressing once again its grave alarm at continuing reports of widespread violations of international humanitarian law occurring within the territory of the former Yugoslavia and especially in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including reports of mass killings and the continuance of the practice of "ethnic cleansing",

1. Reaffirms its call, in paragraph 5 of resolution 771(1992), upon States and, as appropriate, international humanitarian organizations to collate substantiated information in their possession or submitted to them relating to the violations of humanitarian law, including grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions being committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, and requests States, relevant United Nations bodies, and relevant organizations to make this information available within thirty days of the adoption of the present resolution and as appropriate thereafter, and to provide other appropriate assistance to the Commission of Experts referred to in paragraph 2 below;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to establish, as a matter of urgency, an impartial Commission of Experts to examine and analyse the information submitted pursuant to resolution 771(1992) and the present resolution, together with such further information as the Commission of Experts may obtain through its own investigations or efforts, of other persons or bodies pursuant to resolution 771(1992), with a view to providing the Secretary-General with its conclusions on the evidence of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and other violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia;

3. Also request the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the establishment of the Commission of Experts;

4. Further requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the conclusions of the Commission of Experts and to take account of these conclusions in any recommendations for further appropriate steps called for by resolution 771(1992);

5. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Commission of Experts. Pursuant to the Security Council's request in resolution 780(1992), the Secretary-General established a Commission of Experts to examine information containing evidence of grave breaches of the 1949 Geneva Conventions and other violations of international law committed in the former Yugoslavia, particularly in Bosnia and Herzegovina. In establishing the Commission, the Secretary-General said in a report of 14 October,(72) he had taken into account the mandate and work of the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights, in order to minimize a duplication of efforts, maximize the efficient use of resources and reduce costs.

The Commission was to be located at Geneva. It was composed, in the first instance, of five members serving in their personal capacity. On 23 October, the Secretary-General informed the Council that he had appointed Professor Fritz Kalshoven (Netherlands) as President of the Commission, and Professor Cherif Bassiouni (Egypt), William Fenrick (Canada), Judge Kéba Mbaye (Senegal) and Professor Tor-kel Opsahl (Norway) as members.

The Commission held its first meeting on 4 and 5 November. It met with the Secretary-General, as well as with Hans Corell of Sweden, a member of the CSCE Mission under the Moscow Human Dimension Mechanism, whose report and recommendations it reviewed. It decided to analyse existing reports as well as examine applicable law, and was identifying practical problems inherent in investigating alleged incidents. It had before it information on alleged violations from Governments and United Nations sources, as well as from the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, CSCE and NGOs, including Helsinki Watch and Amnesty International.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (9 and 30 October)

At a meeting on 9 October, the Security Council invited Bosnia and Herzegovina, at its request, to participate without vote under rule 37^a of the Council's provisional rules of procedure, and adopted resolution 781(1992).

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 713(1991) of 25 September 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Determined to ensure the safety of humanitarian flights to Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Noting the readiness of the parties, expressed in the framework of the London Conference, to take appropriate steps in order to ensure the safety of humanitarian flights and their commitment at that Conference to a ban on military flights,

Recalling in this context the Joint Declaration signed at Geneva on 30 September 1992 by the Presidents of the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), and in particular paragraph 7 thereof,

Recalling also the agreement reached on air issues at Geneva on 15 September 1992 among all the parties concerned in the framework of the Working Group on Confidence and Security-building and Verification Measures of the London Conference,

Alarmed at reports that military flights over the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina are none the less continuing,

Noting the letter of 4 October 1992 from the President of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Considering that the establishment of a ban on military flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina constitutes an essential element for the safety of the delivery of humanitarian assistance and a decisive step for the cessation of hostilities in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Acting pursuant to the provisions of resolution 770(1992) aimed at ensuring the safety of the delivery of humanitarian assistance in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

1. Decides to establish a ban on military flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina, this ban not to apply to United Nations Protection Force flights or to other flights in support of United Nations operations, including humanitarian assistance;

2. Requests the United Nations Protection Force to monitor compliance with the ban on military flights, including the placement of observers where necessary at airfields in the territory of the former Yugoslavia;

3. Also requests the United Nations Protection Force to ensure, through an appropriate mechanism for approval and inspection, that the purpose of flights to and from Bosnia and Herzegovina other than those banned by paragraph 1 above is consistent with Security Council resolutions;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council on a periodic basis on the implementation of the present resolution and to report immediately any evidence of violations;

5. Calls upon States to take nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements all measures necessary to provide assistance to the United Nations Protection Force, based on technical monitoring and other capabilities, for the purposes of paragraph 2 above;

6. Undertakes to examine without delay all the information brought to its attention concerning the implementation of the ban on military flights in Bosnia and Herzegovina and, in the case of violations, to consider urgently the further measures necessary to enforce this ban;

7. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

The agreement of 15 September on implementation of aerial confidence measures, including the ban on military use of aircraft, together with the report of the Chairman of the Working Group on Confidence and Security-building and Verification Measures, was transmitted to the Council by the United Kingdom.(73)

Presenting allegations on several occasions that the flight ban had been violated,(74) Bosnia and Herzegovina requested the Council to examine without delay all information brought to its attention concerning implementation of the ban and to consider urgently further measures necessary to enforce that ban.

On 30 October, the Council met again to consider the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and invited that country, at its request, to participate without vote under rule 37^a of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.

Before the Council was a letter of 29 October from Bosnia and Herzegovina stating that the besieged city of Jajce had fallen to the aggressor and requesting UNPROFOR protection for fleeing civilians.(75)

Following consultations, the President made a statement authorized by the Council:(76)

"The Security Council remains concerned by the continuing conflict in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina with its resultant loss of life and material damage, which threaten international peace and security, and by reports of egregious violations of international humanitarian law by whomsoever committed.

"The Security Council is appalled by the most recent reports that Serb militia in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina are attacking civilians fleeing from the city of Jajce.

"The Council strongly condemns any such attacks which constitute grave violations of international humanitarian law, including the Geneva Conventions, and reaffirms that persons who commit or order the commission of grave breaches of these Conventions are individually responsible in respect of such breaches. The Council wishes that such violations be brought to the attention of the Commission of Experts mentioned in resolution 780(1992).

"The Council demands that all such attacks cease immediately."

By a letter of 30 October,(77) President Izetbegovic reported continuing attacks on Jajce; over 20,000 women, children and elderly were fleeing the city.

Report of the Secretary-General (5 November).

A plan for further deployment of UNPROFOR to monitor compliance with the ban on military flights over Bosnia and Herzegovina was set out in a 5 November report of the Secretary-General.(78) In order to monitor compliance and approve and inspect non-military flights to and from the republic, UNPROFOR developed a concept combining the deployment of military observers at selected airfields with information obtained from technical sources.

A Monitoring Coordination and Control Centre (MCCC), set up at UNPROFOR headquarters at Zagreb, would oversee all UNPROFOR activities arising from the new mandate set out in Council resolution 781(1992). All flights using the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina would be required to obtain prior approval from MCCC, with UNHCR liaison personnel clearing humanitarian assistance flights. All flights to Bosnia and Herzegovina would be required to depart from Belgrade, Zagreb or Split, Croatia, where they would be inspected. Inspections in Belgrade would be undertaken by UNPROFOR civilian police, while in Zagreb, they would be the responsibility of ECMM. The airfield at Split would be reserved for humanitarian assistance flights to be inspected by UNHCR.

Teams of up to five observers each would be deployed at 13 airfields in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) to monitor all flight movements and inspect on arrival and departure aircraft whose flights into or out of Bosnia and Herzegovina had been approved by UNPROFOR. They would also have a mobile component available to travel to other airfields if so needed. MCCC would be notified of all flights detected over the republic, and then verify that they were UNPROFOR-approved. Any non-approved flights would be reported to the Security Council.

At the time of the report, UNPROFOR was in the process of establishing guidelines as to which categories of non-military flights, apart from humanitarian assistance, would be permitted.

To meet the immediate requirements arising from the new mandate, currently, 30 military observers from four existing peace-keeping operations were temporarily redeployed, and the measures described for monitoring compliance with the flight ban became operational to a limited extent as of 31 October.

The Force Commander estimated that 75 additional military observers with air-force experience, including 25 specialists with pilot and/or air-traffic controller qualifications, would be required, and three or four officers for MCCC.

The Presidents of Croatia and Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) welcomed the early stationing of international observers on airfields in their respective countries as a confidence-building measure. On 10 October, at the Working Group on Confidence and Security-building and Verification Measures of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, both Governments agreed on certain practical aspects of the deployment of ECMM and UNPROFOR military observers.

On 31 October and 1 November, respectively, UNPROFOR concluded agreements with Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) and Croatia, regarding arrangements for the deployment of military observers on their respective airfields. The agreements provided for: access to the airfield flight-control system; observation of preparations for and performance of the flying missions of aircraft at the requested airfields; and inspection of all aircraft whose flights had been authorized by UNPROFOR. Similar agreements were signed with Bosnia and Herzegovina on 3 November, granting UNPROFOR unrestricted access to airfields in the republic, and separately with Radovan Karadzic regarding two airfields in the Banja Luka area.

Additional costs to cover the proposed enlargement of the Force's mandate were estimated at $4,485,000 for the six-month period from 1 November 1992 to 30 April 1993. The monthly cost thereafter would be approximately $520,000.

Information on possible violations of the ban on military flights over Bosnia and Herzegovina was presented to the President of the Security Council by the Secretary-General in a letter of 6 November,⁽⁷⁹⁾ pursuant to resolution 781(1992). According to reports from UNPROFOR, some 24 flights of fixed- or rotary-wing aircraft had taken place in the restricted airspace since 22 October. It had not been possible to determine from which airports the aircraft concerned were operating nor if those flights were military in nature and, therefore, fell under the ban. However, the specific allegations of an air attack on two villages on 31 October, made by Bosnia and Herzegovina on 2 November,⁽⁸⁰⁾ could not be confirmed. A log of the detected flights was annexed to the Secretary-General's report.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (10 November)

On 10 November, the Security Council met to consider the Secretary-General's report. It invited Bosnia and Herzegovina, at its request, to participate without vote under rule 37^a of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.

The Council unanimously adopted resolution 786(1992).

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 781(1992) of 9 October 1992,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 5 November 1992 and his subsequent letter of 6 November 1992 submitted pursuant to resolution 781(1992),

Considering that the establishment of a ban on military flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina constitutes an essential element for the safety of the delivery of humanitarian assistance and a decisive step for the cessation of hostilities in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Taking into account the need for a speedy deployment of monitors on the ground for observation and verification purposes,

Gravely concerned at the indication in the Secretary-General's letter of 6 November 1992 of possible violations of its resolution 781(1992) and of the impossibility of corroborating the information on such violations by technical means presently available to the United Nations Protection Force,

Determined to ensure the safety of humanitarian flights to Bosnia and Herzegovina,

1. Welcomes the current advance deployment of military observers of the United Nations Protection Force and the European Community Monitoring Mission at airfields in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro);

2. Reaffirms its ban on military flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina, which applies to all flights, whether of fixed-wing or rotary-wing aircraft, subject to the exceptions contained in paragraph 1 of its resolution 781(1992), and reiterates that all parties and others concerned must comply with this ban;

3. Endorses the general concept of operations described in the Secretary-General's report and calls on all parties and others concerned, including all Governments operating aircraft in the area, to cooperate fully with the United Nations Protection Force in its implementation;

4. Calls upon all parties and others concerned henceforth to direct all requests for authorizations of flights pursuant to paragraph 3 of its resolution 781(1992) to the United Nations Protection Force, with special provisions being made for flights of the Protection Force, and all other flights in support of United Nations operations, including humanitarian assistance;

5. Approves the recommendation in paragraph 10 of the Secretary-General's report that the strength of the United Nations Protection Force be increased, as proposed in paragraph 5 of the report, in order to permit it to implement the concept of operations;

6. Reiterates its determination to consider urgently, in the case of violations when further reported to it in accordance with its resolution 781(1992), the further measures necessary to enforce the ban on military flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina;

7. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Security Council resolution 786(1992)

10 November 1992 Meeting 3133 Adopted unanimously
Draft prepared in consultations among Council members (S/24784), orally revised.

Eleven more reports of unauthorized flights over the "no flight zone" were issued by the Secretary-General in 1992. From 5 to 12 November, 34 flights were detected.⁽⁸¹⁾ At that point, monitors of UNPROFOR or ECMM were deployed in the majority of their assigned areas. Further reported were: 73 flights from 13 to 19 November;⁽⁸²⁾ 55 from 20 to 26 November;⁽⁸³⁾ and 132 from 27 November to 28 December.⁽⁸⁴⁾

Report of the Secretary-General (11 November). The Secretary-General on 11 November reported to the Security Council on the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia,⁽¹⁾ including the activities of the Steering Committee and its Co-Chairmen and the six working groups. In particular, he provided information on the efforts being pursued within the Conference to promote a peaceful solution to the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina. A draft outline constitution, recently submitted to the parties by the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee, was annexed to the report.

The Secretary-General called for full cooperation of all the parties involved as well as the support of the international community for the work being pursued by the Co-Chairmen and the working groups. (For details on the work of the Conference, see above.)

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (13 and 16 November)

The Security Council convened four meetings on 13 and 16 November to consider the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, at its request,⁽⁸⁵⁾ as well as at the requests of Belgium,⁽⁸⁶⁾ France⁽⁸⁷⁾ and Egypt, Iran, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Senegal and Turkey, as members of the Contact Group of OIC.⁽⁸⁸⁾

The President invited Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Azerbaijan, Bangladesh, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Canada, the Comoros, Croatia, Egypt, Germany, Greece, Indonesia, Iran, Italy, Jordan,

Kuwait, Lithuania, Malaysia, Malta, Norway, Pakistan, Qatar, Romania, Senegal, Slovenia, Tunisia, Turkey, Ukraine and the United Arab Emirates, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote under rule 37^a of the Council's provisional rules of procedure. Also granted was a request of Foreign Minister Ilija Djukic, who identified himself as the Foreign Minister of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, to address the Council in the course of the discussion.

The President informed the Council of a letter⁽⁸⁹⁾ from the Permanent Observer of Palestine to the United Nations, requesting that, in accordance with the Council's previous practice, an invitation be extended to him to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. He would be speaking in his capacity as Chairman of the Arab Group for the month of November. The President added that the request was not made pursuant to rule 37^a or rule 39^b of the Council's provisional rules of procedure but that, if approved, the Council would invite the Permanent Observer to participate, not under rule 37 or 39, but with the same rights of participation of rule 37.

The request was approved by 10 votes in favour to 1 against (United States), with 4 abstentions (Belgium, France, Hungary, United Kingdom).

Prior to the vote, the United States, which had requested it, stated its opposition, saying the Council did not have before it a valid request and the Palestine Liberation Organization should be granted permission to speak only if the request complied with rule 39. The United States was opposed to special, ad hoc departures from orderly procedures and did not agree with recent practice, which appeared selectively to try to enhance, through a departure from the rules of procedure, the prestige of those wishing to speak in the Council.

Invitations to participate under rule 39 were extended to both Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights. The reports of the Special Rapporteur on his first and second missions to the territory of the former Yugoslavia were transmitted to the Council by the Secretary-General on 3 September and 6 November;⁽⁹⁰⁾ a report on the human rights situation in the former Yugoslavia was transmitted on 17 November⁽⁹¹⁾ (for details, see PART THREE, Chapter X).

Both China and Zimbabwe expressed reservations about inviting the Special Rapporteur. Human rights fell under the purview of the Commission and the General Assembly rather than of the Council, and the invitation was therefore not appropriate, China felt. The growing tendency of the Council to interfere with the work of other United Nations organs was a cause of great concern to Zimbabwe, at a time when efforts were being made to streamline the work of the Organization and improve the functional capacity of its constitutional parts.

On 16 November, the Council adopted resolution 787(1992).

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 713(1991) of 25 September 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Reaffirming its determination that the situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina constitutes a threat to the peace, and reaffirming that the provision of humanitarian assistance in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina is an important element in the Security Council's effort to restore peace and security in the region,

Deeply concerned at the threats to the territorial integrity of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, which, as a State Member of the United Nations, enjoys the rights provided for in the Charter of the United Nations,

Reaffirming also its full support for the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia as the framework within which an overall political settlement of the crisis in the former Yugoslavia may be achieved, and for the work of the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the Conference

Recalling the decision by the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia to examine the possibility of promoting safe areas for humanitarian purposes,

Recalling the commitments entered into by the parties and others concerned within the framework of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia,

Reiterating its call on all parties and others concerned to cooperate fully with the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee,

Noting the progress made so far within the framework of the International Conference, including the Joint Declarations signed at Geneva on 30 September 1992 and 20 October 1992 by the Presidents of the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro); the Joint Statement made at Geneva on 19 October 1992 by the Presidents of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro); the Joint Communiqué issued on 1 November 1992 at Zagreb by the Presidents of the Republic of Croatia and the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina; the establishment of the Mixed Military Working Group in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina; and the production of a draft outline constitution for the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Noting with grave concern the report of the Special Rapporteur appointed following a special session of the Commission on Human Rights to investigate the human rights situation in the former Yugoslavia, which makes clear that massive and systematic violations of human rights and grave violations of international humanitarian law continue in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Welcoming the deployment of additional elements of the United Nations Protection Force for the protection of humanitarian activities in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, in accordance with its resolution 776(1992) of 14 September 1992, Deeply concerned about reports of continuing violations of the embargo imposed by its resolutions 713(1991) and 724(1991) of 15 December 1991,

Deeply concerned also about reports of violations of the measures imposed by its resolution 757(1992) of 30 May 1992,

1. Calls upon the parties in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina to consider the draft outline constitution as a basis for negotiating a political settlement of the conflict in that country and to continue negotiations for constitutional arrangements on the basis of the draft outline, under the auspices of the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee, these negotiations to be held in continuous and uninterrupted session;

2. Reaffirms that any taking of territory by force or any practice of "ethnic cleansing" is unlawful and unacceptable, and will not be permitted to affect the outcome of the negotiations on constitutional arrangements for the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and insists that all displaced persons be enabled to return in peace to their former homes;

3. Strongly reaffirms its call on all parties and others concerned to respect strictly the territorial integrity of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and affirms that any entities unilaterally declared or arrangements imposed in contravention thereof will not be accepted;

4. Condemns the refusal of all parties in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, in particular the Bosnian Serb paramilitary forces, to comply with its previous resolutions, and demands that they and all other concerned parties in the former Yugoslavia fulfil immediately their obligations under those resolutions;

5. Demands that all forms of interference from outside the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, including infiltration into the country of irregular units and personnel, cease immediately, and reaffirms its determination to take measures against all parties and others concerned which fail to fulfil the requirements of resolution 752(1992) and its other relevant resolutions, including the requirement that all forces, in particular elements of the Croatian army, be withdrawn, or be subject to the authority of the Government of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, or be disbanded or disarmed;

6. Calls upon all parties in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina to fulfil their commitments to put into effect an immediate cessation of hostilities and to negotiate in the Mixed Military Working Group, continuously and in uninterrupted session, to end the blockades of Sarajevo and other towns and to demilitarize them, with heavy weapons under international supervision;

7. Condemns all violations of international humanitarian law, including in particular the practice of "ethnic cleansing" and the deliberate impeding of the delivery of food and medical supplies to the civilian population of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and reaffirms that those that commit or order the commission of such acts will be held individually responsible in respect of such acts;

8. Welcomes the establishment of the Commission of Experts provided for in paragraph 2 of its resolution 780(1992) of 6 October 1992, and requests the Commission to pursue actively its investigations with regard to grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and other violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, in particular the practice of "ethnic cleansing";

9. Decides, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, in order to ensure that commodities and products transshipped through the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) are not diverted in violation of resolution 757(1992), to prohibit the transshipment of crude oil, petroleum products, coal, energy-related equipment, iron, steel, other metals, chemicals, rubber, tyres, vehicles, aircraft and motors of all types unless such transshipment is specifically authorized on a case-by-case basis by the Committee established by resolution 724(1991) under its no-objection procedure;

10. Further decides, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, that any vessel in which a majority or controlling interest is held by a person or undertaking in or operating from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) shall be considered, for the purpose of implementation of the relevant resolutions of the Security Council, a vessel of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) regardless of the flag under which the vessel sails;

11. Calls upon all States to take all necessary steps to ensure that none of their exports are diverted to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) in violation of resolution 757(1992);

12. Acting under Chapters VII and VIII of the Charter of the United Nations, calls upon States, acting nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, to use such measures commensurate with the specific circumstances as may be necessary under the authority of the Security Council to halt all inward and outward maritime shipping in order to inspect and verify their cargoes and destinations and to ensure strict implementation of the provisions of resolutions 713(1991) and 757(1992);

13. Commends the efforts of those riparian States which are acting to ensure compliance with resolutions 713(1991) and 757(1992) with respect to shipments on the Danube, and reaffirms the responsibility of riparian States to take necessary measures to ensure that shipping on the Danube is in accordance with resolutions 713(1991) and 757(1992), including such measures commensurate with the specific circumstances as may be necessary to halt such shipping in order to inspect and verify their cargoes and destinations and to ensure strict implementation of the provisions of resolutions 713(1991) and 757(1992);

14. Requests the States concerned, nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, to coordinate with the Secretary-General, inter alia, on the submission of reports to the Security Council regarding actions taken in pursuance of paragraphs 12 and 13 of the present resolution to facilitate the monitoring of the implementation of the present resolution;

15. Requests all States to provide in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations such assistance as may be required by those States acting nationally or through regional agencies and arrangements in pursuance of paragraphs 12 and 13 of the present resolution;

16. Consider that, in order to facilitate the implementation of the relevant Security Council resolutions, observers should be deployed on the borders of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and requests the Secretary-General to present to the Council as soon as possible his recommendations on this matter;

17. Calls upon all international donors to contribute to the humanitarian relief efforts in the former Yugoslavia, to support the United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Programme of Action and Appeal for the former Yugoslavia and to speed up the delivery of assistance under existing pledges;

18. Calls upon all parties and others concerned to cooperate fully with the humanitarian agencies and with the United Nations Protection Force to ensure the safe delivery of humanitarian assistance to those in need of it, and reiterates its demand that all parties and others concerned take the necessary measures to ensure the safety of United Nations and other personnel engaged in the delivery of humanitarian assistance;

19. Invites the Secretary-General, in consultation with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other relevant international humanitarian agencies, to study the possibility of and the requirements for the promotion of safe areas for humanitarian purposes;

Report of the Secretary-General (24 November). In a report of 24 November, (20) the Secretary-General provided updated information on UNPROFOR activities in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Progress had been made in deploying the newly established Bosnia and Herzegovina Command and the units under its control, but the deployment of military observers and civil affairs personnel was delayed due to budgetary problems.

Throughout the reporting period, Sector Sarajevo contrived to carry out its mandate of keeping open and operating Sarajevo airport and escorting convoys of relief supplies from the airport to the city. A total of 1,619 humanitarian flights, carrying 19,660 metric tons of aid, had been flown into the airport. The Sector also coordinated efforts to restore electricity, gas and water supplies in the city, with UNPROFOR personnel protecting civilian workers and completing many of the repairs themselves. UNPROFOR military observers continued to monitor the heavy-weapons positions of the parties in the hills around Sarajevo. In addition, the Sector had to devote much effort to providing support to high-ranking delegations who had requested armed and armoured escort during visits to the city.

The establishment of the Mixed Military Working Group, which had held six meetings since 23 October, was a step forward, although negotiations had been slow and arduous. The three parties—the presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bosnian Croats and Bosnian Serbs—had declared their resolve to achieve results which could lead to a cessation of hostilities and facilitate the provision of humanitarian aid throughout the conflict area, but that resolve had not been translated into concrete agreements. So far, the three sides had mostly used the Working Group to state their points of view on various issues or to lay down conditions that were unacceptable to the others. The cease-fire agreement of 10 November was a positive development, but had already been violated by all sides on a large number of occasions, and it remained to be seen whether the parties were really willing and able to implement such an agreement on the ground.

The challenge facing UNPROFOR in Bosnia and Herzegovina should not be underestimated, the Secretary-General warned. The frequent autumn rains, which had led to flooding and mobility problems, were being followed by periods of falling temperatures and snowfalls on Sarajevo and many mountain areas. Roads, bridges and railways had been without normal maintenance for nearly a year; many had suffered major damage from the lighting, making road surfaces unsafe. The implications for humanitarian operations were severe.

Overall, the Secretary-General observed, the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina was disquieting, with a complicated and savage conflict raging and a large number of people remaining vulnerable to starvation and displacement during an arduous winter whose rigours had only just begun. Security Council resolutions calling for the withdrawal of foreign forces remained largely unimplemented. The Croatian Army was reliably reported to be engaged extensively in the republic, particularly in Herzegovina and in the Orasje area. Serb forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina continued to rely on logistical support from Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro).

The Secretary-General noted, however, that UNPROFOR's mandate in Bosnia and Herzegovina was more practicable than in Croatia. The first four weeks of the ban on military flights had produced no confirmed evidence of combat activity, though they had shown that many flights of military aircraft, mostly helicopters, were taking place from Serb-controlled airfields and that unapproved flights occurred regularly, mostly at night, from Croatia into government-controlled areas of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The bulk of UNPROFOR's activity in Bosnia and Herzegovina, however, was in support of efforts to relieve the suffering of the civilian population. United Nations troops were pioneering a new dimension of United Nations peace-keeping as they took on the task of protecting the delivery of humanitarian supplies. That task did not in the Secretary-General's view require a revision of peace-keeping rules of engagement, which already entitled United Nations troops to use force if prevented by armed persons from carrying out their mandate. However, in convoy protection duties, United Nations troops might have to move beyond their usual impartiality, an aspect the Secretary-General was watching carefully.

Turning to the arrangements agreed on for the expansion of UNPROFOR under resolution 776(1992), the Secretary-General said they were quite innovative; the addition to UNPROFOR of contingents financed and supported entirely by their national Governments had given rise to some teething troubles, especially with regard to command and control. He had had to seek the help of contributing Governments in ensuring that all concerned recognized that the new units were an integral part of UNPROFOR, under the overall command of the Force Commander, and that newly arrived troops wearing United Nations insignia passed under United Nations command as soon as they reached the mission area. Their subsequent activities had to comply with UNPROFOR policy, as laid down by the Force Commander, in all operational, legal, information and administrative matters. The lack of budgetary provision for United Nations civilian personnel, including administrators and military observers, had deprived the Bosnia and Herzegovina Command of experienced United Nations personnel; for that reason, the Secretary-General had decided to recommend to the General Assembly that the Command's requirements for civilian staff and related support be provided through assessed contributions levied on all Member States.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (9 and 18 December)

On 9 December, the Security Council met at the request of Bosnia and Herzegovina,⁽⁹²⁾ which the Council invited, at its request, to participate without the right to vote under rule 37^a of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.

In presenting its request, Bosnia and Herzegovina cited a dramatic increase in aggression against Sarajevo, Bihac and other cities in the central area and the northern corridor of the republic.

Following consultations, the President of the Council made a statement:⁽⁹³⁾

Meeting number. SC 3146.

"The Security Council is alarmed by the most recent reports that Serb militia in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina have renewed their offensive in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and in particular against the city of Sarajevo, resulting in further loss of life and material damage as well as in endangering the security of UNPROFOR and international relief workers, thus threatening international peace and security.

"The Security Council is particularly alarmed by reports that the Serb militia in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina are forcing the inhabitants of Sarajevo to evacuate the city. The Council warns that actions aimed at impeding the distribution of humanitarian assistance and at forcing the inhabitants of Sarajevo to leave the city, including the possibility of ethnic cleansing, would have grave consequences for the overall situation in that country.

"The Security Council strongly condemns these attacks as violations of its relevant resolutions and of previous commitments, in particular with regard to the cessation of hostilities, the ban on military flights in the airspace of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the safety of humanitarian assistance to the civilian population and the restoration of power and water supplies.

"The Security Council demands the immediate cessation of these attacks and of all actions aimed at impeding the distribution of humanitarian assistance and at forcing the inhabitants of Sarajevo to leave the city.

"If such attacks and actions continue, the Security Council will consider, as soon as possible, further measures against those who commit or support them to ensure the security of UNPROFOR and of international relief workers, the ability of UNPROFOR to fulfil its mandate and compliance with the Council's relevant resolutions.

"The Security Council will remain actively seized of the matter."

The Council again met on 18 December and by unanimous vote adopted resolution 798(1992).

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 770(1992) and 771(1992) of 13 August 1992 as well as other relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

Appalled by reports of the massive, organized and systematic detention and rape of women, in particular Muslim women, in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Demanding that all the detention camps and, in particular, camps for women should be immediately closed,

Taking note of the initiative taken by the European Council on the rapid dispatch of a delegation to investigate the facts received until now,

1. Expresses its support for the above-mentioned initiative of the European Council;

2. Strongly condemns these acts of unspeakable brutality;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to provide such necessary means of support as are available to him in the area to enable the European Community delegation to have free and secure access to the places of detention;

4. Requests the member States of the European Community to inform the Secretary-General of the work of the delegation;

5. Invites the Secretary-General to report to it within fifteen days of the adoption of the present resolution on measures taken to support the delegation;

6. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter,

Security Council resolution 798(1992)

18 December 1992 Meeting 3150 Adopted unanimously

4-nation draft (S/24977).

Sponsors: Belgium, France, Morocco, United Kingdom.

The EC delegation, which the Secretary-General was requested by the Council to support, was headed by Dame Anne Warburton and included Simone Veil and a number of experts in forensic psychiatry, clinical psychology, law, social development and social anthropology. It visited Geneva and Zagreb between 18 and 24 December and had extensive discussions with representatives of UNHCR, the United Nations Centre for Human Rights and the Commission of Experts on War Crimes in the Former Yugoslavia.(94)

Reports of the Secretary-General (December). Pursuant to resolution 787(1992), the Secretary-General in a report of 21 December(95) presented three alternative concepts for deploying observers on the borders of Bosnia and Herzegovina in order to facilitate implementation of relevant Council resolutions. Bosnia and Herzegovina itself had repeatedly expressed itself in favour of effective monitoring of its borders, and Croatia and Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) had agreed to it in principle during and since the London stage of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia.

The relevant resolutions were: 713(1991) of 25 September 1991, which established a general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Yugoslavia; 752(1992) of 5 May 1992, which demanded that all forms of interference from outside Bosnia and Herzegovina, including units of JNA as well as elements of the Croatian Army, cease immediately, and that Bosnia and Herzegovina's neighbours take swift action to end such interference and respect the republic's territorial integrity; 757(1992) of 30 May, which imposed comprehensive mandatory economic sanctions against Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro); and 787(1992) of 16 November, which again demanded that all forms of interference from outside Bosnia and Herzegovina, including infiltration into the country of irregular units and personnel, cease immediately.

The three operational concepts outlined by UNPROFOR were: observing and reporting of traffic; observing and searching of vehicles and persons crossing the border in either direction, and reporting; and observing, searching, denying passage or confiscating weapons or sanctioned goods, and reporting. All three, but especially the last option, which the Force Commander favoured, would require considerable additional material and human resources, the Secretary-General said.

An additional command, communication and logistics structure would be required to control and supply border personnel, who would be deployed at the 123 widely dispersed crossing points along borders which extended nearly 1,100 kilometres through predominantly difficult terrain. Two or more sub-headquarters in Croatia and Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) would be needed to report through cells in Belgrade and Zagreb to UNPROFOR headquarters. For a variety of political and practical reasons, the Force Commander believed that it would be best for the United Nations observers to carry out their functions on the Croatia or Serbia/Montenegro side of the border; the full cooperation of those States' authorities would be required, especially when non-authorized vehicles or persons were turned back by the observers.

The option preferred by the Force Commander and the Secretary-General would require approximately 10,000 troops, including the necessary logistic, medical and engineering support. In addition, there could also be a need for United Nations civilian police and customs officers. UNPROFOR's logistic infrastructure would have to be extensively upgraded and enlarged.

The Secretary-General estimated the costs associated with the additional responsibilities at $694,125,000 for an initial six-month period, and the monthly costs thereafter at approximately $69,155,000. He recommended that the additional costs be borne by Member States and that the assessments to be levied on them be credited to the UNPROFOR Special Account.

In a report of 24 December,⁽²⁾ the Secretary-General provided information on the activities of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia since his previous report of 11 November. (For details on the Conference, see above.)

He reported on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina to the General Assembly on 3 December,⁽⁹⁶⁾ pursuant to its August request. In submitting the report, he stated it was complemented by his reports to the Security Council and the reports of the Special Rapporteur to the Commission on Human Rights (see PART THREE, Chapter X). The Secretary-General's report dealt with efforts to end hostilities and achieve a peaceful solution to the conflict, as well as the withdrawal of foreign forces; action taken by the Security Council during the year; violations of human rights and humanitarian law; the release of prisoners and detainees; and humanitarian assistance.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/121 by recorded vote.

The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

The General Assembly,

Having considered the item entitled "The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina",

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General,

Reaffirming its resolution 46/242 of 25 August 1992,

Recalling all the resolutions adopted by the Security Council regarding the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and other parts of the former Yugoslavia,

Appreciating all the ongoing international efforts to restore peace in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, particularly those efforts being pursued by the United Nations, the European Community, the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and the Organization of the Islamic Conference,

Commending the untiring efforts and bravery of the United Nations Protection Force in securing relief operations in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, as well as the efforts of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other relief and humanitarian agencies, and expressing its condemnation of the recent attacks on the United Nations Protection Force in Sarajevo by Serbian forces resulting in loss of life and injuries to some of its personnel,

Taking note of the report of the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on the situation of human rights in the territory of the former Yugoslavia dated 6 November 1992, in which he stated, inter alia, that "ethnic cleansing" did not appear to be the consequence of the war, but rather its goal,

Taking note also of the report of the Special Rapporteur dated 17 November 1992, in which he stated, inter alia, that another factor which had contributed to the intensity of "ethnic cleansing" in areas under Serbian control was the marked imbalance between the weaponry in the hands of the Serbian and the Muslim population of Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Gravely concerned about the deterioration of the situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina owing to intensified aggressive acts by the Serbian and Montenegrin forces to acquire more territories by force, characterized by a consistent pattern of gross and systematic violations of human rights, a burgeoning refugee population resulting from mass expulsions of defenceless civilians from their homes and the existence in Serbian and Montenegrin controlled areas of concentration camps and detention centres, in pursuit of the abhorrent policy of "ethnic cleansing", which is a form of genocide,

Strongly condemning Serbia and Montenegro and their surrogates in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina for their continued non-compliance with all relevant United Nations resolutions,

Deeply regretting that the sanctions imposed by the Security Council have not had the desired effect of halting the aggressive acts by Serbian and Montenegrin irregular forces and the direct and indirect support of the Yugoslav People's Army for the aggressive acts in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Recalling that the Government of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina has accepted the constitutional principles proposed by the Co-Chairmen of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia,

Convinced that the situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina warrants the implementation of decisive actions under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations to oblige Serbia and Montenegro and their surrogates in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina to comply with the relevant Security Council resolutions,

Reaffirming the principle of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force and the right of all Bosnian refugees to return to their homes in conditions of safety and honour,

Reaffirming also that the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina has the inherent right to individual or collective self-defence in accordance with Chapter VII, Article 51, of the Charter, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security,

Determined to restore peace in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina as well as to preserve its unity, sovereignty, political independence and territorial integrity,

1. Reaffirms its support for the Government and people of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina in their just struggle to safeguard their sovereignty, political independence, territorial integrity and unity;

2. Strongly condemns Serbia, Montenegro and Serbian forces in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina for violation of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and their non-compliance with existing resolutions of the Security Council and the General Assembly, as well as the London Peace Accords of August 1992;

3. Demands that Serbia and Montenegro and Serbian forces in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina immediately cease their aggressive acts and hostility and comply fully and unconditionally with the relevant resolutions of the Security Council, in particular resolutions 752(1992) of 15 May 1992, 757(1992) of 30 May 1992, 770(1992) and 771(1992) of 13 August 1992, 781(1992) of 9 October 1992 and 787(1992) of 16 November 1992, General Assembly resolution 46/242 and the London Peace Accords of August 1992;

4. Demands that, in accordance with Security Council resolution 752(1992), all elements of the Yugoslav People's Army still in the territory of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina must be withdrawn immediately, or be subject to the authority of the Government of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, or be disbanded and disarmed with their weapons placed under effective United Nations control;

5. Demands also that, in accordance with Security Council resolution 752(1992), all elements of the Croatian Army that may be in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and that are already not operating in accord with the authority of the Government of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina must be withdrawn immediately, or be subject to the authority of that Government, or be disbanded and disarmed with their weapons placed under effective United Nations control;

6. Supports the consideration by the Security Council of the immediate enforcement of Council resolution 781(1992) banning all military flights over the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina;

7. Urges the Security Council, within its responsibility to maintain international peace and security, to again call upon the Serbian and Montenegrin forces to comply with all relevant resolutions and to bring to an end the aggressive acts against the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, to implement and enforce all existing resolutions with respect to the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and the former Yugoslavia and, specifically, further to consider measures, including the following, on an urgent basis, but no later than 15 January 1993:

(a) In the event that Serbian and Montenegrin forces fail to comply fully with all relevant resolutions of the Security Council, under the provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, to authorize Member States, in cooperation with the Government of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, to use all necessary means to uphold and restore the sovereignty, political independence, territorial integrity and unity of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina;

(b) To exempt the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina from the arms embargo as imposed on the former Yugoslavia under Security Council resolution 713(1991) of 25 September 1991;

8. Also urges the Security Council to consider taking measures to open more airports/airfields for international humanitarian relief flights, to pursue emergency airdrops as a stop-gap measure and to study the possibility of and the requirements for the promotion of safe areas for humanitarian purposes;

9. Further urges the Security Council to consider what resources may be required to improve the implementation of all relevant resolutions, and calls upon Member States to notify the Secretary-General regarding the availability of personnel and matériel to assist and facilitate in this effort;

10. Urges the Security Council to consider recommending the establishment of an ad hoc international war crimes tribunal to try and punish those who have committed war crimes in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina when sufficient information has been provided by the Commission of Experts established by Council resolution 780(1992) of 6 October 1992;

11. Requests the Co-Chairmen of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia to conclude expeditiously the work of the Working Group on the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, to report on the reasons for the lack of progress and to submit proposals to overcome obstacles in the fulfilment of their mandate by 18 January 1993;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly by 18 January 1993 on the implementation of the present resolution;

13. Decides to remain seized of the matter and to continue the consideration of this item.

Further developments. In view of the heightened international concern over the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee invited the three parties to Geneva to discuss from 2 January 1993 onwards a sustainable cessation of hostilities; the demilitarization of Sarajevo; an agreement on a pull-back from the military front line in a way that would reinforce an overall political settlement; ensuring free access of all citizens in and out of besieged cities and towns; and free movement of humanitarian aid. Croatia and Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) were also invited.

In preparation for those discussions, the Co-Chairmen invited the Presidents of Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina to Geneva on 27 and 28 December 1992 for consultations, concentrating on the provincial structure of Bosnia and Herzegovina as an intrinsic part of future constitutional arrangements. Consultations also took place on 28 December between the Presidents of Croatia and Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro).

During individual talks with the three Presidents, the Secretary-General expressed his grave concern over the developments in the republic and the risks of escalation and expansion of the conflict, and appealed to each of them to help the Co-Chairmen in their search for peaceful solutions.

Those discussions led the Secretary-General to the conclusion that the designation of Sarajevo as a demilitarized open city could be advantageous to the peace process. On 30 December, he wrote to the Security Council President describing his impression that there were subtle signs of progress and stating his conviction that the growing momentum for stronger military measures by the international community in Bosnia and Herzegovina should be slowed in order to allow the still fragile peace process an opportunity to take root.

Implementation of the weapons embargo and sanctions

A mandatory weapons embargo with respect to all the constituent republics of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was established by the Security Council in September 1991.(9) In 1992, the Council significantly expanded the scope of its mandatory sanctions relative to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro): by resolution 757(1992), of 30 May, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, imposed a wide range of sanctions; by resolution 760(1992) of 18 June, it expanded the exceptions to the prohibitions in resolution 757(1992) relating to the sale or supply of any commodities or products, conditioned on the Sanction Committee's approval on a case-by-case basis; and by resolution 787(1992) of 16 November, the Council, again acting under Chapter VII, tightened procedures for implementing the mandatory sanctions.

As reported by the Secretary-General,(97) a total of 111 replies from 107 States was received as at 29 May 1992 on measures they had initiated to implement a general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons to Yugoslavia. In December 1991,(98) the Council had requested reports from States on such measures and had established a reporting machinery.

In another report,(99) the Secretary-General stated that, as at 9 October 1992, 97 States had submitted information pertaining to the implementation of expanded sanctions under resolution 757(1992).

Security Council Committee on the former Yugoslavia

The Security Council Committee, established pursuant to resolution 724(1991) of 15 December 1991,(98) which consisted of all Council members, outlined its activities in two reports to the Council, of 13 April(100) and 30 December 1992.(101)

The Committee's original mandate was to monitor the implementation by States of the mandatory arms embargo against the former Yugoslavia. In accordance with its approved guidelines, the Committee, in an initial appeal of 7 February, requested all States to provide information relating to any violation or alleged violation of the arms embargo. A similar appeal was addressed to individuals and governmental and non-governmental organizations, both national and international, by means of a press release of 24 February.

Expanding the scope of mandatory sanctions by resolutions 757(1992), 760(1992) and 787(1992), the Council expanded the Committee's mandate accordingly. In June, the Committee adopted a new set of guidelines for its work, which were subsequently amended and transmitted to all States and international organizations. Following adoption of resolution 787(1992), it formulated additional guidelines incorporating further amendments.

The Committee held 47 meetings in 1992, following its first meeting on 20 December 1991. Three meetings were held on an emergency basis (to consider requests for approval of imminent flights from, or back to, Yugoslavia). The Committee devoted most of its time to consideration of matters arising from more than 2,000 communications submitted to it by States, international organizations and, in 16 instances, by NGOs and individuals. The communications consisted for the most part of notifications of the import of foodstuffs and medical supplies to Yugoslavia; requests for approval for supply to that country of commodities and products for essential humanitarian needs; applications for exemptions from the sanctions, where permitted by the Council; requests for approval of transshipments of certain commodities and products through Yugoslavia; reports of sanctions violations or suspected violations; and general questions with regard to implementation of the sanctions regime. In addition, the Committee studied material from published sources, on the basis of which it decided on three occasions to address letters to States requesting that investigations be undertaken into the suspect activities reported.

The Committee adopted a general principle that, in considering requests from States or international organizations under the various sanctions and embargo resolutions, it would not grant generic or standing but case-by-case approval. In a number of instances, it granted general approval, provided advance notification was given, with respect to the following: payment of foreign pension benefits to persons in Yugoslavia; fees and dues collectible by embassies and consulates of Yugoslavia; goods and mail going to Yugoslavia for the use of diplomatic and consular missions there; fees or customs dues for commercial traffic in transit through Yugoslavia; certain requests by international humanitarian organizations, with respect to which the Committee agreed that several shipments of aid materials might be effected to Yugoslavia within a given time (alternatively, specific amounts of such materials might be approved for shipment on any number of trips); and flights by UNPROFOR, as well as by the Secretary-General's Special Representative and the Co-Chairmen of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, as authorized under resolution 757(1992).

The Committee also formulated general principles regarding the repatriation of goods from Yugoslavia and the transfer of personal belongings to and from that country.

In the course of its deliberations, it reached a number of decisions relating to the implementation of sanctions, among them the prohibition of commercial activities of vessels owned by interests in Yugoslavia, regardless of which flag they sailed under; also prohibited were related payments and port services. That matter was settled by the Security Council in resolution 787(1992). By the same resolution, the Council enforced the Committee's position that riparian States of the Danube had the authority and obligation to enforce the sanctions on the Danube.

At several meetings, the Committee considered a number of communications from Yugoslavia requesting authorization for the import of a certain amount of oil derivatives and natural gas exclusively for the operation of humanitarian institutions and services. The Committee suggested that Yugoslavia contact the relevant United Nations humanitarian organizations in order to prepare a plan that would verify and meet the humanitarian needs described and would provide measures to ensure that any permitted products were to be distributed and consumed only to satisfy those needs.

The Committee responded positively to a request by Montenegro for authorization of the import of certain items and machinery in the aftermath of flash floods following heavy rains in October; the Committee's decision was predicated on the agreement by the United Nations Department of Humanitarian Affairs to coordinate the supervision of the import, delivery and proper use. The Committee declined, however, a request of Yugoslavia to repatriate certain works of art following their exhibition in France, having received information that there was a dispute as to the ownership of some of the items among various republics of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The Committee considered that it was not in a position to determine ownership, nor was it able to authorize shipment to Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) of items in dispute.

Faced with several requests concerning participation by athletes from Yugoslavia in international sports events, including the 1992 Olympic Games at Barcelona, Spain, the Committee established a series of conditions for such participation: the athletes were not to appear together or participate as part of a team, nor should they appear in uniform, under any banner or flag, or have any anthem dedicated to them; the international organizations hosting the sports events must assume responsibility for the selection of participating athletes, who might be accompanied by coaches, technical assistants or trainers, but not by any other personnel or officials; and the athletes must not make any political statements or gestures.

In its April report, the Committee dealt with only one specific case of reported sanctions violations, which was brought to its attention by Yugoslavia; since then, the Committee opened 45 new cases, on the basis of information from Yugoslavia and Romania, as well as on the basis of periodic reports submitted by the NATO/Western European Union (WEU) monitoring teams in the Adriatic Sea, from press reports and other sources. In response to the information presented by Yugoslavia, the Committee requested 31 States to undertake investigations, 19 of which had replied as at 29 December. The information supplied by Romania resulted in five States being requested to undertake investigations; based on NATO/WEU reports, such requests were sent to 21 States, of which 11 replied.

In two specific cases still under consideration by the Committee, it was established that sanctions violations did occur. One concerned the delivery of weapons and military equipment by an Iranian transport aircraft at Zagreb on 4 September. The Committee decided that the weapons and equipment seized should be destroyed; their destruction by Croatian authorities was witnessed and confirmed by UNPROFOR. The matter was drawn to the attention of the Security Council, while the Committee was still awaiting an explanation from Iran.

The second case involved illegal trade in pharmaceuticals between Slovenia and Yugoslavia. The Committee put on hold further exports of medical precursors to the companies involved in Yugoslavia until full explanations were submitted by the two Governments.

The Committee also pursued inquiries into the activities of three oil tankers (of Greek, Maltese and Panamanian registry), which were reported by the NATO/WEU monitoring teams to have delivered large quantities of oil and gasoline to Yugoslavia. Inquiries into the remaining specific cases were ongoing; however, in its December report, the Committee stated that as long as replies from the States concerned had not been received, it was not possible to determine whether, or to what extent, sanctions violations had occurred.

In its final observations in December, the Committee noted that the monitoring of sanctions had not been easy and that the effective implementation of sanctions had had an adverse impact on economies, particularly of those neighbouring the territory of the former Yugoslavia. The Committee expressed concern that a number of States had not responded to requests regarding measures they were expected to institute for meeting the obligations set out in the relevant sanction resolutions. It expressed disappointment at the lack of information on sanctions violations, especially from those States that were well placed to have access to such information, and emphasized that the success of the sanctions programme as a measure for settling international disputes peacefully depended on the active cooperation of all States.

While the Committee's role was to offer all possible assistance to States in undertaking their responsibility with regard to sanctions, the absence of an independent monitoring mechanism inhibited its ability to obtain original information and follow up on the investigations requested from States. The Committee considered that resolution 787(1992) had gone a long way in redressing that gap by authorizing States, acting nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, to stop and search maritime vessels or vessels on the Danube in order to establish the bona fides of the cargoes on board. The Committee expressed gratitude to the NATO/WEU monitoring teams in the Adriatic for their cooperation and said it would seek the assistance of the sanctions assistance missions operating in certain countries of the region, to verify the bona fides of commodities and products going to and from regions of the former Yugoslavia.

UNPROFOR financing

The General Assembly, by resolution 46/233 of 19 March 1992, appropriated $251.5 million gross ($250 million net) for the operation of UNPROFOR until October 1992. With the Security Council enlarging the mandate of the Force by seven separate decisions, additional appropriations were needed. In respect of the estimated $30.9 million cost associated with the enlargement of UNPROFOR for border control, the Secretary-General sought and received the concurrence of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) to enter into commitments of $10 million in order to meet the most urgent requirements of that enlargement. No additional appropriation was sought for the costs (estimated at some $27.1 million gross) associated with the reopening of Sarajevo airport and the monitoring of the so-called "pink zones".

By resolution 47/210 of 22 December, the Assembly appropriated $290,049,500 gross ($288,313,900 net), inclusive of the $10 million authorized with the prior concurrence of ACABQ for the operation of UNPROFOR for the period from 15 October 1992 to 20 February 1993.

Report of the Secretary-General (March). On 27 February,(102) the Secretary-General requested inclusion of the item on the financing of UNPROFOR in the agenda of the resumed forty-sixth session of the General Assembly, for allocation to the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee. The financial requirements of the Force were outlined in a report of 6 March.(103)

In order to act immediately on the Security Council's agreement in resolution 727(1992) to send 50 military liaison officers to promote maintenance of the cease-fire in the former Yugoslavia, the Secretary-General had authorized budgetary commitments of up to $1 million, under the authority of a 1991 Assembly resolution on unforeseen and extraordinary expenses of the Organization.(104) He subsequently sought the concurrence of ACABQ to enter into commitments not to exceed $10 million, including the $1 million already authorized, to meet expenses of the military liaison mission starting on 12 January.

The total cost of UNPROFOR was estimated at $620,676,000 gross ($616,280,000 net) for the period from 12 January 1992 to 14 April 1993.

The Secretary-General also outlined the operational plan for UNPROFOR throughout the UNPAS. He also appealed to Member States to make advances to meet the initial expenses of UNPROFOR, and to make voluntary contributions in support of the emplacement and continuing operation of the Force. He recommended the establishment of a special account for UNPROFOR under the authority of financial regulation 6.6 for the purpose of accounting for income received and expenditures made.

Evaluating the Secretary-General's estimates, ACABQ, in a report of 13 March,⁽¹⁰⁵⁾ cited a number of areas in which it believed savings could be achieved, including mission subsistence allowance, travel and transportation, redistribution and reduction of civilian staff, rental and maintenance of premises, air operations, communications and equipment, and supplies and services. It recommended that the Assembly appropriate $250 million net, including the $10 million already authorized, which it considered adequate pending the Secretary-General's submission for additional requirements beyond October 1992.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION (March)

On 19 March, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 46/233 without vote.

Financing of the United Nations Protection Force The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Protection Force and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Bearing in mind Security Council resolutions 727(1992) of 8 January 1992 and 740(1992) of 7 February 1992, which endorsed the sending of a group of military liaison officers to Yugoslavia to promote maintenance of the cease-fire,

Bearing in mind also Security Council resolution 743(1992) of 21 February 1992, by which the Council established the United Nations Protection Force for an initial period of twelve months,

Recognising that the costs of the Force are expenses of the Organization to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recognising also that, in order to meet the expenditures caused by the Force, a different procedure is required from the one applied to meet expenditures of the regular budget of the United Nations,

Taking into account the fact that the economically more developed countries are in a position to make relatively larger contributions and that the economically less developed countries have a relatively limited capacity to contribute towards such an operation,

Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the States permanent members of the Security Council, as indicated in General Assembly resolution 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, in the financing of such operations,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Force with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

1. Concurs with the observations and recommendations contained in the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

2. Urges all Member States to make every possible effort to ensure payment of their assessed contributions to the United Nations Protection Force in full and on time;

3. Decides at this stage to appropriate, in accordance with the recommendation contained in paragraph 30 of the report of the Advisory Committee an amount of 251.5 million United States dollars gross (250 million dollars net), inclusive of the amount of 10 million dollars authorized with the concurrence of the Advisory Committee under the terms of General Assembly resolution 46/187 of 20 December 1991 for the expenses of the Force, and requests the Secretary-General to establish a special account for the Force in accordance with paragraph 15 of his report;

4. Decides also, as an ad hoc arrangement, to apportion the amounts referred to in paragraph 3 above among Member States in accordance with the composition of groups set out in paragraphs 3 and 4 of General Assembly resolution 43/232 of 1 March 1989, as adjusted by the Assembly in its resolutions 44/192 B of 21 December 1989, 45/269 of 27 August 1991 and 46/198 A of 20 December 1991, and taking into account the scale of assessments for the years 1992, 1993 and 1994;

5. Decides further that, in accordance with the provisions of its resolution 973(X) of 15 December 1955, there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 4 above, their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund of the estimated staff assessment income of 1.5 million dollars approved for the Force;

6. Decides to consider the contributions of Armenia, Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Republic of Moldova, San Marino, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan to the Force in accordance with the rates of assessment to be adopted for these Member States by the General Assembly at its forty-seventh session;

7. Invites the new Member States listed in paragraph 6 above to make advance payments against their assessed contributions to be determined;

8. Invites voluntary contributions to the Force in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the procedure established by the General Assembly in its resolution 44/192 A of 21 December 1989;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the Force is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy;

10. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-seventh session the item entitled "Financing of the United Nations Protection Force";

11. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly by the start of its forty-seventh session a report on such additional requirements as may be necessary and to include in the report detailed and up-to-date information on the performance of the Force.

19 March 1992 Meeting 83 Adopted without vote

Approved by Fifth Committee (A/46/894) without vote. 18 March (meeting 62); draft by Netherlands (A/C.5/46/L.23); agenda item 149.

Meeting numbers. GA 46th session: 5th Committee 61, 62; plenary 83.

Report of the Secretary-General (December). In a 2 December report,(106) the Secretary-General estimated the cost of UNPROFOR at $292,811,400 gross ($290,924,100 net) for the period from 15 October 1992 to 20 February 1993, including $10 million in commitment authorization granted by ACABQ for the maintenance of UNPROFOR during the period beyond 14 October 1992. For the year from 21 February 1993 to 20 February 1994, he projected monthly costs of $48,112,350 gross ($47,462,350 net).

As at 31 October 1992, assessments totalling $250,455,801 had been apportioned among Member States for the operation of UNPROFOR from 12 January to 14 October. Contributions received totalled $186,975,292, leaving a shortfall of $63,480,509 in unpaid assessments. Full reimbursement to troop-contributing States for the initial six months of UNPROFOR had been delayed; only $19.3 million had been reimbursed and, as at 14 October, a balance of $64.7 million remained to be paid.

ACABQ, in a report of 11 December,(107) recommended savings through the use of available resources, carrying out UNPROFOR's various mandates in an integrated manner. It therefore recommended that the Assembly appropriate $290,049,500 gross ($288,313,900 net) for the period from 15 October 1992 to 20 February 1993 and, after that, the Secretary-General be given commitment authorization for seven months, i.e., until 20 September 1993, in the amount of $47,064,525 gross ($46,492,334 net) per month.

Approved by Fifth Committee (A/47/825) without vote, 19 December (meeting 50); draft by Kenya (A/C.5/47/L.16); agenda item 137.

Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia

By a letter of 23 November 1992 to the Security Council President,⁽¹⁰⁸⁾ the Secretary-General proposed that the Commander of UNPROFOR dispatch a dozen military, police and civilian personnel on an exploratory mission to the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, in order to assess the need for possible UNPROFOR deployment there. A request for such deployment had been presented to the Secretary-General by Kiro Gligorov, President of Macedonia, on 11 November. The Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, on 19 November, had recommended deployment to the capital, Skopje, of a small group of UNPROFOR military and police observers, with supporting political staff. Their immediate mandate would be to visit Macedonia's border areas with Albania and Serbia and to prepare a report on how a larger deployment of United Nations military and police personnel might help strengthen security and confidence there.

The Security Council's agreement with the proposal was conveyed to the Secretary-General on 25 November.⁽¹⁰⁹⁾

Concern about the situation in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, particularly of the Albanians, who made up 40 per cent of the entire population there, was expressed by Albania in a letter of 14 November.⁽¹¹⁰⁾ Recent violent clashes had left 4 persons dead, 30 wounded and more than 80 arrested. Albania recognized Macedonia's territorial integrity, but insisted that the legitimate rights of the Albanians living there be exercised. Albania requested that the region be put under international observation to avoid more bloodshed.

Report of the Secretary-General. An exploratory mission visited the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia from 28 November to 3 December 1992, the Secretary-General stated in a 9 December report.⁽¹¹¹⁾ The mission recommended that a small UNPROFOR presence be established on the inside of the Republic's borders with Albania and Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), with an essentially preventive mandate of monitoring any developments which could undermine stability. That task could be performed by an infantry battalion and 35 United Nations military observers.

The mission also recommended that a small group of United Nations civilian police be deployed in the border areas to monitor the Macedonian border police, as incidents arising from illegal attempts to cross the border had recently led to increased tension. However, unlike the military deployment, that proposal had not yet been accepted by the authorities of the former Republic.

The Commander of UNPROFOR endorsed the mission's proposals, and the Secretary-General accordingly recommended that the Security Council authorize a further enlargement of UNPROFOR's mandate and strength. The mission's report and recommendations were annexed to the Secretary-General's report.

The start-up costs for the deployment in the former Republic of Macedonia would initially be met from the resources made available for UNPROFOR by the General Assembly at its 1992 regular session.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 11 December, the Security Council met to consider the Secretary-General's report. By unanimous vote, the Council adopted resolution 795(1992).

Baltic States

The Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, in its Helsinki summit Declaration of 10 July 1992,⁽¹⁾ expressed support for the efforts of participating States to remove peacefully problems that remained from the past, such as the stationing of foreign armed forces in the Baltic States—Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania—without the required consent of those countries. CSCE called on the participating States to conclude without delay bilateral agreements, including time-tables, for the early, orderly and complete withdrawal of such foreign troops.

The Baltic States, collectively and individually, sent several communications to the Secretary-General regarding the unauthorized presence of Russian Federation forces in their territory. In August,⁽²⁾ they requested that the issue be included on the agenda of the 1992 session of the General Assembly, bilateral negotiations on the subject having been largely unsuccessful.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 25 November, the General Assembly adopted without vote resolution 47/21.

Complete withdrawal of foreign military forces from the territories of the Baltic States

The General Assembly,

Having considered the item entitled "Complete withdrawal of foreign military forces from the territories of the Baltic States",

Considering that the United Nations, pursuant to the provisions of its Charter, has a major role to play in, and responsibility for, the maintenance of international peace and security,

Recalling with particular satisfaction that independence was restored in Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania through peaceful and democratic means,

Recording that the stationing of foreign military forces on the territories of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania without the required consent of those countries is a problem remaining from the past that must be resolved in a peaceful manner,

Welcoming recent agreements on the complete withdrawal of foreign military forces from the territory of Lithuania,

Welcoming also the bilateral talks on the complete withdrawal of foreign military forces from the territories of Estonia and Latvia,

Concerned about the continuing absence of any agreements for the complete withdrawal of foreign military forces from the territories of Estonia and Latvia,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General entitled "An Agenda for Peace", pursuant to the statement of 31 January 1992 adopted at the conclusion of the meeting held by the Security Council at the level of heads of State and Government,

Mindful that the timely application of preventive diplomacy is the most desirable and efficient means to ease tensions before they result in conflict,

Welcoming the "Helsinki Document 1992—The Challenges of change", in particular paragraph 15, agreed upon at the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, held at Helsinki on 9 and 10 July 1992,

Recognizing that the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe is a regional arrangement in the sense of Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations, and as such provides an important link between European and global security,

Recognizing also that regional organizations participating in complementary efforts with the United Nations may encourage States outside the region to act supportively,

1. Expresses support for the efforts made by the States participating in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe to remove the foreign military forces stationed on the territories of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania without the required consent of those countries, in a peaceful manner and through negotiations;

2. Calls upon the States concerned, in line with the basic principles of international law and in order to prevent any possible conflict, to conclude without delay appropriate agreements, including timetables, for the early, orderly and complete withdrawal of foreign military forces from the territories of Estonia and Latvia;

3. Urges the Secretary-General to use his good offices to facilitate the complete withdrawal of foreign military forces from the territories of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to keep Member States informed of progress towards the implementation of the present resolution and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session;

5. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-eighth session the item entitled "Complete withdrawal of foreign military forces from the territories of the Baltic States".

General Assembly resolution 47/21

25 November 1992 Meeting 72 Adopted without vote

3-nation draft (A/47/L.19); agenda item 139.

Sponsors: Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania.

Introducing the draft on behalf of the Baltic States, Latvia said that stationed in their territories were approximately 100,000 former Soviet military forces. Contrary to earlier agreements, new recruits had been rotated in order to replace departing troops. Military aircraft conducted unauthorized sorties in Baltic skies, endangering civil aviation, and continued to carry out bombing exercises with live ordnance. Cargo aircraft entered and departed Baltic territory without the knowledge and permission of the respective Government. Ports were used by foreign military naval forces, and vessels that operated from those bases were outside the control of local government and had on occasion been transferred to third countries. Nuclear reactors, controlled by the foreign military forces in Estonia, were accessible neither to the Estonian Government nor to international inspectors.

Following the July 1992 Helsinki summit, agreements signed between Lithuania and the Russian Federation provided that the former Soviet military forces stationed in Lithuania would be completely withdrawn by 31 August 1993. However, those agreements were called into question when the President of the Russian Federation, by decree, suspended the withdrawal of military forces from the Baltic States and made the implementation of economic agreements between the Russian Federation and those States conditional on the granting of social guarantees to the foreign military forces. Equally disturbing were provisions of the decree that appeared to link the Russian Federation's commitment to withdraw its forces completely with the resolution of other issues.

The Russian Federation stated that it was attempting to complete the withdrawal as quickly as was feasible in the light of the need for simultaneous troop withdrawal from other foreign States. Having already agreed on a timetable for complete withdrawal from Lithuania by 31 August 1993, the Russian Federation proposed an accelerated withdrawal from Estonia and Latvia before the end of 1994, with the understanding that agreements would be reached on issues to ensure an orderly withdrawal and normal function of the troops during withdrawal. The temporary suspension of such withdrawal should not be seen as a political decision but as a measure for creating social protection for the military personnel involved. The Russian Federation was determined to settle all the problems between itself and the Baltic States in a responsible and constructive manner and in a spirit of cooperation and good-neighbourliness.

Other States

Armenia-Azerbaijan

Armenia and Azerbaijan, two newly independent States recently admitted to membership of the United Nations, had become involved in the situation in and around Nagorno-Karabakh, an enclave in Azerbaijan marked by over four years of lighting between its Armenian and Azerbaijani inhabitants.(1)

The situation was brought to the attention of the Secretary-General on 13 March 1992(2) by Ukraine, which described it as having reached a critical point, causing untold suffering among the population and dangerously destabilizing the situation in the region. Ukraine declared its support for the peace efforts of CSCE and the recommendations of its Committee of Senior Officials, and called for the withdrawal from the region of all armed formations, including the armed forces of the Commonwealth of Independent States. Escalation of the fighting was confirmed by Azerbaijan on 9 May,(3) when it reported that Armenian forces had occupied and destroyed Nagorno-Karabakh's city of Shusha, cutting off the only road linking that city with the rest of Azerbaijan; it made reference to a separatist movement instigated by ardent nationalists from Khankendi and their protectors, including Armenia, which were fuelling hatred and war. Earlier, on 27 March,(4) Iran reported on its efforts, at a tripartite meeting with Armenia and Azerbaijan at Tehran, to mediate an extension of a cease-fire in Nagorno-Karabakh.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (May)

On 11 May,(5) Armenia requested an emergency meeting of the Security Council to consider the escalating conflict. Accordingly, the Council met on 12 May. Following consultations among Council members, the President made a statement(6) on behalf of the Council:

Meeting number. SC 3072.

"The members of the Security Council are deeply concerned by recent reports on the deterioration of the situation relating to Nagorno-Karabakh and by violations of cease-fire agreements which have caused losses of human life and widespread material damage, and by their consequences for the countries of the region.

"The members of the Security Council commend and support the efforts undertaken within the framework of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE), as well as other efforts aimed at assisting the parties in arriving at a peaceful settlement and at providing humanitarian assistance.

"They welcome the urgent dispatch by the Secretary-General of a mission to the region for fact-finding and to study ways and means to speedily assist the efforts undertaken within the framework of the CSCE to help the parties to reach a peaceful settlement. This mission will also include a technical element to look into ways the international community could provide prompt humanitarian assistance.

"The members of the Security Council call upon all concerned to take all steps necessary to bring the violence to an end, to facilitate the work of the Secretary-General's mission and to ensure the safety of its personnel. They recall the statements made on their behalf by the President of the Council on 29 January and 14 February 1992 on the admission respectively of Armenia and Azerbaijan to the United Nations, in particular the reference to the Charter principles relating to the peaceful settlement of disputes and the non-use of force."

Communications (May-August). Between May and August, Azerbaijan alleged continuing Armenian aggression, with Armenian military forces attacking the town of Lachin, not within Nagorno-Karabakh,(7) and other Azerbaijani areas along the Armenia-Azerbaijan border in order to create a perimeter of "scorched territory" uninhabited by Azerbaijanis.(8) It subsequently reported that Armenia had carried out military operations along the entire length of the Armenia-Azerbaijan frontier, seizing Lachin, Shusha, Yukharyt-Askipara, Barkhudarly and Kiarka—to which Azerbaijan had been compelled to respond by exercising its right of self-defence to preserve its sovereignty and territorial integrity—and that CSCE had put forward proposals for a 60-day cease-fire.(9)

Armenia, referring to the alleged attacks and territorial seizures, contended that self-defence units from Nagorno-Karabakh were simply securing a road extending from Nagorno-Karabakh to Armenia to make it a safe corridor for the transport of humanitarian aid to Armenians in Nagorno-Karabakh.(10) On 20 August,(11) Armenia informed the Security Council President that, despite the fact-finding mission dispatched by the United Nations to the region in May to study ways of assisting CSCE negotiations towards resolving the conflict, the situation in Nagorno-Karabakh had rapidly deteriorated; it was therefore requesting an urgent meeting of the Council to consider ways to stabilize the situation.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (26 August)

Following consultations among the members of the Security Council on 26 August, the President made a statement(12) on behalf of the Council, in connection with the item entitled "The situation relating to Nagorno-Karabakh":

"The members of the Security Council are deeply concerned by recent reports on the deterioration of the situation relating to Nagorno-Karabakh with heavy losses of human life and widespread material damage.

"The members of the Council strongly appeal to all parties and others concerned for an immediate cease-fire and support the efforts of the Minsk Conference on the question of Nagorno-Karabakh within the framework of the CSCE, as well as the preparatory negotiations held in Rome. They urge all parties and others concerned to cooperate closely with the CSCE and to participate positively in the negotiations with a view to reaching a peaceful settlement of their disputes as early as possible. They have noted that the Secretary-General dispatched fact-finding missions to the region and was ready to send observers to the above CSCE negotiations. The members of the Council will consider further the role of the United Nations in Nagorno-Karabakh at an appropriate time in the light of the development of the situation in the area."

Communications (October). Armenia on 12 October(13) stated that a cease-fire agreement as proposed by CSCE was unfortunately not concluded. However, a recent meeting with the Russian Federation, Kazakhstan, Armenia and Azerbaijan (Sochi, Russian Federation, 21 September) resulted in a cease-fire agreement, with effect from 26 September, but that had been seriously violated. With Azerbaijan's explicit expression of willingness to enter into a cease-fire agreement and of consent to the deployment of observers in the region, Armenia requested the United Nations to send observers to assist both parties to implement a cease-fire. Certain that the appropriate time for such involvement was immediate, Armenia requested an urgent meeting of the Security Council to consider its request.

Azerbaijan, on 15 October,(14) advised that two cease-fire agreements had been signed: at Alma Ata, Kazakhstan, on 27 August; and at Sochi, on 21 September. A protocol covering the cease-fire arrangements and deployment of observers had also been signed in Moscow on 25 September. The first group of observers were deployed in the conflict zone and began operations on 28 September, and CSCE was continuing to strengthen the negotiating process between the parties.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (October)

Responding to Armenia's request, the Security Council met on 27 October. Before it was a statement from Azerbaijan,(15) expressing grounds for optimism with regard to accelerating the settlement process within the CSCE framework.

Following consultations among Council members, the President was authorized to make a statement(16) on behalf of the Council:

Meeting number. SC 3127.

"The Security Council is deeply concerned by the grave situation which continues to prevail in Nagorno-Karabakh and surrounding districts, and also by the resulting loss of human life and destruction of property, despite the cease-fire agreement concluded at Sochi on 21 September 1992.

"The Security Council reaffirms the terms of its statement of 26 August 1992 on the situation concerning Nagorno-Karabakh, and in particular its support for the efforts of the Minsk Conference on the Nagorno-Karabakh question within the framework of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE). It strongly urges all the parties and others concerned to implement the cease-fire forthwith and to lift all blockades. It requests that the Minsk Conference be convened immediately and that political negotiations be undertaken in accordance with the President's rules of procedure. It urges all the parties and others concerned to cooperate closely with the CSCE and to participate positively in the Conference in order to reach an overall settlement of their disputes as soon as possible.

"The Security Council welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to send a representative to the region to evaluate the contribution which the United Nations might make in supporting the efforts of the CSCE and in providing humanitarian assistance."

Welcoming the Council statement, Armenia said on 29 October(17) it accepted fully and unconditionally the Council's renewed call for an immediate cessation of hostilities and was ready to cooperate with the United Nations and CSCE in that regard. Subsequently, Armenia,(18) referring to a de facto economic blockade by Azerbaijan, appealed for humanitarian assistance, while Azerbaijan(19) reported new aggressions by Armenia in areas along their common border. Moreover, Azerbaijan(20) registered its vigorous objection with the Security Council President to the use of "Nagorno-Karabakh Republic" in a 31 October letter circulated as a Council document at Armenia's request,(21) and categorically rejected any attempt to introduce into United Nations usage, even in veiled form, the concept of an administrative-territorial entity which did not exist in Azerbaijan.

Report of an investigative mission. By a note of 24 July, the Secretary-General transmitted the report of a mission he had appointed, of three experts assisted by two Secretariat members, to investigate reports of chemical-weapons use in Azerbaijan. The mission was dispatched in response to two communications from Azerbaijan in June:(23) one alleged chemical attacks by Armenia on Nakhichevan, an Azerbaijani enclave in Armenia; the other transmitted, among other documents, the results of laboratory analyses of blood and other samples relating to the attacks. The mission's report described the methodology used, the on-site inspections where chemically armed artillery bombardments were alleged to have taken place, and chemical analyses of the samples taken.

The report observed that the initial information of chemical-weapons use was ambiguous at best; the finding of cyanide ion in chemical analyses could have a number of natural explanations; the events described as suggestive of such use were in no way typical of chemical attacks; the cases examined were instances of chemical injuries combined with those from conventional weapons, which were small in number and randomly dispersed over zones of conflict; and it was unlikely that chemical warfare agents would be used in such a way that no clusters of contaminated persons without conventional injury would have occurred. Furthermore, neither the histories told nor the signs and symptoms observed pointed to any of the recognized chemical warfare agents.

The report concluded that the events described could also be readily explained by causes other than chemical weapons; none agreed with any pattern that would be expected from a chemical attack. In sum, no evidence of chemical-weapons use was presented to the team.

Georgia

During 1992, the United Nations was apprised of an armed conflict that had broken out in Abkhazia, in the north-western part of Georgia, another newly independent State recently admitted to the United Nations.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (September)

After consultations held by the Security Council on 10 September, its President made the following statement⁽²⁴⁾ to the media on behalf of the Council:

"The members of the Security Council, having heard the information provided by the Secretary-General and having considered the final document of the Moscow meeting between the President of the Russian Federation and the Chairman of the State Council of the Republic of Georgia on 3 September 1992, express their satisfaction with the efforts of the participants of the meeting aimed at achieving an immediate cease-fire, overcoming the crisis situation and creating conditions for a comprehensive political settlement in Abkhazia, which had become an area of armed conflict.

"The members of the Council, stressing the urgent necessity for a political settlement of the conflict by peaceful means, through negotiations, reaffirm the inadmissibility of any encroachment upon the principle of territorial integrity and upon Georgia's internationally recognized borders, and the necessity of respecting the rights of all people of all ethnic groups in the region. They welcome the resumption of the normal functioning of the legitimate authorities in Abkhazia.

"In this connection the members of the Council welcome the principles of the settlement contained in the above-mentioned final document and commend concrete measures aimed at the settlement in Abkhazia envisaged in it. They call upon all the parties in the conflict and all others concerned to observe strictly the agreements achieved in Moscow.

"The members of the Council take note of the intention of the Secretary-General to send a goodwill mission and request him to inform the Council periodically of the developments in Abkhazia."

Mission of good offices (September)

The Secretary-General, on 7 October,⁽²⁵⁾ transmitted to the President of the Security Council the report of the mission of good offices to Georgia. Led by the Director of the Europe Division, Department of Political Affairs, the mission extended from 12 to 20 September. At Tbilisi, it met with Eduard Shevardnadze, Chairman of the State Council, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, the Deputy Prime Minister and representatives of the State Council and several political parties. Thereafter, it met with members of the Supreme Council of Abkhazia, including its first Deputy President, at the Abkhazian capital of Sukhumi, and its President, at Gudauta, with whom lengthy discussions were held. The mission also met with ICRC representatives. On its return to Tbilisi, it again met with Mr. Shevardnadze and held talks with the diplomatic community.

The report stated that the immediate crisis in Abkhazia could be attributed to two developments early in the year: widespread sabotage and looting that resulted in some 11 billion roubles in lost goods and in the virtual severance of Georgia's links with the Russian Federation, its main trading partner; and to actions by the ethnic Abkhaz leadership issuing from its 1990 declaration of the former Abkhaz Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic as an independent republic.

The report described Abkhazia's 540,000 population as 47 per cent Georgian, 18 per cent Abkhaz (ethnically related to the north Caucasian mountain tribes and mostly Islamic), 18 per cent Armenian and 13 per cent Russian. The decades-long on-and-off tense relations between Georgians and Abkhaz resurfaced in 1978 when the Abkhaz launched a campaign to separate the Autonomous Republic of Abkhazia from the Georgian Soviet Socialist Republic and to incorporate it in the Russian Federative Socialist Republic. Although rejected by the latter and Georgia, the event resulted in significant concessions to the Abkhaz, including a disproportionate representation in the Supreme Soviet of Abkhazia, a preferential treatment perceived by Georgians as unfair to them.

Georgian opposition to new demands in 1989 that Abkhazia be separated from Georgia and granted the status of full Union Republic, which it had enjoyed from 1921 to 1930, led to the first of a series of violent incidents causing a significant number of deaths. In August 1990, the Abkhaz Supreme Soviet declared Abkhazia a sovereign republic of the Soviet Union independent of Georgia, an action immediately annulled by the Georgian Supreme Soviet.

In December 1991, a new Supreme Council of Abkhazia, elected under an electoral law agreed on by the Abkhaz leadership and the Georgian Government during Zviad Gamsakhurdia's presidency, allocated the seats on that Council as follows: 28 to Abkhazians, 26 to Georgians and 11 to the remaining Armenians and Russians. Instead of easing political tensions, this split the Council into two opposing factions so that it ceased to function as a whole.

In mid-1992, in the face of sabotage and looting too widespread for the police to control, Georgia sent 2,000 troops into Abkhazia to protect the railway and communication links. Fierce fighting broke out. Some 200 persons died, hundreds were wounded and up to 40,000 persons became refugees or displaced. While acknowledging that the Abkhaz had legitimate grievances, Georgia stressed that the attack against its troops was unprovoked and planned in advance. The Abkhaz leadership, which relocated to Gudauta, contended that the true purpose of the troops was to oppress the Abkhazians.

On 3 September, an agreement was signed in Moscow by the President of the Russian Federation, Boris Yeltsin, and Chairman Shevardnadze, and agreed to by the Abkhazian leadership. The agreement, the text of which was submitted to the Security Council on 8 September,(26) provided, inter alia, for: the territorial integrity of Georgia, a cease-fire effective 5 September, a Monitoring and Inspection Commission composed of representatives of Georgia, Abkhazia and the Russian Federation to ensure compliance with the agreement, the disarming and withdrawal of all outside illegal armed formations, the reduction of Georgia's armed forces in Abkhazia, the exchange of detainees, prisoners and hostages by 10 September, the removal of all impediments to the free movement of goods and persons, the return of refugees and the search for missing persons, and the resumption of the normal functions of the legitimate authorities of Abkhazia by 15 September. The agreement also appealed for United Nations and CSCE support for the principles it embodied.

Georgia agreed to the need to preserve Abkhazia's autonomy and its self-government status, but stressed that a solution had to preserve Georgia's territorial integrity and be acceptable to both Abkhaz and Georgians. The Abkhaz leadership, which alleged having been forced to sign the 3 September agreement, insisted that Abkhazia was not part of Georgia; thus, references to Georgia's territorial integrity did not affect Abkhazia. It conditioned implementation of the agreement—including withdrawal of the north Caucasian elements and resumption of the Abkhazian authorities' functions—on the withdrawal of all Georgian troops from Abkhazia. It called for direct negotiations with Georgia in order to establish some kind of confederation or federation.

The report observed that the situation in Abkhazia remained tense and explosive and could easily transcend Georgia's borders. The 3 September agreement remained largely unimplemented and law and order had broken down to a serious degree. The agreement should remain the foundation for a peaceful settlement. The international community could help to encourage both sides to abide by the agreement and negotiate a political settlement.

Communications. On 6 October,(27) the First Deputy Minister for Foreign Affairs of Georgia requested an urgent meeting of the Security Council to consider the grave and deteriorating situation in the country as a result of armed conflict unleashed in Abkhazia, threatening regional and international peace and security.

That request had been made four days earlier(28) by the Vice-Chairman of the State Council of Georgia, who informed the Secretary-General that, on 1 October, Abkhaz separatists, in conjunction with mercenary terrorists from the north Caucasian regions of the Russian Federation, mounted a large-scale offensive against the town of Gagra and advanced towards the Georgian-Russian Federation border, cutting off the northern part of Abkhazia from the rest of Georgia. The attackers were armed with state-of-the-art tanks and other weaponry of the kind with which the Russian army was equipped. The Vice-Chairman underscored the apparent conspiracy of the Abkhaz separatists with reactionary forces in Russia. An accompanying appeal for help to CSCE added that the aggression against Georgia climaxed on 3 October when an attempt was made on the life of the State Council Chairman.

In a statement of 7 October,(29) Georgia's First Deputy Foreign Minister recounted the events occurring in Abkhazia and its implications for Georgia's sovereignty and territorial integrity. He spoke of the Russian military's collaboration with separatists and direct aggression against Georgia, which the Government of the Russian Federation was unable to curb. He requested that a small United Nations peace-keeping force, or 10 to 15 military observers, be sent to the region.

On 8 October,(30) the Chairman of the State Council reported that, according to reliable sources from Abkhazia, mass executions of the Georgian civilian population, widespread torture, rape and other atrocities were being committed. He appealed to the Security Council to consider setting up a war crimes commission, with which Georgia was ready to cooperate in furnishing material evidence that might be deemed appropriate.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (October)

In response to Georgia's request, the Security Council convened on 8 October. At its request, Georgia was invited to participate under rule 37^a of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.

Following consultations among Council members, the President made a statement(31) on behalf of the Council:

Meeting number. SC 3121.

"The Security Council has noted with concern the report of the Secretary-General regarding the situation in Georgia dated 7 October 1992. It thanks the Secretary-General for the useful information contained in that document. It expresses its grave preoccupation regarding the recent deterioration of the situation in Georgia. It calls on all the parties to cease the fighting forthwith and to observe the terms of the agreement concluded on 3 September 1992 in Moscow. Which affirms that the territorial integrity of Georgia shall be ensured, which provides for the establishment of a cease-fire, the commitment by the parties not to resort to the use of force, and which constitutes the basis for an overall political solution.

"The Council supports the decision of the Secretary-General to send, in response to the request of the Government of Georgia, another mission to Georgia, headed by an Under-Secretary-General, which will be accompanied by members of the Secretariat, some of whom will remain on the spot. It endorses the mandate proposed by the Secretary-General in his letter of 7 October. It looks forward to the report to be submitted by the Secretary-General upon the return of his mission from Georgia and is prepared to consider the recommendations which the Secretary-General plans to submit to it concerning the contribution which the United Nations could make to the implementation of the agreement of 3 September.

"The Council notes that the current Chairman of the CSCE intends to dispatch a mission to Georgia in the near future and underlines the need to ensure coordination between the efforts of the United Nations and those of the CSCE aimed at restoring peace."

Mission of good offices (October)

On 10 November,(32) the Secretary-General informed the Security Council President that he had sent a second mission to Georgia, from 13 to 16 October, headed by the Director-General of the United Nations Office at Geneva and including the Director of the Europe Division of the Department of Political Affairs.

A summary of the mission's report stated that the situation in Abkhazia had seriously deteriorated since the first mission. Severe fighting had broken out, the military build-up had intensified, Georgians and Abkhazians were accusing each other of the most serious human rights violations and a war mentality seemed to be taking hold. Relations had deteriorated between Georgia and the Russian Federation, mediator of the 3 September agreement, thus handicapping the peace process. Besides capturing the town of Gagra on 1 October and gaining control of the area from the northern cease-fire line along the Bzib River to the Russian Federation border to the north and west, the Abkhaz forces, supported by northern Caucasian fighters, had attacked Ochamchira, 55 kilometres south-east of Sukhumi. Ochamchira's capture could lead to the fall of Sukhumi and bring almost 80 per cent of Abkhazia under Abkhaz control. That could trigger a major military action in the area that could involve neighbouring countries.

The 3 September agreement appeared to have completely broken down and attempts during the first half of October to put it back on track proved unsuccessful. Georgia continued to support full implementation of the agreement, but called for restoration of the status quo prior to 1 October, when the Abkhaz resumed the fighting. It underlined that a crucial question was whether the international community accepted Georgia's territorial integrity and therefore recognized its right to deploy troops within its own borders. It expressed deep concern about the hostile intentions of the illegal "Confederation of Mountain Peoples of the Caucasus" established in the north Caucasus region of the Russian Federation, including its intention to make Sukhumi its capital. It stated that no action had been taken to ensure the withdrawal of the illegal north Caucasian elements from Abkhazia and that their numbers had increased to about 3,000.

The Abkhaz leadership agreed to the implementation of the 3 September agreement but insisted that, according to its interpretation, all Georgian troops were to be withdrawn from Abkhazia, which turned out not to be the case. Therefore, it preferred to conclude a new agreement explicitly stipulating such withdrawal. It recognized the principle of territorial integrity but insisted that the principle of self-determination also had to be respected. Above all, Abkhazia had declared its own "sovereignty" prior to Georgia's admission to the United Nations, of which the Organization had taken no notice. The United Nations, it stated, could play a very important role in Abkhazia, provided it fairly addressed the issues of concern to the Abkhaz.

The mission observed that the potentially explosive situation described by the first mission had clearly worsened. If not reversed and if confidence in the peace process of the 3 September agreement was not rebuilt, large-scale fighting appeared inevitable.

Communications. By a letter transmitted on 11 November,(33) Georgia said the fact-finding mission was an important step towards a peaceful settlement. However, confrontation was intensifying and the number of casualties increased daily, as the Abkhaz separatists, along with mercenaries from other countries, continued to carry out military operations. The rest of Georgia was engulfed by a surge of refugees originating in Abkhazia. Georgia still invested its greatest hopes in international organizations, first and foremost in a prompt and effective response by the Security Council.

On 25 December,(34) Georgia informed the Secretary-General that the military-political situation in the country had somewhat changed. It called for inclusion of the issue on the 1993 agenda of the Security Council and suggested that it be the subject of a formal Council debate. Any Council resolution adopted on it should provide for a United Nations peace-keeping force in the Abkhazian region, as well as for an appeal to neighbouring States to support the efforts for a peaceful settlement of the Abkhaz problem, to refrain from actions that might cause a further escalation of the confrontation and not to allow any encroachment on Georgia's territorial integrity. Georgia also suggested that coordination of Council efforts with those of various regional and subregional international organizations could be highly effective.

Tajikistan

The Secretary-General, on 29 October 1992,⁽³⁵⁾ informed the President of the Security Council of his decision to send a United Nations good-offices mission to Tajikistan and other countries in Central Asia. That decision was in response to two communications, of 29 September and 15 October, from Tajikistan and in the context of a report of a United Nations fact-finding mission to Uzbekistan and Tajikistan from 13 to 23 September.

The mission, to be led by a Director in the Secretariat's Department of Political Affairs, was scheduled to leave New York on 1 November for Moscow and thence to Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan and Kazakhstan. The actual visit to Tajikistan and neighbouring countries took place from 4 to 13 November, with a stopover for consultations in Moscow on 3 and 14 November.

Tajikistan informed the Council President earlier, on 21 October,⁽³⁶⁾ of the armed confrontations among various factions in the country and consequent death and destruction, and urgently requested that a mission be dispatched to help settle the conflicts and provide emergency humanitarian aid. Kyrgyzstan⁽³⁷⁾ and the Russian Federation⁽³⁸⁾ also drew attention to the civil strife and to the threat of its further escalation and expansion, with catastrophic consequences for Tajikistan's territorial integrity and the security of the whole Central Asian region. On 29 October,⁽³⁹⁾ Tajikistan informed the Secretary-General that several officers of the Russian Federation's military command in the country had been won over by one of the local factions and that armoured vehicles and tanks stolen from the Russian command were being used in the fighting.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

On 30 October, the Security Council met to discuss the Tajikistan situation. After consultations among Council members, the President was authorized to make the following statement⁽⁴⁰⁾ on behalf of the Council:

Meeting number: SC 3131.

"The Security Council has considered the communications received from the Government of Tajikistan.

"The Security Council expresses its very grave concern about the continuing deterioration in the situation in Tajikistan, which is causing considerable loss of human life and serious material damage. It notes with concern the consequences for peace and security in the region that this crisis might entail.

"The Security Council calls on all parties to the conflict to end the fighting. It urges the Government of Tajikistan, local authorities, party leaders and other groups concerned to enter into a political dialogue with a view to reaching an overall settlement of the conflict by peaceful means. It calls on parties in neighbouring countries to refrain from any action which might contribute to increasing tension and to impeding a settlement.

"The Security Council welcomes the efforts made by the member countries of the Commonwealth of Independent States, on the initiative of the Republic of Kyrgyzstan, and those undertaken by other States to help Tajikistan to resolve the crisis. It invites the Government of Tajikistan and all other parties to the conflict to cooperate actively with all these efforts.

"The Security Council welcomes the Secretary-General's decision to send a goodwill mission, including a humanitarian assistance mission, to Tajikistan and Central Asia, in response to the requests of the Governments of the region, within the next few days as a contribution by the United Nations to resolving the conflict.

"The Security Council calls on all parties to the conflict and the neighbouring countries to facilitate the work of the Secretary-General's mission and to ensure the safety of its personnel."

Subsequently, in December, Kazakhstan⁽⁴¹⁾ informed the Council President of a further dangerous development, namely, that one of the warring factions had occupied a number of government buildings and announced a change of power in Tajikistan; and Tajikistan⁽⁴²⁾ advised the Secretary-General of repeated violations of its borders by Afghanistan.

Middle East

United Nations efforts to bring about a comprehensive settlement of the complex Middle East conflict remained unswerving throughout 1992. The parties to the conflict were themselves engaged in an ongoing peace process sponsored by the Russian Federation and the United States, to the multilateral negotiations of which the United Nations had been invited as a full participant. Several Member States welcomed as a positive contribution to that process the fact that the General Assembly, deviating from past practice, did not adopt a general resolution on the Middle East during the year. The Assembly expressed the need, however, for the United Nations to play an expanded role in that process.

Concerted action by various United Nations bodies focused on the question of Palestine; on the policies and practices of Israel in the Palestine territory, including Jerusalem, and other Arab territories it had occupied since 1967; and on assistance to the Palestine refugees. To help keep the region's volatility in check, the Security Council extended the mandate of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, as well as that of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force in the Golan Heights, so that both peace-keeping operations remained in place throughout the year.

The Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People (Committee on Palestinian rights) continued to press for the implementation of its original (1976) recommendations on the rights of the Palestinians to return to their homes and property and to achieve self-determination, national independence and sovereignty in Palestine—and for the convening of an international peace conference under United Nations auspices. The Assembly considered that such a conference should take place, at a certain stage, in the light of the Secretary-General's assessment that sufficient agreement did not exist to permit its imminent convening.

The Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Palestinian People and Other Arabs of the Occupied Territories (Committee on Israeli practices) drew to the Assembly's attention the worsening situation in the occupied territories owing to Israeli policies and practices there and to the occupation itself. The Commission on Human Rights reiterated the Palestinians' right to self-determination and called on Israel to desist from human rights violations in the territories.

The United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East continued to provide a wide-ranging programme of education, health, relief and social services for the Palestine refugees. It appealed for more funds from the donor community to enable it to expand its services to meet rising demands from a refugee population that had swelled to an estimated 2.73 million by the end of the year.

By a series of resolutions, the Assembly addressed specific aspects of the refugee problem and of the situation in the occupied territories. By mid-1992, those territories had been under Israeli occupation for a quarter of a century. Throughout that time, the territories' Palestinian and other Arab inhabitants had refused to accept the occupation as a permanent fact. The persistent uprising, born of that refusal, and its suppression by Israeli military force and collective punishment led the Assembly once more to request the Security Council urgently to consider measures to provide international protection to the Palestinian civilians in those territories. The Security Council condemned the renewed cycle of violence between March and April. It convened in January to consider Israel's resumption of deportations, on that occasion of 12 Palestinians accused of inciting terrorism. It met again in December strongly to condemn Israel's deportation of hundreds of Palestinians into Lebanon, to demand their safe and immediate return to the territories, and to ask the Secretary-General to consider dispatching a representative to discuss the matter with the Government of Israel. Of the 418 Palestinians under deportation orders, 383 were deported into southern Lebanon despite that country's unwillingness to receive them.

The Economic and Social Council, as well as the Assembly, deplored Israel's confiscation of land, its appropriation of water resources and depletion of other economic resources. A number of other United Nations organs and specialized agencies maintained their programmes of economic and social assistance for the Palestinians during the year.

Middle East situation

The General Assembly, deviating from past practice, in 1992 did not adopt a resolution on the general situation in the Middle East—a gesture welcomed by several Member States as a positive contribution to the ongoing peace process launched at Madrid, Spain, in 1991.(1) While welcoming that process, the Assembly reaffirmed the urgency of achieving a comprehensive settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict—the core of which was the question of Palestine—and considered that the convening, at a certain stage, of an International Peace Conference on the Middle East under United Nations auspices would contribute to the promotion of peace in the region (resolution 47/64 D).

It was the Secretary-General's assessment, however, that sufficient agreement did not exist to permit convening such a conference in the foreseeable future. In the meantime, the United Nations had become a full participant in the multilateral negotiations on regional matters of the ongoing peace process.

Reports of the Secretary-General. In response to a General Assembly request of 1991,(2) the Secretary-General reported to the Assembly and the Security Council on developments in the Middle East situation during the period 16 November 1991 to 20 November 1992.(3) He gave an overview of all aspects of the situation, including the various peace-keeping operations in the region, the situation in the occupied territories, the Palestine question and the Palestine refugees.

The Secretary-General stated that he had followed closely the Peace Conference on the Middle East in progress in Washington, D.C., had maintained contact with its co-sponsors (the United States and the Russian Federation) and the parties concerned (Israel, Lebanon, the Syrian Arab Republic and a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation), and had underlined United Nations readiness to assist in any way useful. He believed that the United Nations, with its wide experience in peace-keeping, humanitarian relief and technical assistance, was in a position to play a more substantive and integrated role in the Middle East. He recalled that United Nations peace-keeping had its origins in the region, where for decades it had contributed to peace and stability, and where, in the economic and social domains, United Nations agencies and programmes had a solid record of assistance. He noted that Security Council resolutions 242(1967)(4) and 338(1973),(5) long recognized as the cornerstone of a comprehensive settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict, were the basis of the current negotiating process.

The Secretary-General also stated that, on 20 November 1992, following the invitation extended to the United Nations as a full participant in the multilateral negotiations of the Peace Conference, he had appointed Chinmaya Rajaninath Gharekhan (India), with effect from January 1993, as his Special Representative to coordinate the role of the United Nations in the working groups on arms control and regional security, economic and regional development, environment, refugees and water.

The Secretary-General submitted a second report(6) reproducing replies, received as of 16 November from four States, to his request for information regarding implementation of the Assembly's 1991 call on all States not to provide Israel with any assistance to be used specifically in connection with settlements in the occupied Palestinian territory and other occupied Arab territories.(2)

GENERAL ASSEMBLY CONSIDERATION

During the General Assembly's consideration of the agenda item on the Middle East situation on 11 December 1992, Indonesia, on behalf also of Afghanistan, Cuba, Malaysia, Mauritania, Morocco, Oman, Pakistan, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, Viet Nam and Yemen, introduced a draft resolution(7) embodying the text of the resolution traditionally adopted on the item. As in the past, its provisions included a reaffirmation of the Assembly's conviction that the question of Palestine was the core of the conflict in the Middle East and that no comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the region would be achieved without the full exercise by the Palestinian people of its inalienable national rights and the immediate withdrawal of Israel from the Palestinian territory occupied since 1967, including Jerusalem, and other occupied Arab territories.

The sponsors recommended, however, that the Assembly not take action on the draft, although they reserved the right to request action on it later in the current session. Canada, Japan and the United Kingdom welcomed that recommendation as a positive contribution towards the ongoing Middle East peace process. Because the text was repetitive of the previous year's resolution on the subject,(2) the Russian Federation joined in welcoming the sponsors' decision.

Proposed peace conference under UN auspices

As requested by General Assembly resolution 46/75 of 1991, calling for an international peace conference on the Middle East,(8) the Secretary-General submitted a progress report on 27 November 1992(9) on developments concerning the prospects for such a conference, first endorsed by the Assembly in 1983.(10) The report stated that the Security Council had yet to reply to the Secretary-General's request for its views on the matter. However, Israel, Lebanon, the Syrian Arab Republic and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) had communicated their positions, in response to a similar request made of them and of Egypt and Jordan as participants in such a conference.

In its note of 9 November, Israel pointed out that it had consistently voted against Assembly resolutions calling for an international peace conference, having long advocated direct negotiations as the only framework to advance peace in the Middle East. It was currently engaged in direct, face-to-face negotiations with its neighbours in bilateral and multilateral frameworks, in the multilateral negotiations of which the United Nations had become a participant. Israel described resolution 46/75 as detached from reality and anachronistic, and found unacceptable its inclusion of PLO as a conference participant, for it was a terrorist organization and as such could not be considered a partner in peace negotiations. Resolution 46/75, by reaffirming a series of principles that prejudged the very principles contained in Council resolutions 242(1967) and 338(1973), stood in opposition to any genuine notion of peace, thus contradicting itself.

Lebanon's note of 16 November stressed the following points: it supported the convening of an international conference and agreed in principle to attend, although its primary interest lay in the liberation of all of its territory; its attendance should in no way imply a link between the resolution of its problem and that of the Middle East as a whole; it rejected any attempt to settle Palestinians in Lebanese territory; it insisted that the problem of Israel's occupation of Lebanese territory must be solved by implementing Council resolution 425(1978)(11) calling for the immediate cessation of Israel's military action against Lebanon's territorial integrity and withdrawal of Israel's forces from all Lebanese territory; and it insisted on adherence to all provisions of the 1949 General Armistice Agreement.⁽¹²⁾ Lebanon noted that its participation in the current Peace Conference was in response to a United States invitation stating the need for implementing resolution 425(1978).

The Syrian Arab Republic advised on 19 November that, in continuance of its efforts to help establish a comprehensive peace based on Council resolutions 242(1967) and 338(1973), it agreed to participate in the current Peace Conference. It stressed that a failure of that Conference to arrive at an agreement would not affect its commitment to Assembly resolution 46/75 or to other United Nations resolutions on the Arab-Israeli conflict and on the Palestine question. It stated its belief that the Assembly should reaffirm the need for continued international efforts to achieve a comprehensive peace that secured Israel's full withdrawal from all occupied Arab territories and guaranteed the national rights of the Palestinian people.

PLO, in its note of 3 November, expressed support for the peace process currently under way and had authorized Palestinian participation in it. Unfortunately, a year had passed and the negotiations had not achieved any tangible results—because, as the chairman of the observer delegation of Palestine noted in his statement on 30 November before the Assembly, of Israel's intransigent posture. Consequently, PLO believed that an international peace conference represented the most effective means of achieving peace in the Middle East. In view of the complexity of the issues relating to the Palestine question and the Middle East situation, PLO deemed it imperative that such a conference must be convened at a certain stage.

From the foregoing communications, the Secretary-General concluded that sufficient agreement did not exist to permit the convening of an international peace conference as outlined in resolution 46/75. It was important to note, he added, that the negotiations begun at Madrid had continued throughout the year and had been widened to include full United Nations participation in the multilateral working groups on regional issues.

On the other hand, the Committee on Palestinian rights,⁽¹³⁾ in adopting its work programme, continued to give utmost priority to the convening of an international peace conference under United Nations auspices.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

The General Assembly, on 11 December 1992, adopted resolution 47/64 D by recorded vote.

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 43/176 of 15 December 1988, 44/42 of 6 December 1989, 45/68 of 6 December 1990 and 46/75 of 11 December 1991,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 27 November 1992,

Having heard the statement made on 30 November 1992 by the chairman of the observer delegation of Palestine,

Stressing that achieving a comprehensive settlement of the Middle East conflict, the core of which is the question of Palestine, will constitute a significant contribution to international peace and security,

Noting the convening at Madrid, on 30 October 1991, of the Peace Conference on the Middle East and the subsequent bilateral negotiations, as well as meetings of the multilateral working groups,

Noting also that the United Nations has participated as a full, extraregional participant in the work of the multilateral working groups,

Preoccupied by the increasingly serious situation in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, as a result of persistent policies and practices of Israel, the occupying Power,

1. Reaffirms the urgent need to achieve a just and comprehensive settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict, the core of which is the question of Palestine;

2. Welcomes the ongoing peace process, which started at Madrid, and expresses the hope that it will lead to the establishment of a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the region;

3. Expresses the need for the United Nations to play a more active and expanded role in the current peace process;

4. Considers that the convening, at a certain stage, of an International Peace Conference on the Middle East, under the auspices of the United Nations, with the participation of all parties to the conflict, including the Palestine Liberation Organization, on an equal footing, and the five permanent members of the Security Council, based on Council resolutions 242(1967) of 22 November 1967 and 338(1973) of 22 October 1973 and the legitimate national rights of the Palestine people, primarily the right to self-determination, would contribute to the promotion of peace in the region;

5. Reaffirms the following principles for the achievement of comprehensive peace:

(a) The withdrawal of Israel from the Palestinian territory occupied since 1967, including Jerusalem, and from the other occupied Arab territories;

(b) Guaranteeing arrangements for peace and security of all States in the region, including those named in resolution 181(II) of 29 November 1947, within secure and internationally recognized boundaries;

(c) Resolving the problem of the Palestine refugees in conformity with General Assembly resolution 194(III) of 11 December 1948, and subsequent relevant resolutions;

(d) Dismantling the Israeli settlements in the territories occupied since 1967;

(e) Guaranteeing freedom of access to Holy Places, religious buildings and sites;

6. Notes the expressed desire and endeavours to place the Palestinian territory occupied since 1967, including Jerusalem, under the supervision of the United Nations for a transitional period or, alternatively, to provide international protection for the Palestinian people there, as part of the peace process;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his efforts with the parties concerned, and in consultation with the Security Council, for the promotion of peace in the region, and to submit progress reports on developments in this matter.

Before adopting the text as a whole, the Assembly adopted operative paragraphs 4, 5 and 6 by recorded votes of, respectively: 87 to 5, with 58 abstentions; 87 to 6, with 59 abstentions; and 90 to 5, with 57 abstentions.

The Russian Federation, a co-sponsor of the current peace talks, suggested earlier that, instead of presenting the traditional and outdated draft resolution on the convening of an international peace conference, the Assembly should adopt a brief resolution aimed at promoting the Arab-Israeli negotiations currently under way without touching on the substance of questions discussed. Such a resolution might reaffirm the urgent need for the achievement of a comprehensive, just and lasting settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict, welcome the negotiation process within the framework of the Peace Conference taking place at a bilateral level and also in multilateral working groups, call on all parties to those negotiations to demonstrate a constructive and responsible approach and on all other parties concerned to endeavour to ensure a favourable atmosphere to promote the successful conclusion of the ongoing negotiations.

Israel felt that, in the view of the current peace talks and the Secretary-General's assessment that sufficient agreement did not exist to permit the convening of an international peace conference, there was no reason for the resolution just adopted. The text was changed to call for the convening of such a conference "at a certain stage" to create the impression that the resolution and the current peace process were somehow compatible, which they were not. The resolution laid down five principles for the achievement of peace that predetermined the outcome of the proposed international conference, in contradiction of any fair notion of peace. On the other hand, the peace process begun at Madrid and continuing at Washington, D.C., was based on the principle of direct negotiations without preconditions between Israel and its Arab neighbours.

After the vote, a representative of the Permanent Observer Mission of Palestine to the United Nations underscored the importance of three principles: permanent United Nations responsibility in relation to the question of Palestine until the question was resolved in all its aspects; the effective implementation of United Nations resolutions, particularly those of the Security Council, that were binding regardless of developments in the current, or in any other, peace process; and any positive change in the international community's stance towards Israel should be meticulously concurrent with and equal to genuine progress in the peace process and in the actual situation in the occupied territories.

United Nations Truce Supervision Organization

As described by the Secretary-General in his November report on the situation in the Middle East,⁽³⁾ three peace-keeping operations remained in place in the region: two peace-keeping forces—the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force (UNDOF) (see below, under “Israel and the Syrian Arab Republic”) and the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) (see below, under “Lebanon”)—and an observer mission, the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization (UNTSO). Headquartered in Jerusalem, with liaison offices in Amman, Jordan, and Beirut, Lebanon, UNTSO continued to assist UNDOF and UNIFIL in the performance of their tasks.

UNTSO was in the process of gradually reducing its strength, from 298 to some 220 military observers. The observers were from the following countries: Argentina, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Chile, China, Denmark, Finland, France, Ireland, Italy, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Russian Federation, Sweden, Switzerland, United States.

Palestine question

The question of Palestine remained a subject of debate and of several resolutions by the General Assembly in 1992.

Besides reaffirming the question to be the core of the Middle East conflict (resolution 47/64 D), the Assembly, following its consideration of the annual report of the Committee on Palestinian rights, endorsed the Committee's recommendations and drew the attention of the Security Council to the fact that action on them was still awaited (47/64 A); requested resources for the Division for Palestinian Rights, as well as continued cooperation with it (47/64 B); and further requested the Department of Public Information (DPI) to continue its special information programme on the question during the 1992-1993 biennium (47/64 C). It again determined that Israel's 1980 decision⁽¹⁾ to impose its laws, jurisdiction and administration on Jerusalem was illegal and therefore null and void (47/63 B).

Having reviewed the assistance provided by the United Nations system to Palestinians throughout the year, the Assembly, on the recommendation of the Economic and Social Council (1992/58), asked for sustained and increased international assistance to the Palestinian people, in cooperation with PLO (47/170). It requested the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) to maintain its programme of assistance in its current form, also in cooperation with PLO (decision 47/445).

In related actions, the Assembly demanded that Israel acknowledge the de jure applicability of the 1949 Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (fourth Geneva Convention) to the occupied Palestinian territory and other Arab territories, that it desist from changing their legal status, geographical nature or demographic composition, and that it allow the Committee on Israeli practices access to them (see below, under “Territories occupied by Israel”); the Assembly also proposed the establishment of a university for Palestine refugees (see also below, under “Palestine refugees”).

Communications. The Permanent Observer of Palestine, on 4 March 1992,⁽²⁾ transmitted to the Secretary-General a document presented by the Palestinian delegation (the Palestinian side of the joint Palestinian-Jordanian delegation) to Israel on 3 March during the round of negotiations in progress in Washington, D.C. The document outlined the model for a Palestinian Interim Self-Governing Authority (PISGA) as part of interim arrangements for self-government, based on free elections under international supervision and entailing the orderly transfer to PISGA of the powers and responsibilities currently exercised by Israel in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem. PISGA would provide a framework in which Palestinians, in the occupied territory or in exile, would be able to participate, on an equal footing, in all negotiations leading to the permanent resolution of the Palestinian question in all its aspects.

The document emphasized that acceptance of the proposed interim arrangements by the Palestinians would in no way prejudice the exercise of their legitimate right to self-determination, as embodied in the Charter of the United Nations and relevant United Nations resolutions, and as stipulated by the Assembly in 1947.⁽³⁾ It further emphasized the Palestinian resolve to establish an independent State of Palestine, alongside the State of Israel, and that, once established, it would opt for a confederal relationship with Jordan. The document defined the powers and responsibilities to be vested in PISGA and outlined the modalities for electing a legislative assembly, together with specific measures to be undertaken by Israel in advance of the elections.

Israel, in its statement before the Special Political Committee on 24 November, referred to its offer of interim arrangements for Palestinian self-government within a relatively short period, having put forward a series of proposals that would enable the Palestinians to conduct their own affairs under an administrative-executive council, which could be chosen by elections. Negotiations on a permanent settlement, based on Council resolutions 242(1967)(4) and 338(1973),(5) would begin in the third year of such arrangements. The proposed autonomy, being less than independence, was acknowledged earlier as imperfect by Israel's Minister for Foreign Affairs, but was clearly a way out of the existing impasse.

In December, during the debate on the question of Palestine, Israel expanded on its concept of the elected Palestinian council. Its broad powers and responsibilities would include administration of 15 spheres of operation: justice; personnel matters; agriculture; ecology; education and culture; finance, budget and taxation; health; industry and commerce; labour; local police; local transportation and communications; municipal affairs; religious affairs; social welfare; and tourism.

Activities of the Committee on Palestinian rights. The Committee on Palestinian rights, established in 1975,(6) continued in 1992 to follow developments in the Israeli-occupied territory and actions by Israel which the Committee regarded as violations of international law or of United Nations resolutions. It brought such actions—including Israeli settlements, Israeli exploitation of Arab-owned land, human rights violations and other matters affecting Palestinian rights—to the attention of the General Assembly and the Security Council.(7) It submitted a report on its activities to the Assembly in November.(8)

The Committee and, under its guidance, the Division for Palestinian Rights, continued to expand cooperation with non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in order to promote awareness of the Palestine question and create conditions favourable for the implementation of its recommendations. To that end, the Committee carried out its approved programme of regional NGO symposia and seminars for 1992.

The Asian symposium (Nicosia, Cyprus, 20-24 January) was on the theme of developing solidarity activities by Israeli and other organizations with Palestinian women, physicians, health workers and students; the event was combined with an Asian regional seminar on the topics of a just settlement of the Palestine question, protection of the Palestinian people in occupied Palestinian territory, and international and regional issuues. The North American symposium (New York, 24-26 June) centred on the themes of overcoming the obstacles of 25 years of Israeli occupation and of preparing the way for Palestine; it was preceded by a North American regional seminar (New York, 22 and 23 June) that focused on enforcing the 1949 fourth Geneva Convention. The European symposium (Geneva, 24 and 25 August) had as its theme "Working for peace: European coordination"; it was followed by an international NGO meeting (Geneva, 26-28 August) on the subject of protection and statehood and by a European regional seminar (Qawra, Malta, 27-29 July) that explored international action to ensure the safety and protection of Palestinians in the occupied Palestinian territory and efforts to promote implementation of United Nations resolutions on Palestine and the Middle East.

The Committee reiterated its conviction that Security Council action on its recommendations, first made in 1976,(9) would contribute to promoting a peaceful settlement of the Palestine question, the core of the Arab-Israeli conflict in the Middle East. While welcoming the Peace Conference on the Middle East begun at Madrid in 1991 and the subsequent 1992 bilateral and multilateral talks, the Committee continued to promote the convening of an international peace conference under United Nations auspices. It called on Israel to respond positively to the Palestinian peace initiative put forward by the PLO Chairman before the Assembly in 1988 and subsequent proposals, and to recognize the inalienable national rights of the Palestinian people, particularly self-determination.

The Committee expressed concern at the continuing deterioration of the situation in the occupied Palestinian territory and repressive measures imposed by Israel in violation of the fourth Geneva Convention. It deplored Israel's reliance on military force to suppress the Palestinian uprising, the intifadah, already in its fifth year, and condemned Israel's intensified pursuit of its policy of land confiscation and settlement in the occupied territories, including Jerusalem, and its imposition of curfews and collective punishment and restrictions on Palestinians' freedom of movement and economic activities.

The Committee reaffirmed that Israel's continued occupation of Palestinian and other Arab territories and denial of the Palestinians' inalienable rights to self-determination, to national independence and to return to their homes and property constituted the principal obstacles to the achievement of a just peace. It restated its full support for the intifadah to end that occupation and to implement the 1988 proclamation of independence.(10) It reaffirmed the principles it had recommended in 1976, subsequently elaborated by the International Conference on the Question of Palestine,(11) including Israel's withdrawal from the occupied territories, respect for the right of all States in the region to live in peace within secure and internationally recognized boundaries, and recognition of the national rights of the Palestinians.

In expressing hope for radical changes in Israeli policies under the new Government of Israel, the Committee called on it immediately to cease all land confiscation and settlement activities; release political prisoners; end deportations, administrative detention, ill-treatment and torture of prisoners and extrajudicial killings; restore freedom of movement and other civil liberties; and repeal the military orders through which it controlled every area of Palestinian daily life. Pending a political settlement, it pointed to the urgency of action to ensure that Israel, as occupying Power, abide by its obligations under the fourth Geneva Convention, as called for by the Security Council in 1990.(12)

Finally, the Committee reiterated its call on the United Nations system, Governments and inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations to increase their economic and social assistance to the Palestinians.

The third resolution (47/64 C) concerned United Nations information activities on the question of Palestine (see below); the fourth (47/64 D) was on the convening of an international peace conference on the Middle East (see above, under "Proposed peace conference under UN auspices").

Public information activities

The Committee on Palestinian rights(8) followed up on the implementation of a 1991 General Assembly requests(13) that DPI continue in 1992-1993 its special information programme on the Palestine question, with emphasis on public opinion in Europe and North America.

DPI in 1992 accordingly continued to provide press coverage of all United Nations meetings relevant to the question of Palestine, including those of the Security Council and the Committee, and issued press releases on the symposia and seminars organized by the Committee (see above). It provided feature coverage of various aspects of the question in news bulletins, radio programmes and World Chronicle, a 30-minute panel discussion video programme. DPI sponsored an international encounter for European journalists (Lisbon, Portugal, 16 and 17 September) that reviewed the ongoing peace process and explored, from a European perspective, ways and means to build peace in the Middle East. It also prepared for a news mission to that region, scheduled for December.

DPI distributed a total of 14,639 copies, in Arabic, English, French, German and Spanish, of three booklets: Human Rights for Palestinians: The Work of the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Af-feeling the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories;(14) The United Nations and the Question of Palestine;(15) and a revised version of For the Rights of Palestinians: Work of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People.(16) In addition, it issued two new publications, in English and French, titled Prospects for Peace in the Middle East: An Israeli-Palestinian Dialogue(17) and Life of the Palestinians under Israeli Occupation.(18)

Following up also on a 1991 Assembly request that the Division for Palestinian Rights be provided with a computer-based information system,(19) the Committee noted that a feasibility study of the proposed system had been prepared, initial hardware components had been acquired and development of the system was proceeding.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 11 December 1992, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/64 C by recorded vote.

Jerusalem

In a report of November 1992,(20) the Secretary-General reproduced replies received from four Member States to his request for information on steps taken or envisaged to implement a 1991 resolution of the General Assembly deploring the transfer by some States of their diplomatic missions to Jerusalem and calling on them to abide by the relevant United Nations resolutions.(21) Of those States, Ecuador pointed out that it maintained its Embassy in Tel Aviv.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 11 December 1992, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/63 B by recorded vote.

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 36/120 E of 10 December 1981, 37/123 C of 16 December 1982, 38/180 C of 19 December 1983, 39/146 C of 14 December 1984, 40/168 C of 16 December 1985, 41/162 C of 4 December 1986, 42/209 D of 11 December 1987, 43/54 C of 6 December 1988, 44/40 C of 4 December 1989, 45/83 C of 13 December 1990 and 46/82 B of 16 December 1991, in which it determined that all legislative and administrative measures and actions taken by Israel, the occupying Power, which had altered or purported to alter the character and status of the Holy City of Jerusalem, in particular the so-called "Basic Law" on Jerusalem and the proclamation of Jerusalem as the capital of Israel, were null and void and must be rescinded forthwith,

Recalling Security Council resolution 478(1980) of 20 August 1980, in which the Council, inter alia, decided not to recognize the "Basic Law" and called upon those States that had established diplomatic missions at Jerusalem to withdraw such missions from the Holy City,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 25 November 1992,

1. Determines that Israel's decision to impose its laws, jurisdiction and administration on the Holy City of Jerusalem is illegal and therefore null and void and has no validity whatsoever;

2. Deplores the transfer by some States of their diplomatic missions to Jerusalem in violation of Security Council resolution 478(1980), and their refusal to comply with the provisions of that resolution;

3. Calls once upon those States to abide by the provisions of the relevant United Nations resolutions, in conformity with the Charter of the United Nations;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Assistance to Palestinians

The United Nations system continued in 1992 to provide assistance to the Palestinian people, as the General Assembly had requested in 1991.(22) Summaries of the assistance activities undertaken by 10 organs and six specialized agencies of the system were contained in a report submitted by the Secretary-General to the Assembly, through the Economic and Social Council, in June 1992.(23) as updated by the following year's report on the subject.(24)

Report of the Secretary-General. According to the Secretary-General's June report, towards the end of the year, the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) completed a plan for implementing a housing development strategy for the Palestinian people, for consideration by the Commission on Human Settlements in 1993. The plan gave an overview of Palestinian land and population, as well as of the housing sector, including supply and demand, surveyed future housing delivery mechanisms, proposed a Palestinian housing strategy and action plan, and suggested housing institutions and an investment plan.

The United Nations Children's Fund focused on assistance for Palestinian children and women in Jordan, Lebanon, the Syrian Arab Republic, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. In collaboration with the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) and other United Nations organs, it supported programmes in the areas of health, pre-school and primary education, women's development, water supply and sanitation, and rehabilitation for the disabled. The objective was to reduce infant and maternal mortality and morbidity through primary health care, immunization, control of diarrhoeal diseases and respiratory infections, health education and safe child-delivery practices. A five-year (1992-1996) programme of assistance in those areas was submitted to the Executive Board in 1992 for the benefit of Palestinians in Lebanon, while a three-year (1992-1994) programme was submitted for the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

The Programme of Assistance to the Palestinian People under the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP)(25) achieved a level of activity in 1992 unmatched in its 12-year history, with expenditures totalling $12 million. By a decision adopted in May,(26) the UNDP Governing Council called on the Administrator to continue his efforts to provide development assistance to the Palestinian people and invited Governments and other donors to expand further financial and other support for the Programme.

A number of large UNDP-financed projects were completed during the year: the extension and renovation of the Princess Alia Hospital in Hebron; the construction of a packing and grading facility for fruits and vegetables in Gaza; the installation of a honey-processing plant in Jericho; the construction of a sewage-collection network in the Balata refugee camp of Nablus; and the installation of a sewage collection, treatment and disposal system in the northern region of the Gaza Strip, to serve a population of about 120,000. Two infrastructural projects in the West Bank were also completed: water-supply schemes—improvement of wells, construction of pumping stations and reservoirs, and installation of distribution networks and house connections—in 14 villages, benefiting 80,000 villagers; and installation of electricity generators, including maintenance training, in eight villages with a population of 45,000.

Ongoing income-generating projects included: the construction of new irrigation channels in the El-Duyuk area in the West Bank, to benefit some 200 farmers, and distribution of modern irrigation equipment to 1,000 others in the Gaza Strip; the construction of a marketing centre and industrial zone in Nablus; and the manufacture of equipment for a citrus-processing plant with a 20-tonne-per-hour capacity to be installed in the Gaza Strip.

The Business Development Centre continued its training activities in management, feasibility studies and marketing, from which 13 management consultants benefited during the year. In addition, training workshops were organized at Nablus, Bethlehem and Gaza, in which 150 trade unionists took part. Other workshops offered special technical training at the community level to 80 Palestinian women, new education techniques to 15 university educators, and technical and pedagogical training to 90 vocational trainees. At Bir Zeit University at Ramallah, 20 engineers and technicians, engaged in the operation and maintenance of the Gaza Strip sewage system, underwent specialized training.

An assessment of the technical cooperation and capital assistance needs conducted in the first quarter of 1992 identified priority areas for new activities: formulation of development and environmental policies; reactivation of productive sectors, particularly agriculture and industry; and human resources development, with emphasis on women's role in the development process. As a follow-up to its earlier initiatives in information exchange among donors, UNDP issued in April the first compendium of ongoing technical assistance projects in the occupied Palestinian territories.

In the latter part of the year, the Programme underwent a broad review; the findings were being taken into account in the new programming and operational initiatives in progress under the direction of the UNDP Special Representative at Jerusalem.

The Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia (ESCWA),(24) at its sixteenth session (see PART TWO, Chapter VI), adopted two resolutions on Palestinian development. One called for support for the ESCWA secretariat's activities (including studies, conferences, seminars and workshops) giving priority to rebuilding the institutional framework for development.(27) The other, which declared the period 1994-2003 a reconstruction and rehabilitation decade for Western Asia, requested ESCWA to provide technical assistance during the decade for the implementation of projects in various countries and areas, including the occupied Palestinian territory.(28) undertaken in coordination with the UNDP office at Jerusalem. One such mission, made by the ESCWA Regional Adviser on Development Issues and Policies, was aimed at analysing the current situation in the territories and proposing an integrated work programme. A joint FAO/ESCWA mission was dispatched for the purpose of preparing a report on the rehabilitation of the agricultural sector and of identifying priority projects. In addition, a training workshop on planning and appraisal of rural development projects (Jerusalem, 26 July-12 August) was organized by the joint FAO/ESCWA Division, in collaboration with UNDP/Jerusalem; it was attended by 32 trainees from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

The United Nations Population Fund assisted Palestinian NGOs engaged in providing expanded maternal health services in the same two areas. The objectives, to be fulfilled by 1995, were: increased coverage of prenatal and postnatal care; increased hospital delivery for high-risk women; research and baseline studies essential for evaluating and planning maternal and reproductive health care; family planning services; and dissemination of information on the need for birth spacing in relation to maternal and reproductive care.

UNRWA maintained an extensive programme of education, health and relief services and other humanitarian assistance to Palestine refugees (see below, under "Palestine refugees").

The project of assistance of the World Food Programme (WFP), totalling $871,900, provided food aid and cash for the purchase of local food for Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Begun in September 1991 and terminated by the end of March 1992, it was channelled through local institutions to hospital patients, orphanages and destitute families. As of the date of reporting, WFP had not received an official response from the Israeli civil administration authorities to its note of January 1992 notifying them of its intention to continue assistance to targeted beneficiaries.

As to assistance by specialized agencies, the technical cooperation activities of the International Labour Organisation (ILO) in the occupied territories, which began in 1980, centred on two types of projects in 1992. One was on trade union training, for which courses were given to 30 trainees at Nablus, Bethlehem and Gaza. The other was a three-year vocational training project for handicapped persons, organized jointly with UNDP and UNRWA and begun in 1991, under which three ILO consultants held specialized six-week seminars for persons engaged in the vocational training and placement of the handicapped.

In response to a request of the 1991 Conference of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO),(29) negotiations were held in 1992 regarding a joint FAO/UNDP mission to for-ulate an umbrella technical assistance project. Contacts were being made with potential donors, multi-lateral funding agencies, regional development banks and funds to identify and formulate agricultural investment projects in the occupied territories.

Following adoption of a resolution by the Fourth (1991) General Conference of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO), requesting increased technical assistance to the Palestinian people in close cooperation with PLO, UNIDO established a focal point to monitor developments in the Palestinian industrial sector and coordinate technical assistance activities. As a result of a mission to the West Bank and Gaza Strip that also held consultations with UNDP/Jerusalem in February 1992, UNIDO approved two projects before the end of the year: a project of technical advisory services ($49,000) under the Industrial Development Fund and a training project for small-scale industrial enterprises ($180,000) under a trust fund from Japan.

Beginning in March 1992, the UNCTAD secretariat intensified its assistance activities for Palestinians in four main areas: monitoring and analysis of Israeli policies and practices hampering Palestinian economic development; investigation of their impact on the main economic sectors; development of a database on the economy in the occupied territories and information dissemination; and coordination of activities with other United Nations organs responding to General Assembly resolutions on assistance to Palestinians and on economic and social conditions in the occupied Palestinian territory.

An eighth report,(30) prepared in accordance with a decision by UNCTAD VIII (see PART THREE, Chapter IV) that UNCTAD assistance to the Palestinian people would be continued in its current form, was submitted to the Trade and Development Board in September. As in previous years, part I of the report examined the overall policy environment, including Israeli, Palestinian, regional and international dimensions, that influenced the performance of the Palestinian economy, as well as main economic trends; assessed aggregate and sectoral performance; and identified measures for immediate action to promote the revival of an economy that was in serious deterioration. Part II reviewed progress of work being carried out by the Special Economic Unit (Palestinian people), in particular with respect to the intersectoral project investigating prospects for sustained economic and social development of the Palestinian territory of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Initiated in 1990, the project involved preparation of studies in 25 economic and social sectors, scheduled for completion during the second half of 1992.

A meeting of international and Palestinian experts (Geneva, 19-22 May), attended also by representatives of the United Nations and regional organizations, was held to discuss and adopt the findings of part one of each of the 25 studies, which made up a consolidated report on the prevailing economic and social situation in the occupied territories, with specific measures suggested for immediate action by the Israeli authorities, Palestinian inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza, and the international community. Also considered was the quantitative framework for the preparation of parts two and three of the individual studies dealing with future prospects of the Palestinian economy.

The Unit continued development of a database on the Palestinian economy, including the compilation and computerization of statistical data—on national income, population, labour and employment, balance of payments and external trade—standardized and classified according to the specifications of the secretariat's Economic Time Series. The Unit also issued a "Select bibliography on the economy of the occupied Palestinian territory (West Bank and Gaza Strip)",(31) "Selected national accounts series of the occupied Palestinian territory (West Bank and Gaza Strip), 1968-1987"(32) and "The tourism sector and related services in the Palestinian territory under Israeli occupation".(33)

UNCTAD continued to cooperate with the UNCTAD/GATT International Trade Centre (ITC) on finalizing a project document for a proposed marketing centre for Palestinian agricultural goods. Consultations were under way with ITC, UNDP and UNIDO for fielding a mission of experts to prepare a feasibility study on a similar centre for industrial goods.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

The Second Committee had before it a Secretariat note of 10 December 1992(34) reproducing the revised text of a draft resolution transmitted in October(35) by UNCTAD VIII for consideration by the General Assembly. The draft had been submitted to UNCTAD by Iran on behalf of the Group of 77 developing countries.

Based on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the Assembly, in December, adopted decision 47/445 by recorded vote.

Programmes of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development for the Palestinian people

At its 93rd plenary meeting, on 22 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, decided:

(a) To request the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to sustain its programme for the Palestinian people in its current form in close cooperation with the Palestine Liberation Organization;

(b) To urge that Conference staff and experts be given access to the occupied Palestinian territory;

(c) To invite the Trade and Development Board to consider making appropriate reporting arrangements to enable them to be informed by the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development on the progress made in the implementation of the present decision.

Incidents and disputes involving Arab countries and Israel

Iraq and Israel

By decision 47/464 of 23 December 1992, the General Assembly deferred consideration of the item on armed Israeli aggression against the Iraqi nuclear installations and included it in the provisional agenda of its forty-eighth (1993) session. The item had been inscribed yearly on the Assembly's agenda since 1981,(1) following the bombing by Israel of a nuclear research centre near Baghdad.

Lebanon

The situation in Lebanon was marked by continued violence throughout 1992. The southern part of the country, north of the border with Israel, and the western Bekaa were theatres for frequent armed confrontations between Israeli and South Lebanon Army troops on the one hand, and Islamic and other resistance groups on the other. However, a slow but gradual improvement in the security situation had begun to emerge.

Two German nationals, the last of 11 Westerners who had been held hostage in Lebanon, were released in Beirut on 17 June. After their release—hailed a victory by the Secretary-General for all who believed in the rights and dignity of the human person—Giandomenico Picco, the Secretary-General's special envoy who had been instrumental in obtaining the release of the first nine hostages in 1991,(2) stressed that the file on the hostage issue was not closed. He was referring to Lebanese, Iranian and Israeli nationals who continued to be held hostage, as well as to the remains of some Western hostages that had yet to be returned.

While developments on the security front offered encouragement, the national economy failed to show the level of recovery hoped for. The value of the Lebanese pound fell, and the country received little of the promised foreign aid for reconstruction and development, thus limiting the scope for investment and narrowing employment opportunities. Consequently, the number of families under the poverty line increased.

Israel and Lebanon

Lebanon continued in 1992 to press for the withdrawal of Israel from that part of southern Lebanon proclaimed a "security zone" by Israel and manned by Israel Defence Forces (IDF), with the assistance of the so-called South Lebanon Army, referred to also as the de facto forces (DFF). In justification of its refusal to withdraw, Israel maintained that its presence in the area was to prevent terrorist access to its northern borders. Israel's long-standing contention was that southern Lebanon served as a staging area for attacks on northern Israel by what it claimed were several terrorist factions, singling out the Shiite Muslim group Hezbollah, which the Government of Lebanon was either incapable of preventing or unwilling to prevent.

The boundaries of the Israeli-controlled Lebanese territory—an area along the armistice demarcation line—were determined by the forward positions of DFF and IDF. In 1992, both forces maintained 69 military positions, up from 65 in 1991.

Communications. Lebanon, on 17 January 1992,(3) requested that the mandate of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, due to expire on 31 January, be extended for a further six months. In so doing, Lebanon pointed out that, as a result of its efforts to steer the country towards normal conditions, it had strengthened and restructured its army and internal security units into a more cohesive force in the south of the country adjacent to Israel's self-proclaimed security zone. The army had confiscated heavy and medium weapons and banned all forms of armed presence in the areas under its control, including in the Palestinian refugee camps, and had achieved perfect coordination with UNIFIL, with which it was in consultation to determine how best to take over from UNIFIL.

Lebanon alleged that, despite these positive developments, Israel was more than ever adamant in its refusal to withdraw from southern Lebanon. Together with its proxies, it had conducted a series of bombardments and assaults on the area's civilian population during the past year. Lebanon implored the Security Council to take new steps decisively to end the violence. On 21 January,(4) it reported continued Israeli bombings on villages in the area, forcing 80 per cent of their inhabitants to flee, and the incorporation of Rashaf into the so-called security zone. Lebanon reiterated its plea for Council action to stop the escalating attacks.

Responding on 27 January,(5) Israel pointed to the escalation of terrorist activities and resulting casualties in southern Lebanon since the deployment of the Lebanese army in the south, as well as to Lebanon's failure to mention the destabilizing role of Hezbollah, the Islamic faction largely responsible for the unstable situation in the area. The true cause of the civilian population's suffering, Israel asserted, lay in the use by Hezbollah and other terrorist organizations of civilian centres as bases of operation. By refusing to disarm those elements and by praising their acts of bloodshed, the Government of Lebanon had shown itself unwilling to abide by its international obligation to prevent violence and terror within its territory and across Israel's northern border.

Israel was emphatic in its reiteration that it had no claims on any part of Lebanese territory but found it necessary to undertake security functions within a narrow zone of southern Lebanon owing to that country's failure to prevent the use of that part of its territory as a staging area for acts of terrorism against Israel. The appropriate forum for resolving issues between it and Lebanon lay in direct face-to-face negotiations, without preconditions, within the framework of the ongoing peace process.

Israel, on 29 May,(6) clarifying further the state of affairs prevailing in southern Lebanon, alleged that, frustrated by the continuing peace talks between Israel and its neighbours, Hezbollah and others had stepped up their campaign of terror. In view of Lebanon's unwillingness to act to prevent the continuous attacks against it, Israel had been compelled to engage in defensive operations, in exercise of its legitimate right to self-defence.

Lebanon, in two letters of 17 February,(7) requested an urgent meeting of the Security Council to consider what it said were the latest acts of aggression by Israel against the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Lebanon and Israel's continuing occupation of southern Lebanon and part of the Bekaa valley. Lebanon was referring to the previous day's air bombardment of the Palestinian refugee camps of Ein el-Hilweh near Sidon and Rashidieh near Tyre, and the fatal attack from the air on the motorcade carrying Hezbollah's Secretary-General and his family. It also referred to the continued bombardment of southern villages by artillery, tank rounds and machine-gun fire, as well as to violations of its airspace over the southern area.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

Responding to Lebanon's request, the Security Council convened on 19 February 1992 to consider the situation in southern Lebanon. After consultations among Council members, the President made the following statement(8) on behalf of the Council:

Meeting number. SC 3053.

"The members of the Council are deeply concerned about the renewed and rising cycle of violence in southern Lebanon and elsewhere in the region. The Council deplores in particular the recent killings and the continued violence, which threatens to claim additional lives and to destabilize the region further.

"The members of the Council call upon all those involved to exercise maximum restraint in order to bring such violence to an end.

"They reaffirm their commitment to the full sovereignty; independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries, as set out in resolution 425(1978). In this context they assert that any State shall refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

"The members of the Council express their continued support for all efforts to bring peace to the region on the basis of resolutions 242(1967) and 338(1973). The members of the Council urge all the parties concerned to work vigorously to enhance the ongoing peace process."

UNIFIL

The mandate of UNIFIL was extended twice by the Security Council during 1992, in January and July, each time for a six-month period.

Established by the Council in 1978(9) following Israel's invasion of Lebanon in March of that year,(10) UNIFIL was entrusted with confirming the withdrawal of Israeli forces, restoring international peace and security, and assisting the Government of Lebanon in ensuring the return of its effective authority in the area. A second Israeli invasion, launched in June 1982,(11) radically altered the situation in which UNIFIL had to function. Shortly thereafter, the Council authorized the Force to carry out, in addition to its original mandate, the interim tasks of providing protection and humanitarian assistance to the local population, while maintaining its positions in its area of deployment.(12)

The Force was assisted by the Observer Group Lebanon (OGL), composed of unarmed military observers organized from UNTSO and under the operational control of the UNIFIL Commander.

Composition

As at January 1992, UNIFIL had a strength of 5,764 military personnel, provided by nine countries: Fiji, Finland, France, Ghana, Ireland, Italy, Nepal, Norway, Sweden. By July, at the beginning of the second mandate period, troop strength increased to 5,807, with Poland becoming the tenth troop-contributing country. Plans for a 10 per cent reduction in troop strength, as well as a 17 per cent reduction in the number of internationally recruited civilian staff, were to be implemented during this second period.

Under the command of Lieutenant-General Lars-Eric Wahlgren (Sweden) since 1988, UNIFIL remained deployed in southern Lebanon in six sectors: the Fijian, Finnish, Ghanaian, Irish, Nepalese and Norwegian battalion sectors. Parts of the Fijian, Nepalese, Irish and Finnish sectors and the entire Norwegian sector were within the Israeli-controlled area. The 65-member OGL manned five observations posts along the Lebanese side of the Israel-Lebanon armistice demarcation line and operated four mobile teams in the Israeli-controlled section of the UNIFIL area of operation. Two observers were assigned to UNIFIL headquarters.

Military logistic support was provided by the Swedish logistic battalion, elements of the French composite battalion, the Norwegian maintenance company, the Ghanaian engineer company, the Italian helicopter unit and by some civilian staff, especially in communications and vehicle maintenance. Civilian support was provided by a staff of 530, of whom 165 were recruited internationally and 365 locally. By July, the numbers had changed, respectively, to 515, 142 and 373.

The Force Mobile Reserve, a composite mechanized company consisting of elements from seven contingents (Fiji, Finland, Ghana, Ireland, Nepal, Norway, Sweden), served to reinforce UNIFIL battalions when serious incidents occurred and during rotations.

The medical unit temporarily consisted of a small team for emergencies provided jointly by Norway and Sweden since October 1991. In January 1992, the Secretary-General proposed,(13) and the Security Council agreed,(14) to accept Poland's offer to provide the unit. The change-over took effect towards the end of April.

In November,(15) the Secretary-General informed the Council President that, subject to the usual consultations and to the Council's extension of UNIFIL, he intended to appoint Major-General Trond Furuhoide (Norway), with effect from 23 February 1993, to succeed the current Commander, scheduled to leave his post the day before. The Council agreed to that appointment in December 1992.(16)

The foregoing information on the UNIFIL composition and deployment was contained in the Secretary-General's reports of January and July

Activities

Report of the Secretary-General (January). The Secretary-General gave an account of developments in the UNIFIL area between 21 July 1991 and 21 January 1992.(17) During that period, UNIFIL casualties due to firings and explosions included 3 soldiers (Ireland, Nepal, Sweden) dead and 14 others wounded. Another soldier (Ghana) died and 3 others were injured due to traffic accidents. This brought the number of soldiers who had died since UNIFIL's inception to 184 and the wounded to 272.

In addition to providing the data on the composition and deployment of UNIFIL above, the report stated that, as a result of discussions begun in 1991 between the Lebanese military authorities and UNIFIL,(18) for the gradual transfer to the Lebanese army of responsibility for security in the UNIFIL area of deployment, arrangements were under way to hand over to the Lebanese army that part of the Ghanaian battalion sector west of Marakah, some 32 square kilometres in area and encompassing the villages of Burj Rahhal, Bidyas, Dayr Qanun an Nahr, Abbasiyah, Tura, Tayr Dibbah and Al Bazuriyah. UNIFIL troops in the area would be redeployed to the east and south where the need for their presence was greater. The Council, on 28 January,(19) welcomed that development, of which it had been notified earlier by the Secretary-General.(20)

UNIFIL continued its programme of protective works throughout its area of deployment, opposing attempts by armed elements to enter or operate within it. This led to confrontations at checkpoints and to several serious incidents, which claimed the lives of three UNIFIL soldiers and injured nine others.

While for some time IDF and DFF maintained respect for UNIFIL's injunction to refrain from engaging in military operations in the Norwegian battalion sector, which had come entirely within the Israeli-controlled area since Israel's move into Lebanon in 1982,(21) a change in Israeli policy occurred so that, during the reporting period, both forces frequently fired into or within the sector, where they had also begun to conduct patrols. At Chebaa, Kafr Hammam and Kafer Chouba, Israeli security services set up civil administrations, theretofore successfully prevented by UNIFIL.

Resistance groups opposed to the presence of IDF and DFF in Lebanon undertook 52 operations against them, using roadside bombs, rockets, rocket-propelled grenades and small firearms. Retaliation from the two forces, especially when sustaining casualties, was described as indiscriminate bombardment of nearby villages with artillery, tank and helicopter-gunship fire. Some nine villages came under such attack, claiming the lives of seven civilians and wounding 30 others. A nine-day retaliatory shelling of Brashit in August 1991 caused several thousand people to flee their homes. A bomb explosion in Rashaf in December that claimed DFF casualties resulted in travel restrictions to neighbouring villages to the north. A similar explosion in January 1992 that caused further DFF casualties incurred attacks on Yatar, Haddathah and Tibnin.

IDF/DFF firings at or close to UNIFIL positions were reported to have increased substantially, from 90 in the previous period to 263. At Tiri, in November 1991, DFF shot and killed an Irish soldier; others narrowly escaped death when two tank-rounds hit a UNIFIL position there in December. These incidents were vigorously protested to the Israeli military authorities.

UNIFIL carried out 46 controlled explosions in connection with a programme to clear its deployment area of various types of unexploded ordnance. In cooperation with the Lebanese authorities, United Nations organs and agencies operating in the country, the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and NGOs, it continued to extend humanitarian assistance in the form of food, fuel, water, electricity, clothing, medical supplies, engineering work and building repairs. From resources made available by troop-contributing countries, it provided water projects, school materials and equipment, and supplies for social services. UNIFIL medical centres, mobile teams and a dental programme rendered care to an average of 3,000 patients a month.

The Secretary-General observed that the current period had been more difficult than preceding periods for both UNIFIL and the inhabitants of southern Lebanon. Hostilities between Lebanese resistance groups and IDF/DFF had intensified, with a consequent rise in casualties. The imminent transfer of responsibility to the Lebanese army for a part of the UNIFIL deployment area was an encouraging step towards restoring the Government's authority in southern Lebanon. In view of UNIFIL's contribution to stability in such a volatile area, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council accept Lebanon's request for an extension of the UNIFIL mandate for another six months, until 31 July 1992.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (January)

The Security Council met on 29 January 1992 to consider the Secretary-General's report, following which the Council unanimously adopted resolution 734(1992).

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 425(1978) and 426(1978) of 19 March 1978, 501(1982) of 25 February 1982, 508(1982) of 5 June 1982, 509(1982) of 6 June 1982 and 520(1982) of 17 September 1982, as well as all its resolutions on the situation in Lebanon,

Having studied the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon of 21 January 1992 and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

Recalling the addendum to the Secretary-General's report of 22 January 1991,

Taking note of the letter dated 17 January 1992 from the Permanent Representative of Lebanon to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General,

Responding to the request of the Government of Lebanon,

1. Decides to extend the present mandate of UNIFIL for a further interim period of six months, that is until 31 July 1992;

2. Approves the overall objective of the Secretary-General, as set out in paragraph 33 of his report, aimed at promoting the greater effectiveness of UNIFIL;

3. Approves in particular the recommendations summarized in subparagraphs 59 (c) (i) and (ii) of the report contained in the addendum to the Secretary-General's report of 22 January 1991;

4. Invites the Secretary-General to consider further, in consultation with the troop-contributing countries, how to achieve the overall objective referred to in paragraph 2 above, and to take action on the objectives in paragraphs 2 and 3 above;

5. Reiterates its strong support for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries;

6. Re-emphasizes the terms of reference and general guidelines of the Force as stated in the report of the Secretary-General of 19 March 1978, approved by resolution 426(1978), and calls upon all parties concerned to cooperate fully with the Force for the full implementation of its mandate;

7. Reiterates that the Force should fully implement its mandate as defined in resolutions 425(1978), 426(1978) and all other relevant resolutions;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to continue consultations with the Government of Lebanon and other parties directly concerned with the implementation of the present resolution and to report to the Security Council thereon.

29 January 1992 Meeting 3040 Adopted unanimously

Draft prepared in consultations among Council members (S/23483).

Upon adoption of the resolution and after consultations among Council members, the President made the following statement(22) on behalf of the Council:

"The members of the Security Council have noted with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) submitted in conformity with resolution 701(1991).

"They reaffirm their commitment to the full sovereignty: independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries. In this context, they assert that any State shall refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

"As the Security Council extends the mandate of UNIFIL for a further interim period on the basis of resolution 425(1978), the members of the Council again stress the need for the implementation of that resolution in all its aspects. They reiterate their full support for the Taif Agreement and commend the Lebanese Government for its continuous successful efforts to deploy units of its army in the south of the country in full coordination with UNIFIL. The members of the Council urge all the parties concerned fully to support UNIFIL.

"The members of the Security Council express their concern over the continuing violence in southern Lebanon and urge all parties to exercise restraint.

"The members of the Security Council take this opportunity to express their appreciation for the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and his staff in this regard and commend UNIFIL's troops and troop-contributing countries for their sacrifices and commitment to the cause of international peace and security under difficult circumstances."

Report of the Secretary-General (July). In his report to the Security Council on developments during the six-month period from 22 January to 21 July 1992,(23) the Secretary-General noted that one soldier (Fiji) died and eight others were injured from firings or explosions, and that another soldier (Ghana) died and seven others were injured in traffic accidents. This brought the number of UNIFIL dead to 186 and of wounded to 287.

The Secretary-General, in addition to noting changes in the composition of UNIFIL, also noted that the hand-over to the Lebanese army of the western part of UNIFIL's Ghanaian battalion sector, which involved vacating eight military positions, was completed on 9 April. The boundary of the sector was accordingly redrawn and the battalion headquarters was moved to the vicinity of Bir Sanasil

UNIFIL recorded 28 attacks by resistance groups on IDF/DFP positions north of the Litani River and near the Akiya Bridge in the Finnish battalion sector. In retaliation, the two forces subjected seven villages to shelling. Using helicopter gunships, they also targeted individual houses in six villages, as well as the Palestinian refugee camp at Rashidieh. The resultant civilian casualties numbered seven dead and five wounded.

On 16 February, Israeli forces staged an ambush from the air north of the Litani River on a motorcade carrying the Hezbollah Secretary-General, his wife and son, killing all three. Exchanges of intense artillery and rocket fire ensued between armed Lebanese elements and Israeli forces. Caught in the crossfire were many villages in the Nepalese and Irish battalion sectors and several towns in northern Israel.

IDF/DFP firings at or close to UNIFIL positions, of which 175 were recorded for the period, continued to be a subject of UNIFIL protests to Israeli authorities. In one instance, a UNIFIL position south of Kabrikha in the Irish battalion sector sustained five tank rounds; in another, a position in nearby Tulin came under artillery fire. In February, a two-company Israeli force with tanks and armoured carriers, assisted by IDF with bulldozers, launched an incursion into Kafra in the Nepalese battalion sector. Although blocked by UNIFIL for two and a half hours, the Israeli force successfully bulldozed its way to Kafra, where armed elements engaged it. Protective cover was provided by IDF/DFP artillery and mortar fire from helicopter gunships. An exploding missile wounded five Fijian soldiers, one of whom later died. The Secretary-General strongly protested to Israel against the incursion. On his instructions, the Under-Secretary-General and Assistant Secretary-General for Peace-keeping Operations travelled to the area for discussions with Lebanese and Israeli officials, as well as with the Force Commander.

They visited Kafra to inspect the heavy damage it sustained from shelling.

UNIFIL conducted 65 controlled explosions under its mine-clearing programme. Its humanitarian assistance for the period included distribution of 117 tonnes of WFP food to 60 villages and 2,500 families. With UNDP funds, it replaced livestock and crops and repaired greenhouses, and, with $9,000 from UNIFIL personnel, it provided a bus for an orphanage in Tibnin and school books. Its medical centres, mobile teams and field dental programme continued rendering services to an average of 3,000 patients a month.

The Secretary-General observed that the incidents described underscored the continued volatility in the area. He stated that the firings directed at UNIFIL itself severely hampered the discharge of its tasks and he reiterated his appeal for respect of its international and impartial status. He reminded the Israeli authorities that IDF/DFF positions close to population centres should be withdrawn and taken over by UNIFIL. Referring to UNIFIL's contribution to stability in the area, he recommended that the Council accept Lebanon's request of 15 July for an extension of the Force for a further six months.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (July)

On 30 July 1992, the Security Council, having considered the Secretary-General's report, unanimously adopted resolution 768(1992).

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 425(1978) and 426(1978) of 19 March 1978, 501(1982) of 25 February 1982, 508(1982) of 5 June 1982, 509(1982) of 6 June 1982 and 520(1982) of 17 September 1982, as well as all its resolutions on the situation in Lebanon,

Having studied the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon of 21 July 1992 and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

Taking note of the letter dated 15 July 1992 from the Permanent Representative of Lebanon to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General,

Responding to the request of the Government of Lebanon,

1. Decides to extend the present mandate of UNIFIL for a further interim period of six months, that is until 31 January 1993;

2. Reiterates its strong support for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries;

3. Re-emphasizes the terms of reference and general guidelines of the Force as stated in the report of the Secretary-General of 19 March 1978, approved by resolution 426(1978), and calls upon all parties concerned to cooperate fully with the Force for the full implementation of its mandate;

4. Reiterates that the Force should fully implement its mandate as defined in resolutions 425(1978), 426(1978) and all other relevant resolutions;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to continue consultations with the Government of Lebanon and other parties directly concerned with the implementation of the present resolution and to report to the Security Council thereon.

30 July 1992 Meeting 3102 Adopted unanimously

Draft prepared in consultations among Council members (S/24360).

After the vote and consultations among Council members, the President made the following statement(25) on behalf of the Council:

"The members of the Security Council have noted with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) submitted in conformity with resolution 734(1992).

"They reaffirm their commitment to the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries. In this context, they assert that any State shall refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

"As the Security Council extends the mandate of UNIFIL for a further interim period on the basis of resolution 425(1978), the members of the Council again stress the urgent need for the implementation of that resolution in all its aspects. They reiterate their full support for the Taif Agreement and for the continued efforts of the Lebanese Government to consolidate peace, national unity and security in the country. The members of the Council commend the Lebanese Government for its successful efforts to deploy units of its army in the south of the country in full coordination with UNIFIL.

"The members of the Security Council express their concern over the continuing violence in southern Lebanon, regret the loss of civilian life and urge all parties to exercise restraint.

"The members of the Security Council take this opportunity to express their appreciation for the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and his staff in this regard and commend UNIFIL's troops and troop-contributing countries for their sacrifices and commitment to the cause of international peace and security under difficult circumstances."

F i n a n c i n g

The Secretary-General's report of November 1992 on the financing of UNIFIL(26) indicated that assessments totalling $2,003.6 million had been apportioned among Member States from UNIFIL's inception on 19 March 1978 to 31 January 1993, against which contributions of $1,846.4 million had been received. It also indicated an additional commitment authority of $147 million and applied credits of $19.9 million. The resulting outstanding balance of $284.3 million included an amount of $19.6 million due from China, transferred to a special account in accordance with a General Assembly resolution of 1981,(27) leaving $264.7 million due as at 31 October 1992.

Voluntary contributions in services and supplies not budgeted for in the cost estimates continued to be received from Switzerland. Cash contributions to the Suspense Account created in 1979(28) amounted to $8.4 million as at 31 October 1992.

The budget performance for the period from 1 February 1992 to 31 January 1993 reflected overall commitments higher than the level concurred in by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ). The additional requirements amounted to $1,723,000 gross ($1,525,000 net), for which the Secretary-General was seeking supplemental commitment authorization. The revised apportionment for the same period indicated a total of $148,708,000 gross ($145,677,000 net), inclusive of the requested supplemental commitment.

Should the UNIFIL mandate be extended beyond 31 January 1993, the Secretary-General estimated operational costs for a 12-month period beginning on 1 February 1993 at $12,190,000 gross ($11,931,500 net) per month, based on an average Force strength of 5,250 troops. The estimate incorporated the full impact of the ongoing Force reductions of 10 per cent in military strength, and 17 per cent and 10 per cent in the numbers, respectively, of internationally and locally recruited staff.

The audited UNIFIL financial statement for 1 February 1990 to 31 January 1991 indicated a "surplus" balance of $6,851,976, representing excess of income over expenditure. The Secretary-General recommended that that amount, which under certain provisions of the Financial Regulations of the United Nations would have to be surrendered as credits to Member States, be entered in the Suspense Account until the $264.7 million in outstanding assessed contributions was reduced.

Owing to delays or the withholding of contributions by certain Member States, the Secretary-General said UNIFIL was unable to meet its obligations on time, particularly those due to the troop-contributing States, which had never been paid on time and in full according to established rates. The UNIFIL Suspense Account, set up to alleviate the financial burden on those States, had not achieved that purpose. As at 31 October 1992, an estimated $108.7 million was due to former and current troop-contributing States for troop costs; an estimated $10.7 million was also due to Governments for contingent-owned equipment.

ACABQ(29) concurred with the Secretary-General as to the surplus balance and, to permit its transfer to the Suspense Account, recommended that the Assembly suspend the relevant financial regulations. It also recommended approval of commitment authority in the monthly amount indicated for any mandate extension during the 12 months beginning 1 February 1993 and that the Secretary-General be allowed the usual flexibility to transfer credits between items of expenditure.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December 1992, acting on the recommendation of the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/205 without vote.

Financing of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Bearing in mind Security Council resolution 425(1978) of 19 March 1978, by which the Council established the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, and the subsequent resolutions by which the Council extended the mandate of the Force, the latest of which was resolution 768(1992) of 30 July 1992,

Recalling its resolution S-8/2 of 21 April 1978 on the financing of the Force and its subsequent resolutions thereon, the latest of which was resolution 46/194 of 20 December 1991,

Reaffirming its previous decisions regarding the fact that, in order to meet the expenditures, caused by the Force, a different procedure is required from the one applied to meet expenditures of the regular budget of the United Nations,

Taking into account the fact that the economically more developed countries are in a position to make relatively larger contributions and that the economically less developed countries have a relatively limited capacity to contribute towards such operations involving heavy expenditures,

Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the States permanent members of the Security Council, as indicated in General Assembly resolution 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, in the financing of such operations,

Having regard to the financial position of the Special Account for the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, as set forth in the report of the Secretary-General, and referring to paragraph 26 of the report of the Advisory Committee,

Recalling its resolution 34/9 E of 17 December 1979 and the subsequent resolutions in which it decided that the provisions of regulations 5.2 (b), 5.2 (d), 4.3 and 4.4 of the Financial Regulations of the United Nations should be suspended, the latest of which was resolution 46/194,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the Force with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

Noting with appreciation that voluntary contributions have been made to the Force by certain Governments,

Concerned that the Secretary-General continues to face difficulties in meeting the obligations of the Force on a current basis, including reimbursement to current and former troop-contributing States, resulting from the withholding of contributions by certain Member States,

Concerned also that the surplus balances in the Special Account for the Force have, in effect, been drawn upon to the full extent to supplement the income received from contributions for meeting expenses of the Force,

Concerned further that the implementation of the provisions of regulations 5.2 (b), 5.2 (d), 4.3 and 4.4 of the Financial Regulations of the United Nations would aggravate the already difficult financial situation of the Force,

1. Decides to appropriate to the Special Account referred to in section I, paragraph 1, of General Assembly resolution S-8/2 the amount of 148,708,000 United States dollars gross (145,677,000 dollars net) authorized and apportioned by the Assembly in paragraphs 2 and 3 of its resolution 46/194 for the operation of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon from 1 February 1992 to 31 January 1993, inclusive;

2. Authorizes the Secretary-General to enter into commitments for the operation of the Force at a rate not to exceed 12,190,000 dollars gross (11,931,500 dollars net) per month for the period beginning 1 February 1993, should the Security Council decide to continue the Force beyond the period of six months authorized under its resolution 768(1992);

3. Decides, as an ad hoc arrangement, to apportion the amounts referred to in paragraph 2 above among Member States in accordance with the composition of groups set out in paragraphs 3 and 4 of General Assembly resolution 43/232 of 1 March 1989, as adjusted by Assembly resolutions 44/192 B of 21 December 1989, 45/244 of 21 December 1990 and 46/194, and taking into account the scale of assessments for the years 1992, 1993 and 1994;

4. Decides also to consider the contributions of Armenia, Azerbaijan, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Republic of Moldova, San Marino, Slovenia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan to the Force in accordance with the rates of assessment to be adopted by the Assembly for these Member States at its forty-seventh session;

5. Invites the new Member States listed in paragraph 4 above to make advance payments against their assessed contributions, to be determined;

6. Decides that the provisions of regulations 5.2 (b), 5.2 (d), 4.3 and 4.4 of the Financial Regulations of the United Nations shall be suspended in respect of the amount of 6,851,976 dollars, which otherwise would have to be surrendered pursuant to those provisions, this amount to be entered into the account referred to in the operative part of General Assembly resolution 34/9 E and held in suspense until a further decision is taken by the Assembly;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary measures to ensure that the Force is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy;

8. Renews its invitation to Member States and other interested parties to make voluntary contributions to the Force both in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the procedure established by the General Assembly in its resolutions 43/230 of 21 December 1988, 44/192 A of 21 December 1989 and 45/258 of 3 May 1991, and also to make voluntary contributions in cash to the Suspense Account established in accordance with Assembly resolution 34/9 D of 17 December 1979;

9. Decides to consider at its forty-eighth session the question of the financing of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon.

22 December 1992 Meeting 93 Adopted without vote

Approved by F Fifth Committee (A/47/820) without vote, 19 December (meeting 50); draft by Chairman (A/C.5/47/L.13); agenda item 115 (b).
Meeting numbers. GA 47th session: 5th Committee 46, 50; plenary 93.

Israel and the Syrian Arab Republic

The General Assembly continued in 1992 to call for Israel's withdrawal from the Golan Heights, a part of the Syrian Arab Republic near its borders with Israel and Lebanon, which came under Israeli occupation in 1967. It was effectively annexed by Israel when it decided to extend its laws, jurisdiction and administration to that territory towards the end of 1981.(30) The de facto annexation of the Syrian Arab Golan was further confirmed by a decision of the Israeli Knesset on 11 November 1991.

The issue of Israeli practices affecting the human rights of the population in the Syrian Arab Golan continued to be monitored by the Committee on Israeli practices and was the subject of resolutions by the Commission on Human Rights and the General Assembly (see below, under "Territories occupied by Israel").

Report of the Committee on Israeli practices. In its report covering developments in the occupied territories between 23 August and 30 November 1991,(31) the Committee on Israeli practices, citing the Jerusalem Post of 12 November 1991, stated that, on the previous day, the Israeli Knesset, by a vote of 26 to 12, called for the continuation of Israeli sovereignty over the Golan Heights and the expansion of settlements there. Long-term plans for such expansion and the region's development had reportedly been submitted to the Israeli Prime Minister in October, for which he had expressed his support.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 11 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/63 A by recorded vote.

The General Assembly,
Having considered the item entitled "The situation in the Middle East",
Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 25 November 1992,

Recalling Security Council resolution 497(1981) of 17 December 1981,

Recalling its relevant resolutions, the last of which is 45/83 B of 13 December 1990,

Recalling also its resolution 3314(XXIX) of 14 December 1974, in the annex to which it defined an act of aggression, inter alia, as "the invasion or attack by the armed forces of a State of the territory of another State, or any military occupation, however temporary, resulting from such invasion or attack, or any annexation by the use of force of the territory of another State or part thereof" and provided that "no consideration of whatever nature, whether political, economic, military or otherwise, may serve as a justification for aggression",

Reaffirming the fundamental principle of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force,

Reaffirming once more the applicability of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, to the occupied Syrian Golan and the Palestinian territory occupied since 1967, including Jerusalem, and the other occupied Arab territories,

Noting that Israel has refused, in violation of Article 25 of the Charter of the United Nations, to accept and carry out the numerous relevant resolutions of the Security Council, in particular resolution 497(1981),

Deeply concerned that Israel has not withdrawn from the Syrian Golan, which has been under occupation since 1967, contrary to the relevant Security Council and General Assembly resolutions,

Taking note with satisfaction of the convening at Madrid of the Peace Conference on the Middle East on the basis of Security Council resolutions 242(1967) of 22 November 1967 and 338(1973) of 22 October 1973, but regretting that the desired substantial results have not been achieved,

1. Declares that Israel has failed so far to comply with Security Council resolution 497(1981) and the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly;

2. Declares once more that Israel's decision to impose its laws, jurisdiction and administration on the occupied Syrian Golan is illegal and therefore null and void and has no validity whatsoever;

3. Declares that the Knesset decision of 11 November 1991 annexing the occupied Syrian Golan constitutes a grave violation of Security Council resolution 497(1981) and therefore is null and void and has no validity whatsoever;

4. Declares all Israeli policies and practices of, or aimed at, annexation of the occupied Arab territories and the Palestinian territories occupied since 1967, including Jerusalem, and the occupied Syrian Golan to be illegal and in violation of international law and of the relevant United Nations resolutions;

5. Determines once more that all actions taken by Israel to give effect to its decisions relating to the occupied Syrian Golan are illegal and invalid and shall not be recognized;

6. Reaffirms its determination that all relevant provisions of the Regulations annexed to the Hague Convention IV of 1907, and the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, continue to apply to the Syrian territory occupied by Israel since 1967, and calls upon the parties thereto to respect and ensure respect for their obligations under these instruments in all circumstances;

7. Determines once more that the continued occupation of the Syrian Golan since 1967 and its de facto annexation by Israel on 14 December 1981, following Israel's decision to impose its laws, jurisdiction and administration on that territory, constitute a continuing threat to peace and security in the region;

8. Firmly emphasizes once more its demand that Israel, the occupying Power, rescind forthwith its illegal decision of 14 December 1981 to impose its laws, jurisdiction and administration on the Syrian Golan, and its decision of 11 November 1991, which resulted in the effective annexation of that territory;

9. Demands once more that Israel withdraw from the occupied Syrian Golan in implementation of the relevant Security Council and General Assembly resolutions;

10. Calls upon the international community to urge Israel to withdraw from the occupied Syrian Golan and other occupied Arab territories for the establishment of a just, comprehensive and lasting peace in the region;

UNDOF

The United Nations Disengagement Observer Force, established by the Security Council in 1974,(32) as called for by the Agreement on Disengagement of Forces between Israel and the Syrian Arab Republic concluded that year,(33) was charged with supervising the observance of the cease-fire between the two countries in the Golan Heights area and ensuring that there were no military forces in the area of separation between their forces. Assisting the Force as required were UNTSO observers assigned to the Israel-Syria Mixed Armistice Commission.

The UNDOF mandate was renewed twice in 1992, in May and November, each time for a six-month period.

Composition

As of November 1992, UNDOF had a strength of 1,130 military observers (reduced from 1,296 in May) from Austria, Canada, Finland and Poland. Five of them (reduced from seven in May) were on assignment from the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization.

UNDOF, under the command of Major-General Roman Misztal (Poland), remained deployed within and close to the area of separation, where it maintained 11 observation posts. Its headquarters was at Damascus. The Austrian battalion manned 19 positions (reduced from 20 in May) and 7 outposts, conducting 28 patrols daily at irregular intervals on predetermined routes in the area of separation north and inclusive of the Damascus-Quneitra road. South of that road, the Finnish battalion manned 17 positions and 7 outposts (increased from 16 and 6, respectively, in May), patrolling 26 times daily. The UNTSO observers manned 11 observation posts.

The Austrian battalion base camp was located near Wadi Faouar, kilometres east of the separation area, while west of it near Ziouani was that of the Finnish battalion. The Polish and Canadian logistic units shared Camp Faouar and Camp Ziouani, respectively. The Canadian signal unit had a detachment at each camp, as well as at Damascus headquarters. The military police was under redeployment to the two camps and to Checkpoint C (formerly position 28). Most of the military component of UNDOF headquarters relocated to the two camps. The civilian administration remained at Damascus, where the Force Commander maintained an office.

The foregoing information was contained in the May and November reports of the Secretary-General below.

Activities

Reports of the Secretary-General (May and November). Before the expiration of the mandate of UNDOF on 31 May and 30 November 1992, the Secretary-General reported to the Security Council on UNDOF activities for the mandate periods from 21 November 1991 to 19 May 1992(34) and from 20 May to 19 November 1992.(35) UNDOF suffered three fatalities during the two periods: 2 from accidents and 1 from other causes. This brought the number of deaths to 31 since UNDOF's inception, 19 as a result of hostile action or accidents and 12 from other causes.

The reports noted that UNDOF had continued to perform its functions effectively with the cooperation of Israel and the Syrian Arab Republic, that the situation in the area of separation between them had remained generally quiet and that the cease-fire had been maintained without serious incidents.

UNDOF continued to supervise the area of separation from permanently manned positions and observation posts and by foot and mobile patrols operating day and night at irregular intervals on predetermined routes. Temporary outposts were set up as required and the system of patrol paths along the cease-fire lines was further expanded.

Inspection teams made fortnightly inspections of armaments and forces in the area of limitation with the assistance of liaison officers from the two parties. UNDOF pursued the lifting of restrictions on its activities and movement in certain areas that continued to be imposed by both parties.

The November report noted that the Syrian authorities continued to lay mines and replace old ones in minefields along the eastern edge of the separation area, and that, during August and September, they also made improvements to several anti-tank ditches. Repeated UNDOF representations to the Syrian authorities about these infringements had not met with a positive response. However, representations to IDF over Israeli firings at grazing livestock that endangered the lives of their Syrian shepherds brought that dangerous practice to a halt.

The mine-clearing teams of the Polish battalion cleared a total area of 110,760 square metres and destroyed a number of other unexploded ordnance. UNDOF assisted ICRC with mail delivery and safe passage of persons and personal effects across the area of separation. It also provided medical treatment to the local population within available means.

Despite the relative quiet in the Israel-Syrian Arab Republic sector, the Secretary-General cautioned that the Middle East situation as a whole remained potentially dangerous, unless and until a comprehensive Middle East settlement was reached. Stating in each report that he considered UNDOF's continued presence in the area to be essential, the Secretary-General, with the Syrian Arab Republic's assent and Israel's agreement, recommended that its mandate be extended for a further six months, until 30 November 1992 in the first instance and until 31 May 1993 in the second.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (May and November)

At a meeting on 29 May 1992, the Security Council, without debate, unanimously adopted resolution 756(1992).

The Security Council

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force, Decides:

(a) To call upon the parties concerned to implement immediately its resolution 338(1973) of 22 October 1973;

(b) To renew the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force for another period of six months, that is, until 30 November 1992;

(c) To request the Secretary-General to submit, at the end of this period, a report on the developments in the situation and the measures taken to implement Security Council resolution 338(1973).

Security Council resolution 756(1992)

29 May 1992 Meeting 3081 Adopted unanimously

Draft prepared in consultations among Council members (S/24026).

The President stated that, in connection with the resolution just adopted, he had been authorized to make the following complementary statement(36) on behalf of the Council:

[Same text as statement following resolution 790(1992) below.]

At a meeting on 25 November, the Council, also without debate, unanimously adopted resolution 790(1992).

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force, Decides:

(a) To call upon the parties concerned to implement immediately its resolution 338(1973) of 22 October 1973;

(b) To renew the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force for another period of six months, that is, until 31 May 1993;

(c) To request the Secretary-General to submit, at the end of this period, a report on the developments in the situation and the measures taken to implement Security Council resolution 338(1973).

Security Council resolution 790(1992)

25 November 1992 Meeting 3141 Adopted unanimously

Draft prepared in consultations among Council members (S/24842).

The President again stated that, in connection with the resolution just adopted, he had been authorized to make the following complementary statement(37) on behalf of the Council:

"As is known, the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force states, in paragraph 20: 'Despite the present quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, the situation in the Middle East as a whole continues to be potentially dangerous and is likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem can be reached.' That statement of the Secretary-General reflects the view of the Security Council."

F i n a n c i n g

In a November 1992 report on the financing of UNDOF,(38) the Secretary-General indicated that assessed contributions apportioned to Member States in respect of UNDOF—from inception in 1974(32) to 30 November 1992—and of the United Nations Emergency Force II (UNEF II) (from inception at the end of 1973 and liquidation in 1980)—totalled $992 million, against which $935.7 million had been received as at 30 September 1992. The resultant balance of $56.3 million included $36 million due from China, which was transferred to a special account pursuant to a General Assembly resolution of 1981,(27) leaving $20.3 million in unpaid contributions.

The audited UNDOF/UNEF II financial statement, as at 31 December 1991, covering the 12 months from 1 December 1990 to 30 November 1991, showed a "surplus" balance of $4,520,635, representing excess of income (including assessed contributions, irrespective of collectibility) over expenditure. The Secretary-General proposed that, until the level of unpaid contributions was reduced, that surplus, which otherwise would be surrendered as credits to Member States under certain provisions of the Financial Regulations, be entered into the Suspense Account set up by the Assembly in 1978.(39)

The UNDOF performance record for 1 December 1991 to 30 November 1992 showed an unencumbered balance of $911,000 gross ($841,000 net), which the Secretary-General recommended for credit to Member States against their assessments for future mandate periods.

The Secretary-General gave an estimate of $3,034,000 gross ($2,953,000 net) per month for a 12-month period beginning on 1 December 1992, in the event of an extension of the current mandate beyond its expiration on 30 November 1992. On that basis, he requested commitment authorization, as appropriate, for the maintenance of UNDOF from 1 December 1992 to 30 November 1993. He stated that the estimate reflected the full impact of the streamlining of the Force by a 15 per cent reduction in strength of each military contingent and of the internationally recruited civilian staff, with attendant savings in transport and accommodations.

The Secretary-General also stated that appropriation was required in the amount of $21,384,000 gross ($20,835,000 net) to cover commitments for 1 June to 30 November 1992, authorized by the Assembly in 1991,(40) and for apportionment among Member States.

ACABQ(29) concurred with the proposed disposition of the unencumbered balance. It noted that, UNDOF's streamlining notwithstanding, estimates of various items remained over-budgeted, singling out premises/accommodation and transport, the very items that should reflect the impact of the streamlining. Subject to its observations on the need for economy, ACABQ recommended an appropriation for UNDOF in the amount of $18,206,500 gross ($17,718,000 net) for 1 December 1992 to 31 May 1993, and, subject to a mandate renewal after 31 May, commitment authority up to the level of $3,034,000 gross ($2,953,000 net) per month for six months beginning on 1 June 1993. It further recommended suspension of the relevant financial regulations to allow the transfer of the surplus balance to the Suspense Account.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December 1992, acting on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/204 without vote.

Financing of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the financing of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force and the related report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,

Bearing in mind Security Council resolution 350(1974) of 31 May 1974, by which the Council established the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force, and the subsequent resolutions by which the Council extended the mandate of the Force, the latest of which was resolution 790(1992) of 25 November 1992,

Recalling its resolution 3211 B (XXIX) of 29 November 1974 on the financing of the United Nations Emergency Force and the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force and its subsequent resolutions thereon, the latest of which was resolution 46/193 of 20 December 1991,

Reaffirming its previous decisions regarding the fact that, in order to meet the expenditures caused by the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force, a different procedure is required from the one applied to meet expenditures of the regular budget of the United Nations,

Taking into account the fact that the economically more developed countries are in a position to make relatively larger contributions and that the economically less developed countries have a relatively limited capacity to contribute towards such operations involving heavy expenditures,

Bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the States permanent members of the Security Council, as indicated in General Assembly resolution 1874(S-IV) of 27 June 1963, in the financing of such operations,

Having regard to the financial position of the Special Account for the United Nations Emergency Force and the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force, as set forth in the report of the Secretary-General, and referring to paragraphs 24 and 26 of the report of the Advisory Committee,

Recognizing that, as a consequence of the withholding of contributions by certain Member States, the surplus balances in the Special Account for the United Nations Emergency Force and the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force have, in effect, been drawn upon to supplement the income received from contributions for meeting expenses of the Forces,

Mindful of the fact that it is essential to provide the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force with the necessary financial resources to enable it to fulfil its responsibilities under the relevant resolutions of the Security Council,

Noting with appreciation that a voluntary contribution has been made to the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force by a Government,

1. Decides to appropriate to the Special Account referred to in section II, paragraph 1, of General Assembly resolution 3211 B (XXIX) the amount of 21,384,000 United States dollars gross (20,835,000 dollars net) authorized and apportioned by the General Assembly in paragraph 14 of its resolution 46/193 for the operation of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force for the period from 1 June to 30 November 1992, inclusive;

2. Decides also to appropriate to the Special Account an amount of 18,206,500 dollars gross (17,718,000 dollars net) for the operation of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force for the period from 1 December 1992 to 31 May 1993, inclusive;

3. Decides further, as an ad hoc arrangement, to apportion the amount of 18,206,500 dollars gross (17,718,000 dollars net) for the above-mentioned period among Member States in accordance with the composition of groups set out in paragraphs 3 and 4 of General Assembly resolution 43/232 of 1 March 1989, as adjusted by Assembly resolutions 44/192 B of 21 December 1989, 45/243 of 21 December 1990 and 46/193, and taking into account the scale of assessments for the years 1992, 1993 and 1994;

4. Decides that there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 3 above, their respective share in the estimated income of 7,500 dollars other than staff assessment income approved for the period from 1 December 1992 to 31 May 1993, inclusive;

5. Decides also that, in accordance with the provisions of its resolution 973(X) of 15 December 1955, there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 3 above, their respective share in the Tax Equalization Fund of the estimated staff assessment income of 481,000 dollars approved for the period from 1 December 1992 to 31 May 1993, inclusive;

6. Decides further that there shall be set off against the apportionment among Member States, as provided for in paragraph 3 above, their respective share in the unencumbered balance of 911,000 dollars gross (841,000 dollars net) for the period from 1 December 1991 to 30 November 1992, inclusive;

7. Authorizes the Secretary-General to enter into commitments for the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force at a rate not to exceed 3,034,000 dollars gross (2,953,000 dollars net) per month for the period from 1 June to 30 November 1993, inclusive, should the Security Council decide to continue the Force beyond the period of six months authorized under its resolution 790(1992), the said amount to be apportioned among Member States in accordance with the scheme set out in the present resolution;

8. Decides that the provisions of regulations 5.2 (b), 5.2 (d), 4.3 and 4.4 of the Financial Regulations of the United Nations shall be suspended in respect of the surplus balance as at 31 December 1991 covering the period from 1 December 1990 to 30 November 1991 in the amount of 4,520,635 dollars, which otherwise would have to be surrendered pursuant to those provisions, this amount to be entered into the Suspense Account established pursuant to General Assembly resolution 33/13 E of 14 December 1978, until a further decision is taken by the Assembly;

9. Decides also to consider the contributions of Armenia, Azerbaijan, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Republic of Moldova, San Marino, Slovenia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan to the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force in accordance with the rates of assessment to be adopted by the General Assembly for these Member States at its forty-seventh session;

10. Invites the new Member States listed in paragraph 9 above to make advance payments against their assessed contributions, to be determined;

11. Invites voluntary contributions to the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force in cash and in the form of services and supplies acceptable to the Secretary-General, to be administered, as appropriate, in accordance with the procedure established by the General Assembly in its resolutions 43/230 of 21 December 1988, 44/192 A of 21 December 1989 and 45/258 of 3 May 1991;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary action to ensure that the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force is administered with a maximum of efficiency and economy;

13. Decides to consider at its forty-eighth session the question of the financing of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force.

Territories occupied by Israel

The Palestine territory and other Arab territories occupied by Israel as a result of previous armed conflicts in the Middle East comprised the West Bank of the Jordan River, including East Jerusalem, the Gaza Strip, and the Golan Heights in the Syrian Arab Republic. By mid-1992, those territories had been under Israeli occupation for a quarter of a century. Throughout that time, the territories' inhabitants had refused to accept the occupation as a permanent fact—a refusal expressed in sporadic waves of general unrest and violence that exploded into widespread uprising (intifadah) towards the end of 1987 and persisted into 1992.

Israel's policies and practices in the territories remained under constant monitoring by the Committee on Israeli practices, whose reports in 1992 reflected the extremely tense situation and high level of violence engendered by the uprising and Israel's suppression of it by military force and collective punishment, including mass deportations of Palestinians.

The Security Council, in a statement on the situation in the occupied territories, condemned all violence and urged maximum restraint. It further condemned Israel's resumption of deportations in early January (resolution 726(1992)) and demanded the immediate return of the 383 Palestinians deported to Lebanon in December (799(1992)).

The General Assembly, in a series of resolutions adopted in December, demanded that Israel, as the occupying Power, desist from those policies and practices that were in violation of the 1949 fourth Geneva Convention and called on the High Contracting Parties to ensure Israel's respect for that Convention (47/64 E). It reaffirmed that occupation itself was a grave violation of the Palestinians' human rights and condemned Israel's policies and practices affecting every aspect of Palestinian life (47/70 A), demanded that Israel accept the applicability to the occupied territories of the fourth Geneva Convention (47/70 B) and called on it to rescind its deportation orders and to facilitate the immediate return of the deportees (47/70 E). The Assembly called on Israel to release all Palestinians and other Arabs arbitrarily detained or imprisoned (47/70 D) and to rescind all measures taken against Palestinian educational institutions (47/70 G). It condemned Israel's persistence in changing the physical character, demographic composition, institutional structure and legal status of the occupied Syrian Golan (47/70 F) and demanded that Israel desist from such action in all of the occupied territories (47/70 C).

In addition, Israel's confiscation of land, its appropriation of water resources and depletion of other economic resources and displacement and deportation of the territories' population were deplored by the Economic and Social Council (resolution 1992/57) and by the Assembly (47/172).

Earlier, in February, the Commission on Human Rights adopted four resolutions by which it again called on Israel to desist from all forms of human rights violations and to withdraw from the Palestine territory and other occupied Arab territories, as well as to refrain immediately from deporting Palestinians and to return all deportees without delay. It reaffirmed that the occupation of Palestine was a gross violation of human rights and an act of aggression against the peace and security of mankind, and determined that all Israeli measures purporting to alter the character and legal status of the Syrian Golan had no legal effect and that the installation of Israeli civilians in the occupied territories was illegal and a violation of the fourth Geneva Convention.

Communications. Several communications addressed to the Secretary-General in March and early April 1992 drew attention to an escalation of Israeli acts of repression, resulting in many casualties. The communications called on the United Nations to end Israel's continued violation of the fourth Geneva Convention and to provide international protection for the Palestinians living under Israeli occupation.

On 16 March,(1) the Deputy Permanent Observer for Palestine to the United Nations reported that, on the previous day, a large Israeli contingent stormed the Askar refugee camp, in the West Bank, from several directions, killing three Palestinians and injuring a fourth. On 20 March,(2) the Observer further reported that the Israeli army killed six youths and injured many others during the previous two days. Those repressive acts culminated in Israel's announcement, also on 20 March, of its intention completely to seal off the occupied Gaza Strip, where 800,000 Palestinians lived, until further notice. It declared Jerusalem closed to West Bank residents and set up road-blocks on all roads leading to and out of the West Bank.

The Observer wrote on 1 April(3) that Israeli undercover army units and other security forces deliberately opened fire on Palestinians in the Shaborah neighbourhood of Rafah, killing at least four and injuring more than 50, many seriously—a crime that added fuel to an extremely explosive and dangerous situation in occupied Palestine. Referring to the same incident, the Chairman of the Committee on Palestinian rights, on 3 April,(4) named the Israeli border police as the perpetrators of the killing, who additionally injured about 80 persons while chasing a Palestinian car in the market of the Rafah refugee camp. The Chairman referred to a Reuters report according to which 21 other Palestinians were shot and wounded by the Israeli army on 2 April in a clash with protesters in the Gaza Strip, as well as to a British Broadcasting Corporation account of that incident, which spoke of a woman run over and killed by an army jeep, of indiscriminate firing at Palestinians and of ambulances carrying the wounded being denied passage. He cited an article in Ha'aretz of 17 March to the effect that the Israeli Knesset (Parliament), in the latest of a series of legislation aimed at giving wider latitude in respect of its "open-fire" policy, passed a law allowing Israeli settlers and soldiers to chase and shoot at stone-throwing Palestinians. The Chairman asked that Israel immediately cease the killing and injuring of Palestinians and accept the de jure applicability of the fourth Geneva Convention.

Responding on 6 April,(5) Israel explained that, since the beginning of the peace process launched at Madrid in 1991, Israel had been subjected to a wave of terrorist attacks against its citizens at home and abroad that had left 17 Israelis dead and more than 250 wounded, including Jews and Arabs, schoolchildren and diplomats serving overseas. Terrorist leaders of the intifadah had stepped up their calls for violence against Israelis and had urged an intensification of attacks. It was in the context of intifadah violence and bloodshed, Israel stressed, that the incident at Rafah in the Gaza District should be viewed.

The incident was the result of a hand-grenade thrown at an IDF lookout post in southern Rafah. A local vehicle fleeing the scene ran over at least three local residents and hurled three fire-bombs at IDF troops giving chase; two of the attackers were killed in return fire. Mass disturbances ensued in several locations in the area and local residents leapt on vehicles of the security forces, compelling them to open fire. In all, four residents were killed (two of whom had hurled fire-bombs at IDF) and 11 others were wounded; 12 more were injured in riots the following day.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

The Security Council met on 4 April to consider the latest waves of violence in the Gaza Strip. Before it were the foregoing communications, as well as a request of 3 April(6) from the Permanent Observer for Palestine that he be invited to participate in the meeting. The President noted that if the request met with approval, the Observer would be invited, not under rule 37^a or 39^b of the Council's provisional rules of procedure, but with the same rights of participation as those conferred by rule 37. On the proposal of the United States, the request was put to a vote. It was approved by 10 votes to 1 (United States), with 4 abstentions (Belgium, France, Hungary, United Kingdom).

Speaking before the vote, the United States maintained that the Council did not have before it a valid request to speak, and that the PLO representative should be granted permission to speak only if the request complied with rule 39. It pointed to the long-established practice that an Observer had no right to speak in the Council at its own request; rather, a request must be made on its behalf by a Member State. The United States saw no justification for a departure from that practice, nor was there anything in General Assembly resolutions to warrant a change in Council practice, including the 1988 resolution(7) that purported to change the designation of the PLO Mission but did not constitute recognition of any State of Palestine. The United States insisted ^aRule 37 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure states: "Any Member of the United Nations which is not a member of the Security Council may be invited, as the result of a decision of the Security Council, to participate, without vote, in the discussion of any question brought before the Security Council when the Security Council considers that the interests of that Member are specially affected, or when a Member brings a matter to the attention of the Security Council in accordance with Article 35(1) of the Charter."

on its opposition to special and ad hoc departures from orderly procedure, whence its proposal to put the request to a vote.

After consultations among Council members, the President made the following statement(8) on behalf of the Council:

Meeting number.S C 3 0 6 5 .

"The members of the Security Council are gravely concerned by the continued deterioration of the situation in the Gaza Strip, especially by the current serious situation in Rafah in which several Palestinians have been killed and many more injured.

"The members of the Security Council condemn all these acts of violence at Rafah. They urge maximum restraint in order to bring violence to an end.

"The members of the Security Council urge Israel to abide at all times by its obligations under the Fourth Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War of 12 August 1949 and to respect and to act in accordance with the relevant resolutions of the Security Council. The members of the Security Council are concerned that any escalation of violence would have serious implications for the peace process, especially at a time when negotiations to achieve a comprehensive, just and lasting peace are under way.

"The members of the Security Council request the Secretary-General to use his good offices, in accordance with resolution 681(1990), regarding this situation concerning Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation."

Recommendations of the Secretary-General.
In the light of the worsening situation in the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967, attention was once more focused on the Secretary-General's recommendations on ways to ensure the safety and protection of the Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation, as contained in his reports of 1988,(9) 1990(10) and 1991.(11)

The 1988 report recommended that, pending a political settlement that responded both to the refusal of the Palestinian population of the territories to accept a future under Israeli occupation and to Israel's determination to ensure its security and the well-being of its people, the international community should make a concerted effort to persuade Israel to accept the de jure applicability of the fourth Geneva Convention to the occupied territories and to correct its practices in full compliance with that Convention. Meanwhile, temporary measures were urgently needed, including: IDF training in the rules of international humanitarian law, with orders to its personnel to permit, during disturbances, rapid evacuation of the wounded and delivery of essential foods and medical supplies to the civilian population; and an increase in the number of the international staff, within UNRWA's existing administrative structures, to improve the general assistance provided to the refugee population.

In the 1990 and 1991 reports, the Secretary-General stressed that, for any measure of protection to be ensured, the cooperation of the Israeli authorities was absolutely essential. Nevertheless, given the special responsibility of the High Contracting Parties for ensuring respect for the Convention, the Security Council might wish to call for a meeting of the Parties to discuss possible measures that might be taken under the Convention. The Palestinian appeals for an impartial presence in the territories, properly mandated by the United Nations, was a matter for the Council to decide.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 11 December 1992, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/64 E by recorded vote.

The General Assembly,

Aware of the uprising (intifadah) of the Palestinian people since 9 December 1987 against Israeli occupation, which has received significant attention and sympathy from world public opinion,

Deeply concerned about the alarming situation in the Palestinian territory occupied since 1967, as a result of the continued occupation by Israel, the occupying Power, and of its persistent policies and practices against the Palestinian people,

Reaffirming that the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, is applicable to the Palestinian territory occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem, and to the other occupied Arab territories,

Expressing its profound shock at the continued measures by Israel, the occupying Power, including the killing and wounding of Palestinian civilians, and at the acts of violence committed by the Israeli security forces, which took place on 8 October 1990 at the Haram al-Sharif in Jerusalem, resulting in injuries and loss of human lives, and on 29 December 1990 at Rafah,

Stressing the need to promote international protection to the Palestinian civilians in the occupied Palestinian territory,

Recognizing the need for increased support to, and aid for and solidarity with, the Palestinian people under Israeli occupation,

Having considered the recommendations contained in the reports of the Secretary-General of 21 January 1988, 31 October 1990 and 9 April 1991,

Recalling its relevant resolutions as well as the relevant Security Council resolutions, in particular Council resolution 681(1990) of 20 December 1990, in paragraph 6 of which the Council requested "the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the International Committee of the Red Cross, to develop further the idea, expressed in his report, of convening a meeting of the High Contracting Parties to the said Convention to discuss possible measures that might be taken by them under the Convention and, for this purpose, to invite the Parties to submit their views on how the idea could contribute to the goals of the Convention, as well as on other relevant matters, and to report thereon to the Council",

1. Condemns those policies and practices of Israel, the occupying Power, which violate the human rights of the Palestinian people in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, and, in particular, such acts as the opening of fire by the Israeli army and settlers that result in the killing and wounding of defenceless Palestinian civilians, the beating and breaking of bones, the deportation of Palestinian civilians, the imposition of restrictive economic measures, the demolition of houses, the ransacking of real or personal property belonging individually or collectively to private persons, collective punishment and detentions, and so forth;

2. Demands that Israel, the occupying Power, abide scrupulously by the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, and desist immediately from those policies and practices which are in violation of the provisions of the Convention;

3. Calls upon all the High Contracting Parties to the Convention to ensure respect by Israel, the occupying Power, for the Convention in all circumstances, in conformity with their obligation under article 1 thereof;

4. Strongly deplores the continuing disregard by Israel, the occupying Power, of the relevant decisions of the Security Council;

5. Reaffirms that the occupation by Israel of the Palestinian territory since 1967, including Jerusalem, and of the other Arab territories in no way changes the legal status of those territories;

6. Requests the Security Council to examine with urgency the situation in the occupied Palestinian territory with a view to considering measures needed to provide international protection to the Palestinian civilians in the Palestinian territory occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem;

7. Invites Member States, the organizations of the United Nations system, governmental, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, and the mass communications media to continue and enhance their support for the Palestinian people;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to examine the present situation in the Palestinian territory occupied since 1967, including Jerusalem, by all means available to him and to submit periodic reports thereon, the first such report as soon as possible.

Reports of the Committee on Israeli practices. In 1992, the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Palestinian People and Other Arabs of the Occupied Territories presented three periodic reports—in January,(12), July(13) and October(14)—covering developments in the occupied territories between 23 August 1991 and 26 August 1992. The reports incorporated excerpts or details of written information from various sources, including individuals, organizations and the local press; oral testimonies of persons with firsthand experience of the human rights situation in the territories, obtained through hearings organized by the Committee at Damascus (Syrian Arab Republic), Amman (Jordan), Cairo (Egypt) and Geneva; and official Israeli statements reflecting Israeli policies in the territories, as well as reports on measures taken to implement them.

On the basis of the information before it, the Committee concluded that the situation of basic human rights and fundamental freedoms in the occupied territories continued to be extremely serious. The ongoing peace process, begun at Madrid in 1991,(15) had had no significant effect on the overall enjoyment of those rights and freedoms. The physical and psychological stress endured by the Palestinians and other Arabs remained a threat to international peace and security.

The October report reflected the extremely tense situation that had prevailed in the occupied territories since the intifadah began in December 1987.(16) The repression of that struggle had maintained the dramatic level of violence reached in the territories. The occupation itself engendered a situation where human rights violations would occur. The period under review again witnessed a heavy toll of casualties among all categories of the civilian population, due to the indiscriminate and violent methods employed to suppress the popular uprising. To quell demonstrations or strikes, especially in detention centres, disproportionate and at times unnecessary force was resorted to, including beating and the use of tear-gas canisters and live ammunition, causing numerous deaths and injuries that often led to permanent incapacitation. The fear and tension prevailing in the occupied territories was exacerbated by the introduction of undercover units as death squads and the relaxation of open-fire regulations against activists involved in the uprising.

The hardships suffered by a population already living on the threshold of mere survival, brought about by a steady deterioration of the economic, social and health conditions, were compounded by such measures of collective punishment as the periodic closure of educational institutions, the demolition of houses, the deliberate policy of economic pressure and administrative obstacles. Freedom of education was further infringed upon by increasingly restrictive identity-card regulations in respect of students in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Curfews and restrictions on movement inside and outside the occupied territories continued to have an adverse effect on the employment of tens of thousands of Arab workers. The non-recognition of diplomas earned in off-campus teaching owing to school closures resulted in a generation of young Palestinians and other Arabs unable to obtain employment. Further aggravating the employment situation was the continual influx of Jewish immigrants who were competing for the same employment opportunities.

The climate of uncertainty and frustration increased as acts of aggression by Israeli settlers multiplied and as settlements increased under the annexationist policy pursued by Israel. The Committee thus welcomed declarations by the new Israeli Government concerning those settlements, but remained preoccupied by the overwhelming preponderance of "security" over "political" settlements, particularly in the Jordan Valley and the Syrian Arab Golan. The settlers' increased physical and psychological harassment of Palestinians and other Arabs seemed deliberately intended to make them leave their homeland.

The expulsion of Palestinians from the territories for alleged security reasons continued, in violation of the fourth Geneva Convention and despite renewed international protests, as did the expulsion of persons without valid residence permits. Drawn to the Committee's attention was a form of "disguised" deportation of certain students wanting to study abroad, by obliging them to leave for three years.

Other Israeli policies and practices described as persistent included: the increasing transfer of the administration of justice to the military, as had been the case with recent traffic offences; arbitrary administrative detention, ostensibly for preventive purposes; denial of basic legal rights, including the right to a fair trial; imposition of sentences harsher than those imposed on Israelis for the same offences; the detention of several thousand Palestinians, including minors, in prisons and detention centres characterized by overcrowding and inadequate food and medical care; detention of minors over 12 years old in the same areas with adult, often common-law, prisoners; the routine use of torture, including electric shock during interrogation, and ill-treatment of the detained and imprisoned; and severe repression of prison strikes, including hurling tear-gas canisters into closed spaces.

To prevent an exacerbation of the already dramatic situation in the occupied territories, renewed efforts by the international community were required to convince Israel to end its practices affecting human rights. In the meantime, the Committee recommended: full application by Israel of the fourth Geneva Convention, the main international instrument of humanitarian law applicable to the territories, as repeatedly reaffirmed by the Security Council and the General Assembly; full compliance with all resolutions relevant to the Palestine question adopted by the United Nations and by ILO, UNESCO and WHO; the creation of conditions conducive to promoting respect for human rights; full Israeli cooperation with ICRC in its efforts to gain access to detained persons in the occupied territories; full support by Member States of ICRC activities on behalf of the detained, as well as of UNRWA activities on behalf of the refugee population; and full respect by the Israeli authorities of the privileges and immunities of UNRWA as an international body providing humanitarian services to Palestinian refugees in the occupied territories.

Report of the Secretary-General. The Secretary-General reported to the General Assembly in October 1992(17), that Israel had not replied to his July request for information on steps taken or envisaged to implement a 1991 Assembly resolution(18) demanding that Israel desist from certain policies and practices in the occupied territories. He had also drawn the attention of States and international organizations, including the specialized agencies, to the Assembly's call not to recognize any changes carried out by Israel in the territories and to avoid actions, including those in the field of aid, that might be used by Israel in its annexation or other policies.

The Secretary-General further stated that, in response to the resolution's request that he ensure the widest circulation of the reports of the Committee on Israeli practices and of information on its activities and findings, DPI had published a booklet on the life of Palestinians under Israeli occupation, in Arabic, English, French, German, Russian and Spanish, drawing extensively from the Committee's reports. DPI included in its 1992-1993 work programme the updating of the 1989 edition of a booklet on human rights for Palestinians, publicizing the Committee's work. It also publicized the Committee's 1992 mission to the Middle East. (For details of the publications mentioned, see above, under "Public information activities".)

(See also PART THREE, Chapter X.)

Fourth Geneva Convention

Report of the Committee on Israeli practices.

In its October 1992 report,⁽¹⁴⁾ the Committee on Israeli practices stressed that the overall hardships confronting the population of the occupied territories derived from the fact that occupation itself constituted a violation of human rights. Israel continued to impose its laws, jurisdiction and administration on the occupied territories, in violation of its obligations as a State party to the fourth Geneva Convention, which stipulated that military occupation was to be considered a temporary, de facto situation giving no right whatsoever to the occupying Power over the territorial integrity of the territories it occupied.

Israel had consistently held, however, that it did not recognize the Convention's de jure applicability to the territories but asserted that it was acting in de facto accordance with the humanitarian provisions of that Convention. It continued to claim that certain of the territories it had occupied since 1967 constituted a part of Israel—a claim unanimously refuted by the international community.

Report of the Secretary-General. In October 1992,(20) the Secretary-General informed the Assembly that Israel had not replied to his July request for information on steps taken or envisaged to implement a 1991 Assembly resolution(21) demanding that Israel accept the de jure applicability of the Convention and comply with its provisions in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, and other Arab territories it had occupied since 1967.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 14 December 1992, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/70 B by recorded vote.

The General Assembly,

Recalling Security Council resolution 465(1980) of 1 March 1980, in which, inter alia, the Council affirmed that the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, is applicable to the Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem,

Recalling also Security Council resolutions 672(1990) of 12 October 1990, 673(1990) of 24 October 1990 and 681(1990) of 20 December 1990,

Recalling further its resolutions 3092 A (XXVIII) of 7 December 1973, 3240 B (XXIX) of 29 November 1974, 3525 B (XXX) of 15 December 1975, 31/106 B of 16 December 1976, 32/91 A of 13 December 1977, 33/113 A of 18 December 1978, 34/90 B of 12 December 1979, 35/122 A of 11 December 1980, 36/147 A of 16 December 1981, 37/88 A of 10 December 1982, 38/79 B of 15 December 1983, 39/95 B of 14 December 1984, 40/161 B of 16 December 1985, 41/63 B of 3 December 1986, 42/160 B of 8 December 1987, 43/58 B of 6 December 1988, 44/48 B of 8 December 1989, 45/74 B of 11 December 1990 and 46/47 B of 9 December 1991,

Recalling the reports of the Secretary-General of 21 January 1988, 31 October 1990 and 9 April 1991, and taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 23 October 1992,

Considering that the promotion of respect for the obligations arising from the Charter of the United Nations and other instruments and rules of international law is among the basic purposes and principles of the United Nations,

Bearing in mind the provisions of the Convention,

Noting that Israel and the concerned Arab States whose territories have been occupied by Israel since June 1967 are parties to that Convention,

Taking into account that States parties to the Convention undertake, in accordance with article 1 thereof, not only to respect but also to ensure respect for the Convention in all circumstances,

1. Reaffirms that the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, is applicable to the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967;

Expulsion and deportation of Palestinians

Report of the Committee on Israeli practices.

In its report of October 1992,(14) the Committee on Israeli practices noted the continued issuance of deportation orders for alleged security reasons against inhabitants of the occupied territories, in violation of the fourth Geneva Convention. Despite repeated international protests, the case involving 11 persons under deportation orders since the beginning of 1992 remained pending before the High Court of Justice of Israel. Also continuing was the recently introduced "conditional banishment" of alleged leading activists of the uprising, as in the expulsion to Jordan of six Palestinian students on 17 July, following a five-day siege of Al-Najah National University at Nablus in the West Bank, as well as expulsions for lack of a valid "staying visa", often of non-resident wives and children.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (January)

The Security Council convened on 6 January 1992 in the wake of the most recent mass deportation of Palestinians from the occupied territories. At their request, Egypt, Israel and the Syrian Arab Republic were invited to participate in the discussion without the right to vote, in accordance with rule 37a of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.

The President drew attention to a letter from the Permanent Observer for Palestine(22) requesting that, in accordance with the Council's previous practice, he be invited to participate in the discussion. The President noted that the request was not made pursuant to rule 37 or rule 39,b but that, if approved, the Observer would have the same rights of participation as those conferred by rule 37. The request was approved by 10 votes to 1 (United States), with 4 abstentions (Belgium, France, Hungary, United Kingdom).

The United States, which requested the vote, stated its opposition, as it normally had regarding similar requests in the past, to granting PLO the same rights to participate in Council proceedings as if it represented a Member State of the United Nations. It underscored its generous interpretation of rule 39 over four decades and would not have raised any objection had the request been appropriately made under that rule.

Before the Council were two letters, from the Observer(23) and from the Acting Chairman of the Committee on Palestinian rights,(24) dated 3 and 6 January, respectively, drawing attention to and condemning the expulsion of 12 Palestinian civilians suspected of directing and taking part in violent acts against Israel. They were identified as Marwan Afaneh, Iyhab al-Ashkar, Ahmed Nimr Hamdan, Gassan Jarrar, Iyad Abed al-Raouf Judeh, Khader Atieh Khader, Ali Faris al-Khatib, Ra'afet al-Najar, Omar Assaf Safi, Ahmad Abu Sa'if, Sami Abu Samhadaneh and Hassan Abed Alla Shaban. The Acting Chairman cited The New York Times of 3 January as reporting that, since the intifadah began, Israel had deported at least 66 Palestinians, excluding the 12 mentioned above.

Following statements by five speakers, including the Observer for Palestine, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 726(1992).

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 607(1988), 608(1988), 636(1989), 641(1989) and 694(1991).

Having been apprised of the decision of Israel, the occupying Power, to deport twelve Palestinian civilians from the occupied Palestinian territories,

1. Strongly condemns the decision of Israel, the occupying Power, to resume deportations of Palestinian civilians;

2. Reaffirms the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention of 12 August 1949 to all the Palestinian territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem;

3. Requests Israel, the occupying Power, to refrain from deporting any Palestinian civilian from the occupied territories;

4. Also requests Israel, the occupying Power, to ensure the safe and immediate return to the occupied territories of all those deported;

5. Decides to keep the matter under review.

Security Council resolution 726(1992)

6 January 1992 Meeting 3026 Adopted unanimously

Draft prepared in consultations among Council members (S/23372).

The Observer for Palestine asserted that the policy of deportation had its roots in the ideological position that rejected not only the Palestinian national identity, but the very existence of Palestine. That position insisted on regarding the existence of Palestinians in their own country as a transient situation that must be changed and on the need to depopulate the territory of its Palestinian inhabitants through a policy of transfer, in order to annex the territory while keeping the pure Jewish nature of the State.

Israel asserted that the decision to expel the 12 Palestinians who were heavily implicated in organizing terror was not hastily taken. The 12 were active members of three terrorist groups: the Popular Front, which had taken responsibility for several serious attacks involving firearms; the Hamas group, which had admitted to 67 attacks; and the PLO Fatah group, which had committed approximately 320 terrorist acts-all in the past year. Israel pointed out that the expulsion orders were not immediate, each of the 12 having been given the opportunity to submit an appeal, first to an advisory committee attached to the Regional Commander, and then to the Israeli Supreme Court sitting as the High Court of Justice. Israel said expulsion orders were a rarely used but highly effective deterrent, the last ones having been issued against four Gaza District residents in May 1991.(25) The expulsion of extremists actively engaged in wrecking the ongoing peace process would help create the security and calm so essential for serious peace talks.

Israel went on to say that its expulsion orders were in accord with the legal framework in force in Judaea, Samaria and the Gaza District. Pending a political solution to the problem as a whole, Israel was responsible, according to international law, for the administration of the territories and as such obliged to determine the manner of restoring and maintaining order. Most of the security measures adopted by the Military Government in the administered areas were based on local Jordanian or Egyptian legislation, of which the Defence (Emergency) Regulations 1945 formed part. Those regulations were enacted by the British Government in 1945 and applied to the whole area under the Mandate, including the administered areas. Regulation 112, under which expulsion orders were issued, had been held valid in the administered areas by the Israeli Supreme Court. It had been argued that expulsion was prohibited by the fourth Geneva Convention; however, the Convention was not applicable to Judaea, Samaria and the Gaza District since they were not taken, as formulated in the Convention, from any legal sovereign. Nevertheless, Israel voluntarily applied the Convention's humanitarian provisions, which, as interpreted by the Israeli Supreme Court, did not include any prohibition of the expulsion of individuals involved in terrorist activities.

The United States believed that deportation of individuals from the occupied territories was a violation of the fourth Geneva Convention as it pertained to the treatment of inhabitants of those territories. Any person charged with wrongdoing should be brought before a court of law and given a fair trial affording full judicial process. The United States said it had repeatedly urged Israel to cease deportations immediately and permanently and to comply fully with the Convention in all of the territories it had occupied since 1967.

Communications. The Chairman of the Committee on Palestinian rights, on 17 December 1992,(26) drew the Secretary-General's attention to a Reuters dispatch, as well as to press releases issued by the Gaza Centre for Rights and Law and the Palestine Human Rights Information Centre (PHRIC), to the effect that, on the previous day, Israel had ordered the summary deportation of 418 Palestinians from the occupied territories for two years, apparently in punishment for the recent killing of a kidnapped Israeli soldier. Alleged to be activists with Islamic groups, they had not been formally charged with any offence but had been taken to Israel's northern border in anticipation of their deportation into southern Lebanon. They were reportedly waiting on buses, blindfolded and handcuffed, pending a court ruling from Jerusalem.

The move came in the wake of mass arrests of some 2,000 Palestinians during the preceding three days, of a round-the-clock curfew imposed on the Gaza Strip and of the sealing of the Gaza Strip and West Bank as closed military zones. The Chairman conveyed the Committee's renewed call for international protection for Palestinians living under Israeli occupation and for intensified efforts towards the achievement of a just and lasting settlement.

The Observer for Palestine, on 18 December,(27) reported that 383 of those slated for deportation had effectively been deported, in complete disregard of world-wide appeals and in violation of the fourth Geneva Convention. He asked for immediate action to guarantee their safe return and the return of all other Palestinian deportees.

Lebanon, also on 18 December,(28) requested an urgent meeting of the Security Council to discuss the grave situation resulting from the mass deportation into Lebanese territory, urging the Council to compel Israel to reverse its action.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION (December)

The Council convened on 18 December 1992 in response to Lebanon's request.(28) Egypt, Israel, Jordan, Lebanon and the Syrian Arab Republic were invited, at their request, to participate in the deliberations without the right to vote, in accordance with rule 37a of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.

Regarding a request from the Permanent Observer for Palestine(29) to participate in accordance with the Council's previous practice, the President again noted that it had not been made pursuant to rule 37 or rule 39,b and that, if approved, the Observer would be invited to participate with the same rights of participation as those conferred by rule 37. The request was approved by 10 votes in favour to 1 against (United States), with 4 abstentions (Belgium, France, Hungary, United Kingdom). The United States, which had requested the vote, reiterated its objection to the participation of PLO for the same reasons it had cited at the Council's January meeting (see above).

The Security Council,

Recalling the obligations of Member States under the United Nations Charter,

Reaffirming its resolutions 607(1988), 608(1988), 636(1989), 641(1989), 681(1990), 694(1991) and 726(1992),

Having learned with deep concern that Israel, the occupying Power, in contravention of its obligations under the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949, deported to Lebanon on 17 December 1992 hundreds of Palestinian civilians from the territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem,

1. Strongly condemns the action taken by Israel, the occupying Power, to deport hundreds of Palestinian civilians, and expresses its firm opposition to any such deportation by Israel;

2. Reaffirms the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention of 12 August 1949 to all the Palestinian territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem, and affirms that deportation of civilians constitutes a contravention of its obligations under the Convention;

3. Reaffirms also the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Lebanon;

4. Demand that Israel, the occupying Power, ensure the safe and immediate return to the occupied territories of all those deported;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to consider dispatching a representative to the area to follow up with the Israeli Government with regard to this serious situation and to report to the Security Council;

6. Decides to keep the matter actively under review.

Security Council resolution 799(1992)

18 December 1992 Meeting 3151 Adopted unanimously

Draft prepared in consultations among Council members (S/24987).

The Observer for Palestine remarked that perhaps one of the most serious political consequences of Israel's action was its potential for sabotaging or even completely destroying the ongoing peace process. The Palestinian delegation to the talks had been compelled to boycott the previous day's meeting, the last in the eighth round of talks, pending a final decision by the PLO leadership on whether to continue with its participation in the process, for it could not agree to participate in peace talks while Israel pursued its illegal and repressive policies against Palestinians, especially its deportation policy.

Calling Israel's action an act of defiance of the United Nations, a challenge to the Council and a serious breach of the sovereignty and rights of States, Lebanon noted that the Palestinian deportees were left stranded in the open on Lebanese soil under harsh weather conditions, despite its announcement that it would not receive them on its territory.

In defence of the deportations, Israel stated that since March the Islamic fundamentalist group Hamas had carried out 30 terrorist attacks against Israelis that had left 11 dead and 9 wounded. It went on to describe the circumstances and dates of death by stabbing of 3 Israelis (22 February and 24 and 27 May); of 3 soldiers killed by Hamas terrorists, who later paraded through Gaza City proclaiming responsibility for the attack (7 December); of the death of a driver and the wounding of 2 soldiers when Hamas opened fire on their moving vehicle (12 December); and of the kidnapping of an Israeli soldier, later strangled and stabbed to death and whose body was dumped on the Jerusalem-Jericho highway (15 December).

Hamas and Islamic Jihad, Israel claimed, had engaged in gunfire attacks on Israeli civilians and soldiers, in the murder of suspected Palestinian collaborators, in kidnappings and hostage-taking, and in shrill anti-Semitic rhetoric. Moreover, in a leaflet issued in 1991, Hamas declared its unyielding opposition to the very notion of a Middle East peace conference and called for "a serious and effective move at all levels to foil the capitulation conference". Despite these, some Council members were condemning Israel for protecting its citizens and taking measures in self-defence. In view of these terrorist activities, Israel decided to issue temporary removal orders, for a period not to extend beyond two years, against hundreds of members of the terrorist Hamas and Islamic Jihad organizations, including their political and military leaders, whose actions endangered, or incited others to endanger, human lives. The Supreme Court of Israel allowed the temporary-removal measures to proceed, following a careful 14-hour examination of the legal issues involved.

To sum up its position, Israel quoted its Prime Minister, who stated at a special Knesset session on 15 December: "We have only one course, and it is a dual one: a search for peace and an uncompromising war on terrorism. Despite the pain, we continue to cling to the pursuit of peace."

Explaining its affirmative vote, the United States expressed regret that Israel had gone ahead with the deportations, for, by so doing, it played into the hands of those whose goal was to scuttle the peace process. It also imposed an unfair burden on Lebanon. The United States, however, could not ignore, and equally and strongly condemned, the brutal murder of Israelis by Hamas that preceded the deportations and were part of a deliberate strategy to undermine the peace process.

Subsequent communications. On 21 December,⁽³⁰⁾ the Observer for Palestine drew attention to the extremely harsh conditions of the area in which the deportees were located, making necessary an even more rapid implementation of the resolution just adopted.

Israel, on 23 December,⁽³¹⁾ expressed its regret over the Council resolution, which not only failed to recognize Israel's compelling need to defend and protect its citizens against a brutal wave of terrorist activity but also in no way condemned the acts of terror by Hamas and Islamic Jihad elements against Arab and Jew alike. Nevertheless, Israel agreed to the Secretary-General's suggestion to send his representative to Israel on a goodwill mission in the very near future.

Israel restated that it took the exceptional step of temporarily excluding the operatives of the two organizations so as to curtail their network to a degree that would enable the peace talks to proceed in the desired direction. It pointed out that the Supreme Court of Israel sitting as the High Court of Justice had twice considered the petitions for the return of those subjected to the exclusion orders, who had been allowed recourse to individual appeals within 60 days of their removal.

Report of the Secretary-General. The Secretary-General informed the General Assembly in October 1992(32) that no reply had been received from Israel to his July request for information on steps it had taken or envisaged to implement the 1991 Assembly demand(33) that Israel rescind the illegal measure of deporting Palestinians and facilitate their immediate return.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 14 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, adopted resolution 47/70 E by recorded vote.

Palestinian detainees

Report of the Committee on Israeli practices. The Committee on Israeli practices(14) noted serious shortcomings in the administration of justice, increasingly exercised by military courts, even in traffic offences. The number of Arab civilians in detention, administrative or otherwise, remained very high due to the policy of "quick justice". As Amnesty International reported in September 1991, more than 14,000 Palestinians had spent some time in administrative detention since the intifadah began.

Court proceedings were described as summary and arbitrary, denying basic legal safeguards, such as the right to a fair trial. Extracting confessions under duress was common practice. Family members of detainees were also arbitrarily detained so as to exert psychological pressure on them. Contact with legal counsel was not permitted during interrogation periods, which could last several months. Lawyers complained of difficulties in gaining access to their clients' files and of procedural obstacles during trial. In addition, relatives of arrested persons were systematically subjected to economic and psychological pressures, such as the denial or cancellation of work and travel permits. Lawyers and families were often not notified of the place of incarceration or of the transfer of prisoners from one detention centre to another.

The Committee was concerned by the severity of sentences imposed on the Arab population, often disproportionate to the offence, in marked contrast with the leniency from which Israeli citizens benefited, even when charged with the killing or ill-treatment of Arab civilians, in flagrant violation of the fundamental right of equality before courts and tribunals. An additional grave deficiency was the practice of imposing dual punishment on Palestinians, who not only received harsh sentences but also had their houses demolished. Such measures of collective punishment, prohibited by the fourth Geneva Convention, also affected innocent family members or relatives.

The Committee noted a further deterioration in the treatment of prisoners, characterized by systematic torture and ill-treatment, both physical and psychological, such as food and sleep deprivation, being tied up in painful positions and confined to extremely reduced spaces. Such practices often resulted in severe injuries, permanent incapacitation or even death, as in the case of Mustapha al-Akawi, aged 35, who died on 4 February while under interrogation at Hebron Prison in the West Bank. Detained on 22 January, he was brought before the military court at Hebron at the request of the Israeli secret service, Shin Bet. Mr. al-Akawi complained of having been beaten during interrogation, showing the judge deep bruises on his arms and shoulders. Israeli authorities admitted subjecting him to standard treatment—beatings, sleep deprivation, forced postures, confinement to a tiny cell and exposure to extreme cold. A lawyer was not permitted to speak with him during his detention and court appearances. On 4 February, his father was summoned to the Jerusalem police station, where the lawyer telephoned Hebron Prison and learned of Mr. al-Akawi's death. No information on the cause of death was given.

A particularly disquieting development was the alleged use of electric shock during interrogation. The newspaper Hadashot (February 1991) quoted police sources as confirming the allegation to be substantially correct and that electric shock was in use at several prisons to extract information from stone-throwers. An ICRC press release of 21 May 1992 called for an immediate halt to the ill-treatment of detainees during interrogations, stressing that confessions obtained under duress precluded a fair trial.

Contrary to the fourth Geneva Convention, detainees continued to be held in prisons and detention centres inside Israel itself, such as Ketziot, in the Negev, in southern Israel, where conditions were said to be harsh throughout the year and where facilities, food, clothing and medical services were inadequate. Owing to insufficient food intake—only 1,400 calories daily—prisoners fell easy prey to disease. Many were reported to have died of deliberate medical negligence. Although Israel had ratified the 1984 Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment,⁽³⁴⁾ it had a record of detaining and torturing minors. Evidence indicated that even children aged 12 were arrested, beaten and tortured for several days on end.

Communications. In October, the Chairman of the Committee on Palestinian rights⁽³⁵⁾ and the Permanent Observer for Palestine⁽³⁶⁾ drew attention to press reports that, since 27 September, at least 3,000 Palestinian prisoners in the Israeli prisons at Jneid, Nablus, Ashkelon, Bir Saba' and Nafha had been on a hunger strike in protest against ill-treatment and deteriorating conditions of detention. The prisoners were demanding an end to long periods of solitary confinement and other arbitrary individual and collective punishments; the closure of special punishment dungeons; a reinstatement of adequate food rations; a halt to overcrowding; access to proper medical treatment; and an end to beatings and tear-gassing in the cells and to demeaning strip searches.

The Committee deplored that the Israeli authorities had so far refused to address these legitimate grievances, treating them as a security problem rather than as a human rights issue, and that support demonstrations had been suppressed with live ammunition and rubber bullets, resulting in at least 90 Palestinians shot and injured in the Gaza Strip. The Committee further stated that a PHRIC press release estimated the number of Palestinians currently detained or imprisoned at 12,500. Up to 1,000 more might be under short detention orders, although not registered with detention centres or police lock-ups.

The Observer reported⁽³⁷⁾ that, on 6 October, Israeli forces indiscriminately fired on Palestinian civilians in the Gaza Strip and West Bank and raided the ICRC office at Rafah, where a number of Palestinians had previously assembled in solidarity with the ongoing hunger strike. They also attacked other solidarity gatherings at Rafah with gunfire, gas bombs and other means, resulting in 108 casualties.

Report of the Secretary-General. The Secretary-General informed the General Assembly in October 1992⁽³⁸⁾ that Israel had not replied to his July request for information on steps taken or envisaged to implement an Assembly resolution of 1991⁽³⁹⁾ calling on Israel to release all Palestinians and other Arabs arbitrarily detained or imprisoned.

Israeli measures against educational institutions

Report of the Committee on Israeli practices. The Committee on Israeli practices noted in its October 1992 report(14) that freedom of education continued to be restricted by the frequent closure of academic institutions, some of which had remained closed since the beginning of the popular uprising. Those allowed to reopen were subjected to periodic closures. A case in point was Al-Najah University at Nablus, sealed off by the army on 14 July on suspicion that armed fugitives were on the premises. As a result, approximately 2,000 students, professors, employees and several children found themselves confined to the campus for days. A curfew imposed on the town at the same time affected its almost 150,000 inhabitants. The long-term effects of closures and curfews had led to a dramatic decline in the once high academic standards and educational level of the Palestinians. Restrictions on movement curtailed one's choice of schools, as in the case of students from Gaza who wanted to study in the West Bank but needed permission to do so from its military governor.

The Committee was informed of severe shortages of classrooms and teaching materials and of restrictions on the importation of books, even of books in use at Israeli university libraries. An additional difficulty that Palestinian students faced was that diplomas awarded by universities subjected to official closures, based on academic requirements fulfilled outside their premises, were not recognized by Israeli authorities; consequently, students holding such diplomas were unable to find employment. Although regarded illegal by the Israeli military authorities, almost all universities had begun off-campus teaching to maintain a connection between students and teachers and some semblance of a university.

Report of the Secretary-General. The Secretary-General informed the General Assembly in October 1992(40) that no reply had been received from Israel to his July request for information on steps it had taken or envisaged to implement the 1991 Assembly demand(41) that it rescind all actions and measures against educational institutions, ensure their freedom and refrain from hindering their effective operation.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 14 December 1992, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/70 G by recorded vote.

The General Assembly,

Bearing in mind the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949,

Deeply concerned about the continued and intensified harassment by Israel, the occupying Power, directed against educational institutions in the occupied Palestinian territory, Recalling Security Council resolutions 605(1987) of 22 December 1987, 672(1990) of 12 October 1990, 673(1990) of 24 October 1990 and 681(1990) of 20 December 1990.

Recalling further the reports of the Secretary-General of 21 January 1988, 31 October 1990 and 9 April 1991, and taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 23 October 1992,

Taking note of the relevant decisions adopted by the Executive Board of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization concerning the educational and cultural situation in the occupied Palestinian territory,

1. Reaffirms the applicability of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, to the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967;

2. Condemns Israeli policies and practices against Palestinian students and faculty members in schools, universities and other educational institutions in the occupied Palestinian territory, especially the opening of fire on defenceless students, causing many casualties;

3. Also condemns the systematic Israeli campaign of repression against and closing of universities, schools and other educational and vocational institutions in the occupied Palestinian territory, in large numbers and for prolonged periods, restricting and impeding the academic activities of Palestinian universities by subjecting the selection of courses, textbooks and educational programmes, the admission of students and the appointment of faculty members to the control and supervision of the military occupation authorities, in flagrant contravention of the Convention;

4. Demands that Israel, the occupying Power, comply with the provisions of that Convention, rescind all actions and measures taken against all educational institutions, ensure the freedom of those institutions and refrain forthwith from hindering the effective operation of the universities, schools and other educational institutions;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly as soon as possible, but not later than the beginning of its forty-eighth session, on the implementation of the present resolution.

Golan Heights

Report of the Committee on Israeli practices. The October 1992 report of the Committee on Israeli practices⁽¹⁴⁾ included information on the policies and practices pursued by Israel in the occupied Syrian Golan, as provided by the Syrian Arab Republic. The report cited the Jerusalem Post of 15 July, which carried an item on "security" settlements to be established in the Golan Heights and the Jordan Valley, contrary to changes in the settlements policy announced by the newly elected Israeli Government. Land in the region of Buq'ata village was reported to have recently been confiscated, on which military outposts were set up, thus excluding it from grazing. Land was further expropriated from the remaining Syrian Arab villages of Al-Fajr, Ayn Qunyah, Majdal Shams and Mas'adah.

Other practices mentioned included: the continual reduction of irrigation water for Golan Arabs owing to its diversion to farmlands in Jewish settlements; restrictions on digging new wells; the uprooting of fruit trees and saplings of landowners who had not obtained permits from the so-called Israel Land Administration; setting fire to Arab orchards and wooded areas surrounding Arab villages; burning grazing areas and planting mines around them; levying high property and income taxes; replacing Syrian Arab educational curricula with one hostile to the population's national and spiritual heritage; restrictions on travel out of the Golan for medical treatment; and the use of force to quell demonstrations and resistance to Israeli occupation.

Report of the Secretary-General. In October 1992,⁽⁴²⁾ the Secretary-General informed the General Assembly that no reply had been received from Israel to his July request for information on steps it had taken or envisaged to implement the 1991 Assembly call⁽⁴³⁾ on Israel to desist from repressive measures against the Golan population.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 14 December, the General Assembly, on the Special Political Committee's recommendation, adopted resolution 47/70 F by recorded vote.

The General Assembly,

Deeply concerned that the Arab territories occupied since 1967 have been under continued Israeli military occupation,

Recalling Security Council resolution 497(1981) of 17 December 1981,

Recalling also its resolutions 36/226 B of 17 December 1981, ES-9/1 of 5 February 1982, 37/88 E of 10 December 1982, 38/79 F of 15 December 1983, 39/95 F of 14 December 1984, 40/161 F of 16 December 1985, 41/63 F of 3 December 1986, 42/160 F of 8 December 1987, 43/21 of 3 November 1988, 43/58 F of 6 December 1988, 44/2 of 6 October 1989, 44/48 F of 8 December 1989, 45/74 F of 11 December 1990 and 46/47 F of 9 December 1991,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 23 October 1992,

Recalling its previous resolutions, in particular resolutions 3414(XXX) of 5 December 1975, 31/61 of 9 December 1976, 32/20 of 25 November 1977, 33/28 and 33/29 of 7 December 1978, 34/70 of 6 December 1979 and 35/122 E of 11 December 1980, in which, inter alia, it called upon Israel to put an end to its occupation of the Arab territories and to withdraw from all those territories,

Reaffirming once more the illegality of Israel's decision of 14 December 1981 to impose its laws, jurisdiction and administration on the occupied Syrian Golan, which has resulted in the effective annexation of that territory,

Reaffirming that the acquisition of territory by force is inadmissible under the Charter of the United Nations and that all territories thus occupied by Israel must be returned,

Recalling the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, Reaffirming the applicability of that Convention to the occupied Syrian Golan, Bearing in mind Security Council resolution 237(1967) of 14 June 1967,

1. Strongly condemns Israel, the occupying Power, for its refusal to comply with the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council, particularly Council resolution 497(1981), in which the Council, inter alia, decided that the Israeli decision to impose its laws, jurisdiction and administration on the occupied Syrian Arab Golan was null and void and without international legal effect and demanded that Israel, the occupying Power, should rescind forthwith its decisions;

2. Condemns the persistence of Israel in changing the physical character, demographic composition, institutional structure and legal status of the occupied Syrian Golan;

3. Determines that all legislative and administrative measures and actions taken or to be taken by Israel, the occupying Power, that purport to alter the character and legal status of the occupied Syrian Golan are null and void, constitute a flagrant violation of international law and of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, and have no legal effect;

4. Strongly condemns Israel for its attempts forcibly to impose Israeli citizenship and Israeli identity cards on the Syrian citizens in the occupied Syrian Golan, and calls upon it to desist from its repressive measures against the population of the occupied Syrian Golan;

5. Deplores the violations by Israel of the Convention;

6. Calls once again upon Member States not to recognize any of the legislative or administrative measures and actions referred to above;

The Commission on Human Rights, on 14 February, adopted a resolution by which it determined that all legislative and administrative measures and actions taken or to be taken by Israel, purporting to alter the character and legal status of the Syrian Golan, were null and void, constituted a flagrant violation of international law and the fourth Geneva Convention, and had no legal effect.(44) (See also PART THREE, Chapter X.)

Israeli settlements

Report of the Committee on Israeli practices. In its October 1992 report,(14) the Committee on Israeli practices observed that, from the information before it, Israeli settlement activities had intensified through land expropriation and the transfer of Israeli citizens to the occupied territories, particularly of recent Jewish immigrants from Eastern Europe and the former USSR. These and related practices to induce Palestinian and other Arab population to leave their homeland (diversion of water resources, destruction of fields, uprooting of fruit trees, expropriation of grazing land and closing other land areas as military zones, and excessive use of environmentally harmful pesticides and other chemicals) indicated a clear intent to modify the territories' demographic composition. Settlements were often built between Arab villages, cutting off contact among them. Newly built roads and highways linked the settlements but bypassed Palestinian towns and villages.

The Committee cited press reports to show the direction of Israel's settlements policy. Two reports noted the quadrupling in 1991 of building starts in the territories (Ha'aretz and Jerusalem Post, 6 April), and the transfer of some $10.5 million earmarked for roads under the Ministry of Housing's regular budget to a parallel budget for road construction specifically for security reasons (Ha'aretz, 6 May). Announcements were made of the imminent launching of a major campaign to attract more settlers to the Golan Heights, following declarations by the outgoing Prime Minister and the incoming one that Israel would keep the Golan for its strategic importance (Jerusalem Post, 18 June); and of the possible establishment of new "security" settlements in the Golan Heights and the Jordan Valley, defined as border settlements directly connected with warding off attacks and whose residents were organized to defend the sector (Jerusalem Post, 15 July).

On the other hand, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was reported as having proposed a shift away from budget allocations for settlements, but ruled out a complete freeze, and as making a clear distinction between "political" and "security" settlements (Jerusalem Post, 25 June). The Government was reported to have imposed a de facto freeze on all new public housing construction and on all unsigned building contracts throughout the country, including the West Bank and the Gaza Strip (Ha'aretz, 16 July; Jerusalem Post, 17 July). The new cabinet, at its first session in July, voted to carry out previously approved settlement projects only upon their re-approval by the new Government (Jerusalem Post, 20 July; Ha'aretz, 21 July). The Ministers of Finance and Housing ordered the cancellation of construction work on nearly 7,000 new housing units in the territories and on a dozen highways (Ha'aretz, Jerusalem Post, 24 July); and the Prime Minister gave final approval to a plan calling a halt to the construction of 5,364 houses in the territories and of 6,617 units planned to be built inside the Green Line (Jerusalem Post, 28 July).

Meanwhile, numerous cases of harassment and violence involving Israeli settlers continued to be reported. On several occasions, settlers raided villages and refugee camps, attacking the inhabitants, destroying their property and uprooting trees, with the Israeli armed forces often unable to control such outbursts of aggression.

Report of the Secretary-General. The Secretary-General informed the General Assembly in October 1992(45) that no reply had been received from Israel to his July request for information on steps it had taken or envisaged to implement the 1991 Assembly demand(46) that it desist from taking any action that would result in changing the legal status, geographical nature or demographic composition of the territories.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 14 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the basis of the Special Political Committee's recommendation, adopted resolution 47/70 C by recorded vote.

The General Assembly,

Recalling Security Council resolutions 465(1980) of 1 March 1980, 605(1987) of 22 December 1987, 672(1990) of 12 October 1990, 673(1990) of 24 October 1990, 681(1990) of 20 December 1990 and 726(1992) of 6 January 1992,

Recalling also its resolutions 32/5 of 28 October 1977, 33/113 B of 18 December 1978, 34/90 C of 12 December 1979, 35/122 B of 11 December 1980, 36/147 B of 16 December 1981, 37/88 B of 10 December 1982, 38/79 C of 15 December 1983, 39/95 C of 14 December 1984, 40/161 C of 6 December 1985, 41/63 C of 3 December 1986, 42/160 C of 8 December 1987, 43/58 C of 6 December 1988, 44/48 C of 8 December 1989, 45/74 C of 11 December 1990 and 46/47 C of 9 December 1991,

Expressing grave anxiety and concern about the serious situation prevailing in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967, as a result of the continued Israeli occupation and the measures and actions taken by Israel, the occupying Power, designed to change the legal status, geographical nature and demographic composition of those territories,

Recalling the reports of the Secretary-General of 21 January 1988, 31 October 1990 and 9 April 1991, and taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 23 October 1992,

Confirming that the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, is applicable to all occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967,

1. Determines that all such measures and actions taken by Israel in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967 are in violation of the relevant provisions of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, constitute a serious obstacle to the efforts to achieve a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the Middle East and therefore have no legal validity;

2. Strongly deplores the persistence of Israel in carrying out such measures, in particular the establishment of settlements in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967;

3. Demands that Israel comply strictly with its international obligations in accordance with the principles of international law and the provisions of the said Convention;

4. Demands once more that Israel, the occupying Power, desist forthwith from taking any action that would result in changing the legal status, geographical nature or demographic composition of the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967;

5. Urgently calls upon all States parties to the Convention to respect and to exert all efforts in order to ensure respect for and compliance with its provisions in all occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Human Rights Commission action. The Commission on Human Rights, on 14 February,(47) reaffirmed that the installation of Israeli civilians in the occupied territories was illegal and constituted a violation of the fourth Geneva Convention; it urged Israel to abstain from installing settlers, including immigrants, in the occupied territories. (See also PART THREE, Chapter X.)

Economic and social repercussions of Israeli settlements

In a report of July 1992,(48) the Secretary-General summarized the economic and social consequences of the establishment of settlements by Israel in the Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, and the Syrian Golan. Prepared in response to a General Assembly request of 1991,(49) it was submitted to the Assembly through the Economic and Social Council.

According to the report, the establishment of settlements had accelerated since the beginning of 1991. Massive Jewish immigration to Israel from the Commonwealth of Independent States, Eastern Europe and Ethiopia (about 200,000 in 1990 and another 200,000 in 1991) led to unprecedented housing construction in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, the Gaza Strip and the Syrian Golan. In 1991, 5,565 mobile and prefabricated homes were installed. Under a long-term plan, a ring of new housing was to be built in the Jerusalem, Jericho and Nablus areas in the West Bank, and at Tulkarim in the Gaza Strip. By September 1991, there were about 19,000 units at various stages of construction.

Rising prices and a tight housing market in Israel on the one hand, and government financial and tax incentives, concessionary loans and free infrastructure on the other, led many Israelis to move to settlements in the occupied territories. The Council of Jewish Communities launched a major campaign in April 1992 to encourage tens of thousands of Jews to move to houses currently under construction in the territories, with the aim of settling 70,000 persons within a year.

The indigenous Arab community in the occupied territories-governed by a civil administration under the authority of the Israeli Ministry of Defence and subject to specific legislation-developed separately from the newly established Jewish Israeli community. This dual legal and administrative system applicable to the two peoples was highlighted in a 1990 report on human rights practices by the United States Department of State. It emphasized that Palestinians-both Muslim and Christian-were treated less favourably than Israeli settlers on a broad range of issues, including equality before the law, right to residence, freedom of movement, sale of crops and goods, land and water use, and access to health and social services.

The Palestinian human rights organization Al-Haq pointed out that the benefits and subsidies granted to settlers were components of a situation in which 65 per cent of the Arab lands in the West Bank were illegally confiscated by the authorities, and where Palestinian towns and villages were encircled and isolated by settlement developments. There were no urban or rural development projects for the improvement or expansion of Palestinian agglomerations.

Apart from being subject to continued expropriation, Arab land was also subject to restrictions under a specific military order, applicable where the land surrounded settlements, camps, military installations or access routes to settlements. In some areas, fertile Palestinian land had been sacrificed to secure access routes, as in the case of many vineyards between Bethlehem and Hebron. Land confiscated between June 1967 and the end of 1990 through the application of Israeli laws and regulations totalled as follows: 2,895,642 dunums (52.6 per cent) in the occupied West Bank, 153,475 dunums (42.3 per cent) in the Gaza Strip, and 69.4 per cent of the land area of the Syrian Golan. In January 1992, Israel's Ministry of Finance put the number of Jewish settlers at 130,000 in the West Bank, at 120,000 in East Jerusalem, at between 4,000 and 5,000 in the Gaza Strip and at more than 13,000 in the Syrian Golan, making a total of some 268,000 settlers in the occupied territories. The number of settlements was estimated at 194—136 in the West Bank, 33 in the Syrian Golan, 17 in the Gaza Strip and 8 in East Jerusalem.

The report noted that the development of Jewish settlements had worsened the socio-economic conditions of the Palestinians and was a source of tension. Clashes between the two communities occurred with increasing frequency, the Israeli settlers having organized themselves into an armed militia. It cited an UNCTAD study⁽⁵⁰⁾ indicating that Israeli policy and practices in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip had brought about radical changes in the structure of the economy that adversely affected economic growth and development and reduced Palestinian contribution to the gross domestic product. The study found that the total cultivated area decreased in the West Bank from 36 per cent in 1966 to 27 per cent in 1984, and, in the Gaza Strip, from 55 per cent in 1966 to 28 per cent in 1985.

Land confiscation in both territories meant an inevitable decline in agricultural production, and hence a decline in agricultural income: in the West Bank, from $237 million in 1981 to $204 million in 1985, and, in the Gaza Strip, from $66 million to $61 million in the same period, the increased use of modern agricultural technologies notwithstanding. Agricultural employment likewise fell in both territories, from 38.7 per cent of the total workforce in 1970 to 24.4 per cent in 1985.

Also cited was a 1990 ILO report, according to which endogenous development efforts were frequently frustrated or undone for administrative or security reasons. Thousands of workers had left because they or their employers had lost their land or could not expand for lack of water; or because they could not compete in the home market with subsidized imports from Israel; or because they encountered barriers to buying farm inputs or to selling their products abroad. Land confiscation and restrictions on water resources meant that a large proportion of the population normally earning a living by traditional agriculture gradually began seeking employment in Israel as unskilled workers because of a lack of alternative jobs in the territories. That appeared to be partially responsible for the territories' economic dependence on Israel, particularly for agricultural produce.

As to water resources, Israel had issued a series of orders to guarantee its complete monopoly and control over those resources, with respect to water transfer, extraction, consumption, sales and distribution, use, water sharing and rationing, well drilling and construction of water installations. Arab inhabitants of the Syrian Golan were forced to demolish some of their own reservoirs; the Israeli army had dynamited a number of others. Only three or four reservoirs, out of some 400 in existence in the Golan, were currently authorized for use. Restrictions on water use were such that the permits granted were for drilling wells not exceeding 60 metres and for domestic purposes only, while Israeli settlers were allowed to drill to depths of up to 500 metres. Several hundred Arab-owned water pumps in the Jordan Valley were destroyed for security reasons, as were irrigation canals supplying water to Arab farms in the Al-Jiftlik area. Ram Lake, the largest body of water in the Syrian Golan, was seized by Israeli authorities and its water diverted to serve agricultural and industrial projects in Israeli settlements; consequently, Golan villages suffered a critical shortfall in drinking and irrigation water.

The report described the consequences of Israeli water policies and practices thus: a state of conflict and competition over land and water resources prevailed—such as that between Israeli settlements in the Jordan Valley and the Arab villages of the West Bank—with adverse impact on the living conditions of Palestinians. Of estimated usable groundwater reserves of 600 million cubic metres per year in the West Bank, approximately 500 million cubic metres were being pumped by the Israeli occupation authorities, leaving only 100 million cubic metres, or 16.6 per cent of the total water available, for West Bank use. The deep wells drilled by Israeli authorities reduced the water level in Arab wells, in turn reducing productive capacity and gradually drying up those wells and agricultural lands dependent on them for irrigation. Over-exploitation of groundwater in the Gaza Strip and the dramatic increase in water consumption by Israeli settlers had increased salinity through sea-water intrusion so that about 50 per cent of the Gaza wells had become unfit for human use and most of them unfit for irrigation. As in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, Israel's arbitrary practices in land confiscation and control of water resources in the Syrian Golan had reduced the area under cultivation, curtailed local development and lowered income from agriculture.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 31 July 1992, the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of its Economic Committee, adopted resolution 1992/57 by recorded vote.

Economic and social repercussions of the Israeli settlements on the Palestinian people in the Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, occupied since 1967, and on the Arab population of the Syrian Golan.

Recalling its resolution 46/199 of 20 December 1991,

Guided by the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, affirming the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force and recalling Security Council resolutions 242(1967) of 22 November 1967 and 497(1981) of 17 December 1981,

Recalling also Security Council resolution 465(1980) of 1 March 1980 and other resolutions affirming the applicability of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, to the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967,

Expressing its concern at the establishment by Israel, the occupying Power, of settlements in the occupied Palestinian territory and other Arab territories occupied since 1967, including the settlements of new immigrants therein,

Welcoming the Middle East peace process started at Madrid on 30 October 1991 and recognizing that a complete freeze of settlement activity would significantly enhance the prospects for progress in this process,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General;
2. Deplores the establishment of settlements by Israel in the Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, and other Arab territories occupied since 1967, and regards the settlements as illegal and an obstacle to peace;
3. Recognizes the economic and social repercussions of the Israeli settlements on the Palestinian people in the Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, occupied by Israel since 1967, and on the Arab population of the Syrian Golan;
4. Strongly deplores Israel's practices in the occupied Palestinian territory and other Arab territories occupied since 1967, in particular its confiscation of land, its appropriation of water resources, its depletion of other economic resources and its displacement and deportation of the population of those territories;

5. Reaffirms the inalienable right of the Palestinian people and the population of the Syrian Golan to their natural and all other economic resources, and regards any infringement thereof as being without any legal validity;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session, through the Economic and Social Council, a report on the progress made in the implementation of the present resolution.

Palestine refugees

The number of Palestine refugees registered with the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, as at 30 June 1992, was 2,648,707.⁽¹⁾ They lived in and outside camps in the Israeli-occupied West Bank (459,147) and Gaza Strip (560,207), Jordan (1,010,719), Lebanon (319,427) and the Syrian Arab Republic (299,207). UNRWA noted, however, that the refugees present in those five areas almost certainly numbered less than the population recorded. By the end of 1992, UNRWA put the total number of refugees at 2.73 million.

The various aspects of the Palestine refugee problem, as well as the activities of UNRWA, were addressed by the General Assembly through 11 resolutions adopted in December on: assistance to Palestine refugees (47/69 A) and to 'displaced persons' (47/69 C); the Working Group on the Financing of UNRWA (47/69 B); scholarships for higher education and vocational training (47/69 D); refugees in Israeli-occupied territory (47/69 E); resumption of the ration distribution to Palestine refugees (47/69 F); return of displaced population and refugees (47/69 G); revenues from refugees' properties (47/69 H); refugee protection (47/69 I); proposed University of Jerusalem "Al-Quds" for Palestine refugees (47/69 J); and protection of Palestinian students and educational institutions and safeguarding of UNRWA facilities (47/69 K).

UN Agency for Palestine refugees

In 1992, UNRWA continued to provide a wide-ranging programme of education, health, relief and social services for the Palestine refugees in the five areas of UNRWA operation. In addition, it undertook extraordinary measures of assistance for Lebanon and the occupied territories. Details of this assistance were contained in the Commissioner-General's report covering the period 1 July 1991 to 30 June 1992.⁽¹⁾

The education programme, UNRWA's largest activity, served a total of 374,406 elementary and preparatory pupils during the reporting period, 8,800 more than in the previous year. Vocational training, encompassing two-year post-preparatory trade courses and post-secondary technical and teacher-training courses, increased to 5,202 training places, from 5,146 in the preceding period, as did university scholarships, to 661 from 641. The programme followed the host Governments' curricula, in close cooperation with UNESCO, which seconded 14 of its senior staff to UNRWA. Some 9,750 Palestine refugee pupils who returned in 1991 from Kuwait and other Gulf States were absorbed by UNRWA schools, mostly in Jordan (6,200) and Gaza (1,300). The schools in Gaza absorbed another 2,000 pupils originally expected to attend government schools.

As a result of school closures in the occupied territories, due to military orders, curfews and general strikes, the Agency's 98 schools in the West Bank lost 17 per cent of school days, while its 153 schools in the Gaza Strip lost 12 per cent. Its four training centres lost 20 per cent of training days. To compensate for lost days, UNRWA developed self-learning and audiovisual materials for distance education.

The 197 UNRWA schools in Jordan, serving 140,000 pupils, as well as the two training centres, operated normally. The 77 schools in Lebanon, attended by a total of 34,400 pupils, lost less than 6 per cent of school days. Several school construction projects were completed: the renovation of all school premises at Nahr el-Bared camp and of Mansoura school, the reconstruction of Mount Tabor school and the establishment of two learning resource centres in central Lebanon. The 111 schools in the Syrian Arab Republic, serving a student population of 58,800, and the Damascus Training Centre, which provided 776 training places, operated without interruption.

A significant academic development was the Agency's participation in standardized, internationally recognized mathematics and science tests held in Jordan and the West Bank in April and May. Consistent with the findings of an external evaluation made of its vocational and technical education programme, and in view of the region's depressed labour market, UNRWA introduced short-term vocational training. It decided to phase out its two-year pre-service teacher-training programme by 1994, owing to the inability of large numbers of the programme's graduates to find posts and to the imminent requirement of a four-year university degree by Jordan, Gaza and the West Bank.

The Agency health programme provided primary health care, health protection and promotion services; environmental health services in camps; and nutrition and supplementary feeding to vulnerable population groups. Overcrowding at clinics was met by introducing patient-flow analysis and appointment systems, as well as by constructing additional health centres, renovating those that had deteriorated and increasing the number of laboratories, dental and special-care clinics and diagnostic equipment. Medical service was extended to localities not previously covered, especially in the West Bank and Lebanon. A second afternoon shift rendering a full range of preventive and curative services was introduced in five out of eight refugee camps in Gaza. UNRWA emergency operations provided primary and hospital care to intifadah-related casualties. The joint UNRWA/UNICEF physiotherapy programme continued in UNRWA health centres in the West Bank and Gaza. Greater attention was given to planning for the care of the mentally and psychologically disturbed segment of the refugee population. Besides taking over a joint UNRWA/WHO mental health programme begun in 1991, UNRWA jointly arranged with WHO a 12-month training course in community mental health, beginning in October in the United Kingdom.

Under the UNRWA/WHO short-term action plan for HIV/AIDS prevention and control, two inter-field training workshops were conducted in July 1991 and January 1992 in blood transfusion for Agency senior staff and technologists in the West Bank and Gaza, and on epidemiological surveillance for senior staff from all five areas of Agency operation. Meanwhile, WHO provided HIV examination kits for non-governmental hospitals in the West Bank and for the Central Blood Bank Society in Gaza. The expanded UNRWA programme of immunization was strengthened by a supply of measles, mumps, rubella and hepatitis-B vaccines from the Public Health Department of the West Bank.

Demand for social and relief services increased significantly, with the number of refugees qualifying for special hardship assistance rising to 178,000 from 162,000. The increase was largest in Gaza, where economic and social dislocation was especially severe. Of the families receiving such assistance, 42 per cent were headed by women. Development programmes expanded for those with special needs, particularly women and the disabled.

Women's programme centres functioned as multi-purpose focal points. Women and girls from special hardship families received priority for informal training in skills, literacy and numeracy, health education, child development, household maintenance, technical skills to generate or conserve income, basic business skills and legal literacy. With the opening of eight new centres, the number of women's centres rose to 65 and women participants to 9,100, from 4,700. While UNRWA staff were attached to each centre to facilitate the programme, women's committees raised funds to supplement the core budget provided by the Agency. A special contribution enabled the Agency to launch a Palestinian Women's Initiative Fund, under which technical support, grants and loans were made available to productive enterprises and support services, including a women's community bank, a pilot marketing and distribution centre for items produced by women, and training in operating specialized machinery.

A similar community-based, participatory approach was employed in the rehabilitation of the disabled. In the five areas of operation, 14 community rehabilitation centres each offered basic rehabilitation services to an average of 34 children, supported their families and involved disabled persons in community life.

In Jordan, where the number of refugees increased from 960,000 to nearly 1,011,000 due to the return of Palestinians from Kuwait and other Gulf States, 141 families took part in self-support projects, 97 of which achieved sufficient success and were thus removed from the ration rolls. A social service office was set up at Aqaba, together with a women's programme centre offering training in marketable skills. In Lebanon, grants and technical support were given for 154 small income-generating enterprises; of the participating families, 98 became independent of the ration rolls. In the Syrian Arab Republic, recipients of direct relief had increased by 28 per cent over the previous year, necessitating a substantial increase in the allocation of food rations. Assistance for the rehabilitation of dilapidated housing was increased and 176 shelters were repaired or rebuilt. Two new women's centres and several day-care facilities were opened, as was the first community rehabilitation centre at Nairab camp.

In addition to its regular activities, UNRWA, for the fifth successive year, ran a programme of extraordinary measures to alleviate the difficulties experienced by the refugee population in the context of the intifadah and the Israeli response. These included the refugee affairs officer programme, a legal assistance scheme, emergency food distribution, cash grants to families in distress and a variety of emergency health services, including increased hospitalization subsidies.

The situation of the estimated 25,000 to 30,000 Palestinians in Kuwait continued to require UNRWA's attention, particularly of those Palestinians from Gaza who had only Egyptian travel documents and who could have nowhere to go were they to be required to leave Kuwait for lack of employment. UNRWA remained in contact with Kuwait and other concerned Governments on this issue.

UNRWA continued efforts to obtain some liberalization of employment restrictions imposed on Palestinians in Lebanon as a result of economic set-backs in that country. The Government, however, suspended the Lebanese-Palestinian dialogue on Palestinian civil and social rights in Lebanon, pending the outcome of the ongoing peace talks. In the circumstances, UNRWA carried out three emergency food distributions to some 220,000 refugees throughout the country, and a fourth distribution to some 60,000 refugees in Bekaa and Tyre. Other emergency operations in Lebanon were especially directed towards alleviating the suffering of the 7,000 Palestinian families displaced by various rounds of fighting, of which 4,000 remained in makeshift accommodations.

For 1992, UNRWA budgeted over $1 million for the West Bank and Gaza for temporary assistance to families suffering uprising-related death, injury or detention, or whose shelters had been demolished or sealed. An additional $100,000 was provided for Gaza families whose houses had been demolished or sealed in the early days of the uprising but had yet to find suitable accommodations. Another $100,000 worth of roofing sheets and cement was provided for repairs to shelter damage caused by the winter of 1991/92. The Agency continued to operate emergency clinics in the West Bank and Gaza, in spite of the reductions in staff. Subsidies for additional beds or patient expenses in those two areas were budgeted at $300,000, with another $300,000 earmarked for medical supplies for emergency cases. The Agency provided skimmed milk and baby cereals or dry rations to 34,500 additional nutritionally-at-risk infants, school-age children and pregnant or nursing women. UNRWA earmarked $100,000 for education in the West Bank and Gaza, with an additional $100,000 reserved for the production of self-learning materials for elementary and preparatory school students.

Under the expanded programme of assistance (EPA), set up in 1988 with a target of $65 million, some $45 million had been received or pledged by mid-1992. An additional $6.4 million had been received in response to two fund-raising appeals launched to expand the programme further, to cope with rising demands for Agency services by the thousands of jobless migrant workers and their families returning to the UNRWA areas of operation. The funds were to cover construction projects, equipment and medical supplies, and small-scale income-generating projects.

The Agency employed approximately 18,500 staff, the majority of whom were themselves Palestine refugees, and was thus one of the largest employers in the Middle East. The events in the region considerably affected the Agency's work during the reporting period.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 14 December 1992, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/69 A by recorded vote.

Assistance to Palestine refugees

The General Assembly

Recalling its resolution 46/46 A of 9 December 1991 and all its previous resolutions on the question, including resolution 194(III) of 11 December 1948,

Taking note of the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1991 to 30 June 1992,

1. Notes with deep regret that repatriation or compensation of the refugees as provided for in paragraph 11 of General Assembly resolution 194(III) has not been effected, that no substantial progress has been made in the programme endorsed by the Assembly in paragraph 2 of its resolution 513(VI) of 26 January 1952 for the reintegration of refugees either by repatriation or resettlement and that, therefore, the situation of the refugees continues to be a matter of serious concern;
2. Expresses its thanks to the Commissioner-General and to all the staff of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, recognizing that the Agency is doing all it can within the limits of available resources, and also expresses its thanks to the specialized agencies and to private organizations for their valuable work in assisting the refugees;
3. Reiterates its request that the headquarters of the Agency should be relocated to its former site within its area of operations as soon as practicable;

4. Notes with regret that the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine has been unable to find a means of achieving progress in the implementation of paragraph 11 of General Assembly resolution 194(III), and requests the Commission to exert continued efforts towards the implementation of that paragraph and to report to the Assembly as appropriate, but no later than 1 September 1993;

5. Directs attention to the continuing seriousness of the financial position of the Agency, as outlined in the report of the Commissioner-General;

6. Notes with profound concern that, despite the commendable and successful efforts of the Commissioner-General to collect additional contributions, this increased level of income to the Agency is still insufficient to cover essential budget requirements in the present year and that, at currently foreseen levels of giving, deficits will recur each year;

7. Calls upon all Governments, as a matter of urgency, to make the most generous efforts possible to meet the anticipated needs of the Agency, particularly in the light of the budgetary deficit projected in the report of the Commissioner-General, and therefore urges non-contributing Governments to contribute regularly and contributing Governments to consider increasing their regular contributions;

8. Decides to extend the mandate of the Agency until 30 June 1996, without prejudice to the provisions of paragraph 11 of General Assembly resolution 194(III).

UNRWA financing

The UNRWA Commissioner-General, in his report to the General Assembly,⁽¹⁾ stated that, beginning with the 1992-1993 biennium, the Agency had shifted from an annual to a biennial budgetary cycle, bringing it in line with the majority of United Nations organizations. In another change, ACABQ became involved for the first time in the budgetary process. Both changes were reflected in amendments to its financial regulations. A four-year forward planning process was also introduced, the first period to be covered being 1994-1997.

The Agency's relatively healthy financial condition in 1991 began to deteriorate in 1992, with the year ending with a deficit of about $10 million. The gradual emergence of a budget problem was ascribed to increasing claims on limited donor funds from a growing number of global crises and to a downturn in the economies of many of the Agency's major donors.

The General Fund budget approved for the 1992-1993 biennium amounted to $572 million; with the additional sums earmarked for extraordinary measures for Lebanon and the occupied territory (EMLOT), EPA and the Gaza Hospital project, the grand total for the biennium amounted to $644.7 million.

In 1992, a total of $254,068,726 was received under the UNRWA General Fund ($221,917,276 in cash and $32,151,450 in kind). In addition, $13,246,059 was received for ongoing activities ($9,634,204 in cash and $3,611,855 in kind). Expenditures for the year totalled $256,679,308 under the General Fund, and $11,015,293 for ongoing activities-compared to expenditures of $308.1 million in 1991. For the 1994-1995 biennium, expenditures under the General Fund were estimated at $623 million (including $70 million in food donations), representing an increase of $51 million, or 8.9 per cent, over the approved General Fund budget for 1992-1993.

The regular budget was not completely funded for 1992 and substantial amounts were still required for EMLOT, EPA and the Gaza Hospital project. Only limited success was achieved in broadening the Agency's donor base. None the less, donor and host government support remained strong. Agency services alone would not be sufficient to maintain even basic life-sustaining needs were they not complemented by millions of dollars worth of host government assistance for the refugees.

Working Group on UNRWA financing

In a report covering its meetings of 2 September and 22 October 1992,⁽²⁾ the Working Group on the Financing of UNRWA noted that UNRWA received sufficient funds in 1991 to implement its regular programme in accordance with established plans. For the 1992 regular programme, however, income already received and expected to be received during the remainder of the year indicated that it would be under-funded, in the order of $3 million to $4 million, which would have to be covered by the working capital reserve (which stood at $33.7 million at the end of 1991).

The EMLOT fund showed an unencumbered balance of $5.5 million at the end of 1991; an additional $2.9 million was received or pledged for 1992. Programme expenditures for 1992 were expected to amount to $13 million, which meant an anticipated shortfall of between $4 million and $5 million. The EMLOT fund financed additional medical and relief services, as well as other forms of general assistance in Lebanon, the West Bank and Gaza.

Regarding a $35-million project for the construction of a 232-bed general hospital in the Gaza Strip, to include equipment, furnishings and operating costs for three years, the Agency in 1992 obtained a pledge of some $18 million from the European Community for the financing of the construction phase. With another $1.8 million already received, the project was able to enter the pre-tendering phase. This left an unfunded balance of $15.2 million to cover the other phases of the project.

Funding continued to be solicited for EPA, under which some 200 projects were currently under implementation with a total budget of some $32 million.

Of the biennial budget of $572 million for core activities, the 1992 share of financial requirements was budgeted at $274.8 million. This included some $14.4 million for capital and special projects, for which only $9 million had been received; thus, a number of construction projects might have to be deferred to 1993 or later. Of the 1992 requirements, some $28.3 million was expected in the form of contributions in kind.

Sharing the Commissioner-General's concern about the funding prospects for 1993, the Working Group strongly urged Governments to continue making generous contributions and to consider making additional contributions in support of emergency-related programmes and special projects.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 14 December 1992, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/69 B without vote.

Working Group on the Financing of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 2656(XXV) of 7 December 1970, 2728(XXV) of 15 December 1970, 2791(XXVI) of 6 December 1971, 46/46 B of 9 December 1991 and the previous resolutions on this question,

Recalling also its decision 36/462 of 16 March 1982, whereby it took note of the special report of the Working Group on the Financing of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, and adopted the recommendations contained therein,

Having considered the report of the Working Group,

Taking into account the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1991 to 30 June 1992, Deeply concerned about the critical financial situation of the Agency, which has affected and affects the continuation of the provision of the necessary Agency services to the Palestine refugees, including the emergency-related Programmes,

Emphasizing the continuing need for extraordinary efforts in order to maintain, at least at the present minimum level, the activities of the Agency, as well as to enable the Agency to carry out essential construction,

1. Commends the Working Group on the Financing of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East for its efforts to assist in ensuring the financial security of the Agency;

2. Takes note with approval of the report of the Working Group;

3. Requests the Working Group to continue its efforts, in cooperation with the Secretary-General and the Commissioner-General, for the financing of the Agency for a further period of one year;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to provide the necessary services and assistance to the Working Group for the conduct of its work.

The Board of Auditors, following its audit of the UNRWA financial statements for the year ended 31 December 1991, made several observations,(3) summarized also by the Secretary-General in an August 1992 note.(4) These related to the liability for losses and damages to UNRWA equipment in all of its field offices, the employment of internal auditors in line functions and cash management, regarding which ACABQ commented in October.(5)

The General Assembly, by resolution 47/211, accepted the financial report and audited financial statements of UNRWA and the Board's audit opinions and report on them, and requested that the Commissioner-General report in 1993 on steps taken to implement the Board's recommendations.

Legal matters

U N R W A s t a f f

The Commissioner-General reported that, for the period 1 July 1991 to 30 June 1992,(1) the number of UNRWA staff members arrested or detained without trial declined in the occupied territories, as well as in Lebanon and the Syrian Arab Republic, but increased in Jordan. Of the 61 staff members detained during the period, 51 were arrested and released without trial and 10 remained in detention. One staff member in the Gaza Strip remained under deportation order as at 30 June. Of the 418 Palestinians who received deportation orders into southern Lebanon in December, 16 were reported to be UNRWA staff members. Two local staff members in the Gaza Strip were killed for allegedly collaborating with the Israeli authorities.

The Agency remained unable to obtain adequate and timely information on the reasons for the arrest and detention of its staff members. It could thus not ascertain whether the staff members' official functions were involved. However, it had access to 18 staff members from Gaza and six from the West Bank who were in prisons and detention centres in the occupied territories and in Israel. It was unable to visit staff in detention in Jordan, Lebanon and the Syrian Arab Republic, despite its representations to the Governments of those countries.

Of continuing concern was the mistreatment of staff in detention, of which 58 cases were recorded in Gaza and 70 in the West Bank. Mistreatment in the performance of their duties took the form of beatings, threats, insults, intimidation and temporary detention.

UNRWA continued to encounter difficulties with respect to staff movement in and out of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. These included substantial delays in the clearance of staff travelling on official duty and, in some cases, refusal of clearance. Staff movement within the occupied territory remained seriously curtailed by frequent curfews and the designation of areas as closed military zones, with Israel insisting that local staff could operate only if in possession of curfew permits from the civil administration, as well as by periodic restrictions on access to Israel and East Jerusalem imposed on staff residing in the West Bank and Gaza. UNRWA experienced particular difficulty in obtaining for its local drivers entry to Israel's Ben Gurion International Airport, despite assurances from the authorities that their entry would be facilitated.

The Commissioner-General reported(1) that between 1 July 1991 and 30 June 1992 Israeli security forces made 117 incursions into UNRAW installations in the West Bank and 210 in the Gaza Strip, at times resulting in injury to staff and damage to property. There were 94 recorded intrusions into health clinic premises. Israeli security forces on occasion also used Agency premises during military operations. The Agency continued to protest against such incursions as constituting abuse of its privileges and immunities.

Of particular concern were incidents in which Agency medical and ambulance services were interfered with or prevented. There were 31 such incidents in the Gaza Strip alone, during which ambulances were stopped, searched or shot at, with the drivers beaten up and their identity documents confiscated. Israeli authorities continued to object to the Agency's reconstruction of demolished camp shelters, despite assurances by Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs that there would be no objection to it. Construction projects were also subjected to detailed and time-consuming procedures. Restrictions were imposed on the quantity of items imported for the Agency's essential operations and incoming goods were often subjected to delays at the port of entry.

As at 30 June 1992, the Government of Israel owed the Agency $7.7 million in arrears for the payment of clearance, warehousing and transport charges for which Israel was responsible in respect of Agency supplies under the terms of the 1967 Comay-Micheltmore agreement. Payment of those charges, suspended by Israel from 1988 to 1991, were advanced by the Agency.

In resolution 47/69 K, the General Assembly condemned the repeated Israeli raids on UNRWA premises and installations and called on Israel to refrain from such acts.

C o m p e n s a t i o n c l a i m s

In 1992, UNRWA reported(1) that no progress had been made with regard to its claims against the Governments of: Israel (for loss and damage to UNRWA property during the 1967 Middle East hostilities, Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982 and its military action before then); Jordan (arising from the 1967 hostilities and the disturbances of 1970 and 1971); and the Syrian Arab Republic (relating mainly to the levy of certain taxes from which UNRWA believed it was exempt under existing agreements). Those claims had been reported in 1986.(6) The Secretary-General, in October 1992,(7) also stated that there had been no progress with regard to UNRWA claims against Israel resulting from its 1982 invasion of Lebanon.

In resolution 47/69 I, the General Assembly called anew on Israel to compensate UNRWA for damages to its property and facilities resulting from its invasion of Lebanon, without prejudice to Israel's responsibility for all damages resulting from that invasion.

Approximately 12,000 displaced registered refugees were known by UNRWA to have returned to the occupied territories since June 1967.(1) A particularly acute problem were marriages entered into by West Bank residents with women, mainly from Jordan, who had applied for West Bank residence but had obtained only short-term, renewable visitor permits. Deportations carried out by Israeli military authorities of women and children deemed ineligible for resident status created considerable uncertainty for newlyweds and prospective couples, who remained subject to military administrative decisions, with little scope for legal recourse.

Humanitarian assistance

In 1992, in addition to providing relief in the form of basic food commodities, blankets, clothing, shelter repair and cash grants, UNRWA continued to provide a small measure of humanitarian assistance to persons who had been displaced as a result of the June 1967 war and subsequent hostilities in the Middle East but who were not registered with UNRWA as refugees.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 14 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, adopted resolution 47/69 C without vote.

Assistance to persons displaced as a result of the June 1967 and subsequent hostilities
The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 46/46 C of 9 December 1991 and all its previous resolutions on the question,

Taking note of the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1991 to 30 June 1992,

Concerned about the continued human suffering resulting from the hostilities in the Middle East,

1. Reaffirms its resolution 46/46 C and all its previous resolutions on the question;

2. Endorses, bearing in mind the objectives of those resolutions, the efforts of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East to continue to provide humanitarian assistance as far as practicable, on an emergency basis and as a temporary measure, to other persons in the area who are at present displaced and in serious need of continued assistance as a result of the June 1967 and subsequent hostilities;

3. Strongly appeals to all Governments and to organizations and individuals to contribute generously for the above purposes to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East and to the other intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations concerned.

Repatriation of refugees

The Secretary-General reported in October 1992(8) regarding compliance with the General Assembly's 1991 call on Israel to take immediate steps for the return of all displaced inhabitants and to desist from measures obstructing their return.(9) By a note of 30 June, Israel stated that its position on the matter had been set out fully in successive annual replies, the latest of which was the subject of a 1991 report by the Secretary-General;(10) because of its continued effort to review individual cases of resettlement based on the merits of each case, approximately 79,368 persons had already returned to the administered territories.

The Secretary-General also included information from UNRWA on the return of refugees registered with it. Since UNRWA was not involved in arrangements for either refugees or displaced persons not registered as refugees, its information was based on requests by returning registered refugees for the transfer of their service entitlements to their areas of return; UNRWA was not necessarily aware of the return of registered refugees who had not made such requests. Its records indicated that, between 1 July 1991 and 30 June 1992, 310 registered refugees had returned to the West Bank and 83 to the Gaza Strip. Some of them might not have been displaced in 1967 but might be family members of a displaced registered refugee whom they had accompanied on return or later joined. Displaced refugees known by UNRWA to have returned to the occupied territories since June 1967 numbered about 12,400. UNRWA was unable to estimate the total number of displaced inhabitants who had returned, as it kept records only of registered refugees, and even those records, particularly with respect to location of registered refugees, might be incomplete.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 14 December 1992, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/69 G by recorded vote.

Return of population and refugees displaced since 1967

The General Assembly,

Recalling Security Council resolution 237(1967) of 14 June 1967,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General,

Having also considered the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1991 to 30 June 1992,

1. Reaffirms the inalienable right of all displaced inhabitants to return to their homes or former places of residence in the territories occupied by Israel since 1967, and declares once more that any attempt to restrict, or to attach conditions to, the free exercise of the right to return by any displaced person is inconsistent with that inalienable right and is inadmissible;

2. Considers any and all agreements embodying any restriction on, or condition for, the return of the displaced inhabitants as null and void;

3. Strongly deplores the continued refusal of the Israeli authorities to take steps for the return of the displaced inhabitants;

4. Calls once more upon Israel:

(a) To take immediate steps for the return of all displaced inhabitants;

(b) To desist from all measures that obstruct the return of the displaced inhabitants, including measures affecting the physical and demographic structure of the occupied territories;

Food aid

The Secretary-General reported in October 1992(11) that UNRWA continued to provide food assistance to the neediest of the refugee population, known as special hardship cases, who numbered 167,602 persons in December 1991. It also continued emergency distributions of basic commodities, such as flour, rice, sugar, animal protein and skimmed milk to the needy, including non-registered Palestinians, in the occupied territory and Lebanon. In 1991, 25,896 tonnes of those commodities were distributed in the Gaza Strip, 25,527 tonnes in the West Bank and 3,307 tonnes in Lebanon. Given the lack of additional resources, it had not been possible for the Commissioner-General to consider resuming the interrupted general distribution of basic food rations to all refugees, as requested by the Assembly in several resolutions, most recently in 1991.(12)

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 14 December, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/69 F by recorded vote.

Resumption of the ration distribution to Palestine refugees

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 36/146 F of 16 December 1981, 37/120 F of 16 December 1982, 38/83 F of 15 December 1983, 39/99 F of 14 December 1984, 40/165 F of 16 December 1985, 41/69 F of 3 December 1986, 42/69 F of 2 December 1987, 43/57 F of 6 December 1988, 44/47 F of 8 December 1989, 45/73 F of 11 December 1990, 46/46 F of 9 December 1991 and all its previous resolutions on the question, including resolution 302(IV) of 8 December 1949,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General,

Having also considered the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1991 to 30 June 1992,

Deeply concerned about the interruption by the Agency, owing to financial difficulties, of the general ration distribution to Palestine refugees in all fields,

1. Regrets that its resolutions 37/120 F, 38/83 F, 39/99 F, 40/165 F, 41/69 F, 42/69 F, 43/57 F, 44/47 F, 45/73 F and 46/46 F have not been implemented;

2. Calls once again upon all Governments, as a matter of urgency, to make the most generous efforts possible and to offer the necessary resources to meet the needs of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, particularly in the light of the interruption by the agency of the general ration distribution to Palestine refugees in all fields, and therefore urges non-contributing Governments to contribute regularly and contributing Governments to consider increasing their regular contributions;

3. Requests the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East to resume on a continuing basis the interrupted general ration distribution to Palestine refugees in all fields;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Commissioner-General, to report to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Education and training services

Protection of Palestinian

students and educational institutions

In October 1992,(13) the Secretary-General reproduced Israel's reply of 30 June to a 1991 General Assembly resolution (14) calling on Israel to open immediately all closed educational and vocational institutions, a large number of which were operated by UNRWA and to refrain from closing them thereafter.

Describing the resolution as unbalanced, Israel said it distorted the Government's role and policy, which had always been to encourage development of the educational system in Judaea, Samaria and the Gaza District. During its administration, the level of education and literacy in those territories had markedly improved and many new institutions of learning had been established. Since December 1987, however, the schools had frequently been exploited as centres for organizing and launching violent activities. Measures taken by the authorities were in reaction to activities having nothing to do with education. Those measures had enabled Israel to permit the reopening of all educational institutions, including all seven institutions of higher education, as recently recognized by UNESCO.

The Secretary-General also cited the UNRWA Commissioner-General's report(1) stating that, of the 117 cases of unauthorized entry into UNRWA premises in the West Bank during the period 1 July 1991 to 30 June 1992, 62 related to schools; of the 210 such cases in the Gaza Strip, 118 related to schools.

During the same period, one death and 138 cases of injury among students and trainees occurred at UNRWA educational institutions in the West Bank, and five deaths and 637 injuries at institutions in the Gaza Strip—all attributable to beatings, tear-gas inhalation, rubber bullets and live ammunition. In addition, 259 students and trainees in the West Bank and 43 in Gaza were detained, of whom 144 and 37, respectively, were released by 30 June 1992.

During the 1991/92 academic year, an average of 21 per cent of training time was lost at the Kalandia and Ramallah men's and women's training centres in the West Bank due to general strikes, curfews and severe weather conditions. In March 1992, West Bank trainees interrupted instruction in solidarity with Gaza trainees whom Israeli authorities prevented from attending the West Bank centres for lack of permits to stay in the West Bank. The permits, which were a new requirement, were subsequently obtained by UNRWA; none were granted, however, for 17 of the trainees. The Gaza training centre lost 18 per cent of training days to strikes, 1 per cent to curfews, 1 per cent to military closure orders and 4 per cent to closure by UNRWA for security reasons.

Between September 1991 and June 1992, 17.2 per cent of school days were lost in the West Bank and 12.4 per cent in the Gaza Strip owing primarily to military closures, general strikes and curfews. On 27 May, following the stabbing of an Israeli from the Kfar Darom settlement in Gaza, settlers attacked the UNRWA school at Deir el-Balah, where more than 200 children were taking final examinations. In another attack, the settlers bulldozed the school fence to the ground. Military authorities eventually restored calm and UNRWA evacuated the children.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 14 December, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/69 K by recorded vote.

Protection of Palestinian students and educational institutions and safeguarding of the security of the facilities of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East in the occupied Palestinian territories

The General Assembly,

Recalling Security Council resolution 605(1987) of 22 December 1987,

Recalling also its resolutions 43/21 of 3 November 1988, 43/57 I of 6 December 1988, 44/2 of 6 October 1989, 44/47 K of 8 December 1989, 45/73 K of 11 December 1990 and 46/46 K of 9 December 1991,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General dated 21 January 1988, submitted in accordance with Security Council resolution 605(1987), the report dated 31 October 1990, submitted in accordance with Council resolution 672(1990), and the report dated 9 April 1991, submitted in accordance with Council resolution 681(1990),

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General, Having also considered the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1991 to 30 June 1992,

Taking note, in particular, of paragraph 111 of that report, in which it is stated that during the reporting period "there were 117 incursions into Agency installations by members of the Israeli security forces in the West Bank and 210 such incursions in the Gaza Strip" and that "the Agency recorded 94 incidents in which the Agency's clinic and hospital premises were entered" and that "on 26 November 1991, border police personnel fired tear gas into the [Agency's] girls' school in Shu'fat camp in the West Bank, necessitating medical treatment for affected students and teachers, including two pregnant teachers who required hospital treatment",

Gravely concerned and alarmed by the deteriorating situation in the Palestinian territory occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem,

1. Condemns the repeated Israeli raids on the premises and installations of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, and calls upon Israel, the occupying Power, to refrain from such raids;

2. Deplores the policy and practices of Israel, the occupying Power, which have led to the prolonged closure of educational and vocational institutions, a large number of which are operated by the Agency, and the repeated disruption of medical services;

3. Calls upon Israel, the occupying Power, to open immediately all closed educational and vocational institutions and to refrain from closing them thereafter;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Proposed University of Jerusalem "Al Quds"

In keeping with a General Assembly request of 1991,⁽¹⁵⁾ the Secretary-General reported in October 1992⁽¹⁶⁾ on the establishment of a university for Palestine refugees at Jerusalem. The proposed university, first considered by the Assembly in 1980,⁽¹⁷⁾ had since been the subject of annual reports by the Secretary-General with regard to measures taken towards its establishment, including a functional feasibility study.

To assist in the preparation of the study and at the Secretary-General's request, the United Nations University made available the services of an expert who would visit the area and meet with Israeli officials. By a note verbale of 15 September 1992, the Secretary-General requested Israel to facilitate the expert's visit at a mutually convenient time. Recalling the position of Israel on the proposed university and the questions it had raised, as well as the clarifications already given by the Secretariat, the Secretary-General expressed the opinion that those questions could best be discussed during the proposed visit.

Israel replied on 23 October that its position remained unchanged, and recalled its note of 30 June underscoring its consistent vote against the Assembly resolutions calling for the establishment of the proposed university, whose sponsors sought to exploit higher education in order to politicize issues totally extraneous to genuine academic pursuits. In the opinion of Israel, a visit by the expert would serve no useful purpose.

The Secretary-General thus concluded that the feasibility study could not be completed as planned.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 14 December 1992, on the basis of the Special Political Committee's recommendation, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/69 J by recorded vote.

University of Jerusalem "Al-Quds" for Palestine refugees

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 36/146 G of 16 December 1981, 37/120 C of 16 December 1982, 38/83 K of 15 December 1983, 39/99 K of 14 December 1984, 40/165 D and K of 16 December 1985, 41/69 K of 3 December 1986, 42/69 K of 2 December 1987, 43/57 J of 6 December 1988, 44/47 J of 8 December 1989, 45/73 J of 11 December 1990 and 46/46 J of 9 December 1991,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General,

Having also considered the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1991 to 30 June 1992,

1. Emphasizes the need for strengthening the educational system in the Palestinian territory occupied by Israel since 5 June 1967, including Jerusalem, and specifically the need for the establishment of the proposed university;

Scholarships

The Secretary-General reported in October 1992⁽¹⁸⁾ on responses to the General Assembly's appeal of 1991⁽¹⁹⁾ to augment special allocations for scholarships and grants to Palestine refugees, for which UNRWA acted as recipient and trustee.

In the academic year 1991/92, Japan offered, through UNRWA, 16 vocational fellowships in Japan for Palestine refugees in UNRWA's employ. Under the UNRWA university scholarship programme for secondary school graduates, 140 Palestine refugee students were recipients of scholarship awards made possible by Japan's contribution of $1 million in 1989, to be spread over five years. Another 136 Palestinians were awarded scholarships under the same programme, made possible by Switzerland's contributions to the programme of $180,000 in 1989, $213,000 in 1990 and $197,300 in 1991. Those awards, while not specifically in response to Assembly resolutions, were in keeping with their spirit.

In 1991, seven Palestinians were awarded international fellowships under the WHO postgraduate fellowship programme aimed at developing technical and managerial skills of UNRWA's Department of Health staff and at meeting future replacement needs under various health disciplines. Three other Palestinians were granted fellowships to study in Belgium in 1990-1991: one for a full scholastic year in paediatric cardiology, and two for a four-month study in oncology. The World Intellectual Property Organization followed up its award of 15 fellowships in the period 1980-1990, with the offer of a further award in 1992.

Property rights

Report of the Secretary-General. In response to a General Assembly resolution of 1991,⁽²⁰⁾ the Secretary-General, in September 1992,⁽²¹⁾ submitted a report on the status of steps taken for the protection and administration of Arab property, assets and property rights in Israel and for the setting up of a fund for the receipt of income derived therefrom, on behalf of the rightful owners. The Secretary-General indicated that he had transmitted the resolution to Israel and to all other Member States for their comments, as well as to the Chairman of the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine.

According to Israel's reply of 1 July, reproduced in the report, the 1991 resolution demonstrated its sponsors' misuse of the Assembly for the goals of an ongoing propaganda campaign against Israel. Its position had been set out in statements to the Special Political Committee on three occasions and in a 1991 report of the Secretary-General.⁽²²⁾ Israel again asserted that there was no legal basis for taking the steps proposed, as property rights within the borders of a sovereign State were subject exclusively to that State's domestic laws; the right of States to regulate and dispose of property within their territory (and income derived from that property) was a generally accepted principle. Significantly, the resolution's sponsors had not proposed that similar steps be taken regarding the confiscated Jewish property in Arab countries—suggesting that Israel's sovereignty was limited or restricted by some provision that did not apply to other Members of the United Nations. The property left behind by approximately 800,000 Jewish refugees who resettled in Israel as a result of the 1948 war, estimated to be in the billions of dollars, was expropriated by the Arab countries in which they had lived. Israel stressed that there could be no difference in law, justice or equity between the claims of Arab and Jewish property owners.

The Secretary-General added that no reply had been received from any other Member State regarding implementation of the resolution.

Report of the Conciliation Commission. The United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine, in its report covering the period from 1 September 1991 to 31 August 1992,⁽²³⁾ stated that the circumstances that unfortunately had limited its possibilities of action regarding compensation for Palestine refugee properties remained unchanged. The events that had occurred in the area since the preceding reporting period had further complicated an already very complex situation. The Commission continued to hope, nevertheless, that the situation and related circumstances in the region would improve towards a comprehensive, just and lasting Middle East peace, thus enabling it to carry forward its work in accordance with the 1948 Assembly resolution defining its mandate.⁽²⁴⁾

Referring to prospects for implementing paragraph 11 of that resolution, by which the Assembly resolved that the refugees wishing to return to their homes should be permitted to do so at the earliest practicable date, and that compensation should be paid for the property of those choosing not to return and for loss or damage to property, the Commission noted that the examination of various ways in which it might be possible to intensify its efforts towards that end had compelled the conclusion that all the ways envisaged presupposed substantial changes in the situation.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 14 December, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/69 H by recorded vote.

Revenues derived from Palestine refugees' properties

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 35/13 A to F of 3 November 1980, 36/146 C of 16 December 1981, 37/120 H of 16 December 1982, 38/83 H of 15 December 1983, 39/99 H of 14 December 1984, 40/165 H of 16 December 1985, 41/69 H of 3 December 1986, 42/69 H of 2 December 1987, 43/57 H of 6 December 1988, 44/47 H of 8 December 1989, 45/73 H of 11 December 1990, 46/46 H of 9 December 1991 and all its previous resolutions on the question, including resolution 194(III) of 11 December 1948,

Recalling in particular its resolution 394(V) of 14 December 1950, in which it directed the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine, in consultation with the parties concerned, to prescribe measures for the protection of the rights, property and interests of the Palestine Arab refugees,

Taking note of the completion of the programme of identification and evaluation of Arab property, as announced by the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine in its twenty-second progress report, and of the fact that the Land Office had a schedule of Arab owners and file of documents defining the location, area and other particulars of Arab property,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to take all appropriate steps, in consultation with the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine, for the protection and administration of Arab property, assets and property rights in Israel and to establish a fund for the receipt of income derived therefrom, on behalf of the rightful owners;

Refugee protection

The Secretary-General reported in October 1992⁽⁷⁾ on implementation of a General Assembly resolution of 1991⁽²⁵⁾ holding Israel responsible for the security of the Palestine refugees in the occupied territory and calling on it to compensate UNRWA for the damage to its property and facilities resulting from Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon.

The report reproduced Israel's reply of 30 June 1992 to the Secretary-General's request for information on steps taken or envisaged to comply with the resolution. Israel said that it had fully set forth its position on the subject in statements to the Special Political Committee and in a 1991 report of the Secretary-General.⁽²⁶⁾ The adoption of the resolution was hypocritical, anachronistic and out of place. Despite its withdrawal from Lebanon in 1985, Israel was still being blamed for the "suffering" of Palestinians there and, not surprisingly, for Arab persecution of Palestinian refugees. In recent years, thousands of Palestinians had been killed and wounded in Lebanese refugee camps in vicious fighting totally unconnected with Israel; likewise, Palestinian refugee camps in Jordan and the Syrian Arab Republic were the scenes of considerable human misery. The selective and distorted presentation of the Palestinian refugees' situation in Arab countries clearly illustrated the resolution's double standards and its blatant disregard for the refugees' general welfare. Israel emphasized that, in keeping with international law, it alone was competent to ensure full protection to all inhabitants of Judaea, Samaria and the Gaza District.

The Secretary-General cited the UNRWA Commissioner-General's report for the period 1 July 1991 to 30 June 1992,⁽¹⁾ to the effect that the Commissioner-General had continued his efforts in support of the Palestine refugees' safety and legal and human rights. UNRWA international staff, in particular the Refugee Affairs Officers, continued to help reduce tension and prevent maltreatment of refugees, especially vulnerable groups such as women and children. The Commissioner-General also protested to Israel against the excessive use of force and collective punishments, such as the demolition and sealing of shelters, as a failure on Israel's part to uphold standards required under international humanitarian law. As part of the Commissioner-General's efforts in that regard, legal advice and financial assistance were provided for refugees seeking to assert their legal rights.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 14 December, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/69 I by recorded vote.

Protection of Palestine refugees

The General Assembly,

Recalling in particular recent Security Council resolutions 605(1987) of 22 December 1987, 607(1988) of 5 January 1988, 608(1988) of 14 January 1988, 636(1989) of 6 July 1989, 641(1989) of 30 August 1989, 672(1990) of 12 October 1990, 673(1990) of 24 October 1990, 681(1990) of 20 December 1990, 694(1991) of 24 May 1991 and 726(1992) of 6 January 1992,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General dated 21 January 1988, submitted in accordance with Security Council resolution 605(1987), the report dated 31 October 1990, submitted in accordance with Council resolution 672(1990), and the report dated 9 April 1991, submitted in accordance with Council resolution 681(1990),

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General,

Having also considered the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1991 to 30 June 1992,

Gravely concerned and alarmed by the deteriorating situation in the Palestinian territory occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem,

Taking into account the need to consider measures for the impartial protection of the Palestinian civilian population under Israeli occupation,

Referring to the humanitarian principles of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, and to the obligations arising from the regulations annexed to the Hague Convention IV of 1907,

1. Holds Israel responsible for the security of the Palestine refugees in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967, and calls upon it to fulfil its obligations as the occupying Power in this regard, in accordance with the pertinent provisions of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949;

2. Calls upon all the High Contracting Parties to the Convention to take appropriate measures to ensure respect by Israel, the occupying Power, for the Convention in all circumstances, in conformity with their obligation under article 1 thereof;

3. Strongly urges the Security Council to consider the current situation in the occupied Palestinian territory, taking into account the recommendations contained in the reports of the Secretary-General dated 21 January 1988, 31 October 1990 and 9 April 1991;

4. Urges the Secretary-General and the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East to continue their efforts in support of the upholding of the safety and security and the legal and human rights of the Palestine refugees in all the territories under Israeli occupation since 1967;

5. Calls once again upon Israel to desist forthwith from acts of aggression against the Lebanese and Palestinian population in Lebanon, in violation of the Charter of the United Nations and the norms of international law;

6. Demands that Israel, the occupying Power, release forthwith all arbitrarily detained Palestine refugees, including the employees of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East;

7. Calls once again upon Israel to compensate the Agency for damages to its property and facilities resulting from the invasion of Lebanon by Israel in 1982, without prejudice to the responsibility of the latter for all damages resulting from that invasion, as well as for other damages resulting from the policies and practices of Israel, the occupying Power, in the occupied Palestinian territory;

8. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Commissioner-General, to report to the General Assembly, before the opening of its forty-eighth session, on the implementation of the present resolution.

Removal and resettlement of refugees

In a report of October 1992,⁽²⁷⁾ the Secretary-General reproduced Israel's reply of 30 June to a 1991 General Assembly resolution⁽²⁸⁾ demanding that Israel desist from removing and resettling Palestine refugees in the Palestinian territory occupied by it since 1967 and from destroying their shelters. The reply stated that Israel's position had been made known in successive annual replies to the Secretary-General in recent years, the latest of which was contained in his 1991 report on the subject.⁽²⁹⁾

Israel considered the resolution unbalanced and distorted in that it intentionally ignored the improved living conditions in Gaza since 1967. Nothing could be more indicative of that approach than the resolution's condemnation of refugee rehabilitation projects. Since 1967, Israel had initiated community development projects in Gaza, enabling some 20,000 families (approximately 150,000 persons), to leave the refugee camps on a voluntary basis and relocate to nearby residential areas. Israel's vital role in planning and implementing those housing projects had been recognized in 1985 by the Secretary-General⁽³⁰⁾ and the UNRWA Commissioner-General. The resolution's request that the Secretary-General resume issuing identity cards irrespective of the refugees' need for them was yet another indication of its patent political bias. Notwithstanding subversive efforts to the contrary, Israel was determined to pursue the task of improving the refugees' living conditions through projects such as the refugee housing programmes, and would welcome all assistance from the international community in that regard.

The Secretary-General stated that, according to information from UNRWA,⁽¹⁾ the Israeli authorities continued their practice of inflicting collective punishment by demolishing and sealing refugee shelters in the West Bank and Gaza. As at 30 June 1992, of the refugee families affected by the 1971 demolitions,⁽³¹⁾ 12 continued to live in conditions of hardship and 19 remained in unsatisfactory housing. UNRWA's representations with Israeli authorities for the rehousing of those 31 families had not met with success.

The situation of the families living on the northern perimeter of Jabalia camp⁽³²⁾ who had been told to remove some of their shelter extensions remained the same: no demolitions had taken place, but the shelters remained isolated by a sand-hill bulldozed around them. Of the 35 families whose shelters on the perimeter of Beach camp were demolished in 1983,⁽³³⁾ 18 families had been allocated plots of land at Sheikh Radwan and Beit Lahiya housing projects; one was housed in a vacant shelter at Beach camp; and the other 16 families remained in the same situation as previously reported—in temporary shelters near the camp site.

Of the 13 families at Rafah camp who had agreed to relocate to the Israeli-sponsored Tel-es-Sultan housing project but remained waiting at the camp,⁽³⁴⁾ one finally moved to Tel-es-Sultan. Nine families (91 persons) from Canada camp in Egypt returned to Gaza to accommodations at the same housing project.

Statistics on Israeli resettlement of refugees were as reported in 1991.⁽³⁵⁾

As to the Assembly's request that the Commissioner-General address the acute situation of the Palestine refugees, he advised that UNRWA, in addition to extending to them its regular services plus emergency food, medical and other assistance, also pursued its long-term programme to upgrade infrastructure, especially in the camps, and, in general, to improve the economic and social welfare of the refugees.

The Secretary-General regretted his inability to comply with the Assembly's request that he resume issuing identification cards to all Palestine refugees and their descendants in the occupied territory, whether or not they were recipients of UNRWA rations and services. Under an arrangement in effect in the last 40 years, all refugee families registered with UNRWA were in possession of Agency-issued registration cards. While indicating the number of family members and their eligibility for services, those cards were not identification cards and had a more limited purpose: to reflect data about the refugee family concerned, which was entered on the registration roll at the time of registration. While appreciating the need for documentation, the Commissioner-General did not have the means to issue identity cards. However, he would keep the matter under review to see whether appropriate documentation regarding the registration status of individual members of refugee families could be issued.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 14 December 1992, on the recommendation of the Special Political Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/69 E by recorded vote.

Palestine refugees in the Palestinian territory occupied by Israel since 1967

The General Assembly,

Recalling Security Council resolution 237(1967) of 14 June 1967,

Recalling also its resolutions 2792 C (XXVI) of 6 December 1971, 2963 C (XXVII) of 13 December 1972, 3089 C (XXVIII) of 7 December 1973, 3331 D (XXIX) of 17 December 1974, 3419 C (XXX) of 8 December 1975, 31/15 E of 23 November 1976, 32/90 C of 13 December 1977, 33/112 E of 18 December 1978, 34/52 F of 23 November 1979, 35/13 F of 3 November 1980, 36/146 A of 16 December 1981, 37/120 E and I of 16 December 1982, 38/83 E and J of 15 December 1983, 39/99 E and J of 14 December 1984, 40/165 E and J of 16 December 1985, 41/69 E and J of 3 December 1986, 42/69 E and J of 2 December 1987, 43/57 E of 6 December 1988, 44/47 E of 8 December 1989, 45/73 E of 11 December 1990 and 46/46 E of 9 December 1991,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General,

Having also considered the report of the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, covering the period from 1 July 1991 to 30 June 1992,

Recalling the provisions of paragraph 11 of its resolution 194(III) of 11 December 1948, and considering that measures to resettle Palestine refugees in the Palestinian territory occupied by Israel since 1967 away from their homes and property from which they were displaced constitute a violation of their inalienable right of return,

Alarmed by the reports received from the Commissioner-General that the Israeli occupying authorities, in contravention of the obligation of Israel under international law, persist in their policy of demolishing shelters occupied by refugee families,

1. Strongly reiterates its demand that Israel desist from the removal and resettlement of Palestine refugees in the Palestinian territory occupied by Israel since 1967 and from the destruction of their shelters;

2. Requests the Commissioner-General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East to address the acute situation of the Palestine refugees in the Palestinian territory occupied by Israel since 1967 and accordingly to extend all the services of the Agency to those refugees;

3. Requests the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the Commissioner-General, to resume issuing identification cards to all Palestine refugees and their descendants in the occupied Palestinian territory, irrespective of whether or not they are recipients of rations and services of the Agency;

4. Also requests the Secretary-General, after consulting with the Commissioner-General, to report to the General Assembly, before the opening of its forty-eighth session, on the implementation of the present resolution and, in particular, on the compliance of Israel with paragraph 1 above.

Chapter VI

Regional economic and social activities

The five United Nations regional commissions held their regular sessions during 1992, in continuing efforts to promote economic and social development in their respective regions.

The Economic Commission for Africa (ECA) held its twenty-seventh session/eighteenth meeting of the Conference of Ministers at Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, from 20 to 23 April and the thirteenth meeting of the Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole from 13 to 18 April; the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific (ESCAP) held its forty-eighth session at Beijing, China, from 14 to 23 April; the Economic Commission for Europe held its forty-seventh session at Geneva from 7 to 15 April; the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean held its twenty-fourth session at Santiago, Chile, from 8 to 15 April; and the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia held its sixteenth session at Amman, Jordan, from 30 August to 3 September.

In July, the Economic and Social Council admitted as members of ESCAP Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan (resolution 1992/46), the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (1992/47), the Federated States of Micronesia and the Marshall Islands (1992/48), and Azerbaijan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and Turkmenistan (1992/50). French Polynesia and New Caledonia were admitted as associate members of ESCAP (1992/49).

The Council endorsed the programme for the Second Industrial Development Decade for Africa, 1991-2000 (1992/44), which was subsequently adopted by the General Assembly at its forty-seventh (1992) session and adjusted to cover the years 1993-2002 (resolution 47/177). United Nations activities in Africa were also addressed by the Council in its resolutions on strengthening ECA to face Africa's development challenges in the 1990s (1992/51); strengthening the role and functions of ECA in the context of the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic and social fields (1992/52); and cooperation in fisheries in Africa (1992/54).

The Council also adopted resolutions on activities of the United Nations system in the Baltic States and the Commonwealth of Independent States (1992/40); strengthening the role of the regional commissions (1992/43); and the Europe-Africa permanent link through the Strait of Gibraltar (1992/45).

In October, the General Assembly urged United Nations agencies and organizations to continue and intensify their support for and cooperation with the activities of the Latin American Economic System (47/13).

Regional cooperation

Strengthening the role of the regional commissions

On 7 February 1992, the Economic and Social Council decided to consider at its 1992 substantive session, under the item on regional cooperation, the question of strengthening the role of the regional commissions to promote subregional, regional and interregional cooperation (decision 1992/206).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 13 April 1992, at its resumed forty-sixth (1991) session, the General Assembly adopted measures for the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations system in the economic, social and related fields (resolution 46/235). The Assembly considered, inter alia, that the effectiveness of the regional commissions should be strengthened and that the regional commissions, particularly those located in developing countries, should also be strengthened in terms of their activities and participation in operational activities of the United Nations system. The commissions were requested to provide recommendations for consideration by the Assembly at its forty-seventh (1992) session.

In a statement to the Assembly of 2 November, the Secretary-General stressed the importance of decentralizing United Nations activities at both national and regional levels and delegating greater authority to the regional commissions while enhancing their accountability. He indicated his intention to strengthen the role and contribution of the commissions, emphasizing at the same time the need for them to operate within a coherent organizational strategy.

Regional commissions action. During 1992, four of the five regional commissions responded to the General Assembly's request. By 15 April resolution⁽¹⁾ the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC) recommended increased decentralization in the execution of United Nations activities; improved coordination between the regional commissions and other United Nations organizations and agencies through intensified joint activities and joint programming exercises and meetings; a clear division of responsibilities regarding regional technical cooperation activities between the commissions and the United Nations funding agencies; and improved effectiveness of those activities in the region by decentralizing more of the budget resources allotted to ECLAC and by strengthening its capacity as an executing agency at the regional level.

By a resolution of 23 April,⁽²⁾ the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific (ESCAP) directed its Advisory Committee of Permanent Representatives and Other Representatives Designated by Members of the Commission to respond to the Assembly request on behalf of the Commission. At its August/September session, the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia (ESCWA) recommended⁽³⁾ that its potential for coordinating, initiating and carrying out development activities be strengthened through decentralization of those activities that could be more effectively undertaken by the regional commissions and through improved coordination inside and outside the United Nations system. The Commission also recommended the promotion of joint programming of United Nations activities involving the regional commissions and the commissions' active participation in the programming and budgeting process, as well as strengthening their role as executing agencies for regional and subregional technical cooperation projects. The Economic Commission for Africa (ECA), recalling its 1991 resolution on the revitalization of its mandate and operational framework⁽⁴⁾ and a 1991 Economic and Social Council decision⁽⁵⁾ on that resolution, in April 1992 adopted a resolution⁽⁶⁾ which formed the basis of Council resolution 1992/52 (see below).

Report of the Secretary-General. In a June report to the Economic and Social Council on regional cooperation,⁽⁷⁾ the Secretary-General outlined the work of the five regional commissions, including matters and decisions requiring action by the Council or brought to the Council's attention, and elaborated on the question of strengthening the role of the commissions. That issue, he said, must be viewed in the broader context of the restructuring of the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system as a whole; the Organization's success at the regional level depended heavily on concerted and coordinated action throughout the system, within the framework of an integrated multidisciplinary and regional approach to development. As most issues on the new development agenda were of a cross-sectoral nature, that approach had become increasingly important both in terms of dealing with differentiated social and economic problems and as a basis for promoting concerted action among Member States. In that context, greater regionalization and subregionalization of the United Nations system could be expected to occur, and the regional commissions would be called on to play an increasingly active role in promoting regional and subregional cooperation.

As for the relationship between the regional commissions and United Nations agencies, the commissions believed that, based on the experience so far, closer coordination could be maintained and strengthened through greater use of such established mechanisms as joint units, meetings, programming exercises and regular exchanges of information, the Secretary-General reported. He noted that the regional commissions, in their role as team leader under a 1977 General Assembly resolution,⁽⁸⁾ developed a variety of arrangements for inter-agency coordination, including inter-agency committees and task forces on various multisectoral subjects, which were beneficial in avoiding duplication of work and in enhancing complementarity in joint planning of activities. However, greater coordination between the regional commissions and the United Nations funding agencies appeared necessary, especially in cases where the traditional role and mandate of the commissions were surpassed by the efforts of global bodies to extend their regional presence. The Secretary-General stated that the tendency on the part of funding agencies to organize substantive regional meetings further reinforced the need for the Assembly and the Economic and Social Council to redefine the relationship and respective mandates of the two sets of organizations.

As the activities and role of the regional commissions expanded to assist countries in transition to a market economy and countries undertaking economic restructuring or recovering from regional conflicts, closer cooperation and coordination between the commissions and non-United Nations organizations active in their respective regions became of paramount importance, to ensure their full integration in development assistance programmes in the economic and social fields. The Secretary-General recommended that various programming, administrative and management practices of the United Nations system be adjusted to enhance the ability of the commissions to respond to the needs of their members. He noted that neither the Council nor the Assembly had considered how resources would be mobilized for carrying out the new tasks assigned to the regional commissions, nor had they made provision for the allocation of additional resources for that purpose.

UNCTAD action. The United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, at its eighth session (UNCTAD VIII) (Cartagena de Indias, Colombia, 8-25 February) (see PART THREE, Chapter IV), adopted the Cartagena Commitment,⁽⁹⁾ which provided a framework for economic cooperation among developing countries. The Commitment underscored the importance of regional integration for such cooperation and called on United Nations agencies and organizations to support interregional, regional and subregional integration programmes and infrastructural projects. It stated that structural adjustment programmes financed from bilateral and multilateral sources should take into account their impact on regional cooperation and integration, and that the allocation of aid resources should support regional trade liberalization among developing countries.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 31 July, the Economic and Social Council, acting on the recommendation of its Economic Committee, adopted resolution 1992/43 without vote.

Strengthening the role of the regional commissions

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 45/264 of 13 May 1991 and 46/235 of 13 April 1992 on the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields, 46/145 of 17 December 1991 on regional economic integration among developing countries, and other relevant Assembly resolutions,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on regional cooperation, including his views on the role of the regional commissions within the framework of an integrated approach to enhancing the effectiveness of the United Nations system,

Bearing in mind that regional economic integration is important in expanding trade and investment, particularly in developing countries, and that regional economic integration has the potential to strengthen global economic and social development,

1. Urges the regional commissions to take steps to enable them fully to play their role in assisting their member States, in particular the developing countries, to promote accelerated and sustainable development through an integrated approach;

2. Recommends that, when preparing regional technical cooperation programmes, all relevant bodies of the United Nations system dealing with development coordinate their work with the regional commissions with a view to achieving a better and more focused use of available resources, greater coherence of action and, therefore, greater and more concentrated impact;

3. Also recommends that the regional commissions participate fully in the programme budget process at United Nations Headquarters;

4. Urges that priority setting for programming by the regional commissions should take fully into account the views of member States;

5. Urges the regional commissions, at the request of their member States, together with the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, and in accordance with the Cartagena Commitment, to contribute to the identification, preparation and implementation of specific projects to facilitate economic integration and to submit them to bilateral donors, regional economic integration organizations, regional development banks and financial institutions for their consideration;

6. Requests each regional commission to study the possibility of assisting its member States, as appropriate, to participate fully and effectively at its sessions;

7. Stresses the role and important contribution of the regional commissions, within their mandates, in the follow-up and implementation of the decisions adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, in particular those contained in Agenda 21;

8. Stresses also the importance of the regional commissions being part of the continued reform process in the economic and social fields, bearing in mind General Assembly resolutions 45/264 and 46/235;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1993 on the progress made in the implementation of the present resolution.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1992/43

31 July 1992 Meeting 42 Adopted without vote

Approved by Economic Committee (E/1992/108) without vote, 28 July (meeting 16); draft by Vice-Chairman (E/1992/C.1/L.20), based on informal consultations on draft by Pakistan for Group of 77 (E/1992/C.1/L.2); agenda item 11.

On the same date the Council, on the recommendation of its Economic Committee, adopted resolution 1992/52 without vote.

Restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic and social fields: strengthening the role and functions of the Economic Commission for Africa

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling the terms of reference of the Economic Commission for Africa, as adopted by the Economic and Social Council in its resolution 671(XXV) of 29 April 1958 and amended by resolutions 974 D (XXXVI), section I, of 5 July 1963, 1343(XLV) of 18 July 1968 and 1978/68 of 4 August 1978,

Recalling also its decision 1991/302 of 26 July 1991, in which it endorsed resolution 718(XXVI) of 12 May 1991 of the Conference of Ministers of the Economic Commission for Africa on the revitalization of the mandate and operational framework of the regional commission for Africa,

Bearing in mind General Assembly resolutions 45/177 of 19 December 1990, 45/264 of 13 May 1991 and 46/235 of 13 April 1992 on the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields, in which it was stated that the regional commissions should be enabled fully to play their role under the authority of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, and that those regional commissions located in developing countries should be strengthened in the context of the overall objectives of the ongoing restructuring and revitalization process,

Convinced that the Economic Commission for Africa plays a vital catalytic role in the coordination and execution of intercountry programmes and projects aimed at strengthening regional cooperation and integration, especially by fostering the goals of the African Economic Community,

1. Reaffirms the continuing validity of the role of the regional commissions as important organs of the United Nations for promoting the socio-economic development of their respective regions;

2. Appeals to the Secretary-General to ensure that, in the context of the ongoing restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic and social fields, due recognition is accorded to the vital role of the regional commissions.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1992/52

31 July 1992 Meeting 42 Adopted without vote
Approved by Economic Committee (E/1992/108) without vote, 28 July (meeting 16); draft by Conference of Ministers of ECA (E/1992/65), orally amended; agenda item 11.

Also on 31 July, the Council, by decision 1992/295, took note of a number of documents pertaining to regional cooperation, including a note by the Secretary-General on the Second Industrial Development Decade for Africa;⁽¹⁰⁾ the second report of the Joint Inspection Unit on the cost-benefit of office accommodation at ECLAC, Port of Spain (Trinidad and Tobago), and the Secretary-General's comments thereon;⁽¹¹⁾ the Secretary-General's report on the Transport and Communications Decade for Asia and the Pacific, 1985-1994;⁽¹²⁾ and a letter of 2 July 1992 from the Chairman of the Economic Commission for Europe (ECE) to the President of the Economic and Social Council⁽¹³⁾ on the situation within ECE caused by the lack of human resources and its effect on the efficiency of the Commission's activities.

Regional activities in environment and sustainable development

In an April report⁽¹⁴⁾ to the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, submitted in response to a 1989 Assembly request,⁽¹⁵⁾ the Secretary-General summarized further substantive follow-up by Governments and United Nations bodies to two 1987 Assembly resolutions⁽¹⁶⁾ pertaining to the question of the environment and sustainable development. The report noted that United Nations activities in sustainable development focused on preparations for and contribution to the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED), and outlined, among other things, activities of the regional commissions (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII).

ECA gave priority to achieving food self-sufficiency and security; reversing deforestation and conserving wildlife; preventing and reversing desertification and mitigating the impact of drought; ensuring effective management and use of water resources; managing coastal and marine resources; securing greater energy self-sufficiency; and managing demographic change, population pressure and human settlements.

ESCAP concentrated on environmental awareness-building; the greening of the development process; management of terrestrial ecosystems; and protection of the marine environment. Activities of ECE covered promotion of environmental impact assessment; economic instruments; linkages between environmental and trade policies; the Energy Efficiency 2000 programme; environmentally sound technologies; energy-labelling systems; and environmental improvement of transportation. ECLAC's activities included preparations of environmental management plans for sustainable agriculture in mountain ecosystems and for solid and toxic waste management in urban development; provision of guidelines and training in environmental impact assessment and environmental accounting; valuation of environmental management of marine resources; and technical cooperation to strengthen member countries' capability to implement environmentally sound and sustainable development.

By decision 47/444 of 22 December, the General Assembly took note of the Secretary-General's report.

Africa

In accordance with Economic and Social Council decision 1992/213 of 7 February, ECA held its twenty-seventh session/eighteenth meeting of the Conference of Ministers at Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, from 20 to 23 April,⁽¹⁾ to focus on new directions in the 1990s. The Ministers undertook a preliminary review of the continent's economic and social performance in 1991 and prospects for 1992, including its transformation, recovery and adjustment, and considered the Commission's ongoing and planned activities and work programmes as reflected in reports of its subsidiary bodies.

In his message to the Conference of Ministers, the Secretary-General stated that African economies had, in the past decade, suffered dramatic deterioration characterized by disproportionate population growth, serious declines in standards of living, worsening terms of trade and debt-servicing burdens. The revitalization and strengthening of African economies was part of the global perspective for international economic development, which included as a priority narrowing the gap between the rich North and poor South through solutions to the debt problem and strategies for development within a sustainable environment. In that regard, the New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s (UNNADAF), adopted by the General Assembly in 1991⁽²⁾ as a successor arrangement to the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990 (UNPAAERD),⁽³⁾ could be used to build on past initiatives, serving as instruments for the economic transformation of the continent. Although some countries were still plagued with civil strife, border disputes, environmental degradation, famine and refugee problems, the Secretary-General was confident that Africa would succeed in moving ahead with its recovery and in improving the socio-economic conditions of its people.

The Acting Executive Secretary of ECA observed in his statement that there was increasing recognition of the need to step up intra-African cooperation in order to accelerate economic integration, but cautioned that promoting the continent's economic and social transformation in the 1990s would become difficult as the attention of Africa's major development partners shifted towards other regions, particularly Eastern Europe. He noted that the Commission would devote the forthcoming decade to the practical pursuit of priorities, focusing on specific problems of member countries within the context of the various subregional economic groupings.

The Conference of Ministers was preceded by the thirteenth meeting of the Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole (Addis Ababa, 13-18 April), which adopted ECA's policy and management framework for facing Africa's development challenges in the 1990s.⁽⁴⁾ The framework provided adjustments in the Commission's policy orientation, programmes and management capacity, and identified the following areas of focus for ECA's programme delivery: strengthening its advisory role on socio-economic questions; promoting regional cooperation and integration; enhancing the efficiency of the public sector; promoting private initiatives and entrepreneurship; developing, disseminating and utilizing science and technology; ensuring a desirable balance between food supply, population, human settlements and environment; fostering human-centred development; achieving structural transformation and diversification of African economies; and promoting women in development.

The Committee recommended the streamlining and rationalization of the Commission's structure and activities, and the revitalization of its Multinational Programming and Operational Centres (MULPOCs) to improve their service to the subregional economic groupings. It endorsed the first revision⁽⁵⁾ of the Commission's medium-term plan for 1992-1997⁽⁶⁾ (see below) and updated the 1992-1993 programme of work. Noting the alarming decline in the level of extrabudgetary resources for ECA's operational activities, the Committee requested the secretariat to alleviate the financial crisis through the promotion of income-generating actions, use of restrictive budgetary measures and resource mobilization targeted at multilateral and bilateral donors. It further noted the establishment of the Multidisciplinary Regional Advisory Group as part of the new orientation of ECA advisory services during the 1990s and endorsed its 1992 work programme.

The Committee reviewed the continent's socio-economic development in 1991 and considered a progress report on the implementation of regional development strategies,⁽⁷⁾ including the Lagos Plan of Action,⁽⁸⁾ the African Alternative Framework to Structural Adjustment Programmes for Socio-economic Recovery and Transformation (AAF-SAP)⁽⁹⁾ and the African Charter for Popular Participation in Development and Transformation, adopted in 1990.⁽¹⁰⁾

The Conference of Ministers amended and endorsed the Committee's report,⁽¹¹⁾ including its resolutions and decisions. The Ministers also took note of the report and resolutions of the eleventh meeting of the Conference of Ministers of the African Least Developed Countries (LDCs) (Addis Ababa, 17-19 April),⁽¹²⁾ and endorsed the African Common Position on the African Programme for Environment and Development as a regional input to UNCED.

In its resolutions on strengthening the follow-up mechanism of the Lagos Plan of Action in the 1990s⁽¹³⁾ and on implementation of the Treaty establishing the African Economic Community,⁽¹⁴⁾ signed at Abuja, Nigeria, in June 1991,⁽¹⁵⁾ the Conference called on ECA, the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and the African Development Bank (AfDB) to monitor and assist in the implementation of those initiatives through their joint secretariat. The Ministers also adopted resolutions concerning the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic and social fields⁽¹⁶⁾ and the strengthening of ECA to face Africa's development challenges in the 1990s,⁽¹⁷⁾ and submitted them to the Economic and Social Council for action. By other resolutions and decisions, the Conference approved the 1992-1994 budget of the African Centre of Meteorological Applications for Development,⁽¹⁸⁾ approved appointments to the Governing Council of the Institute for Economic Development and Planning⁽¹⁹⁾ and endorsed amendments to the Statutes of the United Nations African Institute for the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders concerning the composition of its Governing Board and financial resources.⁽²⁰⁾

On 31 July, on the recommendation of its Economic Committee, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1992/51 without vote.

Strengthening the Economic Commission for Africa to face Africa's development challenges in the 1990s

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling the terms of reference of the Economic Commission for Africa, as adopted by the Economic and Social Council in its resolution 671(XXV) of 29 April 1958 and amended by resolutions 974 D (XXXVI), section I, of 5 July 1963, 1343(XLV) of 18 July 1968 and 1978/68 of 4 August 1978,

Recalling also the various resolutions that have implications on the mandate and operations of the Commission, including, in particular, General Assembly resolution 32/197 of 20 December 1977 on the restructuring of the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system, and Assembly resolutions 33/202 of 29 January 1979 and 44/211 of 21 December 1989,

Recalling further its endorsement in its decision 1991/302 of 26 July 1991 of resolution 718(XXVI) of 12 May 1991 of the Conference of Ministers of the Economic Commission for Africa on the revitalization of the mandate and operational framework of the regional commission for Africa,

Bearing in mind General Assembly resolutions 45/177 of 19 December 1990, 45/264 of 13 May 1991 and 46/235 of 13 April 1992 on the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields, in which it was stated that the regional commissions should be enabled fully to play their role under the authority of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, and that those regional commissions located in developing countries should be strengthened in the context of the overall objectives of the ongoing restructuring and revitalization process,

Reiterating the validity of the general orientation of the programme of work of the Commission, as outlined in the medium-term plan for the period 1992-1997, including the identified individual subprogrammes,

Convinced that the many and important changes that are taking place in the member States of the Commission, in the international environment and in the United Nations system as a whole will necessitate new approaches by the Commission in carrying out its mandate and new relationships with its constituency and partners, with a view to increasing its impact,

Having examined the in-depth analysis made by the Acting Executive Secretary of the Commission as contained in the document entitled "The Economic Commission for Africa in the 1990s: a policy and management framework for facing Africa's development challenges",

1. Congratulates the Acting Executive Secretary of the Economic Commission for Africa for taking the initiative to establish a task force to review and appraise the policy orientation, programmes and management capacity of the Commission and for his excellent analysis of the pertinent issues and the useful and innovative proposals he has made;

2. Requests the Executive Secretary of the Commission to ensure that there is a clear and concrete balance between the research and operational activities of the secretariat of the Commission and to focus all such activities on the specific realities and characteristics of the African region and on individual subregions;

3. Also requests the Executive Secretary of the Commission to ensure that its activities are fully grounded in sound data and information systems, through the strengthening of the Pan-African Documentation and Information System and providing it with adequate financial resources;

4. Further requests the Executive Secretary to ascertain that the implementation of all subprogrammes contained in the programme of work of the Commission is solidly based on the full attainment of the identified basic indicators of achievement of the objectives of the Commission, namely, strengthening the advisory role of the Commission on socio-economic questions; promoting regional cooperation and integration; enhancing the efficiency of the public sector; promoting private initiatives and entrepreneurship; development, dissemination and utilization of science and technology; ensuring a desirable balance between food supply, population, human settlements and environment; fostering human-centred development; achieving structural transformation and diversification of African economies; and promotion of women in development;

5. Welcomes the process of frequent and close consultations by the secretariat with member States and donors, including with their representatives at Addis Ababa, through regular briefing sessions;

6. Recommends the establishment, within existing resources, of a consultative mechanism that would advise the Executive Secretary on the grouping of conferences along specific themes, including the scheduling and preparation of conferences, meetings, seminars and workshops, taking into account the need to harmonize them with those of the Organization of African Unity and the African Development Bank to avoid duplication and achieve greater efficiency;

7. Urges the Executive Secretary to explore all possibilities for establishing or strengthening the relationships of the Commission with African intergovernmental organizations, the specialized agencies of the United Nations system, bilateral and multilateral development cooperation agencies and non-governmental organizations, including, in particular, the possibility of establishing joint units or special programmes with the specialized agencies and the creation of a special unit within the secretariat of the Commission to coordinate the increased joint activities of the Commission with non-governmental organizations;

8. Expresses appreciation to the General Assembly for providing additional resources to the Multinational Programming and Operational Centres, and consequently recommends that, in conformity with resolution 702(XXV) of 19 May 1990 of the Conference of Ministers of the Economic Commission for Africa on transforming and strengthening the Multinational Programming and Operational Centres of the Commission, the Centres should be further strengthened through the redeployment of resources, should be given specific assignments with respect to technical assistance and advisory services for the execution of joint projects of member States within the framework of the intergovernmental organizations in their respective subregions, and should be enabled to act as the major subregional focal points for collecting and disseminating information on all aspects of economic cooperation and integration;

9. Expresses its gratitude to the General Assembly for providing the African Institute for Economic Development and Planning with four additional posts for the biennium 1992-1993, thus enabling the Institute to contribute to the process of strengthening the operational capacity of the Commission in meeting the challenges facing Africa in the 1990s, and requests the redeployment of resources which would enable the Institute to assume additional responsibility;

10. Requests the Executive Secretary, in close cooperation with the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity, to undertake a thorough examination of the problems and constraints facing the institutions sponsored by the Commission and subsequently to make concrete proposals aimed at alleviating the different problems and to consider alternative solutions such as merging some of the institutions;

11. Appeals to bilateral and multilateral donors to increase their financial and other forms of assistance to the Economic Commission for Africa to enable it to shoulder its responsibilities to member States in the form of extrabudgetary operational activities;

12. Also requests the Executive Secretary to undertake, as necessary, reforms in the structure of the secretariat so as to achieve full consistency with the new orientations recommended in the present resolution and attain greater efficiency and increased capacity for the secretariat to serve as an effective organ for the economic and social development of Africa;

13. Further requests the Executive Secretary to report on the implementation of the present resolution to the Conference of Ministers of the Economic Commission for Africa at its nineteenth meeting.

Economic and social trends

Economic trends

Africa's overall economic performance, measured in terms of trends in total output, payments position, fiscal situation, external debt and price trends, was generally weak, according to a summary of the survey of economic and social conditions in Africa.⁽²²⁾ In 1992, the regional real output grew by only 1.5 per cent, down from an already discouraging gross domestic product (GDP) rate of 2.3 per cent in 1991. The combined output of the continent's 42 non-oil-exporting countries declined by 1.1 per cent, but that was partially compensated by a 3 per cent growth rate in the oil-exporting countries. Economic performance in a number of countries, notably Algeria, Liberia, Mozambique, Somalia, Togo and Zaire, was seriously affected by the unsettled political situation. Adverse international factors also continued to play a decisive role, mainly recessionary conditions in the countries members of the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), Africa's major trading partners.

Despite considerable policy adjustments, the manufacturing sector grew by only 2 per cent in 1992, after a 0.3 per cent decline the previous year. Capacity utilization remained at a low 30 to 50 per cent level in most African countries, which continued to face a high degree of import dependence and constraining factors associated with structural adjustment programmes. The sector was adversely affected by poor agricultural performance, constrained foreign exchange situation and low foreign direct investment inflow, coupled with drastically reduced public investment in many countries. Structural limitations contributed to an overall decline of 0.8 per cent in the mining sector, while the production of oil increased by less than 1 per cent against 1991, totalling 338 million tonnes. The production level stagnated in the States members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC), but rose by 3.4 per cent among the non-OPEC economies (Angola, Congo and Egypt), with Angola producing 27.4 million tonnes—a 10 per cent increase over 1991. The year saw intensified oil- and gas-exploration activities and efforts to improve the investment climate for foreign oil companies. In the non-fuel mining sector, however, prices fell due to the weakening of the base metal market, and the volume of zinc, gold and silver output grew only by 2.2, 2 and 0.4 per cent, respectively.

Annual inflation rates reached 63 per cent in 1992, compared with 36.3 per cent in 1991, excluding the economies of the franc zone (Benin, Cameroon, Central African Republic, Chad, Comoros, Congo, Cote d'Ivoire, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Mali, Niger, Senegal, Togo), which averaged 3.6 per cent inflation. The increase was greatest in Central Africa, due to hyper-inflation in Zaire, and in West Africa. In eastern and southern Africa, drought led to an average inflation rate of 60.5 per cent.

Macroeconomic policy in 1992 emphasized the liberalization and stabilization of economic systems, with particular focus on financial and fiscal sectors, factor markets, the price system and the role of the public and private sectors. Reform measures focused on fiscal discipline and resource rationalization, improvement of the expenditure/revenue ratio and ways to increase revenues, and tax reform. Some countries undertook measures to rationalize expenditure through containing growth in wages and, partly, reducing civil strife. Reform of the financial system concentrated on improving monetary control and coordination, enhancing the mobilization and allocation of domestic savings, and removing the rigidities of the banking system in general. There was also increased recourse to financial instruments, with a number of countries revising their interest and exchange-rate policies. During the year, currencies were devalued in Ethiopia, Malawi, Mauritania, Nigeria, the Sudan and Zambia, while exchange control was liberalized in Botswana, Mauritius, Nigeria and Uganda. The policy of State disengagement from the public sector continued as loss-making public enterprises were being sold in Chad, Morocco, Mozambique, Nigeria, the Sudan and Uganda. Privatization, however, was constrained by the indebtedness of those enterprises and the narrow capital base of the domestic private sector.

Prospects for 1993 depended critically on the removal of current external resource constraints through increased export earnings and investment flows, improved commodity prices and debt reduction. There were encouraging signs of a possible recovery in agriculture, with a considerable rebound forecast for southern Africa after the 1992 drought. Yet prospects were tainted by the existing uncertainty concerning peace and security in the region and by the stagnation in external trade.

External debt

By the end of 1992, the outstanding external debt of developing Africa was $281.8 billion, only $0.8 billion higher than in 1991, and accounted for 92.6 per cent of regional GDP, down from 94 per cent the previous year. Debt servicing represented 23.7 per cent of goods and services exports and continued to constrain import capacity and growth. Accumulations of arrears remained unabated, preventing African countries from creating an environment to attract foreign investment, particularly from private sources.

In addition to Egypt's measures to write off and reschedule a part of its debt, which generally levelled out the continent's external debt obligations, part of the long-term public debt was cancelled in the amount of $1 billion for Zambia and $200 million for Ethiopia. Similarly, Nigeria secured a review of terms for paying back $7 billion, while Algeria concluded a refinancing agreement for $2 billion. The net long-term financial flows to sub-Saharan Africa, estimated at $17.8 billion by the World Bank, contracted by $100 million against 1991, and budgetary problems in donor countries were increasingly affecting aid programmes and external development finance for Africa, even though UNNADAF estimated that beginning from 1992, a minimum of $30 billion would have to be mobilized for Africa every year, growing in real terms at a 4 per cent annual rate.

In April, the ECA Conference of Ministers welcomed the decision of the Secretary-General to make alleviation of the debt burden of the world's poorest countries a major priority for the United Nations, and called on members of the Commission to devote greater effort to debt management at the national level.⁽²³⁾

Agriculture

In developing Africa, agricultural production declined by 1.5 per cent in 1992, compared to a 3.8 per cent increase in 1991, owing largely to the catastrophic drought in eastern and southern Africa, where output fell by 7.7 per cent. Dry conditions also prevailed in North Africa, mainly in Algeria and Morocco, causing a decline in production in those countries as well. Central and western Africa, however, registered growth of 2.3 and 4.2 per cent, respectively. Food was the sector most seriously affected by the poor agricultural performance. Aggregate cereal output in developing Africa dropped by 14.1 per cent to 75 million tonnes—falling an estimated 65 per cent in Morocco and 42.5 per cent in southern Africa. As a result, 40 million people faced food shortages in sub-Saharan Africa, and food import requirements for the region in 1992 amounted to 6 million tonnes, compared to 2 million in a normal year. For developing Africa as a whole, those requirements were estimated at 20.2 million tonnes, and the food aid needed was set at 5.5 million tonnes.

Except for tobacco, a negative growth rate was recorded for all other major industrial crops, including cocoa (-5.3 per cent), coffee (-6.1 per cent), tea (-10.3 per cent), cotton (-7.1 per cent) and sugar (-3.7 per cent), while prices either fell or remained depressed. Agricultural policy continued to focus on transformation through sound investment and liberalization measures; increased attention was also given to drought relief and rehabilitation, and environmental protection was emphasized in the agricultural policies of some countries.

Trade

The volume of exports for the region, totalling $70.8 billion, fell in 1992 by 6 per cent, and their value declined by 6.1 per cent. The purchasing power of exports registered a 9 per cent decline, compared with 3.4 per cent in 1991. As a result, developing Africa's share in world trade remained minimal and showed a decrease in export values of 2 per cent. Oil-exporting countries accounted for 70.5 per cent of the region's exports in 1992, but their earnings declined by 1.5 per cent because of a drop in oil prices and in export volumes. At the same time, import values rose by 9.3 per cent to reach $81 billion, with prices increasing by 3.2 per cent and volume by 3.6 per cent. The increase in import prices was essentially due to a 4.6 per cent rise in the prices of manufactured goods. Although the price of wheat increased by 17.7 per cent, food import prices increased only 1.6 per cent. As the value of exports dropped and imports expanded, the region's trade deficit swelled to $10.2 billion in 1992, up from $1.7 billion the previous year. Yet the services deficit improved from $19.7 billion to $18.7 billion, and unrequited transfers contracted by nearly $3 billion, as a result of reduced level of private transfers.

Commodity prices overall decreased by 1.3 per cent, up from a 14.3 per cent drop in 1991. Excluding oil prices, the decline was 7.3 per cent, against 4.7 per cent the previous year. Prices of beverages fell by 12.3 per cent, although tea prices recovered in 1992. Agricultural raw material prices improved by an average of 2.5 per cent, but cotton recorded a 24.1 per cent decline because of a large supply/demand imbalance on the world market. Metals and minerals prices dropped 2.6 per cent, with copper losing 2.3 per cent on average; nickel, 14 per cent; and iron ore, 4.9 per cent.

Subregional economic performance

Among the continent's subregions, the best results in 1992 were achieved in West Africa, where output grew by 3.3 per cent, although slightly lower than the 3.5 per cent recorded in 1991. Several countries, such as Ghana and Nigeria, showed a satisfactory performance, while others performed poorly and some experienced negative growth, notably Cote d'Ivoire and the Niger. Economic activity increased at a 5.8 per cent rate in the Sahelian subgroup, with the Sudan recording an exceptional GDP growth of some 11 per cent. The growth rates averaged 1.4 per cent in sub-Saharan Africa and 2.1 per cent in North Africa, where only Egypt and Tunisia recorded significant growth rates. In Central Africa, output fell by 1.2

per cent, largely due to the crisis in Zaire and the slow-down in Cameroon and Gabon. The decline in East Africa (2.2 per cent) and southern Africa (3.1 per cent) was largely due to civil strife in Angola, Mozambique and Somalia and the disastrous drought in most countries of the area.

In the least developed countries (LDCs) of Africa, real GDP growth decreased by 0.9 per cent after a drop of 0.4 per cent in 1991. Drought and political instability in Ethiopia, Zaire and Zambia and civil strife in Liberia, Rwanda, Somalia and southern Sudan were among the factors contributing to the poor performance. Agricultural output rose by only 0.8 per cent in 1992, down from 2.7 per cent in 1991, with as many as 14 African LDCs facing the threat of large-scale famine, according to the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO). The financial distress in many LDCs was aggravated by a further drop in an already low rate of domestic savings, averaging some 7 per cent in 1991-1992.

Social trends

According to an ECA report on the African social situation,⁽²⁴⁾ the severe economic crisis that had engulfed Africa's social sector in the 1980s had not abated. Regional per capita incomes and real wages continued to decline, resulting in widespread malnutrition and starvation and leaving a large segment of the population to face primary poverty. Urban unemployment, which was 14 million in 1991, continued to rise and was projected to reach 44 million by the year 2000. The education, health, and food and nutrition sectors, among others, were characterized by social retrogression, compounded by unprecedented population growth rates and negative effects of inadequate structural adjustment programmes.

Severe budgetary pressures resulted in the reduction of real expenditure on education and health, leading to increasing school closures, declining school enrolment and attendance ratios, mounting repetition of classes, falling educational standards and shortages of teaching materials and teachers. The health situation was aggravated by the resurgence of previously controlled diseases, a rise in meningitis and malaria, lack of universal immunization, and depressed consumer imports of medicines and medical equipment. Mortality rates increased among all age groups, and the prevalence of the human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS) had grown into a public health crisis; at current rates, it was estimated that close to 20 million Africans could be infected with the disease by 2000. In addition, the droughts affecting much of the continent caused mass displacements of people and posed a threat of hunger and starvation for millions in more than 11 countries.

Political instability, civil strife and military conflicts, coupled with domestic policy failures, contributed significantly to the continued crisis in the African social situation. The persisting problem of refugees exerted additional pressure on the continent's social sector: it was estimated that Africa was hosting close to 50 per cent of the total world refugee population in 1992. Another adverse factor was the fall in the region's commodity prices and the decline in terms of trade, the burden of external debt and inadequate resource flows, which necessitated a severe and prolonged compression of consumer imports.

On the positive side, increased recognition of Africa's problems and rising democratic activity in the region, although accompanied in some cases by unrest, were believed to be contributing to a gradual restoration of stability in African society.

Activities in 1992

Development policy and regional economic cooperation activities

The 1992 development policy and regional economic cooperation activities were geared towards implementation of the 1991 Abuja Treaty establishing the African Economic Community,⁽¹⁵⁾ according to ECA's annual report covering 24 April 1992 through 6 May 1993.⁽²⁵⁾ The ECA secretariat and its MULPOCs provided assistance to African intergovernmental organizations and their member countries to promote the continent's economic integration. Advisory services dealt with the formulation and programming of integration projects under the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) fifth (1992-1996) programming cycle, trade and maritime coastal links in Central Africa, the Rusumo hydroelectric centre and human resources capacity and capability development in eastern and southern Africa. A seminar on the production and marketing of embroidery products in the Economic Community of the Great Lakes Countries was organized for Central African countries, while workshops and field projects in eastern and southern Africa focused on human resources development, local production of school and university textbooks and the operationalization of the Eastern and Southern African Development and Information System. In West Africa, a number of seminars were held on issues related to integration through production.

The ECA Regional Multidisciplinary Advisory Group provided technical support to 12 training workshops and seminars on policy and development in such sectors as agriculture, energy, science and technology, human resources, and public administration. The Group also undertook 18 country missions and 20 advisory missions to intergovernmental organizations, including an exploratory mission to South Africa to create a framework for reintegrating that country into the rest of Africa. In response to requests from Governments and organizations, the Group carried out a variety of activities related to subregional economic community schemes, policy and development issues, development projects, training programmes, a multidisciplinary approach to the establishment of public administration and management institutions, application of national accounts to development and strategies for combating desertification and integrating environmental dimensions into economic planning.

In the field of socio-economic research and planning, the secretariat prepared biennial surveys of the economic and social conditions and social trends in Africa as a whole and in the African LDCs, and an annual economic report on the region. Other publications dealt with the mobilization and use of household savings in the African least developed, island and land-locked countries as well as with their food and agricultural policies, and with social security schemes and national development in Africa. The secretariat also provided advice on the modalities of the proposed African Foundation for Research and Development and the Research and Development Forum for Science-Led Development in Africa, whose trust became operational in October.

Statistical development

In its annual report covering 14 May 1991 through 23 April 1992,⁽¹⁾ ECA noted that the level and quality of African statistics had deteriorated during the past two decades due to economic crises that led to public spending cuts; weak interest in quantitative information for economic planning; competition between external and internal demands for statistical data; inadequate infrastructure for data collection, analysis and dissemination; and poor management of statistical services.

Issues related to statistical development and economic planning and forecasting were examined by the Joint Conference of African Planners, Statisticians and Demographers at its seventh session (Addis Ababa, 2-7 March), which considered the Strategy for the Implementation of the Addis Ababa Plan of Action for Statistical Development in Africa in the 1990s.⁽²⁶⁾ In April,⁽²⁷⁾ the ECA Conference of Ministers adopted the Strategy and urged its members to set up needs assessment/programme review and strategy development teams to identify needs and priorities and to formulate draft five- to ten-year national statistical development plans. Also in April,⁽²⁸⁾ the Ministers requested the secretariat to continue strengthening and expanding its work on short-term economic forecasting in Africa and called on bilateral and multi-lateral donors to support the establishment of forecasting systems in African countries.

Activities in 1992 were centred on building national statistical capability and self-reliance. The secretariat undertook technical advisory missions in the areas of training and household surveys, and provided technical support in census project development/census organization, census cartography, sampling, data processing and civil registration/vital statistics. It prepared publications on vertical and horizontal collaboration in data processing within national statistical offices and on alternatives to population censuses in small area statistics, and continued to issue the Statistical Training Programme for Africa (STPA) News and the Foreign Trade Statistics for Africa series. Among other publications were African socio-economic indicators for 1989 and for 1990-1991; the African compendium of environment statistics for 1991; a directory of African statisticians for 1992; and the African Statistical Yearbook, 1988-1989, Part 4 — East and Southern Africa.

The Coordinating Committee on African Statistical Development held its second annual meeting in Kenya in November.

Information for development

The Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole, noting that data and information were central to socio-economic development planning, observed that the information infrastructure in Africa was largely unprepared to meet information needs in the 1990s, owing to inadequate organization of existing data and information, insufficient use of facilities and resources, insensitivity of information structures to the needs of development planners, and lack of attention given to the role of information by decision-makers in many countries. While information technology, particularly computers, was well-disseminated, its impact on the quality of socio-economic information in the region had been negligible. In that regard, the Committee noted with satisfaction the work of the Pan-African Development Information System (PADIS) in sensitizing African countries to the use of information technology for development, as well as the creation of a Working Group on ECA's Information Systems to help the secretariat integrate its activities in this area.

In April,⁽²⁹⁾ the ECA Conference of Ministers set out measures for its members to adopt in order to ensure the delivery of technical assistance by PADIS, called on them to adopt policies related to the acquisition and use of appropriate information technology and requested PADIS to continue coordinating development information to respond to the continent's pressing problems. The secretariat was requested to collaborate with OAU and AfDB in harmonizing and standardizing information sources and systems to facilitate regional economic cooperation.

During 1992, PADIS continued to provide technical assistance (advisory services and training) to member States. Training courses were offered at Addis Ababa in reprography techniques (10 October-13 November), selected aspects of information technology (19-20 November) and database development (November/December). Workshops on digital communications and on science and technology networking were held (Nairobi, Kenya, August) to discuss the use of digital radio and packet satellite technology in development communications and electronic networks in Africa, including training in project development. Preparations were initiated for a joint project of PADIS and the International Development Research Centre (Canada) (Ottawa, October), and an African pilot project for an economic and commercial information network, established by the Chambers of Commerce and Industry of Developing Countries members of the Group of 77, was launched in Cameroon in December. The Development Information Day was celebrated on 18 November at ECA headquarters. A subregional workshop on processing, analysis and dissemination of household survey data was organized for English-speaking African countries in cooperation with the International Labour Organisation (ILO).

Other activities included a meeting on information processing using Arabic letters (Tunis, Tunisia, 29 June-12 July); a review of the database and information system development project for the Kagera Basin Organization (Kigali, Rwanda, May); and training courses on PADIS methodologies and the use of computer software, and on electronic mail and computer-mediated communications. The secretariat maintained databases on socio-economic, scientific and technical aspects of Africa's development and on African experts in those fields, and provided technical assistance to UNDP in establishing a database of Nigerian experts. It also published its quarterly Newsletter and four issues of the Divindex-Africa, and updated the Directory of African Experts, the Directory of ECA-sponsored Institutions, and the Directory of Development Institutions.

The System's role and functioning was reviewed by the Regional Technical Committee for PADIS and the Standing Committee on the Harmonization and Standardization of Documentation and Information Systems, which met from 18 to 20 November.

Public administration and finance

ECA provided assistance to its members in improving and strengthening their public administration, management and fiscal systems, institutions and processes as well as the performance of public enterprises, public financial management and the promotion of entrepreneurship. The secretariat completed technical publications on measures to stimulate, develop, and promote indigenous entrepreneurial capability in Africa, as well as measures to improve management capacity, motivation and productivity in African public enterprises, and on current trends in Africa's public expenditure programming. Other publications dealt with public administration and management innovations to enhance popular participation in the design and implementation of national development programmes; current trends in the restructuring of taxation systems for adequate mobilization of domestic resources; and the impact of automation and modern technology on financial management in public enterprises.

Regional training workshops were held on strengthening the managerial and administrative capacity of public enterprises and various approaches to privatization in Africa (Khartoum, the Sudan, September), and on improvement in tax administration (Yaounde, Cameroon, June). Two senior policy workshops and a regional conference were organized under the Special Action Programme for Administration and Management in Africa, funded by UNDP. National training workshops in 1992 focused on reforming taxation systems, policies and tax administration (Lusaka, Zambia, September/October) and on senior financial management in the public sector (Lusaka, March).

International trade and development finance

ECA's activities in trade and development finance focused on mobilizing financial resources for development through indigenous banking and financial institutions and improving the region's position in world trade and at international multilateral trade negotiations.

The Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole, considering issues related to UNCTAD VIII (see above), noted that Africa's interests were not reflected in the common position of the Group of 77 at the session due to the continent's poor participation. The Committee further observed that negotiation frameworks offered by UNCTAD and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) were important for the region, and that it should strive to improve its negotiating position.

The ECA Conference of Ministers noted with concern that most African financial institutions had been ineffective in mobilizing resources to finance the development process, and that imbalances between the volume of savings and investment requirements remained large and perpetuated the continent's overdependence on external development financing. The Ministers called upon African countries to implement financial reform programmes and pursue policies aimed at raising real incomes and savings, especially in rural areas, and requested the secretariat to undertake case studies on obstacles to the mobilization of financial resources.⁽³⁰⁾ By another resolution,⁽³¹⁾ ECA, OAU, AfDB and the African Centre for Monetary Studies were requested to assist member States in monitoring the evolution of international monetary systems, particularly the European Monetary System, and in evaluating their possible impact on the monetary and financial arrangements in African countries. In an effort to give impetus to Africa's monetary integration, the Conference called on its members to accelerate the ratification of the Treaty establishing the African Economic Community.

In 1992, the secretariat prepared a number of studies on the continent's external debt situation and the impact of initiatives for alleviating the debt burden, as well as on the creation of an ECA database on Africa's debt profile and on the impact of recent international developments on net resource transfers to African countries. It also continued to issue information on trade opportunities for African businessmen and the African Trade Bulletin, and published a study on the role of financial institutions in facilitating and promoting intra-African trade.

Workshops were organized in southern and eastern Africa on facilitation of trade and investment flows and payments in the subregion (Mauritius, June); savings and development of small-scale enterprises (Gaborone, Botswana, June); and facilitation of intra-regional economic activity (Harare, Zimbabwe, 30 November-2 December). A meeting of the Working Party of the African Governors of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (Arusha, United Republic of Tanzania, August) discussed issues related to monetary and financial policies. AfDB and the subregional committees of the Association of African Central Banks for West Africa and eastern and southern Africa also held their meetings in 1992.

Other activities included a fourth Trade Fair of the Preferential Trade Area of Eastern and Southern African States (Dar-es-Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania, July); a ninth East African Central Banks course (Nairobi, 6 July-14 August); an international conference on promoting capital markets in Africa (Abuja, November); and a sixth all-Africa Trade Fair (Bulawayo, Zimbabwe, 2-10 September), organized by OAU.

Industrial development

The secretariat pursued activities aimed at revitalizing and restructuring the industrial sector through supporting national and multinational resource-based and core industries. In the context of the second Industrial Development Decade for Africa, emphasis was placed on strengthening the technological and entrepreneurial capabilities of African countries. The secretariat prepared a review of African industry, a directory of project profiles on small-scale industries and a manual for entrepreneurship-development trainers in those industries, and issued publications on national and subregional industrial priorities, the structure of industrial enterprises in the informal sector, sustainable financing of selected industrial projects, the role of industrial free zones in African industrialization, guidelines for the manufacture of agricultural tools and other equipment by small-scale engineering industries and possibilities and perspectives for the production of basic chemicals from natural gas. Seminars on comparative advantage for industrial development and on policies for the promotion of small-scale industries were held in West Africa.

Second Industrial Development Decade for Africa

In April,⁽³²⁾ the ECA Conference of Ministers endorsed the resolution adopted by the Conference of African Ministers of Industry at its tenth meeting, held in July 1991,⁽³³⁾ adopting the draft programme for the second Industrial Development Decade for Africa (IDDA II), 1991-2000. In a separate resolution,⁽³⁴⁾ the Conference of Ministers adopted the programme and requested ECA to submit it through the Economic and Social Council for adoption by the General Assembly at its 1992 session. It also decided to establish a ten-member working group to monitor implementation of the programme, and appealed to the Assembly and United Nations funding agencies to provide adequate financial support to programme-related activities. The General Conference of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) had also endorsed the programme in November 1991 and recommended it for adoption by the Assembly in 1992.

In May, the Secretary-General submitted the programme to the Economic and Social Council.⁽³⁵⁾

The programme of IDDA II incorporated strategic approaches and an action-oriented programme for self-sustained development through industrialization, focusing on the industrial expansion of major sectors, promotion of small- and medium-scale industries and entrepreneurship development, development of physical and institutional infrastructure and human resources and consolidation programmes aimed at rehabilitating and regenerating existing industries, improving the performance of public enterprises and enhancing complementarity between the public and private sector. It also included programmes for the industrialization of Africa's LDCs, proposed ways of financing the Decade, set out possible mechanisms for coordinating and monitoring the implementation of IDDA II and provided breakdowns by subregion.

Approved by Second Committee (A/47/717/Add.1) without vote, 11 December (meeting 50); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/47/L.79), based on informal consultations on draft by Mauritius for African States (A/C.2/47/L.50); agenda item 12.

Meeting numbers. GA 47th session: 2nd Committee 3-9, 34-37, 40, 42, 43, 45, 46, 48-50; plenary 93.

Transport and communications

Activities in the transport and communications sector included a seminar on the establishment of a multinational company for transport operations on Lakes Kivu and Tanganyika, a technical consultative meeting on transit traffic, a second special meeting of the Conference of African Ministers responsible for Telecommunications (Abidjan, Cote d'Ivoire, May), a meeting of the African information and telecommunication study group (Nairobi, July) and the African regional telecommunications conference (Gaborone). Intergovernmental meetings of experts were held on the development of cooperation among African ports, trans-African highways and gas transportation. A regional seminar on railway restructuring was organized by the World Bank. An ad hoc expert group meeting reviewed proposals and guidelines for the development of subregional and regional cooperation in shipping, prepared by ECA. The Ministerial Conference of West and Central African States on Maritime Transport, the Port Management Association for West and Central Africa and the General Assembly and Symposium of the Union of African Railways also met during the year.

The secretariat issued guidelines on the establishment of inland container depots along the main transport corridors in Africa, and for the improvement of clearing and forwarding operations to facilitate seaborne trade. It also prepared a study on African gas pipelines and draft statutes for the Trans-African Highways Bureau. Other publications focused on port dues and charges for cargo handling and their impact on port efficiency, development of standardized maintenance management systems, rehabilitation and modernization programmes for railway services, and improvement of maintenance and repair workshops for rolling stock in African railways networks.

Transport and Communications Decade

In April, the Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole⁽¹¹⁾ considered a progress report⁽³⁶⁾ on the implementation of the second United Nations Transport and Communications Decade in Africa (UNTACDA II),⁽³⁷⁾ which was adopted by the Economic and Social Council in July 1991⁽³⁸⁾ and endorsed by the General Assembly later that year.⁽³⁹⁾

The Committee recommended that the programme be implemented in a way that ensured proper linkages with other economic sectors. Calling for more coordination between UNTACDA II and IDDA II, it urged ECA to prepare a plan of action for harmonizing the activities of the two Decades. The Committee also requested finalization of a review of guidelines for project identification, especially those related to railway projects, and recommended that more emphasis be placed on research in transport equipment maintenance, transport modes and applied research for alleviating the burden on women transporting goods from rural to urban areas. It particularly welcomed the memorandum signed between the World Bank and ECA inviting donor participants in sub-Saharan Africa's Special Transport Programme to launch activities compatible with the UNTACDA II programme.

The ECA Conference of Ministers, having taken note of the Committee's deliberations related to the implementation of the Decade, urged its members to establish national coordination committees and to revitalize the operation of the existing ones, and requested the General Assembly to provide the Commission, as the Decade's lead agency, with the necessary regular budgetary resources.⁽⁴⁰⁾ By decision 1992/294 of 31 July, the Economic and Social Council endorsed the decision of the Conference.

Initial activities of the Decade included the first meeting of the UNTACDA II working group on strategies for development of transport and communications equipment, organized by ECA and attended by OAU, UNDP and UNIDO, as well as a training workshop on the design and management of road safety programmes.

Europe-Africa permanent link through the Strait of Gibraltar

A 1989 cooperation agreement between Morocco and Spain included a study of institutional schemes for implementing the project of linking Europe and Africa through the Strait of Gibraltar, as well as measures for its promotion at the international level. The Economic and Social Council, in 1991, had requested the Executive Secretaries of ECA and ECE to prepare an evaluation report for submission to the Council in 1993.⁽⁴¹⁾

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 31 July 1992, the Economic and Social Council, acting on the recommendation of its Economic Committee, adopted resolution 1992/45 without vote.

Europe-Africa permanent link through the Strait of Gibraltar

The Economic and Social Council, Recalling its resolution 1991/74 of 26 July 1991 and other relevant resolutions concerning the Europe-Africa permanent link through the Strait of Gibraltar, and the activities that the Executive Secretaries of the Economic Commission for Africa and the Economic Commission for Europe were requested to carry out regarding the preparation of an evaluation report on the studies relating to the project in the period 1982-1993 for submission to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1993,

Conscious of the contribution of the project to the development of transport and to physical integration at the regional and interregional levels,

Noting that its resolution 1991/74 does not impose any financial burden on the budgets of the two Commissions concerned, since the Governments of Morocco and Spain are making available most of the financial resources needed to perform the activities mandated in that resolution,

Bearing in mind the necessary involvement of experts from the Economic Commission for Africa and the Economic Commission for Europe in coordinating the evaluation process requested in Council resolution 1991/74,

Recalling that in that resolution it called upon the Secretary-General to allocate as far as possible sufficient resources to the two Commissions, within existing priorities, for the preparation of the above-mentioned evaluation report,

Noting that the Secretary-General has not been able to allocate the necessary resources from within existing appropriations,

Requests the Secretary-General, taking account of relevant priorities, to provide the Economic Commission for Africa and the Economic Commission for Europe, within existing resources for the relevant sections of the programme budget for the biennium 1992-1993, with the necessary budgetary resources to enable them to prepare effectively and efficiently the evaluation report requested by the Economic and Social Council in its resolution 1991/74.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1992/45

31 July 1992 Meeting 42 Adopted without vote

Approved by Economic Committee (E/1992/108) without vote, 28 July (meeting 16); draft by Vice-Chairman (E/1992/C.1/L.16), based on informal consultations on draft sponsored by France, Greece, Italy, Morocco, Spain (E/1992/C.1/L.6); agenda item 11.

Science and technology

Acting on the conclusions of the Intergovernmental Committee of Experts for Science and Technology Development at its seventh meeting, held at Addis Ababa in November 1991, the ECA Conference of Ministers requested the Executive Secretary to prepare a report on the possibilities of establishing a Conference of Ministers of Science and Technology for Development.⁽⁴²⁾ In a separate resolution,⁽⁴³⁾ the Conference urged members of ECA to take explicit individual and collective measures to build up their endogenous capabilities in science and technology.

During 1992, activities focused on strengthening policies and institutional infrastructure for science and technology in African countries and promoting regional and interregional cooperation in that area. A high-level expert meeting on science and technology (Bujumbura, Burundi, May) discussed the role of technology in industrialization and regional economic integration. An ad hoc expert group meeting (Addis Ababa, October) considered various applications of nuclear science and technology for agricultural production and food preservation. A technical publication on guidelines and methodologies for the planning and management of science and technology policies for development was issued by the secretariat.

Marine affairs

In the field of marine affairs, the secretariat prepared a technical study on current status, policies, strategies and legal framework for developing marine resources in selected African countries, and provided advisory services and technical assistance to several States regarding development of institutions, human resources and science and technology in the marine sector.

Natural resources

Activities in the field of mineral resources were geared towards improving institutional capacity for mineral resources development, policy formulation in small-scale mining strategies and dissemination of information for the mining sector. Advisory services were provided on the development of gold deposits in the Liptako-Gourma region; restructuring of the national mining survey and improvement of the small-scale gold-mining sector in Equatorial Guinea; feasibility of establishing a mineral processing plant in Burkina Faso; and negotiations with donors regarding environmental aspects of developing the Mount Nimba iron deposit in Guinea. Technical assistance was extended to the Undugu Group (an intergovernmental economic group of Sahelian countries) in drafting a framework for cooperation, to the Central African Mineral Resources Development Centre in defining strategies to revitalize the institution and to the Eastern and Southern African Mineral Resources Development Centre to prepare project documents for submission to potential donors. The secretariat participated in an international seminar on the role of the mineral sector in Africa's economic development, organized by UNCTAD (Ouarzazate, Morocco, 27-30 April), and prepared technical publications on the establishment of African mineral associations of mining and related industrial operators; the status of small-scale mining in Africa and strategies for its development; and the environment and mineral resources development and use.

Under the water resources subprogramme, the secretariat assisted member States in coordinating and harmonizing their activities in the development of natural resources within the transboundary river/lake basin areas. It published an information bulletin on water activities in the region and a directory of African water specialists, and offered advisory services to Cameroon to review the creation of water points in the Menchoum region.

ECA's efforts in cartography and remote sensing focused on the development of technological, institutional and human resources capabilities in data acquisition, analysis and use for natural resources and environmental management, as well as on policies and strategies in surveying, mapping and remote sensing in Africa. The Cartography and Remote Sensing Bulletin for Africa was issued in 1992. Technical assistance was provided to the African Organization for Cartography and Remote Sensing, the Regional Centre for Training in Aerospace Surveys and the Regional Centre for Services in Surveying, Mapping and Remote Sensing.

Energy

ECA continued to assist its members in energy planning and management. The secretariat issued guidelines on petroleum legislation in African countries and a compendium of rules and regulations in the continent's oil-producing States, and provided technical advice to the African Regional Centre for Solar Energy in Burundi in coping with its managerial and financial difficulties. It also cooperated with the World Bank in formulating and monitoring a project on rationalization of petroleum supply in sub-Saharan Africa, including a meeting of governmental experts from eastern African countries on the subject (Nairobi, 20-21 January), and in organizing a seminar on energy policy and the environment (Addis Ababa, 9-11 November), which focused on strengthening energy policy research and management in Africa. ECA held discussions with other regional commissions on interregional project development within the framework of the Global Energy Efficiency 21/Energy Efficiency 2000 project (Geneva, October), following an ad hoc meeting on the subject (Geneva, 3-5 March).

Food and agriculture

Activities in the area of food and agriculture included seminars on training needs in agricultural development planning and programming, four meetings for Central and West African countries on critical food security issues and workshops and field projects in eastern and southern Africa on food self-sufficiency and food processing and storage. Advisory services were provided to improve control of the tsetse fly under the Kagera basin project and to test livestock models in Central and West Africa, with the aim of expanding the region's livestock resources.

In 1992, the secretariat distributed to member States a progress report on the application of AAF-SAP in the agricultural sector, published two issues of the Rural Progress newsletter and a manual on measures for expanding food availability through the exploitation of non-conventional food resources, and issued a comparative analysis of the structural advantages of African and South-East Asian agricultural export products as well as guidelines for loss reduction in the cattle subsector with emphasis on reproductive wastage.

Other technical publications dealt with the impact of the 1992 European economic integration measures on African agriculture, assessment of inland and marine aquaculture development programmes, the impact of biotechnology on agricultural development, measures to coordinate maize research networks in eastern and southern Africa, the impact of structural adjustment programmes on the food situation in West Africa, measures to develop institutional aspects of rural transformation in selected African countries, the impact of food aid on the continent's food security and self-sufficiency and the role of agricultural marketing in economic development.

Fisheries

In response to a 1990 request of the General Assembly,⁽⁴⁴⁾ the Secretary-General in June submitted a report on cooperation in fisheries in Africa prepared in close consultation with FAO. The report provided an overview of African fishery development and reviewed the status and prospects for cooperation, including short- and medium-term cooperation needs in resource management; development planning and programming; training; technology transfers and support to private entrepreneurs; and coordination of regional and subregional fishery programmes.

According to the report, the total potential of African waters, both marine and inland, was estimated at some 9 million tonnes per year. Of that amount, marine fisheries accounted for 6.8 million tonnes, with West Africa (from Morocco to Namibia) accounting for nearly 74 per cent. As the continent's fishery exports had increased three-fold over the past decade, the fishery sector had become a vital source of foreign exchange, job creation and investment potential as well as protein supply. It was generating considerable social and economic benefits, and could be considered one of the healthiest sectors in Africa, with its economic indicators showing positive trends.

At the same time, marine and inland fishery resources were under severe pressure almost everywhere in Africa. Given fiercer competition and increasingly demanding health and ecological standards on world markets, the continent also needed urgent action to sustain and improve its trade position and to speed up technological advances in its fishery sector. As most African countries had no high-sea fishing fleets and shared stocks among several exclusive economic zones, cooperation was essential at the international, regional and subregional levels to negotiate fishing agreements, to evaluate and monitor stocks, to develop regulations for and carry out joint administration and control of fisheries and to meet training needs. The report stated that national and regional development-planning and resource-management efforts had to be urgently reinforced in order to meet those challenges without further endangering the resource base, as well as to solve the complex problems related to the environment and to the unbalanced distribution of expertise, experience and technical and financial resources.

The Secretary-General noted that the framework for sustained international and regional collaboration in fishery management had been laid by the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea⁽⁴⁶⁾ and developed through the Strategy for Fisheries Management and Development, adopted by the World Conference on Fisheries Management and Development in 1984,⁽⁴⁷⁾ and the Regional Convention on Fisheries Cooperation and the Programme of Action, adopted by the Ministerial Conference on Cooperation in Fisheries among the African States Bordering the Atlantic Ocean in 1991.⁽⁴⁸⁾ He underscored the importance of complementarity between such organizations as ECA and FAO for developing effective cooperation in Africa, and pointed to various existing and emerging regional bodies and economic groupings concerned with marine fisheries, which demonstrated the resolve of African countries to strengthen their capabilities for cooperation in this field.

In conclusion, the Secretary-General recommended that African Governments adopt fishery planning and management standards, with greater reliance on subregional approaches, and that regional and subregional coordination mechanisms be reinforced, particularly among groupings and bodies with overlapping fishery management areas. He also recommended that a greater portion of fish export earnings be used for importing the fishing inputs necessary to increase the productivity of small-scale fishermen, and called for the exchange of African expertise as well as more effective use of regional training centres. Other recommendations provided for enhancing and harmonizing relevant statistical and information bases and devising options and strategies for generating maximum social and economic benefits from the various African fishery subsectors.

By decision 47/444 of 22 December, the General Assembly took note of the Secretary-General's report.

A number of regional projects continued to be implemented during the year in several African subregions. A programme on aquaculture for local community development; research projects on applied hydrobiology and on management of the Lake Tanganyika fisheries; and a project for inland fisheries planning, development and management in eastern, central and southern Africa contributed to the development of the Rift Valley fisheries. The development of small-scale fisheries in West Africa was boosted through a project on the integrated development of artisanal fisheries, the reduction of post-harvest losses and the regional fish trade information and cooperation services.

The ECA secretariat held a seminar for North African countries on improved capacity for fishery planning and management, and issued technical publications on ameliorating fishery policies and management, enhancing fishery institutional capacities, and strengthening cooperation for the exploitation and management of shared inland fishery resources. Activities planned as a follow-up to the 1991 Ministerial Conference⁽⁴⁸⁾ included workshops on: the maritime data bank; monitoring, control and surveillance; and institutional options for the establishment of a permanent secretariat for the Conference.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 31 July 1992, on the recommendation of its Economic Committee, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1992/54 without vote.

Environment

In April, the ECA Conference of Ministers endorsed the African Common Position on the African Programme on Environment and Development as a regional input to UNCED. The areas covered in the Programme included food self-sufficiency and security; efficient and equitable use of water resources; management of marine and coastal resources; energy self-sufficiency; control of demographic changes and pressure; development of human settlement planning and management; optimization of industrial production and pollution control; management of biological and bio-technological diversity; mitigation of global warming and climatic change; protection and regeneration of the tropical forest; reversal of desertification; human resources development; popular participation; development of environmental legislation; enhancement of environmental awareness; management of solid and toxic wastes; environmental revival; elimination of poverty; drought monitoring; development of science and technology; health; mitigation of the effects of natural disasters; environmental measures in land-locked countries; and minimization of the effects of refugees on environment and development.

During 1992, the secretariat continued to publish its quarterly Environment Newsletter, and focused on the follow-up of UNCED within the framework of the Conference's main document, Agenda

21.⁽⁴⁹⁾ Its coordination activities were directed towards the EGA-sponsored African Centre of Meteorological Applications for Development in Niamey (Niger). ECA also collaborated with OAU to develop an African approach to negotiations for an international convention on desertification, and maintained contact with non-governmental organizations on matters relating to preparations for UNCED and its follow-up. Advisory services were provided to the Permanent Inter-State Committee on Drought Control in the Sahel and the Intergovernmental Authority on Drought and Development.

Social development and humanitarian affairs

In April, the ECA Conference of Ministers urged its members to give priority to the human dimension and to the implementation of an integrated approach to human resources planning and development within the Regional Framework for Human Resources Development and Utilization in Africa, prepared by a United Nations Inter-Agency Task Force on the subject.⁽⁵⁰⁾ The Ministers also urged UNDP to implement its pilot programme on integrated human resources development, requested the Executive Secretary to carry out the regional pilot programme for the exchange of African experts and called on the Intergovernmental Committee for Migration to increase its support to the ECA's Return of Skills Programme for Africa.

In 1992, the secretariat undertook a number of activities aimed at promoting the development of human resources. It produced technical publications on: trends and issues in African education, focusing on constraints and challenges of education development over the past three decades and Africa's response to them; strategies for increasing the effectiveness of human resources in priority sectors for socio-economic development; and resource mobilization and utilization in higher education institutions. Member States and other interested parties were informed of job vacancies in the region for qualified and trained personnel available for recruitment under the Return of Skills Programme for Africa. The secretariat also issued the Training Information Notice, providing information on ECA training programmes, and prepared publications on non-formal education in Africa and on measures for solving the problem of unemployment among the educated. A national seminar in Nigeria (15-19 June) considered an integrated long-term manpower and employment policy in that country. National training workshops were held on curriculum development and evaluation in Swaziland (18-29 May) and on employment planning and productivity enhancement in Ethiopia (6-10 July). The Ministerial Follow-up Committee of Ten of the Conference of Ministers Responsible for Human Resources Planning, Development and Utilization held its seventh meeting at Addis Ababa (18 and 19 April).

Activities in the field of social programmes and services focused on issues concerning youth, the family and disabled persons. In response to ECA's request, the secretariat undertook a feasibility study on the establishment of an African fund for youth.⁽⁵¹⁾ It issued innovative strategies for dealing with youth unemployment in the region, a directory of youth organizations in Africa and a publication on the interrelationship between youth, health and the continent's development and transformation. As part of its efforts to promote the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons (1983-1992) (see PART THREE, Chapter XI), the secretariat continued to publish the Equal Time newsletter, highlighting activities for and by disabled persons. It prepared a study on the impact of economic and social changes on the African family, and continued to provide technical and substantive support to the United Nations African Institute for the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, in Kampala, Uganda.

Among the international and regional meetings convened by other United Nations bodies in 1992 were a regional meeting on human rights (Tunisia, November), the third biennial meeting of Africa Employment Planners (Arusha, November/December) and an International Conference on African Children (Dakar, Senegal, December). ECA also collaborated with the United Nations system in organizing a meeting on the ramifications of the HIV/AIDS pandemic on the long-term socio-economic development of the region.

Population

The Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole, noting the deteriorating living conditions and physical environment in Africa aggravated by rapid population growth, insufficient and inequitably distributed goods and services, the AIDS pandemic and mass displacement of people as a result of man-made and natural calamities, encouraged African countries to formulate population and development policies aimed at balancing their economic and population growth rates and to integrate them in their development plans. In addition, the Committee urged ECA members to intensify population education programmes from the primary level to the post-formal education stages and to involve both men and women in family-planning programmes and policies.

During the year, the secretariat provided advisory and backstopping services to member States and ECA-sponsored institutions in the field of population, and produced the Demographic Handbook for Africa, 1992, as well as technical publications on strategies for improving contraceptive use to influence demographic trends in African countries; assessment of mortality levels, trends and differentials in selected countries in relation to the goal of health for all by the year 2000; and assessment of the methodology and data from the world fertility and demographic surveys. It held a training workshop on methodologies and uses of subnational and sectoral population projections (Ghana, November/December), and provided advisory services in evaluation analysis and dissemination of data from population censuses, survey and vital registration systems, as well as in formulation execution, assessment of population-related projects and programmes and integration of population factors into development planning and policy formulation.

In preparing for the International Conference on Population and Development, to be held at Cairo, Egypt, in 1994, the secretariat presented a document on major population and environment problems in Africa to an expert group meeting on population, environment and development (New York, 20-24 January), and organized the third African Population Conference (Dakar, 7-12 December). The Conference reviewed implementation of the 1984 Kilimanjaro Programme of Action for African Population and Self-Reliant Development⁽⁵²⁾ and adopted the Dakar/Ngor Declaration on Population, Family and Sustainable Development.⁽⁵³⁾

The Declaration provided a set of 36 recommendations for African Governments pertaining to population, socio-economic growth and sustainable development; family; fertility and family planning; mortality, morbidity and AIDS; urbanization, migration and physical planning; refugees and displaced persons; women in development; children; youth; data collection and analysis, information dissemination, training and research; information, education and communication; and private and non-governmental organizations. Other recommendations were addressed to subregional and regional groupings, ECA, United Nations Fund for Population Activities (UNFPA) and the international community. The Declaration called on African Governments to integrate population policies and programmes in their development strategies and to strengthen the social sectors, giving special attention to environmental issues and food security.

Among the targets set in the Declaration were reducing the annual population growth rate from the prevailing 3 to 2.5 per cent by the year 2000 and to 2 per cent by 2010; increasing average life expectancy at birth for the region to at least 55 years by 2000; decreasing infant mortality to less than 50 per 1,000 and maternal mortality by 50 per cent; and increasing contraceptive prevalence to 20 per cent by 2000 and 40 per cent by 2010.

Human settlements

Activities in the area of human settlements focused on redressing the rural/urban imbalance in the region. In that regard, ECA developed and promoted guidelines for the formulation and implementation of national policies on settlements aimed at balanced spatial distribution of population and economic activities in the context of a sound environment, land reforms, promotion of rural townships and strengthening of the indigenous construction sector. The secretariat organized an ad hoc expert group meeting on the protection of the natural and man-made environment by regulating human settlement development, issued a publication on strengthening the development of intermediate towns and establishing growth poles in African countries, and launched a UNDP-funded field project on the commercial manufacture and use of soil-stabilized blocks in Senegal, fibre concrete roofing tiles in Cameroon and Guinea, and lime in Uganda.

Integration of women in development

In April, the ECA Conference of Ministers endorsed a 1991 proposal to establish a federation of African women entrepreneurs,⁽⁵⁴⁾ and recommended that ECA, along with OAU and AfDB, study the possibility of creating an African Bank for Women. The Ministers appealed to United Nations funding agencies to provide financial, material and technical support for those initiatives.⁽⁵⁵⁾ The Ministers urged member States to revise their legal texts by drafting family codes, strengthening the schooling of young girls, eliminating illiteracy among women, establishing a data bank for women, promoting trade in products produced by women and creating the necessary policy environment for the operation of small and medium-sized enterprises initiated by women. In addition, the Ministers called on States which had not implemented the Abuja Declaration on Participatory Development: The Role of Women in the 1990s, adopted by the 1989 Conference on the Integration of Women in Development and endorsed by the Conference of Ministers in 1990,⁽⁵⁶⁾ to consider taking the necessary steps to do so. By another resolution,⁽⁵⁷⁾ the Ministers urged Governments to ensure the participation of women in all peace initiatives and negotiations at all levels, and supported Uganda's proposal to hold a regional Conference on Women for Peace. By a separate decision,⁽⁵⁸⁾ the Conference of Ministers requested the Secretary-General to appoint an African woman as Secretary-General for the fourth World Conference on Women, to be held in Beijing, China, in September 1995.

The Africa Regional Coordinating Committee for the Integration of Women in Development held its thirteenth meeting (Addis Ababa, 9 and 10 April), and a Franco-African Conference on Women in Development was held in Paris in November. A round table for women in business in eastern and southern Africa (Lusaka, July) recommended strengthening the existing associations of business women in the Preferential Trade Area subregion and establishing a revolving loan fund for that purpose.

The African Training and Research Centre for Women (ATRCW) published guidelines for improving the role of women in production and management in the informal sector and an annotated bibliography on African women in development, as well as two issues of the ATRCW Update newsletter. Other activities included a joint ECA/AfDB/FAO international consultation on increasing rural women's access to credit, and seminars on policies for the promotion of women in development in West Africa and on the elaboration of a rural national plan of action for women in the Niger.

Programme, administrative and organizational questions

Medium-term plan for 1992-1997

In April, the ECA Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole endorsed proposed revisions⁽⁵⁾ to the medium-term plan for 1992-1997,⁽⁶⁾ covering follow-up to UNPAAERD and issues arising from the adoption of UNNADAF; a follow-up to UNCED and UNCTAD VIII; update of the industrial development subprogramme with regard to IDDA II and adjustments to the transport and communications subprogramme to include UNTACDA II; and updating of legislative authorities arising from the Programme of Action for LDCs in the 1990s, endorsed by the General Assembly in 1990.⁽⁵⁹⁾ The revised plan included new subprogrammes on development issues and policies; trade, regional economic cooperation and integration; poverty alleviation through sustainable development; development administration and management; human resources development and social transformation; statistical and information systems development; natural resources and energy development; infrastructural and structural transformation; and women in development.

In October, the Committee for Programme and Coordination (CPC)⁽⁶⁰⁾ further revised the medium-term plan, which the General Assembly adopted by resolution 47/214.

Venue of 1993 session

At its 1992 session, the ECA Conference of Ministers approved Zambia's offer to host the 1993 session of the Conference. On 31 July, by decision 1992/292, the Economic and Social Council decided that the twenty-eighth session of the Commission/nineteenth meeting of the Conference of Ministers should be held at Lusaka in April 1993.

Asia and the Pacific

ESCAP, at its forty-eighth session (Beijing, 14-23 April),⁽¹⁾ had as its theme topic "Regional economic cooperation in the ESCAP region: prospects, priorities and policy options". On 23 April,⁽²⁾ the Commission adopted the Beijing Declaration on Regional Economic Cooperation, in which it set out the following guiding principles to impart new impetus to economic cooperation in the region: to ensure the region's sustained growth and development for the good of its people; to promote economic cooperation on the basis of equality and mutual benefit; to reaffirm ESCAP members' commitment to an open world trading system; to take into account the diversity of the region; and to follow the principles of equality and consensus-building in consultations and dialogue.

The Commission urged that high priority be accorded to promoting intraregional trade and investment, to greater cooperation in science and technology and to the development of infrastructure. In the context of revising its intergovernmental subsidiary structure, the Commission welcomed the establishment of the Committee for Regional Economic Cooperation and directed it to examine trends and developments in the region and develop measures for enhancing regional cooperation.

The Commission adopted a resolution revising its conference structure and frequency of meetings in order to enhance its effectiveness in responding to increasingly complex development problems.⁽³⁾ It also adopted a framework for its own programming and established a subsidiary structure comprising three thematic committees (on regional economic cooperation, on environment and sustainable development and on poverty alleviation through economic growth and social development), two other committees (on statistics and on transport and communications) and two special bodies (on least developed and land-locked developing countries and on Pacific island developing countries). It also set up a high-level steering group for the Committee for Regional Economic Cooperation, abolished the Special Body on Land-locked Countries and amended provisions for convening ad hoc conferences and intergovernmental meetings. The terms of reference of the thematic and other committees and special bodies were annexed to the Commission's resolution.

The Commission invited the ESCAP Executive Secretary, under the direction of the Secretary-General, to reorganize the ESCAP secretariat to enhance the servicing of the Commission's subsidiary structure and to forward to ESCAP members his assessment of the organizational, staffing and financial implications of the revised intergovernmental structure. The Executive Secretary was asked to report to the Commission in 1994 on the implementation of its resolution.

By a resolution on the role and functions of ESCAP in the context of restructuring the economic and social fields of the United Nations,⁽⁴⁾ the Commission, taking note of General Assembly resolution 46/235, which stated that the regional commissions should be strengthened (see PART THREE, Chapter XVIII), directed the Advisory Committee of Permanent Representatives and Other Representatives Designated by Members of the Commission to seek the views of members and associate members on the Assembly resolution, draft a response and submit it for consideration by members and associate members, convey the response to the Assembly through the ESCAP Executive Secretary and report to the Commission in 1993 on the implementation of its resolution.

In other action, the Commission adopted resolutions on the Asian and Pacific Decade of Disabled Persons, 1993-2002; the Fourth Asian and Pacific Population Conference, 1992; the Social Development Strategy for the ESCAP Region Towards the Year 2000 and Beyond; regional cooperation in the implementation of the Jakarta Plan of Action on Human Resources Development in the ESCAP Region; guidelines for consumer protection; problems faced by the transitional disadvantaged economies in the ESCAP region; strengthening ESCAP assistance to the Pacific island countries; the Asia-Pacific International Trade Fair (1994); and road and rail transport modes in relation to facilitation measures. (For further information on those resolutions, see below under subject headings.)

In a message to the session, the Secretary-General said that the end of the cold war provided the international community with an opportunity to lay a basis for balanced and sustained development in all regions of the world. The vigorous economic performance of some Asian and Pacific countries, their remarkable resilience and economic dynamism in the face of serious external and domestic difficulties were an encouraging indication that developing countries could achieve rapid progress. However, a number of economies in the region, particularly the least developed and Pacific island countries, had been unable to achieve significant growth and still needed special support and assistance. A major challenge facing the region in the 1990s was breaking the cycle of stagnation and poverty and ensuring access to opportunities for all, thus reducing the differences within and between countries. The Secretary-General called on the Asian and Pacific nations to make a collective effort to eradicate poverty and illiteracy and to improve social conditions in the region as a prerequisite for sustained economic development.

The ESCAP Executive Secretary noted with satisfaction that, despite the lack of an immediate recovery in the world economy, the region's economic growth rate remained high, although there were considerable variations among countries. Strong growth in intraregional trade and domestic demand played an increasingly important role in overall economic development; however, the resultant growth in imports caused deterioration in the external trade and balance-of-payments situation, and necessitated a quick revival of export demand. As the average per capita income in Asia and the Pacific remained low, the reputed dynamism and prosperity in the region was limited to a small, though expanding, group of countries, while the least developed and Pacific island economies continued to be generally weak.

He noted that poverty remained the region's main challenge, with absolute poverty existing in most developing countries of Asia and the Pacific. Many of them continued to be burdened with high rates of population growth and unbalanced demographic distribution, and their development was seriously hindered by inadequate physical and social infrastructure. In addition, uncontrolled ex-exploitation of natural resources and environmental degradation had become increasingly serious problems. The Executive Secretary urged ESCAP members to formulate appropriate regional strategies in those and other areas.

Pointing to the emergence of regional cooperation arrangements in many parts of the world, he said that enhanced regional cooperation could stimulate accelerated development in an open multilateral trading system, supported by the ESCAP region, and that the Commission could make a strong plea for a speedy and successful conclusion of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 31 July 1992, the Economic and Social Council, by decision 1992/290, approved ESCAP's resolution on restructuring its conference structure.

Economic and social trends

Economic trends

The Economic and Social Survey of Asia and the Pacific, 1992⁽⁵⁾ comprised two volumes: recent economic and social developments in the region, and expansion of investment and intraregional trade as a vehicle for enhancing regional economic cooperation and development.

According to a summary of the survey,⁽⁶⁾ the region sustained high growth performance in 1992, despite an overall sluggishness of the world economy. The average rate of growth for its developing economies was estimated at 6.9 per cent, against 6.1 per cent in 1991. China's growth rate reached 12 per cent, compared with 7.7 per cent in 1991, while India's economy was expected to pick up to slightly above 4 per cent, after a dip to 2.5 per cent in 1991. However, a large number of economies in the region remained weak and fragile after decades of development effort, in a perpetual state of low performance caused by a complex of both long- and short-term factors. With the exception of China, rates of economic growth in East and South-East Asia varied between 5 and 8 per cent, and decreased in some countries. In South Asia, Iran's GDP growth rate was expected to decline to 8 per cent in 1992 from 9.9 per cent in 1991, while Pakistan's increased to 6.4 per cent from 5.6 per cent in 1991. The small island economies of the Pacific were experiencing tightening rather than easing of the usual constraints on their growth and development, and the performance of the region's LDCs, with the exception of Maldives, remained lacklustre in most cases.

In 1992, the three developed economies of the region were at different stages of recession. Australia, whose economy went into full recession in 1991 and experienced negative growth (-1.9 per cent), was undergoing a slow recovery, with the 1992 growth rate estimated at 2.6 per cent. Japan's rate of economic growth (4.5 per cent in 1991) fell to an estimated 1.8 per cent in 1992, the lowest since 1980. Although the easing of monetary policy and fiscal conditions as well as low inflation and expanding export markets had been expected to bring growth back to 2.5 per cent by the end of the year, low personal consumption and corporate investment rates had an adverse impact on the pace of recovery. In New Zealand, GDP fell by 2.1 per cent in 1991. Declining domestic demand caused imports to fall by 6 per cent in 1991, but projections for 1992 showed a modest increase of between 2.5 and 3 per cent. Inflation was projected to decline to around 2 per cent. However, fiscal consolidation suffered a set-back as the recession caused a decrease in tax revenues.

With the exception of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and Mongolia, the economies of East Asia remained geared to a high performance in 1992. Hong Kong's economic growth accelerated from 4.2 per cent in 1991 to an estimated 6 per cent in 1992, and its economy became increasingly linked with that of China. The Republic of Korea, whose GDP grew by 8.4 per cent in 1991, achieved a growth rate of 7.3 per cent in 1992. A reduced growth target had been set by the Government as part of its stabilization policies to reduce inflation and balance-of-payments deficits. Taiwan's growth rate reached 7.3 per cent in 1991 and was projected at 7 per cent for 1992.

The economy of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea grew at an estimated annual rate of 2 to 3 per cent during the first three years of its 1987-1993 plan and contracted in 1990-1991. In Mongolia, which was undergoing a transition from a centrally planned to a market system, GDP continued to fall, declining by 9.2 per cent in 1991 and an estimated 5 per cent in 1992.

The six Central Asian republics of the former USSR, which became members of ESCAP in 1992 (see below), were also experiencing serious problems of transition to a market economy, with losses of output, excessive inflation and rising unemployment, resulting from a breakdown of the centrally planned system, the collapse of trade with the former members of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance, the dissolution of the USSR and price liberalization measures by the Russian Federation. The net material product (NMP), which declined in 1991 by 9.6 per cent in Kazakhstan, 8.7 per cent in Tajikistan, and between 0.6 and 2 per cent in Azerbaijan, Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan, was expected to fall more steeply in 1992.

In South-East Asia, only Singapore experienced a substantial deceleration in its growth rate, from 6.7 per cent in 1991 to 4.7 per cent in 1992, while Viet Nam's GDP was expected to rise from 4 per cent in 1991 to some 7 per cent in 1992. The Philippines succeeded in reversing the 1991 contraction of its economy; however, its growth rate remained at less than 2 per cent in 1992, leading to a further decline in average per capita income. Indonesia's rate of GDP growth slowed to 6.6 per cent in 1991 from 7.1 per cent in 1990, and a further deceleration to 5.9 per cent was projected for 1992. Malaysia's economic growth in 1992 was estimated at 8.5 per cent, compared with 8.6 per cent in 1991. Thailand's economy sustained an overall growth rate of 7.5 per cent in 1992, despite a period of political uncertainty from February 1991 until the general election in September 1992, policy changes such as the introduction of the value-added tax on 1 January 1992, and supply-side constraints emerging from the previous years of rapid growth, which adversely affected consumption and investment activities.

Of the subregion's LDCs, the Lao People's Democratic Republic's GDP growth rate slowed from 6.6 per cent in 1990 to 4 per cent in 1991, largely due to a drought affecting agricultural production. The rate rose to 6 per cent in 1992, as the industrial sector continued to grow rapidly, spurred by liberal reforms in investment, trade and prices. Myanmar's GDP, which achieved a 3.7 per cent growth rate in 1990, decreased its growth to 2.7 per cent in 1991 and to 1.3 per cent in 1992, the result of a decline in agricultural output.

With regard to the five LDCs of South Asia, Afghanistan's economy showed no apparent improvement after the GDP decrease in 1987-1989; its agricultural production index registered a further decline of 6 per cent in 1991. Although GDP in Bangladesh grew at the rate of 4 per cent in 1992 against 3.6 per cent in 1991, agricultural and industrial growth rates were marginally lower than in the previous year. Bhutan's rate of growth was estimated at 4 per cent in 1992, up from just over 3 per cent in 1990 and 1991. The economy of Maldives, which performed exceptionally well during the 1980s, showed an estimated growth rate of 15.1 per cent in 1990 and 8 per cent in 1991, with manufacturing output increasing by 40 per cent between 1987 and 1990. Nepal's GDP increased by only 3.1 per cent in 1992, down from 5.5 per cent for 1991; the non-agricultural sector, however, was expected to grow at the rate of 7 per cent, compared with 5.7 per cent in 1991.

The economies of the Pacific island countries came under severe pressure from recessionary conditions prevailing in the industrialized nations in 1991-1992, especially in Australia and New Zealand. The situation was further compounded by extensive cyclone damage to some of them; however, many of those countries maintained positive rates of growth, although reduced in some cases. Papua New Guinea, with a 9.5 per cent growth in 1991, sharply reversed a cumulative contraction of its economy by more than 4 per cent during the previous two years; for 1992, the rate was estimated at over 5 per cent. Tonga recorded a 3.9 per cent GDP growth in 1991, and its economy was projected to grow by more than 4 per cent in 1992. GDP growth in the Solomon Islands also increased to 3.9 per cent in 1991, but was expected to slow to 3.6 per cent in 1992. Vanuatu registered a growth rate of over 4 per cent in 1991, and the 1992 projections for the industry and service sectors showed a further increase, although the agricultural sector, expected to contract by 11 per cent, was slowing overall economic growth to 2.9 per cent. After its 1991 contraction, the economy of Fiji was expected to rebound in 1992 with a 4.2 per cent growth rate. That of Samoa, however, continued to decline for the third consecutive year, owing to the damage from two highly destructive cyclones in 1990 and 1991.

The nature of the problems faced by the disadvantaged economies of the region varied in both kind and intensity. Of the 13 LDCs, four countries (Afghanistan, Bhutan, Lao People's Democratic Republic and Nepal) suffered the additional disadvantage of being land-locked, while Afghanistan, Cambodia and the Lao People's Democratic Republic also had to cope with difficulties related to their transition to a market system, with the former two remaining the most distressed economically and politically. The six Asian republics of the former USSR had similar problems adjusting to a market system, as their traditional international links had been severed and needed recasting. Six LDCs, including Maldives, were island economies suffering from their smallness, remoteness and openness to international market influences.

Despite the global recession, the international trade of the region's developing countries was buoyant in 1991-1992 as a result of improved production efficiency, low rates of domestic inflation and wage increases, diversification of markets, and consolidated and expanded policy reforms involving trade and investment regimes.

Exports from the region as a whole in 1991 totalled $872.3 billion, representing 25.3 per cent of world exports, compared with $715.4 billion, or 21.1 per cent, in the previous year. The developing economies' share in the regional total was 58 per cent, while their share in world trade reached 15.5 per cent. At the same time, intraregional exports in 1991 rose to $395.1 billion, accounting for 45.3 per cent of the regional total.

Over the period 1975-1991, exports from the ESCAP region grew at 12.1 per cent annually, against the world rate of 8.7 per cent, so that the region had become its own dynamic market. Although the performance of different groups of economies and individual countries varied greatly, the overall situation in intraregional trade was characterized by a decline in the dominant role of the developed countries of the region and an improvement in the position of the newly industrializing economies (NIEs) (Hong Kong, Republic of Korea, Singapore and Taiwan), the four larger countries of the Association of South-East Asian Nations (ASEAN-4) (Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines and Thailand) and China. In 1991, the NIEs' share in the region's exports to world markets rose to 35 per cent and that of China to 8 per cent, while ASEAN-4 accounted for 11.5 per cent and South Asia for about 3.5 per cent of the regional total. At the same time, exports to regional markets from Australia, New Zealand and Japan represented 63.5, 52.6 and 35.5 per cent, respectively, of their global exports.

Regional trade links were also strengthened by investment flows. After 1986, the ESCAP region became the largest recipient of foreign direct investment (FDI) in the developing world, of which more than 90 per cent went to NIEs, ASEAN-4 and China. Although Japan was the most important source of FDI in the region, the United States and the European Community (EC) had a more visible presence in some developing economies, and the investment flow from NIEs to the region also increased significantly, notably to China.

However, intraregional trade and investment expansion encountered a number of constraints. Endogenous obstacles stemmed from three main sources—the macroeconomic environment, regulations of foreign investment and inadequate infrastructural support—which were within the purview of domestic policy. Non-tariff barriers and product standardization requirements imposed by importing countries represented the main exogenous obstructions.

Enhancing regional economic cooperation was an option for stimulating the growth process across the region, as coordinated regional strategies based on export-led growth would encourage more efficient use of capital and capital flows within the region, and expand both intraregional and inter-regional markets. It was essential to direct policy efforts towards removing or easing constraints to the free flow of goods, services and investment; providing decision makers and the business community with information about markets, technologies and investment opportunities; encouraging foreign investment in regional and world, rather than domestic, markets to ensure positive balance-of-payments effects; enhancing, through trade and investment, export capacities in the domestic private sectors of host countries; devising such mechanisms as payment arrangements and capital flows; and according due attention to the problems of the Pacific island countries, LDCs and the economies in transition.

Increasing intraregional linkages in trade and investment also underlined the need for greater macroeconomic consultation, cooperation and synchronization, especially on monetary, fiscal and external commercial issues, as well as a cooperative action to lower trade barriers in the region. The move towards trade liberalization, in its turn, required strengthening the regional transportation and communications infrastructure and removing hindrances in the movement of goods and people. In order to strengthen the operation of the trade-investment nexus in the region and ensure the spread of its beneficial impact to the less dynamic developing economies, the Survey suggested a number of initiatives dealing with increased regional trade information dissemination; establishment of a regional trade-related network of research institutions and a regional investment information and promotion service; regional cooperation in trade in services; human resources development; harmonization of customs procedures; and regional programmes on quality assurance, development of small- and medium-scale enterprises, and special assistance to the economies in transition and to LDCs.

Social trends

The summary of the economic and social survey⁽⁶⁾ noted that the health of the region's 3.1 billion people was one of the most significant issues in social development. Although many more people were enjoying higher living standards, better education and improved social services, poverty and malnutrition still predominated in many parts of Asia and the Pacific, with an estimated 800 million people living below the poverty line in 1990. Infectious and communicable diseases, many associated with substandard living conditions, continued to undermine productivity, while social and economic inequities fueled the vicious circle leading from poverty to malnutrition and disease to loss of employment and productivity, thereby perpetuating poverty. In more developed areas, non-communicable diseases linked to stress and environmental factors became major public health problems. Drug addiction, which earlier existed in a limited form, was threatening to acquire menacing new dimensions, and AIDS was emerging as perhaps the foremost health challenge in the region.

Those problems notwithstanding, life expectancy increased significantly in most developing nations of Asia and the Pacific and, in some countries, almost reached the developed country levels, while infant mortality rates, although still relatively high, declined in all countries. The highest under-five mortality rates of 292 and 193 deaths per 1,000 live births were recorded in 1990 in war-torn Afghanistan and Cambodia; in the same year, Hong Kong and Singapore registered the lowest rates in the region, of 7 and 9, respectively. Maternal mortality rates had also declined, to 50 deaths per 100,000 live births in Sri Lanka and 60 in Thailand by 1988, but remained as high as 1,310 per annum in Bhutan for the period 1980-1990. In the Asian republics of the former USSR, where family-planning services were virtually nonexistent and the frequency of abortions in many communities equalled or exceeded the rate of live births, maternal mortality rates ranged between 40 and 120 per 100,000.

As primary health care was widely recognized as the key to achieving health for all by the year 2000, most countries of the region incorporated health policies in their national development strategies and made concerted efforts to reorient their health systems. The primary-health-care approach sought to meet the needs of all population groups through integrated programmes, multisectoral collaboration and maximum community and individual participation. Most national health-care systems in the region included extended hospital emergency medical care and general public-health services supplemented by a private health sector and a network of health centres with limited ambulatory and home visiting services supported by referral institutions. Steps were also taken to shift emphasis from the curative to the preventive aspects of health care, decentralize services and focus on reaching underserved and vulnerable populations, particularly in rural areas and urban slums.

The percentage of total government expenditure devoted to health services indicated their relative priority over other sectors. As a proportion of gross national product (GNP), however, it was very low for many of the region's developing economies, ranging in 1990 from 0.2 per cent in Pakistan to 2.7 per cent in Papua New Guinea and 2.8 per cent in Vanuatu. The exception was Maldives, which allocated 9.8 per cent of its GNP to the health sector. Yet, regardless of trends in national economic growth and the share of national income allocated to health, the combined effects of inflation and population growth often resulted in declining real public spending for health per capita, and vast amounts of additional resources were required to ensure improvements in the health status and well-being of the region's population.

In addition to resource allocation considerations, the critical role of population growth for attaining the goals of economic development and health for all demanded greater attention. The average annual population growth rate in the region was 1.7 per cent, which translated to an additional 53 million people each year. Most countries were taking steps to control their population growth through the promotion of integrated family-planning and health programmes, but integration efforts often left much to be desired. In the absence of an adequately integrated approach, family-planning programmes could divert resources from other sectors having a bearing on fertility determinants and ultimately on health and population growth.

Activities in 1992

Development policy and regional economic cooperation

During 1992, ESCAP prepared a theme study on prospects, priorities and policy options for regional cooperation.⁽⁷⁾ The report, which examined policy options for strengthening regional cooperation in the areas of investment and development finance, complementarities and intraregional trade, science and technology, and infrastructure development, was discussed at ESCAP's 1992 session⁽¹⁾ in the debate leading up to the adoption of the Beijing Declaration (see above). The Commission also devoted attention to activities in support of the developing Asian and Pacific nations, as well as to policy reforms and economic restructuring efforts under way in many countries of the region, including social consequences of those measures and the problems of economies in transition to a market system.

The newly established Committee for Regional Economic Cooperation held its first session at Bangkok, Thailand, on 19 October and from 22 October to 2 November 1992⁽⁸⁾ to discuss modalities for implementing its mandate. The Committee's Steering Group, at its first meeting (New Delhi, India, 24-27 November),⁽⁹⁾ adopted an action programme for regional economic cooperation in trade and investment, giving high priority to a macro study on intraregional trade patterns and a study on sectoral inflows of FDI. The programme also provided for a number of subsidiary studies addressing particular issues of regional concern, such as the outcome of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations, trade regimes in manufactures and non-tariff barriers. It incorporated recommendations for strengthening the regional trade expansion infrastructure, including ESCAP's Regional Trade Information Network and a network of trade-related research institutions, and for promoting standardization and quality control in the manufacturing process. The action programme further called for the establishment of a regional investment information and promotion service, and focused on the development of small and medium-sized enterprises and cooperation among them; trade, investment and environmental issues; regional cooperation in assisting the economies in transition to overcome macroeconomic problems and requirements for their integration into the region; and inter-subregional cooperation. The action programme would be given final consideration by the Committee for Regional Economic Cooperation in 1993.

Implementation of the Programme of Action for LDCs

In contrast to the overall dynamism of the ESCAP region, the socio-economic conditions of LDCs continued to deteriorate, mainly due to their chronic structural weakness and fragile economic base. The uncertain global economic environment, mounting obstacles faced by exports from LDCs, a heavy debt burden and other external shocks and natural disasters added to their difficulties. Several countries also faced major dislocations stemming from wars, civil unrest and ethnic strife, and had to cope with serious economic, social and humanitarian problems created by large masses of refugees and displaced persons.⁽¹⁰⁾ As a consequence, the GDP growth rate of the least developed and land-locked developing countries of Asia and the Pacific as a group fell below 1 per cent in 1991, impeding progress in implementing the Programme of Action for LDCs for the 1990s, adopted in 1990 by a United Nations conference (known as the Paris Conference⁽¹¹⁾ and endorsed by the General Assembly later that year.⁽¹²⁾

However, there were substantial differences in individual country performance, from Afghanistan, which was plagued by a series of calamities, to countries like Bhutan and Maldives, which registered significant economic gains in recent years. Generally, low growth characterized the economies of Bangladesh, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Myanmar and Nepal, and growth was marginal or slowing down in the Pacific island LDCs, except for Kiribati. In an effort to reactivate their development process, the least developed and land-locked developing countries of the region launched far-reaching reform programmes, ranging from improved policies for development and modernization of the economic base to mobilization and effective use of domestic resources. Measures were taken to enhance the efficiency of the private sector, strengthen human and institutional capabilities, promote private initiative for development, foster motivation and participation of the population and link poverty alleviation to environmental concerns. Bangladesh, the Lao People's Democratic Republic and Nepal also adopted structural adjustment policies to strengthen their competitiveness and raise their actual and potential growth rates. Many LDCs undertook unilateral trade liberalization measures; however, they needed to be matched by supportive action of their trading partners.

Efforts by LDCs needed to be complemented by external support measures, particularly official development assistance (ODA), as envisaged in the Programme of Action for the 1990s. While ODA resources played a vital role in building social and physical infrastructure in those countries, stagnation and decline in ODA flows in the early 1990s remained a matter of considerable concern and fueled the need for donor nations to increase substantially their assistance. There was also a need for strengthened international efforts to alleviate the debt burden of LDCs, as well as for expanded activities enabling those countries to exploit fully the special treatment offered to them under the generalized system of preferences (GSP) schemes (see PART THREE, Chapter IV). The special problems of LDCs were also considered by other United Nations bodies (see PART THREE, Chapter I).

Special problems of Pacific island countries

A note by the ESCAP secretariat to the Commission⁽¹³⁾ described the special barriers to development unique to Pacific island countries, such as smallness of land area, geographical fragmentation and isolation, great vulnerability to natural disasters and lack of human and natural resources

The Commission, noting those constraints, endorsed the need for technology-intelligence services and training, emphasizing an intercountry approach to supplement national arrangements and to take advantage of economies of scale and economic diversity. It expressed concern at the decline in technical assistance activities for those countries and urged the secretariat to reverse that trend. The Commission also noted with gratification financial assistance and expert services provided by Australia, France, Japan and New Zealand to the ESCAP Pacific Operations Centre, and welcomed announcements by France of its provision of a replacement expert and by Australia of possible funding of the post of statistical adviser.

The ESCAP Pacific Operations Centre continued to discharge its technical assistance activities in the Pacific. During the year, Australia, France and the Republic of Korea provided personnel to the Centre in the areas of statistics, macroeconomics and planning, and trade promotion, respectively. A number of countries, namely Australia, China, France, Indonesia, Japan, Kiribati, Micronesia, Papua New Guinea, the Philippines and the Republic of Korea, pledged financial support for the Pacific Trust Fund, which was established to ensure the participation of Pacific island countries in ESCAP's annual sessions. The Commission appealed to ESCAP members for financial assistance to the Fund to transform it into a self-supporting endowment body.

On 23 April,⁽¹⁴⁾ the Commission asked the ESCAP Executive Secretary to redeploy three Professional staff members from ESCAP headquarters to the Pacific Operations Centre in Vanuatu for three years commencing in 1993. Those staff members would complement the available expertise at the Centre and provide assistance in economic and financial management, structural adjustment and economic reform; social development problems stemming from economic adjustment and reform programmes; and market development and trade promotion.

Other United Nations bodies also considered the problems of island developing countries (see PART THREE, Chapter I).

By resolution 47/186, the General Assembly appealed to the international community to assist island developing countries and, by resolution 47/189, decided to convene, in 1994, a global conference on the sustainable development of small island developing States.

ESCAP transition economies

On 23 April,⁽¹⁵⁾ the Commission welcomed several Asian Republics of the Commonwealth of Independent States (Azerbaijan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and Turkmenistan) as new members (see below). Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan also joined ESCAP in 1992. Taking into account that the early stabilization of the social and economic situation in those countries, which were facing problems of transition from centrally planned to market economies, coincided with the interests of ESCAP members, the Commission recommended that activities relating to countries with transitional disadvantaged economies should be included in ESCAP's programme of work as soon as possible and that the medium-term plan for 1992-1997 should be revised to take their needs into account. The secretariat was asked to provide consultancy and technical assistance in economic reform, structural adjustment and the social development problems that accompanied economic reform. The Commission recommended that the Executive Secretary ask for voluntary contributions to enable the full participation of the transitional economies in ESCAP meetings and invited ESCAP members to contribute generously and promptly.

Economic and technical cooperation

During 1992, ESCAP received $19.5 million in contributions to implement its technical cooperation activities, 23 per cent less than in 1991.⁽¹⁶⁾ The decrease was mainly due to reduced funding by UNDP. Also in 1992, donor States and developing member countries provided 300.25 work-months of expert services, compared with 388 in 1991. The Project Review Committee considered 135 new project proposals for bilateral funding in 1993 (compared with 111 in 1991), and recommended 94 of them, totalling $10 million, for approval and submission to potential donors. A corps of 10 regional advisers undertook 37 missions to 26 developing countries of the region.

The Commission urged its secretariat to exert further efforts to promote ECDC/TCDC (economic and technical cooperation among developing countries), particularly to enhance the availability of information on TCDC potential and opportunities for the benefit of the least developed, land-locked and island developing countries, and endorsed a proposal to conduct a TCDC survey on the needs of those countries. It urged members of ESCAP and other donors to contribute to the ESCAP TCDC supplementary fund in order to expand operational TCDC activities in the region. In total, the secretariat implemented more than 80 ECDC/TCDC activities, comprising 12 study tours in specific areas of interest to ESCAP members, 18 workshops and seminars and 3 demonstration projects to promote further cooperation. With the support of China, the Netherlands, Norway and the Republic of Korea to the ESCAP TCDC supplementary fund, the secretariat supported 33 operational TCDC activities, 10 of which were for the benefit of the least developed, land-locked and island developing countries. Fields of interest included agriculture, natural resources development, industry and human settlements, the environment, population, social development and science and technology.

International trade and finance

In 1992, although there was an emerging global consensus on liberalization of international trade and investment regimes, trade barriers persisted and non-tariff barriers proliferated in areas that were comparatively advantageous to developing countries.

In November,⁽⁹⁾ the Steering Group of the Committee for Regional Economic Cooperation adopted an action programme for regional economic cooperation in trade and investment (see above, under "Development policy and regional economic cooperation"). Other major activities in 1992 included the Intergovernmental Meeting on Policy Issues and Measures Arising from the Effects of Graduation under GSP (Bangkok, 28-30 January), the ESCAP/UNCTAD/UNDP Expert Group Meeting on a Regional Investment Information and Promotion Service for Asia and the Pacific (Seoul, Republic of Korea, 23-25 June) and the Inter-country Consultation on Trade in the Asia-Pacific Region (New Delhi, 11 and 12 August). The secretariat fielded a joint ESCAP/Asian Development Bank advisory mission to newly independent Asian republics of the former USSR, and provided technical assistance in such areas as commodities, intraregional trade and investment, including in the mineral sector; market and product diversification; trade facilitation; trade expansion in manufactures; and promotion of exports, including the Asian International Silk Fair '92 (Dusseldorf, Germany, 6-9 September).

On 23 April,⁽¹⁷⁾ the Commission decided that the fifth Asia-Pacific International Trade Fair would be held in Beijing in 1994. It asked the ESCAP Executive Secretary to assist the Fair and to approach the UNDP Administrator and bilateral donors for financial support for it. The Commission called on Governments of ESCAP members and associate members to support the Fair and to encourage their industrial and commercial organizations to participate in it.

Consumer protection

On 23 April,⁽¹⁸⁾ the Commission commended the Executive Secretary on ESCAP's efforts to promote the implementation of the guidelines for consumer protection adopted by the General Assembly in 1985.⁽¹⁹⁾ The Executive Secretary was asked, in cooperation with non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and relevant parts of the United Nations system, to promote implementation of the guidelines, initiate activities to follow up on the recommendations of a 1990 regional seminar on consumer protection for Asia and the Pacific and to seek extrabudgetary contributions for that purpose.

Transnational corporations

The potential contribution of transnational corporations (TNCs) to the socio-economic development of many developing countries in the region was recognized by the Commission, which, at its April session, stressed the need for greater regional cooperation to attract foreign investment in Asia and the Pacific. However, ESCAP expressed concern at the environmental impact of TNC activities in host countries, and noted that joint action was needed to solve those problems.

During the year, the ESCAP/TCMD (United Nations Transnational Corporations and Management Division) Joint Unit on Transnational Corporations continued efforts to facilitate mutually beneficial linkages through a better understanding of TNCs and their impact on host countries in Asia and the Pacific, and to provide policy recommendations and assist the region's developing countries in attracting foreign investment. The Joint Unit continued to prepare policy recommendations for publication and distribution among members of ESCAP, and to collect data on FDI in the region for a World Investment Directory to be published by the Division (see also PART THREE, Chapter V).

Transport and communications

ESCAP's major achievement in the transport and communications area in 1992 was the formulation of the regional action programme for phase II (1992-1996) of the Transport and Communications Decade for Asia and the Pacific (see below). The secretariat continued to develop computer models and manuals for strengthening national capabilities in transport research and planning, focusing particularly on shipping and ports. It also intensified efforts to implement the integrated project on Asian land transport infrastructure development, comprising the Asian Highway, the Trans-Asian Railway and the facilitation of land transport projects.

In addition, the secretariat fielded a number of route survey missions to selected countries in the region and fact-finding missions to the newly independent Asian republics, and provided advisory services on transit transport facilitation to several land-locked countries. It continued assistance in national capacity-building for multimodal transport by providing training for national trainers and in developing and improving information and statistical systems on inland water transport and upgrading dredging capabilities. In support of environmental development, the secretariat issued two publications relating to the environmental impact of dredging and port development and successfully completed a five-year demonstration project in Karachi, Pakistan, on the use of compressed natural gas in urban transport.

Other activities included a subregional seminar on performance improvement of inter-island shipping (Suva, Fiji, 12-15 May) a seminar-cum-study tour on commercial aspects of railway modernization (Tokyo, Sendai and Hokodate, Japan, 20-27 October) and a regional expert group meeting on utilization of compressed natural gas in urban transport (Karachi, 30 and 31 December). ESCAP also organized a number of country-level workshops on various aspects of transport and communications.

On 23 April,⁽²⁰⁾ the Commission adopted a resolution on road and rail transport modes in relation to facilitation measures, in which it recommended that countries of the region that had not yet done so consider acceding to a number of transport-related international conventions. It also recommended that the ESCAP secretariat examine the needs of countries or groups of countries in relation to the adoption of facilitation measures in road and rail transport, provide advisory services and convene expert group meetings to consider problems, bottlenecks and facilitation measures in that area.

Transport and Communications Decade for Asia and the Pacific

The second session of the Meeting of Ministers Responsible for Transport and Communications (Bangkok, 3-5 June)⁽²¹⁾ considered a regional action programme for phase II (1992-1996) of the Transport and Communications Decade for Asia and the Pacific, 1985-1994.⁽²²⁾ In preparation for the meeting, a meeting of senior government officials was held on 1 and 2 June. The Decade covered the area of two regional commissions, ESCAP and ESCWA. In 1991,⁽²³⁾ the Assembly changed the period of the Decade's second quinquennium to 1992-1996 to coincide with the period of the medium-term plan (1992-1997).

The Ministers emphasized the importance of strengthening the transport network of the region and the elimination of missing links and non-physical barriers, as well as the promotion of greater private-sector participation in transport and communications infrastructure development and services. They endorsed the following issues for the action programme: institutional development; transport and communications operations; human resources development; multimodal transport and logistics; commercialization of transport and communications operations; environment, health and safety in transport; and urban transport.

On 5 June, the Ministers adopted a declaration and officially launched phase II of the Decade. The report of its meeting was submitted to the Economic and Social Council.⁽²⁴⁾

During 1992, the ESCAP secretariat carried out two missions to Amman, Jordan, for consultations with the ESCWA secretariat on developing inter-regional projects within the framework of the Decade. The secretariat also began implementing some regional action programme activities. The first meeting of the Inter-agency Steering Committee on Phase II of the Decade was held at Geneva from 2 to 4 December.

In response to a 1984 request of the Economic and Social Council,⁽²⁵⁾ the Secretary-General in June submitted to the Council a biennial report on implementation of the Decade.⁽²⁶⁾ The report described activities undertaken by ESCAP and the conclusions of the 1991 mid-term review of the Decade,⁽²⁷⁾ as well as preparations for Phase II. The report went on to describe activities undertaken by the ESCWA secretariat, as the Western Asia region was also covered by the Decade.

By decision 1992/295 of 31 July, the Council took note of the Secretary-General's report and of the report of the Meeting of Ministers.

Tourism

International tourism in Asia and the Pacific grew at rates higher than in other regions of the world. It became a principal source of foreign exchange for a number of countries and played a significant role in generating employment opportunities. In 1992, the Commission suggested that the secretariat expand its assistance to tourism projects at the country level and continue to assist members and associate members in collecting data on the impact of tourism on economic development. The secretariat's work programme emphasized research on the economic, socio-cultural and environmental impact of tourism, as well as human resources development, tourism marketing, promotion of tourism investment and regional and subregional cooperation in tourism development.

During the year, the secretariat continued to assist developing countries of the region in deriving greater socio-economic benefit from the planned and systematic development of tourism. Research studies were prepared on the impact of tourism on the national economy and the environment in Bangladesh, Pakistan, the Republic of Korea and Sri Lanka. Other activities included advisory services on tourism promotion and the dissemination of technical information and data on tourism development through the ESCAP Tourism Review and the ESCAP Tourism Newsletter.

Industrial and technological development

At its 1992 session, the Commission adopted the Seoul Plan of Action for Promoting Industrial Restructuring in Asia and the Pacific, which it had welcomed at its 1991 session.⁽²⁸⁾

The Seoul Plan of Action (1992-2001) served as a basis for the Regional Strategy and Action Plan for Industrial and Technological Development, adopted by the Meeting of Ministers of Industry and Technology (Tehran, Iran, 28 and 29 June).⁽²⁹⁾ The meeting, which was preceded by a preparatory meeting of senior officials (Tehran, 23-25 June), was held in conjunction with the Industrial and Technological Exhibition (23-29 June). A private-sector symposium was held on 26 June. The Meeting also adopted the Tehran Declaration on Strengthening Regional Cooperation for Technology-led Industrialization in Asia and the Pacific.

The main objective of the regional strategy was to enhance the quality and pace of national industrial and technological developments and, through its multiplier effects on other sectors, stimulate the growth and expansion of trade, transport and communications, services, human resources development and agriculture. Its key elements included national and regional facilities, trade and investment, science and technology, problems and issues of disadvantaged economies, development of small and medium-scale industries and improvement of the public sector, the environment, women in industry and technological development, human resources development, and cooperation with the United Nations and other international organizations.

The Tehran Declaration called for further strengthening of regional cooperation to accelerate industrialization in Asia and the Pacific, urged members of ESCAP to take the action necessary for this purpose, and identified areas for such action.

During the year, the secretariat provided assistance to LDCs and the newly independent Asian republics in strengthening national capacity for industrial and technological development, and organized training workshops on industrial project preparations and management. Major activities included a training workshop on industrial projects preparation and management for LDCs and island developing countries of the region (Bangkok, 14-26 September) and a training workshop on industrial project preparation and management for private-sector representatives from selected LDCs, island developing countries and transitional disadvantaged economies of the region (Bangkok, 8-15 December).

Asian and Pacific Development Centre

The Asian and Pacific Development Centre (APDC), in implementing its fifth phase work programme (1991-1994), carried out 16 projects during 1992 in its seven programme areas: energy planning, industrial development, information technology, poverty alleviation, public management, regional cooperation, and women in development. Six projects were funded by UNDP and 10 by other countries and agencies, including such major bilateral donors as Australia, Canada, the Netherlands and Sweden. Total funds available to APDC for 1992 amounted to $3 million, an increase of 22.2 per cent over 1991. The increase was mainly due to an increase in Malaysia's contribution. Malaysia, the host Government, had also provided additional grants for upgrading the Centre's facilities. By the end of the year, 188 institutions from 33 countries, including 10 from outside the region, were associated with APDC networks.

Natural resources and marine affairs

Mineral resources

During 1992, many developing countries in the ESCAP region initiated nationwide resource assessment programmes for the discovery and development of their mineral endowments. The ESCAP secretariat assisted members in attracting foreign investment in the mining industry.

Regional mineral assessment programmes were continued in 1992 on important mineral commodities such as epithermal gold mineralization, non-metallic and fertilizer minerals and construction materials. The secretariat focused its activities on geological resource assessment in selected countries of the region, and provided assistance in formulating national mineral development strategies, integrating geoscientific knowledge in land-use planning and applying environmental geology to sustainable development in urban centres and in the Asian and Pacific new economic zones. Other activities during the year included a seminar on future directions in mineral resources development in LDCs (Bangkok, 29 June-1 July), a workshop on a mineral information database system for the ESCAP region and installation of four country databases (Colombo, Sri Lanka, 20-25 July) and a workshop-cum-study tour on industrial minerals development (Nagoya, Japan, 27 August-2 September).

The 1992 activities of the Committee for Coordination of Joint Prospecting for Mineral Resources in Asian Offshore Areas (CCOP) in the areas of energy and minerals included work on oil and gas management, application of computer technology to map compilation, and interpretation of geological and geophysical data.

Water resources

ESCAP activities in 1992 in the area of water resources included the continued TCDC programme and a study on the assessment of water resources and water demand by user sectors in Thailand. The Interagency Task Force on Water for Asia and the Pacific met at Bangkok (15 May and 19 November), as did a workshop on testing the training modules on women, water supply and sanitation (21-25 September).

Marine affairs

In the marine affairs area, attention was directed to the problems of managing and developing coastal zones. The ESCAP secretariat continued to promote the establishment of a new ocean regime within the framework of the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea⁽³⁰⁾ (see PART FIVE, Chapter III) by assisting member countries to develop an integrated and multisectoral marine policy with special emphasis on the protection of the marine environment to achieve sustainable development. A number of training courses, workshops and advisory missions related to applied geosciences and coastal zone management were organized by CCOP, including a seminar on the removal and disposal of obsolete offshore installations and structures in the exclusive economic zone and the continental shelf (Jakarta, Indonesia, 25-28 May).

Mekong River basin development

The Committee for Coordination of Investigations of the Lower Mekong Basin⁽³¹⁾ had, since 1978, functioned with interim status without the participation of Cambodia. Cambodia rejoined the Committee in November 1991, allowing full operations in that country to be resumed. In 1992, the Committee initiated consultations among the four riparian States (Cambodia, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Thailand and Viet Nam) on its future role, mandate, structure and operations. Substantial progress was made at the Committee's meeting in October (Hong Kong). At a December meeting (Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia), the four countries approved the Committee's 1993 work programme and agreed on basic principles for future cooperation and on the modality for elaborating a new cooperative framework.

New donor commitments for the Committee totalled more than $17 million in 1992, compared with an average of $8 to $12 million during the previous decade. During 1991 and 1992, Austria, Canada and Denmark joined or rejoined the Committee's donor community.

Energy

In 1992, activities under the UNDP-funded Regional Energy Development Programme included a regional workshop on sectoral energy demand studies and energy scenarios, a workshop on co-generation and advisory missions to Cambodia on training for power sector rehabilitation and to Viet Nam on the use of computers in power system management. However, operational activities were greatly curtailed compared with the previous biennium, as UNDP had temporarily suspended support.

TCDC activities were conducted between China and Sri Lanka and Viet Nam in wind energy technology, and between Thailand and China, India, the Republic of Korea and Viet Nam in acid rain and emissions, while Australia funded a project on environmentally sound coal utilization. In October, missions were fielded to China, India and Japan to collect information and hold discussions on clean coal technology. In a concerted effort to promote the enhancement of energy efficiency, ESCAP, together with the other regional commissions, initiated the Global Energy Efficiency 21 project, as follow-up to the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII.).

A workshop on the legal framework for co-generation of electricity and process heat (Bangkok, 30 June-2 July) was organized jointly by ESCAP and the German Agency for Technical Cooperation.

Agricultural and rural development

During 1992, ESCAP activities in agriculture and rural development continued to focus on the alleviation of rural poverty, integrated rural development and interdivisional, inter-agency and multisectoral activities. The ESCAP/FAO/UNIDO Fertilizer Advisory, Development and Information Network for Asia and the Pacific carried out national and regional training programmes in India, Indonesia, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Nepal, Thailand and Viet Nam under the regional fertilizer distribution and marketing assistance programme and the project on environmentally friendly fertilizer use. The agricultural requisites scheme for Asia and the Pacific continued to collect pesticide index information and launched, in April, a project to create a database on pesticides and the environment, funded by ECE. Field work on employment strategies to involve the rural poor in income-generating activities was continued in Bangladesh, Nepal and Viet Nam as part of an inter-agency programme within the framework of the Inter-agency Coordinated Plan of Action for Integrated Rural Development in the ESCAP Region.

Other activities included an expert group meeting on a centre on rival enterprises (Beijing, 13-15 May) and a meeting of the Inter-agency Task Force on Integrated Rural Development for Asia and the Pacific (Bangkok, 26 August).

Science and technology

ESCAP continued its activities aimed at strengthening technological capabilities and institutional infrastructure for science and technology in its member States. It accorded high priority to the transfer and diffusion of technology, especially with regard to energy conservation and renewable sources of energy, as well as to biotechnology and information technology. It provided advisory services to the region's LDCs to improve their capability to import technology. In the field of biotechnology, special importance was placed on greater regional cooperation, women's involvement in development, the transfer and adaptation of technology and the extension of biotechnology to small-scale farmers.

The Governing Board of the Asian and Pacific Centre for Transfer of Technology held its seventh session at New Delhi on 27 and 28 November.⁽³²⁾ The Centre's main activity continued to be a UNDP-supported project on technology transfer and management with particular relevance to clean technologies. Workshops included one on the identification and formulation of intercountry projects in the field of biotechnology (Taejon, Republic of Korea, 14-18 September) and a regional training workshop on the application and extension of the technology atlas (Bangkok, 14-18 December).

Remote sensing

The second phase of the UNDP-funded ESCAP Regional Remote Sensing Programme was completed on 30 June 1992. It began to function as a regular budget programme activity within ESCAP and included seminars, short- and long-term training activities and information exchange. The Programme maintained a national focal points network covering 30 member countries, a regional information service network in 17 countries and an education and training network in 17 countries of the region. Technical advisory assistance was strengthened with the appointment of a regional adviser on remote sensing and geographic information systems. The Programme's activities helped update and maintain a higher standard in the application of space remote sensing and geographic information systems for the sustainable development of environmental resources in Asia and the Pacific.

Social development

Activities in the area of social development focused on implementing the Social Development Strategy for the ESCAP Region towards the Year 2000 and Beyond. On 23 April,⁽³³⁾ the Commission welcomed the Strategy's adoption in 1991⁽³⁴⁾ by the Fourth Ministerial Conference on Social Welfare and Social Development and urged all members and associate members to take early action to implement it. It called on donor countries and funding agencies, United Nations bodies and specialized agencies and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to provide substantive and financial support. The Commission requested the Executive Secretary to examine modalities for implementing the Strategy, convene a meeting of experts to obtain advice on the matter and establish an inter-agency task force to promote intersectoral participation and ensure effective coordination of the United Nations system in implementing the Strategy; establish a forum of concerned NGOs to promote their participation; convene in 1994 a regional conference of senior government officials, United Nations bodies and agencies and other organizations to review progress achieved towards attaining the Strategy's aims and objectives; and prepare a progress report for submission to the Fifth Asian and Pacific Ministerial Conference on Social Welfare and Social Development to be held in 1996.

As requested by the Commission, an expert group meeting on implementation of the Social Development Strategy was held at Bangkok from 8 to 11 December, and the Inter-agency Task Force meeting on the Strategy's implementation was held, also at Bangkok, on 14 December. An expert group meeting on a survey of the quality of life in the ESCAP region met twice in 1992 (Seoul, 11-15 August; Bangkok, 26-30 October).

In the social development field, in addition to activities in the areas of human resources development, assistance to disabled persons, population, human settlements and women (see below),

ESCAP organized a number of meetings on drug abuse control and the special problems of youth and the elderly. They included a Pacific subregional workshop on the training of trainers in rural and urban youth work (Honiara, Solomon Islands, 5-19 July), a community-level training course on the development of integrated community-based approaches to drug abuse demand reduction (Manila, 2-6 September; Kandhala, India, 18-24 September; Bangkok, 26-30 October; Manila, 4-8 November), a meeting to design country studies on policies and programmes concerning the integration of elderly persons in development (Bangkok, 29 September-2 October) and a seminar on the effects of new technologies on the working life of young people (Zhuhai, China, 20-24 October).

The ESCAP secretariat held an expert group meeting to examine and advise on the modalities for implementing the regional strategy on social development and established an inter-agency task force on its implementation. Advisory services were provided to assist Governments and NGOs in planning and delivering social services, in strengthening demand-reduction activities to fight drug abuse and in crime prevention and criminal justice. The secretariat also contributed to strengthening a regional network of national focal points on drug abuse demand reduction, extending community-based action on drug abuse to the border area of two countries in the region and developing integrated community-based approaches to tackle the problem through information collection and pilot planning and training workshops.

Human resources development

On 23 April,⁽³⁵⁾ the Commission called on all its members and associate members to intensify their efforts to promote human resources development by implementing the 1988 Jakarta Plan of Action on Human Resources Development in the ESCAP Region.⁽³⁶⁾ All bilateral and multi-lateral development partners were invited to support and participate in the regional initiative, and UNDP was urged to provide adequate funding. The Commission requested the Executive Secretary to continue to provide support to the activities of the ESCAP Network of National Focal Points for Human Resources Development, particularly in strengthening linkages among government agencies and between them and NGOs and the private sector; adopting an integrated approach to human resources development; building a human resources development information base; promoting the training of public sector and NGO personnel in human resources development-related skills; enhancing public awareness of human resources development as elaborated in the Jakarta Plan of Action; establishing, in each country and area, a national advisory mechanism to provide conceptual guidance to human resources development initiatives at the national level; and monitoring and evaluating the Jakarta Plan of Action's implementation. He was also asked to prepare standardized procedures for use by Governments in monitoring and evaluating the implementation of the Plan of Action, review the status of its implementation, convene an expert group meeting to re-examine the Plan of Action with a view to refining it to ensure its continued relevance, and refine it in conformity with the findings of that expert group for submission to the Commission in 1994.

As requested, the ESCAP secretariat developed guidelines to assist in the systematic monitoring and evaluation of the Jakarta Plan of Action and initiated a project to involve the business sector in skills-training programmes to enhance the productivity of the rural poor.

Disabled persons

On 23 April,⁽³⁷⁾ the Commission proclaimed the Asian and Pacific Decade of Disabled Persons, 1993-2002, with a view to giving fresh impetus to implementing the 1982 World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons⁽³⁸⁾ (see also PART THREE, Chapter XI) in the ESCAP region beyond 1992 and strengthening regional cooperation to resolve issues affecting the achievement of the World Programme of Action's goals, especially those concerning the full participation and equality of persons with disabilities. The Economic and Social Council and General Assembly were asked to endorse the Commission's resolution and to encourage support for its implementation. The Commission urged all members and associate members to review the situation of disabled persons in their countries and areas, with a view to developing measures to enhance their equality and full participation, including: formulating and implementing national policies and programmes to promote the participation of disabled persons in economic and social development; establishing and strengthening national coordinating committees on disability matters; assisting in enhancing community-based support services for disabled persons and their families; and promoting special efforts to foster positive attitudes towards children and adults with disabilities, and undertaking measures to improve their access to rehabilitation, education, employment, cultural and sports activities and the physical environment. The Commission urged members of the United Nations system to examine their ongoing programmes and projects in the region with a view to integrating disability concerns into their work programmes. It called on NGOs to utilize their experience and expertise to strengthen the capabilities and activities of organizations of disabled persons, and urged the latter organizations to cooperate with government agencies in helping disabled citizens to realize their full potential and in strengthening linkages among disabled persons in developed and developing countries to enhance their self-help capacity. The Executive Secretary was asked to assist members and associate members to develop and pursue national programmes of action during the Decade and to formulate and implement technical guidelines and legislation to promote access by disabled persons to buildings, public facilities, transport and communications systems, information, education and training, and technical aids. He was also asked to report to the Commission biennially until the Decade's end on progress made in implementing the resolution.

During 1992, the ESCAP secretariat fostered regional support for implementing the resolution by preparing case-studies and technical guidelines on promoting non-handicapping environments for disabled and elderly persons. It also published a directory of self-help organizations of disabled persons and reports on a series of national training workshops. A meeting to launch the Asian and Pacific Decade of Disabled Persons, 1993-2002, was held at Beijing from 1 to 5 December, and the Sixth Meeting of the Asia-Pacific Inter-organizational Task Force on Disability-related Concerns was held at Bangkok on 1 September.

By decision 1992/289 of 31 July, the Economic and Social Council endorsed the Commission's resolution proclaiming the Decade. By resolution 47/88 of 16 December, the General Assembly welcomed the Commission's proclamation.

Population

On 23 April,⁽³⁹⁾ the Commission called on member and associate member Governments to review and appraise population trends and policies in their countries and areas in order to report to the Fourth Asian and Pacific Population Conference to be held later in the year. It urged them to participate, at the ministerial level, in its deliberations, which were aimed at determining goals, strategies and directions for the achievement of sustainable development in the twenty-first century. The Executive Secretary was asked to undertake follow-up activities based on the Conference's recommendations and provide assistance to members in implementing those recommendations. He was also asked to present the Conference's findings to the International Conference on Population and Development to be held in 1994.

The Fourth Asian and Pacific Population Conference was held in two parts at Bali, Indonesia: a meeting of senior officials (19-24 August) followed by a ministerial meeting (26 and 27 August).⁽⁴⁰⁾ The Preparatory Committee for the Conference held its third session, also at Bali, from 16 to 18 August.

The Conference reviewed the population situation in the region and adopted the Bali Declaration on Population and Sustainable Development,⁽⁴¹⁾ which included a set of 67 recommendations on policy and programme development, population data and policy research, information and population awareness and human resources development in population. It also formulated proposals on follow-up strategies for consideration by the Commission in 1993, which included activities to improve the awareness and understanding of population and sustainable development issues among planners, policy makers and programme managers; the data, information and knowledge base relating to population, use of resources, the environment, development and their interrelationships; the policies, plans and programmes reflective of those linkages; the implementation, monitoring and evaluation of those programmes; and the national skills to respond effectively to the emerging challenges.

Other ESCAP activities in the area of population in 1992 included training on management, analysis and synthesis of population data and information (Bangkok, 4-15 May), an expert group meeting on population change, women's role and status, and development (Bangkok, 12-15 May), a study programme on technology and management of population data processing services (Hong Kong, 15 June-3 July) and an expert group meeting on trends, patterns and implications of rural-urban migration (Bangkok, 3-6 November).

Human settlements

ESCAP activities during 1992 in the human settlements area included missions to Ho Chi Minh City (Viet Nam) and Ahmedabad (India) to discuss the modalities and applied methodological approach to regional planning, an advisory services mission on housing finance and credit systems to Vientiane (Lao People's Democratic Republic), a regional training course on applicable construction technology and material (Chengdu, China) in April and a regional seminar-cum-study visit on solid waste management (Bandung, Indonesia) which addressed solid waste collection, treatment and disposal; privatization; and innovative approaches to solid waste management. The Regional Network of Local Authorities for the Management of Human Settlements (CITYNET), established by ESCAP with UNDP support, became independent and continued to promote cooperation and exchange of know-how in areas of urban management.

In preparation for the Ministerial Conference on Urbanization, to be held in 1993, ESCAP convened a Consultative Meeting on Establishing an Inter-organizational Task Force on Urbanization for Asia and the Pacific (Bangkok, 9 September)⁽⁴²⁾ A report on the state of urbanization in the region to be submitted to the Conference was under preparation.

Other activities included a policy-level seminar on subnational area planning through action-oriented research (Bangkok, 15-18 June), workshops, in Chiang Mai, Thailand, on urban economy and productivity (6 and 7 July) and on urban poverty (10 and 11 July) and an intergovernmental expert group meeting on urbanization (Colombo, 30 March-1 April).

Women in development

In preparation for the Second Asian and Pacific Ministerial Conference on Women and Development, to be held in 1994, ESCAP convened an interdivisional meeting on 8 September and an inter-agency meeting on 10 September, both at Bangkok.⁽⁴³⁾ In addition, a seminar on the participation of women in politics as an aspect of human resources development in the ESCAP region, funded by the Republic of Korea, took place at Seoul from 18 to 20 November. The seminar adopted the Seoul Statement on Empowering Women in Politics.⁽⁴⁴⁾

Activities undertaken by ESCAP to promote and strengthen national capabilities for the integration of women's concerns into development planning included advisory services to Governments and NGOs; background studies on women's concerns; and policy recommendations relating to household operations, the market system and the government sector. In an effort to promote awareness of the need for equal rights legislation and its implementation, it organized a series of national workshops on legal literacy, followed by campaigns to improve the legal status of women. Meetings included a Pacific subregional workshop on the technical processing of information concerning women in development (Suva, Fiji, 4-15 May) and a national legal literacy workshop (Kuala Lumpur, 5 and 6 September).

Environment

The focus of ESCAP's environmental activities in 1992 was on the achievement of environmentally sound and sustainable development in the region. In an effort to integrate the objectives and recommendations of the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII) into its work, the secretariat concentrated on implementing the Regional Strategy on Environmentally Sound and Sustainable Development, endorsed by the Commission in 1991,⁽⁴⁵⁾ as well as the recommendations of the 1990 Ministerial-level Conference on Environment and Development in Asia and the Pacific.

A project on desertification control gave priority to national capacity-building and the elaboration of desertification assessment and mapping methodology in the region. A regional working group on the marine environment and oceanographic studies was set up, and studies were undertaken to develop guidelines for environmentally sound coastal tourism development. Other activities included an ESCAP/UNDP consultative policy meeting on the regional network of environment and economic policy research institutions on environmentally sound and sustainable development (Bangkok, 13-16 July), a meeting of the Inter-agency Committee on Environment and Development in Asia and the Pacific (Bangkok, 8 September), a meeting on the regional working group on marine environment and oceanographic studies (Guangzhou, China, 28 September-3 October), a workshop to consider models for sustainable development and application of environmental development principles (Bangkok, 25-27 November), an expert group meeting on appropriate methodologies for hazardous waste management in Asia and the Pacific (Bangkok, 1-4 December), and an ESCAP/UNDP consultative meeting on models for environmentally sound and sustainable development (Bangkok, 8-10 December).

Natural disaster reduction

The Typhoon Committee, at its twenty-fifth session (Zhuhai, China, 8-14 December),⁽⁴⁶⁾ restated the importance of telecommunications in its activities and the need for a consolidated telecommunications system that would standardize and integrate some of its operational activities. The Committee appealed to ESCAP to consider allocating manpower and other resources to implement natural disaster reduction activities.

Statistics

The Committee on Statistics, at its eighth session (Bangkok, 16-20 November),⁽⁴⁷⁾ reviewed statistical and governmental computerization activities in the region and focused on issues relating to the development of national statistical capabilities; the promotion of computerization in the public sector; and the development of economic statistics, statistics in support of regional economic cooperation, social and demographic statistics, including those in support of poverty alleviation, and environmental and energy statistics. The Committee endorsed its programmes of work for 1992-1993 and 1994-1995 as well as the revised medium-term plan for 1992-1997. It identified important areas of its work in government computerization, including the promotion of standards and coding systems for integration of government information systems and the establishment of national policies and strategies for the development of government computerization. It also decided to hold an expert group meeting to review computerization development in the public sector.

Other meetings on statistics in 1992 included a workshop on the development and improvement of environment statistics (Kathmandu, Nepal, 31 May-4 June), a workshop on ESCAP regional specifications for phase VI of the International Comparison Programme (Beijing, 21-25 September) and a seminar on the development of statistical estimating procedures and techniques as a means of improving the timeliness of data (Bangkok, 26-30 October).

Statistical Institute for Asia and the Pacific

The Statistical Institute for Asia and the Pacific⁽⁴⁸⁾ (Tokyo) continued to train statisticians in government services. During the year, 166 people participated in its training courses on practical statistics, automatic data processing and analysis and interpretation of statistics, and in its five in-country courses. The Institute completed the fifth phase of its work in March and agreed on the framework of the sixth phase.

Organizational questions

Membership

In a June note,⁽⁴⁹⁾ the Secretary-General informed the Economic and Social Council that Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan had applied for full membership in ESCAP.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

By resolution 1992/46 of 31 July, the Council recommended that Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan be included in the geographical scope of the Commission and be admitted as members, and decided to amend the Commission's terms of reference accordingly.

By two other resolutions of 31 July, the Council, noting that the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (resolution 1992/47) and the Federated States of Micronesia and the Marshall Islands (resolution 1992/48) had become members of ESCAP, decided to amend the Commission's terms of reference accordingly. By resolution 1992/49, also of 31 July, the Council, noting that French Polynesia and New Caledonia had become associate members of ESCAP, decided to amend the Commission's terms of reference accordingly. By resolution 1992/50 of the same date, the Council, noting that ESCAP had recommended the inclusion of Azerbaijan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and Turkmenistan in its geographical scope and their admission as members of the Commission, approved that recommendation and decided to amend the Commission's terms of reference accordingly.

Forty-ninth ESCAP session

At its forty-eighth session, the Commission decided to hold its forty-ninth session at Bangkok in March or April 1993, and chose "expansion of investment and intraregional trade as a vehicle for enhancing regional economic cooperation and development" as its theme topic for that session.

Europe

The forty-seventh session of the Economic Commission for Europe took place at Geneva from 7 to 15 April 1992, at a time when the ECE region had to face new challenges calling for cooperative solutions. Following the disintegration of the former USSR and Yugoslavia and the consequent creation of newly independent States, the old East-West partition of Europe was replaced by new structures for cooperation and economic links, as countries in Central and Eastern Europe continued on the road towards parliamentary democracy and a market economy. Equally significant were the integration processes in Western Europe, highlighted by the signing of the Maastricht Treaty in February, which set guidelines for political, monetary and economic union, and the establishment of economic cooperation and free-trade agreements between countries from all parts of the region. However, the euphoria of 1989 gave way to a growing realization that the economic and political transformation of the region would be a long and arduous task.

During the year since the 1991 session, there was a general weakening of output growth in Europe, with several countries remaining in or moving into recession. The overall slow-down resulted in rising unemployment and increasing inflationary pressures. Changes in the economic system, introduction of stabilization measures and the collapse of trade among countries belonging to the former CMEA contributed significantly to the recession in Eastern Europe, causing an accelerating fall in output and a rise in unemployment. As the transition to a market economy proved more painful and complex than originally expected, bilateral and multilateral initiatives were needed to secure the success of reforms and mitigate the hardships experienced by the countries in transition, as well as to promote their integration into the European and global economy.

The Helsinki Declaration, adopted at the summit of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) in July 1992, recognized the Commission's key role in the construction of a new Europe. As an agency for the multilateral implementation of the relevant provisions of CSCE, including its Final Act, the Charter of Paris for a New Europe, adopted at the 1990 CSCE summit, and the final document of the 1990 Bonn Conference on Economic Cooperation in Europe, ECE continued to make substantive contributions to the CSCE process. In 1992, particular attention was given to cooperation with Mediterranean countries not members of ECE, with a view to developing projects of common interest promoting economic and social development and enhancing stability in the region.

At its April session,⁽¹⁾ the Commission reviewed the implementation of its 1990 decisions on restructuring within ECE and considered its activities and future work in the five priority areas, namely, environment, transport, statistics, trade facilitation and economic analysis, as well as activities designed to assist countries in transition to a market economy and issues relating to sustainable development. Noting that its membership had increased from 34 to 40 countries between April 1991 and April 1992, ECE welcomed Estonia, Israel, Latvia, Lithuania, the Republic of Moldova and San Marino as its new members.

It adopted seven decisions, six of which pertained to the provision of adequate resources for the servicing of ECE's priority sectors;⁽²⁾ fundamental principles of official statistics in the region;⁽³⁾ its work concerning economies in transition in Central and Eastern Europe;⁽⁴⁾ cooperation in the field of environment and sustainable development;⁽⁵⁾ cooperation in the field of transport;⁽⁶⁾ and economic cooperation in the Mediterranean in the light of the Final Act of CSCE.⁽⁷⁾ By the seventh decision, the Commission approved its programme of work for 1992-1993 and endorsed in principle, subject to review at its forty-eighth (1993) session, its programme of work for 1992-1996.⁽⁸⁾

In response to a 1991 Commission request,⁽⁹⁾ its Chairman continued to convene ad hoc informal meetings of ECE to consult on policy matters, assist in preparations for the annual sessions, monitor progress in the work programmes and offer guidance to the Executive Secretary.

As agreed at an ad hoc informal meeting on 25 June, the Commission, at a special session on 5 October,⁽¹⁰⁾ considered the question of strengthening its role and functions and adopted pertinent recommendations.⁽¹¹⁾ Noting the applications of Armenia, Azerbaijan, Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan for admission to full membership, ECE stated that it would welcome those newly independent republics of the former USSR as its members, and welcomed their immediate participation in its activities, pending approval by the Economic and Social Council of any necessary amendments to ECE's terms of reference.

During the year under review, the Commission continued to provide a bridge between the United Nations and other economic institutions active in the region, such as EC, OECD, the Council of Europe and the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development. During 1992, five countries (Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, the Republic of Moldova, San Marino and Slovenia) became members of ECE by virtue of their admission to the United Nations, bringing the Commission's membership to 43 by year's end.

By a letter of 2 July,⁽¹²⁾ the ECE Chairman communicated to the Economic and Social Council an appeal of the ECE members to maintain budgetary resources allotted to ECE and to find a rapid solution to the situation created by the lack of personnel in its secretariat, in the light of unprecedented and increasing needs for cooperation and assistance in the region. Annexed to the letter was a resolution adopted by the Conference of European Statisticians in June (see below), calling for priority filling of vacancies in ECE's Statistical Division.

By decision 1992/295 of 31 July, the Council took note of the letter.

Economic trends

Economic developments in Europe were disappointing in 1992, as economic conditions in Western Europe deteriorated significantly, with high and rising unemployment and a financial crisis in the public sector. According to the summary of the economic survey of Europe in 1992-1993,⁽¹³⁾ average output growth stagnated at a rate of 1 per cent, coupled with a sharp weakening of economic activity in the second half of the year, while unemployment rose to just under 10 per cent from 8.9 per cent in 1991. The 1993 projections for the four major economies in Western Europe showed that real GDP was likely to fall in France, Germany and Italy, and was expected to grow, albeit slowly, only in the United Kingdom. Major factors behind that economic downturn were high interest rates, resulting from a tightening of monetary policy in Germany, and the commitment to fixed exchange rates under the EC Exchange Rates Mechanism. The situation in the smaller countries was characterized by a pervasive slow-down in economic growth, with a number of economies close to stagnation or even an absolute fall in total output. Against a background of turbulent foreign-exchange markets, and with the German economy moving into recession, consumer and business confidence were at very low levels. In an effort to enhance the scope for output and employment growth through a coordinated macroeconomic policy, the EC summit at Edinburgh, United Kingdom, in December adopted a package of measures to stimulate investment demand; however, the overall impact was expected to be rather modest.

Economic performance in Central and Eastern Europe was characterized by increasing diversity among the countries in transition, although the overall economic crisis deepened further during the year. GDP/net material product fell on average by some 10 per cent, bringing the aggregate decline since 1989 to more than 30 per cent, with the 1992 estimated falls ranging from 27 per cent in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) to 4-6 per cent in Hungary, whereas in Czechoslovakia the decline appeared to have come to an end. A slow recovery was also indicated in Poland. In the former USSR/Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS), the falls in output ranged from 11 per cent in Belarus and 19 per cent in the Russian Federation to 28 per cent in Estonia, 35 per cent in Lithuania, over 40 per cent in Armenia and 44 per cent in Latvia. Agricultural output also declined, by 9-13 per cent in Eastern Europe and 10 per cent in CIS.

Nearly 6.5 million people in Eastern Europe were unemployed in December 1992, up from 5 million in 1991, with rates varying from 5 per cent in Czechoslovakia to 14 per cent in Poland and nearly 25 per cent in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. In CIS and the Baltic States, where unemployment was less than 1 per cent, except in Armenia, Estonia and Latvia (2 to 3.5 per cent), there was a significant increase in the number of people officially classified as living in poverty, which in Russia more than doubled towards the end of 1992 from 12 to 29 per cent of the population. Annual inflation rates fell to 80 per cent in Bulgaria, 43 per cent in Poland, 23 per cent in Hungary and 11 to 10 per cent in Czechoslovakia, but accelerated to over 200 per cent in Albania, Romania and Slovenia. Hyperinflation was registered in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, with a rising annual rate of more than 9,000 per cent. In Russia and most of CIS, prices were rising at some 25 per cent a month, while the Baltic States reduced their monthly inflation to some 3 to 5 per cent by the end of the year.

At the same time, the private sector in the economies in transition grew rapidly, particularly in agriculture, construction, trade and other services. Its share in domestic output increased from 9 per cent in 1991 to 20 per cent in 1992 in Czechoslovakia and from 5 to 10 per cent in Bulgaria, and reached some 25-35 per cent of GDP in Hungary, 26 per cent in Romania and 45-50 per cent in Poland. Eastern Europe also sustained a significant growth of exports to Western markets, while trade between those markets and CIS, as well as intra-Eastern trade, continued to fall.

Ethnic strife in some parts of the region, which followed the breakup of the USSR and Yugoslavia, provided economic and social problems on a different scale, as more than 200,000 people were killed, some 85 per cent of whom were in Yugoslavia, and nearly 3 million were displaced.

Western economic assistance to Eastern Europe

Economic assistance to the region's 17 countries in transition to a market economy focused on technical aid to help create appropriate institutional structures and train people to operate them effectively, backed up by improved access for Eastern exports to Western markets and by short-run financing for private investment to take over the task of economic restructuring. According to the summary of the economic survey,⁽¹³⁾ some $40 billion of financing was made available to those countries in 1992; however, only a small portion of it was grant aid or concessionary finance, while special financing (debt write-offs, rescheduling, deferrals and arrears) accounted for about one half of the amount, totalling $5 billion in Eastern Europe and $14 billion in CIS and the Baltic States. A further $1 billion was provided by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) to Russia. A large portion of financing came in bilateral credits, which were debt-creating and carried market interest rates. The total flow of those resources was estimated at $12 billion for Russia in 1992 and $20 billion for Eastern Europe in 1991. At the same time, multilateral financing in that subregion fell from $8.5 billion in 1991 to less than $5 billion in 1992.

Political uncertainties, incomplete market infrastructures and delays in resolving basic problems such as property rights in the economies in transition, as well as much delayed recovery of activity there and a deepening recession in Western Europe, led Western companies to reassess their investments in the East and postpone new investments. Those problems notwithstanding, foreign direct investment (FDI) to those countries rose from $0.6 billion in 1990 to some $3 billion in 1992, although the bulk of it (some 90 per cent) was concentrated in Czechoslovakia and Hungary. FDI also increased in 1992 in Poland and Slovenia, but the amounts remained relatively small.

In April, the seven major industrial nations announced a $24 billion aid package to Russia; according to IMF, that obligation was essentially met during the year. Yet the delivery of financial aid as well as rapidly expanding technical assistance activities revealed an urgent need for improved monitoring and coordination and for broader national transition frameworks, to match assistance with the specific economic needs of each country. Among other problems facing both the countries in transition and Western economies were debt servicing, the uneven distribution of financial assistance, further liberalization of trade, effects of United Nations sanctions on trade with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and increasing emigration to Western Europe.

Despite those difficulties, there was room for optimism as the reforms were starting to bear fruit and economic indicators were improving. During the year, association agreements designed to reduce trade barriers and improve market access were signed between EC and Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland and Romania. EC also signed trade and economic cooperation agreements with Albania, the Baltic States and Slovenia, and opened negotiations on partnership and cooperation agreements with CIS countries on a broad range of political, economic and commercial relations. An early and successful conclusion of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations could also provide important benefits to the countries of Central and Eastern Europe.

In February, the UNDP Governing Council approved the allocation of indicative planning figures under the fifth programming cycle (1992-1996) for Belarus, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania and Ukraine, and authorized the Administrator to proceed with programme development in those five countries.⁽¹⁴⁾ A similar action was taken in May for Armenia, Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Republic of Moldova, the Russian Federation, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan.⁽¹⁵⁾ Also in May, the Governing Council, having considered ways of establishing a United Nations presence in the Baltic States and CIS, requested the Administrator, in collaboration with United Nations bodies, to elaborate an integrated United Nations system approach to and presence in the countries concerned and provide them with operational support during 1992-1993, and approved, on an exceptional basis, the use of up to $3 million during that period to open a limited number of UNDP offices in those regions.⁽¹⁶⁾

The Executive Board of the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), at its 1992 regular session, recognized the need to enhance the role of UNICEF in Central and Eastern Europe, the Baltic States and CIS and approved recommendations of its Executive Director to that effect (for details, see PART THREE, Chapter XIV).

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 30 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1992/40 without vote.

Activities of the United Nations system in the Baltic States and the Commonwealth of Independent States

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling decision 92/43, adopted on 26 May 1992 by the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme at its thirty-ninth session, and decision 1992/19, adopted by the Executive Board of the United Nations Children's Fund at its regular session of 1992, concerning the activities of the United Nations system in the Baltic States and the Commonwealth of Independent States,

Reaffirming the importance it attaches to an integrated United Nations system approach to, and presence in, the region,

1. Requests the various bodies of the United Nations system, in order to ensure an integrated United Nations system approach to, and presence in, the Baltic States and the Commonwealth of Independent States:

(a) In consultation with the Administrative Committee on Coordination and the Joint Consultative Group on Policy, to reach an early agreement that will ensure such an integrated approach and presence in the countries concerned, including common administrative support arrangements;

(b) In providing assistance to the countries concerned, to take account of the national priorities of those countries and of the comparative advantages of each of the bodies of the United Nations system;

2. Invites the Secretary-General to prepare a report on ways of ensuring such an integrated approach and presence in the countries concerned and the steps already taken to do so, which would be annexed to the report for the triennial comprehensive policy review of operational activities of the United Nations system at the forty-seventh session of the General Assembly.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1992/40

30 July 1992 Meeting 41 Adopted without vote

Draft by Austria, Belarus, Canada, Estonia, Finland, Japan, Latvia, Lithuania, New Zealand, Norway, Russian Federation, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, United Kingdom (for EEC), United States (E/1992/L.34); agenda item 4. Meeting numbers. ESC 38, 41.

Activities in 1992

Assistance to the Central and Eastern European economies continued to be at the core of ECE activities in 1992,⁽¹⁷⁾ which was reflected in the establishment of a United Nations/ECE Trust Fund for Assistance to Countries in Transition. ECE organized 34 workshops in those countries on issues relating to energy, transport, statistics, human settlements, industrial development, agriculture and timber, and, to a lesser extent, trade, environment and economic analysis. Its subsidiary bodies established special assistance programmes in their respective areas. Efforts were made to ensure close cooperation with other international organizations and their participation in the assistance programme.

Another area of activities was the ECE's continuing assistance to developing countries of other regions and its contribution to United Nations global programmes,⁽¹⁸⁾ as well as its active participation in and contribution to the CSCE process.⁽¹⁹⁾

International trade

The ECE Committee on the Development of Trade (forty-first session, Geneva, 8-10 December 1992)⁽²⁰⁾ reviewed the economic and trading situation in the region, with an emphasis on trade facilitation and promotion of trade with the transition economies. It welcomed the secretariat proposal for an assistance programme in trade facilitation as well as its decision to establish an inter-secretariat task force between ECE, UNCTAD and the International Trade Centre to ensure greater cooperation and coordination of related work. It decided to hold three workshops in Eastern Europe in 1993 on promotion of FDI; progress in foreign trade and payments reform; and implication of privatization, including the role of small and medium-sized enterprises, for international trade and investment. The secretariat was requested to prepare studies on successful measures and negative experiences of the Eastern economies in the field of privatization, and on the establishment of conditions conducive to expanding trade among those countries. The Committee decided to continue its work in the field of trade in services and on information sources relevant to trade and investment activities in Central and Eastern Europe and needed by business operators.

The Committee adopted a revised programme of work for 1992-1995, reformulating it under three main headings: trade facilitation, trade promotion and trade analysis. It examined the report of a workshop on the management of East-West joint ventures (Rome, Italy, June 1992) and a Guide on Management Requirements and Training for East-West Joint Ventures, and noted that the secretariat's quarterly newsletter, East-West Joint Ventures News, continued to be published under the title East-West Investment News, It decided to select a discussion theme for each session, and chose the impact of trade facilitation on trade in the ECE region as the theme for its 1993 session.

The Committee reviewed the work carried out by the Working Party on International Contract Practices in Industry, which included the publication of a Guide on Legal Aspects of Privatization in Industry and the preparation of a new guide on financing East-West trade and privatization in Central and Eastern Europe. It also assessed the rapid progress achieved by the Working Party on Facilitation of International Trade Procedures, which approved a number of new messages to be submitted to trial and testing to increase the practical application of the United Nations Electronic Data Interchange for Administration, Commerce and Transport (UN/EDIFACT) as a standard for world trade. In total, there were 124 messages at various stages of development by the Working Party. A steering group was set up to streamline EDIFACT procedures so as to enhance the production of messages, and the team of regional rapporteurs, constituting regional EDIFACT boards, was being expanded with an agreed establishment of an African Board. During 1992, Brazil became a full member and Chile and Colombia associate members of the North American EDIFACT Board, which changed its name to Pan American EDIFACT Board, while Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania and the Russian Federation joined the Eastern European Board. The Western European Board was expanded to include Luxembourg as a member and Malta as an observer.

The Working Party also analysed international trade transactions to give countries in transition a tool for developing efficient trade procedures in order to be more competitive in Western markets, and continued implementing its comprehensive work programme in the legal field.

Industry

The Working Party on the Chemical Industry held its second session at Geneva from 7 to 9 October 1992.⁽²¹⁾ It endorsed the reports of the meeting of experts on the periodic survey of the chemical industry and of the annual meeting of rapporteurs on aromatic hydrocarbons and olefins, and took note of the progress made in preparing a study on management of plastic wastes in the region and the ECE Directory of Chemical Producers and Products. The Working Party adopted its programme of work for 1993-1997, including the priority ranking of programme elements, and agreed to include in the programme a study on trends in structural and ownership changes in the chemical industries of the economies in transition.

It also considered the report of a high-level meeting on cooperation and sustainable development in the chemical industry (Warsaw, Poland, 10-12 March 1992), which reviewed development strategies for the chemical industry in the 1990s in the areas of environment, health and safety; availability and efficient use of raw materials and energy; investment and industrial cooperation; and follow-up activities in the countries in transition. ECE decided to present the conclusions of the meeting to UNCED.

The Working Party welcomed the conclusions of the meeting as guidelines for its future work and discussed possible follow-up action geared towards sustainable economic and ecological development of the chemical industry. Acting on a proposal by Poland to establish a regional environmental management centre for the chemical industry, it decided to convene a meeting of experts at Warsaw in April 1993 to examine the modalities of that project. The Working Party also recognized the need for a pilot project demonstrating the environmental clean-up of selected chemical production sites, and agreed to undertake two comparative studies, one on chemical legislation in ECE member countries and the other on the complex utilization of raw materials using advanced low- and non-waste process technologies.

A study on substitutes for tripolyphosphate in detergents was completed for sale in 1992, while the publication of the annual review of the chemical industry (1991) and the annual bulletin of trade in chemical products was delayed due to insufficient secretariat resources. The Working Party urged the secretariat to finalize and publish the review in early 1993. Preparations were made for workshops on waste treatment in industrial parks and on the rational use of raw materials and energy in the chemical industry.

In April, ECE reviewed activities of the Working Party on Engineering Industries and Automation and welcomed the preparations for seminars on environment-related topics in the countries in transition, as well as the results of workshops on rehabilitation engineering. Support was expressed for the development of internationally comparable engineering statistics and for the annual review and a study on the medium- and long-term trends and prospects in engineering industries and automation.

A workshop on strategies in privatization and management in engineering industries in Belarus was held (Minsk, 10-14 February). The third in a series of workshops on rehabilitation engineering (Trebno Spa, Czechoslovakia, 24-27 May) stressed the importance of education, information and international cooperation in the development of rehabilitation infrastructures in Central and Eastern Europe. A seminar on new materials and their application in engineering industries (Kiev, Ukraine, 13-16 October) agreed on the potential of such materials to contribute to sustainable industrial development and protection of the environment.

The Working Party on Steel, at its second session (Geneva, 21-23 October), focused on the management of the evolution of the steel industry, questions of interest to countries in transition and protection of the environment. It reviewed short- and medium-term trends in the steel market and endorsed the report of a June meeting of experts on the subject, noting a general decline in market activity, export difficulties and falling prices for most iron and steel products. The resultant decrease in industrial steel production in the most affected economies in transition was estimated at 20 per cent in Czechoslovakia, 15 per cent in Romania and Russia, and 9 per cent in Hungary.

With regard to steel statistics, the Working Party endorsed the report of a meeting of experts on the subject and asked the secretariat to rationalize and streamline further the United Nations/ECE Steel Statistical System. It noted the preparation of a study on problems arising from the use of iron and steel scrap and the completion of a study on steel product quality and maximum utilization of scrap. In 1992, the secretariat published the Annual Bulletin of Steel Statistics for 1990 and The Steel Market in 1991.

The Working Party endorsed the reports of a seminar on restructuring and management techniques in steel industries in countries in transition (Szczyrk, Poland, 18-22 May) and of the first preparatory meeting on 17 June for a seminar on metallurgy and ecology, scheduled for 1993. It was informed of a workshop on the restructuring of the Romanian steel industry (Tirgoviste, 16-20 February) and the International Symposium on Steel Scrap (Algiers, Algeria, 26-30 April). It adopted its programme of work for 1992-1996.

In April, ECE endorsed the 1992-1996 programmes of work and the revised terms of reference of the Working Party on Steel and the Working Party on the Chemical Industry.

Transport

The Inland Transport Committee (fifty-fourth session, Geneva, 3-7 February 1992) analysed the transport situation in member countries and emerging development trends, considered activities regarding assistance to economies in transition, and discussed specific issues related to road, rail and inland water transport. The Committee, having examined the secretariat's proposals on follow-up action to the Pan-European Transport Conference (Prague, Czechoslovakia, 29-31 October 1991) and amendments thereto by an informal group of high-level experts, modified its programme of work for 1992-1996 and its structure accordingly. It was informed of a series of workshops on combined transport issues, held in 1991 in some Eastern European countries, as well as a workshop on multimodal transport (Volos, Greece, November 1991) aimed at providing technical assistance to the economies in transition. It reviewed activities of its subsidiary bodies related to transport infrastructure, safety and facilitation, harmonization of transport requirements, vehicle construction, transport policy and economics, customs questions, and issues concerning the transportation of people and merchandise, including dangerous goods and perishable foodstuffs.

In April, ECE stressed the importance of international cooperation and coordination in the field of transport in the region, and felt that the Committee should contribute actively to the development of an integrated all-European transport concept. It endorsed the Committee's revised programme of work and welcomed the initiatives to translate the provisions of the Prague Declaration, adopted at the Pan-European Transport Conference, into concrete action within the framework of that programme.

During the year, the ECE secretariat continued to promote international agreements, conventions and resolutions to achieve a coherent, efficient and well-balanced all-European transport system. It participated in the elaboration of a European Transport Charter, finalized the draft of a convention on customs treatment of pool containers used in international transport, and updated regulations and provisions for combined transport on inland waterways and the transport of dangerous goods. Progress was made on the Trans-European North-South Motorway network and the Trans-European Railways project, which were revised to include east-west connections. A number of workshops were held on transition issues in the field of inland transport: on responsibilities of the State and the railways in a market economy (Rouen, France, 30 June-2 July); on road transport safety (Benesov, Czechoslovakia, 6-9 October); and two on combined transport (Bonn, Germany, 6-9 October; Moscow, 21 and 22 October).

Rail transport issues were addressed by an ad hoc meeting on the facilitation of border crossing in international rail transport (Geneva, 2-4 September) and a newly established ad hoc inter-secretariat group, which analysed the factors causing delays in international rail traffic. A seminar on road safety (Geneva, 23 and 24 March) assessed positively the results of the first Road Safety Week in the region (October 1990) and submitted its conclusions to the Inland Transport Committee. A global seminar on the impact of increasing dimensions of loading units on combined transport (Geneva, 1-4 September 1992) considered issues related to the introduction of larger containers and adopted recommendations on their maximum size. The Working Party on Combined Transport, at its seventeenth session (7 and 8 September), provided clarifications and comments on the seminar's recommendations.

Energy

At its second session (Geneva, 10-12 November 1992), the Committee on Energy considered the energy situation and prospects in the region, with particular focus on assistance to the economies in transition, and adopted its draft programme of work for 1992-1996 in the areas of energy reforms in Central and Eastern Europe; rational use of energy, efficiency and conservation; interface between energy and the environment; energy policies and prospects; energy demand and supply issues for sustainable development; and energy trade, trade facilitation and infrastructure. The Committee reviewed energy conservation policies and prospects in the region and evaluated the impact of multilateral intergovernmental assistance to the countries of Central and Eastern Europe. It was informed of the status of negotiations to implement the European Energy Charter, providing for cooperation in the fields of energy economy and efficiency; interconnection and extension of gas and electric power systems, respectively; and technologies for the clean combustion of low-calorie-value solid fuels. The Committee noted the progress achieved in cooperation with the other regional commissions in preparing the project entitled "Global Energy Efficiency 21: An Inter-regional Approach" and the conclusions of an ad hoc meeting on the project (19 and 20 October).

In 1992, the Working Parties on Coal, Gas and Electric Power held their second sessions. The Working Party on Coal (2-4 November) focused on the transition of the coal industry in Central and Eastern Europe from central planning to a market economy and reviewed the coal situation in the region, including environmental concerns, international cooperation and safety in mines.

The Working Party on Gas (20-22 January) concentrated on the transition of the gas industry in Central and Eastern Europe to market economy. A study on the interconnection of gas networks in Europe was completed in 1992. Workshops were held on coal-bed methane exploration, extraction and use (Katowice, Poland, March), gas tariff-making in Italy (Turin, May) and integration of the liquefied petroleum gas industry in the energy markets of economies in transition (Prague, November).

The Working Party on Electric Power (10-12 February) initiated a joint study with the Working Party on Gas on demand for gas for electric power generation, and was preparing workshops on achievement and future development of cogeneration and district heating; possibilities of refurbishing fossil-fired power stations; and one entitled "Power to Communicate".

The Steering Committee of the "Energy Efficiency 2000" project, aimed at reducing the gap between the energy-intensive industries in Eastern Europe and the energy-saving technologies of the West, held its second session (3-5 March). Activities since the commencement of the project in June 1991⁽²²⁾ included a symposium on energy efficiency measures in industry (Bled, Slovenia, September/October 1991), two ad hoc meetings on energy efficiency demonstration zones (Moscow, May 1992; Rome, October 1992), a meeting on electricity and energy efficiency technology and demand management (Oslo, Norway, June), and a book on East-West energy efficiency, published in September. In November, the Committee on Energy invited its members to complete or pledge their contributions to the project trust fund, and endorsed the initiative of Central, East and South European members to work more extensively on energy efficiency demonstration zones.

Science and technology

The Senior Advisers to ECE Governments on Science and Technology (twentieth session, Geneva, 23-25 September 1992) discussed managerial aspects and the relationship between national and regional bodies in promoting innovation and reviewed changes in national science and technology policies, priorities and institutions, including those relating to international cooperation. They also considered the report of a workshop on State policy on science and technology in economies in transition aimed at promoting innovations in industry (Warsaw, 22 and 23 June), and discussed the possibility of convening a follow-up seminar aimed at encouraging research, development and innovation in industry and enterprises. The Senior Advisers reviewed progress in the establishment of an inventory of safety guidelines in biotechnology. They considered a proposal for a compendium of laws, principal legal instruments and mechanisms regulating national and international research and development activities of ECE members under market-economy conditions. They agreed to encourage one of the economies in transition to hold a workshop on commercialization of research and development and to discuss specific legislative aspects related to science and technology at a future session. The secretariat was requested to elaborate science and technology indicators for the countries in transition and prepare a study on the investment goods trade in 1985-1993, concentrating on imports into Central and Eastern Europe. The Senior Advisers adopted their programme of work for 1993-1997, including the priority ranking of programme elements.

Agriculture

The Committee on Agriculture (forty-third session, Geneva, 9-12 March 1992) reviewed recent developments and prospects for agriculture in the region and consequences of its future activities, with emphasis on the economies in transition. It adopted its programme of work for 1992-1996, focusing on economic analysis of the agri-food sector, agriculture and the environment, standardization of perishable produce and quality developments, and food and agricultural statistics. The Committee also reviewed European trade in agricultural products and the market situation of selected commodities, including grains, livestock and meat, and milk and dairy products. It was informed of the preparations for a symposium on quality of products in the agri-food sector (Murcia, Spain, 5-9 October) and for a workshop on specific problems of the transformation of collective farms into viable market-oriented units (Gödöllő, Hungary, 22-26 June). Hungary was also preparing to hold a preparatory workshop in September on the establishment of a European liaison centre for the harmonization of soil-monitoring systems.

The Committee approved the terms of reference and programmes of work of the new Working Party on Economics of the Agri-Food Sector and Farm Management and Working Party on Relations between Agriculture and the Environment, adopted at their first (constituent) sessions in October and September 1991, respectively. Acting on a recommendation of the Working Party on Standardization of Perishable Produce and Quality Developments at its forty-seventh session (October/November 1991), the Committee adopted a resolution on the role of international harmonized commercial standards. The Study Group on Food and Agricultural Statistics in Europe concentrated its activities on priority needs of the countries in transition and organization of a workshop on the preparation of agricultural censuses in those countries (Bulgaria, May 1992); creation of an intersecretariat working group for the harmonization of the international collection of agricultural statistics; and elaboration of a conceptual framework for statistics on relations between agriculture and the environment.

In April, ECE endorsed the Committee's programme of work and accepted the terms of reference of its two new Working Parties. During the year, the Committee continued its cooperative activities with FAO, which were discussed at an informal meeting of representatives of the two bodies (Rome, November). A workshop on agro-technical methods to improve soils contaminated by radionuclides was held in Minsk in September.

The Timber Committee held two sessions during 1992. At its forty-ninth session (Geneva, 27-30 January), it discussed the consequences of increased waste-paper recycling for the forest and forest products sector as its special topic, revised its terms of reference and approved its programme of work for 1992-1996 in six priority areas: analysis of developments for forestry and forest products; collection, dissemination and improvement of forest and forest products statistics; forest technology, management and training; issues related to a sound and sustainable development of the forest and forest products sector; assistance to the economies in transition; and a special priority issue of radiation contamination problems in the forestry and forest industry sector, particularly from the Chernobyl disaster.

In April, ECE endorsed the Committee's programme of work and terms of reference.

At its fiftieth session (Geneva, 20-23 October), the Committee considered market developments in 1992 and prospects for 1993, discussed as its special topic the implication of selected environmental and ecological developments on the forest and forest products sector in the region, reviewed its programme of assistance to the economies in transition and approved its revised programme of work for 1993-1997. The Committee was informed of the main findings of a 1990 FAO/ECE forest resource assessment (temperate zones) and resultant publications, and endorsed the proposal of the Joint FAO/ECE Working Party on Forest Economics and Statistics for a pilot study on long-term changes in temperate-zone forest resources. It assessed progress on the European timber trends and prospects study, endorsed the proposals of an informal meeting of experts on the outlook for economies in transition in the study, and added Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania to its scope.

The Joint FAO/ECE/ILO Committee on Forest Technology, Management and Training, at its nineteenth session (Croce di Magara, Italy, 29 September-2 October 1992), agreed to set up a team of specialists to act on the recommendations of the first meeting of experts on forestry and forest industry problems arising from radiation contamination (Gomel, Belarus, March) and a meeting of experts on the impact of the Chernobyl accident (Minsk, July). In May, a study tour and a workshop on forest regeneration in areas exposed to air pollution was carried out in Czechoslovakia. An informal FAO/ECE meeting on public relations in the forestry and forest industry sector (United Kingdom, June 1992) adopted recommendations for further activities. Assistance to the countries in transition included workshops on privatization in forestry and forest industries (Germany, June) and on problems of those countries (Russia, September), and an informal FAO/ECE meeting on strategies for and coordination of such assistance (Ossiach, Austria, 5-8 October).

Economic analysis

The Senior Economic Advisers to ECE Governments (twenty-eighth session, Geneva, 1-5 June 1992) held a round table on the conditions for economic recovery in Central and Eastern Europe, considered issues related to the prospects of economic growth and sustainable development in the region, and adopted its programme of work for 1992-1996, including a priority ranking of programme elements. Among the matters discussed were the impact of the economic slow-down in Western Europe on transition economies and related stabilization measures; restructuring of public enterprises and privatization; structural changes in employment, labour productivity and working patterns and their impact on economic growth; and growth conditions for 1991-1995 and their long-term implications, including the results of workshops on foreign trade and payment reforms in the economies in transition (Snagov, Romania, 16-19 September 1991) and on restructuring State-owned enterprises in economies in transition and main policy issues (Baden, Austria, 9-11 March 1992).

The Senior Advisers were informed of progress made in the development of a specialized macroeconomic database and implementation of the telecommunication network between the secretariat, ECE members and other international organizations. The second ad hoc meeting on international trade and structural changes (Geneva, 1-3 April) agreed to focus its future work on macroeconomic development scenarios for the global and ECE economies and their implication for the transition countries, the relation between industrial restructuring and international trade, and financial implications of transition policies.

Environment

The Senior Advisers to ECE Governments on Environmental and Water Problems (fifth session, Geneva, 3-6 March 1992) assessed progress made in cooperation in water management, air pollution, environmental technology and waste management, bilateral and multilateral financial cooperation, and systems for obtaining and exchanging reliable environmental information. They adopted a Code of Practice for the Conservation of Threatened Animals and Plants and Other Species of International Significance, and took note of the Indicative Lists of Birds and Mammals of International Significance, to be attached to the Code. The Senior Advisers were informed of the preparations for the April 1993 Conference "Environment for Europe" and a May 1993 seminar on low-waste technology and environmentally sound products; and, in the area of management of hazardous chemicals, a workshop on the OECD principles of good laboratory practice (GLP) and compliance (Hungary, October 1992) and a third OECD workshop on the application of GLP (Switzerland, October). They decided to set up a task force on environmental rights and obligations and to discontinue the activities of the Working Party on Air Pollution Problems, discussed a proposal to develop a strategic planning and management framework, and adopted their programme of work, including a priority ranking of programme elements.

The Senior Advisers' recommendations to ECE members pertained to ecosystems-based water management and the protection of inland waters against eutrophication, the five R policies (reduction, replacement, recovery, recycling and reutilization of industrial waste), and the use and application of the OECD guidelines for testing of chemicals and the OECD principles of GLP.

At their resumed fifth session (Helsinki, Finland, 17 and 18 March), the Senior Advisers adopted the Convention on the Protection and Use of Transboundary Watercourses and International Lakes and the Convention on the Transboundary Effects of Industrial Accidents. During the year, the Conventions were signed by 25 and 26 Governments and EC, respectively. The Meeting of Signatories to the latter Convention (May) and the Working Party on Water Problems at its sixth session (November) considered measures for implementing the Conventions and elaborated relevant work plans. The number of signatories to the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context rose to 28 plus EC in 1992, with three ratifications, while the protocol on volatile organic compounds had been signed by 22 Governments and EC and ratified by one country, as at the end of 1992.

In April, ECE endorsed the Senior Advisers' programme of work, welcomed the adoption of the Conventions, and stressed the need for more support to the economies in transition to implement ECE environmental conventions and integrate environmental concerns in the process of economic reform. The Commission requested its Executive Secretary to pursue his efforts in facilitating consultations on the Mediterranean Technical Assistance Programme and the Mediterranean Special Programme of Action to strengthen environmental management and development in the region, and suggested defining elements of sustainable development there.

At its tenth session (Geneva, 17-19 November), the Executive Body for the Convention on Long-range Transboundary Air Pollution amended the mandate of the Working Group on Strategies to include provisions for proposals on financial burden-sharing, and requested it to report to the Conference "Environment for Europe" (see above) on progress in negotiating a second pro-protocol on the reduction of sulphur emissions. The Executive Body requested the Working Group to review technical annexes to the protocol on control of nitrogen oxide emissions and future protocols, approved the revised scale of contributions to the cooperative programme for monitoring and evaluation of the long-range transmission of air pollutants in Europe, and considered effects of major air pollutants on human health and the environment and related international cooperative programmes. It also reviewed activities of the Working Group on Technology (first session) in preparing a draft technical annex to a second sulphur protocol, progress reports of the Task Forces on Persistent Organic Pollutants and on Emissions of Heavy Metals, and the results of the first workshop on facilitation of exchange of technology for the purpose of second generation protocols on emission reductions (Budapest, September). The problem of pollution was also dealt with at a workshop on integrated pollution prevention and control (Geneva, 18-20 November).

Human settlements

The Committee on Human Settlements (fifty-third session, Lisbon, Portugal, 15-17 September) discussed the human settlements situation in the region and related current trends and policies, and reviewed the work accomplished or in progress on assistance to the countries in transition, sustainable development of human settlements in the region, housing policies and building, urban and regional planning and research, human settlements policies in southern Europe and human settlements statistics. Following informal consultations with the heads of delegations at Geneva (February) and Lisbon (September), the Committee agreed that its work should focus on promoting sustainable development of human settlements and assisting the transition process in Central and Eastern Europe. It decided to discontinue the three former Working Parties and to set up two new Working Parties, on Housing Modernization and Management and on Sustainable Human Settlements Planning, and agreed on its own draft terms of reference.

During the period from September 1991 to December 1992, 14 seminars/workshops were organized on various issues related to human settlements, including a workshop on human settlements and sustainable development (Örebro, Sweden, May 1992) and the seventh Conference on Urban and Regional Research on the ecological challenge in urban planning (Ankara, Turkey, 29 June-3 July).

Standardization

The Working Party on Standardization Policies (second session, Geneva, 12-14 May) reviewed developments in the field of standardization, including coordination, harmonization, conformity assessment and metrology in testing. It adopted its revised terms of reference, an explanatory note on its role as an international standards-related forum with governmental representation with the objective of reducing non-tariff standards-related trade barriers, and its programme of work for 1992-1996.

The Working Party adopted the third revision of the ECE Standardization List, endorsed the sixth edition of the guide on standardization terms and definitions of the International Organization for Standardization and the International Electrotechnical Commission, and considered a draft recommendation on metrological assurance of testing and the proposal of an ad hoc meeting on energy efficiency standards (January 1992) for holding in May 1993 a seminar on energy efficiency standards and labelling systems. It was informed that a meeting of rapporteurs and coordinators would be held at Prague on 14 and 15 September 1992.

During 1992, the Working Party conducted five workshops—one in Bulgaria and four in Czechoslovakia—dealing with technical barriers to trade and conformity assessment, and initiated preparations for 1993 workshops on transition issues in Croatia, Cyprus and Israel.

Statistics

The Conference of European Statisticians (fortieth session, Geneva, 15-19 June) expressed satisfaction with the approval by ECE of fundamental principles of official statistics in the region⁽³⁾ and reviewed activities in its programme areas, with a focus on new statistical systems emerging in the countries in transition. The Conference noted that the so-called "Steering Document" was designed to enable ECE countries to keep abreast of directions taken by statistical systems in transition economies and underlined the importance of monitoring and evaluating those systems. A workshop on the evaluation of transition processes in statistical offices was held (Bucharest, Romania, 2-5 November). The Conference was informed of the status of a project on applied statistical computing, designed to assist transition countries in adapting statistical computing techniques to the standards of market economies.

The Conference expressed support for the development of electronic data interchange for statistical use, stressed the importance of continuing work on the European Comparison Programme (a comparative analysis of national accounts), confirmed the direction of its work programme in social and demographic statistics, took note of the results achieved in natural resource and environment statistics, discussed experiences from the 1990 round of population censuses and reviewed ECE statistical publications. Noting with concern the discrepancy between the increasing amount of work and available staff, the Conference adopted a resolution on secretariat resources, requesting that United Nations Headquarters give highest priority to resolving the staffing problems of ECE's Statistical Division.

The Bureau of the Conference, at a meeting with the participation of the Statistical Office of EC (Eurostat) and OECD (Geneva, 26 and 27 October), reviewed cooperation and coordination between ECE, Eurostat and OECD and world-level organizations carried out through intersecretariat working groups in selected fields of statistics and joint programme review meetings.

Latin America and the Caribbean

ECLAC held its twenty-fourth session at Santiago, Chile, from 8 to 15 April.⁽¹⁾ The Commission focused its deliberations on general economic conditions in the region and strategic approaches to achieve economic growth coupled with social equity, and considered two basic documents, entitled Social Equity and Changing Production Patterns: An Integrated Approach and Education and Knowledge: Basic Pillars of Changing Production Patterns with Social Equity, the latter prepared in cooperation with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO).

By a resolution on bases for changing production patterns with social equity in Latin America and the Caribbean,⁽²⁾ the Commission emphasized the possibility and necessity of achieving socially equitable, environmentally sustainable growth within a democratic framework, and requested its secretariat, in its efforts to take an integrated approach to economic and social matters, to give priority to regional cooperation and modalities of integration; demographic issues, especially those relating to migration, population growth, family planning, urbanization and public services; international economic trends, particularly in trade and exports; domestic and external development finance; and modernization of the public sector and the role of the State in changing production patterns with social equity on a demographic and sustainable basis.

By another resolution, dealing with human resources, changing production patterns and social equity,⁽³⁾ ECLAC welcomed the document on the subject and instructed the Executive Secretary to continue working with the UNESCO Regional Office for Education to make further progress in studying, adapting and implementing the proposals contained in it and to ensure its extensive dissemination. The Commission adopted a resolution⁽⁴⁾ on UNCED⁽⁵⁾ (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII) recommending that its members promote the incorporation of the environmental dimension into the work of regional and subregional organizations and into regional and subregional agreements. It further urged⁽⁶⁾ the Latin American and Caribbean countries to implement viable programmes for cooperation between the two subregions and requested the Executive Secretary to formulate a structured cooperation programme focusing on trade and issues concerning the attraction of foreign investment to the Caribbean.

Other resolutions of ECLAC pertained to support for the reorientation of the Latin American and Caribbean Institute for Economic and Social Planning (ILPES);⁽⁷⁾ the Commission's programme of work for 1994-1995⁽⁸⁾ and the calendar of conferences for 1992-1994;⁽⁹⁾ and recommendations on the role and functions of ECLAC in the light of restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic and social fields.⁽¹⁰⁾ The Commission also adopted resolutions on strengthening intraregional cooperation;⁽¹¹⁾ the Latin American Demographic Centre (CELADE);⁽¹²⁾ preparatory activities for the 1994 International Conference on Population and Development⁽¹³⁾ and regional preparations for the 1995 World Conference on Women;⁽¹⁴⁾ cooperation among developing countries and regions;⁽¹⁵⁾ and the damage caused by the eruption of the Cerro Negro volcano in Nicaragua.⁽¹⁶⁾

In his closing statement, the Executive Secretary said that by recognizing the linkage between economic growth, social equity, environmental sustainability and democracy, the Commission sent an encouraging message about the possibility of making simultaneous progress towards those four objectives and the practical ways of applying public policies to attain them. Progress had also been made in formulating guidelines for the work of ECLAC and the United Nations, especially with regard to strengthening the relationship between democracy and development. He pointed out the need to disseminate the Commission's proposals and initiate a discussion of development at all levels of the societies of the region, particularly relating to education and knowledge, and drew attention to the richness and diversity of the existing situations in Latin America and the Caribbean, saying that they were a great asset to the region in terms of knowledge and creativity.

ECLAC continued close cooperation with other United Nations bodies and specialized agencies, and established joint programmes and units with some of them. It also maintained coordination with academic and other institutions and with subregional and regional organizations active in fields related to the Commission's programme of work.

Economic trends

In 1992, economic activity in Latin America and the Caribbean as a whole grew by 2.4 per cent, according to a summary of the 1992 economic survey of Latin America and the Caribbean.⁽¹⁷⁾ Excluding Brazil, the output of the region's economies increased by 4.3 per cent, while regional per capita GDP rose by nearly 2.3 per cent. The average annual inflation rate, excluding Brazil, declined to 22 per cent, less than half the 1991 level. Inflation rates in the region varied from Brazil's high of 1,130 per cent to about 60 per cent in Ecuador, Peru and Uruguay, almost 30 per cent in Colombia and Venezuela and below 20 per cent in the rest of the region.

In view of widespread global recession, such growth was a considerable achievement; however, there was a divergence in the performance of various economies. In Chile, GDP increased by 9.5 per cent, continuing its steady expansion for the ninth consecutive year. Economic activity in Argentina, the Dominican Republic, Panama, Uruguay and Venezuela grew by 6 to 8 per cent, while in Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras, output rose by 4 to 5 per cent. The growth rate was some 3 per cent in Bolivia, Colombia, Ecuador, Guyana and Mexico, and 1 to 2 per cent in the Bahamas, Jamaica and Paraguay. It remained unchanged in Nicaragua, Suriname and Trinidad and Tobago, and fell by an estimated 1.5 per cent in Brazil, 2.5 per cent in Barbados and Peru, and 5 per cent in Haiti. The smaller countries of the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States (OECS) (Antigua and Barbuda, Dominica, Grenada, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, and Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) maintained their growth rate of previous years, registering an average increase of some 4 per cent.

Economic expansion generally exceeded population growth, with increases in per capita output of 1 to 3 per cent in eight countries and over 4 per cent in six. In 11 States, that indicator increased just marginally or fell. The unemployment rate remained largely unchanged and declined significantly only in Chile, Panama and Venezuela, while Argentina, Brazil, Colombia and Uruguay registered higher unemployment.

The sluggishness of world trade in 1992 was reflected in a further decline of the terms of trade in goods to more than 3 per cent in almost all the countries of the region, with Argentina being the sole exception. The Central American economies were particularly hard hit by that deterioration; however, a considerable number of States, notably Brazil, Chile, Costa Rica and Honduras, expanded the volume of their exports. Total exports from the region grew by 6 per cent in volume and 4 per cent in value, reaching $126 billion. The value of exports from the oil-producing countries contracted slightly but was partially offset by increasing volumes, while the non-oil-exporting economies saw an increase in the value of their exports, which was 12 per cent in Brazil and Chile. At the same time, the vigorous expansion of imports continued and even accelerated in some cases, stimulated by tariff liberalization and the appreciation of local currencies, which, in turn, induced a negative merchandise trade balance of nearly $6 billion for the first time in many years. The value of merchandise imports in Latin America and the Caribbean rose to $132 billion, representing an increase of 18 per cent.

The negative effects of deterioration in the terms of trade were offset by considerable capital inflows for the second year in a row, amounting to more than $57 billion in 1992, which represented the most prominent feature of the regional economic picture. The bulk of capital entering the region consisted of various types of investments from private non-banking sources, including financial placements, short-term credits and acquisition of stocks. FDI increased significantly in Mexico, followed by Argentina, Brazil, Chile and Venezuela.

The net inflow of capital contributed to domestic stabilization measures, as it was used to close fiscal gaps through the acquisition of government bonds and privatized public enterprises, to spur a non-inflationary expansion of credit to the private sector for both investment and consumption and to shore up the region's international reserves. Most countries also sustained or tightened the drastic fiscal adjustments of the previous three years and stabilized the interest burden on fiscal budgets, which varied from 1 to 4 per cent of GDP. The adjustment processes were backed by negotiations to regularize external debt servicing, the decline in international interest rates and institutional reforms aimed at reinforcing export-oriented growth and trade liberalization, deregulation of the price system, consolidation of fiscal equilibria and more prudent management of monetary policy.

Domestic price stabilization efforts continued to be the focal point of macroeconomic policy, with only Brazil standing in sharp contrast to the rest of the region. Those efforts were particularly successful in Argentina and Nicaragua, which reduced the rate of consumer price increases to an annual 18 per cent and 2 per cent, respectively, although the adjustment, stabilization and restructuring programme in Nicaragua kept its economy in recession. The economies undergoing structural adjustment, such as Bolivia, Chile and Mexico, made further progress towards stabilization within a framework of sustained growth. Stabilization processes were also consolidated in Central America and the Caribbean, where annual inflation fell below 10 per cent except in Costa Rica, El Salvador and Haiti.

After stagnating in 1991, the region's external debt rose by 2 per cent in 1992, reaching $451 billion. Among various factors leading to that expansion were new bond placements abroad for the amount of $10 billion, official credits, a proliferation of short-term credit operations and accumulated arrears in interest payments. At the same time, the rising dollar exchange rate in international markets reduced the dollar value of debt denominated in other currencies, and various debt-reduction schemes were implemented in many Latin American and Caribbean countries. Debt growth was also restrained by the dynamism of non-debt-related capital movements, especially foreign direct and indirect (equity capital) investment, as well as the flow of resources to short-term deposits in the region's banking systems, reflecting in part a repatriation of capital.

Indicators of the region's external debt burden continued to fall during 1992, prolonging the trend towards improvement observed in recent years. The share of debt interest in total exports from Latin America and the Caribbean fell to 20 per cent, the lowest since 1980, although interest payments still absorbed an excessive portion of the region's export earnings. The total debt/export ratio, a more structural indicator of the debt burden, decreased to 282 per cent from 290 per cent in 1991. The structure of debt payments was also improved by extending payback periods under various official restructuring exercises.

The average price of the region's bank debt on the secondary market rose from 45 cents in December 1991 to 46 cents in November 1992, which basically reflected a perception in the market that the authorities of some countries in arrears were in a better position to renegotiate their debt with creditor banks. None the less, only five countries in 1992 had a debt/exports coefficient lower than the critical threshold of 200 per cent.

Development policy and regional economic cooperation

The ECLAC secretariat's work in economic development covered both the analysis of activities undertaken by the Economic Development Division and those related to information and documentation for economic and social development carried out by the Latin American Centre for Economic and Social Documentation (CLADES). The Economic Development Division monitored the economic performance of ECLAC members and examined their development policies and strategies likely to harmonize macroeconomic stability with social equity and structural change.

As part of its ongoing activities, ECLAC published the annual Economic Panorama of Latin America, Preliminary Overview of the Latin American Economy, and Economic Survey of Latin America and the Caribbean, which presented, respectively, a timely overview of the economic trends in the nine major economies of the region for the first half of the year and projections for the remaining months, the performance of the entire region during 1992 and complete and comparable breakdowns on the region's economic trends. ECLAC also analysed economic policies aimed at securing an expansionary adjustment and lowering inflation without inducing recession, with particular attention to the strategies adopted by some countries to reduce the external debt.

CLADES provided technical assistance to member countries and institutions connected with information and documentation, and initiated preparations for a training course on information management under the new network of Latin American information networks project. It continued to issue periodically the Informativo INFOPLAN and the Informativo Terminológico. In March, as a contribution to UNCED, CLADES published the review Reseñas de Documentos sobre Desarrollo Ambientalmente Sustentable, which listed documents on environmentally sustainable development in Latin America issued by international and regional agencies.

In 1992, consultations were initiated on the terms of collaboration between the Centre's regional programme designed to strengthen cooperation among National Information Networks and Systems for Development in Latin America and the Caribbean (INFOLAC), the project on the status of regional cooperation and the Simon Bolivar programme on Latin American technological innovation. Other activities included a meeting on "social intelligence" (Havana, Cuba, 1 and 2 June) and a regional meeting of experts on macrothesaurus and information management (Santiago, 18-20 November).

The Committee of High-level Government Experts (CEGAN), at its eighteenth session (San Jose, Costa Rica, 3-6 March), continued to discuss guidelines for the development of the Latin American and Caribbean countries during the 1990s, focusing on the two basic documents prepared by ECLAC's secretariat for the twenty-fourth session of the Commission (see above). It was agreed that, although adjustment and stabilization efforts of the previous decade were beginning to yield results, they were not founded on an adequate basis of sustained increases in productivity and were often offset by an irreversible deterioration of natural resources. The Committee therefore recognized the need for economic and social policy to concentrate on resolving short-term problems and made no medium-term projections. It further endorsed additional guidelines for future studies, identifying their priority topics as population and development, modernization of the state apparatus, regional cooperation and integration, the immediate international situation, technology and productivity, environmental sustainability, investment, and development financing.

At its eighth session, the Conference of Ministers and Heads of Planning of Latin America and the Caribbean (Madrid, Spain, 22-26 March) examined the link between Ibero-America and EC with regard to development plans, policies and strategies. The Regional Council for Planning, which met for its ninth session (Madrid, 24 March) within the framework of the Conference, recommended that the work programme of ILPES focus on priority issues taken up by Governments, specializing in strategic State management, and proposed that ILPES introduce changes in its training, technical cooperation and research components. In April, ECLAC endorsed the Council's recommendations.⁽⁷⁾

During the year, ILPES revised its training strategy to introduce a flexible, modular system of medium-length courses on specific topics in response to government requirements. Under the new system, the Institute organized a course on formulation and appraisal of social policies and projects (Santiago, 21 September-23 October) and a high-level regional development training programme and Integrated Laboratory on the Design of Regional Strategies (Santiago, 26 October-27 November). ILPES also held a seminar on models and instruments for evaluating budgetary policies (Buenos Aires, Argentina, 23-26 June) and prepared a number of studies on the subject, and provided advisory services to national planning bodies in organizing seminars and courses on project appraisal, in preparing technical documents and methodology manuals and in systems operation. The Institute maintained close cooperation with the Latin American Economic System (SELA) in the area of forward planning.

Among the numerous training activities in 1992 were 4 courses on decentralization, land-use management and siting of investments; 4 courses on project preparation and appraisal; 19 courses on decentralized municipal administration; and a seminar on national regional development funds. A fourth regional seminar on fiscal policy, stabilization and adjustment (Santiago, 27-30 January) evaluated tax reforms and programmes for restricting public expenditure. A workshop on planning activities (Santiago, 6-8 July) established analytical methods and determined the final programme of work for the regional project on fiscal decentralization. A regional seminar on public policy reform (Santiago, 3-5 August) discussed relationships among the fiscal, strategic, instrumental and political, and institutional aspects of reforms and their interaction in State restructuring processes. Technical national seminars on fiscal policy were held in Uruguay (Montevideo, 21 July) and Costa Rica (San Jose, 11 August).

Other activities in economic and social planning included courses and classes on social project formulation and appraisal (Temuco, Chile, 13-25 January; Caracas, Venezuela, 10-21 August; Buenos Aires, 16-20 November); a course-workshop on economics and health (Santiago, 4-9 May); an international course on Ibero-America, today and tomorrow (Canary Islands, Spain, 18-26 July); a course on poverty reduction (La Serena, Chile, 19 and 20 October); and classes on regional development (Neuquén, Argentina, 20-25 September). ECLAC and ILPES also promoted regional cooperation in investment programming and project banks and in the search for alternative development scenarios in the fishing industry. Under the joint ECLAC/International Centre for Living Aquatic Resources Management project, a technical meeting was organized (Santiago, 22-24 September) on the bio-economic valuation of development scenarios for pelagic fisheries in northern Chile and southern Peru.

Industrial, scientific and technological development

The Joint ECLAC/UNIDO Industry and Technology Division was responsible for activities in the industrial, scientific and technological fields. The Division placed special emphasis on industrial restructuring to build competitiveness, channelling its efforts through the ECLAC/UNDP project on designing policies to strengthen the capacity for technological innovation and enhance the international competitiveness of the Latin American entrepreneurial environment. Joint activities with the Latin American Association of Capital Goods Industries under a project to promote that industry focused on consolidating focal points for demand and promoting the technical and productive capacity of the regional capital goods sector. Technical advisory services were provided to Brazil, Chile, the Dominican Republic and Peru on non-conventional financial instruments to support small and medium-scale industry, and a study was conducted on paper recycling in the region.

The Division's publications in 1992 included a document on trends in quality and productivity for the 1990s, a regional directory of manufacturers of machinery and equipment covering 436 corporations in 11 countries, and two issues (Nos. 12 and 13) of the journal Industrialización y Desarrollo Tecnológico.

The Latin American Commission on Science and Technology (COLCYT) continued cooperating with SELA in technological forecasting under a regional research and training programme and initiated preparations for their joint participation in a United Nations seminar on technology monitoring, assessment and forecasting, scheduled for Paris in January 1993. SELA's activities in industrial and technological policy and integration focused on implementing the Regional Plan of Action on Industrialization, adopted at the 1991 Regional Conference on Industrialization, through the Permanent Regional Forum on Industrial and Technological Policy and Integration established on the recommendation of the Conference. The United Nations University (UNU) Institute for New Technologies launched a study on the role of political factors in technological policies in the region, and was commissioning a number of Latin American country studies.

International trade and development finance

The ECLAC International Trade and Development Division centred its work on four major subject areas: international economic relations; inter-regional economic relations; economic integration and regional cooperation; and development finance. Activities concentrated on formulating policies and defining mechanisms to continue expanding and improving the region's trade position in the world economy and included the preparation of 12 documents on various aspects of trade and regional economic integration, which examined prevailing trade policies in both developed and developing countries, analysed Latin American economic relations and integration processes and offered guidelines for promoting the region's exports and integration.

Jointly with UNCTAD and SELA, ECLAC began preparing a UNDP-funded programme of technical cooperation on international trade and trade relations for Latin America and the Caribbean.

In cooperation with the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB), ECLAC sponsored a second colloquium on global questions related to hemispheric trade liberalization (Washington, DC., 30 April and 1 May). A third colloquium on the subject was held at Toronto, Canada, from 31 May to 2 June. The ECLAC secretariat also participated in a meeting of agencies and experts on Latin American and Caribbean integration and cooperation, hosted by SELA on 25 and 26 June. An informal inter-agency meeting on trade-related activities, held on 9 September in conjunction with the eighteenth meeting of the Latin American Council of SELA (Caracas, 7-11 September), reviewed the activities of various agencies and identified priorities of inter-institutional cooperation in international trade, regional integration, support mechanisms for Governments and other actors in the region, trade relations with the United States and regional relations with Europe and Asia.

In 1992, SELA and other regional organizations held consultations with UNCTAD to determine the best way of adapting payment and clearing arrangements without distorting normal flows of trade, investment and technology. Training programmes and advisory services were elaborated with the participation of SELA member States to encourage the involvement of regional enterprises in environmentally sound trade and development activities. A seminar on GATT was held in Ecuador in February, and officials from SELA member States participated in a trade policy course in Spanish, organized by GATT, during the first half of the year.

Foreign trade officials of member countries of the Latin American Integration Association, at their fifth meeting (Santiago, 23 and 24 November), considered issues related to Latin American integration, negotiations and international economic relations, and relations with developed economies.

Activities in development finance included studies on bank regulation and supervision (Brazil, El Salvador, Honduras, Trinidad and Tobago) and on pension reform systems (Argentina, El Salvador, Honduras, Jamaica, Paraguay, Trinidad and Tobago), as well as seminars on those subjects (Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, 23 November; Santiago, 3 and 4 December) and on indexing financial funds in Latin America (Santiago, 3 and 4 August). ECLAC, UNU, the World Institute for Development Economics Research and UNCTAD jointly organized an international seminar on savings and financial policy issues in African, Asian, and Latin American and Caribbean countries (Santiago, 5 and 6 October). Among 1992 publications were project documents on reducing inflation rates in the region and on financing exports, a review of regional experiences in bank regulation and supervision and five issues of the Financiamiento del Desarrollo series on development finance.

Natural resources and energy

ECLAC's activities in support of natural resource and energy management concentrated on four subject areas: mineral resources, water resources, marine resources and energy. The secretariat continued its support to the Latin American Mining Organization in implementing the second phase of the Latin American Regional Mining Information and Documentation System and assessed the mining situation in several countries. Assistance was provided in calculating the economic value of natural resources and assessing their use in the region, preparing legal and institutional analyses of natural resource management and maintaining a statistical database on international trade, prices, output and reserves of mining resources.

The secretariat analysed recommendations of UNCED pertaining to marine resources, with a view to assisting countries in formulating appropriate marine policies, and offered a course-workshop on development management of basins and micro-regions in Latin America (Santa Fe de Bogotá, Colombia, 19-22 May). Advisory services were delivered to a number of countries to help establish a cooperation network on integrated water resource management, and a postgraduate course on the subject was offered (Mendoza, Argentina, 28 September-23 October).

Transport

A regional technical cooperation project on transport, distribution, commercialization and competitiveness of exports concluded in 1992 with the publication of a document summarizing the findings of project studies and proposing a methodology for an overall analysis of a corridor for world trade. The work completed under another project, on control and organization of urban public transport systems in Latin America, was reviewed in a document on the impact of subsidies, regulation and different forms of ownership on the quality of service and operational efficiency of urban bus systems. A publication on restructuring public-sector enterprises in the case of the region's ports inspired studies on rationalizing port activities in 14 countries.

A regional technical cooperation project on road maintenance resulted in a book providing a new approach to road network management and conservation, which was widely distributed in Latin America and followed by national seminars on the subject in seven countries. Regional seminars on the same topic were held in Chile (Santiago, 27 and 28 April) and Mexico (Mexico City, 18 and 19 May). A seminar on institutional aspects of mass urban transport (Lima, Peru, 19-22 May) addressed issues related to transport deregulation.

The Commission provided support to Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Colombia, Chile, Ecuador, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay and Venezuela in establishing and institutionalizing the Conference of Ministers of Transport, Communications and Public Works of South America (Santiago, 27-29 May) as a permanent regional forum. Transport-related issues were also considered at a meeting of Ministers of Transport, Communications and Public Works of the Andean Group (Caracas, 22-24 October) and at a meeting of Ministers of Public Works and Transport of the Southern Cone Countries (Punta del Este, Uruguay, 9-14 November).

Within the framework of the General Assembly of the Latin American Railways Association at its eighteenth session, a symposium was held on the restructuring and privatization of Latin America's railways (Santiago, 17-19 November).

Social development

In the early 1990s, nearly 200 million Latin Americans were unable to meet their basic needs and poverty continued to increase. As the Governments of the region were attaching growing importance to the study of the nature and evolution of poverty and policies to combat it, the ECLAC Social Development Division concentrated on preparations for the Third Regional Conference on Poverty in Latin America and the Caribbean (Santiago, 23-25 November).⁽¹⁸⁾

The Conference, in which 25 ECLAC member States and several United Nations bodies and agencies participated, assessed the levels and characteristics of poverty and poverty-reduction efforts in Latin America and the Caribbean, considered policies to promote higher productivity among the rural and urban poor, and discussed targeting of social policies to reduce poverty in the region. Noting the need for various institutions, policies and programmes to fight poverty from different angles and the need to coordinate action at regional and international levels, the Conference proposed the establishment of an intergovernmental information network on anti-poverty social policies and the creation of an advisory system within its framework. It also pointed out the need to maintain the continuity of regional cooperation, avoid duplication of efforts and take full advantage of available resources in the framework of national anti-poverty strategies.

The third informal inter-agency meeting on integrated social policies and economic adjustment

(Caracas, 7 and 8 May), convened by SELA, resulted in important agreements on joint activities, including the final revision of the meeting's basic document, on the social dimensions of changing production patterns with social equity, prepared by ECLAC; establishment of a social project bank and an information and communications network; inter-agency missions and projects on social policy; and organization of a regional meeting to prepare for a world summit for social development.

ECLAC contributed to the Latin American and Caribbean regional meeting in preparation for the International Year of the Family (1994) (Cartagena de Indias, 10-13 August) and prepared a number of studies on family issues. It also offered a workshop on methodologies for analysing the situation of the family in Latin America (Mexico City, 27-30 October). Cooperation activities in the field of youth were reviewed at the fourth informal inter-agency meeting on youth in Latin America and the Caribbean (Seville, Spain, 14 September), while another meeting discussed the methodology of a project on popular participation and community organization, organized jointly with three universities in Spain (Santiago, 9 June). Various courses on social development and a lecture on adjustment, restructuring and social security in the region were also offered in 1992.

Integration of women

The Commission attached great importance to activities related to the integration of women into development, including the elaboration of a new regional programme of action for women in Latin America and the Caribbean, 1995-2001, and preparing an assessment of the status of women. In April, ECLAC urged the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly to allocate the resources needed for regional activities in preparing for the 1995 World Conference on Women.⁽¹⁴⁾ Those activities, as well as measures and mechanisms for their coordination, were evaluated at a meeting of specialized agencies and other bodies of the United Nations system (Santiago, 3 and 4 September),⁽¹⁹⁾ which identified priority issues for future action to promote the integration of women into Latin American and Caribbean development. The meeting agreed that the integration of gender analysis into policy formulation should be promoted as a guiding principle, that future activities should be defined by the integration of women into global processes and that women's participation must be ensured at all levels of decision-making. It was also agreed that the United Nations should give priority to in-house gender training, that there was a need to analyse the family from the perspective of women and that men and boys as well as girls and young women must be mobilized and sensitized if effective changes were to be made through education.

The Presiding Officers of the Regional Conference on the Integration of Women into the Economic and Social Development of Latin America and the Caribbean met twice during 1992. At their fourteenth meeting (Curaçao, Netherlands Antilles, 18 and 19 June)⁽²⁰⁾ they reviewed national and regional activities undertaken since 1 June 1991; considered actions taken to implement the resolutions of the Conference at its fifth session held in September 1991,⁽²¹⁾ and set up a group of experts to prepare a new regional programme of action on the integration of women into economic and social development. That group (Mexico City, 26-28 October)⁽²²⁾ discussed the objective and structure of the regional programme of action and identified its priority areas, including the relationship between women and power and issues related to power-sharing and social equity. It was decided that the programme should cover the period 1995-2001 and focus on changing current society as a prerequisite for achieving social equity.

The Presiding Officers, at their fifteenth meeting (Mexico City, 29 and 30 October),⁽²³⁾ reviewed the new regional programme of action, evaluated their work for 1991-1992 and considered future activities in preparation for the sixth session of the Regional Conference.

The improvement of the legal and institutional framework for incorporating women into development was the subject of a technical meeting (Tegucigalpa, Honduras, 13 and 14 February) and national and regional workshops (Asuncion, Paraguay, 1 and 2 August; Santiago, 14-16 October). The legal status of women was also discussed at a national seminar in Ecuador (Quito, 4 and 5 May). Among other 1992 activities were a working meeting on women and violence (Santiago, 29 April) and a seminar on gender and identity (Santiago, 18 and 19 August).

Environment

The ECLAC Environment and Human Settlements Division centred its efforts on finding alternative instruments for the promotion of sustainable economic growth through policies designed to enhance the quality of life in the region's human settlements. It initiated activities to improve information and statistics on the urban environment, and provided assistance under a project on technical cooperation for environmental planning and management in Latin America and the Caribbean, financed by the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP). The Division also provided technical assistance through the execution of projects related to guidelines and advisory services on controlled environmentally sound waste management and on urban management in selected middle-sized Latin American cities.

The management of hazardous wastes in the context of environmentally sustainable development was the subject of a national seminar in Argentina (Buenos Aires, 21 and 22 April) and an international course in Chile (Santiago, 30 June-10 July). Another national seminar (Santiago, 22-24 June) examined management of sustainable agricultural development in marginal areas of Chile. A seminar/workshop on environmentally sound waste management for sustainable development (Cartagena de Indias, 3 and 4 September) was followed by a national seminar on 7 and 8 September, which considered a case-study on the subject. Another seminar in Chile (Santiago, 16-20 March) formulated an action plan for environmental education in that country.

Human settlements

A Regional Meeting of Ministers and High-level Authorities of the Housing and Urban Development Sector in Latin America and the Caribbean (Santiago, 16-20 March)⁽²⁴⁾ reviewed the regional situation in that sector; considered international financing for housing, concentration of resources on low-cost housing and cost-recovering capacity, restoration and repopulation of deteriorated city centres and modalities for a permanent regional experience-sharing mechanism; and adopted the Santiago Declaration. The Declaration provided for the establishment of an advisory and coordinating body among the participants of the meeting and requested the ECLAC secretariat to strengthen its role in coordinating United Nations activities in the area of housing and human settlements. The participants agreed to hold regular biennial meetings to analyse the main trends in housing development, share experience and know-how and define cooperation objectives.

Other activities included a regional meeting on selected middle-sized Latin American cities (Santiago, 11-15 May); a course on State, region and municipality (Santiago, April-June); an international course on Government and municipal administration (Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, 22-29 November); and a training course for municipal officials under the municipal management and training support programme (Taka, Chile, 26 November-3 December).

Population

During 1992, CELADE, the institution within ECLAC responsible for the regional population programme, fielded 41 missions to 16 countries and provided technical assistance in the areas of the elderly population; census processing; demographic analysis; maternal and child mortality; applications of the "previous child" computer programme, developed by the Centre to help hospitals establish a database on health conditions of previous children of women in maternity wards; population and environment; population projections; spatial distribution; demographic dynamics of poverty; population policies; computerized documentation on population and bibliographic searches; and the use of a computerized data retrieval system interfacing with geographical and demographic information systems.

The Centre's training and teaching activities included a second course on population and development under the UNFPA Global Plan of Training in Population and Development (Santiago, 3 March-3 December), evaluated at the Scientific Advisory Committee meeting (Santiago, 20 and 21 October); the fifteenth intensive regional course on demographic analysis for development (San Jose, 3 August-4 December); a workshop on policies for the care of the elderly (Santiago, 2-6 November); a regional workshop on in-depth analysis of the results of a demographic and health survey (Santiago, 27 February-27 March); and courses on the population dimension in development strategies (Santiago, 22 June-6 July) and on spatial planning (Santiago, July-August). Training courses were organized in specific fields, including a course-workshop on socio-demographic analysis of census data (Bolivia, 30 November-11 December), a one-week workshop on subnational population projections (Valdivia, Chile, January) and a seminar-workshop on the use of demographic-economic models in policy formulation.

A Meeting of Government Experts on Population and Development in Latin America and the Caribbean (Saint Lucia, 6-9 October)⁽²⁵⁾ held in preparation for the 1994 International Conference on Population and Development, examined socioeconomic trends and implications of population growth, structure and distribution in the region, and formulated recommendations on a wide variety of population issues, such as population dynamics, development and equity, fertility and mortality, and spatial distribution and migrations; population policies and programmes; population growth and distribution in relation to development and the environment; women and population dynamics; and family planning, health and family well-being.

Food and agriculture

A number of documents published by ECLAC in 1992 gave an overview of agriculture and forestry development in the region. Several missions were conducted in Chile to obtain information for a case study on agro-industrial changes and relations, using a methodology to be applied in similar studies in the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Nicaragua and Paraguay. Projects on the modernizing impact of agro-industry in Paraguay and on the use of forestry resources within the concept of sustainable development, both financed from extrabudgetary resources, were prepared during the year.

FAO provided assistance to Central American countries to strengthen their food control programmes as a means of contributing to the region's economic development and integration and reducing non-tariff barriers. Similar projects were being implemented in Peru and other Latin American and Caribbean countries. Another project was being prepared to strengthen food standardization and import/export control in the Southern Cone Common Market. Within the framework of a joint FAO/UNEP/World Health Organization food contamination and assessment programme, two subregional networks were developed for the monitoring of food contaminants, especially pesticide residues, in Central and South America.

Statistics and economic projections

The ECLAC Statistics and Projections Division concentrated its work on enlarging the regional network of statistical information; statistical development and quantitative analysis; regional cooperation, dissemination and transfer of new computer technologies to the countries; prospective medium- and long-term studies on Latin American and Caribbean development; and analysis of the region's position in world production and trade. The Division launched the first stage of a database of short-term indicators, incorporated new international statistical classifications into the regional data bank on external trade and created a database on external debt, covering the period 1970-1980. It also added new survey results to the household survey data bank, refined and augmented the database on social statistics and started replacing the 1980 base year used in national accounts with a more recent year in preparation for adopting a new system of national accounts.

Special importance was attached to refining the methods of updating sampling frames and sample designs; the development of household survey databases to facilitate the application of more advanced methods of measuring poverty; a study of computerized systems to be used in the region; and the analysis and definition of social indicators included each year in the Panorama Social de America Latina. The Division collaborated with Governments and other United Nations bodies in organizing seminars and indicator databases and assisted in the data compilation and computer processing of statistical information. Two seminars were held on the renovation of sampling frames and sample designs (Caracas, 22-24 September; Port of Spain, Trinidad and Tobago, 29 September-1 October), and one on Central American foreign trade statistics (Guatemala City, 7-11 September).

Work in the field of economic projections focused on analysing the external economic factors influencing the region and on updating medium- and long-term prospects for Latin American and Caribbean countries. As for the region's global integration, emphasis was placed on studying the situation and the evolution of the world economy and its possible impact on regional development.

Activities in the area of statistics were reviewed at a meeting of Directors of Statistics of the Americas (Madrid, 11-13 November),⁽²⁶⁾ which discussed national experiences in conducting the 1990s round of censuses and examined the latest revision of the national accounts system. It considered the current status and future outlook of administrative records and the architecture of regional statistical data banks and geographical information systems as its special topics, and evaluated activities currently pursued in various statistical areas, including the informal sector, social and poverty indicators, short-term indicators and statistics, foreign trade statistics and the environment.

Transnational corporations

The joint unit of ECLAC and the United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations continued to carry out research, information and technical cooperation activities to identify contributions (and the repercussions thereof) by TNCs to the development of the Latin American and Caribbean countries, and elaborating case-studies on specific countries and sectors, focusing on the interests and concerns of the Governments and economic agents of ECLAC members. A number of working papers were completed under a project on the role of foreign capital in the process of industrial restructuring in the region, and questionnaires were administered to the major foreign-owned manufacturing companies of Brazil, Chile and Colombia. The joint unit initiated three special studies involving the collection, processing and analysis of background information on the role of foreign direct investment by TNCs in industrial restructuring in Argentina, Mexico and Peru.

The contribution of TNCs to growth and development in the region was the central theme of a high-level symposium (Santiago, 19 and 20 October).

Technical cooperation and assistance

During 1992, the ECLAC Programme Planning and Operations Division completed five regional, three subregional and seven country projects and launched 20 new projects for a total amount of some $4.8 million. Technical assistance was provided to Chile, Colombia and the Dominican Republic in the area of food and agriculture, and similar assistance was extended to Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, El Salvador, Jamaica, Mexico, Nicaragua, the Dominican Republic, Uruguay and Venezuela on economic development and economic and social planning.

ECLAC collaborated with the Latin American Integration Association in designing a project to establish an integrated system of information and support for the region's foreign trade, and offered assistance to member countries in other programme areas, including industrial, scientific and technological development; international trade and development finance; natural resources and energy; environment and human settlements; population; social development and the integration of women into the socio-economic development of the region; transport; and statistics and economic projections.

Technical assistance in promoting linkages between regional economies and foreign markets was also provided by the Department of Economic and Social Development (DESD) of the United Nations Secretariat, and included the formulation and implementation of policies and laws in foreign investment, foreign trade and technology transfer, and the establishment of linkages between specific companies in the region and TNCs in natural resources, agriculture, manufacturing and

Technical cooperation among developing countries

The Division continued to carry out various activities within the framework of the 1978 Buenos Aires Plan of Action for Promoting and Implementing Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries.⁽²⁷⁾ Those activities were coordinated through a regional mechanism, set up for that purpose by ECLAC and SELA with UNDP support, and reviewed at a regional meeting of national directors for international technical cooperation (Caracas, 7-9 September) and by a seasonal committee on TCDC, which discussed the main guidelines of work in this field for the following biennium.

ECLAC continued to promote TCDC initiatives related to technical cooperation projects in specific sectors and prepared a document on the guidelines and regional strategies for TCDC in the 1990s. In July, the Commission hosted a regional meeting on TCDC in health technologies, within the framework of the "project convergence" exercise, intended to stimulate the development of health technology in the region. The meeting was preceded by subregional meetings on the subject in Central America (Antigua, Guatemala, 9-12 March) and in the Caribbean (Bridgetown, Barbados, 27-30 April).

ECLAC also collaborated with the Administrative Committee for the Coordination of Information Systems in preparing the United Nations Register of Development Projects for 1991 and in publishing the quarterly bulletin Cooperation and Development (Nos. 37-39), which described technical cooperation initiatives carried out by the Commission.

Subregional activities

Caribbean

The ECLAC subregional headquarters for the Caribbean, at Port of Spain, Trinidad and Tobago, analysed issues relevant to the promotion of socio-economic development in the Caribbean Development and Cooperation (CDCC) countries and focused on the initiation and implementation of projects pertinent to them. It continued to prepare economic analyses of Caribbean countries, including overviews of their economic activity for 1990 and 1991; develop and maintain electronic databases on information collection and dissemination and amplify the coverage of its database in terms of countries and subject matter; issue a quarterly bulletin on trade and related activities; and support the activities of the Caribbean Council for Science and Technology, which held its eleventh session in 1992 (Saint Lucia, 12-14 September). The CDCC secretariat also developed population units and contributed to population policy formulation in various Caribbean countries, concluded a project on training policies to identify problems of public-sector services, prepared a document on implications of the proposed North American Free Trade Agreement from the Caribbean perspective, and provided assistance in organizing a Subregional Conference on Poverty in the Caribbean (Dominican Republic, 30 September-2 October).

A project on socio-cultural and environmental management issues in Caribbean tourism, completed in 1992, included one regional and two national workshops in Trinidad and Tobago (13 and 14 February), Barbados (12 and 13 March) and Saint Lucia (18 and 19 March), respectively, to develop a plan of action on tourism in the subregion and forecasting models on tourist arrivals for 26 Caribbean countries.

CDCC held consultations on national science and technology activities in Saint Lucia (21-24 April) and Belize (27 April-1 May), followed by a regional seminar/workshop to develop a plan of action for science and technology (Saint Lucia, 8-11 September). It also organized a workshop for its national focal points (Port of Spain, 15 and 16 July) and provided training on the UNEP/ECLAC Electronic Environment Information System (Port of Spain, 30 November-2 December). A number of other training workshops dealt with the application of computer programs and with the analysis of census data using such programs. A working group on Non-independent Caribbean Countries held its first meeting in conjunction with a meeting on inter-organizational collaboration (Grenada, 7 December).

Mexico and Central America

The ECLAC subregional headquarters for Mexico and Central America, at Mexico City, carried out activities in Central America, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Haiti and Mexico, with the aim of reviving and transforming the subregion's economies and consolidating Central American integration. A significant share of the work was devoted to analysing economic developments in 1991.

As a contribution to the modernization of the manufacturing sector, project profiles and studies were elaborated on capital formation in some countries, and research was initiated on the feasibility of producing agricultural raw materials for the pharmaceutical industry. In the field of energy, ECLAC continued its research on the supply of oil for electricity generation and its activities in support of Central American electrical integration. Documents were prepared on the energy crisis, methods of saving energy and electrical interconnection, and simulation models to optimize petroleum supply to Central America were considered at a seminar/workshop in Nicaragua (Managua, 6-11 June) under a technical cooperation project for enhancing the petroleum subsector. At the request of Nicaragua, the Commission collaborated with UNDP in evaluating the damage caused by the eruption of the Cerro Negro volcano and the subsequent tsunami that struck the country. In the area of social development, research was begun on savings and financing mechanisms for low-income groups.

Food and agricultural activities in 1992 were closely connected to issues related to international and intraregional trade in agricultural commodities and trade liberalization. Advisory services on the subject were provided to the Central American countries in the Uruguay Round, and a study was conducted on recent trends in the trade of some Central American products and their consequences for the subregion, coupled with a seminar on production of traditional agricultural exports (Mexico City, 10 and 11 December). Economic relations between Mexico and Central America were reviewed at a meeting of Central American Vice-Ministers of Economic Affairs (Mexico City, 30 March), which evaluated the progress achieved in implementing the trade liberalization programme with Mexico and its prospects. The impact of trade liberalization on Mexican agriculture was analysed under a technical cooperation project, which also provided alternative scenarios for the organization of production and the application of differentiated public policies.

Other activities during the year included a seminar on small- and medium-scale industry (San Jose, 19 October), followed by the first Central American Congress on Micro-, Small- and Medium-scale Industry (San Pedro Sula, Honduras, 23 and 24 October), a seminar/workshop on liberalization of the petroleum trade in Central America (Tegucigalpa, 26-28 August) and the fourth meeting on the petroleum supply in the subregion (Panama, 12 and 13 November). Training was provided on rural modernization in Mexico and on new Mexican agrarian policies.

Cooperation between the United Nations and the Latin American Economic System

In response to a 1991 General Assembly resolution,⁽²⁸⁾ the Secretary-General submitted, in October 1992, a report⁽²⁹⁾ on cooperation between the United Nations and the Latin American Economic System. Collaboration between the two entities, which had been growing stronger and broader in scope since the establishment of SELA in 1975, was further strengthened through a cooperation agreement signed in September 1991, which spurred new activities with a wider range of United Nations bodies.

An essential part of those activities continued to be carried out through ECLAC, which provided support to various SELA projects and participated in SELA meetings. ECLAC and SELA maintained ongoing consultations in the fields of social policies and economic planning, information, trade development and other areas of economic cooperation; on the promotion of a convergence among various Latin American economic integration modalities; on environment and development; and on the execution of a special cooperation programme on external trade.

Cooperation between SELA and UNDP concentrated on activities related to international trade negotiations, industrialization, integration, external debt, and regional cooperation and convergence. Further activities in those and other fields, such as external economic relations, foreign trade and financing, innovation, and competitiveness and social equity were incorporated in a new UNDP/SELA project for an amount of $550,000, to be included in the UNDP fifth programming cycle (1992-1996) for an initial period of two years (1993-1994). Jointly with UNDP, SELA co-sponsored and hosted a regional workshop on the application of the Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer⁽³⁰⁾ (12-15 May). UNDP also assisted SELA in defining a working strategy to strengthen national focal points for technical cooperation and in identifying related priority areas, which facilitated the promotion of programming exercises and TCDC negotiations in specific fields.

The SELA/UNESCO/IDB regional Simon Bolívar Programme, aimed at achieving technological development, innovation and industrial competitiveness through new linkages among the scientific, academic, business and public sectors in Latin America and the Caribbean, was launched on 31 March. Another project, analysing the status of the Uruguay Round of multi-lateral trade negotiations in terms of the interests of the countries in the region, was being carried out by SELA in collaboration with UNCTAD. DESD implemented a substantial technical cooperation programme in developing countries that were SELA members and continued to work closely with SELA in the research and analysis of development issues of global and regional concern.

SELA hosted the third meeting of the Latin American and Caribbean Forum on Intellectual Property Policies (20 and 21 July), which considered the general situation and international trends in intellectual property protection; the Uruguay Round and trade-related aspects of intellectual property rights; the 1970 Patent Cooperation Treaty; the possibilities of advancing towards a Latin American patent system; and elements of a possible SELA/TCDC programme on industrial property. The SELA/UNIDO programme of cooperation, agreed on in 1989, accorded priority to industrial and technological development activities in the region.

The SELA Action Committee for the Economic and Social Development of Central America (CADESCA) received assistance from FAO in calculating production costs and producer subsidy equivalents for maize, sorghum, rice and beans and in organizing workshops on the calculation of such equivalents for basic grains and standardization of the calculation methodology. Another area of cooperation between CADESCA and FAO was the preparation of national studies on producer subsidy equivalents and on marketing foodstuffs in rural areas of Central America and Panama, as well as workshops on management and analysis of data on food consumption for food and nutrition surveillance. SELA and FAO also planned to cooperate in establishing a fertilizer information network for Latin America and the Caribbean.

In conclusion, the report stressed that cooperation between SELA and the United Nations system became increasingly diversified during the year and helped to optimize existing resources for the benefit of the countries in the region.

Organizational questions

JIU report

By an April note,⁽³¹⁾ the Secretary-General transmitted to the Economic and Social Council a second report of the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) on the cost-benefit of the Commission's office accommodation at Port of Spain, prepared as a follow-up to a 1987 JIU report on the rational use of space and location of offices at the Commission's headquarters at Santiago. JIU noted that the subregional office at Port of Spain was limited in its capacity for expansion, efficiency and effectiveness due to the size and location of the premises. In the light of the offer of Trinidad and Tobago to make a piece of land available for the use of interested international organizations at no cost, JIU recommended that ECLAC begin negotiations leading to the donation of the land, followed by in-situ arrangements for the construction of offices. It also recommended that all agencies paying rent to third parties alert their organizations to the savings and benefits to be realized from locating all the agencies in the same place.

The Secretary-General, in a July addendum to the report, notified the Council that ECLAC would begin consultations on the subject and examine the construction costs and viability of the project as soon as a firm commitment was obtained from Trinidad and Tobago to donate the property to the United Nations. By decision 1992/295 of 31 July, the Council took note of the JIU report and the Secretary-General's comments thereon.

Venue of the twenty-fifth session of ECLAC

On 31 July, the Economic and Social Council, acting on a recommendation of ECLAC,⁽³²⁾ decided that the Commission's twenty-fifth session should be held at Cartagena de Indias in 1994 (decision 1992/291).

Western Asia

In a January 1992 letter to the Secretary-General,⁽¹⁾ Bahrain confirmed its offer to host in April the sixteenth session of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia, which had been postponed for one year by a 1991 decision of the Economic and Social Council,⁽²⁾ owing to the interruption of work by the Persian Gulf hostilities and the subsequent temporary repatriation of staff. Activities of the Commission had been officially resumed in August 1991.⁽³⁾ On 7 February 1992, the Council decided that the session would be held in Bahrain from 27 to 30 April 1992 (decision 1992/212).

The Secretariat was subsequently informed of the withdrawal of Bahrain's invitation. By a June note,⁽⁴⁾ the Secretary-General notified the Council accordingly and proposed a new date and venue for the session. By decision 1992/224 of 29 June, the Council endorsed the Secretary-General's proposal.

In accordance with the Council's decision, the Commission held its sixteenth session at Amman, Jordan, from 30 August to 3 September 1992.⁽⁵⁾ The Commission assessed progress in implementing its programme of work for 1990-1991 and reviewed follow-up action on its resolutions adopted at the fifteenth (1989) session.⁽⁶⁾ It also examined regional follow-up to United Nations world conferences and ESCWA regional meetings, and issues related to cooperation among developing countries and regional organizations. The Commission commended the secretariat's efforts to continue its work during the Persian Gulf hostilities.⁽⁷⁾

Noting with deep concern the devastating effects of man-made destruction and natural disasters on economic and social conditions in ESCWA countries, the Commission declared⁽⁸⁾ 1994-2003 a

Reconstruction and Rehabilitation Decade for Western Asia, and requested its secretariat, in close coordination with concerned regional and international organizations, to intensify efforts to promote regional cooperation in the areas of reconstruction, rehabilitation and manpower, and to organize a meeting to assess the progress made and formulate appropriate policies. It also adopted resolutions on: the reconstruction of Lebanon;⁽⁹⁾ the economic and social condition of Palestinian Arabs in the occupied Palestinian territories⁽¹⁰⁾ and the Syrian people in the occupied Syrian Golan;⁽¹¹⁾ preparations for the International Year of the Family, 1994;⁽¹²⁾ support for the Regional Household Survey Project;⁽¹³⁾ the impact of a single European market on Western Asia;⁽¹⁴⁾ and the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields.⁽¹⁵⁾ (For other resolutions on specific issues, see below.)

In an October addendum to his report on regional cooperation,⁽¹⁶⁾ the Secretary-General communicated to the Economic and Social Council the Commission's resolutions that required action by the Council or were brought to its attention.

Economic trends

The overall economic performance and outlook of the region improved considerably in 1992, according to a summary of the survey of economic and social developments in the ESCWA region, 1992.⁽¹⁷⁾ Among the contributing factors were: the progress in implementing economic reform programmes in Egypt and Jordan; the spread of privatization and policies of "opening up" to the Syrian Arab Republic, Yemen and other countries; the resiliency of Jordan and other economies in coping with the aftermath of the Persian Gulf hostilities; progress in the reconstruction of Kuwait; and a continuing commitment to the Middle East peace negotiations. With the exception of Iraq, which continued to be adversely affected by United Nations sanctions, the region showed higher aggregate output and per capita income levels, a marked improvement in the internal and external balance situation, and reduced inflationary pressures.

After declining in 1990-1991, regional GDP was estimated to have grown by 4.5 per cent in 1992, with all ESCWA members, except Iraq and Yemen, achieving positive growth rates. Economic activity in the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) group of countries grew by 5.2 per cent, compared with a 0.8 per cent decline in the previous year. The fastest growth, 30 per cent, was recorded by Kuwait, which had a 40 per cent fall in output in 1991. Kuwait's rebound was largely due to a sharp increase in oil production and a boom in construction activity to rebuild the country's infrastructure and basic services. Oman's GDP growth rate was estimated at 9 per cent, against 7.5 per cent in the previous year. Growth in the non-oil sector was the major contributing factor to Oman's performance. Saudi Arabia's economy was expected to grow by 4 per cent, down from 6 per cent in 1991.

With one of the region's more diversified economies, Jordan achieved the highest growth, 8 per cent, after a marginal 1.1 per cent in 1991. Jordan also reduced inflation from 8.2 to about 4 per cent. The central contributing factors were a boom in the construction sector, boosted by sharp rises in demand and investment, financed mainly through the repatriated savings of returnees, increased investment in the manufacturing sector and a favourable agricultural season. The GDP growth rate in the Syrian Arab Republic was estimated at 5 per cent. Egypt's economy grew by 3.5 per cent, driven by higher oil revenues, record earnings from tourism and Suez Canal dues, an improved balance of payments, and increased private sector investment.

Privatization gained further momentum in 1992 as the Syrian Arab Republic and Yemen adopted investment promotion laws, and Egypt and Jordan pursued privatization under structural adjustment programmes. A recovery in non-oil sector activities in the Persian Gulf, the return of capital that was repatriated during the crisis, as well as good agricultural harvests in some countries gave an added boost to the region's development.

Many serious obstacles to development persisted, however. The Persian Gulf hostilities had adverse effects on regional trade and aid and labour flows, and it strained relations even among countries with traditionally close economic and cultural ties. The crisis also accentuated the priority attached to security and defence, helping to widen budget deficits, increase external debt, and hinder the consolidation of institutions and policies needed to implement Yemen's unification agreement of May 1990. Income disparities within and between Western Asian economies remained a problem, together with inflation and unemployment, the latter running at double-digit rates in Egypt, Jordan and Yemen.

Sharply reduced remittances and aid flows, lower oil revenues and a series of strikes by civil-servants and trade unions, coupled with a massive influx of refugees and returnees from the Gulf crisis, contributed to depressed economic activity in Yemen. GDP in Yemen declined for the third year, although at a lower rate, 2 per cent, while inflation was estimated to have risen from 40 per cent in 1991 to 50 per cent. Iraq's economy also continued to suffer from high inflation, fuelled by severe supply constraints and excessive money supply. Inflation averaged 120 per cent in Lebanon, ranging as high as 200 per cent in the first 6 months of the year, but subsided in some other countries, notably Egypt and Jordan.

Government budgeting and financial planning in Western Asia continued to suffer the impact of the hostilities in the Persian Gulf, though to a lesser degree than in 1990-1991.

The budgets of most ESCWA countries in 1992 were aimed at restoring financial order and economic balance. Budget deficits were largely contained by increases in oil revenues and the trimming of expenditures associated with the crisis. The total debt of the GCC countries was estimated at about $90 billion at the end of 1992, of which $65 billion was domestic.

The total external debt of the ESCWA region was estimated at more than $180 billion at the end of 1992, with Egypt, Iraq, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia accounting for a significant portion. While the debt of GCC member countries could be serviced from their substantial foreign financial resources, indebtedness remained a heavy burden on other Western Asian countries. A number of these, however, were able to reschedule significant portions of their debt, and in Jordan the ratio of external debt to gross national product fell from 220 per cent in 1991 to 150 per cent in 1992.

Sectoral developments

Oil and natural gas

Oil markets in 1992 remained calm compared with 1990 and the first half of 1991. Average oil prices were virtually unchanged at $18.50 per barrel. There was a gradual return of Kuwait's oil production to almost equal its pre-Gulf crisis level, and production by members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) reached 24.4 million barrels a day, the highest level since 1980. Demand, however, grew by less than 1 per cent, reflecting the overall sluggishness of the global economy.

Total crude oil production in the ESCWA region, after declining by 4.2 per cent in 1991, rose by 8.2 per cent in 1992, bringing oil revenues for the year to $77.5 billion, 13.8 per cent higher than in 1991 ($68 billion) but still 5.2 per cent below the 1990 level of $81.7 billion. The largest increase was recorded in Kuwait, where oil revenues reached $4.1 billion compared with $500 million in 1991. Saudi Arabia followed with 3 per cent growth in production and a 10.7 per cent gain in revenues. The Syrian Arab Republic had increases of 7.7 and 3.8 per cent in output and revenues, respectively, while the United Arab Emirates registered 2.9 and 2.4 per cent declines, respectively. Yemen's output and revenues fell by 10.2 and 16.3 per cent, respectively. Oil production rose by 2.4 per cent in Bahrain. Iraq's output grew by 53.9 per cent, but the volume was still only about one seventh that of its pre-Gulf crisis level, and oil exports were blocked by United Nations sanctions, except for 50,000 barrels a day that were exported to Jordan in repayment of debt.

The region's share of total OPEC production increased from 56.3 per cent in 1991 to 61.3 per cent in 1992 but remained 1.2 per cent below its 1990 level. The share of ESCWA countries in total OPEC revenues grew from 52.7 per cent in 1991 to 56.7 per cent in 1992.

Proven oil reserves in the region remained virtually unchanged at 574.8 billion barrels, accounting for 57.7 per cent of the world total and 77.4 per cent of the OPEC total. Saudi Arabia accounted for 45.3 per cent of the regional total and 26.1 per cent of global oil reserves, followed by Iraq with 17.4 per cent of the regional total and 10 per cent of the world total. Iraq, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates combined accounted for 55.5 per cent of the world's proven oil reserves.

Proven gas reserves in the ESCWA region grew by 14 per cent in 1992 to be slightly more than 17 per cent of the world total. This was mainly due to discoveries in Egypt, Oman, Qatar and Yemen. Although most of this production was intended for local consumption, Western Asian countries with large gas reserves were looking for export markets in Europe and Asia. A number of gas purchase agreements were concluded with European and Asian countries in 1992.

Agriculture

Growth in the agricultural production index ranged from 1.7 per cent in Egypt to 48 per cent in Jordan. Despite a 5.2 per cent increase in the area under cultivation, the region's cereal production fell by 3.5 per cent against the 1991 harvest. However, the production of fruits grew by 1.8 per cent, the output of vegetables was up 3.8 per cent due to the expanded use of greenhouses in most ESCWA countries, and there was some increase in the production of red meat and poultry, eggs and dairy products, as well as in the production of pulse crops, potatoes and sugar beets. A decline was recorded in the output of oil crops.

Agricultural commodities accounted for some 17.1 per cent of total regional imports in 1991 and a mere 2.6 per cent of exports. The deficit in agricultural trade, however, decreased from $12.5 billion in 1990 to some $11 billion in 1991, due mainly to the Persian Gulf hostilities.

Industrial development

With the exception of Kuwait and Iraq, where manufacturing activities focused mainly on reconstruction and restoration, the region's industrial performance remained strong, registering a growth rate of 8.8 per cent, led by the food, beverage, clothing and construction industries.

The transportation sector also performed strongly in 1992, with most countries giving transportation projects a high priority. Efforts were being made to reduce nations' dependence on foreign resources for project implementation, extend transportation networks and optimize services, giving consideration to conditions for competition or complementarity between various transport modes. Maritime transport, however, continued to suffer the effects of the Persian Gulf conflict as reflected in the reduced deadweight tonnage of the region's merchant fleet.

Trade

The trade performance of Western Asia was adversely affected during the year by the decline of oil prices to pre-Gulf crisis levels, the disruptive impact of sanctions against Iraq, the global recession, and deepening financial difficulties in the former USSR and countries of Eastern Europe. The total value of exports from the region, excluding Iraq and Kuwait, declined by 12.9 per cent in 1991 to $89.3 billion, with the sharpest falls registered in Yemen (28.8 per cent) and the Syrian Arab Republic (22.6 per cent). Decreases in exports from the GCC countries ranged from 9.4 per cent in Bahrain to 6.5 per cent in Oman. Saudi Arabia and Qatar, however, recorded increases of 10 and 6.4 per cent, respectively. Egypt reported 41 per cent growth following a 50 per cent increase in its oil exports and Jordan's export total grew by 6.5 per cent despite the economic isolation of Iraq, its largest market.

Exports from Western Asia remained heavily weighted in favour of the developed market economies, although their total share fell from 54 per cent in 1991 to 51.7 per cent in 1992. Intra-regional exports rose from 9 per cent in 1990 to 9.5 per cent, while exports to developing countries grew from 23 to 24 per cent of the total.

Imports to the region, excluding Iraq, totalled more than $72 billion in 1991, a 2.9 per cent improvement over 1990. With the exception of Egypt and Jordan, where imports fell by 15.7 and 3.5 per cent, respectively, imports increased in all ESCWA countries at rates ranging from 9.4 per cent in Bahrain to 45.4 per cent in Lebanon. The developed countries increased their share of the regional total from 60.7 per cent in 1991 to 61.7 per cent in 1992, with the United States accounting for 17.6 per cent of that amount. While the share of EC declined, it remained the region's leading supplier. The largest reduction was in intra-regional imports, from 7.7 to 4.7 per cent.

The combined current account balance of the region, excluding Iraq, Kuwait and Lebanon, regressed into a $21.8 billion deficit in 1991, after surpluses of $3.9 billion in 1989 and $4.3 billion in 1990. The deficit reflected a decline in the trade surplus from $29.6 billion to $26.9 billion, accompanied by an expansion of the services deficit from $15.8 billion to $30.8 billion and the unrequited transfers deficit from $9.5 billion to about $18 billion. The surplus fell by more than 50 per cent in the Syrian Arab Republic, but grew in the non-oil economies from $1.9 billion in 1990 to $3.1 billion in 1991. Egypt led the improvement with a surplus rising from $0.2 billion to $1.9 billion, followed by Jordan, which succeeded in transforming a $0.1 billion deficit in 1990 into a $0.4 billion surplus in 1991. At the same time, the aggregate international reserves of Western Asia, excluding Iraq, the Syrian Arab Republic and Yemen, reached $36.4 billion in 1991, compared with $31.4 billion in 1990. Of this amount, $24.9 billion belonged to GCC countries and $11.4 billion to Egypt. The reserve/import ratio for the region as a whole grew from 5.3 months in 1990 to 6.6 months in 1991.

Social trends

The Western Asian countries in 1992 were adjusting to significant social changes in the wake of the Persian Gulf hostilities, which aggravated unemployment, disparities in living standards, poverty, drug abuse, disability and the flow of refugees and returnees. High population growth rates, a massive influx of returnees, and reduced aid flows in a number of countries had an adverse effect on employment opportunities, savings generation and the delivery of health, education and other social services, particularly in rural areas.

Deteriorating rural conditions continued to encourage the massive displacement of people and worsen urban poverty. In Iraq, poverty increased dramatically as a result of the Persian Gulf hostilities and economic sanctions, and in Jordan, where almost 30 per cent of the population was already considered to be living below the poverty line, the Gulf crisis added further strain. Indications from Yemen were that increasing poverty had been precipitated by the return of more than 850,000 people from the Gulf region, and 40,000-60,000 refugees from Somalia and other parts of Eastern Africa. Another expanding problem in the ESCWA region was the large caseload of human disability, as a result of armed conflicts such as the Persian Gulf hostilities and the suppression of the intifadah in the Israeli-occupied territories, (see PART TWO, Chapter V). Diseases leading to impairments were also on the increase, due to a lack of vaccines and poor sanitary conditions.

Despite these problems, education and health conditions overall in Western Asia continued to improve. Health plans and programmes were being implemented by almost every country and expanding education opportunities were reflected in higher adult literacy rates and gross enrolment ratios in primary education, as well as in the establishment of new and specialized higher education institutions, with the participation of the private sector. In most ESCWA countries, better health care was prolonging life expectancy, reducing infant mortality and improving labour productivity. In Iraq, however, the health situation deteriorated due to inadequate medical supplies and services. The infant mortality rate quadrupled and cholera and typhoid returned.

Rapid urbanization, industrialization, migration, armed conflicts and political disturbances continued to undermine family structures and traditional values in the region, although the family was still considered the primary source of cohesion and support for its individual members. The typical family was still dominated by children and youth—more than 61.7 per cent—with very high economic dependency ratios.

The Persian Gulf hostilities cost ESCWA a full year of work and led to the postponement of some 25 per cent of its activities under the 1990-1991 plan until the 1992-1993 biennium. However, despite the disruption and difficult working conditions, 36 per cent of total outputs were completed as planned, and an additional 8 per cent were concluded after being reformulated.

The Commission's medium-term plan for 1992-1997 was reviewed by an intergovernmental meeting convened for that purpose (Cairo, Egypt, 8 and 9 February 1992), and subsequently amended by the ESCWA Technical Committee at its seventh session (Amman, 30 August-3 September). Among the key issues and problems addressed under the plan were: rehabilitation and reconstruction of war-affected areas; economic restructuring; transfer of technology; employment; urbanization; population dynamics; rural poverty; housing, especially low-cost housing; social welfare, particularly with regard to the handicapped; the changing role of the family; women in society; and the new social structure. Programme areas covered in the plan included: food and agriculture; development issues and policies; environment; human settlements; industrial development; international trade and development finance; natural resources; energy issues; population; public administration and finance; science and technology; social development and welfare; women and development; statistics; and transport and communications.

In September, the Commission approved its revised medium-term plan for 1992-1997⁽¹⁸⁾ and the programme budget for 1992-1993,⁽¹⁹⁾ as amended on the recommendation of its Technical Committee.

The secretariat continued to strengthen its relations with the specialized agencies and other United Nations organizations, while cooperating closely with various regional and interregional institutions. The Commission cooperated with the Organization of the Islamic Conference in priority areas such as food security and agriculture, science and technology, and trade and investment mechanisms among Islamic countries. In February 1992, the ESCWA Executive Secretary and the Deputy Secretaries-General of the economic, social, political and Palestinian affairs offices of the League of Arab States (LAS) held discussions on strengthening joint activities and cooperation between the two bodies.

During the period under review, from mid-1989 to mid-1992, ESCWA signed a number of agreements and exchanged memoranda of understanding with various regional and interregional bodies, including the Arab Cooperation Council, the International Council for Building Research Studies and Documentation, the General Federation of Arab Chambers of Commerce, Agriculture and Industry in the Arab countries, and the Arab Atomic Energy Organization.

Development planning, development finance and international trade

Several studies and reports were undertaken under the development planning subprogramme, with emphasis on the state of the regional economy in the aftermath of the Persian Gulf hostilities. They included the annual survey of economic and social developments in the ESCWA region and technical publications dealing with the hostilities' impact on Western Asian economies, with breakdowns by country and sector.

In the area of international trade and development finance, the secretariat issued a review of developments and trends in the monetary and financial sectors in the region for 1991 and completed a regional study on financial resources availability and management. It also prepared the sixth issue of the External Trade Bulletin of the ESCWA Region and a review of developments in the external sector of Western Asia, dealing with the performance of new export products in the 1980s, and carried out studies on export finance and the implications of the Uruguay Round on the region's economies.

Food and agriculture

ESCWA continued to issue its annual publication Agriculture and Development in Western Asia and completed two country studies and a regional study in preparation for an ad hoc expert group meeting on rural development at the regional level, scheduled for Amman in October 1993. The secretariat assisted in formulating national plans of action to combat desertification in Bahrain and in Yemen, and initiated activities to prepare a similar plan for the United Arab Emirates. A socio-economic survey of the Baalbeck-Hirmil region, published in 1992, dealt with the eradication of illicit crops and rehabilitation of Lebanon's agricultural sector. Work was completed on projects addressing issues related to rural credit institutions and extension, and education for agriculture and rural development. In cooperation with FAO, several training workshops and seminars were held on the use of computers in agricultural policy analysis, farm management surveys, data processing and project planning, and agricultural marketing at the regional and international levels. Also jointly with FAO, the Commission undertook studies on agricultural marketing in Iraq, Jordan and the Syrian Arab Republic, and extension institutions in Jordan.

Industrial development

The joint ESCWA/UNIDO Industry and Technology Division continued to promote industrial development in the Arab countries. Activities in 1992 included an expert group meeting on interconnection technologies for the Western Asian electronics industries (Damascus, Syrian Arab Republic, 4 and 5 July); a review of recent developments in the region's manufacturing sector; studies on promoting entrepreneurship in small-scale industrial enterprises and the strengthening of industrial training institutions in the region; and a regional seminar on motivation, orientation and training techniques for enhancing industrial entrepreneurship in Western Asia. Several projects were also initiated by UNDP to develop engineering infrastructure and strengthen national capabilities to organize industrial projects for the use of natural gas.

Natural resources and energy

The secretariat's activities under this sub-programme focused on implementation of renewable energy projects and the expansion of the regional information network on new and renewable energy sources. During the year, the secretariat issued a bulletin on energy data for the ESCWA region for 1991, a directory of new and renewable energy resources, and a survey and assessment of energy-related activities for 1990-1991. It continued to cooperate with UNEP in carrying out a project on the assessment of water resources using remote-sensing techniques, and completed a study on water-loss prevention measures in Western Asian irrigation schemes. A regional water resources database and a study on issues of rural energy were also published in 1992, and a preliminary document was prepared on the impact of the ongoing Arab-Israeli peace negotiations on the region's water sector. Country studies on energy demand in the household sector were prepared for Egypt, Jordan and the Syrian Arab Republic.

An interregional symposium on gas development and market prospects by the year 2000 and beyond (Damascus, 20-26 June 1992) adopted a set of recommendations for the development of natural gas projects and an expansion of natural gas usage and trade. A UNDP-sponsored seminar on domestic energy policies and management in the Arab countries, in October 1992, focused on improving the efficiency of energy use, promoting the development of conventional and renewable energy resources, and strengthening regional cooperation.

Science and technology

The Commission's science and technology sub-programme was responding to the enhanced interest of ESCWA members in scientific and technological activities aimed at protecting the environment and developing environmentally sound technologies. A number of activities were undertaken in the areas of ozone-depleting substances and the use of space technology for monitoring desert environments. A high-level workshop on the implications of new advanced materials technologies for Western Asian economies (Damascus, 21-24 September) was organized jointly with UNIDO's new technology and Arab region programme. The secretariat also had before it a proposal to establish a regional centre for space science and technology education.

Transport and communications

Activities in Western Asia within the framework of the Transport and Communications Decade for Asia and the Pacific (1985-1994), proclaimed by the General Assembly in 1984,⁽²⁰⁾ focused in 1992 on: the impact of privatization, deregulation and subsidy policies in the transport sector; manpower policies and training for transport operations; and maritime transport problems. In addition to the annual ESCWA Transport Bulletin, four documents on transport development were published in 1992, addressing the privatization and deregulation of selected transport modes, the training needs of transport authorities in Western Asia, subsidy issues, and the pricing policies of port services. A study on road maintenance issues and problems in the ESCWA countries was also issued. Other activities included a seminar on modern pricing policies for the region's ports and an expert group meeting on training requirements in the transport sector.

Environment

During 1992, ESCWA continued to promote the integration of environmental aspects into the development policies of its members and to implement related capacity-building programmes, including a UNEP-funded project to strengthen environmental management and planning capabilities in Jordan. Work also started on a preliminary assessment of environment and development conditions and trends in selected ESCWA countries.

In September, the Commission endorsed⁽²¹⁾ the Arab Declaration on Environment and Development and Future Prospects, adopted by the 1991 Arab Ministerial Conference on Environment and Development.⁽²²⁾ The Declaration incorporated the Arab perspective on, and programme of action for, environmentally sound and sustainable development in the Arab countries and served as a regional input to UNCED. The Commission also called for the establishment of an Arab and international inter-agency committee to coordinate promotional activities for environmentally sound and sustainable development in the region. Two preparatory meetings on the terms of reference, functions and mandate of a joint committee on environment and development in the Arab region were held in 1992 in cooperation with LAS. In December, the secretariat issued a review of reports on the environment and sustainable development submitted by selected countries to UNCED.

Social development and the role of women

At its 1992 session, the Commission, noting the deteriorating social situation in the region, with particular regard to poverty, unemployment, disability, crime and drug abuse, shelter and health care costs, and access to basic education, adopted a resolution on the forthcoming world summit for social development,⁽²³⁾ endorsing Economic and Social Council resolution 1992/27 and requesting ESCWA's active involvement in the summit and its preparations. In another resolution,⁽²⁴⁾ the Commission stressed the need to strengthen national and regional institutional mechanisms for the advancement of women. It appealed to its members and to regional and international donors to support a 1994 regional preparatory meeting for the Fourth World Conference on Women, to be convened in 1995.

As a follow-up to the 1989 Conference on the Capabilities and Needs of Disabled Persons in the ESCWA region, a Cultural Event of Disabled Persons was organized in Amman in October 1992 to promote public awareness of the capabilities of disabled persons.

Technical studies on the introduction, adaptation and transfer of appropriate technologies for disabled persons in the region and on the second-round monitoring of the implementation of the 1982 World Programme of Action concerning Disabled Persons⁽²⁵⁾ were included in the Commission's 1992-1993 programme of work.

Among other activities related to social development and the integration of women were a review of social security systems in Western Asia, an assessment of the impact of socio-economic changes on the Arab family, and a document on working women in the ESCWA region. Five case-studies were completed on the participation of women in the food and textile industries of five Western Asian countries, and executive summaries of nine other studies on the participation of women in development were issued for the benefit of other United Nations bodies and funding organizations.

Population and human settlements

In preparing for the 1994 International Conference on Population and Development, the ESCWA and LAS secretariats and UNFPA agreed in 1992 to convene a joint Arab Population Conference at Amman in April 1993, including a three-day intergovernmental expert group meeting followed by a two-day ministerial meeting. In September 1992, the Commission endorsed the agreement and requested its members to take an active part in the Conference.⁽²⁶⁾

During the year, the secretariat carried out research on returnees from Kuwait and other Persian Gulf countries, and started preparing for expert group meetings on unemployment in the Arab world and on human development. Technical publications were issued on national policies for crime prevention and drug abuse control, and on the situation of marginalized youth groups in the region. Work continued on a review and appraisal of national policies and measures related to population distribution in selected Western Asian countries and on a bibliography of population literature in the Arab world. Case-studies on manpower planning in the industry sector were completed for Saudi Arabia and the Syrian Arab Republic. A symposium on low-cost housing in the Arab region (Sanaa, Yemen, 24-28 October) called for an intensified exchange of information and experiences and the coordination of policies and programmes to alleviate housing problems. The secretariat also published a study on the role of geographic information systems in planning appropriate human settlements in Western Asia.

Statistics

Following the 1989 session of the Commission, the secretariat participated in a number of technical and policy-oriented meetings on statistics, including a regional seminar for senior statisticians on household surveys (Cairo, Egypt, 14-21 December 1992) and meetings of the LAS Statistical

Committee and the Board of Directors of the Arab Institute for Training and Research in Statistics. The third edition of the Unified Arab Statistical Abstract was published under the agreement on cooperation in statistics between ESCWA and LAS. Other publications included the Statistical Abstract of the ESCWA Region and the Bulletin of National Accounts.

In September, the Commission established a committee of heads of the ESCWA members' central statistical organizations to coordinate statistical activities and the exchange of related data, and to standardize national statistics and provide advice to member States on training requirements. It was decided that the Statistical Committee would meet biennially.⁽²⁷⁾

Technical cooperation

ESCWA continued technical cooperation activities in the region through short-term regional advisory services and the monitoring and substantive support of technical assistance projects. During 1992, the secretariat issued a review and analysis of progress made by Yemen in carrying out the 1990 Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, and provided advice on data processing, energy, environment, human resource development, industrial development, national accounts and economic statistics, development planning, science and technology, transport and communications, and water resources development.

Organizational questions

In September, ESCWA decided that sessions of its Technical Committee would be convened in the years when no Commission session was held, starting with a three-day meeting in 1993.⁽²⁸⁾ The Commission requested its Executive Secretary to study offers from Jordan and Lebanon to host ESCWA's permanent headquarters, and decided to discuss the question at a special session in Beirut, Lebanon, to be held within one year.⁽²⁹⁾ It thanked Iraq for the facilities it had provided to the Commission and Jordan for hosting the Commission on a temporary basis since August 1991.

PART THREE

Economic and social questions

Chapter I

Development policy and international economic cooperation

World economic growth continued to be slow in 1992, after having contracted in 1991—the first such contraction in the post-war era. The sluggishness of world output was largely a reflection of the slow-down in some large developed market economies and the sharp decline in the transition economies of Eastern Europe and the former USSR. Although the developing countries as a whole were experiencing an acceleration in growth, not all were sharing in it; strong growth rates were almost entirely concentrated in Asia.

In July, at the high-level segment of its substantive session, the Economic and Social Council discussed the role of the United Nations system in enhancing international cooperation for development. The General Assembly, in December, reaffirmed the unique position of the United Nations as a forum for promoting such cooperation and requested the Secretary-General to make recommendations on ways to enhance that role (resolution 47/181). During its coordination segment, the Council considered the policies and activities of the specialized agencies and other bodies of the system as they related to assistance in eradicating poverty and supporting vulnerable groups. The Assembly, in December, declared that 17 October would be observed as International Day for the Eradication of Poverty beginning in 1993 (resolution 47/196).

Concerning least developed countries (LDCs), the Assembly discussed the application of new criteria for identifying those countries in the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s. It noted donors' determination to implement their commitments with regard to official development assistance to the 47 countries included in the list of LDCs and the intention of the Trade and Development Board of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) to examine the effects of the newly added countries on the additional resource requirements of the group as a whole (resolution 47/173). In February, the eighth session of UNCTAD discussed a wide range of international economic issues, including the special problems of LDCs.

With regard to small island developing countries, the Assembly decided to convene, in April 1994, the first global conference on their sustainable development (resolution 47/189).

International economic relationsDevelopment and international economic cooperation

The General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council and other United Nations bodies in 1992 discussed many issues related to development and international economic cooperation.

CDP activities. At its April 1992 session,⁽¹⁾ the Committee for Development Planning (CDP) noted that the expectation of an early recovery from the recession in the industrial market economies had not materialized and, although relatively unaffected by the Iraq-Kuwait situation, their performance was sluggish. Demand in Canada and the United States did not recover as expected, restructuring in the eastern part of Germany placed a considerable burden on the economy of that country and Japan had not overcome the set-backs created by financial market shocks. Recovery was expected to be slower than in earlier recessions, which was unhelpful for the developing countries and those in Eastern Europe. In the latter, output contracted and unemployment rose. However, in Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Poland where structural changes were taking place, inflation was being brought under control and balance-of-payments indicators were modestly sturdy. In the other countries of Central and Eastern Europe, economic problems were much larger and major domestic policy initiatives and considerable international support would be required for them to overcome the problems of transition.

Developing countries continued to experience widely divergent patterns of growth and some showed a rise in performance well above that of the industrial market economies. China showed considerable success in its stabilization policies and India initiated a comprehensive liberalization programme. A number of other developing countries in all regions were overcoming some major macro- and micro-economic difficulties, becoming more stable and internationally competitive. In Latin America, more countries experienced increases in their gross domestic product (GDP) growth rates in 1991 and an increasing number of them were succeeding in their domestic stabilization efforts. Growth was stronger in Argentina, Chile, Mexico and Venezuela. In Africa, somewhat higher growth rates were achieved by countries participating in the World Bank's Special Programme of Assistance for debt-distressed and low-income countries in sub-Saharan Africa. However, the economic problems of the poorest and least developed countries continued and were exacerbated by high population growth rates.

With regard to the role of the United Nations in the framework of international economic cooperation, CDP stated that political events and the cumulative effect of economic and technological processes had reshaped the world economy, added new issues to the international agenda and enhanced the role of the United Nations in the economic, social and political arenas. To meet that challenge, the United Nations system was in need of reform. Its specialized agencies were to a great extent self-contained and, in spite of their sectoral mandates, their activities frequently overlapped, often resulting in spontaneous cooperation but sometimes in conflict. The United Nations itself, which revolved around the General Assembly, the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council, was complicated in structure and lacked transparency.

CDP recommended that coordination of the activities of the specialized agencies be improved by: flexible cooperation among agencies with interrelated spheres of interest; more consistent positions by member States in the various governing bodies of which they were members; and the revitalization of the Economic and Social Council to enhance its overview function. The complicated structure of the United Nations needed to be streamlined and made more transparent and more coordination was needed between the Economic and Social Council and the Assembly to streamline their agendas and make them more relevant. CDP also recommended strengthening the research functions of the Secretariat in the economic and social fields.

Economic Committee consideration. The Economic Committee of the Economic and Social Council considered the question of development and international economic cooperation in June/July 1992.⁽²⁾

The Committee had before it the World Economic Survey 1992,⁽³⁾ prepared by the United Nations Department of Economic and Social Development. The Survey examined the state of the world economy and trends in global output and policies. It also discussed international trade, saving, investment and the international transfer of resources, developments and emerging trends in energy, conversion and the peace dividend, and entrepreneurship and the development challenges of the 1990s.

Also before the Committee was the Secretary-General's report on the main research findings of the system in major global economic and social trends, policies and emerging issues.⁽⁴⁾ In accordance with a 1986 resolution,⁽⁵⁾ by which the Council had requested that the report be submitted on a biennial basis, it was prepared on the basis of information received from concerned bodies of the United Nations system, together with a review of their major publications. It highlighted findings published in the preceding few years, including some issues and projections of future conditions for the 1990s, and identified areas warranting further analysis. The report considered in particular global output and policies; debt adjustment, growth and human resource protection and development; population and human settlements; science and technology; and environment and development.

The report concluded that research carried out in the system over the preceding two years had focused on such questions as the nature, parameters and policy implications of changing concepts of growth and development, the reversal of environmental degradation in a developmental context and the improvement of the quality of life.

Subjects that seemed to warrant further investigation included: the need for more reliable data on Eastern European economies in order to monitor their transitional process and define policies to support transition; grass-roots participation as an element of the development process; and the use of human resources for capacity-building, self-reliance and sustainability. Although major strides had been made in factoring environmental concerns into the development process, the secretariat of the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII) had suggested further intersectoral research in a number of areas.

The report noted that the objectivity and impartiality of research work carried out by entities such as the World Institute for Development Economics Research of the United Nations University and the United Nations Research Institute for Social Development generated new insights and information into major policy issues. Their contributions could be further promoted through enhanced collaboration both between them and with research-oriented units within the system.

On the basis of the recommendations of the Committee, the Economic and Social Council, by decision 1992/296 of 31 July 1992, took note of the Secretary-General's report,⁽⁴⁾ the World Economic Survey 1992⁽³⁾ and the CDP report.⁽¹⁾

High-level segment of the Economic and Social Council. In accordance with a 1991 General Assembly resolution⁽⁶⁾ on the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields, the Economic and Social Council held a high-level segment of its substantive session from 6 to 9 July 1992. On 7 February (decision 1992/203), the Council decided that the high-level segment would consider the theme "Enhancing international cooperation for development: the role of the United Nations system".

The segment, which was attended by Ministers and high-level representatives, had before it CDP's report on its 1992 session⁽¹⁾ (see above), the World Economic Survey 1992⁽³⁾ and a note by the Secretary-General on strengthening the operational activities of the United Nations system, including the governance and financing thereof⁽⁷⁾ (see PART THREE, Chapter II).

It also had before it a report of the Secretary-General on the role of the United Nations in enhancing international cooperation for development.⁽⁸⁾ The report reviewed the dramatic changes in the international environment that had set the new context for development cooperation, and attempted to identify key development objectives for the 1990s, such as revitalizing growth and development; the reform of national policies and the establishment of stable rules for market access and an enhanced mechanism for the settlement of trade disputes; and the interrelated aims of human development, eradication of poverty, diffusion of technology and protection of the environment.

The report's principal focus was on the role of the United Nations system in facilitating the attainment of those objectives, including what action the international community could take, through the system, to advance international cooperation and ways to improve the system to serve as an effective instrument to that end. It stated that the development dialogue in the United Nations forums in the key areas of trade, finance, technology and sustainable development needed to be strengthened. The General Assembly's political role in the development dialogue and the Council's overview functions had to be made more effective, and there was a need for more fruitful cooperation among the various bodies of the system. The system had to continue to provide multilateral assistance to support economic reforms and structural adjustment programmes, as well as long-term development objectives of developing countries, but that assistance had to be refocused on the basis of more clearly defined goals and priorities. Greater impact could be achieved if funding institutions, specialized agencies and Governments worked together to help developing countries to formulate and implement common development strategies. Arrangements for governance needed to be examined to ensure a strong intergovernmental capacity to set clear directions and policy guidance. Financing of operational activities needed to be placed on a more adequate, assured and stable basis and field level coordination needed to be improved.

Summarizing the proceedings of the high-level segment, the President of the Council noted that a broad convergence of views on several key aspects of the theme had emerged. International development cooperation and the eradication of poverty were inextricably linked with the preservation of peace and security and needed to be pursued with equal vigour. Member States had expressed concern over the stalled world economy, stressing that persistent problems of limited access to markets and technology, excessive debt burdens, inadequate official development assistance (ODA) and an unfavourable international economic environment continued to hamper development. The first priority was a concerted global effort to reinvigorate growth and development.

The successful transition and restoration of growth in Eastern Europe and newly independent States, seen by participants in the high-level segment as beneficial for growth and development in the world economy, and the urgency of international support for the accompanying political and economic reforms were highlighted. Assurances were given that resources for development assistance would not be diverted to support the transition economies.

With the concept of development emerging as human-centred, equitable and socially and environmentally sustainable, the high-level segment pointed to the eradication of poverty as a priority objective and stressed the need to integrate social goals into structural adjustment programmes and development strategies. Reference was also made to adjustment programmes and economic reform policies, including more open and liberalized trade policies, being pursued by developing countries, and international support for their success was called for.

With regard to the restructuring and reform of the United Nations system, caution was expressed against redefining the development priorities of developing countries or limiting the scope of technical cooperation carried out through the system. The importance of better coordination of United Nations activities in the economic, social and related fields was stressed, including the enhancement of the roles of resident coordinators and of the regional commissions. The high-level segment also noted the need for a closer and improved relationship between the United Nations and its agencies and the Bretton Woods institutions (the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank). The role of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) was seen as central in improving coordination in the system.

At the end of the high-level segment, the President of the Council established an ad hoc open-ended working group to hold consultations, prior to the opening of the General Assembly's 1992 session, on the role of the United Nations system in enhancing international economic cooperation with a view to making recommendations to the Assembly for its consideration and action. Since the working group did not complete its work in time for it to report to the Assembly, it continued its consultations under the Assembly's auspices.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

In his annual report on the work of the Organization (see p. 3), the Secretary-General discussed the wide range of development issues before the international community and outlined a possible approach to those issues—an agenda for development.

On 22 December 1992, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/181 without vote.

An agenda for development

The General Assembly,

Recalling the Charter of the United Nations, in particular the commitment to employ international machinery for the promotion of the economic and social advancement of all peoples,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the work of the Organization, in particular the reference to an agenda for development,

Reaffirming the unique position of the United Nations as a forum for the promotion of international cooperation for development,

Emphasizing the need to give due consideration to the broad scope of themes related to international cooperation and international economic relations in order to address effectively the issue of development, particularly of developing countries,

Stressing the importance of continuing to strengthen the capacity of the United Nations to foster international cooperation in order to address fully the wide range of issues pertaining to development, particularly that of developing countries,

Stressing also that the objectives and commitments with regard to development adopted by the General Assembly, especially the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade, the Cartagena Commitment, the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, and the various consensus agreements and conventions, especially Agenda 21, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development at the level of heads of State or Government, which mark the beginning of a new global partnership for sustainable development, all together provide the overall framework of international cooperation for development,

Recalling the restructuring and revitalization process initiated by its resolution 45/264 of 13 May 1991, in particular its commitment to promote the achievement of the objectives and priorities of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields, as set forth in other relevant resolutions,

Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session, in consultation with Member States, a report on an agenda for development, taking fully into consideration the objectives and agreements on development adopted by the Assembly, containing an analysis of and recommendations on ways to enhance the role of the United Nations and the relationship between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions in the promotion of international cooperation for development, within the framework and provisions of the Charter of the United Nations and the articles of agreement of the Bretton Woods institutions, and to include therein, inter alia, a comprehensive annotated list of substantive themes and areas to be addressed by the United Nations in the agenda, as well as his views on priorities among them, for the consideration of Member States.

22 December 1992 Meeting 93 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/47/718/Add.1) without vote, 9 December (meeting 49); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/47/L.71), based on informal consultations on draft by Pakistan for Group of 77 (A/C.2/47/L.44); agenda item 78.

Meeting numbers. GA 47th session: 2nd Committee 25, 30, 45, 46, 49; plenary 93.

The Second Committee considered the issues of development and international economic cooperation during the Assembly's 1992 regular session and made recommendations on a number of topics (see APPENDIX IV, agenda item 78). The Assembly took note of part I of the Committee's report on the item⁽⁹⁾ by decision 47/441 of 22 December.

In other action, by decision 47/465 of 23 December, the Assembly deferred consideration of the launching of global negotiations on international economic cooperation for development and decided to include it in the provisional agenda of its forty-eighth (1993) session.

Integration of economies in transition into the world economy

The World Economic Survey 1992 examined the transition process of the centrally planned economies of Eastern Europe and the former USSR to market economies. Although the old order had broken up as of early 1992, the new system had not crystallized. Severe economic disruption was taking place, with output dropping by 16 per cent in 1991 and investment falling to the levels of the mid-1970s. The Survey noted that the excitement in 1989 over the political opening for the full economic transformation of the centrally planned economies of Europe had been tempered by the realization of the arduous nature of the transformation. The breakup of the USSR into 15 independent States intensified the disruption of economic activity, with no new mechanisms to replace the traditional ones for economic exchange and distribution. Those successor States had only just started their economic transformation, but neither the path of the transition nor the character of the mix of State and private activity towards which they were aiming was clear. The other Eastern European countries had already started the transition to market economies and the stabilization-cum-liberalization policies implemented had started to bear fruit in those countries that began the process first. The Survey analysed the situation in the countries of the former USSR and the prospects and challenges for them.

Report of the Secretary-General. In response to a 1991 request of the General Assembly,⁽¹⁰⁾ the Secretary-General submitted a report on the impact of the evolution of East-West relations on global growth and development.⁽¹¹⁾ It described the state of economic transformation and recent developments in East-West economic relations and discussed the implications of Eastern Europe's transition to market orientation for the developing countries.

The report concluded that efforts to introduce far-reaching structural changes in the Eastern European economies deserved international assistance. However, that assistance had to be managed in such a way as to produce positive effects on the transition, while containing negative repercussions for other countries, including developing ones.

From country to country, the transitions had exhibited major differences in scope, depth and range, but it was widely recognized that the timetable stretched far into the future. It was likely to be much longer for most of the successor Soviet republics, where transition policies remained a subject of socio-political debate, than for the Central European countries where steps towards macroeconomic stabilization, institution-building and structural change had already been taken.

For the transition economies to reach the stage where they could play a constructive role in coordinating global affairs in the interest of all parts of the world economy, the international community would need to provide temporary technical and financial assistance to deflect the most negative aspects of transformation policies for their populations. In addition, since a successful transition hinged on the ability of the Eastern European countries to penetrate world markets competitively, it was necessary to restore and reinforce basic elements of a multilateral trading world with minimal non-tariff inhibitions.

Although both national Governments and multilateral financial organizations had generally adhered to their commitments to assist the transitional economies, it seemed likely that the Eastern European countries would need assistance over a longer period and on a larger scale than originally envisaged. Over the medium term, major donor countries might find it necessary to merge assistance budgets. The report stated that that should be avoided, as assisting the Eastern European countries was a different proposition from assisting the development process of the less advantaged countries. It noted that more open, liberal trade policies would be of immense significance to most of the transition economies and, in the long term, considerably boost trade with developing countries.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/187 without vote.

Integration of the economies in transition into the world economy

4. Requests the Secretary-General therefore to prepare, within existing resources, with the full cooperation of the relevant organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, including the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, a report on the role of the United Nations system in addressing problems facing the economies in transition, including the difficulties that the economies in transition are encountering in their integration into the world economy, and to submit the report to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session;

International cooperation for economic growth and development

In response to a 1991 request,⁽¹²⁾ the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly the report of the President of the Economic and Social Council⁽¹³⁾ on the outcome of an informal exchange of views on the 1991 report of the Commonwealth Group of Experts on the Impact of Global Economic and Political Change on the Development Process.⁽¹⁴⁾ The informal exchange of views took place on 22 July 1992. By decision 47/444 of 22 December, the Assembly took note of the Council President's report.

Implementation of the 1990 Declaration on International Economic Cooperation

In response to a 1991 request of the General Assembly,⁽¹⁵⁾ the Secretary-General submitted an analytical report on the implementation of the commitments and policies agreed upon in the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of the Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries.⁽¹⁶⁾ The report examined national and international action that had implications for the implementation of the Declaration, adopted by the Assembly in 1990,⁽¹⁷⁾ and concluded that so far results of the implementation had been mixed.

Economic growth and policies in industrialized countries, developing countries and countries with economies in transition were discussed. The report also addressed the issues of betterment of the human condition, the debt problem of the developing countries, external resources for development, regional integration among developing countries, international trade, the environment, science and technology, integrating the transition economies into the global economy, reduction of military expenditure and the role of the United Nations system.

In a series of conclusions, the report stated that, although many developing countries had instituted or continued major economic reforms, there was a widening perception of old and new problems, such as poverty eradication and environmental protection, and the gap between international commitment and action remained large. Initiatives taken included some progress towards solving the debt problem of the developing countries; countries with economies in transition continued efforts to integrate themselves into the world economy; and world military expenditure declined, creating the potential for economic and social development. However, there had not been a commensurate international initiative to create a supportive economic environment; international economic cooperation to revitalize growth in developing countries lacked the momentum envisaged in the Declaration; the revival of the transition economies was more difficult than envisaged; and the stalemate in the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations cast doubts on the future of the multilateral trading system and inhibited trade-related investment.

International Development Strategy for the Fourth UN Development Decade

The International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade (the 1990s), adopted by the General Assembly in 1990,⁽¹⁸⁾ provided for a process of review and appraisal. Accordingly, the Secretary-General submitted to the Economic and Social Council and the Assembly in June 1992 the first biennial review of the Strategy's implementation.⁽¹⁹⁾

Since its launching, some of the Strategy's basic premises had been threatened by the situation in the Persian Gulf, recession in the developed market economies and the dissolution of the USSR. Although the Persian Gulf situation had left little impact at the global level, the recession in the developed market economies had been deeper and more persistent than predicted and the recovery was weak. The resumption of growth in the industrialized economies, a major premise on which the Strategy had based its objective of accelerated development in developing countries, had not materialized and the international economic environment was not conducive to growth and development in other respects.

The Strategy had seen reform and restructuring in Eastern Europe as a potential new source of growth and development for developing countries, largely through expanded trade, but that seemed unlikely to happen in the first half of the decade. The pattern of growth in the developing countries remained essentially unchanged in 1991.

Despite the Strategy's emphasis on the need for additional financial resources, development finance remained scarce. Since some major donors were burdened with large fiscal deficits and deteriorating social and economic conditions, their ability and willingness to provide and increase resources were constrained.

The Strategy had stressed the need for domestic economic reform, and many developing countries had undertaken major policy reforms aiming at greater reliance on market forces and the private sector, stabilization and monetary and fiscal discipline, more realistic exchange rates and trade liberalization.

It was too early to discern major changes in the Strategy's priority areas of poverty and hunger eradication, human resources development, slowing population growth and environmentally sound and sustainable development. However, despite developments in the early 1990s, the goals and objectives of the Strategy remained valid since the Strategy had set broad goals in critical areas and recognized that many of its objectives could be realized only in the medium and long term. The review identified a number of concerns which had become more prominent than at the time of the Strategy's adoption. They included the repercussions for international economic relations of the disintegration of the USSR, the integration of Eastern European countries into the world economy, the environment and international migration. The review noted that a reversal of trends in the first 18 months of the decade would require decisive efforts in virtually all countries. Developing countries should continue their economic reform process and developed countries should restore the primacy of economic growth.

The Economic and Social Council took note of the Secretary-General's report by decision 1992/297 of 31 July.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/152 without vote.

International cooperation for economic growth and development

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, contained in the annex to its resolution S-18/3 of 1 May 1990, and the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade, contained in the annex to its resolution 45/199 of 21 December 1990, which provide the overall framework for economic growth and development,

Recalling its resolution 46/144 of 17 December 1991 on the implementation of the commitments and policies agreed upon in the Declaration,

Taking into account the Cartagena Commitment, the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, and Agenda

21, and all the relevant decisions of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development,

1. Takes note with interest of the reports submitted by the Secretary-General on the subject;

2. Encourages Member States to submit their reports on the implementation of the commitments and policies agreed upon in the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to provide, at its forty-ninth session, an analytical and comprehensive report on the implementation of the commitments and policies agreed upon in the Declaration and on the implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade, including his assessment of the steps taken by Governments of developed and developing countries, individually and collectively, and by organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, including the regional commissions;

4. Decides, in order to keep the implementation of the Declaration and the International Development Strategy under review, to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-eighth session the item entitled "International cooperation for economic growth and development: (a) Implementation of the commitments and policies agreed upon in the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries; (b) Implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade".

The private sector in development

Entrepreneurship and private-sector development

The World Economic Survey 1992,⁽³⁾ in a section on entrepreneurship and the development challenges of the 1990s, stated that there was a growing consensus that interaction between government activities and market forces provided the most conducive environment for tackling the complex problems of sustained economic development and the alleviation of global poverty. A long-term vision of change in which entrepreneurship had a key role could open new perspectives on the challenge of development. The Survey examined the key features of entrepreneurship and its role in bolstering productive potential and promoting rapid restructuring. It reassessed the concept of entrepreneurship, outlined the nature of an enabling environment for private enterprise and suggested specific institutional requirements and policy measures in support of productive entrepreneurship. Experiences with entrepreneurship in Africa, Asia and Latin America, as well as the transition economies in Eastern Europe, were presented.

UNDP action. In response to a 1991 request,⁽²⁰⁾ the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) reported to the UNDP Governing Council on UNDP's role in private-sector development.⁽²¹⁾ The report indicated that the private sector had come to play a central role in nations' development strategies, which included mobilizing entrepreneurs to achieve self-sustaining growth in national development efforts. That trend was reflected in many national development plans reviewed by UNDP field offices. UNDP, in cooperation with other United Nations agencies, had assisted a variety of private sector-related activities in response to requests from Governments arising from major changes in their development strategies. The report suggested that communication with and coordination of United Nations system activities would be strengthened by UNDP involvement at the country level through the resident representatives and resident coordinators with support from UNDP's Division for the Private Sector in Development. The allocation of $4 million in Special Programme Resources would support private-sector initiatives of a catalytic nature during UNDP's fifth programming cycle (1992-1996).

The report discussed UNDP's comparative advantage in providing assistance in private-sector development and outlined UNDP's strategy for the private sector in development. The strategy included seeking to create a favourable environment for private investment and business, and supporting the development of the intellectual infrastructure, institutions and skills needed to expand and improve efficiency. The report also addressed the need to strengthen coordination among United Nations bodies and other organizations involved in matters relating to the private sector.

On 26 May,⁽²²⁾ the Governing Council endorsed UNDP's role and strategy in assisting Governments to promote the role of the private sector in their development efforts and requested UNDP to focus its activities on national capacity-building and policy formulation. It asked the Administrator to define further UNDP's role in promoting assistance in private-sector development in order to clarify its comparative advantage, to strengthen communication and cooperation within the United Nations system and to harmonize UNDP activities with other multilateral organizations and bilateral donors when promoting entrepreneurship and private-sector development.

Privatization

Private-sector development had become a central concern for many developing countries and economies in transition. During 1992,⁽²³⁾ the Transnational Corporations and Management Division of the Department of Economic and Social Development (formerly the Centre on Transnational Corporations) assisted Governments in developing a network of institutions, agencies and mechanisms to support the functioning of markets and encourage entrepreneurial activities.

UNCTAD action. The eighth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD VIII) (see PART THREE, Chapter IV), in its final document (the Cartagena Commitment),⁽²⁴⁾ noted the growing recognition that reform of State economic enterprises would contribute to an increase in savings and investment in developing countries. Privatization, accompanied by an effective regulatory framework to foster competition and efficiency and prevent the emergence of private monopolies, could play an important role. The Conference encouraged officials responsible for the privatization programmes adopted by many countries to share their experience and expertise. It recommended that developing countries should further improve their policy and regulatory environment so as to attract foreign direct investment, the return of flight capital and other non-debt-creating financial flows. Policies were also required to sustain economic development and expand internal market opportunities and export activities.

On 7 May,⁽²⁵⁾ the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board established the Ad Hoc Working Group on Comparative Experiences with Privatization. The Group's terms of reference were: to review countries' experience with privatization; to consider medium- and long-term objectives of privatization processes; to consider factors pertinent to the design and implementation of privatization programmes; to elaborate possible guidelines for formulating privatization programmes and plans; and to serve as a forum for the presentation of national privatization programmes and plans and for the exchange and dissemination of information and national experiences. It would also identify areas in which technical cooperation could be strengthened.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 30 July, on the recommendation of its Economic Committee, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1992/36 without vote.

Privatization and foreign investment in the context of economic restructuring

The Economic and Social Council,

Recognizing the fact that numerous countries attach growing importance to privatization of enterprises, administrative deregulation, increased competition, open markets and demonopolization of their economic activities as a means to increase economic efficiency, growth and development, in the context of their economic restructuring policies,

Stressing the important role that foreign direct investment can play in the process of privatization in those countries,

Noting the difficulties those countries encounter in the process of privatization, administrative deregulation and demonopolization of their economic activities,

Noting also the work the former United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations has performed so far in analysing new approaches to the process of privatization, administrative deregulation and demonopolization of economic activities,

1. Requests the Secretary-General, in coordination with other relevant international organizations, to enhance technical cooperation activities in order to assist all interested countries in attracting foreign investment and transnational corporations so as to contribute to the implementation of privatization programmes, in the context of their economic reforms;

2. Invites the Secretary-General to explore further, through case-by-case studies of foreign investment, new approaches to the process of privatization, administrative deregulation and demonopolization of economic activities;

3. Recognizes the need to diversify sources of funding for research and technical cooperation activities, and, to that end, invites voluntary contributions to the Trust Fund for the Technical Cooperation Programme of the former United Nations Centre on Transnational Corporations, and requests the Secretary-General to seek to mobilize resources from various sources, including non-governmental organizations, and to report to the Commission on Transnational Corporations at its twentieth session.

Approved by Economic Committee (E/1992/109/Add.3) without vote, 28 July (meeting 16); draft by Commission on TNCs (E/1992/26); agenda item 12 (e).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/171 without vote.

Privatization in the context of economic restructuring, economic growth and sustainable development

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolution S-18/3 of 1 May 1990, the annex to which contains the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, and its resolution 45/199 of 21 December 1990, the annex to which contains the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade, as well as other relevant United Nations resolutions,

Taking note of the Cartagena Commitment, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development at its eighth session, and Trade and Development Board decision 398(XXXVIII) of 7 May 1992, by which, inter alia, the Ad Hoc Working Group on Comparative Experiences with Privatization was established, and looking forward to the contribution of the Ad Hoc Working Group,

Taking note also of Economic and Social Council resolution 1992/36 of 30 July 1992 on privatization and foreign investment in the context of economic restructuring,

Recognizing the sovereign right of each State to decide on the development of its private and public sectors, taking into account the comparative advantages of each sector,

Noting that the private sector plays a positive role in mobilizing resources and promoting economic growth and sustainable development,

Noting also that many countries are attaching growing importance, in the context of their economic restructuring policies, to the privatization of enterprises and the demonopolization and administrative deregulation of economic activities, as well as market-oriented reforms, increased competition, the elimination of price-distorting mechanisms, and open markets, all as a means to increase economic efficiency, growth and sustainable development,

Noting further the difficulties these countries encounter in those policies and that various practical modalities and approaches towards privatization can be considered by them,

1. Welcomes the activities being undertaken by relevant organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system in supporting national efforts aimed at increasing economic efficiency, growth and sustainable development through privatization, demonopolization, administrative deregulation of economic activities and other relevant policies, and urges them:

(a) To support, when requested, the national efforts of countries in implementing privatization, demonopolization, administrative deregulation and other relevant policies in the context of their economic reforms and the opening of their economies;

(b) To strengthen their communication and cooperation in supporting the national efforts of countries in privatizing enterprises, demonopolizing and deregulating their economic activities and implementing other relevant policies, and invites the Secretary-General to give due attention to coordination of the United Nations system in this field, through, inter alia, the Economic and Social Council and other relevant United Nations bodies;

Industrial development cooperation

In response to General Assembly requests of 1990⁽²⁶⁾ and 1991,⁽²⁷⁾ the Secretary-General submitted a report on measures taken by the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) to enhance industrial development cooperation and the diversification and modernization of productive activities in developing countries.⁽²⁸⁾ As requested by the Assembly in 1990,⁽²⁶⁾ a study was planned by UNIDO, to be undertaken jointly with the United Nations Secretariat, on scientists, engineers and entrepreneurs, which was expected to culminate in an action plan on ways to promote the enhancement of United Nations training activities. However, the study's preparation was postponed due to financial constraints and it was proposed that it be submitted to the Assembly in 1994.

The Secretary-General reported that UNIDO's industrial cooperation activities were being strengthened within an integrated framework comprising the human factor; modernization: the challenge of technology; and diversification: industrial recovery. UNIDO's human resources development objective was to build up in developing countries coherent and sustainable systems for upgrading local technological, managerial and entrepreneurial capabilities for industrial development. Programmes had given priority to the transfer of new and high technologies, the enhancement of economic and technical cooperation among developing countries, the integration of women in human resource development activities and managerial training. The primary objectives of the UNIDO development and transfer of technology programme were to: increase developing countries' awareness of the implications of emerging technological changes; facilitate their access to technology sources; assist them in strengthening their domestic technological capabilities; promote broader participation by them in international technological development; and improve regional cooperation. With regard to revitalizing industry in developing countries, UNIDO aimed to find new ways to increase the international flow of finance to productive industrial investment by supporting investment policy formulation, including investment codes attractive to foreign capital. It also aimed to work closely with financial institutions in developing countries, identify, appraise and promote industrial investment opportunities and promote enterprise-to-enterprise cooperation through direct foreign investment and technical cooperation agreements.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December, the Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 47/153 without vote.

Industrial development cooperation

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolutions S-18/3 of 1 May 1990, the annex to which contains the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, 45/199 of 21 December 1990, the annex to which contains the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade, and 46/151 of 18 December 1991, the annex to which contains the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s,

Reaffirming also its resolutions 45/196 of 21 December 1990 and 46/146 of 17 December 1991, taking note of Economic and Social Council resolution 1992/44 of 31 July 1992, and reaffirming other relevant resolutions in the field of industrial development cooperation,

Noting with satisfaction the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development,

Recognizing that the creation of a supportive international economic environment, through, inter alia, effective relief measures to address external debt problems and an open and non-restrictive world trading system, is essential to promoting the industrialization efforts of developing countries,

Convinced that, in order to promote the industrial development of developing countries, their indigenous capabilities in such areas as entrepreneurship, management, technology, financing and marketing need to be built up or strengthened, and that technical and financial assistance in support of the national efforts of developing countries would need to be extended for this purpose,

Taking note of the note by the Secretary-General on industrial development cooperation and the diversification and modernization of productive activities in developing countries,

1. Stresses the importance of international cooperation in supporting efforts at the regional, subregional and national levels in industrial development, in particular in the fields of human resources development, investment and export promotion, technology transfer, industrial conversion and development of national capacities, in order to diversify and modernize productive activities in developing countries;

2. Calls upon organizations of the United Nations system, in particular the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, to take due account in their programmes, projects and activities, in the context of industrial development cooperation, of the commitments to further sustainable development agreed upon in the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development process, especially by ensuring provision of the means of implementation, as set forth in section IV of Agenda 21, stressing in particular the importance of financial resources and mechanisms, the transfer of environmentally sound technology, cooperation and capacity-building and international institutional arrangements, in order to achieve sustainable development in all countries;

3. Recommends that the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, in the context of its medium-term plan and the decision taken by the Industrial Development Board, on 6 November 1992, on relative priorities among the activities included within that plan, bearing in mind the Organization's financial and technical capacity and with due regard to national priorities, strengthen its cooperation with organizations in the public and private sectors, especially in developing countries, in particular with those organizations working in human resource development, investment and export promotion and technological capacity-building;

4. Urges the international community, including the United Nations system and the regional commissions, and, in particular, multilateral financial institutions and regional banks, to support industrial development programmes and projects, especially in developing countries;

5. Notes with concern that the study of long-term world industrial structure could not be carried out;

6. Reiterates its call to the United Nations Industrial Development Organization and other relevant United Nations organizations to encourage and support technical cooperation among developing countries in the field of industrialization;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to invite the Director-General of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization to report, through the Secretary-General, to the General Assembly at its forty-ninth session on the implementation of the present resolution;

8. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-ninth session an item entitled "Industrial development cooperation".

Eradication of poverty

By decision 1992/204 of 7 February 1992, the Economic and Social Council decided that part of its 1992 segment on coordination should be devoted to the coordination of the policies and activities of the specialized agencies and other bodies of the United Nations system related to assistance in the eradication of poverty and support to vulnerable groups, including assistance during the implementation of structural adjustment programmes.

In a May report,⁽²⁹⁾ the Secretary-General provided the Council with a brief review of recent developments in the area of poverty relevant to coordination issues, paying particular attention to the impact of structural adjustment programmes on poverty. Based on information from various parts of the United Nations system, it outlined the strategies, priorities, policy orientations and programmatic activities of the system in poverty eradication, including promotion of growth with poverty alleviation, support to vulnerable groups and amelioration of negative impacts of structural adjustment programmes. The report also drew on the discussions and conclusions on the subject of the ACC Task Force on Long-term Development Objectives (Geneva, 3-6 March).⁽³⁰⁾

The report also presented some broad themes related to the nature and scope of coordination in the United Nations system in poverty alleviation and eradication, and formulated specific suggestions to improve and strengthen coordination processes and structures. It identified the need to develop a coherent system-wide framework for action and strengthen the existing mechanisms for inter-agency coordination and cooperation and their mandates to ensure coverage of the whole range of issues related to poverty. In recognition of the importance of accurate and up-to-date data and the development of poverty indicators, it was also suggested that an inter-agency meeting be organized to devise common understandings and approaches towards a set of social indicators that could be used for data collection by the system. At the country level, it was suggested that the role of the resident coordinator be strengthened and that programmes and projects of the United Nations system be better harmonized with those of recipient Governments to enhance the efficiency of delivery.

Summarizing the results of the Council's coordination segment,⁽²⁾ the President stated that a number of recommendations had emerged. At the global level, ACC should develop a common system-wide approach to policies and activities for poverty eradication and review existing arrangements for system-wide coordination in the area of poverty, modifying them to encompass poverty issues more comprehensively. At the country level, the system should assist developing countries to enhance their institutional capacity for policy formulation and coordination of the implementation of programmes to eradicate poverty. In all countries, a common strategy, prepared under the leadership of the resident coordinator, should be developed on ways in which the organizations of the system could work together to help alleviate poverty. Coordinated approaches should be devised for data collection and the development of social indicators to facilitate shared analysis and assessment of country situations. The organizations of the system, including the World Bank and IMF, should collaborate closely to ensure that poverty alleviation and human development goals were incorporated into their programmes and into structural adjustment programmes. It was recommended that the Secretary-General should report in 1993 on progress made in implementing the Council's recommendations.

On 31 July, the Council, by decision 1992/300, took note of the Secretary-General's report.

In response to a 1991 request,⁽³¹⁾ the Secretary-General, in October 1992,⁽³²⁾ reported to the General Assembly, informing it of the Council's consideration of the matter. He submitted to it for consideration his report on progress made in coordinating policies and activities for the eradication of poverty in developing countries⁽²⁹⁾ and drew attention to the Council President's summary of recommendations for action by the United Nations system on poverty eradication.⁽²⁾

UNCTAD action. The Cartagena Commitment, adopted by UNCTAD VIII in February⁽²⁴⁾ (see PART THREE, Chapter IV), stated that a consensus had developed on a number of priority aspects of development, including the eradication of poverty and hunger. It was agreed that major efforts by all countries were necessary to evolve approaches to growth that would substantially alleviate poverty and promote ecologically sound and sustainable development. In the context of the need for institutional adaptation by UNCTAD in order for it to address new developments in international economic cooperation, UNCTAD VIII agreed that a number of new committees of the Trade and Development Board should be established, including a standing committee on poverty alleviation.

On 7 May,⁽²⁵⁾ the Board adopted the terms of reference of the Standing Committee on Poverty Alleviation, which would contribute to national and international efforts to prevent, alleviate and reduce poverty and to the formulation of national and international policies, bearing in mind the diversity of country situations including the particular problems of LDCs and the most vulnerable population groups. To that end, the Committee, among other things, would: review existing information and analyses on the characteristics, causes, location, dimensions and dynamics of poverty; exchange and review national experiences in dealing with poverty and identify impediments to poverty alleviation and policy options for the prevention and alleviation of poverty; exchange views on the impact of development assistance and cooperation programmes on the alleviation and reduction of poverty and develop approaches to promote effective programmes; consider questions related to the financing and organization of social development programmes in developing countries, particularly in the areas of health, education, housing and sanitation; examine the impact of trade expansion on poverty alleviation; identify linkages between poverty alleviation and the achievement of sustainable development; and examine the relationship between migration and other demographic factors and poverty alleviation. The Committee would also identify areas where technical cooperation should be strengthened.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/197 without vote.

International cooperation for the eradication of poverty in developing countries

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, contained in the annex to its resolution S-18/3 of 1 May 1990, the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade, contained in the annex to its resolution 45/199 of 21 December 1990, the Paris Declaration and Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, adopted by the Second United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries, the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s and the Cartagena Commitment, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development at its eighth session, in February 1992,

Reaffirming also principle 5 of the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, chapter 3 of Agenda 21, principle 7 (a) of the Non-legally Binding Authoritative Statement of Principles for a Global Consensus on the Management, Conservation and Sustainable Development of All Types of Forests, and all other decisions and recommendations adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development relating to the eradication of poverty,

Reaffirming further its resolutions 43/195 of 20 December 1988, 44/212 of 22 December 1989, 45/213 of 21 December 1990 and 46/141 of 17 December 1991,

Noting that the eradication of poverty in all countries, in particular in developing countries, has become one of the priority development objectives for the 1990s,

Stressing that effective national policies supported by a favourable international economic environment can promote sustained and sustainable development in all countries, in particular in developing countries, thus increasing their capacity to undertake social and economic programmes to eradicate poverty,

Noting with concern the negative effects of large debt burdens and their impact on poorer sections of society in many developing countries,

Recognizing that poverty is a complex and multidimensional problem with origins in both the national and international domains, and that its eradication constitutes an important factor to ensure sustainable development,

Noting that the efforts made at the national and international levels need to be enhanced to ensure the eradication of poverty,

1. Takes note of the note by the Secretary-General on the subject;

2. Stresses the importance of domestic policies, including effective budgetary policies, to mobilize and allocate domestic resources for the eradication of poverty through, inter alia, the creation of employment and income-generating programmes, with particular reference to households headed by women, the implementation of food security, health, education, housing and population programmes and the strengthening of national capacity-building execution programmes;

3. Encourages all countries to undertake national strategies and programmes for the eradication of poverty, in particular devoted to the poorest strata of society, and involving a more active participation of the targeted communities in the initiative for and implementation, follow-up and evaluation of specific projects;

4. Reaffirms that a supportive international economic environment which takes into account the review of resource flows and structural adjustment programmes, integrating social and environmental dimensions, is crucial to the success of efforts of developing countries to deal with the eradication of poverty;

5. Reiterates its request to the international community to adopt specific, effective measures designed to increase financial flows to developing countries, and urges the developed countries, which have reaffirmed their commitment to reach the accepted United Nations target of 0.7 per cent of gross national product for official development assistance, to the extent that they have not yet achieved that target, to agree to augment their aid programmes in order to reach that target as soon as possible, some developed countries having agreed to reach the target by the year 2000; other developed countries, in line with their support for reform efforts in developing countries, agree to make their best efforts to increase their level of official development assistance;

6. Urges all donors to contribute generously to the tenth replenishment of the International Development Association, to the fourth replenishment of the International Fund for Agricultural Development and to other international financial institutions, with a view to ensuring that those institutions continue in their fight against poverty, especially in rural areas;

7. Urges the international community to continue to undertake technical cooperation programmes with a view to strengthening income and job creation capacities, improving food security, health, education and housing, and meeting other basic needs of the populations of developing countries, in particular the poorest groups among them, and, in that context, reaffirms that, with respect to the transfer of technology on favourable terms, including concessional and preferential terms, as mutually agreed, taking into account the need to protect intellectual property rights as well as the special needs of developing countries for the implementation of Agenda 21, effective modalities should be examined with a view to implementing and enhancing that transfer as soon as possible;

8. Encourages the international community, including the organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, to continue to support development programmes in all countries, in particular developing countries, including human resources development programmes, in order to strengthen endogenous technical capacity and generate opportunities for production and employment;

9. Welcomes the decision of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development at its eighth session to set up a Standing Committee on Poverty Alleviation and to request the Trade and Development Board to attach high priority to its work in the framework of its agreed terms of reference;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session on the progress made in coordinating action, in cooperation with governmental and non-governmental organizations and other multilateral bodies, to formulate improved and enhanced action-oriented technical cooperation programmes for the eradication of poverty in all countries, particularly in developing countries, within the framework of the United Nations system, in accordance with the policies, priorities and strategies of those countries;

11. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-eighth session the item entitled "International cooperation for the eradication of poverty in developing countries".

On 22 December 1992, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/196 without vote.

Observance of an international day for the eradication of poverty

The General Assembly,

Noting that the eradication of poverty and destitution in all countries, in particular in developing countries, has become one of the priorities of development for the 1990s, and considering that the promotion of the eradication of poverty and destitution requires public awareness,

Welcoming the fact that certain non-governmental organizations, on the initiative of one non-governmental organization, have in recent years in many States observed 17 October as World Day for Overcoming Extreme Poverty,

1. Decides to declare 17 October International Day for the Eradication of Poverty, to be observed beginning in 1993;

2. Notes that activities undertaken with respect to the Day will take into account those undertaken each 17 October by certain non-governmental organizations;

3. Invites all States to devote the Day to presenting and promoting, as appropriate in the national context, concrete activities with regard to the eradication of poverty and destitution;

4. Invites the Secretary-General to make recommendations on ways and means by which the Secretariat could, within existing resources and without prejudice to ongoing activities, assist States in organizing their national activities for the observance of International Day for the Eradication of Poverty;

5. Invites intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to assist States, at their request, in organizing national activities for the observance of International Day for the Eradication of Poverty, paying due attention to the specific problems of the destitute;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to take, within existing resources, the measures necessary to ensure the success of the observance by the United Nations of International Day for the Eradication of Poverty;

7. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fiftieth session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Agrarian reform and rural development

ACC action. The ACC Task Force on Rural Development (New York, 22-24 April)⁽³³⁾ considered the work accomplished by various agencies and bodies of the United Nations system during 1991 in rural development and related areas. The issues discussed were monitoring and evaluation of rural development, people's participation, industrial contribution to rural development, coordination and collaboration on rural development and agrarian reform, impact of national macroeconomic policies on the rural poor, implementation of the 1985 Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women⁽³⁴⁾ as they related to rural women, and an enabling approach to shelter improvement in rural areas as a contribution to sustainable rural development and poverty alleviation.

The Task Force agreed that agencies should provide information on the impact of their rural development efforts and, in their next reports, place their rural development activities in perspective and review progress, shortcomings and obstacles. It reviewed agency reports on their planned activities for 1992-1993, noting that people's participation, environmental sustainability, food security and nutrition, the private sector, employment, integration of women in development and rural poverty alleviation had received high priority in most agencies. The Task Force agreed that in future reports attention should also be paid to rural-urban linkages. It noted the activities of UNDP in the Niger and the United Republic of Tanzania on the impact of national macroeconomic policies on the rural poor and, in particular, on the implications of the UNDP/World Bank Social Dimensions of Adjustment programme for rural women, and suggested closer cooperation on issues relating to women in development. Having considered the suggestion of the ACC Task Force on Long-term Development Objectives⁽³⁰⁾ that the mandate of the Task Force on Rural Development be extended to cover all issues related to poverty, the Task Force concluded that, although its mandate should remain firmly anchored in rural development, it could be enlarged to review linkages between rural and urban poverty.

UNCTAD and other action. In February,⁽²⁴⁾ UNCTAD VIII expressed support for and solidarity with the Summit on the Economic Advancement of Rural Women, to be held later that month, and underlined the importance of strengthening the productive role of rural women to promote food security, alleviate poverty and accelerate development.

On 30 June,⁽³⁵⁾ Belgium transmitted to the Secretary-General the Geneva Declaration for Rural Women, adopted at that Summit (Geneva, 25 and 26 February) (see PART THREE, Chapter XIII).

In resolution 1992/53 of 31 July, the Economic and Social Council urged States to work to achieve the Geneva Declaration's goals. It urged the United Nations system to take those goals into account in carrying out programmes and invited governing bodies to consider measures to address the special needs of rural women.

FAO report. In response to a 1981 request,⁽³⁶⁾ the Secretary-General submitted to the Economic and Social Council in April 1992 the third review and analysis of agrarian reform and rural development.⁽³⁷⁾ The report, prepared by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) in collaboration with other concerned organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, was the third in the series, the first having been submitted in 1984⁽³⁸⁾ and the second in 1988.⁽³⁹⁾ The report discussed the major dimensions and trends of rural poverty alleviation; reviewed progress in agrarian reforms and their impact on rural poverty; considered patterns and trends in rural employment and the implications of agricultural policy reforms for market prices and access to inputs; analysed the impact of human resource development on poverty and rural development; and discussed the relationship between environment, public policy and poverty. It also drew together the main lessons from the experience of developing countries in their efforts to implement poverty alleviation strategies in the light of the Programme of Action adopted by the 1979 World Conference on Agrarian Reform and Rural Development.⁽⁴⁰⁾

The report found that the negative effects of structural adjustment programmes on the rural poor could be effectively minimized through appropriate government policies. Improvements in social indicators and a decline in the proportion of the poor in the total rural population could also be achieved through increased social services expenditure and improved targeting to the poor.

Considerable disparities persisted between rural and urban areas and between males and females, particularly with respect to school enrolment and literacy rates. Thus, greater effort was required in many countries to remove the bias against rural areas and women. There was strong justification for agrarian reforms based on equity, but effective implementation of redistributive land reforms was contingent on political will and the introduction of complementary policies and measures to provide beneficiaries with improved technologies and supporting services. Greater attention was needed to remove barriers to effective implementation of labour legislation and more innovative and concerted efforts were needed to reach rural youth and women in skill-formation training programmes. Special measures were also needed to promote technology adoption by small farmers and for research and development of appropriate farming systems and technologies for resource-poor, environmentally degraded agro-ecological areas. People's participation was vital to successful environmental conservation or rehabilitation.

By decision 1992/280 of 30 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of the FAO report.

Economic and social trends and policy

Economic surveys and trends

The World Economic Survey 1992⁽¹⁾ stated that the gross global product—the total world output of goods and services—dipped by 0.5 per cent in 1991, a rare occurrence. The dip was mainly due to the fact that the economies of Eastern Europe and the former USSR plunged even deeper into disruption than in 1990. However, growth also slowed in the large industrial economies and several of them were in recession. African economies, on average, barely kept up with population growth. On the other hand, Latin American economies seemed to revive from a decade of stagnation, and growth in Asia remained widespread and fast, despite the slow-down in world trade.

Although in late 1991 many indicators suggested that recovery was finally under way in the United States and a number of other countries, economic activity began weakening in Germany and Japan. Political instability in several parts of the world and the difficulties encountered in the transition in Eastern Europe and the former USSR obscured the economic prospects in those regions. Uncertainties also prevailed in world markets, notably with regard to interest rates. The large investment requirements of the European transition economies and the needs of the Gulf States were leading to an increased world demand for credit, over and above the current-account deficits of the United States. Also, in some major developed market economies, commercial banks, shaken by falling equity prices and large bankruptcies among borrowers, were reluctant to lend even to credit-worthy traditional customers. Thus, interest rates could remain high and credit scarce.

In a note giving an update of the world economy at the end of 1992,⁽²⁾ the Secretary-General stated that it grew only 0.4 per cent in 1992, resulting from a 1.5 per cent increase in industrial countries, a 4.5 per cent increase in developing countries and a decline of 18.4 per cent in the transition economies of Eastern Europe and the former USSR. An improvement was forecast for 1993, mainly due to projected better conditions in transition economies, high growth rates for developing countries and slow but improving growth in industrial countries.

World trade grew 4.5 per cent in 1992, a strong result given slow output growth; imports surged in the developing countries of Asia and Latin America. Japan's net transfer of financial resources to other countries jumped by 55 per cent to some $90 billion in 1992, while the United States absorbed $39 billion from the rest of the world for a second year of smaller inflows. Developing countries absorbed $25 billion in net financial transfers for a second year of big inflows after almost a decade of outflows.

In its review of the situation and prospects for the world economy, the Trade and Development Report, 1992⁽³⁾ noted that the world economy was in a period of uncoordinated, disparate and overall weak growth, with little prospect of vigorous recovery in the near future, continuing a trend that had become evident in 1989 and 1990. Some of the key problems facing the world economy were structural in nature and specific to particular country groups or regions. The clearest example was that of Central and Eastern Europe, where new political, economic and social institutions had to be built. Institution-building would also be important to the economic future of the European Economic Community, and the United Kingdom and the United States also faced major tasks of rebuilding deteriorated infrastructures. In Asia, growth in many of the newly industrialized economies would be increasingly constrained by environmental deterioration and too little investment in infrastructure. In contrast, the development process had scarcely been launched in Africa.

In all regions, problems stemming from demographic changes and pressures required urgent attention. Measures to put the world economy on a balanced and sustainable path of development required not only macroeconomic policy coordination, but also approaches that were carefully tailored to the specific need of individual countries and regions while being mutually supportive and taking account of global interdependence.

Development planning and public administration

Development planning

The Committee for Development Planning held its twenty-eighth session in Kuwait (18-22 April 1992).⁽¹⁾ It stated that while the short-term outlook for the world economy remained fragile, the medium-term outlook inspired cautious optimism. In the industrial countries, the major factors underlying that assessment were the policy reforms introduced in the 1980s, completion of the European Community single-market programme and the creation of the European Economic Area, establishment of a North American free trade area and continuing rapid technical progress, making for rising economies of scale, greater competitiveness and increasing productivity. For other countries to benefit, however, it was important that neither a "fortress Europe" nor a "fortress America" emerged.

In the developing countries, acceleration of growth would depend on the industrial countries and their own continuing domestic policy reforms aimed at macroeconomic stability and outward-oriented trade regimes. There was a danger that privileged access of the Central and Eastern European countries to the markets of Western Europe could harm the trade prospects of developing countries and that those countries could also "crowd out" some groups of countries in international capital markets. CDP observed that, since the rising pressure on global savings would raise interest rates and the cost of capital, a medium-term policy objective of developed market economies should be to raise national savings rates, by reducing fiscal deficits and easing the stance of monetary policy. For developing countries, dependent on ODA for the bulk of their development financing, the prospects for growth in ODA were poor, particularly in view of the likelihood of a diversion of existing ODA levels to the countries with economies in transition.

Addressing the question of economic reforms being implemented in developing countries, CDP concluded that for structural adjustment packages to be sustainable and conducive to longer-term growth, they must include measures to cope with transitory social costs and ensure satisfactory levels of investment in physical infrastructure and human resource development. Experience also indicated that in many developing countries a variety of fundamental structural and institutional changes were needed to ensure growth. Furthermore, structural adjustment programmes that did not explicitly incorporate measures addressing long-term development goals, such as the alleviation of poverty, improvement in the distribution of income, and the socio-economic attainments of women, were likely to fail since a broad-based consensus in support of reform was unlikely to become firmly established. Equally, a comprehensive reform programme that did not address issues of short-term stabilization and medium-term growth-oriented structural reform was likely to result in failure and premature abandonment of the programme. Within a framework of macroeconomic stability, most decision-making in economic matters should be decentralized, consistent with the country's basic socio-economic objectives, requiring measures in a range of policy areas, including fiscal, trade, exchange rates, industrial, labour, social and others.

With regard to fiscal policies, public-sector investment and social spending needed to be rationalized to sustain adequate levels of investment in infrastructure, agriculture and energy and to increase access of the poor to health, education and adequate nutrition. Besides overhauling fiscal systems, States could contribute more effectively to economic development by modifying their approach to development, from one involving heavy governmental intervention and regulation to a more indicative approach.

Industrial and labour policies also needed to be reviewed and reformed, with adequate employment termination benefits and job retraining programmes replacing efforts to preserve employment by keeping loss-making enterprises afloat through public subsidies.

Since growth and welfare benefits of comprehensive reform programmes were realized only after a considerable period of time, many countries needed to pursue political reforms to foster a sense of participation in decision-making at the grass-roots level. Improvements were also needed in the basic elements of governance—adherence to the rule of law, transparency in the use of public funds, and accountability to the governed—so that States could become effective agents of development.

CDP concluded that, although the implementation of developing countries' reform programmes would depend on their own efforts, a favourable external environment would enhance their chance of success. Donor countries could also assist reform efforts by encouraging developing countries to programme measures and establish performance targets over a long-term horizon, supporting such programmes with a multi-year financial commitment.

By decision 1992/296 of 31 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of CDP's report.⁽¹⁾

Public administration

The Secretary-General, in April 1992, presented to the Economic and Social Council the report of the Tenth Meeting of Experts on the United Nations Programme in Public Administration and Finance (New York, 4-11 September 1991).⁽²⁾ The Meeting reviewed current issues in public administration and finance in developing countries, the United Nations work programme in public administration and finance and medium-term plan for 1992-1997, and technical cooperation activities of the United Nations in public administration and finance and prospects for technical cooperation among developing countries. It made recommendations for action at the national and international levels.

In their review of current issues, the Experts noted that the 1990s would present extraordinary challenges to public administration and finance systems throughout the world where national Governments were faced with a complex environment for decision-making. They reviewed those challenges and emphasized that public management would continue to play a vital role in national development. They recommended a number of policy and programme actions to strengthen management approaches, techniques and skills in the areas of administrative reform; human resource management; resource mobilization and expenditure control; financial management; public enterprises; environmental management; information technologies in public management; and commitment and transparency in public management. They also reviewed the constraints facing public administration and finance systems in making them relevant and effective in the 1990s and beyond.

Commenting on the Experts' recommendations, the Secretary-General agreed that there was a need for closer collaboration between the United Nations central programme and new programmes in public management initiated by other United Nations agencies. He stated that the Experts' recommendations were sound and reflected the priority interests and pressing needs of developing countries; their implementation would help to increase the efficiency and effectiveness of public administration and finance measures in developing countries. Actions at the international level would be implemented within current available resources and every attempt would be made to incorporate the recommendations within the framework of the United Nations medium-term plan for 1992-1997. The Secretary-General suggested that future Meetings of Experts should focus mainly on prevailing public management issues, especially in the context of global concerns such as governance, transformation, responsiveness and resource management, with a view to providing timely policy and technical guidance to developing countries.

By decision 1992/287 of 30 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of the Secretary-General's report and requested him to convene the Eleventh Meeting of Experts in 1993.

Developing countries

Least developed countries

The special problems of the officially designated least developed countries were considered in several United Nations forums during 1992, including UNCTAD VIII, the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board, CDP and ACC.

The number of countries on the United Nations list of LDCs remained at 47: Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Benin, Bhutan, Botswana, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cambodia, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Comoros, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Gambia, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Kiribati, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Liberia, Madagascar, Malawi, Maldives, Mali, Mauritania, Mozambique, Myanmar, Nepal, Niger, Rwanda, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sudan, Togo, Tuvalu, Uganda, United Republic of Tanzania, Vanuatu, Yemen, Zaire, Zambia.

Application of the criteria for identification of LDCs

In April,⁽¹⁾ in accordance with the criteria recommended by it in 1991 for the identification of LDCs and noted by the General Assembly later that year,⁽²⁾ CDP considered the requests of the Republic of the Marshall Islands and the Federated States of Micronesia for inclusion in the list of LDCs. CDP examined the economic and social situation of both countries, paying particular attention to the extremely high level of aid dependency. However, in both cases, according to the data provided, per capita income exceeded the income threshold (per capita GDP of $600 or less) and the value of the augmented physical quality of life index exceeded the cut-off point (a value of 47 or less) for that indicator. Accordingly, the Committee did not recommend the two countries for inclusion in the list.

CDP agreed on the need to consider further possible improvements in the criteria for identifying LDCs and their application and requested the Secretariat to prepare a note on the subject for consideration at its 1994 session.

Programme of Action for the 1990s

During 1992, several United Nations bodies reviewed progress in implementing the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, adopted by the Second (1990) United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries (Paris Conference)⁽³⁾ and endorsed by the General Assembly the same year.⁽⁴⁾

In response to a 1991 request of the General Assembly,⁽²⁾ the Secretary-General in June 1992⁽⁵⁾ submitted, through the Economic and Social Council, a note by the UNCTAD Secretary-General on the resource and other implications of the application of the new criteria for identifying LDCs on the implementation of the Programme of Action. The UNCTAD Secretary-General noted that, as a result of the addition in 1990 of Liberia⁽⁶⁾ and of five new LDCs in 1991,⁽²⁾ the increase in external capital requirements of LDCs as a group was in the order of 20 per cent.

In a report on the subject⁽⁷⁾ to UNCTAD VIII (see PART THREE, Chapter IV), which the UNCTAD Secretary-General attached to his note, it was stated that a steady improvement in living standards could be seen in 11 LDCs (with 58 million population) and that an additional six countries (with 124 million population) had realized modest per capita GDP gains. However, those relatively high growth rates were in stark comparison with the group average. Their performance was due in part to strong gains in the purchasing power of their exports and the ability to expand the volume of imports and maintain high domestic investment, high levels and effective use of concessional assistance, expansion of agricultural production and efficient management of external debt. Other factors included large emigrant remittances, strong tourism earnings and, for the six Asian LDCs, the spillover effects of sharply accelerated growth in neighbouring countries.

At the other extreme were the countries with rapid declines in growth and in various human development indicators; they suffered from varying combinations of war, turmoil and unrest, exacerbated in many cases by a heavy inflow of refugees, severely declining export earnings, onerous debt, high inflation and accompanying devaluations, severe declines in investment and sharp falls in import value. Comparing the two extremes, the report noted that countries that were included in the list of LDCs from the beginning (1971)⁽⁸⁾ had generally performed better during the 1980s than those included more recently. That analysis supported the declaration made by participants in the Paris Conference that deterioration in the situation of LDCs could be reversed if the Programme of Action was expeditiously and fully implemented by all concerned.

With regard to the implications of the new criteria on the implementation of the Programme of Action, the report stated that, with the addition of five countries in 1991,⁽²⁾ the population of the LDC group had increased by 15 per cent, rising from 445 million to over 500 million. Since the 1990 Programme of Action was designed for the 41 LDCs on the list at that time, the subsequent increase called for a corresponding revision of the volume of external support and scope of international action on their behalf. Also, the added countries would be expected to fulfil the commitments undertaken at the Conference by other LDCs. Examining the implications, the report focused on international action with respect to resources, debt and trade. The Secretary-General's note described the response of UNCTAD VIII to the situation and action by the Trade and Development Board and the UNDP Governing Council (see below).

UNCTAD action. On 11 February,⁽⁹⁾ UNCTAD VIII held a special meeting on LDCs to review progress in implementing the Programme of Action and the implications for the Programme of additions to the list of LDCs. Two proposals emerged from the meeting: that studies be initiated within UNCTAD on the possible repercussions of new developments in LDCs (increase in number and political and economic changes in the international environment); and that the concerns expressed at the special meeting be taken into account and included in the final act of UNCTAD VIII (the Cartagena Declaration).

The Declaration reaffirmed the need to give priority to the problems facing LDCs due to the fragility of their economies and their particular vulnerability to external shocks and natural calamities. In a section of the Cartagena Commitment dealing with the follow-up of the Programme of Action, UNCTAD VIII stated that LDCs should continue to enhance the implementation of national policies and measures in line with the Programme of Action. Their development partners should effectively and expeditiously implement commitments undertaken or measures proposed in the Programme in all areas of international support.

UNCTAD reiterated that external financial support to complement domestic efforts and appropriate policies should be sufficient in volume and quality, and reaffirmed that a significant and substantial increase in the aggregate level of external support should be made available to LDCs, taking into account those countries recently added to the list. In that regard, donor countries reaffirmed their determination to implement the commitments undertaken in the Programme of Action with regard to ODA to the 41 LDCs on the list at the time of the Paris Conference. As to the consequences of the inclusion of the six additional countries, UNCTAD recommended that the Trade and Development Board, at its spring 1992 session, consider the implications of appropriate adjustments to the commitments contained in the Programme in respect of targets and levels of ODA. The UNDP Governing Council was invited to consider adjusting the total allocation of indicative planning figures (IPFs) to LDCs in the light of the additions to the list. It was noted that the call in the Programme of Action for increasing the resources of the United Nations Capital Development Fund by 20 per cent a year should be adjusted.

UNCTAD identified a number of areas for priority action: external debt problems; mobilization of resources for development; attention to the problems of LDCs in the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations (see PART SEVEN, Chapter XVIII); implementation by preference-giving countries of the Programme of Action's provisions in respect of measures under the generalized system of preferences in favour of LDCs; support by the international community for LDCs' efforts towards diversification; and the introduction of further compensatory-financing mechanisms to assist LDCs affected by commodity-related shortfalls in export earnings.

The Conference stressed the importance of the monitoring, follow-up and review process envisaged in the Programme and called on Governments, UNCTAD and other members of the United Nations system to make early preparations for a mid-term review of the Programme in 1995.

The Conference stated that the problems of LDCs should remain a priority topic in all relevant international forums. It invited UNCED to give special attention to their problems of poverty and environmental degradation.

During the September/October session of the Trade and Development Board,⁽¹⁰⁾ a special sessional committee conducted the second annual review of progress in implementing the Programme of Action for LDCs. It decided that the special issues of domestic and external resource mobilization, including debt situation and management, and improving trading opportunities would be reviewed at the Board's spring session in 1993, when the question of the effects that the countries newly added to the list of LDCs would have on additional resource requirements would also be considered. The Committee urged donors to consider providing extrabudgetary resources to facilitate participation of LDC delegations in future reviews of the Programme of Action by the Board.

UNDP action. In an April report to the Governing Council,⁽¹¹⁾ the UNDP Administrator indicated that IPFs for the five countries obtaining LDC status in 1991—Cambodia, Madagascar, Solomon Islands, Zaire, Zambia—had been recalculated to take account of additional supplementary points awarded to LDCs.

UNCED action. Agenda 21, adopted by UNCED in June⁽¹²⁾ (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII), stated that particular efforts in implementing recommendations in four programme areas—promoting sustainable development through trade, making trade and environment mutually supportive, providing adequate financial resources to developing countries and encouraging economic policies conducive to sustainable development—were warranted in view of the especially acute environmental and developmental problems of LDCs.

Inter-agency consultation. The second inter-agency consultation on the follow-up to the Programme of Action for LDCs (Geneva, 25 and 26 June 1992)⁽¹³⁾ discussed the implications of recent developments in the world economy and of the enlarged list of LDCs for the implementation of the Programme of Action, action by individual organizations in implementing the Programme within their fields of competence, follow-up arrangements at the regional and national levels, including the outcome of country review meetings, and action at the global level for review and monitoring of progress in implementing the Programme. The consultation made recommendations to ACC through its Organizational Committee on the resource situation of LDCs, access to resources under UNDP intercountry programmes, and acquired immunodeficiency syndrome and LDC development in the 1990s.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/173 without vote.

Implications of the application of the new criteria for identifying the least developed countries in the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 45/206 of 21 December 1990, in which it endorsed the Paris Declaration and the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, adopted by the Second United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries, resolution 46/156 of 19 December 1991 on the implementation of the Programme of Action and resolution 46/206 of 20 December 1991 on the report of the Committee for Development Planning: criteria for identifying the least developed countries,

Taking note of the document entitled "A New Partnership for Development: The Cartagena Commitment", adopted by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development at its eighth session,

Reaffirming that the least developed countries have the primary responsibility for the formulation and effective implementation of national policies and priorities for their growth and development, and should continue to implement the commitments they undertook at the Paris Conference, and that the international community, in particular the donor countries, should implement fully and expeditiously their commitments in all areas, as set out in the Programme of Action,

Reiterating the need to strengthen international cooperation for sustainable development in order to support and complement the efforts of the least developed countries,

Noting the donors' determination, reflected in the Cartagena Commitment, to implement the commitments that they undertook in the Programme of Action with regard to official development assistance to the forty-one countries which were included in the list of the least developed countries at the time of the Second United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries,

Noting also that the Trade and Development Board, at the first part of its thirty-ninth session, conducted the second annual review of progress in the implementation of the Programme of Action and also reviewed the question of appropriate adjustment of commitments in respect of targets and levels of official development assistance to the least developed countries in the light of the addition of six countries to the list of those countries after the Second United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries,

Noting further that, at the same session of the Trade and Development Board, donors expressed their intention to examine the effects that the countries newly added to the list of the least developed countries were having on the additional resource requirements of the least developed country group as a whole,

1. Reaffirms that the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s should be implemented fully, effectively and on a timely basis by all parties;

2. Also reaffirms that all least developed countries should continue to enhance the implementation of national policies and measures in line with the Programme of Action, including through macroeconomic policies conducive to long-term, sustained growth and sustainable development, the promotion of individual initiative and broad-based popular participation in the development process, the enhancement of human and institutional capacities and the expansion and modernization of the economic base, and that their development partners should effectively and expeditiously implement the commitments undertaken or the measures proposed in the Programme of Action in all areas of international support, including official development assistance, debt relief and external trade;

3. Further reaffirms that a significant and substantial increase in the aggregate level of external support should be made available to the least developed countries, taking into account those countries recently added to the list of the least developed countries;

4. Takes note of decision 92/30 of 26 May 1992 of the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme concerning adjustment of the allocation of indicative planning figures to the least developed countries in the light of the additions to the list of the least developed countries;

5. Welcomes the outcome of the second annual review of progress in the implementation of the Programme of Action undertaken by the Trade and Development Board at the first part of its thirty-ninth session, and notes the decision, inter alia, that the Board, at the second part of its thirty-ninth session, should:

(a) Review in depth two special issues, namely, domestic and external resource mobilization, including debt situation and management, and improvement of trading opportunities;

(b) Consider the question of appropriate adjustment of the commitments, as requested by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development at its eighth session, taking into account the views expressed and the decisions made at the first part of the thirty-ninth session of the Trade and Development Board;

6. Invites the least developed countries and their development partners, including international organizations and financial institutions, to participate adequately and effectively in the second part of the thirty-ninth session of the Trade and Development Board, to be held at Geneva from 15 to 26 March 1993;

7. Urges donors to consider providing, pursuant to its resolution 46/156, extrabudgetary resources to facilitate the participation of representatives of the least developed countries at future reviews of the Programme of Action by the Trade and Development Board;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session a report on the implementation of the present resolution, including an assessment of the outcome of the third annual review of the Programme of Action by the Trade and Development Board.

Island developing countries

In response to a 1990 General Assembly request,⁽¹⁴⁾ the Secretary-General submitted in September 1992 a report⁽¹⁵⁾ on the specific problems and needs of island developing countries. The report drew on the observations of a meeting of a group of experts (Geneva, 15 and 16 July) appointed by the UNCTAD Secretary-General to review recent trends in the socio-economic performance of island developing countries and prospects for their growth and development; to assess the nature and magnitude of island-specific vulnerabilities; to identify areas of development potential and comparative advantage of island developing countries; and to make policy recommendations for national, regional and international action.

The report examined recent economic performance of island developing countries and their specific vulnerabilities, transport problems, the challenges for the 1990s, and areas of development potential, including service exports, flexible specialization as an approach to organizing production and marine resources of exclusive economic zones.

In a series of policy recommendations for national, regional and international action, the report noted that the key to reducing the vulnerability of island developing countries and to achieving sustainable development was in developing the capacity to respond to shocks and changes in the external environment. National development policy should therefore be outward-oriented and encourage flexibility. Island developing countries should seek to increase their international competitiveness and, in that regard, Governments should provide a broad focus for the economy and establish an enabling environment to encourage and support entrepreneurial activity. They should explore the concept of flexible specialization as the basis for a development strategy linked to world trade and capable of responding to new consumer-driven demand. Countries should actively explore service export strategies, especially in the tourism sector, where linkages within the domestic economy to agriculture, marine resource development, local manufacturing, construction, transport and other service sectors should be encouraged. In achieving the strategic objectives of island developing countries, the importance of human resource development and infrastructural investment should be emphasized, as well as the importance of environmental management. There was also scope for increased regional cooperation measures, particularly among those countries in close geographical proximity, which would help to address the problem of being high-cost economies by developing common services.

With regard to international action, the report recommended removing protectionist measures in developed countries, making available financial resources at concessional rates to complement trade preferences, providing international assistance to mitigate the consequences of global warming and sealevel rise and establishing a family of statistical indicators to reflect adequately the special vulnerabilities of island developing countries.

The expert group suggested a number of areas for specific studies and identified UNCTAD as the appropriate forum to carry them out.

An addendum to the Secretary-General's report⁽¹⁶⁾ provided information from 7 countries, 18 United Nations bodies and specialized agencies and 5 intergovernmental organizations on action taken in response to General Assembly requests in respect of island developing countries.

The sustainable development of small islands was considered by UNCED in June,⁽¹²⁾ identifying it as one of the programme areas in the chapter of Agenda 21 dealing with the protection of the oceans. Small island developing States and islands supporting small communities were considered a special case for both environment and development because of their small size, limited resources, geographic dispersion and isolation. The ocean and coastal environment was of strategic importance for them and constituted a valuable development resource. Because their development options were limited, there were special challenges to planning for and implementing sustainable development.

States committed themselves to addressing the problems of sustainable development of small island developing States and identified a number of management-related activities. At the level of international and regional cooperation and coordination, UNCED recommended that, with the support of international organizations, small island developing States should develop and strengthen inter-island, regional and interregional cooperation and information exchange, including periodic regional and global meetings on sustainable development of small island developing States. International organizations should recognize their special development requirements and give adequate priority in providing assistance, particularly with regard to developing and implementing sustainable development plans.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/186 without vote.

Specific measures in favour of island developing countries

The General Assembly,

Recognizing that, in addition to the general problems facing developing countries, many island developing countries experience handicaps arising from the interplay of such factors as their smallness, remoteness, geographical dispersion, vulnerability to natural disasters, the fragility of their ecosystems, constraints on transport and communications, great distances from market centres, a highly limited internal market, lack of natural resources, weak indigenous technological capacity, the acute problem of obtaining fresh water supplies, heavy dependence on imports and a small number of commodities, depletion of non-renewable resources, migration, particularly of personnel with high-level skills, shortages of administrative personnel and heavy financial burdens,

Recognizing also that many of these factors occur concurrently in island developing countries, resulting in economic and social vulnerability and dependence, particularly in those countries which are small and/or geographically dispersed,

Noting that many island developing countries are least developed countries,

Mindful of the fact that island developing countries are facing in the 1990s an international economic environment which may strongly affect their ability to achieve sustainable development, particularly in small island developing countries which have extremely open and volatile economies,

Concerned about the adverse effects on island developing countries of sealevel rise resulting from climate change,

Taking note of Agenda 21, which was adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, in particular chapter 17, section G thereof, relating to the sustainable development of small island developing States,

Welcoming the decision to convene in 1994 a global conference on the sustainable development of small island developing States,

1. Reaffirms its resolution 45/202 of 21 December 1990 and other relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, and calls for their immediate and effective implementation;

2. Expresses its appreciation to States and to organizations and bodies, within and outside the United Nations system, that have responded to the special needs of island developing countries;

3. Welcomes the initiative of the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development in having convened a meeting of the Group of Experts on Island Developing Countries at Geneva on 14 and 15 July 1992;

4. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the specific problems and needs of island developing countries;

5. Welcomes the efforts made by island developing countries to adopt policies that address their specific problems, including efforts at regional cooperation and integration, and calls upon those countries to continue to pursue, in accordance with their national objectives, policies and priorities, further measures to increase their international competitiveness, render their economies less vulnerable by developing the capacity to respond to shocks due to natural disasters and external economic changes, and promote sustainable development;

6. Appeals to the international community:

(a) To maintain and, if possible, increase the level of concessional financial and technical assistance provided to island developing countries;

(b) To optimize access of island developing countries to concessional financial and technical assistance by taking into account, inter alia, the specific development needs and problems facing those countries;

(c) To consider reviewing the mechanisms of existing procedures used in providing concessional resources to island developing countries, taking into account their situation and development potential;

(d) To ensure that assistance conforms to the national and, as appropriate, regional priorities of island developing countries;

(e) To provide support to island developing countries over a mutually agreed and, where appropriate, longer time-frame to enable them to achieve economic growth and development;

(f) To consider improving trade and/or other existing arrangements for assisting island developing countries in redressing adverse effects on their export earnings and to consider wider adoption of such arrangements;

(g) To continue to ensure that a concerted effort is made to assist island developing countries, at their request, in improving their institutional and administrative capacities and in satisfying their overall needs with regard to the development of human resources;

(h) To provide assistance, where appropriate, to island developing countries to mitigate the consequences of climate change and sealevel rise;

7. Invites island developing countries to intensify further their regional and subregional cooperative arrangements, particularly to address the problem of high-cost economies, by developing, where appropriate, common services to reduce the high per capita costs of infrastructure and public services and by developing regional transport and communications systems;

8. Urges once again relevant organizations of the United Nations system to take adequate measures to respond positively to the particular needs of island developing countries and continue to report on such measures through the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, as appropriate;

9. Urges the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to strengthen its role, within its mandate, as the focal point for specific action at the global level in favour of island developing countries and to act as a catalyst in this regard, inter alia, by organizing and facilitating the cross-regional interchange of information and experience, in full cooperation with regional and subregional organizations, both within and outside the United Nations system, as appropriate;

10. Requests the Secretary-General, taking into account work already done on this issue, as well as that provided for in the context of the preparation for and follow-up to the global conference on the sustainable development of small island developing States, to continue to monitor and review in a coordinated manner, inter alia, within the Inter-Agency Committee on Sustainable Development and the secretariats of the Commission on Sustainable Development and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the problems of island developing countries, in particular those of small island developing countries;

11. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-ninth session on the implementation of the present resolution.

General Assembly resolution 47/186

22 December 1992 Meeting 93 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/47/718/Add.2) without vote, 7 December (meeting 48); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/47/L.68), based on informal consultations on draft by Pakistan for Group of 77 (A/C.2/47/L.33); agenda item 78 (a).

Meeting numbers. GA 47th session: 2nd Committee 40, 42, 43, 48; plenary 93.

On the same date, the Assembly adopted, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, resolution 47/189 without vote.

Convening of a global conference on the sustainable development of small island developing States

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 44/228 of 22 December 1989, in which it decided to convene the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development to, inter alia, elaborate strategies and measures aimed at promoting sustainable and environmentally sound development in all countries,

Recalling also its resolution 45/202 of 21 December 1990, in which it called upon island developing countries to continue to adopt suitable development policies designed to overcome their specific vulnerabilities and to adopt measures aimed at protecting and rehabilitating their fragile ecosystems, and at the same time appealed to the international community to extend cooperation in this regard,

Taking note of Agenda 21, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, in particular chapter 17, section G thereof, on the sustainable development of small island developing States,

Taking into account relevant work in this area carried out by other organs, programmes and organizations of the United Nations system,

Recognizing that small island developing States and islands supporting small communities are a special case with regard to both environment and development, that they are ecologically fragile and vulnerable, that their small size, limited resources, geographic dispersion and isolation from markets place them at a disadvantage economically and limit economies of scale, and that for small island developing States the ocean and coastal environment is of strategic importance and constitutes a valuable development resource,

Also recognizing that the geographic isolation of small island developing States has resulted in their habitation by comparatively large numbers of unique species of flora and fauna, giving them a very large share of global biodiversity,

Aware that small island developing States have rich and diverse cultures with special adaptations to island environments and knowledge of sound management of island resources,

Aware also that small island developing States have all the environmental problems and challenges of the coastal zone concentrated in a limited land area,

Noting that small island developing States are considered extremely vulnerable to the impact of potential climate change and sealevel rise, with certain small low-lying island developing States facing the increasing threat of the loss of their entire national territories,

Gravely concerned that most tropical islands are currently experiencing the more immediate impacts of an increasing frequency of cyclones, storms and hurricanes associated with climate change, which are causing major set-backs to their socio-economic development,

Stressing that, because the development options of small island developing States are limited, there are special challenges to planning for and implementing sustainable development, and that small island developing States will be constrained in meeting those challenges without the cooperation and assistance of the international community,

Affirming the relevance of the environmental issues identified in paragraph 12, section I, of its resolution 44/228 to the sustainable development of small island developing States,

Reaffirming the recommendation in Agenda 21 that small island developing States, with the support, as appropriate, of international organizations, whether subregional, regional or global, should develop and strengthen inter-island, regional and interregional cooperation and information exchange, including periodic regional and global meetings on the sustainable development of such States,

1. Decides to convene in April 1994 the first Global Conference on the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States, which shall be of two weeks' duration and shall have the highest possible level of participation;

2. Accepts with deep appreciation the generous offer of the Government of Barbados to host the Conference;

3. Affirms that the Conference should elaborate strategies and measures to enhance the sustainable development of small island developing States in the context of increased national and international efforts to promote sustainable and environmentally sound development worldwide;

4. Decides that the Conference shall have the following objectives:

(a) To adopt plans and programmes to support the sustainable development of small island developing States and the utilization of their marine and coastal resources, which includes meeting essential human needs, maintaining biodiversity and improving the quality of life for island people;

(b) To adopt measures that will enable small island developing States to cope effectively and creatively and in a sustainable manner with environmental changes and to mitigate the impacts on and reduce the threats posed to marine and coastal resources;

5. Also decides that the Conference, in pursuit of those objectives, shall examine strategies for national and international action with a view to arriving at specific agreements and commitments by Governments and by intergovernmental organizations for defined activities to promote sustained and environmentally sound development of small island developing States; the Conference shall, inter alia:

(a) Review current trends in the socio-economic development of small island developing States and the prospects, constraints and further options for their sustainable development, taking into consideration the relevant programmes and recommendations in chapter 17, section G, of Agenda 21;

(b) Examine the nature and magnitude of the specific vulnerabilities of small island developing States with a view to defining and/or formulating specific indicators of vulnerability in a way that has operational applicability;

(c) Define a number of specific actions and policies relating to environmental and development planning to be undertaken by small island developing States, with the assistance of the international community, to facilitate the sustainable development of such States;

(d) Identify the elements that small island developing States need to include in their medium- and long-term sustainable development plans, including their response strategies, taking into account the importance of integrating environmental, social and economic factors in the maintenance of cultural and biological diversity and the conservation of endangered species and critical habitats on both land and sea;

(e) Recommend measures for enhancing the endogenous capacity of small island developing States, in particular the development of human resources and the promotion of access to environmentally sound technology for sustainable development within such States;

(f) Review whether institutional arrangements at the international level enable small island developing States to give effect to the relevant provisions of Agenda 21, and make recommendations as needed in this regard;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare a report for the substantive session of the Preparatory Committee established in paragraph 8 below, containing a review of existing global and regional programmes of action with regard to their applicability to and their combined effect on the sustainable development of small island developing States, with specific recommendations on any changes to those programmes of action which may be needed to establish greater consistency with the principles of Agenda 21 with respect to the sustainable development of small island developing States;

7. Also requests the Secretary-General to invite to the Conference those listed in paragraph 9 of General Assembly resolution 46/168 of 19 December 1991, as well as representatives of relevant regional and subregional organizations;

8. Decides to establish the Preparatory Committee for the Global Conference on the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States, which shall be open to all the participants referred to in paragraph 7 above, in accordance with the established practice of the Assembly;

9. Welcomes the candidature of Ambassador Penny Wensley (Australia) for the chairmanship of the Preparatory Committee;

10. Decides that the Preparatory Committee shall hold a two-day organizational session at United Nations Headquarters, not later than April 1993, for the following purposes:

(a) The election of its chairman and the other officers, namely, four vice-chairmen, including a rapporteur, giving due regard to equitable geographical representation;

(b) The organization of its work;

11. Also decides that the Preparatory Committee shall hold a substantive session of two weeks' duration in August 1993 at United Nations Headquarters, at which time it shall:

(a) Draft the provisional agenda for the Conference, in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution, on the basis of recommendations to be submitted by the Secretary-General;

(b) Receive and consider the substantive contributions referred to in paragraphs 6, 16 and 17 of the present resolution;

(c) Prepare draft decisions to be submitted to the Conference for consideration and adoption;

12. Further decides that the host country of the Conference shall be ex officio an officer of the Preparatory Committee;

13. Requests the Secretary-General, within the context of the administrative arrangements to be put in place to coordinate the implementation of Agenda 21 and the servicing of the Commission on Sustainable Development, and in close cooperation with the United Nations Environment Programme, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations and other relevant organizations and programmes of the United Nations system, to establish a focal point with a senior official, at an appropriate level and with the necessary specialized expertise, to service fully the preparations for and holding of the Conference and to ensure such follow-up action as may result therefrom;

14. Also requests the Secretary-General to prepare a report, to be submitted to the Preparatory Committee at its organizational session, containing recommendations on an adequate preparatory process, taking into account the provisions of the present resolution and the views expressed by Governments during the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development;

15. Further requests the Secretary-General to prepare draft rules of procedure for the consideration of the Preparatory Committee at its organizational session, and, in this context, to include proposals for the participation of representatives of associate members of the regional commissions, outside the negotiating process, and, in accordance with the rules of procedure of the General Assembly, to allow them to contribute to the Conference and its preparatory process;

16. Stresses the importance of holding regional technical meetings on the sustainable development of small island developing States as a means of preparing substantive contributions to the Conference, and invites relevant regional and subregional bodies, in close cooperation with the United Nations Environment Programme, the United Nations Development Programme, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization and other agencies, organs, organizations and programmes of the United Nations system, to organize such meetings as soon as practicable, preferably in the first half of 1993;

17. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure the coordination of contributions from the United Nations system through the Administrative Committee on Coordination;

18. Invites relevant non-governmental organizations from developed and developing countries, in particular those from small island developing States, including those related to major groups, to contribute to the Conference, within the areas of their competence and expertise, on the basis of the procedures for their accreditation followed for the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, as recommended in paragraph 38.44 of Agenda 21;

19. Decides that, subject to the relevant provisions of General Assembly resolutions 40/243 of 18 December 1985, 41/213 of 19 December 1986 and 42/211 of 21 December 1987, the funds necessary for the preparatory process and the Conference itself should be made available within the programme budget without adversely affecting other ongoing activities and without prejudice to the provision of extrabudgetary resources;

20. Abo decides to establish a voluntary fund for the purpose of assisting small island developing States and the least developed countries to participate fully and effectively in the Conference and its preparatory process, and invites Governments to contribute to the fund;

21. Requests the Secretary-General to bring the present resolution to the attention of the relevant specialized agencies and other relevant organs, organizations and programmes of the United Nations system;

22. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-eighth session a sub-item entitled "Global Conference on the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States" under an item entitled "Implementation of decisions and recommendations of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development".

Chapter II

Operational activities for development

A comprehensive policy review of United Nations operational activities for development took place in 1992 at a critical juncture for developing countries and international development cooperation. The operational activities of the United Nations system were undergoing important changes to adapt to the circumstances of the 1990s. The question of strengthening the operational activities of the United Nations system was discussed by the Economic and Social Council in July, while the triennial policy review of operational activities was carried out by the General Assembly later in the year. In December (resolution 47/199), the Assembly stressed the need for a substantial increase in resources for operational activities for development and made a number of recommendations for improvements in the system, including the strengthening of the resident coordinator function. As part of his efforts to restructure the Secretariat, the Secretary-General established the Department of Economic and Social Development (DESD), incorporating the former Department of Technical Cooperation for Development.

During 1991, the most recent year for which figures were available, expenditures by the United Nations system on operational activities for development totalled $8.4 billion. Of that amount, $4.3 billion was in the form of development grants and $4.1 billion in concessional loans.

The United Nations Development Programme (UNDP)—the central funding body for providing technical assistance to developing countries—spent $1 billion on programme activities in 1992, a decline from $1.1 billion in 1991. The organizational entities of the United Nations—mainly through DESD—delivered a technical cooperation programme of $243 million in 1992, compared with $285 million in 1991.

Expenditures in 1992 by the United Nations Capital Development Fund, a multilateral agency providing small-scale capital assistance to the least developed countries, amounted to some $57.5 million.

With regard to technical cooperation among developing countries, the Economic and Social Council, in July, called for increased use by developed countries of consultants from developing countries to improve the cost-effectiveness of technical cooperation projects, and urged UNDP to intensify efforts to build national capacity for human resources development in developing countries (resolution 1992/41).

General aspects

Strengthening operational activities. In accordance with a 1991 General Assembly decision,⁽¹⁾ the Secretary-General, by a June note,⁽²⁾ submitted to the Economic and Social Council a report on strengthening the operational activities of the United Nations system, including the governance and financing aspects thereof, prepared by two consultants. The Council considered the report and others during its high-level segment (6-9 July), devoted to the theme "enhancing international cooperation for development: the role of the United Nations system" (see PART THREE, Chapter I), and during its operational activities segment.

The report discussed the need to reform the United Nations system as well as those reform and restructuring efforts that had already taken place. It also considered issues in governance and finance and other issues in strengthening operational activities. To assist the Council in its review of the subject of governance, the report presented four models representing four different governance structures, including the current situation, ranging from a highly centralized, unified structure to a highly decentralized one. In an appendix, the report discussed two reform initiatives and proposals—the Nordic United Nations project and a research programme of the United Nations Association of the United States, A Successor Vision: The United Nations of Tomorrow.

By decision 1992/301 of 31 July, the Council took note of the Secretary-General's note transmitting the consultants' report.

Triennial policy review. In September/October, the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly a report on the triennial comprehensive policy review of the operational activities of the United Nations system.⁽³⁾ The report discussed changes in United Nations operational activities, resources for development, human development, programming, the resident coordinator system and country representation, national execution, and coordinated training strategies and national capacity. Addenda surveyed the contribution of operational activities to the enhancement of science and technology in developing countries (see PART III, Chapter VII), provided statistical data for 1991, and described the activities of the United Nations system in the Baltic States and the Commonwealth of Independent States.

Among the changes taking place in the United Nations development system were the reforms initiated by a General Assembly resolution of 1989,⁽⁴⁾ which recognized that the 1990s required greater coherence of action and new approaches to programming operational activities, with greater emphasis on integrated and multidisciplinary support and advice.

Guiding the reforms was the resolution's call for more coordinated programming of United Nations system cooperation; harmonization of programming processes at country levels; a shift away from small projects to more concentrated and integrated programmes; the strengthening of the resident coordinator system; more decentralized capacity of the United Nations at the country level, including maximum use of national capacities; and measures to enable Governments to assume the execution of programmes funded by the United Nations. The system had taken action to comply with the resolution on many fronts.

In 1992, the Secretary-General initiated the first phase of the restructuring of the economic and social sectors of the United Nations and was in the process of consulting with a panel of high-level advisers on the future course of United Nations development activities.

The report's analysis of the country-level performance of the system's operational activities was based on the findings of four expert missions to 12 developing countries between 8 February and 11 March; 101 responses to questionnaires sent to United Nations resident coordinators; responses to a questionnaire sent to United Nations organizations and as a result of direct consultations within the Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions (Operational Activities) of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC); and 71 responses to questions sent to Governments of both developing and developed countries.

The principal findings were as follows: the provisions of the 1989 Assembly resolution on operational activities⁽⁴⁾ remained valid, although the United Nations system had taken numerous steps to implement the resolution at the intergovernmental level; differences remained in understanding and applying operational concepts; and the remaining task was to implement more fully the central ideas of the resolution and to take further steps to respond to developing countries' requirements through support from the best sources both within and outside the system.

The report reviewed the historical and international economic factors that had an impact on the availability of resources for development, noting that the International Development Strategy for the Second United Nations Development Decade, adopted by the Assembly in 1970,⁽⁵⁾ had set a target for each developed country of 0.7 per cent of its gross national product (GNP) to be provided as official development assistance. Several smaller developed countries had met or surpassed the target, but overall the flow of assistance had remained at half the target level.

Debate on the magnitude of resources for development had gone well beyond discussion of the desirable level of assistance and was currently addressing the following major issues: international debt; trade; environment; population; development assistance and basic needs; investment flows; and institutional framework.

With regard to the role of operational activities in human development, the policy review stated that all development effort, whether national, bilateral or multilateral, had been traditionally justified on the grounds that it would improve the lives of people. However, at national and international levels, the focus on human development remained inadequate. Developing countries had not been able to make their needs felt as an imperative in shaping global economic priorities nor had the poorer sections of the population been able to do so at the national level.

The new focus on human development in the United Nations was directed at providing the poor with the means to improve their condition. That meant improving their access to food, water, housing, health services and education. It also meant empowering them to improve their technical skills, conserve their environment, enlarge their intellectual world and protect their human rights.

Cross-sectoral dimensions had been added to the concept of human development. For example, UNDP and the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), in collaboration with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), the International Labour Organisation (ILO) and the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) were assisting Governments to prepare country strategies for human development that placed social concerns on an equal basis with economic growth.

As to programming of operational activities, the shift from a project to a programme approach was considered in the policy review. It was noted that the 1990s demanded greater inter-agency cooperation and integration of United Nations programmes with national strategies. The programme approach was an integral part of the national effort, and the national organization managing the programme needed to have the capacity to implement cross-sectoral programmes.

Some progress had been achieved in synchronizing all programming cycles of United Nations funds and programmes and adapting them to national requirements. Further progress should be achieved, particularly on the basis of work being done by the Joint Consultative Group on Policy (UNDP, UNFPA, UNICEF and the World Food Programme (WFP)), by establishing an agreed plan and by stressing substantive, thematic collaboration. Further steps should be taken to improve the assessment of impact, sustainability and self-reliance in evaluating programme and project performance.

The policy review also discussed the responsibility of the United Nations resident coordinator to provide leadership in integrating and coordinating the system's response to developing countries' needs.

Resident coordinators worked in differing environments, providing development services, technical advice, humanitarian assistance and information. The resident coordinator system had been strengthened during the past three years, but further progress was needed. Several elements were essential for its improved functioning: a process to communicate United Nations goals and strategies at the country level; clearer guidelines for the functioning of the resident coordinator system; technical capacity to provide high-quality and timely support to the Government; better access to data required for country programmes; and further decentralization to the field level, delegation of authority and flexibility.

Many achievements of the resident coordinator system had relied too much on ad hoc initiatives and not enough on a systematic approach. More coherent guidance from the headquarters of various United Nations organizations was required on major policy questions, and support should come in a coordinated manner and on the basis of processes agreed upon by ACC and other coordinating entities, such as the Joint Consultative Group on Policy.

To respond more effectively to requirements for multidisciplinary advice, there was a need to give the resident coordinator the authority to constitute multidisciplinary teams and to reinforce collaborative cross-sectoral programmes through coordination and harmonization of the policies of United Nations organizations.

Wider application of the national execution modality was occurring in various countries, the policy review stated. In UNICEF, the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD) and WFP, national execution was the norm. That also largely applied to the World Health Organization (WHO). For UNFPA, the proportion varied, but was much higher than for UNDP.

Current rules and procedures relating to administration and programme and project identification, formulation, appraisal, monitoring and evaluation required by the United Nations system inhibited greater national participation. Greater harmonization and simplification of United Nations rules and procedures would facilitate national participation, enhance efficiency and make better use of scarce resources.

Addressing the issue of training strategies and national capacity, the policy review observed that the impact and the success or failure of operational activities was related to the Government's ability to provide human and financial resources. Deficiencies took various forms, among which the following were particularly relevant: shortages of qualified human resources in the public sector; lack of legal, accounting, audit and financial management personnel; lack of funding; lack of training resources; and delays in decision-making, cumbersome national bureaucracies and lack of delegation of authority.

A training strategy in operational activities could involve training for enhanced national development management within the framework of national execution and national capacity-building and workshops on the management of field coordination for senior United Nations representatives.

A scheme for the training of trainers was needed. While project-by-project funded training schemes should continue, there was a need to mobilize a separate fund to underwrite the start-up cost and the continuing organizing expenses of a global multi-agency trainers' programme.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, adopted resolution 47/199 without vote.

Triennial policy review of operational activities for development within the United Nations system

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 44/211 of 22 December 1989 and 46/219 of 20 December 1991, and other relevant resolutions,

Concerned that the full and coordinated implementation of resolution 44/211 has not been achieved by the United Nations system,

Noting with concern that, while some progress has been made in implementing parts of its resolution 44/211, both by individual organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system and by coordination mechanisms of the system, many of the provisions of that resolution have still to be implemented,

Urging developed countries, in particular those countries whose overall performance is not commensurate with their capacity, taking into account established official development assistance targets, including targets established at the Second United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries, and current levels of contribution, to increase their official development assistance substantially, including contributions to the operational activities of the United Nations system,

Stressing that national plans and priorities constitute the only viable frame of reference for the national programming of operational activities for development within the United Nations system,

Stressing also that the fundamental characteristics of the operational activities of the United Nations system should be, inter alia, their universal, voluntary and grant nature, neutrality and multilateralism, and the ability to respond to the needs of the developing countries in a flexible manner, and that the operational activities of the United Nations system are carried out for the benefit of the developing countries, at the request of those countries and in accordance with their own policies and priorities for development,

Reaffirming that the operational activities for development within the United Nations system have a critical and unique role to play in enabling developing countries to take a lead role in the management of their own development process,

Stressing further that, in order to achieve the objective set out above, processes and procedures of the United Nations system should be streamlined and rationalized, especially in the interrelated areas of programming, execution, decentralization, monitoring and evaluation, thus making the United Nations system more relevant and responsive to the national plans, priorities and objectives of developing countries and more efficient in its delivery systems,

Emphasizing the importance it attaches to a more effective and coherent coordinated approach by the United Nations system to the needs of recipient countries, particularly at the field level,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the triennial comprehensive policy review of operational activities of the United Nations system;

2. Reaffirms its resolution 44/211 and stresses the need to implement all the elements of that resolution in a coherent manner, keeping in mind their interlinkages;

3. Stresses the need for a substantial increase in resources for operational activities for development on a predictable, continuous and assured basis, commensurate with the increasing needs of developing countries;

4. Reaffirms the need for priority allocation of scarce grant resources to programmes and projects in low-income countries, particularly the least developed countries;

5. Stresses the need for an overall improvement of the effectiveness and efficiency of the United Nations system in delivering its development assistance;

6. Also stresses that, in the context of the administrative reform of the Secretariat and the restructuring and revitalization of the intergovernmental process, the mandates of the separate sectoral and specialized entities, funds, programmes and specialized agencies should be respected and enhanced, taking into account their complementarities;

7. Emphasizes that the recipient Government has the primary responsibility for coordinating, on the basis of national strategies and priorities, all types of external assistance, including that provided by multilateral organizations, in order effectively to integrate the assistance into its development process;

8. Reaffirms that the multisectoral, sectoral and/or subsectoral strategies prepared by the recipient countries, on the basis of priorities identified by them, should provide a coherent and coordinated programme framework for all external assistance;

9. Stresses that, on the basis of the priorities and plans of recipient countries, and in order to ensure the effective integration of assistance provided by the United Nations system into the development process of countries, with enhanced accountability, and to facilitate the assessment and evaluation of the impact and sustainability of that assistance, a country strategy note should be formulated by interested recipient Governments, with the assistance of and in cooperation with the United Nations system, under the leadership of the resident coordinator, in all recipient countries where the Government so chooses, taking into account the following:

(a) The country strategy note should outline the contribution the operational activities for development within the United Nations system could make to respond to the requirements identified by recipient countries in their plans, strategies and priorities;

(b) The contribution of the United Nations system to the country strategy note should be formulated under the leadership of the resident coordinator, in order to promote greater coordination and cooperation at the field level;

(c) The country strategy note should be transmitted to the governing body of each funding organization as a reference for the consideration of its specific country programme;

(d) The specific activities of each funding organization of the United Nations system, within the broad framework of the country strategy note, should be outlined in a specific country programme prepared by the recipient Government with the assistance of the funding organizations;

10. Reaffirms that, within the context of the Joint Consultative Group on Policies, the funding organizations of the United Nations system, the United Nations Development Programme, the United Nations Children's Fund, the United Nations Population Fund, the World Food Programme and the International Fund for Agricultural Development and the funds administered by the United Nations Development Programme should harmonize their cycles and, where appropriate, adapt them to national budget cycles, plans and strategies;

11. Decides that assistance should be based on an agreed division of responsibility among the funding organizations, under the coordination of the Government, in order to integrate their response into the development needs of recipient countries;

12. Takes note of decision 92/23 of 26 May 1992 and of all other relevant decisions of the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme regarding the programme approach;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to promote an early agreement on a common interpretation of the programme approach, including an effective methodology for evaluation, to be applied by the United Nations system, with due regard to country-specific circumstances, and to report thereon to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1993;

14. Requests the Economic and Social Council to examine the report mentioned above at its substantive session of 1993 and to determine whether effective and coordinated actions are being taken on the matter by the United Nations system dealing with development;

15. Reiterates that national execution should be the norm for programmes and projects supported by the United Nations system, taking into account the needs and capacities of recipient countries;

16. Also reiterates that it is the principal responsibility of recipient countries to determine their capacity to execute programmes and projects supported by the United Nations system;

17. Stresses the need for the United Nations system to strengthen its capacity to provide policy and technical support and advice at the request of recipient countries;

18. Also stresses the urgent need for the United Nations system to give increased priority to assisting recipient countries in building and/or enhancing the capacity necessary to undertake national execution, including the provision of support services, as required, at the field level;

19. Recognizes the important role of the specialized agencies of the United Nations system within their specific areas of competence and the need for a clear division of labour in facilitating and providing the necessary technical and substantive expertise for programmes and projects supported by the United Nations system;

20. Requests the Economic and Social Council, through the Commission on Science and Technology for Development at its session in 1993, to consider the report of the Secretary-General on the comprehensive policy review of operational activities of the United Nations system as a means to examine the contribution of the operational activities of the United Nations system to the enhancement of the national capacities of developing countries in the field of science and technology, and to make appropriate recommendations thereon;

21. Takes note of decision 92/22 of 26 May 1992 and of all other relevant decisions of the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme regarding the definition of programme/project execution and implementation concepts;

22. Requests the Secretary-General to promote an early agreement on a common interpretation of national execution to be applied by the United Nations system and to report thereon to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1993;

23. Requests the Economic and Social Council to examine the report mentioned above at its substantive session of 1993 and to determine whether effective and co-ordinated actions are being taken on the matter by the United Nations system dealing with development;

24. Decides that, in order to enhance coherence in programming and resource utilization, programme development and component approval, capacity and authority should be further decentralized to the field offices, which should be provided with the necessary technical and substantive expertise;

25. Strongly urges, in this context, that governing bodies of all funds, programmes and specialized agencies should ensure that the prescribed limits on field-level authority for cancelling, modifying and adding activities within approved programmes and for shifting resources within approved budget lines of individual components of a programme and among components of a programme, with the approval of national authorities, should be expanded to become equal and uniform, to the maximum extent possible, in the context of enhanced accountability;

26. Stresses that the United Nations system should use, to the fullest extent possible, available national expertise and indigenous technologies;

27. Also stresses that the procurement of expertise and equipment and the placing of fellowships should be decentralized to the country level to the maximum extent possible to avoid delays, reflect national needs and ensure cost-effectiveness, and stresses further that, in this context, the procurement of expertise and equipment should be decentralized, with due regard to the principles of international competitive bidding, while acknowledging the commitment to increase substantially procurement from developing countries and the need for effective accountability mechanisms;

28. Acknowledges the commitment to procurement from underutilized major donor countries, in accordance with the principles of international competitive bidding;

29. Stresses that common formats, rules and procedures are critical to meet the requirements of the shift to a programme approach, and that all formats, rules and procedures and periodicity of reports should be simplified and harmonized to promote national capacity-building, so as to assist the Government to integrate external assistance from different sources into its development process;

30. Decides that the financial and programme auditing capacity and accounting systems of recipient Governments should be strengthened, with assistance from the United Nations system, as requested by Governments;

31. Also decides that, within the context of the programme approach, formats designed for programme, programme component and project development, monitoring and evaluation should take into account interrelated and cross-sectoral linkages between individual strategies of recipient countries and between the individual components of a strategy;

32. Further decides that budgeting and related rules, procedures, processes and formats should be redefined to become, within the context of the sustainability of programmes supported by the United Nations system and their components and projects, oriented towards output, impact or performance rather than towards input or supply, and that, accordingly, evaluation and monitoring systems should be reoriented, while the use of evaluation and monitoring findings should be strengthened, thereby creating a feedback system;

33. Requests inter-agency coordination mechanisms, in particular the Joint Consultative Group on Policies, to give priority to simplifying, harmonizing and increasing the transparency of their procedures relating to programme component and project formulation, appraisal, implementation, monitoring and evaluation, taking into account the need to focus on the impact and sustainability of projects and programmes, and to reach agreement on a common United Nations system-wide manual for such procedures by 1 July 1994;

34. Also requests the members of inter-agency coordination mechanisms, in particular the Joint Consultative Group on Policies, to put in place as soon as possible, and no later than 1 January 1995, measures to enhance accountability at the field level, including effective harmonized programme monitoring, evaluation and management audit systems;

35. Stresses the need for funds and programmes to take into account the decisions of the General Assembly on auditing standards;

36. Also stresses that the strengthened resident coordinator function is necessary to assist the Government in mobilizing technical expertise from both inside and outside the United Nations system and ensuring co-ordination at the country level through, inter alia, the country strategy note, in order to respond to national needs and priorities in the most cost-effective and efficient manner and to maximize the impact of the United Nations system on the development process;

37. Further stresses that, in order to achieve the objective set out above, particular attention should be paid in the selection of the resident coordinators to quality, relevant broad development experience, managerial and team-building skills, and the capacity to integrate individual components and strategies into the overall development process of the country, as well as to develop effective and coherent coordination by the United Nations system as a whole;

38. Emphasizes that an effectively functioning resident coordinator system will be dependent on a number of factors, including the following:

(a) The separate funds, programmes and specialized agencies must make a commitment to work together to integrate assistance provided by the United Nations system into the development process of the recipient countries in a fully coordinated manner;

(b) The United Nations system at the country level should be tailored, taking into account the views of the recipient Government, to the specific developmental needs of the country in such a way that they correspond to ongoing and projected cooperation programmes rather than to the institutional structure of the United Nations;

(c) The separate identities and, where appropriate, representation of funds and programmes at the country level should be ensured in the framework of a clear and improved division of labour, in accordance with their mandates;

(d) The resident coordinator should, if required, establish close cooperation with the funds, programmes and specialized agencies at the regional and subregional levels, in order to respond to specific requests by recipient Governments;

(e) In strengthening the resident coordinator system, the creation of an additional bureaucratic layer should be avoided;

39. Requests the Secretary-General, with due regard to General Assembly resolutions 34/213 of 19 December 1979 and 46/182 of 19 December 1991 and paragraph 38 above, to strengthen the resident coordinator system with the aim of:

(a) Improving the efficiency and effectiveness of the United Nations system at the field level, through a fully coordinated multidisciplinary approach to the needs of recipient countries under the leadership of the resident coordinator, bearing in mind the complementarity of the system and the need for a division of labour within the respective spheres of competence of individual specialized agencies, programmes and funds;

(b) Establishing, in consultation with recipient Governments, a clearer division of responsibilities for the resident coordinator and individual funds, programmes and specialized agencies;

(c) Ensuring that, in the context of the country strategy note, where in place, representatives of the members of the Joint Consultative Group on Policies at the field level and, in due course, of all funds, programmes and specialized agencies with field operations inform, consult with and take account of any views of the resident coordinator in the context of major programming exercises before reporting to their headquarters on major programming and policy issues;

(d) Widening the pool of qualified development professionals eligible for appointment as United Nations Development Programme resident representatives/resident coordinators to include the members of the Joint Consultative Group on Policies, together with increased transparency in the selection process;

(e) Encouraging individual specialized agencies at the field level to participate fully in all aspects of the resident coordinator system;

(f) Defining the responsibility of the relevant inter-agency coordination mechanisms, in particular the Joint Consultative Group on Policies, in close consultation with the funds, programmes and specialized agencies of the United Nations system, for providing clear guidance to resident coordinators and for ensuring that they are provided with the necessary support both at the headquarters level and in the field;

(g) Enhancing the responsibility and authority of the resident coordinator for the planning and coordination of programmes as well as allowing him or her to propose, in full consultation with the Government, to the heads of the funds, programmes and specialized agencies, the amendment of country programmes and major projects and programmes, where required, to bring them into line with the country strategy note;

40. Calls upon resident coordinators to take the necessary steps, in those countries where the scale of the activities of the United Nations and the number of funds, programmes and specialized agencies so justify, to establish, in consultation with host Governments, an appropriate field-level committee, which will normally comprise all resident United Nations system representatives and which, under the leadership of the resident coordinator, will serve as a United Nations coordinating mechanism in the countries concerned;

41. Calls upon the coordinating mechanism mentioned above, in consultation with the host Government, to undertake advisory functions including, inter alia, the provision of guidance and advice on proposed programmes of funding organizations, the review of agency sector strategies and evaluations and the investigation of specific problems and issues requiring a coordinated response;

42. Welcomes the decision of the Joint Consultative Group on Policies to set a target for increasing the number of common premises, while emphasizing that this should be achieved in cooperation with host Governments in a way that increases efficiency through, inter alia, consolidation of administrative infrastructures of organizations concerned, without increasing the costs for the United Nations system or for developing countries;

43. Emphasizes the necessity of continuing to develop common innovative and integrated system-wide training programmes, at Headquarters and, especially, at the field level, while taking into account the use of regional cooperation arrangements, for government officials and other nationals, as well as for the staff of the United Nations system field offices, to facilitate the shift from the project to the programme approach and to promote effective and innovative execution modalities;

44. Also emphasizes that those training programmes should be joint and common, include on-the-job training, involve the establishment of a training capacity internal to each country, including a scheme for the training of national trainers, and be provided on a continuous basis as an integral function of the United Nations system field office structure;

45. Stresses that those training programmes should aim to develop capacities, especially in the areas of the programme approach, national execution, programme accountability and financial audit, support costs and evaluation and monitoring;

46. Urges the United Nations system to give appropriate attention to establishing and maintaining national institutional expertise, particularly in the areas mentioned in paragraph 45 above, through, inter alia, the increased participation in training programmes of national staff and members of relevant national institutions;

47. Reaffirms the importance of human development, including human resources development, and requests the United Nations system to strengthen the support given by its operational activities for development, at the request of recipient countries, to sectors vital to human development;

48. Recognizes that the United Nations system has a role to play in assisting countries that are undergoing deep economic and social reforms;

49. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the operational activities for development within the United Nations system carried out in new recipient countries are undertaken, from the outset, on the basis of an integrated, unified, cost-effective and innovative approach to development cooperation and presence in the countries concerned and to ensure effective support to them, while ensuring that such support is not to the detriment of existing programmes for developing countries;

50. Stresses the need for the Economic and Social Council to examine the operational activities of the United Nations system with a view to ensuring implementation of the present resolution and making recommendations thereon;

51. Calls upon the governing bodies of the funds, programmes and specialized agencies of the United Nations system to take appropriate action for the full implementation of the present resolution, and requests the executive heads of those funds, programmes and specialized agencies to submit a yearly progress report to their governing bodies on measures taken and to be taken for its implementation;

52. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the provisions of the present resolution are fully implemented by all the organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system;

53. Also requests the Secretary-General, after consultations with the funds, programmes and specialized agencies of the United Nations system, to present to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1993 an appropriate management process containing clear guidelines, targets, benchmarks and timeframes for the full implementation of the present resolution;

54. Further requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive sessions of 1993 and 1994 a progress report on the implementation of the present resolution, incorporating, inter alia, the reports mentioned in paragraph 51 above to be prepared by the funds, programmes and specialized agencies of the United Nations system;

55. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fiftieth session, through the Economic and Social Council, in the context of the triennial policy review, a comprehensive analysis of the implementation of the present resolution and to make appropriate recommendations.

Financing of operational activities

Expenditures

In an addendum to his report on the triennial comprehensive policy review of operational activities⁽⁶⁾ the Secretary-General provided detailed statistical data for 1991 on resources channelled through United Nations organizations. During 1991, expenditures by the United Nations system on operational activities totalled $8.4 billion. Of that amount, $4.3 billion was distributed in grants and $4.1 billion was disbursed in concessional loans by the International Development Association (IDA) ($4 billion) and IFAD ($115 million). Non-concessional loans, disbursed through the World Bank and the International Finance Corporation (IFC), had a negative balance of $4 billion in 1991. Grants to finance refugee, humanitarian, special economic and disaster relief activities amounted to $1.4 billion.

Of the total expenditures on grant-financed development activities, WFP accounted for approximately 31.2 per cent in 1991; UNDP and UNDP-administered funds, 28.9 per cent; specialized agencies, 15.5 per cent; UNICEF, 13.8 per cent; regular budgets, 6.7 per cent; and UNFPA, 4 per cent.

Regionally, approximately 47.6 per cent of the expenditures went to Africa; 39.4 per cent to Asia and the Pacific; 8.2 per cent to the Americas; 4 per cent to Western Asia; and 0.7 per cent to Europe.

Expenditures by sector were as follows: health, 24 per cent; humanitarian aid and relief, 23 per cent; agriculture, forestry and fisheries, 16 per cent; general development issues, policy and planning, 8 per cent; industry, 5 per cent; natural resources, population, and transport and communications, 4 per cent each; education, 3 per cent; employment, international trade and development finance, science and technology, and social conditions and equity, 2 per cent each; and culture and human settlements, 1 per cent each.

Contributions

Contributions from Governments and other sources for operational activities of the United Nations system, including IFAD and the World Bank group (World Bank, IDA and IFC), totalled $10 billion in 1991.⁽⁶⁾

In addition, contributions for refugees, humanitarian, special economic and disaster relief activities totalled $1.9 billion and for the Environment Fund of the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP), $61 million.

UN Pledging Conference for Development Activities

The 1992 United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities was held in New York on 3 and 4 November to receive government pledges for 1993 to United Nations funds and programmes concerned with development and related assistance.

In a September note⁽⁷⁾ to the General Assembly, the Secretary-General listed contributions pledged or paid as at 30 June 1992 to 22 United Nations funds and programmes at the 1991 pledging conference, totalling approximately $1,557 million, with $832 million designated for UNDP.

Technical cooperation through UNDP

In his annual report for 1992,⁽¹⁾ the UNDP Administrator noted that there was an emerging international consensus that development was aimed at improving the human condition rather than achieving growth per se, and that while economic growth was a necessary condition of human development, it could not take place at the cost of future generations.

Shifts in the development paradigm made for complex relationships between development and humanitarian assistance and for considerable institutional uncertainty, the Administrator said. UNDP was re-examining its mandate, focus, tools and modalities and was collaborating with its partners in the United Nations system in an attempt to make the system more effective. The mandate and functions of UNDP seemed certain to remain valid as a need would remain for a multisectoral, country-based organization supporting national, regional and global efforts for sustainable development with sufficient funding resources to ensure its coordination role as well as its credibility with recipient countries.

In 1992, estimated UNDP income was some $1,620 million, an increase from $1,222 million in 1991. Of the 1992 total, $1,178 million came from voluntary pledges, compared to $949 million in 1991. Other major sources included cost-sharing contributions by recipient Governments ($294 million), trust funds established by the Administrator, excluding the Global Environment Facility (GEF) ($51 million), GEF trust fund ($64 million), contributions to local office costs ($17 million) and government cash counterpart contributions ($11 million).

UNDP also administered eight funds which provided an additional $76.4 million during 1992, bringing total income to $1,696 million. The funds were the United Nations Capital Development Fund (UNCDF), the United Nations Revolving Fund for Natural Resources Exploration (UNRFRNRE), the United Nations Sudano-Sahelian Office (UNSO), the United Nations Volunteers (UNV), the United Nations Fund for Science and Technology for Development (UNFSTD), the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM), the UNDP Energy Account and the UNDP Study Programme.

At the November 1992 Pledging Conference, Austria and the United States announced increases in their contributions of 10 per cent and 16 per cent, respectively, surpassing the UNDP Governing Council target of 8 per cent per annum. Luxembourg increased its contribution by 25 per cent. Other major donors that made pledges were Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, the Netherlands, Norway, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom. Denmark and the Netherlands pledged contributions at levels higher than their 1992 contributions.

Of the recipient countries that made pledges, Benin, Bhutan, Botswana, Djibouti, Fiji, Guinea, India, Kenya, Lesotho, the Maldives, Mauritius, Mongolia, Nigeria, Panama, Romania, Thailand, the United Republic of Tanzania and Viet Nam surpassed the Council's growth target. Nine recipient countries pledged $1 million or more each: China, Cuba, India, Indonesia, Mexico, the Republic of Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sri Lanka and Thailand.

Field programme expenditures, including indicative planning figures (IPFs), Special Programme Resources (SPR), the Special Measures Fund for the Least Developed Countries, cost-sharing and government cash counterpart contributions were reported at $1,027 million in 1992. Of total field programme expenditures, 52 per cent went for project personnel, which included internationally and nationally recruited personnel and UNV specialists, 18 per cent for subcontracts, 15 per cent for project equipment, 11 per cent for training and 4 per cent for miscellaneous expenses such as maintenance and operational costs.

Regionally, Africa absorbed 33.4 per cent of field programme expenditures in 1992; Asia and the Pacific, 28.5 per cent; Latin America and the Caribbean, 22.9 per cent; the Arab States, 7.6 per cent; Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States, 1 per cent; and global and interregional projects, 6.6 per cent.

Project approvals during 1992 totalled 972, a decline from 1,129 the previous year. The value of new project approvals was about $642 million, compared to $690 million in 1991.

UNDP Governing Council

In 1992, the UNDP Governing Council held both its organizational meeting and a special session to discuss pending issues from 10 to 14 February 1992 in New York; it held its thirty-ninth session from 4 to 26 May at Geneva.⁽²⁾

At the organizational meeting, the Council adopted decisions on its schedule of meetings in 1992 and other organizational matters,⁽³⁾ rationalization of its work⁽⁴⁾ and its venue.⁽⁵⁾ At the special session, it adopted eight decisions. Those not dealt with in this chapter were on assistance to Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya, Somalia, the Sudan and Yemen; the UNDP Gulf Task Force; and special assistance to Samoa (see next chapter).

During its thirty-ninth session, the Council adopted 36 decisions. Those not dealt with in this chapter were on the human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS), environment and development, the private sector in development, the International Year for the World's Indigenous People, a New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, humanitarian programmes, assistance to the Palestinian people; UNFPA, and UNFPA financial, budgetary and administrative matters.

On 4 May,⁽⁶⁾ the Council approved the agenda and organization of work for its thirty-ninth session. On 26 May,⁽⁷⁾ it decided to review the venue of its sessions at its fortieth (1993) session and asked the UNDP Administrator to provide further information on attendance and the cost of holding sessions for both Geneva and New York. The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) was asked to report to the Council on the matter in 1993. Also on 26 May, the Council took note of a number of reports and documents;⁽⁸⁾ adopted a provisional agenda for its fortieth session;⁽⁹⁾ and agreed to the schedule of its future sessions and those of its subsidiary bodies.⁽¹⁰⁾

By decision 1992/301 of 31 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of an extract from the Governing Council's report on its 1992 meetings.⁽¹¹⁾

Standing Committee for Programme Matters. The Standing Committee for Programme Matters

held an in-session meeting during the special session of the Governing Council (10-14 February).⁽¹²⁾ The Committee recommended that the Council adopt draft decisions on SPR and on country, intercountry and global programmes.

On 26 May,⁽⁸⁾ the Council took note of the report of the Standing Committee on its 1992 in-session meeting.

The Standing Committee also held an in-session meeting during the thirty-ninth session of the Council (4-26 May),⁽¹³⁾ covering field visits, the social dimensions of adjustment, country and intercountry programmes and projects, UNFPA, evaluation and its future programme of work. The Committee recommended that the Council adopt draft decisions on country, intercountry and global programmes, country programming and mid-term reviews, programme approach, evaluation, assistance to Myanmar and the UNDP programme in the former Yugoslavia.

UNDP operational activities

Country and intercountry programmes

On 14 February,⁽¹⁴⁾ the UNDP Governing Council approved country programmes for nine countries: Chad, Colombia, Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Ecuador, Maldives, Peru, Senegal, Sri Lanka and Viet Nam. It also approved the country programme for Zambia on condition that an advance mid-term review would be held in 1993. It took note of the extension by one year of country programmes for Anguilla, Burundi, the Congo, Ghana, Pakistan and Rwanda.

On 26 May,⁽¹⁵⁾ the Council approved country programmes for 57 countries: 13 in Africa, 6 in Arab States, 3 in Europe, 12 in Asia and the Pacific and 23 in Latin America and the Caribbean. It also approved a five-year programme for Malawi, subject to a policy review after one year of the social and political environment. It took note of the extensions of 44 country programmes: 16 for Africa, 3 for Asia and the Pacific, 8 for the Arab States, 4 for Europe and 13 for Latin America and the Caribbean, and approved the extensions of the country programmes for Gabon, Iran and Turkey for a period of two years. It also took note of intercountry programmes in Africa, Asia and the Pacific, Europe, and Latin American and the Caribbean, and of the extension of the regional programme for Arab States. It authorized the UNDP Administrator to approve projects on a project-by-project basis for Afghanistan, Cambodia, Haiti, Kuwait, Lebanon, Liberia, Myanmar and the former Yugoslavia, as he had requested.

The Council further approved the global and interregional programmes for the fifth programming cycle (1992-1996). The global programmes included health and food research, food and natural resources research and health research. The interregional programmes covered social development and poverty alleviation, environment and natural resources and public-sector management. The Council approved eight global projects in health and environmentally sustainable food production totalling $62.7 million.

With regard to the country programme for Myanmar, the Administrator, in an April note,⁽¹⁶⁾ sought the Council's authorization to approve assistance on a project-by-project basis (see above). On 26 May,⁽¹⁷⁾ the Council asked the Administrator to review with Myanmar reallocations of fourth programming cycle (1987-1991) IPF resources and to approve personally higher priority projects likely to have greater impact at the grass-roots level. He was also asked to conduct a review of the fifth country programme for Myanmar, including an evaluation of the impact of all projects implemented under it, and to present a report to the Council in 1993 together with recommendations on programming for Myanmar under the fifth programming cycle. The Council deferred further action on Myanmar's sixth country programme until it had considered and accepted the review and recommendations requested.

As to the former Yugoslavia, the Council, also on 26 May,⁽¹⁸⁾ noted the Administrator's proposal to draw on the small balance of fourth-cycle programme resources carried forward solely for the preparation of urgent humanitarian projects on a case-by-case basis and authorized him to proceed.

Mid-term reviews. On 26 May,⁽¹⁹⁾ the Governing Council, reaffirming the need for the Administrator to carry out mid-term reviews of all country, regional, interregional and global programmes, welcomed the new format of country programme documents presented for its consideration. It asked the Administrator to include in mid-term review documents an analysis of levels of national execution; UNDP assistance in national capacity-building at the policy and programme formulation, management and evaluation levels; experience with the new support costs arrangements; and experience with the programme approach, including the use of alternative programme support mechanisms. He was asked to include in future country programme documents more consistent information on lessons learned from previous programming cycles and mid-term reviews and more comprehensive performance indicators. He was also asked to continue to increase the focus of country programmes on a smaller number of concentration areas according to recipient country needs.

The Administrator was invited to submit to the Council's 1993 special session a tentative timetable for mid-term reviews to be carried out in 1993-

1995, together with proposals on how he would report the outcomes of those reviews. He was asked to report to the Council's regular 1993 session on progress achieved in harmonizing programme cycles and programming procedures among members of the Joint Consultative Group on Policy (JCGP) and to increase his efforts to stagger the scheduling of country programmes throughout the programming cycle.

Country programmes by region

Africa

The management plan of the UNDP Regional Bureau for Africa for 1992 was aligned with the major objectives of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s (see next chapter), adopted by the General Assembly in 1991.⁽²⁰⁾ Under the National Long-Term Perspective Studies Programme, which aimed to create a national process for establishing long-term development strategies and priorities, plans were launched in 9 countries and a further 20 countries submitted requests for studies. The African Capacity-Building Foundation, a joint initiative of UNDP, the World Bank and the African Development Bank, sought to strengthen regional and national capacities to formulate and manage national economic policies and programmes and to support the internalization of long-term development planning.

During the year UNDP supported democratization and electoral processes in 22 African countries with advisory services, resource mobilization, logistical support and follow-up (observers), and development of social funds or social safety nets. Electoral support in Ethiopia, Mali and Namibia was successful, while in Angola, where UNDP coordinated some $5 million in cost-sharing support for the election, the results were not accepted by all parties and fighting resumed. In Ethiopia, UNDP assisted in demobilizing troops and reintegrating them into the private sector; an estimated 350,000 ex-servicemen benefited from donor contributions, including $7.87 million from UNDP.

UNDP provided emergency assistance to drought-affected countries in southern Africa and to 40,000 persons who were displaced by the political upheaval and resumed fighting in Liberia. In Mozambique, technical support was provided to national and provincial emergency commissions, and a large multi-donor programme to reintegrate displaced persons and returning refugees was supported.

Under GEF, seven UNDP-sponsored projects, amounting to $18 million, were approved. A range of innovative projects were being implemented, including a project in Mauritania to establish infrastructure to deliver wind-based rural electric power. In a semi-arid zone of Burkina Faso, a pilot project to demonstrate how biodiversity could be conserved within wildlife ranching systems was designed in collaboration with village associations and local and international non-governmental organizations (NGOs).

UNDP assisted Governments to formulate economic management and capacity-building programmes, four of which were inaugurated, in Burkina Faso, Cote d'Ivoire, the Gambia and Zambia. Furthest advanced was the programme to develop national economic management capacity in the Gambia.

With respect to HIV/AIDS, UNDP played an advocacy role through the country programmes, including the sensitization of African policy makers and community organizations to the implications—human, social and developmental—of the pandemic. Some 30 projects, ranging from support for multisectoral national programmes to survivor assistance, were developed.

Asia and the Pacific

Use of the programme approach gained momentum in Asia and the Pacific. UNDP assisted national authorities to develop national programme frameworks, a prelude to programme formulation. In China, eight programmes in agriculture, forestry, industry and natural resources development were approved. In India, jute and leather programmes became operational. In Thailand, a subprogramme on human resources development focused on increasing the relevance of and access to education.

UNDP assistance was increasingly sought to translate the principles of human development into national development strategies. For example, following a one-year UNDP-assisted study, Bangladesh published a human development report and undertook to integrate its concerns into a five-year plan. In Pakistan, a human development initiative led to a report that was distributed to government officials, the private sector, NGOs and foreign missions and influenced a $700,000 human development project. In the Philippines, UNDP helped to organize a network of human development advocates among academicians, practitioners and professionals in both the public and private sectors to promote the concept and prepare a national human development report.

In the area of aid coordination, round-table meetings were organized for Bhutan and the Lao People's Democratic Republic. The shortfall in resources for Bhutan's sixth five-year plan was estimated at $370 million, and donors expressed willingness to support that country's development schemes. Priority projects in the Lao People's Democratic Republic were estimated to cost $745 million, against which donors pledged some $600 million in concessional loans and grants.

In north-eastern Asia, the Tumen River Area Development Programme was a comprehensive approach by China, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Mongolia, the Republic of Korea and the Russian Federation to develop resources in their border areas. UNDP provided assistance not only in articulating common interests and objectives, but in facilitating contacts with and coordinating the inputs of donors and investors.

UNDP co-chaired a Ministerial Conference on the Rehabilitation and Reconstruction of Cambodia (Tokyo, June), which resulted in donor pledges of $880 million and which constituted the International Committee on Reconstruction of Cambodia, with UNDP as its secretariat.

In Afghanistan, UNDP initiated a rehabilitation strategy exercise to identify immediate and medium-term needs and draw up a rehabilitation and reconstruction programme.

JCGP introduced coordination mechanisms and undertook joint actions in many countries of the region. In China, UNDP organized a United Nations Inter-Agency Working Group on Poverty Issues with 11 agencies participating. In the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, a rural health plan was formulated by JCGP and WHO. In Indonesia, United Nations specialized agencies formed an Inter-Agency Coordination Committee.

Through a regional project, 14 country-level and a number of intercountry workshops and seminars were initiated on HIV/AIDS. The regional project also co-sponsored the Second International Congress on AIDS in Asia and the Pacific (New Delhi, India, November).

IPF resources for the fifth cycle for the region (1992-1996) amounted to $1.5 billion; cost-sharing contributions by recipient countries and third parties were expected to provide another $200 million. Some 200 new projects and programmes were approved, with the total IPF and cost-sharing funds committed amounting to about $140 million. Total programme expenditure for the region in 1992 was estimated at $260 million.

More than 105 nationally executed projects valued at $84 million were approved. China and India were the leading countries in national execution: in China, 52 per cent of the projects approved were nationally executed; in India, 33 per cent. Training of government staff in the operational and financial management of projects continued.

UNDP emphasized sustainable development and environmental issues in its country and intercountry programmes. A regional sustainable development project was initiated with an IPF commitment of $837,000. Work also commenced on nine national and two subregional Sustainable Development Networks (SDNs) to facilitate information exchange in support of environmentally sound national development activities. SDNs became operational in Pakistan, the Philippines and the South Pacific. The regional GEF portfolio, managed by UNDP, helped to meet obligations under the conventions on climate change and biodiversity (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII), and included a large-scale ($9.5 million) project on developing a least-cost greenhouse gas emission plan in Asia. Projects on ozone-layer depletion worth $2.9 million were programmed and implemented in five countries.

Arab States

In 1992, many Arab countries moved to rehabilitate their economies after the Gulf war of 1991, to accelerate a trend towards civil reform and more open market economies, and to introduce greater pluralism in their societies.

In Egypt and Lebanon, UNDP coordinated with the Governments and the World Bank to assess technical cooperation requirements. In Algeria, UNDP assisted the Government to review its investment policy and identify areas where legal restrictions could be reduced. In Tunisia, UNDP helped to design an anti-poverty strategy for about 100,000 families, and, with the World Bank, assisted the Government to restructure the industrial sector for privatization. UNDP assistance in Egypt focused on building its capacity for national economic reform and structural adjustment, and in Jordan was aimed at development planning and data and policy analysis.

Emergency assistance was provided to Somalia and the Sudan. In Somalia, which faced a combination of collapse of civil society, political and military disorder and extreme famine, UNDP established itself at Mogadishu and Hargeisa and provided staffing and logistical support to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General. Other UNDP activities included managing and providing air transport for the United Nations and NGOs; rehabilitating the water-supply system in Mogadishu; financing missions to identify the needs of the displaced in the agricultural sector; and participating in civil aviation and de-mining projects.

In the Sudan, the Resident Representative served as Special Representative of the Secretary-General for relief operations. He was supported by an emergency coordination unit funded and managed by UNDP.

While development programmes remained suspended in Iraq, a number of activities were approved and implemented with the concurrence of the Security Council's Sanctions Committee (see PART TWO, Chapter III). Under a regional project for the eradication of rinderpest, $400,000 was allocated for vaccination campaigns in the northern part of the country; assistance was provided to a rehabilitation project for the handicapped; and logistical and administrative support was given to United Nations humanitarian activities.

In Kuwait, UNDP assisted in planning and civil service reform, with emphasis on greater use of Kuwaiti indigenous skills and the private sector. In Saudi Arabia, UNDP helped to train 2,700 Saudis in the civil aviation sector and assisted in establishing two telecommunications institutes. In Qatar, UNDP assisted in a study of how to replenish the aquifer. In the United Arab Emirates, it helped to establish a Central Forecasting Office for Meteorological Services.

Resident representatives in the region agreed to decentralize programme activities and to strengthen field offices; to draw up subregional strategies for clusters of countries; to emphasize resource mobilization and coordination efforts; and to increase the promotion of networking and regional linkages.

Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States

Six field offices were in operation in Europe and the Russian Federation by the end of 1992. Four were headed by a United Nations Representative, who was also the UNDP Resident Representative, and the other two by field staff from a United Nations Information Centre, supported by a Deputy United Nations Representative, who was also the UNDP Resident Representative.

Institutions implementing national privatization strategies benefited from expert advice provided through a UNDP regional privatization network. In Romania, UNDP assisted the Government to build up the capacity for privatization through a UNDP-funded centre to counsel small-scale entrepreneurs during the start-up phase of their businesses.

A regional programme based on providing turn-around teams of corporate leaders from countries outside the region was prepared. The teams would be on call for visits over a two-year period to resolve senior management problems.

Albania requested a UNDP team to assist with electoral procedures and to organize the participation of other international organizations and international observers. UNDP cooperated with the European Community (EC) in preparing studies for a meeting between EC and Albania to determine support for restructuring the Albanian economy. EC channelled $1 million in humanitarian assistance to Albania through UNDP.

There was also close cooperation with EC on the environment, particularly with regard to activities in the Danube River basin and the Black Sea area. Two projects funded by GEF were developed by UNDP: environmental management of the Danube basin to enhance institutional capabilities in riparian countries of the Danube, and environmental protection of the Black Sea to enable riparian countries of the Black Sea and the Sea of Azov to develop a comprehensive management strategy.

Latin America and the Caribbean

In Latin America and the Caribbean, UNDP began to participate with other institutions such as the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) in promoting democracy. The advancement of governance was being achieved through public-sector reform and decentralization efforts as well as by fostering private-sector support of human development. Efforts to reduce poverty were basic to governance and social peace, and numerous programmes were addressed to the plight of the poor. Social emergency funds in Bolivia and Central America, established under agreements with the World Bank and IDB, continued to operate. Chile put in place a UNDP-supported development facility in each of its 12 regions, which had an important poverty-alleviation component. A UNDP initiative in Peru helped to establish a fund to provide financial support to communities for employment generation and basic infrastructure.

The importance of external resource flows was increasingly recognized and a new slant was given to the national technical cooperation assessment and programmes (NATCAPs) exercise when Guatemala decided to use UNDP aid coordination to promote a national peace plan. UNDP cooperation was sought by several countries to improve their competitiveness in international markets. Brazil implemented a $28 million cost-shared project for the coordination of research and the promotion of informatics exports. Chile implemented a cost-shared project to integrate the research capacity in Government, the private sector and universities.

In the environmental sector, two new GEF projects were approved and a third IPF project for Brazil was revised, producing additional IPF and cost-sharing funds for strengthening the capacity of Governments for environmental management. One GEF project supported the Peruvian Centre for Energy Conservation, and the other would demonstrate the commercial feasibility of using biomass as a feedstock for power generation in Brazil through applying biomass-integrated gasification/gas-turbine technology.

Global and interregional programmes

The UNDP global programme supported high-level research on food production and health, and the interregional programme promoted sharing of knowledge on such questions as management, debt, trade, energy, water and sanitation, HIV and development, and electoral administration.

The United Nations received 31 requests for electoral assistance, two thirds of which were for first-time elections in Africa, between October 1991 and September 1992. UNDP prepared the publication Guidelines on Special Arrangements for Electoral Assistance. In addition, it established an electoral assistance trust fund, advanced the funding for seven urgent needs-assessment missions, co-funded the first conference on the coordination of international assistance in the electoral field and funded a training course for United Nations officials.

UNDP and the International Monetary Fund Institute initiated a programme to train middle-level managers in the basic skills to deal with the transition from centrally planned to market economies. The programme attracted support from Japan, Portugal and EC. The Division for Global and Interregional Programmes was instrumental in launching a new programme to strengthen the capacity of developing countries to manage their external assets and liabilities. The programme had a number of innovative features, including the fact that for the first time two major providers of technical cooperation—the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) and the World Bank—agreed to pool their assistance. In addition, the programme nurtured initiatives at the subregional level, including an effort by anglophone countries of East and southern Africa to create their own pool of advisory services which would be attached to the Reserve Bank of Zimbabwe. Other subregional initiatives were being formulated for Central America, Eastern Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States.

At the beginning of 1992, UNDP established an HIV and Development Programme to increase global awareness of the threat that the pandemic posed to development. The programme involved communities, academic institutions, NGOs, Governments and the United Nations system. In cooperation with the library of Columbia University School of Public Health (New York), the programme initiated the HIVDEV database. A memorandum of understanding for implementing the WHO/UNDP Alliance to Combat AIDS was agreed upon, with a pledge to develop multisectoral approaches.

A UNDP/World Bank programme established a new strategy with regard to water and sanitation to build support for sustainable investments and disseminate lessons learned. For example, in Kumasi, Ghana's second-largest city, people were asked how much, if anything, they would pay for sanitation facilities. A new sanitation plan, based on demand-driven, privately provided services, was developed. The approach was to be tested in other countries of the developing world.

Other areas addressed in the UNDP global and interregional programmes included the environment, privatization, urban management, education and assistance to the Palestinian people.

Programme planning and management

Since the General Assembly adopted a resolution in 1989 on operational activities,⁽²¹⁾ there had been considerable discussion of the terms "programme approach" and "programme-oriented mechanism". However, no clear definitions of those terms were available. UNDP had attempted to arrive at an understanding of them, and in March 1992,⁽²²⁾ the UNDP Administrator submitted a report to the Governing Council stressing that the programme referred to was a national programme, not a UNDP programme or that of any other outside partner. The approach was the way in which national authorities attempted to achieve a national objective, not through discrete or ad hoc projects, but through a carefully thought-out, articulated programme. The programme contained all the elements needed to reach and sustain the national objective. External cooperation supported national programmes. Within the programme approach, the advantages of UNDP, stemming from the political and sectoral neutrality and universality of its mandate, appeared to lie in areas such as policy and programme formulation and management.

The programme support mechanism in principle ensured that externally provided resources were available where they were most needed, rather than being confined to a particular component of a programme.

Guidelines would be issued in due course for cooperation in formulating and managing national programmes; for the programme support mechanism; for a revised project document format; and for revised monitoring and evaluation procedures. The Administrator suggested a number of ways in which a country could start to follow the programme approach in the areas of identifying national objectives, formulating a national programme and implementing and managing it.

On 26 May,⁽²³⁾ the Governing Council stressed that the programme approach should be applied on a country-specific basis and that UNDP should ensure the smooth implementation of country programmes. It encouraged UNDP to continue formulating principles for the programme approach. It further stressed the need to develop baseline data and success indicators for monitoring and evaluating UNDP-assisted projects/programmes and the need to involve United Nations specialized agencies at the early stages of the design of programme assistance. The Administrator was asked to hold consultations on the draft guiding principles and to submit a progress report in 1993.

National execution

The Administrator, in response to a 1991 request of the Governing Council,⁽²⁴⁾ in April 1992 submitted a report on national execution⁽²⁵⁾ containing guidelines on assisting Governments to formulate and implement national capacity-building strategies, on the respective roles of UNDP, agencies and Governments in national execution and implementation and on use for national execution of the technical support resources agreed upon by the Council in 1991.⁽²⁶⁾

The overall UNDP strategy for capacity-building would provide a unifying framework for UNDP mechanisms such as the round-table process, the Management Development Programme (MDP) and NATCAPs. UNDP recognized the need for developing countries to develop their own long-term perspectives. In addition, it recognized a distinction between institution-building and capacity-building. Capacity-building need not be confined to one institution but may refer to the strengthening of national capacities across sectors such as policy formulation, scientific research, information technology and financial management.

The strategic entry points at which UNDP would interface with national systems would increasingly be the following: dialogue on overall goals and policies, sectoral strategies and programmes; assistance to Governments to strengthen their ability to define and prepare national programmes; and integration of global priorities and initiatives. The role and responsibilities of Government, United Nations specialized agencies, UNDP, UNDP field offices and the Office for Project Services (OPS) in the capacity-building process were also discussed. Guidelines specifying the roles of the various partners in the national execution process would be updated after a period of testing in the field and then incorporated into the UNDP Programmes and Projects Manual.

On 26 May,⁽²⁷⁾ the Governing Council noted the definitions in the Administrator's report and clarified the following: execution was defined as the overall management, by national government authorities or by a United Nations agency, of the programme/project, along with responsibility for outputs, achievement of objectives and use of resources; implementation was defined as the procurement and delivery of programme/project inputs and their conversion into outputs; administrative and operational support services were defined as the procurement and delivery of UNDP-financed programme/project inputs and thus constituted only an aspect of implementation.

With regard to execution and implementation, the Council agreed that national government authorities responsible for programme/project execution needed to have the necessary national management staff, and that the cost of managing nationally executed programmes/projects should be borne by the Government; UNDP assistance in the building of sustainable capacity for national execution could be financed from country IPF resources or SPR; UNDP field office staff might provide administrative assistance to executing agents as long as that did not interfere with their primary tasks; and the involvement of OPS in national execution should be limited to providing non-technical implementation services and to building up national managerial and administrative capacities.

The Council endorsed the Administrator's approval to delegate to resident representatives the authority for approving national execution and urged the Administrator to improve the financial accounting, reporting and auditing of nationally executed projects.

Programme evaluation

In March 1992,⁽²⁸⁾ the Administrator submitted to the Governing Council the ninth annual report on programme evaluation. The report covered the principal evaluation issues that had emerged during 1991 and reviewed the work of the Central Evaluation Office over the fourth programming cycle (1987-1991). The report also considered the evolving role of evaluation in UNDP during the last five years; discussed the feedback of evaluation results into UNDP's work; recorded what had been done to promote national monitoring and evaluation systems; gave an account of other evaluation work; and discussed collaboration with other institutions. It also presented a work plan for evaluation activities for 1992-1993.

On 26 May,⁽²⁹⁾ the Council welcomed the change in approach in evaluation activities towards more impact- and result-oriented assessments as well as towards increased strategy- and policy-oriented evaluation of UNDP activities during the fifth programming cycle (1992-1996). It urged the Administrator to strengthen the capacity of the Central Evaluation Office to undertake policy, strategy and programme evaluations in line with the findings and recommendations of a planning exercise and workload study and to backstop the evaluation capacity of the Regional Bureaux, keeping in mind the necessity to involve the recipient Governments in evaluation activities. It requested the Administrator to expand measures to ensure genuine feedback and use of results attained through evaluations and assessments to the programming activities of UNDP and the Governments concerned.

Field visits

The Governing Council, in 1991, had provided for up to four field visits per year by members of its Standing Committee for Programme Matters.

Each mission was to cover not more than two countries; costs would be shared by UNDP (80 per cent) and UNFPA (20 per cent).

At its February in-session meeting,⁽¹²⁾ the Standing Committee, on the basis of experience gained through the first three visits (January 1992) to a total of six countries (Botswana/United Republic of Tanzania, Indonesia/Sri Lanka and Egypt/Morocco), prepared standard terms of reference to facilitate future visits. The terms were used in preparing forthcoming field visits. The report on the visit to Bhutan/India (March) was considered at the Standing Committee's May in-session meeting.⁽¹³⁾ Further visits to the Syrian Arab Republic/Yemen and Bolivia/Paraguay took place in August/September 1992.⁽³⁰⁾

Fourth and fifth programming cycles

On 14 February,⁽³¹⁾ the Governing Council took note of an oral presentation by the Administrator on the resource outlook for the fifth programming cycle (1992-1996). It requested him to prepare a detailed analysis of the resource outlook and its impact on IPFs, and decided to consider those questions at its thirty-ninth (1992) session.

In response to that request, the Administrator in April submitted a report on matters relating to the fourth (1987-1991) and fifth programming cycles.⁽³²⁾ The report examined the resource outlook for the fifth cycle and discussed new and revised IPFs for it. The Administrator noted that the fifth cycle unallocated account of $100 million could not accommodate all the estimated additional requirements of $117.5 million. The addition by the General Assembly in 1991⁽³³⁾ of five countries to the list of least developed countries (LDCs) and the emergence of new republics from the former USSR that would probably request recipient status was likely to have an impact on fifth cycle resources. However, since the additional resources needed over and above the $100 million were likely to be small, the Administrator proposed postponing any adjustments to IPFs and SPR until the mid-term (1994) review had been carried out.

The report also provided information on the status of fourth cycle net contributor obligations.

On 26 May,⁽³⁴⁾ the Council decided that IPFs for future programming cycles should be established as of the first day of each cycle. It further decided that country IPF revisions and IPFs for new recipients should be allocated in proportion to the number of years remaining in each cycle. The Council authorized the Administrator to continue to issue allocations for the fifth cycle within the overall planning framework established by the Council in 1990,⁽³⁵⁾ and urged Governments to increase their contributions to UNDP in line with the planning assumptions contained in that framework. The Administrator was asked to inform the Council in 1993 of the complete list of IPFs for the fifth cycle.

Also on 26 May,⁽³⁶⁾ the Council requested the Administrator, in the context of a 1991 Council decision,⁽³⁷⁾ on an exceptional one-time basis and where he decided it was warranted, to extend until 31 December 1992 the period for finalizing accounts for fourth cycle obligations and payments for the purpose of calculating fifth cycle entitlements.

New recipient countries

On 14 February,⁽³⁸⁾ the Governing Council welcomed the Republics of Belarus, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania and Ukraine as recipient countries in UNDP. It approved the allocation of IPFs and asked the Administrator to inform it in 1993 of any revised basic data and its effect on the computation of IPFs. He was also authorized to proceed with programme development in the five countries, taking into account the need for impact sustainability, effective use of resources and other development activities being undertaken there. The Council requested the Administrator to submit a report to its 1993 regular session with proposals on ways to establish a United Nations presence in those countries, with particular regard to cost-effectiveness. In preparing the report, he was asked to consult with members of ACC and JCGP.

In response to that request, the Administrator in April submitted a report⁽³⁹⁾ in which he noted that, in addition to the five countries for which the Council had established IPFs in February, requests for recipient status had been received from a further seven countries of the former USSR. He had therefore broadened the parameters within which he was responding to the Council's February decision.

The Administrator recommended that the basic UNDP structure in the region should consist of one international senior staff member per country, with the minimum office logistical support required and access to a wide-area communications network. UNDP's role dictated a set-up that would meet the following characteristics: the host country would share in the cost of nationally recruited professionals in support of the international senior officer, with possible support from other sources; and, while heads of offices would primarily serve their country of accreditation, they might also advise other offices in the region in such areas as electoral processes, social and economic dimensions of transition, information management, support to entrepreneurship, aid flow management and the role of local government.

The Administrator gave a breakdown of estimated start-up and recurrent costs to UNDP through December 1993 per country and, applying those costs to the five countries given recipient status in February, noted that the total cost over 18 months would be $2.75 million. Assuming that the 10 remaining countries would acquire recipient status, the total net cost through 1993 for all 15 countries would be $8.25 million. He therefore recommended that that amount be provided from the UNDP administrative budget and proposed to offset a large part of it with any income received through special contributions.

On 26 May,⁽⁴⁰⁾ the Council, welcoming Armenia, Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Republic of Moldova, the Russian Federation, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan as recipient countries in UNDP, approved the allocation of IPFs and asked the Administrator to inform it in 1993 of any revised basic data and its effect on the computation of IPFs. It authorized the Administrator to proceed with programme development in the eight countries, taking into account other development activities being undertaken there.

Also on 26 May,⁽⁴¹⁾ the Council noted the Administrator's intention to submit country programmes for the 13 new recipient countries in 1993. It asked him to work with those countries, other interested Governments and relevant bodies to ensure that UNDP's work in the region was focused on areas where it had a comparative advantage and to continue efforts to clarify the country-specific role and comparative advantages of UNSO in the countries concerned. He was also asked to work with the United Nations Secretariat and other United Nations bodies, particularly ACC and JCGP, to ensure an integrated United Nations system presence in those countries.

The Administrator was further asked to provide those countries with operational support during 1992-1993 and was authorized to open temporary and/or regional UNDP offices. In that regard, he was asked to give priority to countries with the lowest relative levels of per capita GNP and the highest levels of IPF and aggregate programme resources, and to follow an innovative and cost-effective approach when opening offices and/or providing operational support.

The Council approved, on an exceptional basis, the use during 1992-1993 of up to $3 million from savings in the original appropriation for the 1992-1993 core budget to enable the Administrator to open the temporary offices, and urged him to negotiate cost-sharing arrangements with host countries with the aim of covering expenses incurred in local currency. The Administrator was encouraged to seek to complement the country IPFs through other programmable resources. The Council decided to review action taken by the Administrator at its 1993 special session.

Financing

In his annual review of the financial situation,⁽⁴²⁾ the Administrator reported that total income in 1992 was $1.5 billion, while expenditures totalled $1.4 billion, with a resulting surplus of $100 million. As a result of the surplus, the balance of UNDP general resources increased from $152.9 million at 31 December 1991 to $220.6 million at 31 December 1992. Income from voluntary contributions totalled $1.2 billion. Miscellaneous income, mainly composed of income from UNDP placements of funds in short-term financial instruments and adjustments resulting from exchange rate changes, decreased from $13.1 million in 1991 to $0.5 million in 1992, reflecting lower interest rates on investments and substantial foreign exchange losses at a time of high foreign exchange rate volatility and the significant devaluation of a number of currencies of donor countries.

Cost-sharing contributions grew from $218.8 million to almost $300 million, and were expected to continue to increase. While that source of funding enabled a larger total programme expenditure in selected countries, it did not make up for shortfalls in voluntary contributions necessary for financing IPFs.

IPF expenditures declined from $867 million in 1991 to $727 million in 1992. Expenditures under the Special Measures Fund for LDCs decreased from $13 million in 1991 to $6.5 million in 1992. Expenditures under cost-sharing contributions increased from $195.9 million in 1991 to $225.2 million in 1992 and under SPR from $43 million in 1991 to $50.6 million in 1992.

The Administrator reiterated that it had become evident that the target for annual increases in contributions of 8 per cent was unlikely to be achieved. He had been obliged to assume an annual rate of growth in resources of 4 per cent; to instruct UNDP field offices to provide for a programme reserve of 10 per cent of IPFs in the country programmes; and to establish annual expenditure targets for 1992 and 1993 of $780 million and $760 million, respectively. There were also indications that contributions for 1993 would amount to only $930 million, a reduction of 13.5 per cent from 1992.

On 26 May,⁽⁴³⁾ the Governing Council took note of the Administrator's annual review of the financial situation for 1991⁽⁴⁴⁾ and of the Council's decision⁽⁴⁵⁾ on the fourth and fifth programming cycles (see above). It noted with concern the impact of exchange rate fluctuations on the dollar value of contributions in 1991 and on the level of resources anticipated by the Administrator in 1992 and 1993 and that real growth in contributions had not reached the level projected by the Council in 1990.⁽⁴⁶⁾ It further noted the reduction in the Administrator's expenditure forecasts resulting from the level of anticipated resources.

The Council approved the format of the ex post facto report on support costs contained in the Administrator's 1991 review of the financial situation and asked him to submit such a report on a biennial basis, starting in 1994. It also approved changes to the financial regulations proposed in the same document and annexed them to its decision. It deferred consideration of a request for additional support cost reimbursement from the World Meteorological Organization, and urged member organizations of JCGP to pursue the possibility of using common premises.

Budgets

Revised 1992-1993 budget

In March,⁽⁴⁵⁾ the Administrator submitted to the Governing Council revised budget estimates for 1992-1993. The revised estimates for UNDP core activities amounted to $478 million gross and $446 million net. In net terms, that represented a decrease of $4 million (0.9 per cent) in relation to the original appropriation approved in 1991.⁽⁴⁶⁾ The revised estimates for UNDP core and non-core activities as a whole amounted to $607 million gross and $575 million net. With regard specifically to non-core activities, that represented in gross terms a reduction of $0.4 million.

Cost adjustments relating to the core budget amounted to a total reduction of $4.7 million. A currency release of $6.3 million and a downward inflation adjustment of $1.5 million were partially offset by cost adjustments amounting to $3 million. The currency release related to the impact of the difference in exchange rates between February 1991, when the original 1992-1993 estimates were formulated, and February 1992, the basis for the revised estimates.

The downward adjustment in inflation rates reflected adjustments in United Nations projections for both Headquarters and the field. Cost adjustments related to the following staff cost categories: home leave ($0.6 million); security ($0.8 million); pension contributions ($1.4 million); and medical insurance ($0.7 million). That was partially offset by a reduction in the education grant of $0.5 million.

ACABQ presented its observations on the revised budget estimates for 1992-1993 to the Council in an April report.⁽⁴⁷⁾

On 26 May,⁽⁴⁸⁾ the Council approved the cost adjustments reflected in the revised 1992-1993 biennial budget estimates. It also approved the continuation of one core post (at the P-5 level) for the Humanitarian Programme until the end of the 1992-1993 biennium and decided to apply the same procedure to an existing D-2 post in that Programme. It decided, in that context, to review the staffing level of the Programme, stressing the need for a clear division of responsibility between the United Nations Department for Humanitarian Affairs and the UNDP Humanitarian Programme.

In his March report on revised budget estimates for the 1992-1993 biennium,⁽⁴⁵⁾ the Administrator also presented his budget strategy for 1994-1995. His strategy was based on two goals: further administrative cost reduction and increased transparency regarding the nature of services rendered by UNDP field offices to non-UNDP-financed programmes and their costs.

On 26 May,⁽⁴⁸⁾ the Council welcomed the Administrator's 1994-1995 budget strategy, including a proposed volume reduction of $30 million to $40 million and, in order to give priority to the allocation of resources for programming and to protect fully the integrity of UNDP, urged the Administrator to achieve the maximum possible savings. In that regard, the Council requested the Administrator to take into account the need to ensure that regional service centres did not introduce a new bureaucratic layer or duplicate headquarters functions and the need to reduce significantly the ratio of General Service to Professional staff.

The Council requested the Administrator, in the context of the 1994-1995 budget strategy, to report to it in 1993. The report should include an analysis of the UNDP field structure, taking the following elements into consideration: the levels of IPFs and extrabudgetary resources, the impact of the composition of resources on the field structure and the impact of different options for decentralization of OPS. It requested the Administrator to make recommendations regarding the possibility of a more flexible and cost-effective approach to the UNDP field presence, including the option of closing field offices and making use of regional offices.

Further, the Council stressed the importance of common system-wide approaches on personnel entitlement issues and on job-classification issues and decided that proposals by the Administrator on reclassification should have no adverse financial implications and should not lead to grade creep. It approved his proposals on a pilot basis for one year, and decided to review the arrangement in 1993. It also endorsed the Administrator's proposals relating to increased transparency of the nature of the services rendered by UNDP field offices to non-UNDP-financed programmes and the associated costs, approved in principle his proposals relating to OPS and requested him to review the question of savings through mergers of the administrative and other functions of the trust funds. The Administrator was asked to report on those matters in 1993, taking into account also the review of the senior management structure to be submitted in 1993 (see below).

Audit reports

The Governing Council considered the interim audit report of the Board of Auditors on UNDP for the first year of the biennium 1990-1991⁽⁴⁹⁾ as well as the comments of ACABQ thereon.⁽⁵⁰⁾ It also reviewed the audited financial statements of the executing agencies for the year ended 31 December 1990, the reports of the external auditors and comments of the Administrator on the audit reports of the executing agencies,⁽⁵¹⁾ and the report of the Administrator on the interim report of UNDP itself.⁽⁵²⁾

On 26 May,⁽⁵³⁾ the Council noted that the Administrator had taken and was taking action to correct the situations identified by the auditors, and urged him to conclude all standard basic executing agency agreements by 31 December 1992. The Council also noted the comments of ACC regarding the views of the Board of Auditors on agency accountability, and requested the Board to pursue the issue of submission of complete audit information to the Board by the external auditors of the agencies. It requested the Administrator to intensify efforts to achieve full implementation of the recommendations of the Board of Auditors on OPS and to report to the Council thereon in 1993. He was urged to work with other United Nations organizations and specialized agencies to achieve common accounting principles and standards.

Status of management services

In March,⁽⁵⁴⁾ the Administrator submitted to the Governing Council his biennial report, covering 1990 and 1991, on the status of management services provided to Governments by UNDP. He noted that the use of management services continued to grow, though at a slower pace, with no significant new trends emerging since his 1990 report.⁽⁵⁵⁾ Development bank borrowers and bilateral aid recipients engaged UNDP in 59 new agreements during the period, bringing the total value of active management services projects at OPS to $305 million by the end of 1991. The Administrator stated that, by providing management services, UNDP assisted Governments in utilizing development funds and in mobilizing greater resources; such services also strengthened UNDP's role in coordinating aid at the country level.

On 26 May,⁽⁵⁶⁾ the Council concluded that the principles and guidelines in regard to management services enumerated in a 1983 Council decision⁽⁵⁷⁾ remained valid; that management services constituted a flexible mechanism for increasing the capacity of recipient countries to absorb external assistance; and that the use of management services enhanced the aid coordination role of UNDP at the field level.

The Council requested the Administrator to continue to observe the 1983 principles and guidelines; to bear in mind that management services should be viewed as assistance to developing countries in response to their specific needs; to ensure, with respect to bilaterally funded Management Service Agreements, fuller use of rules for international competitive bidding; and to ensure that the appropriate UNDP contract review process was followed, including the so-called double check mechanism. It authorized the Administrator in the coming years to respond to requests for management services in relation to programmes funded by sources other than UNDP. The Council recommended that in the future information on the status of management services be submitted as part of the annual financial report and as part of the OPS annual report, to be reviewed triennially by the Council.

Financial regulations

In January,⁽⁵⁸⁾ the Administrator submitted a report on proposed financial regulation 4.6, which defined the term "readily usable" with regard to the currency of voluntary contributions, and other matters on which consensus had not been reached. The report provided the Governing Council with the texts of those items for its consideration.

On 26 May,⁽⁵⁹⁾ the Governing Council took note of the report of the Administrator and decided that its Budgetary and Finance Committee would consider, at the Council's 1993 regular session, the proposed financial regulation and the other matters on which consensus had not been reached.

UNDP-administered funds

During 1992, 11 new trust funds were established by the Administrator on behalf of UNDP.⁽⁶⁰⁾ They were the Family Health International Trust Fund, Rehabilitation Assistance to Anhui Province (China) following Flood Disaster, Trust Fund for the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional Relocation Points in El Salvador, UNDP Trust Fund for Humanitarian and Rehabilitation Assistance for Cambodia, International Development Research Centre Trust Fund for Information Management Training Series, UNDP Trust Fund for Technical Assistance to Electoral Processes, Trust Fund to Mainstream Human Development into Operational Activities, UNDP Trust Fund for the Baltic Republics, Trust Fund for the Inter-Parliamentary Union, UNDP Trust Fund for the Mozambique Demobilization Programme and the Capacity 21 Trust Fund. Contributions received for those funds during the year totalled $30.6 million. Three sub-trust funds were established under the Trust Fund for Humanitarian and Rehabilitation Assistance for Cambodia. They were the UNDP/Sweden Trust Fund for the Rehabilitation of Infrastructure in Cambodia, the UNDP/United States Trust Fund for Cambodia and the UNDP/Netherlands Trust Fund for Cambodia. Contributions to those funds during 1992 totalled $7.1 million.

Sixteen sub-trust fund arrangements were established on behalf of UNCDF (2) and UNV (14). The value of those arrangements was approximately $15.5 million.

During 1992, contributions to the 75 trust funds and sub-trust funds in operation totalled $118.3 million, while expenditures amounted to $42.7 million.⁽⁶¹⁾

Special Programme Resources

SPR represented resources set aside by the Governing Council to finance specified types of programme activities during each programming cycle. In 1991,⁽⁶²⁾ the Council increased the SPR allocation from $189.5 million in the fourth cycle to $313 million in the fifth.

Total SPR expenditures during 1992⁽⁴²⁾ amounted to $83.2 million, of which $32.6 million was charged against cost-sharing contributions, resulting in a net expenditure of $50.6 million.

In accordance with a 1991 Council decision,⁽⁶³⁾ the UNDP Administrator submitted a report to the Council's special session⁽⁶⁴⁾ containing the programming documents for the 26 subcategories of SPR, which were grouped under six major clusters: disaster mitigation; thematic activities; other special and/or new activities; aid coordination; programme development; and assistance to the Palestinian people.

On 14 February,⁽⁶⁵⁾ the Council approved the programming documents for allocating SPR on the understanding that comments by delegations would be taken into consideration for action during programme design and that the subcategory on social dimensions of adjustment would be redesigned and resubmitted to the Council.

Support cost successor arrangements

In response to a 1991 Governing Council decision,⁽²⁶⁾ by which it established a new system of reimbursing specialized agencies for support services provided to UNDP-financed programmes and projects, the Administrator in April 1992 submitted his first annual progress report on the new support cost successor arrangements system.⁽⁶⁶⁾ He stated that, since the new arrangements had gone into effect only as of 1 January 1992, his report covered preparatory actions taken since June 1991 to implement the system and other issues on which the Council's guidance was requested. He noted that UNDP, in consultation with specialized agencies, had developed a set of operational guidelines for implementation of the new system. Those guidelines were issued in January and had gone into effect. They would be field-tested for one year and would then be updated and amended as necessary. The report also discussed the policy framework for execution and implementation; status of financial provisions; the results of a 1991 cost study;⁽⁶²⁾ technical support services at the programme level (TSS-I); issues relating to agencies not subject to the new regime; application to trust funds and other funds under the Administrator; currency fluctuations; flexibility arrangements; and monitoring and evaluation. An addendum to the report listed TSS-I for 1992-1993.

On 26 May,⁽²⁷⁾ the Council requested the Administrator, while implementing successor arrangements, to take into account differences among recipient countries with respect to the size of IPFs and the administrative capacity of the field office.

The Council approved the TSS-I work plan for 1992-1993; authorized the Administrator to make such changes as were necessary to the work plan during its implementation; requested that a TSS-I work plan for 1994-1995 be submitted to the Council in 1993; encouraged, through the catalytic use of TSS-I, more effective use of the agencies' analytical capacities in support of Governments at the policy and programme levels; and requested the Administrator to provide an update of the cost study, taking into account the cost of technical services provided specifically under TSS-I.

With regard to administrative and operational support services, the Council decided that if non-United Nations agents were designated as providers of support services, they would be reimbursed from the IPF sub-line at rates not to exceed those established for the United Nations agencies subject to the new regime as well as for OPS. National NGOs responsible for programme/project implementation should have the necessary management staff and might be reimbursed for their services from project budgets.

The Council approved a proposal made by the Administrator to provide the five agencies subject to the new regime (Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, ILO, UNESCO, United Nations Industrial Development Organization and the former Department of Technical Cooperation for Development (DTCD)) with a reasonable degree of protection from exchange rate movements, taking into account the principle of symmetry in compensatory payments between UNDP and the agencies. The Administrator was asked to include in his annual review of the financial situation information on actual payments made or recoveries achieved in connection with the scheme.

Net contributor status

In response to a 1991 Governing Council decision on preparations for the fifth programming cycle,⁽³⁷⁾ the Administrator submitted a report⁽⁶⁷⁾ on consultations with countries having a per capita GNP of above $3,000 (except for small island developing countries) regarding their being asked to contribute to the costs of field offices located there. By an addendum to his report, the Administrator transmitted a communication from Bahrain indicating that it would bear the costs of the UNDP office there and pay 60 per cent of the principal of arrears.

On 14 February,⁽⁶⁸⁾ the Council noted Bahrain's proposed settlement of outstanding field cost obligations. It approved the proposed method for distributing local office costs between countries covered by a field office with regional responsibilities and the host country, namely that field office costs attributable to countries other than the host would be covered by the country concerned. The Administrator was asked to inform the Council of the manner in which countries had met their fourth cycle (1987-1991) net contributor obligations, the final IPFs for the countries concerned and the projected implications of the implementation of the 1991 decision⁽³⁷⁾ on the maintenance of field offices in those countries and on the 1994-1995 budget.

Organizational issues

Staff-related matters

In response to a 1991 Governing Council decision,⁽⁶³⁾ the Administrator in March 1992 submitted a report⁽⁶⁹⁾ on the senior management structure of UNDP. The report outlined the legislative background, as well as the context in which efforts to improve effectiveness and efficiency within UNDP had been undertaken. It described modalities aimed at strengthening UNDP's policy and strategy formulation capacity and dealt with issues relating to improved programme quality and accountability. The report also described a pilot exercise in enhanced divisional management and outlined the structure and functions of the new Bureau of External Relations, which included the Governing Council secretariat, the legal status of which was defined. Issues concerning OPS were also discussed.

The Administrator concluded that a restructured UNDP, with a clearly defined mission, focused strategic approach and strengthened management capacity, was in a strong position to respond to the increasing development challenges facing the international community. He intended to keep UNDP's functioning under review.

On 26 May,⁽⁷⁰⁾ the Council asked the Administrator to continue to review the senior management structure and to report to it in 1993. It reaffirmed the need to strengthen UNDP's capacity for institutional strategic planning and the need to take full advantage of management decentralization. It invited the Administrator to designate an existing UNDP unit to have overall responsibility for institutional strategic planning and urged him to continue to improve the managerial qualities and capacities of his staff. Recognizing the steps taken to launch a new Division Chief concept, the Council encouraged the Administrator to continue to develop the concept, and in formulating proposals to increase decentralization of authority to the field, to ensure adequate monitoring, accounting, auditing, backstopping and personnel appraisal, and clear lines of responsibility. The Administrator was asked to invite the Board of External Auditors to UNDP to examine the accountability arrangements for and the effectiveness of the new Division Chief concept and to report to the Council in 1993 on the implementation of the decision.

Proposal on the location of UNDP

On 26 May,⁽⁷¹⁾ the Governing Council noted with appreciation the proposal by Germany to host the headquarters of UNDP, of its affiliated funds and of UNFPA in Bonn from 1996 onwards. The Council requested the Administrator to: examine in consultation with UNDP members the potential impact of such relocation on the objective of reforming the United Nations system of operational activities for development; to consult with UNDP members on the full range of logistical and related financial, administrative and representational implications of such a relocation; and to provide to the Council, not later than February 1993, a report on the results of the implementation of the decision.

Coordination with other organizations

On 26 May,⁽⁷²⁾ the Governing Council encouraged the Administrator to strengthen UNDP's interaction with other development institutions, including international and regional finance institutions, to establish the greatest possible coordination, avoid duplication and achieve the best use of comparative advantage in technical cooperation, within the context of the national development priorities of recipient countries. It asked the Administrator to report to the Council on the issue in 1993.

Other technical cooperation

UN programmes

On 1 March, the Department of Economic and Social Development (DESD) was established as part of the restructuring of the United Nations Secretariat by the Secretary-General. The new Department's responsibilities included those of the former Department of Technical Cooperation for Development (DTCD). In addition to DESD, organizations engaged in providing technical cooperation assistance for economic and social development during 1992 included the regional commissions, the Centre for Human Rights, the United Nations Office at Vienna, the United Nations International Drug Control Programme, the Office of Legal Affairs, the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements, UNCTAD and UNEP.

In 1992, the organizational entities of the United Nations delivered a technical cooperation programme of $243 million, compared with $285 million in 1991, representing a 15 per cent decrease in project expenditures.

DESD activities

In his annual report to the UNDP Governing Council on technical cooperation activities,⁽¹⁾ the Secretary-General stated that, in 1992, DESD had 918 technical cooperation projects under execution, with a total delivery of some $140.7 million against budgets of $185 million.

Projects financed by UNDP represented $87.2 million; those by trust funds, $28.7 million; those by UNFPA, $14.1 million; and by the United Nations regular programme of technical cooperation, $10.7 million.

On a geographical basis, the DESD-executed programme included expenditures of $61.9 million in Africa; $37.6 million in the Middle East, Mediterranean, Europe and for interregional programmes; $34.6 million in Asia and the Pacific; and $6.6 million in the Americas. Project delivery in Africa remained the largest, with a 39 per cent share of the total sum.

Distribution of expenditures by substantive sectors was as follows: natural resources and energy, $47.3 million; development policy, $28.7 million; public administration and finance, $25.3 million; statistics, $16.7 million; population, $7.6 million; the United Nations Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa (UNETPSA), $5.8 million; social development, $4.5 million; and others, $4.8 million. Natural resources and energy, which included work in minerals, energy, water and infrastructure, comprised 34 per cent of the total $140.7 million.

By component, DESD delivery included $83.9 million for project personnel; $21.2 million for training; $19.8 million for equipment; $8.8 million for subcontracted services; and $7 million for miscellaneous expenses.

In addition to a number of new initiatives, such as peace-building, improvement of governance, electoral administration, privatization, investing in Central American development and assistance to economies in transition and to newly independent States, DESD continued its efforts in relation to Africa and LDCs, environment, evaluation, women in development and technical cooperation among developing countries (TCDC).

In-depth evaluations were undertaken in respect of 29 projects during 1992. Problems identified in the evaluations included shortcomings in project selection and design; scarcity and too-rapid turnover of national staff; and lack of detail and analysis in the area of human resources development.

Expenditures for fellowships and training amounted to $21.2 million in 1992. Africa had the largest share, 54 per cent, or $11.4 million; Asia and the Pacific, 27 per cent, or $5.8 million; the Mediterranean, Middle East and inter-regional programmes, 18 per cent, or $3.7 million; and the Americas, 0.1 per cent, or $0.3 million.

DESD implemented a total of 3,438 training awards, including fellowships, study tours, seminars and workshops. Most placements were in the United States, followed by South Africa, the United Kingdom and Australia.

The tenth meeting of Senior Fellowship Officers, held under DESD auspices at the ILO International Training Centre (Turin, Italy, 24-26 March), reconfirmed the role of the DESD office in Geneva as the focal point for the United Nations system inter-agency fellowships.

DESD continued to cooperate with the United Nations Department of Political Affairs on UNETPSA. In 1992, contributions and pledges amounted to over $5.3 million, a decrease from the previous year's $5.9 million. Policy directives for funding in South Africa and abroad emphasized building the institutional capacity of NGOs to provide black leadership skills training to facilitate the transition to a non-racial, democratic system and training black lawyers and judges for the administration of justice in post-apartheid South Africa.

In response to a 1991 Governing Council request,(2) the Administrator in April submitted a report(3) on options for closer cooperation between the former DTCD and UNDP. He stated that its conclusions had been overtaken by the restructuring within the United Nations. Consequently, he proposed that the Council's consideration of the issue should be postponed until DESD was fully established.

On 26 May,(4) the Council took note of the Secretary-General's report on the 1991 technical cooperation activities of the United Nations(5) and of the report of the Administrator on cooperation between the former DTCD and UNDP. It noted the Administrator's view that the issue of in-depth consideration of closer cooperation between the new DESD and UNDP should be taken up again after the Department was fully established. It requested the Administrator to provide information on options of cooperation between DESD and UNDP, if possible for the Council's 1993 session.

The Council stressed the importance of collaboration between DESD and UNDP in those areas where the Department had already developed the necessary technical expertise, capacity and experience. It welcomed DESD's efforts to help increase national capacities for programme management and project execution, and invited it to continue its activities relating to LDCs, environment, TCDC, women in development, economies in transition and other initiatives.

United Nations Volunteers

On 26 May,(6) the Governing Council, having considered the Administrator's report on UNV for 1990-1991,(2) requested him to continue to strengthen the universal character of recruitment for the UNV programme, including increasing the participation of volunteers from underrepresented countries, of women and of older persons; to make full use of more detailed post and job descriptions for better matching of skills with assignments; to expand training and briefing for volunteers; and to help to formulate programmes in which UNV specialists and Domestic Development Services field workers contributed to development activities, with special emphasis on responding to ideas from local, low-income communities to build up their capacity to deal with their development needs.

The Council encouraged UNV to seek a more clearly defined role for volunteers in development cooperation and to develop its current and future strategy regarding the focus of work. It reiterated its request to the Administrator to find means to support Domestic Development Services activities and their regional networks, and encouraged him to apply funding where appropriate from SPR.

It urged the Administrator to work with Governments and the United Nations system in raising awareness of the potential contribution that volunteers could make to development, and to promote greater mobilization of human resources in developing countries through, among other things, support to local NGOs and community-based organizations and mixed teams of international and national volunteers in UNV activities. The Council welcomed UNV's involvement in the humanitarian relief area and related fields, ranging from capacity-building in disaster prevention, preparedness and mitigation to rehabilitation and reconstruction activities.

The Administrator was requested to ensure that UNV activities would be consistent with the coordination to be exercised by the United Nations Department of Humanitarian Affairs (DHA); to consider ways of securing start-up funding for the early fielding of volunteers in time of emergencies, particularly through access to DHA's central emergency revolving fund; and to ensure funding for middle- and long-term UNV involvement through access to SPR and to trust funds. The Council decided that, except in situations where special financing was available for volunteers, the external costs of UNV specialists should be charged to project budgets on the basis of a pro forma cost, starting with new contracts as at 1 July 1992. It also decided that the income accruing annually to the Special Voluntary Fund as of 1 January 1992 from voluntary general contributions and interest income be utilized to support such activities as pilot and experimental projects; the briefing of UNV specialists and training of Domestic Development Services country specialists and field workers, government officials and NGO representatives; and special recruitment campaigns. The Council invited all UNDP members to increase contributions to the Special Voluntary Fund and asked the Administrator to report to it in 1994 on the implementation of the decision.

Technical cooperation among developing countries

In his annual report for 1992,(7) the UNDP Administrator stated that solid progress had been made in the promotion of TCDC. Information activities on TCDC were intensified, targeting Governments, the United Nations development system, intergovernmental organizations, NGOs and other key actors in the development process using a training-of-trainers scheme. A comprehensive trainers' guide was prepared and distributed to field offices and Governments, and information kits on TCDC were provided. Four issues of the Cooperation South magazine were published, and a newsletter was produced on a regular basis.

A number of intercountry workshops took place covering, for example, air transport (Ethiopia); networking among grass-roots women's organizations (Ghana); TCDC aid coordination and resource mobilization (Seychelles); meat-preservation technologies (Senegal); macroeconomic planning for island countries (Fiji); spare parts reconditioning (Cuba); technical cooperation for transition (Commonwealth of Independent States, the Baltic States and Poland); urban management (Malaysia), and intellectual property and trade (Philippines).

Two regional workshops (Latin America and the Arab region) were held to strengthen the role of TCDC national focal points in promoting and advising on the application of TCDC. The fifth TCDC Focal Point Meeting of United Nations organizations (New York, 15 and 16 July) worked on draft guidelines for the review of policies and procedures in the United Nations development system concerning TCDC.

DESD worked with the UNDP Special Unit for TCDC in providing support to Ecuador and 21 other countries for an exercise, held at Quito, to identify possible TCDC arrangements in connection with mining and its environmental impact. In preparation for the exercise, missions were conducted to several countries in Latin America and the Caribbean and in Asia. The exercise resulted in 177 project agreements.

Secretary-General's report. In response to decision 1992/205 of 7 February, by which the Economic and Social Council placed an item on TCDC on the agenda of its 1992 substantive session, the Secretary-General in June submitted to the Council a report(8) on TCDC as a modality in formulating, preparing, executing and evaluating projects implemented by the United Nations system in the economic, social and related fields. The report noted that the relevance of TCDC as a modality in strengthening national capabilities and building collective self-reliance had been given special impetus with the 1978 adoption of the Buenos Aires Plan of Action for Promoting and Implementing TCDC.(9) The continuing validity of the Plan of Action had been repeatedly reaffirmed by various United Nations bodies.

The report discussed application of the modality, noting that it had not been fully put to use. TCDC needed to be seen as a key to the whole development effort, not as an alternative, but as a complement to the more conventional forms of development assistance.

The report recommended that all parties should inspire a change in attitude whereby TCDC would become appreciated and applied as an effective, less costly and relevant modality of cooperation. They should simplify the gathering and accessing of data on capacity availability in developing countries, use demonstration and pilot projects to test new approaches and refine initiatives, and strengthen the national TCDC focal points. It recommended that Governments encourage and facilitate the use of TCDC for programme and project implementation, adopt national policies favourable to its use in national development plans, strengthen or establish national focal points for TCDC, identify and facilitate sectors where TCDC could be more widely applied, sensitize officials in governmental institutions, the private sector and NGOs on the comparative advantages of TCDC for the exchange of technology, expertise and experience, and strengthen and streamline the matching of technical cooperation needs and capacities.

As to the United Nations development system, it should use TCDC in implementing programmes and projects by ensuring that it was given first consideration, both during the formulation and implementation process and through the involvement of field offices during project identification; ensure more focused efforts in using the capacities of developing countries; enhance the role of agencies in assisting Governments to identify needs and capacities for cooperation among developing countries; improve and expand the TCDC Information Referral System; encourage Governments, public and private institutions and NGOs to consider using TCDC in projects and to adopt policies favourable to its wider use; and assist Governments to apply the TCDC modality in preparing projects and programmes for cooperation regardless of the source of funds.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 30 July 1992, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1992/41 without vote.

Technical cooperation among developing countries
The Economic and Social Council,

Reaffirming the continued validity and importance of all the recommendations of the Buenos Aires Plan of Action for Promoting and Implementing Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries in promoting technical cooperation among developing countries,

Reaffirming also the recommendation that the entire United Nations system dealing with development must be permeated by the spirit of technical cooperation among developing countries and that all relevant organizations of the United Nations system should play a prominent role as promoters and catalysts of technical cooperation among developing countries,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 45/191 of 21 December 1990 and 46/143 of 17 December 1991 on developing human resources for development,

Recognizing that increased cooperation is taking place among developing countries and their institutions through the sharing of expertise, experience and facilities,

Recognizing also that technical cooperation among developing countries is an effective tool for implementing development programmes and projects through the use of relevant experience and expertise and could also facilitate trade among developing countries,

Reiterating that developing countries have a primary responsibility for promoting technical cooperation among themselves, and that developed countries and the United Nations system should assist and support such activities and should play a prominent role as promoters and catalysts of technical cooperation among developing countries, in accordance with the Buenos Aires Plan of Action,

Noting with appreciation the recent measures taken by organizations of the United Nations system to identify technical cooperation among developing countries as a priority theme, to provide increased support to promotional activities and to arrange for monitoring technical cooperation among developing countries through the mechanisms established for project appraisal and approval,

Concerned, however, that technical cooperation among developing countries since the adoption of the Buenos Aires Plan of Action has not been widespread and is still marginally applied in the implementation of programmes and projects,

1. Calls upon all parties in the development effort to make concerted, planned and vigorous endeavours to benefit from utilization of the capacities of developing countries by giving their full support and first consideration to the use of the modality of technical cooperation among developing countries;

2. Urges all parties to enhance the scope and application of the modality in work carried out at all stages of the project cycle;

3. Requests all parties to increase support activities aimed at enhancing awareness in government institutions, the private sector and non-governmental organizations of the modality of technical cooperation among developing countries;

4. Calls for increased use, where appropriate, by developed country partners of consultants from developing countries so as, inter alia, to improve the cost-effectiveness of projects and programmes;

5. Urges the United Nations Development Programme and other organizations of the United Nations system dealing with development to consider improvements to the working and scope of the Information Referral System, to improve and expand data and information on existing technical capabilities in developing countries through that System and to enhance access to such information;

6. Also urges the United Nations Development Programme and other organizations of the United Nations system dealing with development to intensify, within existing resources, their efforts to build national capacity for human resources development in developing countries;

7. Invites all countries and organizations of the United Nations system dealing with development to review further their policies and practices to facilitate the use of technical cooperation among developing countries in the design, formulation, implementation and evaluation of programmes and projects supported by them;

8. Urges developing countries to encourage greater use of technical cooperation among developing countries in the implementation of national development activities and projects, including procurement practices;

9. Invites developing countries to strengthen their national focal points for technical cooperation among developing countries to enable them to promote more effectively and monitor progress in such cooperation;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1994 on his assessment of the implementation of the present resolution.

UN Capital Development Fund

During 1992,(1) an estimated $48.7 million in resources was made available to UNCDF, a multilateral agency providing small-scale assistance to officially designated LDCs and other countries regarded as LDCs. The total comprised $39.6 million in voluntary contributions, $8 million in other income, $700,000 in loan repayments, and a $400,000 reduction in operational reserve. A further $101.2 million was available from previous years.

Resources used during the year totalled $57.5 million, including $48 million in project expenditures, $4.5 million in administrative expenditures and $5 million in loans disbursed.

Seventeen new projects were approved by UNCDF in 1992. They included an aquaculture project in Bangladesh, support to rural self-help development activities and a water supply and sanitation project in the Central African Republic, rural water supply and sanitation projects in Equatorial Guinea and Guinea-Bissau, a fisheries rehabilitation project in Eritrea, a guarantee fund and credit line for micro-enterprises in Madagascar, a rural motorized transport project in Malawi, road rehabilitation in Mozambique, a small marketing infrastructure project in Nepal, construction of a bridge in Nicaragua, integrated rural development in the Niger and road reconstruction and rehabilitation in Sierra Leone.

In his annual report for 1992,(2) the UNDP Administrator stated that an internal management review was conducted both at headquarters and in the field to analyse UNCDF programme development and delivery. A strategy based on area development emerged, although its implementation was constrained by a lack of resources. That strategy sought to take advantage of trends towards democratization and decentralization by working with Governments, community groups and NGOs in order to intensify participatory activities at the grass-roots level. With grass-roots level poverty reduction in LDCs as its major thrust, UNCDF continued to incorporate other themes into its programming, particularly the environment and women in development.

Chapter III

Special economic, humanitarian and disaster relief assistance

In 1992, in response to an escalation of natural disasters, civil strife and other emergencies, the United Nations implemented a more unified and strengthened approach to special economic, humanitarian and disaster relief assistance. The Secretary-General created a new Department of Humanitarian Affairs (DHA), absorbing the Office of the United Nations Disaster Relief Coordinator, in order to deal more comprehensively with the consequences of humanitarian emergencies which required ever-mounting humanitarian relief assistance. The General Assembly emphasized the leadership role of the Secretary-General in ensuring rapid and coordinated response of the United Nations system to these humanitarian emergencies and invited States to increase the resources of the Central Emergency Revolving Fund (resolution 47/168).

A System-Wide Plan of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development, developed to contribute to the implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, succeeded the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990. Special economic assistance was provided to Benin, the Central African Republic, Chad, Djibouti, Madagascar and the front-line States bordering South Africa, as well as to Vanuatu and Yemen. Organizations of the United Nations system, under the coordination of DHA, provided humanitarian and emergency assistance to countries of the Horn of Africa through the Special Emergency Programme for that subregion. Angola, Liberia, Mozambique, Somalia and the Sudan also received assistance.

DHA and United Nations agencies also provided assistance for the drought emergency in southern Africa, to the countries of sub-Saharan Africa and to the Sudano-Sahelian region.

Countries that received United Nations disaster relief assistance in 1992 included a number of South Pacific countries following cyclones, Nicaragua following a volcanic eruption and an earthquake, Pakistan following storms and floods and the Philippines in the light of the continued activity of the Mount Pinatubo volcano.

The Organization continued to provide rehabilitation and reconstruction assistance to Afghanistan, Lebanon and Liberia and to aid efforts to mitigate the consequences of the Chernobyl nuclear powerplant disaster.

Special economic assistance

The United Nations continued in 1992 to provide special assistance to a number of developing countries faced with particularly severe economic problems. A wide range of adverse economic conditions, often accompanied by damaging climatic events, armed conflict or civil strife, jeopardized development in those countries. Several organizations of the United Nations system participated in implementing the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s and elaborating the System-Wide Plan of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development.

Critical situation in Africa

New agenda for African development

During 1992, several United Nations forums discussed implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, adopted by the General Assembly in 1991.⁽¹⁾ The New Agenda resulted from the 1991 final review and appraisal⁽²⁾ of the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990, adopted by the Assembly in 1986.⁽³⁾

In an effort to advance implementation of the New Agenda, the Secretary-General established the Panel of High-Level Personalities on African Development to assist and advise him. The 12-member panel, comprising specialists on African development issues from both within and outside the United Nations, held its first meeting at Geneva on 28 December 1992.

UNCTAD action. In February,⁽⁴⁾ the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, at its eighth session (UNCTAD VIII) (see next chapter), adopted the Cartagena Commitment, in which it identified the New Agenda and the United Nations System-Wide Plan of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development (see below) as areas requiring intensified international cooperation for development. It requested the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board (TDB) to respond fully to requests by the General Assembly for consideration of particular issues, notably UNCTAD's contribution to the New Agenda.

In a July note,(5) the UNCTAD Secretary-General presented to TDB proposals for action to be taken as UNCTAD's contribution to the implementation of the New Agenda and the System-Wide Plan of Action. The report also examined the implications of the proposals for UNCTAD's work and gave the background to the development of the System-Wide Plan. The report identified a number of areas where UNCTAD could make a contribution to the New Agenda's implementation: achievement of sustained and sustainable growth; population, environment and development; intensification of the democratization process; the human dimension; promotion of regional cooperation and integration; South/South cooperation; agriculture, rural development and food security; trade, commodities and diversification; trade; solution of Africa's debt problem; resource flows; investment promotion; technology; the role of non-governmental organizations (NGOs); and follow-up, monitoring and implementation.

On 14 October,(6) TDB took note of the report of its Sessional Committee II on the New Agenda and endorsed its decision that the UNCTAD Secretary-General should be requested to undertake Africa-specific studies and to present progress reports on UNCTAD's contribution to the New Agenda's implementation to TDB's 1993 spring session. In addition, the UNCTAD secretariat should give priority to Africa in developing available technical cooperation resources and ensure that its technical cooperation activities, within the context of the New Agenda, responded to the needs of African countries. Extrabudgetary resources should also be sought to intensify UNCTAD's contribution to the New Agenda. The work of UNCTAD intergovernmental bodies should take the New Agenda into account and TDB should evaluate UNCTAD's contribution to its implementation every two years, taking into account the follow-up and monitoring mechanisms and timetable set up by the General Assembly.

UNDP action. In response to a 1991 decision of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) Governing Council,(7) the UNDP Administrator submitted in March 1992 a report(8) on UNDP's role in African economic recovery and development.

For the fifth programming cycle (1992-1996), UNDP allocated over 50 per cent of indicative planning figure (IPF) resources to Africa. It would also support the New Agenda through its country programmes, the intercountry programme for Africa and activities under Special Programme Resources (SPR). It was pursuing an integrated approach focusing on human development in country programmes and six areas listed in a 1990 Governing Council decision(9)—poverty eradication and grass-roots participation in development; environmental problems and natural resource management; management development; technical cooperation among developing countries; transfer and adaptation of technology for development; and women in development. At the regional level, UNDP would assist African economic recovery through its fifth intercountry programme, which concentrated on three major areas of the New Agenda: regional cooperation and integration; long-term strategic planning; and fostering an enabling environment for human development. In addition, UNDP proposed to use part of the $10 million of SPR funds allocated for African economic recovery and development to assist African countries in drawing up national long-term perspectives to provide a framework for their development in the 1990s and beyond. SPR funding would also help to support a continental programme for African capacity-building. It would continue to promote the coordination of activities covered by the Regional Bureau for Africa.

In his annual report for 1992,(10) the Administrator noted that the entire management plan of the Regional Bureau for Africa for the year was aligned with the major objectives of the New Agenda.

On 26 May,(11) the Governing Council requested the Administrator to work in concert with the United Nations system to implement all elements of the New Agenda; to work closely with the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs to ensure a coordinated and effective international response to the devastating drought situation, especially in eastern and southern Africa; and to assist in mobilizing additional resources, in particular from consultative groups, round-table meetings and co-financing, for programmes in the African region during the fifth programming cycle. It also requested him to report to the Council at its 1993 session, providing an analysis of the linkages and relationships among national long-term perspective studies, the UNDP/World Bank African Capacity-Building Initiative and human development strategies, and how they related to the application of the programme approach. The Council called on African countries to pursue vigorously their responsibility and commitment under the New Agenda to achieve sustained and sustainable growth and development, to promote cooperation and regional and subregional integration, to intensify the process of democratization, to encourage investment and to integrate population issues into the development process. It called on the international community to assist African countries to achieve accelerated growth and human-centred development on a sustainable basis through finding durable solutions to the African debt crisis, providing adequate resource flows, diversification of economies, enhanced market access, and support of regional integration.

System-Wide Plan of Action

In August 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Committee for Programming and Coordination (CPC) a report on the System-Wide Plan of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development,⁽¹²⁾ prepared in response to a recommendation of CPC at its 1990 session and endorsed later that year by the Economic and Social Council.⁽¹³⁾ The Plan encompassed the financial institutions and operational funds and programmes of the United Nations system, as well as the technical cooperation activities of the specialized agencies. Its objectives were to provide a dynamic and flexible framework for concerted and coordinated action by the system to assist Africa in achieving sustained and sustainable growth and development in the 1990s and beyond; to create a more supportive international economic environment; and to assist African Governments in their efforts to transform the structure of their economies and promote economic integration, collective self-reliance, popular participation, adequate human and institutional capacities and employment creation.

The Plan's overall strategy was to maximize the system's contribution to African countries and the international community in their efforts to realize the objectives of the New Agenda for African Development.

CPC action. CPC⁽¹⁴⁾ recommended that the Secretary-General launch, at the earliest possible time, the System-Wide Plan of Action and the New Agenda for the Development of Africa; that the Plan's priorities be used as guidelines for the system's activities in the area of African development; that the Plan be monitored and updated within the framework of the United Nations Inter-Agency Task Force for African Economic Recovery and Development; and that the process of updating the Plan should be carried out after each review, by the General Assembly, of the implementation of the New Agenda.

Assistance to Benin,
the Central African Republic and Madagascar

In response to a 1990 General Assembly resolution,⁽¹⁵⁾ the Secretary-General submitted in August 1992 a report,⁽¹⁶⁾ prepared by UNDP, on special economic assistance to Benin, the Central African Republic, Madagascar and a number of other countries (see below). The report stated that, as a result of a severe financial crisis, social and economic development in Benin had suffered a severe slow-down. With UNDP assistance, Benin held a Round-Table Conference of Donors (Geneva, 2 and 3 April), at which Benin's macroeconomic policies, sectoral strategies, social development strategy and programme of technical assistance were discussed. Benin reported on the positive results of the implementation of its first structural adjustment programme and indicated that the second structural adjustment programme aimed to bring its public finances closer to equilibrium, promote the banking and private sectors, continue reform in the public sector and rationalize the institutional framework. Total pledges to Benin by donors at the Round-Table Conference, at which sectoral strategies and priorities were presented, exceeded requirements for the period 1992-1994. As a follow-up to the Conference, the specific needs of each sector would be considered at sectoral consultations.

Among the leading priorities of the Central African Republic's development plan and structural adjustment programme were a sustainable increase in national output; strengthening of the public administration system; overcoming constraints to external trade and communications imposed by the land-locked situation; social and human resources development; environmental preservation; and strengthening of national planning and socio-economic management. As follow-up to a 1991 Round-Table Conference of Donors, consultations on the health sector between the Government and donors were scheduled for November, with consultations on education, training and employment planned for a later stage. Estimates of needs to be met in 1992 amounted to 59.8 billion CFA francs.

During the 1991-1992 period, Madagascar experienced both a cyclone and drought. International assistance focused first on food aid, medicines and medical supplies to meet the emergency situation. Priority for subsequent action was the rehabilitation of the Dabara canal, for which a food-for-work programme was established with assistance provided by UNDP, the World Food Programme (WFP), the French Caisse centrale de Coopération économique, Swiss Cooperation and USAID. In April 1992, an assessment mission, funded by Swiss Cooperation, evaluated the situation and drew up information to enable donors to decide on their follow-up activities. The mission's report observed good donor response and concluded that the food-for-work programme proved to be a good option. The two remaining areas of need were the total rehabilitation of the irrigation network and the establishment of a rational, well-structured system of water management. In mid-May, donor agencies and institutions entered into consultations with a view to selecting from proposals and making commitments for the continuation of work.

With regard to the drought, a joint government/multi-donor mission in May identified two priorities for action: provision of emergency food and formulation of medium- and long-term development policies for the south.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, adopted resolution 47/159 without vote.

Assistance to Benin, the Central African Republic and Madagascar

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 45/230 of 21 December 1990, on assistance to Benin, the Central African Republic, Ecuador, Madagascar and Vanuatu, and its previous resolutions on assistance to those countries,

Having considered the relevant report of the Secretary-General,

Concerned at the continuing need for assistance in those countries, particularly since they are adversely affected by natural disasters,

Noting that, despite the structural adjustment programmes carried out by those countries, on the whole their economic and financial performance for the past two years has continued to be poor, and stressing the need for vigorous support of these programmes and for action to alleviate the impact of natural disasters and of the adjustment policies being implemented, especially in the social sphere,

Noting also that the financial crisis that Benin is undergoing has led to a slowing down of its economic and social development, and that the disastrous consequences of repeated floods during the past ten years, alternating with periods of drought and pluviometric disturbances, are a major impediment to the implementation of development policies and strategies,

Noting the grave difficulties that the Government of the Central African Republic has continued to face since 1982 in achieving the objectives of its development programme, owing to the harmful effects of the international economic situation, and recognizing the need to provide it with supplementary resources so as to enable it to achieve those objectives,

Noting the particularly difficult problems faced by island developing countries in responding to negative and special economic circumstances, referred to in the report of the Secretary-General called for in General Assembly resolution 45/202 of 21 December 1990, that the economic and social development efforts of Madagascar, an island developing country, are being thwarted by the adverse effects of the cyclones, floods and drought that afflict that country periodically and that the implementation of reconstruction and rehabilitation programmes requires the mobilization of substantial resources that are beyond the real means of the country,

Concerned at the devastating effects of natural and other disasters on the environment and their adverse effects on the economy,

Recalling its resolution 44/236 of 22 December 1989 on the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction,

Having heard the statements of Member States at its forty-seventh session on the situations currently prevailing in those countries,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General, Member States, the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system, and regional, interregional, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations for the assistance they have provided or pledged to those countries;

2. Notes the efforts undertaken by the Governments of those countries to overcome their economic and financial difficulties and to alleviate the catastrophic effects of natural disasters;

3. Reaffirms that all Governments and international organizations should fulfil the commitments undertaken within the framework of the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, contained in the annex to its resolution S-18/3 of 1 May 1990, the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade, contained in the annex to its resolution 45/199 of 21 December 1990, the Paris Declaration and the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, the Cartagena Commitment, the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, and Agenda 21;

4. Noting with concern that the assistance made available to those countries has not always been adequate to meet their urgent requirements and that additional assistance is needed;

5. Appeals to States, the international financial institutions of the United Nations, humanitarian organizations and voluntary agencies to respond generously and urgently to the needs of those countries and to continue and increase their assistance in response to the reconstruction, economic recovery and development needs of those countries;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to take the steps necessary and to mobilize the resources needed, in collaboration with the relevant organs, agencies and programmes of the United Nations system, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 45/230 on special programmes of economic assistance, to provide assistance for all disasters, natural or otherwise, striking those countries, in order to:

(a) Meet any reconstruction needs resulting from disasters that have already occurred;

(b) Implement preventive programmes to reduce the effects of future disasters, taking into account the International Framework of Action for the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction contained in the annex to General Assembly resolution 44/236;

7. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its forty-ninth session a report on the implementation of the present resolution, containing:

(a) The identification of priorities for action by the international community in those countries;

(b) An assessment of the assistance actually received by those countries;

(c) An assessment of needs still unmet and specific proposals for responding to them effectively.

Chad

In response to a 1991 General Assembly resolution,⁽¹⁷⁾ the Secretary-General submitted an August 1992 report,⁽¹⁶⁾ prepared by UNDP, containing information on special economic assistance to Chad. The report stated that Chad's economy remained extremely fragile despite internal efforts and external assistance to redress the situation. The output of cereals continued to fall short of the subsistence needs of Chad's population, which was rapidly growing due to high fertility and the large number of returning Chadian refugees. To meet overall food needs, 106,000 tons of cereals were being sought from the international community.

Pursuant to the third (1990) Round-Table Conference of Donors to Chad, an agenda for consultations on the following sectors was drawn up for the 1992-1993 period during an in-country meeting in March 1992: health and social affairs (June 1992); promotion of the private sector (October 1992); environment and desertification (December 1992); rural development, food security and hydraulic resources (January 1993); and urban development (January 1993).

Among other assistance, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) continued to promote voluntary repatriation and reintegration. In 1992, some 12,000 Chadians, out of a total case-load of 20,000, registered for voluntary repatriation and, by mid-May, 3,412 had been repatriated. UNHCR provided transportation to final destinations, domestic utensils, seeds and agricultural tools for repatriated Chadians. The Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) covered such areas as food security, environmental conservation, combating desertification, strengthening rural institutions, development of human resources and promotion of better nutrition. With technical assistance from FAO, Chad was preparing a comprehensive food security programme. FAO was executing 19 field projects in Chad, at a total value of $28.6 million, of which eight projects valued at $1.2 million were funded through its technical cooperation programme.

WFP had three development projects under implementation in Chad in education, food for vulnerable groups and rural development, valued respectively at $23.9 million, $4.5 million and $2.4 million. The United Nations Department of Economic and Social Development was executing a total of 12 projects in Chad, valued at $3.7 million, covering social development, statistics, energy, and water and mineral resources.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 47/156 without vote.

Special economic assistance to Chad

The General Assembly,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General;
2. Invites all States and competent United Nations organizations and programmes that participated actively in the conference of friends of Chad, held in Paris in 1991, to participate in the various round tables to be held at N'Djamena in 1993;
3. Calls upon the Secretary-General to keep the situation in Chad under review and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its forty-ninth session.

Djibouti

In response to a 1991 General Assembly resolution,⁽¹⁸⁾ the Secretary-General submitted in August a report,⁽¹⁶⁾ prepared by UNDP, containing information on special economic assistance to Djibouti. The situation in the Horn of Africa had resulted in an influx of over 100,000 refugees and displaced persons into Djibouti, swelling its population by 20 per cent and exacerbating the already serious food shortage caused by drought. Following a review of the situation in January, a consolidated inter-agency appeal for the Special Emergency Programme for the Horn of Africa (SEPHA) was launched on 1 February (see below, under "Humanitarian assistance activities") to support urgent activities to be undertaken in the region by the United Nations system and secure the resources required for their implementation in 1992. While the funding requested was substantial, the needs identified represented only a small part of the total humanitarian assistance required.

Six projects in Djibouti were proposed by the United Nations for priority funding, totalling an estimated $10.6 million: multisectoral assistance to 33,000 refugees in camps in Djibouti, strengthening camp infrastructure and providing primary education ($2.3 million); food assistance for refugees ($2.1 million); port and railroad rehabilitation ($5 million); strengthening health, nutrition, water and sanitation services ($500,000); recovery of peripheral health services ($280,000); and tuberculosis control ($306,000).

A second multi-donor development project for the reconstruction and development of Djibouti City was approved in the course of 1991-1992. Valued at $45.5 million, the project would provide the city with sanitation facilities and low-cost housing schemes. UNDP and the United Nations Capital Development Fund were financing a $4.5 million low-cost housing project to set up self-help construction schemes in the poorest areas of Djibouti City. There was also an ongoing $13.3 million sanitation and drainage project, funded by the African Development Bank, to protect urban water-supply systems from pollution.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 47/157 without vote.

Assistance for the reconstruction and development of Djibouti

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 46/175 of 19 December 1991 and its previous resolutions on economic assistance to Djibouti,

Recalling also the Paris Declaration and the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, adopted by the Second United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries on 14 September 1990, as well as the mutual commitments undertaken on that occasion and the importance to be attached to the follow-up to that Conference,

Noting that the economic and social development efforts of Djibouti, which is included in the list of least developed countries, are constrained by the extremes of the local climate, for example, cyclical droughts and torrential rains, and floods such as those which occurred in 1989, and that the implementation of reconstruction and development programmes requires the deployment of resources that exceed the real capacities of the country,

Noting with concern that the situation in Djibouti has been adversely affected by recent events in the Horn of Africa, and noting the recent influx of over 100,000 refugees and persons displaced from their countries, which has, on the one hand, placed serious strains on the fragile economic, social and administrative infrastructure of the country and, on the other, raised serious security concerns,

Noting the extremely critical economic situation of Djibouti resulting from its geographical location and from the number of priority development projects that have been suspended in the light of the new critical international situation,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General,

Noting with gratitude the support provided to emergency relief operations during the floods in 1989 by various countries and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations,

1. Declares its solidarity with the Government and people of Djibouti in the face of the devastating consequences of the torrential rains and floods and the new economic realities of Djibouti resulting in particular from the new critical situation in the Horn of Africa;

2. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his efforts to make the international community aware of the difficulties faced by Djibouti in particular and the Horn of Africa in general;

3. Invites the United Nations system, in particular the United Nations Development Programme, to assist the Government of Djibouti, in the context of the scheduled round-table meeting, the Government of Djibouti in preparing an urgent programme of rehabilitation and reconstruction, as well as a sustainable and adequate long-term development programme;

4. Calls upon all States, all regional and interregional organizations, non-governmental organizations and other intergovernmental agencies, in particular the United Nations Development Programme, the United Nations Children's Fund, the World Food Programme, the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the International Fund for Agricultural Development and the World Bank, to provide Djibouti with substantial appropriate assistance, on both a bilateral and a multilateral basis, to enable it to cope with its special economic difficulties;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to mobilize the resources necessary for an effective programme of financial, technical and material assistance to Djibouti;

6. Also requests the Secretary-General to prepare a study of the economic situation of Djibouti and of the progress made in the organization and implementation of the new special programme of economic assistance for that country, in time for the question to be considered by the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session.

Front-line States

In October, the Secretary-General submitted a report⁽¹⁹⁾ on special assistance to front-line States and other States bordering on South Africa in response to a 1991 General Assembly resolution.⁽²⁰⁾ The report contained information from 10 Member States and 17 United Nations organizations describing activities undertaken by them to support the national and collective development and emergency programmes of the front-line States and neighbouring States.

Following a joint United Nations/Southern African Development Community (SADC) Consolidated Appeal, a pledging conference took place in June to address the drought emergency in southern Africa (DESA) (see below, under "Disasters").

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 47/163 without vote.

Special assistance to the front-line States

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 46/172 of 19 December 1991,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on special assistance to front-line States and other bordering States,

Reaffirming the provisions of the Declaration on Apartheid and its Destructive Consequences in Southern Africa, contained in the annex to its resolution S-16/1 of 14 December 1989, in particular paragraph 9(e) thereof, in which the States Members of the United Nations decided to render all possible assistance to the front-line and neighbouring States to enable them to rebuild their economies, which have been adversely affected by past acts of aggression and destabilization,

Aware that the apartheid system in South Africa has aggravated economic and social problems confronting the front-line States and other neighbouring States,

Welcoming the recent positive developments in the region, including the holding of elections in Angola and the recently concluded General Peace Agreement for Mozambique, signed at Rome on 4 October 1992,

Recognizing the urgent and imperative need for all the parties in South Africa to implement fully the relevant provisions of Security Council resolutions 765(1992) of 16 July 1992 and 772(1992) of 17 August 1992,

Gravely concerned about the effects of the devastating drought that is currently ravaging the southern African region,

Welcoming with appreciation the positive response of the international community at the Pledging Conference for the Drought Emergency in Southern Africa, held at Geneva on 1 and 2 June 1992,

Conscious of the urgent need and responsibility of the international community to continue to deal with the drought situation and other problems affecting the region,

Mindful of Security Council resolutions 568(1985) of 21 June 1985, 571(1985) of 20 September 1985 and 581(1986) of 13 February 1986, in which the Council, inter alia, requested the international community to render assistance to the front-line States and other neighbouring States,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his efforts regarding assistance to the front-line States and other neighbouring States;

2. Notes with appreciation the assistance being rendered to the front-line States by donor countries and inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations;

3. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General, donor countries and non-governmental organizations for the invaluable assistance they are rendering towards the alleviation of the effects of the drought in the southern African region;

4. Expresses its deep concern about the continuing adverse effects of past acts of aggression and destabilization in the region;

5. Strongly urges the international community to continue to provide, in a timely and effective manner, the financial, material and technical assistance necessary to enhance the individual and collective capacity of the front-line States and other neighbouring States to cope with those effects;

6. Requests the Secretary-General and organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to respond, as appropriate, to such requests for assistance as might be forthcoming from individual States or the appropriate subregional organizations, and urges all States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to respond favourably to such requests;

7. Reiterates the urgent need for the removal of all remaining obstacles to the resumption of constitutional negotiations on a non-racial democratic South Africa;

8. Appeals to all States and appropriate intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to support, in the context, inter alia, of the current drought situation, the national and joint emergency programmes prepared by the front-line States and other neighbouring States to overcome their critical humanitarian and emergency problems, taking into account the special circumstances of the most affected countries;

9. Appeals to the international community to extend appropriate assistance to the front-line States and other neighbouring States to enable them to advance the process of regional economic integration, as envisaged in the Treaty of 17 August 1992 establishing the Southern African Development Community, including the eventual participation of a non-racial democratic South Africa;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-ninth session on the progress made in the implementation of the present resolution.

Other economic assistance

Vanuatu

In response to a General Assembly resolution of 1990,(21) the Secretary-General submitted in August a report,(16) prepared by UNDP, containing information on economic assistance to Vanuatu, an island developing country. The report listed, as major constraints to the country's development, a high population growth rate; lack of skilled manpower; inadequate infrastructure; and high dependency on external aid to fund the bulk of the State capital budget. It identified as priority areas for action by the international community: national planning and policy formulation; economic and financial management, adjustment and reform; institutional strengthening of the Vanuatu Development Bank; tourism, agriculture and industry; policies to mobilize domestic savings; building of infrastructure; health and population; professional and technical expertise; and training and the provision of scholarships. The report concluded that much remained to be done before Vanuatu became economically and institutionally self-sustaining. (See PART THREE, Chapter I, for further details on island developing countries.)

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 47/161 without vote.

Economic assistance to Vanuatu

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 45/230 of 21 December 1990 on economic assistance to Vanuatu and other specified countries, in which it requested the Secretary-General to mobilize the resources necessary to provide assistance to Vanuatu and those other countries,

Recalling also its resolution 45/202 of 21 December 1990 on specific measures in favour of island developing countries,

Taking into account that Vanuatu, an island developing country that is also included in the list of least developed countries, continues to experience, as a consequence of periodic natural disasters, significant economic and social disadvantages of the type referred to in resolution 45/202,

Taking note of Agenda 21, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, in particular chapter 17, section G thereof, relating to the sustainable development of small island developing States,

1. Calls the attention of the international community to the report of the Secretary-General on the specific problems and needs of island developing countries, and specifically to those confronting Vanuatu;

2. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for the steps he has taken to mobilize assistance for Vanuatu and to those States and organizations which have provided assistance to it;

3. Also expresses its appreciation to the United Nations Development Programme, the specialized agencies of the United Nations and the donor community for their participation in the first round-table meeting to assist Vanuatu, and notes the proposed convening of a second such meeting in 1993;

4. Appeals to Member States, international financial institutions and the specialized agencies, organizations and programmes of the United Nations system to respond generously to the needs of Vanuatu, particularly in the nine priority areas identified in the report of the Secretary-General;

5. Invites the appropriate parts of the United Nations system, at the next meetings of their various governing bodies, to consider, as appropriate, the special needs of Vanuatu and to report the decisions of those bodies to the Secretary-General;

6. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) To continue his efforts to mobilize the necessary resources for an effective programme of financial, technical and material assistance to Vanuatu;

(b) To report to the General Assembly at its forty-ninth session on the progress made in organizing international assistance for Vanuatu and on developments in the economic situation of that country.

Yemen

In response to a 1990 General Assembly resolution,(22) and to a 1991 Economic and Social Council resolution,(23) the Secretary-General submitted a June report(24) to the Assembly, through the Council, on assistance to Yemen. The report reviewed the post-unification situation in Yemen and the mobilization of international assistance. The Yemen Arab Republic and the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen, two least developed countries, had merged in May 1990.

It was noted that the cost of unification, the negative effects of war and upheaval in the Gulf and Horn of Africa region, drought and earthquake, the return of Yemeni expatriates, coupled with unsettled financial obligations inherited from Yemen's predecessors, far outweighed the available resources. Therefore, the need for financial, capital and technical assistance to Yemen persisted.

In an August report,(16) prepared by UNDP, containing information on economic assistance to Yemen, the Secretary-General stated that the first Round-Table Conference of Donors to Yemen, convened with the assistance of UNDP, was held at Geneva on 30 June and 1 July. Follow-up sectoral meetings would construct detailed programming frameworks for key economic and social sectors.

The report noted that approximately a million Yemeni expatriates had returned to their country as a result of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, causing the resident population to increase suddenly by 7 per cent and imposing a severe strain on social services and infrastructure. With the assistance of UNDP and the International Development Association (IDA), Yemen had formulated an emergency recovery programme to meet the long-term needs arising from the large-scale repatriation. The programme aimed to strengthen the social infrastructure, create employment opportunities in such areas as road construction and increase food production in agriculture and fisheries. The programme's first phase, which would focus on road construction, agriculture, education and housing, was estimated to cost $60 million, $52.6 million of which would be provided by donor Governments and institutions as follows: IDA, $33 million; USAID, $15 million; Germany, $4.2 million; and UNDP, $0.4 million.

Other assistance by the United Nations system included the coordination by UNHCR of humanitarian aid from specialized international agencies for some 125,000 returnees, UNDP funding of a $400,000 project to strengthen the project management unit of the emergency recovery programme, as well as continued support from the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF). In May, the International Labour Organisation co-sponsored with UNDP a seminar on the capacities of Yemen and other countries in the region to manage labour migration in the wake of the Gulf crisis. During the year, UNHCR provided assistance for refugees from the Horn of Africa valued at $900,000 and was extending its camps to deal with the continuing influx. WFP provided emergency food assistance for the refugees, in addition to medicines and medical supplies, field personnel and consulting doctors. The Islamic Development Bank established a school for refugee children.

Humanitarian assistance and disaster relief

Coordination of humanitarian assistance and disaster relief

In accordance with a 1991 General Assembly resolution on strengthening the coordination of humanitarian emergency assistance of the United Nations,⁽¹⁾ the Secretary-General, in March, established the Department of Humanitarian Affairs (DHA) and, in April, appointed Jan Eliasson as Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs and Emergency Relief Coordinator. In an October report to the Assembly,⁽²⁾ he stated that, as called for by the Assembly in 1991,⁽¹⁾ the Central Emergency Revolving Fund (CERF) and the Inter-Agency Standing Committee had also been established.

DHA, designed to strengthen a coordinated and coherent system-wide approach, was staffed through the redeployment of resources, combining the former UNDRO with other existing capacities within the United Nations. The Department was also supported by staff seconded from WFP, UNICEF, UNHCR and UNDP. DHA had offices in both New York and Geneva. The New York office concentrated on policy issues pertaining to the international community's response to emergencies, monitored developments and acted as an early warning system, while the Geneva office was responsible for all matters relating to natural disasters, including relief mobilization, coordination and disaster mitigation. The secretariat of the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction (IDNDR) also became an integral part of DHA.

DHA launched initiatives to improve the system's preparedness, including the establishment of a Central Register of Disaster Management Capacities, two parts of which, namely the Directory of Emergency Response Officers and the Directory of International Search and Rescue Teams, were already in existence. The Register of Stockpiles of Disaster Relief Items and the Register of Disaster Management Expertise were being prepared. The Department was also establishing a register of stand-by capacity encompassing available resources, both inside and outside the United Nations system, to be drawn upon in cases of emergency. Discussions on the use of military and civil defence assets in sudden natural disasters were initiated and measures taken to strengthen the participation of other United Nations agencies in the activities of the DHA-UNDRO warehouse in Pisa (Italy). With respect to the relief-to-development continuum, DHA took steps to bring development and related financial organizations, including the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF), into the early stages of planning of humanitarian assistance, especially in the design of relief programmes, to ensure a smooth transition from relief to rehabilitation and long-term sustainable development.

The joint DHA-UNDP Disaster Management Training Programme was expanded to over 70 disaster-prone developing countries. Five regional and 17 country workshops were held in four developing regions. The programme received special contributions from States, totalling $2.75 million.

In reviewing emergency response activities, the Secretary-General indicated that DHA began to monitor world-wide developments to provide early warning and mobilize resources for effective and timely humanitarian responses to natural and man-made emergencies. During the first months of its operation, the Department addressed emergencies in Afghanistan, along the Bangladesh/Myanmar border, in Haiti, the Horn of Africa, Iraq, Kenya, Liberia, Mozambique, Nagorno-Karabakh, Somalia, the Sudan, Tajikistan and the former Yugoslavia. Its relief coordination activities were required in several natural disasters, and a major programme was put into place for the countries affected by the drought in southern Africa.

In his concluding observations, the Secretary-General noted that since its establishment DHA had addressed and coordinated the international community's response to an increasing number of acute emergencies. However, the earmarking of contributions for specific relief activities continued to limit the possibilities of a coherent humanitarian response to complex emergencies. Additional resources were essential if DHA's work was to be successfully accomplished. A major concern was the security and protection of staff in delivering humanitarian relief materials, and he advocated that all measures be taken to ensure their security. The Secretary-General observed that a notable feature in the humanitarian activities of the United Nations was the increased involvement of the Security Council, which had accorded humanitarian assistance high priority and had developed modalities to ensure the safe and effective delivery of relief assistance.

In July,⁽³⁾ the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly a report on UNDRO's activities in 1990-1991.⁽⁴⁾ By decision 47/437 of 18 December, the Assembly took note of the report.

Central Emergency Revolving Fund. CERF became operational on 22 May 1992, having reached its target of $50 million in pledges with contributions from 25 Member States. CERF's establishment had been called for by the General Assembly in 1991⁽¹⁾ to enable operational organizations to ensure prompt response to emergencies. By October, disbursements totalling some $11 million had been made.

Consolidated appeals. The process of consolidated appeals was employed to prepare and launch appeals describing the United Nations response to particular emergencies and identifying needed resources. Under the aegis of DHA, needs assessments were carried out and consolidated inter-agency appeals were launched in the following cases: the Consolidated United Nations/SADC Appeal for DESA; the Consolidated Appeal for Emergency Humanitarian Assistance for Afghanistan; the Special Consolidated United Nations Inter-Agency Appeal for Kenya; the Updated Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for SEPHA; the United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Programme of Action and Appeal for Former Yugoslavia; and the Inter-Agency Humanitarian Programme—Plan of Action for Iraq (1 July 1992-31 March 1993).

Inter-agency coordination. The Secretary-General stated that the Inter-Agency Standing Committee, envisaged by the Assembly in its 1991 resolution(1) as an important coordination tool, had become operational. UNHCR, UNICEF, WFP, UNDP, FAO and the World Health Organization (WHO) were participating in the Standing Committee, and the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies (IFRC) and the International Organization for Migration were associated with its work. Representatives of NGOs had been invited to participate on an ad hoc basis. An Inter-Agency Working Group had also been established for regular consultations at the middle-management level at Geneva.

The Ad Hoc Working Group on Early Warning of New Flows of Refugees and Displaced Persons of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) proposed the creation of an inter-agency consultative mechanism as a first step towards establishing an early warning system to assist the international community to deal more efficiently and effectively with situations that could result in new flows of refugees and displaced persons. The Working Group designated DHA as the focal point of the new mechanism, which was expected to begin functioning in 1993.

UNDP action. In response to a 1991 Governing Council decision,(5) the UNDP Administrator submitted a March report(6) on activities carried out under UNDP's Humanitarian Programme, established in 1991. A joint planning exercise between UNDP and UNHCR concerning returnee aid and development, with particular reference to the reintegration of returning refugees, was held in January 1992. UNDP and UNHCR signed, also in January, a Memorandum of Understanding to provide the framework for cooperation between the two organizations in repatriating and resettling displaced persons in Cambodia. The UNDP Office of Project Services developed special methods and capacity to design and execute projects for the Development Programme for Refugees, Returnees, and Displaced Persons in Central America, as well as for similar operations in Cambodia and Mozambique.

The Administrator, in his annual report for 1992,(7) stated that UNDP was attempting to bring to bear its multisectoral human development expertise to put in place rehabilitation and recovery measures. The measures were designed to give practical effect to the relief-to-development continuum, whose concept was to move as quickly as possible from emergency-phase activities through recovery and rehabilitation to resumed sustainable development. UNDP was developing procedures to allow for the rapid deployment of personnel, equipment and funds in response to emergencies while preserving accountability through a mechanism of ex post facto reporting.

On 26 May,(8) the Council encouraged the Administrator to work closely with DHA and the relevant United Nations relief organizations to enhance their coordinated approach to the continuum from relief to rehabilitation to reconstruction. The Council urged the Administrator to cooperate fully with the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs in formulating a detailed, comprehensive United Nations humanitarian assistance plan specifying the respective roles and outlining the comparative advantages of DHA, UNDP and other United Nations organs, in all aspects of humanitarian emergency-related assistance, including disaster prevention, preparedness and mitigation activities, refugee assistance and other elements within the continuum from relief to rehabilitation and development. It emphasized the need for UNDP to develop a clear strategy on linking emergency assistance and sustainable development. The Administrator was requested to develop further UNDP capacities to promote the transition from relief to development and to make rapid implementation of reintegration programmes, particularly quick impact projects, a priority objective in future humanitarian programmes. The Council approved the extension of UNDP's humanitarian programme, with approved staffing from the regular budget, to cover the balance of the 1992-1993 biennium.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/168 without vote.

22 December 1992 Meeting 93 Adopted without vote

Draft by New Zealand (A/47/L.51); agenda item 37.

Another draft resolution on strengthening the coordination of humanitarian emergency assistance,(9) submitted by Pakistan, was withdrawn.

Facilitation of the delivery of humanitarian assistance

In response to a 1990 General Assembly request,(10) the Secretary-General submitted an October report on humanitarian assistance to victims of natural disasters and similar emergency situations.(11) The report, based on informal meetings and questionnaires sent to Member States, United Nations agencies and NGOs, noted that, during discussions on improving the delivery of humanitarian assistance, the issue of access to victims of emergencies invariably came into opposition with the principle of sovereignty. Different viewpoints on that issue persisted among Governments and international and non-governmental organizations.

There was, however, overall agreement about the usefulness of relief corridors as a means to reach people trapped by armed conflicts and civil disturbances. Agreed upon by all parties to the conflict, corridors had been set up and successfully used in El Salvador, Ethiopia, Somalia, the Sudan and the former Yugoslavia.

The Secretary-General considered relief corridors an indispensable tool in the successful delivery of humanitarian assistance to conflict zones and recommended widening the concept whenever possible by seeking political solutions, including conflict-solving measures, as indicated by the Assembly in 1990.(10) Concerning the possible establishment of a list of persons and bodies with expert knowledge in emergency humanitarian assistance, he suggested that the creation of a detailed list might be extremely difficult, time-consuming and costly, with possible duplication of already existing rosters by operational agencies. However, to strengthen the capacity for immediate assessment at the onset of an emergency, DHA was studying the possibility of creating United Nations Disaster Assessment and Coordination (UNDAC) Stand-by Teams. Under the UNDAC concept, DHA-Geneva, in cooperation with national emergency relief services, would identify skilled and experienced persons, together with its regular staff, for a stand-by cadre forming a core group of UNDAC mission leaders. DHA had taken other initiatives, particularly the compilation of a Directory of International Search and Rescue Teams. It was also working on a project to prepare a register of stockpiles of disaster relief items available for international assistance.

New international humanitarian order

In response to a 1990 General Assembly resolution,(12) the Secretary-General submitted an August report(13) containing replies to his note verbale requesting views or information on the promotion of a new international humanitarian order and on the report of the Independent Commission on International Humanitarian Issues.(14) Replies were received from the Central African Republic, Ecuador, the Holy See, the Niger, Panama, the United Nations Subcommission on the Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, UNESCO, WHO and the United Nations Volunteers.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, adopted resolution 47/106 without vote.

Humanitarian assistance activities

Africa

Special Emergency Programme for the Horn of Africa

In an overview of emergencies and natural disasters in 1992, DHA reported that, despite a marked improvement in crop production in Ethiopia, Eritrea and the Sudan, improved security in Ethiopia and peace in Eritrea after 25 years of warfare, the situation in the region was still critical due to continuing civil conflict in southern Sudan and the deteriorating situation in Somalia. The effects of the conflict in Somalia spilled across borders into the neighbouring countries of Djibouti, Ethiopia and Kenya. They included large numbers of refugees and significant security problems.

Humanitarian efforts in the Sudan focused mainly on those affected by drought and by the civil war in the south. In Ethiopia, the United Nations used a cross-mandate approach for a mixed population of refugees from Somalia and Ethiopians affected by local conflicts. Although Eritrea's 1992 harvest was the best in years, it was only sufficient to meet half the country's food needs. In Djibouti, major humanitarian assistance needs arose from the problems in Somalia and from its own internal conflicts. A major component of humanitarian assistance in Kenya was for drought relief, but the country also hosted hundreds of thousands of refugees from Somalia.

On 28 January, the Secretary-General issued a Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for the Horn of Africa, which received pledges of almost $576 million against identified needs of $621 million. On 11 June, Kenya requested the United Nations to bring the plight of drought-affected Kenyans and of refugees from Ethiopia, Somalia and the Sudan to the attention of the international community. In response, a Special Consolidated United Nations Inter-Agency Appeal for Kenya was launched, pending an update of the Horn of Africa appeal. A revised appeal, which subsumed the Kenya appeal, was issued on 15 July.

A November 1992 situation report by DHA on the six countries of the Horn of Africa that were included in the Special Emergency Programme for the Horn of Africa (SEPHA) appeal process—Djibouti, Ethiopia, Eritrea, Kenya, Somalia and the Sudan—stated that, against revised 1992 requirements of $1.15 billion, $788 million or almost 70 per cent had been pledged by donors during the first 10 months of the year. Among United Nations agencies, WFP received pledges covering 78 per cent of its total requests under SEPHA. UNHCR also received strong donor response, while response to other agencies and in the non-food sector was less strong.

On 27 April,(1) Ethiopia transmitted to the Secretary-General the Declaration, Framework of Cooperation and Programme of Action adopted at the summit of heads of State and Government of the countries of the Horn of Africa (Addis Ababa, 8 and 9 April), which, inter alia, pledged assurance of access by impartial humanitarian organizations to civilian populations, to comply fully with international humanitarian law and to cooperate with the international community in the field of humanitarian assistance.

UNDP action. In response to a 1991 Governing Council request,(2) the UNDP Administrator submitted a report on UNDP's role in assisting Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya, Somalia, the Sudan and Yemen.(3)

The Administrator described action by UNDP and other United Nations organizations to coordinate assistance in the region, noting that his Senior Adviser for Humanitarian Affairs was leading the SEPHA unit in the United Nations Secretariat. He also outlined the level and forms of assistance provided to the countries of the region by UNDP.

On 14 February,(4) the Council requested the Administrator to present proposals in 1993 for future funding of the new liaison office, established to provide logistical support to Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya, Somalia, the Sudan and Yemen.

Angola

In response to a 1991 General Assembly request,(5) the Secretary-General submitted an October report on international assistance for the economic rehabilitation of Angola.(6) The report provided information on assistance to the peace process, the Special Relief Programme for Angola (SRPA), repatriation of refugees, the regional drought emergency, plans for progress from emergency to rehabilitation and assistance by the United Nations system, Member States and other donors. The Secretary-General stated that the 1991 signing of the Peace Accord(7) by the Government of Angola and the União Nacional para la Independência Total de Angola enabled the United Nations to assist Angola in the peace process, the movement towards democracy, the expansion of emergency relief activities and planning of resettlement and rehabilitation programmes.

The mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission (UNAVEM II) included the observation and verification of elections (see PART TWO, Chapter I). The Secretary-General appointed a Special Representative to head UNAVEM II, who was responsible for coordinating all United Nations operations relating to the peace process and the holding of elections in September. UNDP assisted in the electoral process through a technical team in Luanda. Further United Nations support was given through the programme of assistance to soldiers and families awaiting demobilization, for which an appeal for $27 million had been launched in October 1991. WFP responded quickly to the critical situation in the assembly areas by using emergency food resources to feed cantoned soldiers, while UNICEF supplied non-food items, such as bed sheets, tents, family kits, hoes, machetes and seeds.

SRPA's second phase (SRPA-II), launched by the Secretary-General in December 1991, emphasized long-range rehabilitation of infrastructure and basic services. Its main objectives were the reintegration of 1.4 million persons affected by the war; assistance to abandoned children and disabled persons; improvement of basic services, including water and sanitation; and the extension of immunization coverage throughout the country. Against a total appeal of $167 million, only $58 million had been pledged through mid-July.

WFP programmed 64,800 tons of food aid for internally displaced persons and Angolan returnees at a cost of $36.6 million and also supplied 21,300 tons of food to 250,000 demobilized Angolan troops and their families at a cost of $11 million.

By the end of August, some 77,500 Angolan refugees had returned. A UNHCR appeal for international assistance to carry out an organized programme of repatriation was launched in June, with the greater part of the requested $55.3 million to be spent in Angola. Transit centres with shelter and sanitation facilities were established in northern and eastern Angola. Additionally, Angola was affected in 1992 by the drought emergency in southern Africa (see below, under "Disasters"), the consolidated appeal for which collected $30 million of the $81 million sought for Angola. While that provided further evidence of the international community's support for Angola, it was clear that the most vital needs of the affected population were still not being adequately addressed.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 47/164 without vote.

International assistance for the economic rehabilitation of Angola

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 46/142 of 17 December 1991, 45/233 of 21 December 1990 and 44/168 of 15 December 1989 on international assistance for the economic rehabilitation of Angola, cial assistance necessary for the economic rehabilitation of Angola;

5. Request the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the international community, to continue to mobilize organizations and organs of the United Nations system in order to ensure an appropriate level of economic assistance for Angola;

Liberia

In response to a 1991 General Assembly request,(8) the Secretary-General submitted an October report on emergency assistance for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Liberia.(9) The report described emergency assistance activities being carried out by the United Nations system in response to Liberia's civil conflict. It also outlined efforts by seven Member States (Canada, Denmark, Germany, Japan, Norway, Saudi Arabia and Sweden) to assist Liberia.

The Office of the United Nations Special Coordinator for Emergency Relief Operations in Liberia (UNSCOL), based at Monrovia, coordinated all institutional and operational arrangements for relief programmes and other humanitarian activities. The Office included representatives of UNICEF, UNDP, WFP, UNHCR, FAO and WHO.

Four United Nations operational centres were opened in strategic rural areas to enhance the delivery capacity of the organizations concerned, and a viable country-wide emergency assistance programme was instituted. Nevertheless, security and logistical problems continued to hamper relief operations. The renewal of armed hostilities in August hindered relief work in affected areas and gave rise to new mass displacements.

Some 115,000 Sierra Leonean refugees fled to the western Liberia border counties, to which UNHCR responded with an emergency assistance programme of $2.5 million covering July to December 1992. A further 20,000 to 25,000 displaced persons arrived in Monrovia in late August, including 5,000 Sierra Leonean refugees, adding to a population of 4,000 refugees from Sierra Leone already in Monrovia.

For the period December 1990 to September 1992, UNSCOL recorded contributions totalling $102 million against appeal targets of $149.9 million. Food aid requirements identified in the appeals of the Secretary-General totalled $86.6 million, against which $64.8 million was pledged. In April, the first lot of 500 metric tons of rice was sold under an experimental pilot monetization scheme intending to wean the population from total emergency food aid dependency and help revitalize the commercial market. In May, the WFP Committee on Food Aid Policies and Programmes approved the extension of food aid deliveries under a protracted refugee operation, with a total value of $170 million, covering 1993. The Global Information and Early Warning System on Food and Agriculture continued its intensive monitoring of the food supply situation.

The health situation in Liberia remained alarming with a high incidence of disease, especially among women and children. With UNICEF and WHO as lead agencies, United Nations emergency intervention in the health and medical sector was both extensive and multifaceted, ranging from supporting vaccination campaigns, and a major field hospital to providing essential drugs and medical equipment to NGO partners working the interior. WHO planned to continue its programme of data collection and prevention and treatment of communicable and non-communicable diseases, costing $200,000, plus a separate component of $300,000 to prevent the spread of the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV).

Educational efforts resulted in a gradual increase of school enrolment, reaching 70 per cent of the pre-war level in greater Monrovia and 28 per cent in the country as a whole. The Special Emergency Life Food (SELF) community structure, established in Monrovia, developed a unique housing enumeration scheme which provided the basis for general food distribution and other community-based rehabilitation programmes. SELF was also being used for health and education programmes, reception of returnees, school feeding, food-for-work and vulnerable group programmes.

In his annual report for 1992,(10) the Administrator stated that UNDP provided emergency assistance to 40,000 displaced persons in Liberia, undertook an assessment of needs to be addressed and provided logistical support to deploy relief supplies and equipment. A main concern of UNDP was to facilitate the transition from relief to rehabilitation and reconstruction, and eventually to normal development activities. Such efforts ranged from distribution of agricultural seeds and tools to promotion of local NGOs, both in an immediate relief role and in larger post-relief activities.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 47/154 without vote.

Assistance for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Liberia

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 45/232 of 21 December 1990 and 46/147 of 17 December 1991,

Recalling also the statement of the Security Council of 7 May 1992 on the situation in Liberia, in which the Council indicated, inter alia, indicated that the Yamoussoukro Accord of 30 October 1991 offered the best possible framework for a peaceful resolution of the Liberian conflict by creating the necessary conditions for free and fair elections in Liberia, and called on all parties to the conflict to respect and implement the various accords of the peace process, including refraining from actions that endangered the security of the neighbouring States,^a

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General, Noting that, even though a viable country-wide emergency assistance programme has been instituted, security and logistical problems continue to hamper relief operations and have prevented the transition from emergency relief to reconstruction and development,

Noting with deep concern the devastating effects of the protracted conflict on the socio-economic conditions in Liberia and the urgent need to rehabilitate, in an atmosphere of peace and stability, basic sectors of the country in order to restore normalcy,

Recalling the agreement reached at the fourth meeting of the Committee of Five on the Liberian crisis and other members of the Standing Mediation Committee of the Economic Community of West African States, held at Yamoussoukro on 29 and 30 October 1991, on the immediate demobilization of combatants and the holding of democratic elections,^b

Noting the recent decision of the Authority of Heads of State and Government of the Economic Community of West African States at its fifteenth session, regarding the imposition of comprehensive sanctions against any of the parties failing to implement fully the Yamoussoukro Accord,

1. Expresses its gratitude to the States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations that have responded and continue to respond to appeals by the Government of Liberia, as well as to appeals by the Secretary-General for emergency and other assistance;

2. Expresses its gratitude to the Secretary-General for his efforts in mobilizing the international community, the United Nations system and other organizations to provide emergency assistance to Liberia, and urges that such assistance be continued, as necessary;

3. Calls upon the international community and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to continue to provide Liberia with technical, financial and other assistance for the repatriation and resettlement of Liberian refugees, returnees and displaced persons and for the rehabilitation of combatants, which constitute important elements for facilitating the holding of democratic elections in Liberia;

4. Appeals to the international community and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to provide adequate assistance to programmes and projects identified in the report of the Secretary-General;

5. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) To continue his efforts to coordinate the work of the United Nations system and to mobilize financial, technical and other assistance for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Liberia;

(b) To undertake, when conditions permit, in close collaboration with the authorities of Liberia, an overall assessment of needs, with the objective of holding, when appropriate, a round-table conference of donors for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Liberia;

6. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Mozambique

In response to a 1990 General Assembly request,⁽¹¹⁾ the Secretary-General submitted an October report,⁽¹²⁾ prepared in consultation with the Government of Mozambique, on the implementation of the emergency and rehabilitation programmes for that country. The report documented the role of the United Nations in support of Mozambique emergency programmes; emergency requirements for 1992-1993; international support for the 1990-1991 and 1991-1992 periods; global development assistance to Mozambique; and assistance rendered by United Nations organizations and by 11 Member States.

Immediately following the October signing of the General Peace Agreement for Mozambique⁽¹³⁾ (see PART TWO, Chapter I), a DHA mission was dispatched to establish a comprehensive mechanism to ensure a more effective response to the emergency situation in the light of new realities. The Secretary-General appointed an interim Special Representative and dispatched a team of military advisers to Mozambique. In addition to the war having stripped the country of much of its economic and social infrastructure, severely constricting the Government's already limited capacity to respond quickly and effectively to the emergency situation, Mozambique was also affected by the drought in the region (see below). Simultaneously with the joint United Nations/SADC appeal for the drought emergency in southern Africa, an appeal was launched at Maputo presenting the priority requirements for the internally displaced and the drought-affected populations.

Emergency assistance for 1992-1993 was estimated at more than $400 million. The total number of persons in need of direct support in 1992-1993 was 3.1 million. In April 1992, estimates of total food aid needs were 1.3 million tons for the 1992-1993 period. WFP assistance amounted to $57.4 million in food aid and logistics support, of which $28.2 million was used to support primary education and the forestry sector and $39.2 million for emergency feeding of displaced people. In response to the joint United Nations/SADC appeal, WFP would provide additional food aid assistance and internal transportation costs valued at $71 million for the crop year 1992/93.

Health sector requirements for 1991-1992 were valued at $6.1 million, of which $5.5 million, or 68 per cent, had been pledged. Emergency health services were integrated within the national health system and donor support was allocated through bilateral agreements and ongoing development assistance, with UNICEF and WHO being among the main channels of support.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 9 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 47/42 without vote.

Assistance to Mozambique

The General Assembly,

Recalling Security Council resolution 386(1976) of 17 March 1976 and taking note of Council resolution 782(1992) of 13 October 1992,

Recalling also its relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 45/227 of 21 December 1990, in which it urged the international community to respond effectively and generously to the call for assistance to Mozambique,

Reaffirming the principles for humanitarian assistance contained in the annex to its resolution 46/182 of 19 December 1991,

Noting the signing at Rome, on 16 July 1992, of the Declaration on Guiding Principles for Humanitarian Assistance, which permits the expansion of relief programmes to cover all affected people in Mozambique, and urging all parties concerned to implement the Declaration,

Welcoming the signing at Rome, on 4 October 1992, of the General Peace Agreement for Mozambique, whose main goals are the establishment of lasting peace, the enhancement of democracy and the promotion of national reconciliation in that country,

Stressing the need for a sustained effort by the international community to respond to the increasing and urgent emergency humanitarian needs of the people of Mozambique, in the light of the current severe drought and the evolving process of repatriation of refugees and normalization of the lives of displaced persons,

Stressing also that a proper response to the current situation in Mozambique requires substantial international assistance in a comprehensive and integrated manner, linking emergency relief aid with additional rehabilitation and development assistance,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General and the relevant organizations of the United Nations system for the measures taken to organize international assistance programmes for Mozambique;

3. Expresses its gratitude to all States and regional, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations that have rendered assistance to Mozambique;

4. Expresses its satisfaction at the entry into force, on 15 October 1992, of the General Peace Agreement for Mozambique, in particular the cease-fire, which creates favourable conditions for the implementation of programmes of economic and social rehabilitation and the overall process of national reconstruction;

5. Urges the international community, in particular the United Nations system, to extend its full support and contribute to the peace-building process in Mozambique in accordance with the General Peace Agreement, providing, inter alia, assistance for the electoral process, emergency and rehabilitation assistance for refugees and displaced persons and support for programmes of demobilization of armed forces;

6. Also urges the international community, in the context of paragraph 5 above, to support and participate actively in the forthcoming conference of donor countries and organizations, to be held at Rome on 15 and 16 December 1992;

7. Notes with appreciation the establishment, in Mozambique, of a Committee on Humanitarian Assistance, with the participation of the United Nations, and the formulation of a unified plan for the delivery of relief assistance throughout the country;

8. Draws the attention of the international community to the unmet funding needs referred to in the 1992/93 Emergency Programme for Mozambique and the United Nations/Southern Africa Development Community Consolidated Appeal for the Drought Emergency in Southern Africa;

9. Calls upon all States, regional and interregional organizations, other intergovernmental organizations and international non-governmental organizations to intensify their development cooperation and assistance in support of the process of national reconstruction of Mozambique;

10. Requests the Secretary-General, in close cooperation with the Government of Mozambique:

(a) To continue his efforts to mobilize the international assistance required by Mozambique;

(b) To ensure the coordination of the work of the United Nations system for an adequate response to the emergency, rehabilitation and development needs of Mozambique;

(c) To prepare a report on assistance to Mozambique for submission to the General Assembly at its forty-ninth session.

Somalia

In accordance with a 1991 General Assembly request (14) the Secretary-General submitted an October report on emergency assistance for humanitarian relief and the economic and social rehabilitation of Somalia.⁽¹⁵⁾ The report contained information on the impact of the crisis, initiatives taken by the United Nations for emergency relief and rehabilitation, progress achieved and assistance by 12 Member States and the United Nations system.

In the 22 months since the overthrow of the Government, the situation in Somalia had continued to deteriorate. Almost 4.5 million people were threatened by severe malnutrition and related diseases. Of those, at least 1.5 million were at immediate mortal risk, with 300,000 people having already died since November 1991. No functioning government existed in most parts of the country and inter- and intra-clan violence abounded. The power struggle hampered the delivery of vitally needed humanitarian assistance and increasingly threatened relief workers.

Despite a situation which for most of the year bordered on anarchy, ICRC and a determined band of NGOs had maintained a continuous presence, principally at Mogadishu and Hargeisa. UNICEF re-established its presence in Mogadishu on 24 December 1991, while WFP re-established its operations in March 1992. Deliveries of humanitarian assistance were subject to extensive theft and looting, with relief workers labouring under extremely hazardous conditions. The breakdown in law and order had resulted in the deaths of many local and expatriate relief staff.

United Nations initiative for emergency relief and rehabilitation

In March, following a series of meetings in Mogadishu and New York, the United Nations successfully negotiated a cease-fire between the two factions contesting Mogadishu, making it possible for humanitarian assistance to reach both sides of the divided city. In May, it negotiated and established a vital route along the beach for convoys to pick up food from the port. On 18 March, the Secretary-General appointed a United Nations Coordinator for Humanitarian Assistance for Somalia. The Security Council, in April (see PART TWO, Chapter I), approved deployment of a 50-member observer force to monitor the cease-fire; agreed to the deployment of a 500-member security force to protect relief goods and personnel; and endorsed a 90-Day Plan of Action for Emergency Humanitarian Assistance to Somalia, as proposed by a technical mission that had visited the country. Those elements were brought under the aegis of the United Nations Operation in Somalia (UNOSOM), and the Secretary-General appointed a Special Representative for Somalia to provide overall direction of United Nations activities and assist in promoting peace and national reconciliation. The 50 military observers were deployed in July and August, while the 500-member security force arrived at Mogadishu in September.

A United Nations technical team visited Somalia from 6 to 15 August to examine ways to expand UNOSOM's scope and effectiveness. On the basis of the team's findings, the Secretary-General recommended to the Security Council⁽¹⁶⁾ a substantial increase in airlift operations; the establishment of a preventive zone on the Kenya-Somalia border for special deliveries of food and seed to reduce famine-induced population movements; deployment of four additional security units of up to 750 persons each in different parts of the country; and the establishment of four UNOSOM zone headquarters headed by civilian officials as the operational basis for a comprehensive approach to the Somali problem. By resolution 775(1992) of 28 August, the Security Council endorsed those proposals and called on all parties, movements and factions to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General. Earlier, in resolution 767(1992) of 27 July, the Council had asserted that, in the absence of cooperation of the parties concerning deployment of United Nations security personnel, other measures to deliver humanitarian assistance to Somalia were not excluded.

100-day Action Programme for Somalia

The Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs led a high-level inter-agency mission, including high-level officials of FAO, UNDP, UNHCR, UNICEF, WFP and WHO, to Somalia from 10 to 12 September, meeting with political leaders, clan elders, ICRC, NGOs and United Nations relief workers. A major outcome of the mission was the decision to develop the 100-day Action Programme for Accelerated Humanitarian Assistance for Somalia, covering the period until the end of 1992. The Programme was drafted and refined through a collaborative process involving United Nations agencies, NGOs and other entities and reviewed at a coordination meeting on humanitarian assistance for Somalia (Geneva, 12 and 13 October). The Programme's priority actions included: massive infusion of food aid; expansion of supplementary feeding; provision of basic health services and a mass immunization campaign; urgent provision of clean water, sanitation and hygiene and of shelter material, including blankets and clothes; simultaneous delivery of seeds, tools and animal vaccines with food rations; prevention of further refugee outflows and displacements and initiation of returnee programmes; and promotion of rebuilding of civil society and local institutions, economic and social recovery and rehabilitation.

Resources of up to $83 million were required to implement the Programme, which called for some 50,000 metric tons of food per month to be delivered and distributed in Somalia.

In a December review of the 100-day Action Programme, DHA noted that deaths from starvation had been substantially reduced in most of the worst-affected famine areas, but remained, overall, at unacceptably high levels. The response from the donor community had been prompt and generous: of the $83 million requested under the Programme, $53 million was either received or pledged by early December. While food requirements were fully resourced, in some sectors underfunding or slow honouring of pledges prevented the start of activities.

A follow-up meeting to review the 100-day Action Programme was held at Addis Ababa from 3 to 5 December. Participants discussed constraints in the Programme's implementation and how to enhance collaboration between the international community and Somali society. They accepted the importance of deploying humanitarian protection forces and recommended that the focus of the forces should be on protecting key installation gateways to Somalia, including airports and overland delivery routes, the delivery process, international and Somali aid workers and their facilities and the beneficiaries of relief assistance. They recognized that the Programme's original targets needed to be reassessed, assistance to Somalia's north needed to be stepped up and, in addition to food aid, greater efforts should be made on monetization of food to stimulate the economy and encourage local food production.

In a 29 October statement to the Second Committee,⁽¹⁷⁾ the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs said he was convinced of the great need for urgent action in Somalia. He expressed appreciation to the World Bank for a grant of $20 million for the Somali people.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 47/160 without vote.

Emergency assistance for humanitarian relief and the economic and social rehabilitation of Somalia

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 43/206 of 20 December 1988, 44/178 of 19 December 1989, 45/229 of 21 December 1990 and 46/176 of 19 December 1991 and the resolutions and decisions of the Economic and Social Council on emergency assistance to Somalia,

Taking note of Security Council resolutions 733(1992) of 23 January 1992, 746(1992) of 17 March 1992, 751(1992) of 24 April 1992, 767(1992) of 27 July 1992 and 775(1992) of 28 August 1992, in which the Council, inter alia, urged all parties, movements and factions in Somalia to facilitate the efforts of the United Nations, its specialized agencies and humanitarian organizations to provide urgent humanitarian assistance to the affected population in Somalia and reiterated the call for the full respect of the security and safety of the personnel of those organizations and the guarantee of their complete freedom of movement in and around Mogadishu and other parts of Somalia,

Noting with appreciation the cooperation between the United Nations, the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States and the Organization of the Islamic Conference in their efforts to resolve the humanitarian, security and political crisis in Somalia,

Noting the efforts of the countries of the Horn of Africa and the countries of the Non-Aligned Movement to alleviate the situation in Somalia,

Noting with appreciation the measure taken by the Secretary-General to mobilize international assistance for Somalia,

Deeply concerned at the magnitude of human suffering in Somalia, the extensive damage to and destruction of villages, towns and cities, the heavy damage inflicted by the civil conflict on the infrastructure of the country and the widespread disruption of public facilities and services,

Gravely concerned about the continually deteriorating situation in Somalia, which underlines the urgent need for the accelerated delivery of adequate humanitarian assistance to all parts of the country,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on emergency assistance to Somalia and the statement made before the Second Committee of the General Assembly on 29 October 1992 by the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs on special economic and disaster relief assistance,

Deeply appreciative of the humanitarian assistance rendered by a number of Member States to alleviate the hardship and suffering of the affected population,

Recalling the principle enunciated in the annex to its resolution 46/182 of 19 December 1991, which states that contributions for humanitarian assistance should be provided in a way that is not to the detriment of resources made available for international cooperation for development,

Noting the importance of the four operational zones for more effective humanitarian and relief assistance under current conditions in the country,

Noting with great satisfaction the humanitarian efforts being made by the various entities of the United Nations system and by intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations,

Noting with concern the disastrous impact that the conflict is having on the educational system of the country and the total disruption of schooling for all students at the primary, secondary and university levels,

Recognizing the importance of rehabilitating the basic social and economic services at the local level in all operational zones,

Cognizant that the exodus and displacement of skilled and professional manpower is eliminating the human resources of the country, which are much needed for rehabilitation, reconstruction and development,

Welcoming the policy initiatives taken by some Member States in providing educational assistance and scholarships to eligible Somali asylum seekers,

Further recognizing that emergency assistance must be provided in ways that will be supportive of recovery and long-term development,

1. Expresses its gratitude to the Member States and the intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations that have responded to the appeals of the Secretary-General and others by extending emergency assistance to Somalia;

2. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for the measures taken to mobilize emergency assistance to the affected population in Somalia;

7. Appeals to all States and relevant intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to provide financial and material assistance for the reopening of primary and secondary schools in those areas where conditions permit;

8. Decides to establish, through extrabudgetary resources, a United Nations scholarship programme for Somali undergraduate university students whose studies have been disrupted by the ongoing civil strife, so as to enable them to complete their studies at higher institutes and universities abroad and thus enhance the human resource capacity of Somalia, and to review the situation when the Somali university and higher institutes re-open, and urges Member States and relevant intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to contribute to this programme;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure, within existing regular budgetary resources, that information about the scholarships that have been offered will be disseminated to those Somali students, within and outside Somalia, who might qualify for such scholarships;

10. Urges the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system concerned, in particular the United Nations Development Programme, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the United Nations Children's Fund, the World Health Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the World Food Programme, the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements and the United Nations Environment Programme, to continue to implement their assistance programmes in their respective fields of competence, within the framework of the United Nations Operation in Somalia, on the most urgent basis, in order to alleviate the suffering of the affected population in all parts of Somalia;

11. Appeals to all parties concerned to terminate hostilities and to engage in a national reconciliation process that will lead to the re-establishment of peace, order and stability and also facilitate relief and rehabilitation efforts;

12. Calls upon the Secretary-General to continue to mobilize international humanitarian assistance for Somalia;

13. Calls upon all parties, movements and factions in Somalia to respect fully the security and safety of personnel of the United Nations and its specialized agencies and of non-governmental organizations, and to guarantee their complete freedom of movement throughout Somalia;

14. Requests the Secretary-General, in view of the critical situation in Somalia, to take all measures necessary for the implementation of the present resolution, to apprise the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1993 of the progress made and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session.

Sudan

In response to a 1991 General Assembly request,(18) the Secretary-General submitted an October report on emergency assistance to the Sudan and Operation Lifeline Sudan.(19) The report reviewed the situation in the Sudan and the implementation of emergency operations. It also described the refugee situation; relief food and non-food assistance; and action taken by eight Member States (Denmark, Germany, Indonesia, Norway, Poland, the Republic of Korea, Sweden and Turkey) and by United Nations organizations. The report stated that the plight of those affected by drought, civil conflict and displacement had worsened. The overall food supply situation remained extremely difficult and in some areas critical. FAO reported that rainfall was average to above average through most of the Sudan with prospects of a good harvest. However, ongoing conflict in southern Sudan still precluded normal agricultural activity.

The situation for the increasing numbers of newly displaced people, returnees and other war-affected people had become desperate. An FAO/WFP assessment had indicated that some 5.2 million drought-affected persons and 1.9 million displaced persons would need assistance in 1992.

Emergency requirements, including those under Operation Lifeline Sudan,(20) were reflected in the Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeals for the Horn of Africa (see above). Urgent requirements identified in those appeals totalled $281.5 million. After the arrival of 270,000 returnees to the Sobat basin and Pochalla in June, Operation Lifeline Sudan committed almost all its resources to assisting them. With significant NGO collaboration, basic services, including deliveries of WFP food supplies by airlift, were provided. The southern operations of Operation Lifeline Sudan expanded in the 12 months before January 1992. However, by mid-June, the Operation's international presence in southern areas had been reduced because of lack of security or inaccessibility. United Nations flights, which were suspended for two months because of lack of clearance by all parties concerned, resumed to certain locations in June. All relief activities in the Bor-Kongor area were suspended in September when two UNICEF staff members, an NGO worker and a journalist were killed there while on mission.

The late arrival of food donated to the 1992 relief operation constrained WFP and NGO ability to pre-position food in affected areas early in 1992. It was not until May that the first ship arrived in Port Sudan carrying 1992 food aid.

The United Nations and NGOs also provided emergency assistance to displaced persons and squatters relocated by the Government of the Sudan. A World Bank-funded Khartoum structure plan was developed, which outlined viable actions Government authorities should take regarding the displaced and squatter problem. In addition, the United Nations developed medium-term and long-term proposals, including a project to improve urban management.

The Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs held high-level discussions with the Government of the Sudan between 13 and 16 September on means to improve the delivery of humanitarian assistance. In a joint statement of 16 September,(21) the Sudan and the United Nations reaffirmed the critical importance of access to all people in need of humanitarian assistance, respect for the neutrality of relief operations and the fundamental necessity for transparency. Agreement was also reached on the use of corridors for prompt delivery and distribution of humanitarian assistance, efforts to facilitate procedures so as to expedite the entry, travel and work of NGOs, the need to support the voluntary return of Sudanese refugees, repatriation and reuniting of unaccompanied minors with their families, mobilization of resources to support the transition to recovery, rehabilitation and development, and the appointment of a Special Emissary for follow-up with the Government of the Sudan.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 47/162 without vote.

Emergency assistance to the Sudan

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 43/8 of 18 October 1988, 43/52 of 6 December 1988, 44/12 of 24 October 1989, 45/226 of 21 December 1990 and 46/178 of 19 December 1991 on assistance to the Sudan,

Taking note of the Declaration, Framework of Cooperation, and Programme of Action, adopted at the Summit of the Heads of State and Government of the countries of the Horn of Africa, held at Addis Ababa on 8 and 9 April 1992, and the principles embodied therein,

Noting with deep concern the continuing negative impact of armed conflict on the socio-economic infrastructure of the Sudan and the displacement of a large number of persons,

Noting with satisfaction the projected increase in cereal production in the Sudanese harvest for 1992/93, which should first be used to meet the needs of the people,

Recognizing, however, that there continues to be a need in the Sudan for strong and continued international solidarity and humanitarian support as a complement to its own efforts to meet its urgent needs in 1993,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General,

1. Notes the agreement between the Government of the Sudan and the United Nations, as reflected in the joint statement issued on 16 September 1992 during the visit of the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs to Khartoum, and calls upon all parties to adhere to this agreement;

2. Expresses its deep gratitude and appreciation to the States and the intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations that are providing assistance to the country in the context of the Sudan Emergency Operation and Operation Lifeline Sudan;

3. Expresses its full appreciation to the Secretary-General and the organizations of the United Nations system for their efforts to coordinate and mobilize resources and support for the Sudan Emergency Operation and Operation Lifeline Sudan and requests them to continue these efforts;

4. Calls upon the international community to continue to contribute generously to the emergency needs of the country, especially in the areas of supplementary feeding, non-food items, storage, transportation and emergency recovery;

5. Appeals to all parties concerned to pursue dialogue and negotiations and to terminate hostilities to allow for the re-establishment of peace, order and stability and also to facilitate relief efforts;

6. Stresses the importance of assuring safe access for personnel providing relief assistance to all in need;

7. Urges all parties involved to offer all feasible assistance, including facilitating the movement of relief supplies and personnel, to guarantee maximum success of the Sudan Emergency Operation in all parts of the country;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to assess the emergency situation in the Sudan and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session.

Asia

Afghanistan

In response to a 1991 General Assembly request,(22) the Secretary-General submitted a November report on the situation in Afghanistan.(23) In addition to reviewing his efforts and those of his Personal Representative in Afghanistan and Pakistan towards a comprehensive political settlement (see PART TWO, Chapter III), the report also discussed the humanitarian activities of the United Nations system, coordinated by the United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian and Economic Assistance Programmes Relating to Afghanistan (UNOCA).

The Secretary-General observed that 14 years of war had resulted in more than 1 million people dead, 2 million disabled, tens of thousands of orphans and widows, over 5 million refugees and more than 2 million internally displaced persons in a country that had been subjected to total devastation. Afghanistan, one of the least developed countries even before its destructive war, faced an emergency of immense proportions, compounded by the huge number of returning refugees.

To address the severe humanitarian situation, UNOCA had issued in November 1991 the Operation Salam Programme for 1992, with a proposed budget of $133.7 million. On 6 April 1992, in response to the deteriorating situation in Kabul, the Secretary-General appealed to the international community for 30,000 tons of emergency food assistance. Based on the report of a UNOCA-led inter-agency assessment mission, which visited Afghanistan from 11 to 15 May to identify emergency humanitarian needs, the Secretary-General launched, on 5 June, a Consolidated Appeal for Emergency Humanitarian Assistance for Afghanistan, requesting $180 million for the period 1 June to 31 December 1992, including $76 million representing the shortfall in funding for the Operation Salam Programme, 1992. The Appeal's main sectors comprised food aid ($45.1 million); voluntary repatriation ($52.8 million); health, including water supply and sanitation ($30.6 million); and mine clearance ($15 million). As at 30 October, Governments had pledged or contributed $59.2 million towards the $180 million sought.

Continued hostilities in Kabul during July and August resulted in further large-scale destruction and death. On 25 August, the Secretary-General's Personal Representative issued a Note on Immediate Needs in Afghanistan, which requested $10 million, within the context of the 5 June Consolidated Appeal, for urgent relief necessitated by the Kabul hostilities. The Note was presented to the donor community in Geneva, Islamabad and New York.

Following discussions with the authorities during a visit to Kabul on 21 October, the Personal Representative, on 1 November, issued a Note on Emergency Winter Needs for Afghanistan, seeking a further $17.6 million for winter programmes within the context of the 5 June Appeal.

Meanwhile, the change of Government in April, accompanied by the cessation of hostilities in most areas outside Kabul, led to an enormous increase in voluntary refugee repatriations from both Iran and Pakistan. By the end of October, over 1.2 million people had benefited from a UNHCR/WFP repatriation grant programme. A UNOCA-executed mine-clearance programme provided basic mine-awareness training and actual mine clearance. The 5 June Consolidated Appeal had requested $15 million for this essential programme, against which only $5.8 million was pledged. On 2 and 3 September, floods caused by heavy rainfall in the Hindu Kush mountains inundated villages, killing many and destroying houses and agricultural land. A United Nations team immediately proceeded to the area to assess the damage and deliver emergency food and medical and shelter supplies. DHA received pledges totalling $180,000 towards the relief effort.

The Secretary-General regretted that the response to the 5 June Consolidated Appeal had been far from satisfactory, and cautioned that unless needs could be adequately and effectively addressed in the early stages, the possibilities for overcoming Afghanistan's humanitarian emergency in the foreseeable future would be limited.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December 1992, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/119 without vote.

Emergency international assistance for the reconstruction of war-stricken Afghanistan

The General Assembly,

Noting that the establishment of the Islamic State in Afghanistan provides a new opportunity for reconstruction of the country,

Wishing the people of Afghanistan peace and prosperity,

Expressing the hope that the Islamic State will continue its efforts towards further stabilization of the security situation in the country, so as to contribute to the safe delivery of international aid,

Deeply concerned about the massive destruction of properties and the serious damage to the economic and social infrastructure of Afghanistan caused by the fourteen years of war,

Underlining the importance of the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Afghanistan for the prosperity of its people, who have suffered many hardships during fourteen years of war and devastation and who have lost the chance for development throughout the conflict,

Aware that Afghanistan continues to suffer from an extremely critical economic situation as a land-locked and least developed country,

Thanking all Governments that have rendered assistance to Afghan refugees, in particular the Governments of Pakistan and the Islamic Republic of Iran, and recognizing the need for international assistance for the repatriation and resettlement of refugees and internally displaced persons,

4. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) To ensure the continued operation and further strengthening of "humanitarian and economic assistance programmes relating to Afghanistan";

(b) To dispatch, as soon as possible, a team of experts to Afghanistan to evaluate the situation in the light of the war damage and destruction and to prepare a comprehensive report, in cooperation with the Government of Afghanistan, on requirements for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of the country;

(c) To initiate a plan for mobilizing financial, technical and material assistance, including the convening of a conference of donor States and international financial institutions;

5. Also appeals to all Member States, in particular donor countries, to provide emergency financial assistance to the Afghanistan Emergency Trust Fund established in August 1988 and to consolidated appeals by the Secretary-General for emergency humanitarian assistance for Afghanistan;

6. Invites the international financial institutions and specialized agencies, organizations and programmes of the United Nations system, where appropriate, to bring the special needs of the Islamic State of Afghanistan to the attention of their respective governing bodies for their consideration and to report on the decisions of those bodies to the Secretary-General;

7. Invites the Secretary-General to continue to monitor the overall situation in Afghanistan and make available his good offices as required and to report to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session on the progress made in the implementation of the present resolution;

9. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-eighth session the item entitled "Emergency international assistance for the reconstruction of war-stricken Afghanistan".

Gulf Task Force

The UNDP Administrator submitted to the Governing Council a report giving an overview of proposals for the socio-economic and environmental recovery of countries affected by the Persian Gulf crisis of 1990-1991.(24) He noted that, in 1991,(25) he had established a Gulf Task Force to assist in the move from emergency relief to development.

Regional proposals included a human development and returnee programme for the Arab region and Asia ($8 million) and a Gulf war recovery programme for women ($3 million). Country-specific and territory-specific proposals were submitted for Jordan ($4.5 billion); the occupied Palestinian territories ($86.5 million); the Syrian Arab Republic ($1.8 million); the Sudan ($7.6 million); Viet Nam ($3.9 million); and Yemen ($245 million). Other proposals covered environmental rehabilitation and management of the economic impact of the Gulf crisis.

Another report⁽²⁶⁾ proposed a funding strategy for the affected countries, which had been developed at a December 1991 meeting of the international community.⁽²⁵⁾

On 14 February,⁽²⁷⁾ the Council endorsed the proposed funding strategy for the socio-economic and environmental recovery of countries affected by the Gulf crisis and expressed continuing concern at the impact of the crisis on the affected countries and at the lack of sufficient funds to enable recovery. It noted the importance of collective action to assist the affected countries and of collaboration between them, donor countries, the United Nations system, multilateral financial institutions and NGOs. The Council requested the Administrator to continue to assist all affected countries in formulating and pursuing proposals for recovery at the national, regional and inter-regional levels, through UNDP field offices, its bureaux and units and in dialogue with donors at the country level, particularly regarding the human problem of returning labour migrants and management of the economic and environmental impact of the crisis.

Iraq

In April 1992, DHA assumed responsibility for the coordination of the United Nations Inter-Agency Humanitarian Programme for Iraq, established by the Secretary-General in 1991.⁽²⁸⁾ At the invitation of Iraq, the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs visited Baghdad from 17 to 22 August to negotiate an extension of the Memorandum of Understanding governing the Programme, which had expired on 30 June. Since final agreement could not be reached, negotiations resumed in Baghdad from 14 to 17 October, resulting in an agreement ad referendum on a new Memorandum of Understanding providing a framework for a humanitarian programme until 31 March 1993. The agreement was signed in New York on 22 October. Based on the findings of an inter-agency mission in September, a Winter Plan for Northern Iraq totalling over $85.5 million was drawn up in October to meet the basic survival needs of the most vulnerable groups. A plan of action covering all of Iraq was also prepared and agreed upon with the Government. Urgent requirements covering the period up to 31 March 1993 were estimated at $217 million. The total budget of the plan was revised to $206 million, of which $166 million was mobilized and effectively delivered. Under the plan, pre-positioning of food, fuel and other basic needs, provision of road repairs, shelter materials and medical supplies, immunization programmes, water and sanitation services, supply of agricultural inputs, education, rehabilitation and psycho-social support for disabled children were proposed (see also PART TWO, Chapter III).

Lebanon

In response to requests made in 1991 by the General Assembly⁽²⁹⁾ and the Economic and Social Council,⁽³⁰⁾ the Secretary-General submitted a July report on assistance for the reconstruction and development of Lebanon.⁽³¹⁾

The report stated that Lebanon's encouraging economic results of 1991 were not sustainable beyond the short term in so far as its exchange rate and price stabilization policy implied a major fiscal adjustment. The injection of a large dose of liquidity, as a result of a 120 per cent salary increase in the public sector, led to a depreciation in the value of the Lebanese pound and the abandonment of the stabilization policy in February 1992. The Government subsequently announced an emergency plan to deal with the economic crisis centring on control of the fiscal deficit. Also in February, a government initiative was announced towards solving the problem of the more than 500,000 displaced persons, roughly 20 per cent of the population. Lebanon's Council for Development and Reconstruction activated and accelerated preparations to initiate reconstruction and mobilize the required resources.

United Nations economic assistance to Lebanon was managed at the central level by the Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs. At the field level, the programme of United Nations Assistance for the Reconstruction and Development of Lebanon (UNARDOL) functioned as the United Nations coordinator's office. In accordance with a 1991 Assembly invitation,⁽²⁹⁾ the Secretary-General nominated a Resident Coordinator in Beirut. The Coordinator assumed duty in January 1992 and immediately took action to create a coherent framework for enhanced coordination and expanded activities of economic and technical assistance. In addition, UNDP reactivated its operations and appointed a Resident Representative who simultaneously functioned as UNARDOL Resident Coordinator. A new WHO representative and coordinator was also appointed. In support of its representative, UNICEF appointed a Programme Officer. The UNESCO Regional Office for Education in the Arab States reopened in Beirut in April.

UNARDOL participated in the World Bank Economic Assessment Mission to Lebanon (20 April-1 May) and maintained close contacts with the World Bank group and IMF. An Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia (ESCWA) team visited Lebanon from 10 to 12 March and identified six target areas for assistance: survey of Lebanese expatriates; strengthening of statistics; framework of macroeconomic policies; housing problems and priority programmes; industrial survey and development of industrial estates; and rehabilitation of the agricultural sector, with emphasis on agricultural credit and replacement of undesirable crops. UNICEF finalized with the Lebanese Government a five-year programme of cooperation (1992-1996) that was submitted to its Executive Board in June for a commitment of $5 million from general resources and $20 million from external funding to be sought.

During the reporting period (1 August 1991-31 May 1992), UNDP activities concentrated on preparatory work for the third country programme for Lebanon and on management of ongoing programme activities, including identification and formulation of programmes for rehabilitation of priority sectors. Total fourth (1987-1991) and fifth (1992-1996) cycle IPF or core UNDP resources committed by May amounted to $3.8 billion, leaving $15 million uncommitted. UNDP provided $50,000 from SPR for emergency assistance for the victims of severe winter snowstorms.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 30 July 1992, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1992/42 without vote.

Assistance for the reconstruction and development of Lebanon

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 46/173 of 19 December 1991 on assistance for the reconstruction and development of Lebanon, as well as previous resolutions adopted by the Economic and Social Council in which the specialized agencies and other organizations and bodies of the United Nations system were called upon to expand and intensify their programmes of assistance in response to the urgent needs of Lebanon,

Aware of the deteriorating economic conditions of Lebanon and the magnitude of the country's prevailing needs,

Noting with great concern the high rate of inflation in Lebanon during the past few years, the catastrophic erosion of the value of the country's currency and the severe destruction of its infrastructure,

1. Appeals to all Member States and all organizations of the United Nations system to intensify their efforts to mobilize all possible assistance for the Government of Lebanon in its reconstruction and development efforts, in accordance with the relevant resolutions and decisions of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council;

2. Invites the Secretary-General to inform the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1993 of the progress made in the implementation of the present resolution.

On 18 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 47/155 without vote.

Assistance for the reconstruction and development of Lebanon

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 46/173 of 19 December 1991 and its previous resolutions on assistance for the reconstruction and development of Lebanon, taking note of Economic and Social Council resolution 1992/42 of 30 July 1992 and recalling other relevant resolutions and decisions previously adopted by the Council,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General,

Aware of the severe destruction of the infrastructure of Lebanon, and the continuing deterioration of its economic situation and basic services and the detrimental effects of such destruction and deterioration on social conditions and on the reconstruction and rehabilitation efforts of the country,

Reaffirming the urgent need to initiate regional and international action to assist the Government of Lebanon in rebuilding the country and restoring its human and economic capacities,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his report and for his endeavours to mobilize assistance to Lebanon;

2. Commends the Under-Secretary-General for Political Affairs for his coordination of system-wide assistance to Lebanon;

3. Calls upon Member States and international and regional organizations to provide financial and technical assistance to Lebanon in their programmes of assistance for rehabilitation and reconstruction whenever possible;

4. Call upon all organizations and programmes of the United Nations system to intensify their assistance in response to the urgent needs of Lebanon and to take the steps necessary to ensure that their offices in Beirut are adequately staffed as soon as possible;

5. Invites the Secretary-General to intensify his efforts to mobilize all possible assistance to Lebanon and to report to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session on the progress made in the implementation of the present resolution.

Europe

Croatia

By a letter of 27 August,(32) Croatia reported that the major military operations of the war in Croatia, which had started in June 1991, halted during January 1992, when a fragile cease-fire was reached (see PART TWO, Chapter IV). However, attacks against specific cities and regions were continuing and the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR), under whose mandate four areas of Croatia fell, was not capable of resolving the problems of the heavy burden of human casualties, material destruction and the tide of refugees and displaced persons. More than 4,200 people had died and more than 20,000 had been wounded as a result of military operations, with the estimate of missing persons exceeding 18,000. Several cities were heavily damaged and many villages totally destroyed. The total war damage in Croatia was estimated at around $40 billion. Croatia was providing food, medical assistance and accommodation for more than 270,000 internally displaced persons, in addition to 360,000 refugees from Bosnia and Herzegovina. Croatia deemed it essential that it be granted disaster area status and that all necessary assistance be provided by the international community as soon as possible. In a 20 October letter,(33) Croatia communicated to the Secretary-General a further assessment of the war damage.

Following the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia (London, 26-28 August 1992) (see PART TWO, Chapter IV), a high-level meeting of the Humanitarian Issues Working Group(34) was held on 4 December. The Working Group was informed that there were some 3 million refugees, displaced persons and other victims of the conflict in the former Yugoslavia, who were in need of humanitarian assistance. A UNHCR/DHA-coordinated inter-agency mission visited the former Yugoslavia from 9 to 16 August. In the framework of the United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Programme of Action and Appeal for the Former Yugoslavia, which was launched by the Secretary-General on 4 September and requested $434 million for 2.7 million affected people in all areas of the former Yugoslavia, Croatia's requirements were estimated at $92.1 million.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 47/166 without vote.

International cooperation and assistance to alleviate the consequences of war in Croatia and to facilitate its recovery

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 46/182 of 19 December 1991 and the annex thereto,

Deeply concerned about the serious aggravation of the humanitarian situation as a direct consequence of the ongoing conflict in the former Yugoslavia,

Conscious of the extensive material destruction of major sectors of the national infrastructure, dwellings, the environment and the cultural heritage in Croatia,

Aware that, owing to the constant increase in the number of refugees in Croatia, emergency assistance and humanitarian relief should be continued and expanded,

Deeply concerned about the suffering of the victims of war and of the tides of refugees and displaced persons,

Noting the efforts of the Government of Croatia to solve the problems of the postwar reconstruction of the national infrastructure and, at the same time, to solve the problem of refugees, displaced persons and victims of war within the Republic of Croatia,

Expressing concern about the potential effects of the deepening of the crisis in the former Yugoslavia in the event that, inter alia, no rapid process of postwar recovery in Croatia is established,

Recognizing the importance of the interrelationship between economic recovery and peaceful inter-ethnic relations,

Recognizing that the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the United Nations Children's Fund and other organizations and programmes of the United Nations system are providing emergency humanitarian relief assistance to all areas of the former Yugoslavia, including the Republic of Croatia, and that such humanitarian aid should be organized in such a way as to facilitate the recovery of Croatia,

1. Appeals to all States, regional organizations, inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations and other relevant bodies to provide cooperation in various forms and special and other assistance, in particular in the most severely affected areas and with a view to facilitating the return of refugees and internally displaced persons to those areas;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, having regard for the continuum ranging from emergency relief to the longer-term development needs of the war-torn region, to initiate, in cooperation with the Government of Croatia, an assessment of needs for the rehabilitation, reconstruction and development of Croatia, and to introduce, if appropriate, an international appeal for the funding of a programme for rehabilitation, reconstruction and development;

3. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit a comprehensive report to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session on the implementation of the present resolution.

El Salvador

UNDP began preparations for the post-war period in El Salvador seven months before the signing of the January 1992 Peace Accord(35) (see PART TWO, Chapter II). Technical assistance was provided to the Government in formulating a National Reconstruction Plan (NRP) and in creating opportunities for dialogue and consensus-building to ensure the viability of its execution. Immediately after the signing of the Accord, UNDP began to assist with the emergency plan for humanitarian assistance for former Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional (FMLN) combatants in the process of demobilization. It also provided assistance with the initial execution of NRP, the establishment of new democratic institutions emerging from the Peace Accord, the strengthening of existing ones and management of financing those programmes. UNDP coordinated an inter-agency mission to El Salvador in February, which elaborated recommendations on technical aspects of NRP in the areas of health, nutrition and sanitation; education, culture and communications; agricultural reactivation and natural resources; social compensation, poverty and housing; and employment and micro-enterprises.

During the first meeting of the consultative group of donors for El Salvador (Washington, D.C., 23-26 March), in which the Government of El Salvador and FMLN participated, the international community pledged more than $800 million to support NRP. UNDP also launched an appeal to 15 countries for financial support of a programme of humanitarian assistance for the concentration and demobilization of FMLN. In response, Canada, Denmark, Japan, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States donated more than $3.1 million.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December 1992, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 47/158 without vote.

Assistance for the reconstruction and development of El Salvador

The General Assembly,

Taking note of Security Council resolution 784(1992) of 30 October 1992 and recalling the previous Council resolutions on El Salvador,

Noting with satisfaction the signing, on 16 January 1992 at Mexico City, of the Chapultepec Agreement between the Government of El Salvador and the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional, which put an end to the Salvadorian armed conflict within the framework of the negotiating process begun on 4 April 1990 under the auspices of the Secretary-General,

Recognizing the valuable support given to the peace process by the countries that constitute the "four friends of the Secretary-General" and by other States and groups of States concerned,

Gravely concerned at the destruction of a large part of the country's economic and social infrastructure and the deterioration of the environment caused by the military activity and by other factors relating to the armed conflict,

Taking into account the fact that the National Reconstruction Plan has as its main objectives the integrated development of zones affected by the conflict, satisfaction of the most immediate needs of the population hardest hit by the conflict and of former combatants of both parties, and the reconstruction of the economic and social infrastructure,

Aware of the need for greater involvement of the international community in the reconstruction and development of El Salvador through the granting of economic, technical and financial assistance,

Bearing in mind El Salvador's resource constraints and financial difficulties affecting the implementation of the commitments assumed under the peace agreement,

Reaffirming the urgent need for the international community to take action in support of the peace agreement at this crucial stage in its implementation,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General and the "four friends", namely, Colombia, Mexico, Spain and Venezuela, and to other States and groups of States for their efforts in helping to bring to an end the armed conflict in El Salvador;

2. Notes the preparation by the Government of El Salvador of the National Reconstruction Plan, which reflects the collective wishes of the country, having taken into account the recommendations and suggestions of various political and social forces, including the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional, and which was presented at the Consultative Group meeting held at the World Bank on 23 March 1992, and the current implementation by the Government of that Plan;

3. Notes with satisfaction the assistance promised to El Salvador by the international community at the Consultative Group meeting;

4. Appeals to all States, the relevant organizations and agencies of the United Nations system, regional and interregional intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations to provide the requisite assistance, on the most favourable terms possible, for the reconstruction and development of El Salvador;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, in close coordination with the Government of El Salvador, to make all possible efforts to encourage the international community to increase the level of economic, financial and technical assistance to El Salvador;

6. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit a report to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session on the implementation of the present resolution;

7. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-eighth session an item entitled "Assistance for the reconstruction and development of El Salvador".

Haiti

In response to a 1991 General Assembly request,(36) the Secretary-General submitted a November report on the situation of democracy and human rights in Haiti.(37) In addition to describing major developments in Haiti since the political crisis in 1991 (see PART TWO, Chapter II), the report discussed the humanitarian situation there. The 1991 coup d'état(38) had resulted in the freezing of Haiti's financial assets and the imposition of a trade embargo, except for humanitarian aid. The country's economy was in a state of free fall, said the Secretary-General, and the crisis had led to the collapse of the industrial and service sectors, to an increase in the already high rates of unemployment and to the deterioration of agriculture and of the food situation generally. Together with the partial suspension of priority programmes financed through external cooperation, the health situation also worsened. In addition, the crisis caused an estimated 135,000 children to leave school and thousands of refugees to flee by boat.

Also in response to a 1991 Assembly request,(39) the eight United Nations agencies still maintaining a presence in Haiti established, under the direction of DHA, an inter-agency committee, which drew up a draft integrated plan of humanitarian action for Haiti. In addition, in July, the Organization of American States (OAS) established a coordinating committee for humanitarian assistance to Haiti.

On 24 November, in resolution 47/20, and on 18 December, in resolution 47/143, the Assembly urged Member States and international organizations to increase their humanitarian assistance to the Haitian people and to support all efforts to resolve the problems associated with displaced persons. In that context, it encouraged the strengthening of institutional coordination among United Nations specialized agencies and between the United Nations and OAS.

Disasters

Disaster relief activities

Drought-stricken areas

Southern Africa

In 1992, southern Africa faced the most severe drought to affect the region in the twentieth century. The drought devastated crops, reduced already scarce water availability and placed the lives of 18 million people from the most vulnerable population groups at risk from starvation and disease. It affected 10 countries of the region (Angola, Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Mozambique, Namibia, Swaziland, United Republic of Tanzania, Zambia, Zimbabwe), with the hardest hit countries recording maize crop failure of 70 to 90 per cent. In addition to food losses, water shortages threatened lives, livelihoods and livestock.

DHA, in cooperation with SADC, operational agencies of the United Nations system, the World Bank group and concerned NOGs, launched an urgent joint United Nations/SADC appeal to meet the anticipated needs of the drought victims. Following the official launching of the Consolidated Appeal on 26 May by the President of Botswana, on behalf of SADC, at Gaborone, and by the Secretary-General in New York, a formal pledging conference took place (Geneva, 1 and 2 June), bringing pledges amounting to $570 million of the $854 million sought. The main components of the appeal were the provision of 1.6 million metric tons of targeted food aid, 2.5 million tons of programme food aid, and non-food aid to assure the availability of water, health care and agricultural and livestock inputs.

With the support and participation of SADC and the Organization of African Unity (OAU), the joint DHA-UNDP Disaster Management Training Programme conducted a workshop at Harare, Zimbabwe, for representatives from a number of drought-affected countries. Less than six months after the appeal was issued, 82 per cent of the emergency food needs and 78 per cent of the programme food needs of the region were met. However, additional assistance estimated at $50 million was required for water interventions, refugee populations, agriculture and livestock activities.

In his report for 1992,(1) the UNDP Administrator stated that UNDP had allocated $50,000 for each affected country for institutional support dealing with the emergency situation. The Resident Representative in Zimbabwe was designated as liaison between resident coordinators, the SADC Food Security Unit in Harare and DHA. UNDP field offices provided IPF funding for projects in Malawi estimated at $1.9 million to coordinate drought disaster preparedness and relief and to strengthen the institutional response capacity of NGOs.

Sub-Saharan Africa

The Special Programme for Sub-Saharan African Countries Affected by Drought and Desertification (SPA) of the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD) was established in 1986,(2) with a funding target of $300 million for the first three years. In view of the continuing need for special support, the IFAD Governing Council had, in 1991,(3) approved the continuation of the Programme into a second and terminal phase. Under the second phase (SPA-II), initiated in 1992, three new projects in Mauritania, Sierra Leone and the Sudan were presented for approval, with nine projects under preparation for 1993. IFAD held its Sixth Session of Consultation on SPA in 1992 (Rome, 20 January). The Council of Ministers of OAU (Dakar, Senegal, 22-28 June)(4) appealed to the international donor community to contribute: generously to SPA-II.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 30 July 1992, the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of its Economic Committee, adopted resolution 1992/31 without vote.

Second phase of the Special Programme for Sub-Saharan African Countries Affected by Drought and Desertification of the International Fund for Agricultural Development

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolution 1989/88 of 26 July 1989, in which it stressed the urgent need for substantial progress in stimulating food production in developing countries, and its resolution 1991/95 of 26 July 1991 on the second phase of the Special Programme for Sub-Saharan African Countries Affected by Drought and Desertification of the International Fund for Agricultural Development,

Recalling also General Assembly resolution 45/207 of 21 December 1990, in which the Assembly urged the international community to support the efforts of developing countries by increasing even more the flow of resources, including concessional flows for agricultural development,

Bearing in mind General Assembly resolution 46/151 of 18 December 1991, in which the Assembly adopted the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s,

Recalling resolution CM/Res.1416(LVI) on the second phase of the Special Programme, adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its fifty-sixth ordinary session and endorsed by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity at its twenty-eighth ordinary session, held at Dakar in July 1992,

Noting with satisfaction the effective implementation of the first phase of the Special Programme, including the mobilization of the target level of $300 million.

Recalling also resolution 67/XIV of the Governing Council of the International Fund for Agricultural Development on the establishment of a second phase of the Special Programme and its decision, inter alia, to take note of the appeal made by the African members that every effort should be made to reach a target of $300 million for the second phase of the Special Programme and to appeal to all members in a position to do so to contribute generously, on a voluntary basis, to the Special Resources for Sub-Saharan Africa for the second phase of the Special Programme of three years, bearing in mind the level of resources mobilized for the first phase and its successful implementation,

Noting the progress made on the preparatory activities for the launching of the second phase of the Special Programme, including the development of a pipeline of projects in an advanced stage of preparation,

Expressing its deep appreciation for the contributions pledged by a number of industrialized and developing Member States to the second phase of the Special Programme,

1. Appeals to the international community to contribute generously, on a voluntary basis, to the second phase of the Special Programme for Sub-Saharan African Countries Affected by Drought and Desertification of the International Fund for Agricultural Development;

2. Appeals also to those donors that have generously made firm pledges for the second phase of the Special Programme to deposit their instruments of contribution so as to permit the second phase of the Special Programme to become effective as soon as possible in 1992.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1992/31

----	------	------	---------	----	---------	---------	------

Approved by Economic Committee (E/1992/109/Add.2) without vote, 28 July (meeting 16): draft by Madagascar on behalf of the African States (E/1992/C.1/L.11/Rev.1); agenda item 12 (c).

By resolution 47/188, the Assembly decided to establish an Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee to elaborate an international convention to combat desertification in countries experiencing serious drought and/or desertification, particularly in Africa (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII).

Sudano-Sahelian region

In a report on the activities of the United Nations Sudano-Sahelian Office (UNSO) during 1991 and 1992,(5) the UNDP Administrator stated that the decisions of the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII) resulted in a redefinition of UNSO's goals and a reorientation of major areas of its activities, emphasizing its role as a dryland activity centre serving African countries affected by drought and desertification and as UNDP's focal point on drought and desertification issues. UNSO promoted the sound management of natural resources in 22 countries of the Sudano-Sahelian region to assist Governments and communities in tackling drought and desertification, which were the major environmental issues constraining sustainable development. The programme focused on three major themes: strengthening or creation of national capacity in planning and coordination for the improved management of natural resources; operational field activities; and, pursuant to a 1989 General Assembly resolution,(6) preparations for UNCED.

In 1992, UNSO launched, in cooperation with UNDP, the World Bank and the African Development Bank (AfDB), a Joint Regional Programme Facility, based at Abidjan (Côte d'Ivoire), to strengthen national capacities to integrate the environmental dimension into all aspects of development planning. A network of African experts and institutions was to be established to foster technical cooperation among African countries. During 1991-1992, 52 new projects were approved in all Sudano-Sahelian countries, except Somalia, at a value of $22.4 million, in agro-pastoral development, land protection, desertification control, land-rehabilitation and environmental education and sensitization activities.

On 26 May(7) the Governing Council requested the Administrator to present to it in 1993 proposals on specific ways and means to combat desertification and drought, including strengthening the coordination and effectiveness of the United Nations system to meet this objective, taking into account the role identified for UNSO by UNCED's Preparatory Committee.

In a September report to the General Assembly on combating desertification and drought,(8) the Secretary-General stated that UNSO was working closely with subregional organizations, particularly the Permanent Inter-State Committee on Drought Control in the Sahel and the Intergovernmental Authority on Drought and Development, in their programming and coordination activities, including support to the Sudano-Sahelian countries for the UNCED preparatory process. UNSO's detailed study, Assessment of Desertification and Drought in the Sudano-Sahelian Region 1985-1991, was issued in January. The study called for concerted action in the Sudano-Sahelian region to deal with the twin environmental problems of desertification and drought, including the promotion of alternative livelihood systems that could relieve pressure on the land and help alleviate poverty by providing alternative and supplementary sources of income.

By decision 47/444 of 22 December, the Assembly took note of the Secretary-General's report.

Storms and floods

Cyclone-affected South Pacific countries

The 1991/92 cyclone season caused considerable damage to a number of island developing countries in the South Pacific region. Cyclone Val in December 1991 was followed by cyclones Betsy in January and Fran in March.

On 13 April, Micronesia, on behalf of the members of the South Pacific Forum, described the devastation caused by the cyclones and typhoons that were increasingly prevalent in the region.

UNDP action. On 14 February,(9) the UNDP Governing Council, noting the damage caused during the cyclone season to several island developing countries in the South Pacific, particularly the devastation caused by cyclone Val in Samoa, commended the Administrator for his prompt action in allocating funds from SPR to alleviate the immediate effects of the emergency in Samoa. It called on the Administrator to continue consultations with the Samoan Government with a view to extending further assistance for its rehabilitation and reconstruction efforts and called on States and international organizations to further support Samoa and other South Pacific countries affected.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 13 April 1992, the General Assembly adopted resolution 46/234 without vote.

Reconstruction and rehabilitation of cyclone-affected South Pacific countries

The General Assembly,

Noting with concern the damage caused by recent cyclones in several island developing countries in the South Pacific, namely the Federated States of Micronesia, the Republic of the Marshall Islands, Samoa, Solomon Islands and Vanuatu, and their severe adverse impacts on the efforts of those countries to achieve sustainable economic growth and development,

Noting, in particular, the loss of life and comprehensive material damage, in Samoa,

Taking note of decision 92/11 of 14 February 1992 of the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme, entitled "Special assistance to Samoa",

1. Acknowledges with appreciation both the efforts of the Governments and people to deal with the emergencies within their limited resources and the assistance so far provided by organizations of the United Nations system, other Governments and non-governmental bodies;

2. Urges the continuing assistance of organizations of the United Nations system, international financial institutions and the international community in the development of disaster preparedness and mitigation programmes in the above-named affected countries, in the identification of their medium- and long-term rehabilitation and reconstruction needs and in the mobilization of resources to meet those needs.

Pakistan

By a 30 September letter,⁽¹⁰⁾ Pakistan reported to the Secretary-General that there had been unprecedented rainfall in Pakistan's northern areas and in Azad Jammu and Kashmir during the second week of September. The intensity of the rain was the highest ever experienced in the region, leading to exceptionally high flows in the catchment areas of rivers and resulting in extensive floods and colossal damage. Thousands of villages were inundated and floods and landslides swept away bridges, roads, railway tracks and the telecommunication network. The major highway linking Pakistan and China was severely damaged and closed for traffic. Preliminary estimates of damages and losses were put at 1,022 persons dead or missing; 6 million displaced; 176,117 houses destroyed or damaged; and 122,000 cattle and other livestock lost. The total damage was estimated at more than $1 billion.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 7 October 1992, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/2 without vote.

Emergency assistance to Pakistan

The General Assembly,

Deeply concerned about the extensive damage and devastation in Pakistan caused by the unprecedented floods in that country,

Noting with concern the destruction of thousands of dwellings and the damage to major sectors of the national infrastructure,

Acknowledging the efforts of the Government of Pakistan to provide relief and emergency assistance to the people affected by the flood,

Noting that the earnest efforts of the Government of Pakistan to promote economic growth and development will be hampered by this calamity,

1. Declares its solidarity with the Government and the people of Pakistan in this hour of trial;

2. Notes with appreciation the efforts of the Government of Pakistan to provide speedy relief to the flood victims from national resources;

3. Commends the efforts of the international community to supplement the efforts of the Government of Pakistan in relief operations and emergency assistance;

4. Calls upon the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the relevant organs and organizations of the United Nations system and in close collaboration with the Government authorities, to assist in the rehabilitation efforts of the Government of Pakistan;

5. Requests all States and international organizations and other intergovernmental agencies to extend emergency support to Pakistan to alleviate the plight of the afflicted people of Pakistan, including their economic and financial burden.

Other disasters

Aftermath of war and natural disasters in Nicaragua

On 13 April, Nicaragua informed the General Assembly of the eruption of the Cerro Negro volcano, which was taking place at that time. The eruption was affecting 150,000 people in the Chinandega and León departments in one of the country's main productive regions. Sand- and ash-storms caused serious damage to 4,500 families, totalling 20,000 victims; immediate material damage was estimated at $4 million.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 May 1992, the General Assembly adopted resolution 46/239 without vote.

Emergency assistance to Nicaragua following the eruption of the Cerro Negro volcano

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 43/131 of 8 December 1988 and 45/100 of 14 December 1990 concerning humanitarian assistance to victims of natural disasters and similar emergency situations,

Deeply concerned about the serious consequences of the eruption of the Cerro Negro volcano in Nicaragua, which has given rise to an emergency situation in the affected areas, and about the urgent need to restore normal conditions for the population,

Recognizing that the great efforts that the Government of Nicaragua is making to promote economic and social development and the process of national reconciliation have been hampered by this natural disaster,

Considering the generous assistance that has been provided by the United Nations system, and by some States, to alleviate this emergency situation in Nicaragua,

1. Requests the Secretary-General, to the extent of his authority, to support the rehabilitation efforts that are being made by the Government of Nicaragua in the affected areas;

2. Invites Member States, international financial institutions, organizations, programmes and specialized agencies of the United Nations system to continue to contribute and to respond generously for the duration of the emergency and of the rehabilitation process in Nicaragua.

On 1 September, a powerful earthquake measuring 7.2 on the Richter scale, followed by a tidal wave (tsunami) with waves reaching 15 metres in height, struck the Pacific coast of Nicaragua.

In a 12 November letter to the Secretary-General,⁽¹¹⁾ Nicaragua stated that the tidal wave had caused damage all along its coastline, including major ports, and had affected several coastal towns with a total population of some 70,000. Approximately 150 people had been killed, 500 had disappeared and immediate material losses were valued at around $25 million. In addition, Nicaragua drew attention to the fact that it was still suffering the consequences of the armed conflicts that had taken place there before 1990 (see also PART TWO, Chapter II).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/169 without vote.

International assistance for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Nicaragua: aftermath of the war and natural disasters

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 45/15 of 20 November 1990 and 46/109 A and B of 17 December 1991 concerning the item entitled "The situation in Central America: threats to international peace and security and peace initiatives", in which it welcomed the implementation of phases I and II of the National Conciliation Agreement on Economic and Social Matters concluded in Nicaragua on 26 October 1990 and 15 August 1991, and endorsed, in particular, the provision concerning exceptional circumstances and the invitation to the international community and the international funding agencies to provide effective and efficient support for the implementation of the Agreement,

Deeply concerned at the fact that the recent natural disasters are impeding Nicaragua's efforts to overcome the consequences of the war within the framework of a democracy and in the macroeconomic conditions already achieved,

Taking into account the serious consequences of the destruction of crops and of thousands of homes and the damage caused to important sectors of the national infrastructure, as well as the growing needs of thousands of displaced persons and refugees who must be incorporated into the country's economic activities,

Recognizing the efforts of the international community and the Government of Nicaragua to provide relief and emergency assistance to persons affected by the aftermath of the war, the floods, the volcanic eruption and the recent tidal wave,

Recognizing also that the intensive efforts of the Government of Nicaragua to promote economic reactivation within the framework of a process of adjustment with economic growth and development have been hindered by the aftermath of the war and natural disasters,

1. Commends the efforts made by the international community, including the organs and organizations of the United Nations system, to supplement the action undertaken by the Government of Nicaragua in the task of rehabilitation and national reconstruction, as well as in providing emergency assistance;

2. Requests all Member States, the international funding agencies and regional, intraregional and non-governmental organizations, to continue providing support to Nicaragua at the required levels in order both to overcome the aftermath of the war and natural disasters and to stimulate the process of reconstruction and development;

3. Requests the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the relevant organs and organizations of the United Nations system and in close cooperation with the Nicaraguan authorities, to provide all necessary assistance to activities for the rehabilitation, reconstruction and development of that country and to continue to ensure the timely, comprehensive and effective formulation and coordination of programmes of the United Nations system in Nicaragua, given the importance of those activities for the consolidation of peace;

4. Calls upon the Secretary-General to provide Nicaragua, at the request of the Government of Nicaragua, with all possible assistance to support the consolidation of peace, in areas such as the settlement of displaced and demobilized persons and refugees, land ownership and land tenure in rural areas, direct care for war victims, mine clearance and the overcoming of difficulties in the restoration of the productive areas of the country, and, in general, a process of sustained recovery and development that will render the peace and democracy achieved irreversible;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session on the action taken to implement the present resolution;

6. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-eighth session the item entitled "International assistance for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Nicaragua: aftermath of the war and natural disasters".

Aftermath of Mount Pinatubo volcanic eruption and typhoons in the Philippines

In a 7 October letter,⁽¹²⁾ the Philippines informed the Secretary-General that the Mount Pinatubo volcano, which first erupted in June 1991,⁽¹³⁾ continued to wreak havoc and destruction in Central Luzon. The gravest and most immediate threats to life and property, however, came from mud flows and flash flooding of heavily silted rivers, exacerbated by a spate of typhoons that struck the northern Philippines, leaving, as at 9 September, 36 persons dead, 10 injured, 15 missing and some 940,000 displaced and over 6,350 homes destroyed or damaged. Some 1,254 hectares of land planted with rice, 1,476 hectares of sugarcane and 87 hectares of vegetables were damaged and 4,851 head of livestock were lost. Damage was estimated at approximately $74.2 million.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 21 October 1992, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/7 without vote.

Emergency assistance to the Philippines

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 46/177 of 19 December 1991 on emergency assistance to the Philippines,

Deeply concerned about the extensive damage and devastation in the Philippines caused by the massive mudflows from the volcanic ash deposits of the recent eruptions of Mount Pinatubo volcano,

Noting with concern the destruction of thousands of dwellings and the damage to major sectors of the national infrastructure, as well as the mounting needs of hundreds of thousands of displaced persons,

Acknowledging the efforts of the Government of the Philippines to provide relief and emergency assistance to the people affected by the mudflows and recent volcanic eruptions,

Noting that the earnest efforts of the Government of the Philippines to promote economic growth and development will be hampered by this continuing calamity,

1. Commends the efforts of the international community, including the organs and organizations of the United Nations system, to supplement the efforts of the Government of the Philippines in relief operations and emergency assistance;

2. Calls upon the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the relevant organs and organizations of the United Nations system and in close collaboration with the Government authorities, to assist in the rehabilitation efforts of the Government of the Philippines;

3. Requests all States and international organizations to extend, on an urgent basis, further support to the Philippines in ways that would alleviate, for the duration of the emergency and the ensuing rehabilitation process, the economic and financial burden borne by the Philippine people.

Screw-worm infestation

In response to a 1991 request,(14) the Secretary-General transmitted to the Economic and Social Council a June report,(15) prepared by the Director-General of FAO, in cooperation with IFAD, on the screw-worm eradication programme in North Africa. The report stated that to combat the new world screw-worm, which was first detected in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in 1988, sterile insect technique operations—field tested in a $2.8 million pilot programme approved by IFAD in 1989—were extended to the entire infested area in February 1991. The number of screw-worm myiasis cases dropped from over 12,000 in 1990 to 6 in 1991, the last being detected on 7 April 1991. Following six months of continued dispersal of millions of sterile flies, the operation was suspended on 15 October 1991.

The last remaining international staff of the eradication programme left the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in June 1992. Subsequent field operations were limited to surveillance activities carried out by the Libyan authorities for a further year, with the financial closure of the programme being expected in 1993. The original estimate of international funds required to complete the programme was revised downward to a final estimate of $34 million in response to the rapid success being achieved. By June 1992, donors had contributed $32.4 million and a further $2.9 million was expected, thus assuring the required funding for the programme's completion.

The FAO Director-General termed the campaign an example of effective cooperation among a large number of partners in an emergency operation. He concluded that the successful campaign demonstrated that cooperation among technical agencies, financing institutions, bilateral agencies, NGOs and affected countries could effectively address a disaster situation, in a coordinated manner.

By decision 1992/280 of 30 July 1992, the Economic and Social Council took note of the report of the Director-General.

Chernobyl aftermath

On 23 March,(16) the heads of State of Belarus, the Russian Federation and Ukraine transmitted an appeal (Kiev, Ukraine, 20 March) to the United Nations concerning the provision of assistance in mitigating the consequences of the Chernobyl catastrophe. The heads of State called on the international community to give renewed impetus to the international programme to minimize the consequences of the 1986 nuclear powerplant disaster.

In a response to a 1991 General Assembly request,(17) the Secretary-General submitted a July report(18) on strengthening international cooperation and coordination to study, mitigate and minimize the consequences of the Chernobyl disaster, which updated information submitted to the Assembly in October 1991.(19) The report described the accident at the nuclear powerplant, measures taken by the authorities of the former USSR and by the newly independent States to counteract the disaster, and activities of the United Nations system.

The report indicated that, consequent to the 1991 Assembly resolution on the Chernobyl disaster,(17) a small secretariat was established at the United Nations to work on negotiations with donors and recipients on projects to be implemented utilizing resources from the United Nations Chernobyl Trust Fund, pledges for which had been made at the Chernobyl Pledging Conference in 1991.(20)

In the light of the political changes in the former USSR, the implementation of the 1991 International Programme on the Health Effects of the Chernobyl Accident (IPHECA) was reviewed and an agreement was signed in April 1992 by WHO and the Ministries of Health of the affected States, under which the parties were to carry out the programme on the basis of equal involvement of the three States. International participation was encouraged and all relevant Chernobyl health-related projects were to be either incorporated into IPHECA or closely coordinated with it. Together with the Russian Federation and in association with the Chernobyl secretariat, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization initiated a multifaceted project for socio-economic rehabilitation in a 300-square-kilometre zone. An international seminar on the topic was held at Wolfsburg, Germany, in June.

In November, the United Nations Deputy Coordinator for Chernobyl held meetings with authorities from Belarus, the Russian Federation and Ukraine, which culminated in the signing by the affected States of a document indicating the following priorities for assistance: creation of medical centres for examination and treatment; equipping of medical institutions in the contaminated zone; formulations of plans, definition of special economic conditions and advantages for foreign investors; creation of centres for children and teenagers for socio-psychological rehabilitation; and production of uncontaminated food products and products containing special additives.

The Inter-Agency Task Force for Chernobyl decided to take full account of these priorities and considered that the coordination and management of Chernobyl programmes and projects should increasingly become the responsibility of the three Governments.

On 30 July 1992, by decision 1992/286, the Economic and Social Council took note of the Secretary-General's report.

UNICEF action. At its June 1992 session,(21) the UNICEF Executive Board urged the Executive Director to continue consideration of possible technical and other special assistance to children and mothers living in the areas most affected by the Chernobyl accident, and requested him to continue to provide all appropriate support and assistance to the victims.

Stressing also the responsibility of each State, particularly through its safety authorities and its plant operators, for the safety of its nuclear power plants, and encouraging cooperation to this end throughout the world, in particular in Central and Eastern Europe, and emphasizing the high priority that should be given by the countries concerned to eliminating this danger through safety improvements and other appropriate measures with the support of the international community,

Chapter IV

International trade, finance and transport

The deceleration of international trade expansion which began in 1989 continued through 1992. Among the main contributing factors were the recession in North America and the United Kingdom, weakening investment trends in Japan, economic slow-down in Western Europe and the sharp output contractions in Central and Eastern Europe and the former USSR.

The eighth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, a high-level meeting held at Cartagena de Indias, Colombia, from 8 to 25 February, included in its final document "A New Partnership for Development: The Cartagena Commitment", which stressed the importance of strengthening multilateral cooperation in order to translate the broad policy commitments undertaken by countries into sustained economic growth and development. In December, the General Assembly endorsed the outcome of the Conference and called on the international community to assist in promoting measures in pursuit of the revitalization of international trade and development, particularly in the developing countries (resolution 47/183).

The Assembly noted, with regard to the strengthening of international organizations in the area of multilateral trade, that the Uruguay Round of multilateral negotiations had not been completed and expressed the hope that it would be rapidly concluded (47/184).

The Assembly examined the various aspects of international trade, finance and development, including the importance of the commodity sector to economic growth and transformation in developing countries (47/185), the promotion of an adequate flow of resources to developing countries and the need to achieve a higher degree of stability in financial markets in order to promote an international financial system more conducive to stable economic growth (47/178). It urged creditor countries, private banks and multilateral financial institutions to consider the extension of appropriate new financial support to developing countries, in particular low-income countries that continued, at great cost, to service their debt and meet their international obligations (47/198). The Assembly also continued to explore the issue of convening an international conference on the financing of development (decision 47/436).

Eighth session of UNCTAD

International trade and development issues for world economic revitalization and growth received greater focus in 1992, by the convening, in accordance with a General Assembly resolution of 1991,(1) of a high-level eighth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD-VIII), at Cartagena de Indias, Colombia, from 8 to 25 February 1992.(2)

The UNCTAD Trade and Development Board (TDB), which served as a preparatory committee for UNCTAD VIII, convened the first part of its seventeenth special session in December 1991.(3) The second part of that session was held from 15 to 24 January 1992 to finalize the preparations for the Conference.(4) In addition to finalizing the organizational and procedural arrangements, the special session discussed a number of substantive issues, including the outcome of a number of informal encounters and seminars held during 1991 in preparation for UNCTAD VIII.

At the intergovernmental level, three regional ministerial meetings were held: the Latin American Group of the Group of 77 (the developing countries) (Caracas, Venezuela, 26-30 August and 4 September 1991), which adopted a declaration entitled "Latin America and the Caribbean and UNCTAD VIII"; the Seventh Ministerial Meeting of the Asian Group of the Group of 77 (Pyongyang, Democratic People's Republic of Korea, 10-12 September 1991), which adopted the "Pyongyang Final Document"; and the Seventh Ministerial Meeting of the African Group of the Group of 77 (Lusaka, Zambia, 19 and 20 September 1991), which adopted the "Lusaka Declaration". The results of those meetings were considered at the Seventh Ministerial Meeting of the Group of 77 (Tehran, Iran, 16-23 November 1991), which adopted the Tehran Final Documents(5) containing the Tehran Declaration entitled "Towards a new partnership for development", the "Substantive platform of the Group of 77 for international cooperation" and the "Statement of Ministers on economic cooperation among developing countries".

Other documents circulated in connection with the substantive work of the Conference included a text by Australia on its approach to institutional issues and the role of UNCTAD; a position paper by China(6) on basic considerations on issues on the agenda of UNCTAD VIII; a communication from Italy, on behalf of States members of Group B (developed market economics),(7) on trade, development and the new international challenges: towards a programme of action for strengthened multilateral cooperation and sustainable development; and a text from the Nordic countries (Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden) containing their contribution to the discussions on the revitalization of UNCTAD.

A pre-Conference meeting of senior officials was held at Cartagena de Indias on 6 and 7 February.

The Conference's main substantive agenda item was the strengthening of national and international action and multilateral cooperation for a healthy, secure and equitable world economy.

Proceedings of UNCTAD VIII

The Conference was attended by 126 member States of UNCTAD, one observer State (Kiribati), Palestine and the Pan African Congress of Azania, as well as by representatives of the United Nations Secretariat, the regional commissions and other United Nations organizations, eight specialized agencies, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) and the International Trade Centre (UNCTAD/GATT). Also represented were 15 intergovernmental organizations, eight non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and the Airlines Worldwide Telecommunications and Information Service.

At its opening meeting, on 8 February, the Conference elected as its President Juan Manuel Santos, Minister of Foreign Trade of Colombia; it also elected a Rapporteur and 32 Vice-Presidents.

The Conference's inaugural ceremony was addressed by Cesar Gaviria Trujillo, President of Colombia, who welcomed delegates on behalf of his Government, and by Bernard T. G. Chidzero, Senior Minister of Finance, Economic Planning and Development of Zimbabwe and President of the Conference's seventh session (1987).(8)

The United Nations Secretary-General, in his address to the inaugural ceremony, stated that, in recent years, the burden of foreign debt had hindered development in a considerable number of developing countries. Many of the poorest countries had been obliged to transfer vast resources to the rich countries and the resulting economic crisis in the poor countries was jeopardizing their democratic institutions and threatening their national stability and political future. He noted that the causes of the threats facing the environment, and the causes of large-scale migrations and the spread of epidemics, were to be found in poverty and income disparities between peoples and nations. In the economic and social field, a global consensus in favour of development was still in the process of elaboration. The Secretary-General concluded that if the major objective of peace through development was to be pursued, the political will of Member States needed to be strengthened. New resources were also needed, as well as a more coordinated, more integrated system between the United Nations on the one hand and the specialized agencies and NGOs on the other.

On 10 February, the Conference established a Main Committee to consider and report on matters referred to it by the plenary. The Main Committee established two Working Groups to consider parts of the basic negotiating text.

The Conference had before it a report of the UNCTAD Secretary-General entitled "Accelerating the development process: challenges for national and international policies in the 1990s", (9) the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries (LDCs) for the 1990s, (10) an analytical report by the UNCTAD secretariat, (11) the report of the Pre-Conference Meeting of Senior Officials (12) and a number of documents submitted by member States and groups of member States.

In accordance with a proposal of the Pre-Conference Meeting, the Conference held a special meeting on 11 February on LDCs (see PART THREE, Chapter I).

UNCTAD VIII Declaration and final document. On 25 February, the Conference adopted a Declaration entitled "The Spirit of Cartagena" and a five-part final document entitled "A New Partnership for Development: the Cartagena Commitment": Part I outlined the challenges and potentials for international trade and development in the 1990s in the context of the evolving international political and economic situation and the growing convergence on development issues and priorities and a new partnership for development; Part II dealt with the broad policy orientations on the issues of good management at the national and international levels and with sustainable development; Part III discussed the role of UNCTAD in a changing political and economic environment, focusing on a wide range of issues, including institutional adaptation, UNCTAD's functions, adapting, reorienting and consolidating its substantive work, strengthening its intergovernmental machinery and improving its methods of work; Part IV reviewed policies and measures, particularly in the areas of finance, trade, commodities, technology and services and their interlinkages; and Part V focused on economic cooperation among developing countries (ECDC), noting that such cooperation could enable developing countries to exploit more effectively the latest complementarities in their economies, promote a fuller and more effective mobilization of their resources, gain access to additional resources and knowledge, and enhance the negotiating weight necessary to advance their common interests.

Other UNCTAD VIII action. In addition to the Declaration and the final document, UNCTAD VIII, by resolution 170(VIII) of 24 February, approved the report of the Credentials Committee, accepting the credentials of the representatives to the Conference. On 25 February, it adopted resolution 171(VIII), expressing its gratitude to the Government and people of the Republic of Colombia. The Conference also adopted a text by which it invited the UNCTAD Secretary-General to hold consultations on the question of convening a world commodity conference and a message from UNCTAD VIII to the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) (see below). The Conference also addressed a message to the 1992 Summit for the Economic Advancement of Rural Women (see PART THREE, Chapter I) and agreed to transmit to the General Assembly a draft resolution on assistance to the Palestinian people. It further agreed that UNCTAD assistance to the Palestinian people would be continued in its current form.

UNCTAD VIII follow-up

In the Cartagena Commitment,(2) UNCTAD VIII proposed a number of institutional reforms for UNCTAD, particularly its intergovernmental machinery. It called on TDB, at its first session following the Conference, to take the necessary follow-up measures to ensure speedy implementation of the agreed institutional reforms. On 7 May,(13) TDB adopted guidelines for its executive sessions and established the terms of reference for four Standing Committees: the Standing Committee on Commodities; the Standing Committee on Poverty Alleviation; the Standing Committee on ECDC; and the Standing Committee on Developing Services Sectors: Fostering Competitive Services Sectors in Developing Countries. It also established the terms of reference for the following Ad Hoc Working Groups: the Ad Hoc Working Group on Investment and Financial Flows—non-debt-creating finance for development; new mechanism for increasing investment and financial flows; the Ad Hoc Working Group on Trade Efficiency; the Ad Hoc Working Group on Comparative Experiences with Privatization; the Ad Hoc Working Group on Expansion of Trading Opportunities for Developing Countries; and the Ad Hoc Working Group on the Interrelationship between Investment and Technology Transfer. TDB agreed that the Standing Committees and the Ad Hoc Working Groups, in their work, would take into account the results of the review and follow-up by TDB of progress in implementing the Programme of Action for LDCs for the 1990s (see PART THREE, Chapter I). TDB would also consider establishing a working group to explore questions related to structural adjustment for the transition to disarmament and the implications for economic growth and development of reductions of military expenditures.

On 9 October,(14) TDB established an Ad Hoc Working Group to explore the issue of structural adjustment for the transition to disarmament. It requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General to prepare a report on the activities of other United Nations organizations in this area, indicate where UNCTAD could best play a role, provide an estimate of the resource implications of establishing the Working Group and prepare draft terms of reference. It would also, at its first session in 1993, establish the timetable for the Group, taking into account the timetable of existing working groups and the availability of resources.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December 1992, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/183 without vote.

Eighth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the importance and continued validity of the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade, the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, and the various agreements, especially Agenda 21, that were adopted during the process of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development,

Recalling its resolution 1995(XIX) of 30 December 1964, as amended, on the establishment of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) as an organ of the General Assembly, and its resolution 45/261 of 3 May 1991, in which it decided to convene the eighth session of the Conference at Cartagena de Indias, Colombia, from 8 to 25 February 1992,

Having considered the final documents adopted by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development at its eighth session, in particular the Declaration and the document entitled "A New Partnership for Development: The Cartagena Commitment", and noting with satisfaction the highly successful outcome of the eighth session of the Conference and the spirit of genuine cooperation and solidarity—the Spirit of Cartagena—that emerged therefrom,

Expressing its deep gratitude to the Government and the people of Colombia for the hospitality extended to the participants at the eighth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and for the facilities for holding the session,

Noting the importance of follow-up and of keeping under review the implementation of the policies and measures adopted by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development at its eighth session,

Emphasizing that the concerns of the international community about the current world economic situation, trade and development issues, and the difficulties of many countries in achieving satisfactory rates of development deserve continuing attention, in particular as far as the developing countries are concerned,

Reaffirming, in this context, the need to give priority to problems facing the least developed countries owing to the fragility of their economies and their particular vulnerability to external shocks and natural calamities,

Reiterating that the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations should result in a substantial and balanced outcome in all areas involved, and expressing concern that those negotiations have not yet been completed but hopeful that they will come to a successful conclusion rapidly, taking into account the specific interests of developing countries,

I

1. Endorses the outcome of the eighth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, in particular the commitments agreed upon, and emphasizes the importance of the New Partnership for Development, initiated by the Conference at that session, where countries will join actively in cooperative work to address the development challenges of the 1990s, and expresses its political will and responsibility to implement the agreed commitments;

2. Welcomes the far-reaching institutional reform measures adopted by the Conference at its eighth session regarding the functions, intergovernmental machinery, methods of work and substantive orientations of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD), and agrees that those measures are a valuable contribution to the process of restructuring the economic and social sectors of the United Nations launched by the General Assembly;

3. Reaffirms the important role of UNCTAD, as a principal organ of the General Assembly in the field of trade and development and as the most appropriate focal point within the United Nations proper for the integrated treatment of development and interrelated issues in key areas, including trade, commodities, finance, investment, services and technology, in the interests of all countries, particularly those of developing countries;

4. Welcomes the agreement by UNCTAD to refocus its substantive work on four areas, namely, a new partnership for development, global interdependence, paths to development and sustainable development, which should serve as orientations for developing both fresh approaches to long-standing issues and insights for pursuing relevant new lines of work, and acknowledges the efforts that have been made in this respect and encourages further efforts in this regard;

5. Also welcomes the high priority given by UNCTAD to commodities, poverty alleviation, services development, economic cooperation among developing countries, investment and financial flows, privatization, trading opportunities for developing countries, investment and technology transfers, and trade efficiency;

International trade

The Trade and Development Report, 1992(1) stated that world trade grew by only 3 per cent in 1991, continuing the deceleration of world trade expansion that began in 1989. The recession in North America and the United Kingdom, weakening investment trends in Japan, the economic slow-down in Western Europe and the sharp output contraction in Central and Eastern Europe and the former USSR all influenced international trade negatively. However, rapid growth and buoyant domestic activity bolstered imports in East Asian countries, and strong import demand was experienced in the Persian Gulf area, on account of reconstruction in some economies. The economic recovery in Latin America boosted world demand and the unification process in Germany substantially raised import demand.

As to the world trade pattern, the volume of exports of developed market economies as a group increased by slightly more than 3 per cent in 1991, compared with over 5 per cent in 1990, while imports grew by less than 2 per cent, against over 4 per cent in 1990. Export expansion slowed in virtually all the major industrialized countries in volume terms, except for the United States where, at over 6 per cent, it was about double the world average. However, imports to the United States fell slightly, owing to depressed domestic demand. The unification of Germany led to a diversion of production to internal markets and a sharp rise in imports. Exports declined by 2 per cent in 1991, in contrast to an import volume growth of over 9 per cent. Japan, despite a sluggish domestic economy, experienced some export growth but an import growth of only 1 per cent, against over 6.5 per cent the previous year. In the developing countries, which provided the major impetus to world trade in 1991, the volume of exports and imports grew significantly, especially in the Asian region. China raised its market share and integrated into the world economy, with a rapid growth in both export and import volume, averaging around 12 per cent per year. Latin America recorded a growth of imports of over 10 per cent in 1991, while for developing countries in Africa, the sharp fall in commodity prices resulted in a fall in the volume of imports of over 5 per cent. High import levels were maintained in the Persian Gulf region, while West Asia recorded a 10 per cent decline in the value of exports and an increase of over 18 per cent in imports. The decision to transact their mutual trade in hard currency led to a virtual collapse of trade among member countries of the former Council for Mutual Economic Assistance (CMEA). This loss was partially compensated by the expansion of trade with other markets, notably Western Europe.

The World Economic Survey 1992(2) reported that the 3 per cent growth in the volume of world trade in 1991 was the smallest gain since 1985. It was none the less remarkable in a year when world output declined.

A revival of world trade would clearly depend on the speed of recovery of the industrial economies from the current recession, said the Survey. The pent-up import demand in Eastern Europe and the republics of the former USSR should lead, if properly financed, to increased imports into that area. Efforts at trade liberalization in the developing countries should also make a modest contribution to the resuscitation of world trade. However, continuing protectionist trends could dampen those possibilities.

The outcome of the Uruguay Round of trade negotiations (see PART SEVEN, Chapter XVIII) remained uncertain, with agriculture continuing to be the biggest sticking-point. While there was little abatement of protectionism among the major trading nations, a number of developing countries—especially in Latin America—were undertaking significant liberalization of their trade regimes.

Trade policy

The Trade and Development Report, 1992(1) noted that a large number of developing countries had liberalized their trade regimes in the late 1980s and early 1990s as part of a more comprehensive set of structural adjustment measures to accelerate economic growth in response to economic crisis and disenchantment with excessive State intervention. The result had been an increase in the number of developing countries with fairly free trade regimes. Developing countries used different strategies to build export success and were able to combine protection for the domestic market with export promotion in many different ways. However, aside from liberalization of imported inputs used by the export sectors, other forms of import liberalization had not necessarily been an ingredient of successful trade policies.

The World Economic Survey 1992(2) reported that 1991 saw a continuing trend towards the formation of trading blocs in the form of regional and subregional arrangements in both the developed and the developing regions of the world.

UNCTAD VIII action. In the Cartagena Commitment,(3) UNCTAD VIII stated that the international trading environment had been affected by a number of developments which created new challenges and opportunities, making multilateral cooperation of even greater importance. World exports had continued to grow faster than world output in recent years, but its expansion had been unevenly spread; only a limited number of developing countries had been capable of achieving appreciable growth in their exports. Therefore, UNCTAD VIII stressed that the objectives of the international community should be to halt and reverse protectionism in order to bring about further liberalization and expansion of world trade to the benefit of all countries, particularly the developing ones; to provide for an equitable, secure, non-discriminatory and predictable international trading system; to facilitate the integration of all countries into the world economy and the international trading system; to ensure that environment and trade policies were mutually supportive, with a view to achieving sustainable development; and to strengthen the international trading system through an early, balanced, comprehensive and successful outcome of the Uruguay Round.

It outlined the measures and action needed to fulfil these objectives and urged all countries to implement previous commitments to halt and reverse protectionism and further expand market access, particularly in areas of interest to developing countries, which would be facilitated by appropriate structural adjustment in developed countries. Developing countries should continue their trade-policy reforms and structural adjustments and should progressively reduce their import barriers, consistent with their trade, financial and development needs. These efforts should be supported by the international community through adequate improved market access and increased flows of financial resources. UNCTAD VIII invited member countries to support the transition of countries in Central and Eastern Europe to a market economy and to liberalize their trade regimes vis-à-vis all of them. It stressed the need to abolish discriminatory measures aimed at those countries and to relax non-tariff measures (NTMs) on a most-favoured-nation basis.

The Conference said that the international trading system should support the observance by all countries of their international commitments on the granting of differential and more favourable treatment to developing countries and provide for their increasing integration into the system. The international community should implement measures to grant substantially improved market access for exports of LDCs and provide special trade treatment for them. The Conference also called for action with regard to protectionism and the generalized system of trade preferences (GSP) (see below).

UNCTAD VIII agreed that TDB should continue to review annually global developments in the evolution of production of and trade in manufactures, commodities and services. The review should comprise analysis of the principal elements and effects of structural adjustment and trade policies and policy options, taking into account the special interests of developing countries.

Uruguay Round

The World Economic Survey 1992(2) reported that the Uruguay Round—the eighth round of multilateral trade negotiations, launched in 1986(4) under the aegis of GATT (see PART SEVEN, Chapter XVIII)—which was suspended in December 1990, was restarted in early 1991. However, the outcome of the negotiations remained uncertain.

UNCTAD VIII action. In the Cartagena Commitment,(3) UNCTAD VIII urged all participants, in particular the major trading partners, to make determined efforts to arrive at an early, balanced, comprehensive and successful outcome of the Uruguay Round, taking into account the specific interests of the developing countries. It reaffirmed the commitment to an open, viable and durable multilateral trading system to bring about further liberalization and expansion of world trade to the benefit of all countries, especially the developing ones. It requested TDB to analyse and assess the outcome of the Uruguay Round, in particular in areas of interest or concern to developing countries, and its impact on the international trading system. In that context, TDB should examine, on the basis of analyses by the UNCTAD Secretary-

General, the problems and opportunities faced by the developing countries as well as the economies in transition in Central and Eastern Europe in increasing their participation in international trade in the 1990s. The Conference acknowledged the appreciation expressed by developing countries for support provided by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), through UNCTAD, to facilitate their effective participation in the Uruguay Round.

Strengthening institutional trade arrangements

Responding to a 1991 General Assembly request,⁽⁵⁾ the Secretary-General submitted a progress report on strengthening international organizations in the area of multilateral trade.⁽⁶⁾ He reported that the UNCTAD Secretary-General had received no replies from international organizations in response to his 1991 request for their views, apart from the six reported on in 1991.⁽⁷⁾ However, the UNCTAD Secretary-General had received responses to his note from nine Governments and the Commission of the European Communities. The responses emphasized that, given the still unclear situation in the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations, the time might not be ripe to define a clear line of action or to draw correct conclusions as to the institutional needs of a global trading system. Several replies did focus on ensuring complementarity between activities of UNCTAD and GATT. In particular, the Commission of the European Communities stressed that the roles of GATT and UNCTAD were and should remain complementary and that it was essential to maintain adequate coordination between the activities of the two institutions.

The Secretary-General further reported that the draft final act embodying the results of the Uruguay Round, submitted to participants in December 1991, included a draft agreement establishing a multilateral trade organization—considered to be the most effective and pragmatic mechanism for implementing the results of the Round.

The Secretary-General concluded that it would be advisable to review the matter again at the Assembly's 1993 session on the basis of an updated report on the subject, on the assumption that the Uruguay Round would be concluded by that time.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December 1992, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/184 without vote.

Strengthening international organizations in the area of multilateral trade

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, and the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Development Decade,

Recalling its resolutions 45/201 of 21 December 1990 and 46/207 of 20 December 1991.

Welcoming the successful outcome of the eighth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, in particular the organization's institutional reform,

Taking note of the progress report by the Secretary-General concerning institutional developments related to the strengthening of international organizations in the area of multilateral trade,

Expressing concern that the current negotiations of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations have not yet been completed, but hoping that they will rapidly reach a balanced and substantial conclusion in all areas involved,

1. Once again Urges all Governments and the executive heads of the specialized agencies and other organizations and programmes of the United Nations system to endeavour to present their views to the Secretary-General on this matter;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare, for submission to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session, an updated report taking into account the positive outcome and developments of the eighth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the developments in the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations.

22 December 1992 Meeting 93 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/47/718/Add.2) without vote, 9 December (meeting 49); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/47/L.70), based on informal consultations on draft by Pakistan for Group of 77 (A/C.2/47/L.31); agenda item 78 (a).

Meeting numbers. GA 47th session: 2nd Committee 40, 42, 43, 48, 49; plenary 93.

Protectionism and structural adjustment

UNCTAD VIII action. In the Cartagena Commitment,⁽³⁾ UNCTAD VIII agreed that UNCTAD should promote the establishment by Governments of transparent mechanisms at the national level to evaluate protectionist measures sought by firms/sectors, and the implications of such measures for the domestic economy and their effects on the export interests of developing countries. The UNCTAD secretariat should provide technical assistance to interested countries in connection with the establishment of such mechanisms. The Conference also recommended that countries give attention to increasing the transparency of their trade regimes and to replacing NTMs by tariffs where possible.

National transparency mechanisms

In July, the UNCTAD secretariat presented a report to TDB on issues relating to national transparency mechanisms in the context of the fight against protectionism.⁽⁸⁾ The report noted that the need to establish or to enhance domestic transparency of trade-related policy-making was now widely recognized and had been supported by intensive investigation and analysis by the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), GATT and UNCTAD. It described the set of issues concerning national transparency mechanisms and summarized the analytical work accomplished. It discussed the trade-policy bias towards protection and the implications of transparency mechanisms for developing countries. The report further reviewed the experiences of transparency mechanisms in Australia, Canada, New Zealand and the United States, the nature of the analytical activities of a transparency agency, the techniques used to evaluate the costs to and benefits of protection on the sectors affected as well as on the economy as a whole. It listed the basic features of an effective transparency mechanism and discussed the role of technical assistance in its establishment.

Trade preferences

Generalized system of preferences

TDB's Special Committee on Preferences held its nineteenth session at Geneva from 18 to 22 May 1992.(9) It considered the fifteenth general report(10) by the UNCTAD secretariat on the implementation of GSP schemes. The report described changes and improvements that had taken place in the various schemes since the last review and updated information on the trade effects of the system. It noted that the European Economic Community (EEC) GSP scheme for 1991, with the exception of a few technical changes and an increase in the amounts in European Currency Units (ECU) of sensitive industrial products, would be applied mutatis mutandis from 1 January to 31 December 1992. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) had been excluded from the beneficiary list under the schemes of EEC and Norway. Czechoslovakia had been added to the beneficiary lists of Australia, Austria, Canada and the United States. Namibia became a beneficiary under the schemes of Australia, Austria, Canada, Finland and the United States. Finland and Switzerland added Albania to their beneficiary lists. The United States considered that the Sudan did not meet the standards of workers' rights and therefore excluded it from its scheme. Poland adjusted and modified its scheme and established a new list of beneficiary countries. Hungary revised its scheme, adding several industrial products and giving preferential duty-free treatment to tropical products already covered, or increasing the preferential tariff margins on them. It also established a new list of beneficiaries. The question arose as to the form in which the GSP scheme of the former USSR would be applied in the future.

The Special Committee also considered an UNCTAD secretariat report(11) on the incidence of NTMs on imports of GSP-covered products which updated earlier information on the subject. It indicated that over one fifth ($26 billion or 21.3 per cent) of GSP-covered products ($122 billion) of the 11 OECD schemes, in terms of 1988 trade flows, were found to be subject to NTMs. GSP-covered products faced a wide variety of NTMs in the markets of preference-giving countries and heavy reliance was placed by certain preference-giving countries on the use of "hard-core" NTMs to limit imports eligible for preferential tariff treatment, including variable levies, quotas, non-automatic licences and restrictions under the Multifibre Arrangement (MFA). Percentages of GSP-covered imports facing NTMs for each of the major beneficiaries under the various schemes were found to be extremely high in all cases. The report indicated that NTMs could be an important deterrent to imports of GSP-covered products and recommended that, as a means of improving utilization of GSP, preference-giving countries could consider exempting GSP-covered products from NTMs.

In a concluding statement attached to the Special Committee's report,(9) the Chairman said that it was felt that graduation/differentiation in the treatment of beneficiary countries under GSP would be arbitrary and restrictive and that objective and rational criteria for their treatment would be the best way to avoid such unwanted and often discriminatory results. A positive effect of graduation/differentiation could be a better spread of benefits among developing countries, however, and it could open the way for increased product coverage. Country/product differentiation was also considered preferable to complete country exclusion because such a macroeconomic policy decision could create problems at the microeconomic level for the graduated country. With regard to the rules of origin, it was considered that the question of harmonization should be treated as a separate issue from other possible improvements, such as simplification and liberalization. Many countries felt that extension of the use of the donor-country concept would be consistent with national and international trends towards trade liberalization. Full global cumulation was seen as having positive effects on cooperation among beneficiary countries, particularly those outside regional groupings. Technical assistance was of continuing importance for meeting the growing needs of countries, as an increasing number were in a position to use GSP. There was broad consensus that, in line with agreed policy, ways should be sought to offer special benefits to all LDCs in view of their limited industrial base and export power.

Technical cooperation

The delivery of technical cooperation for GSP and other trade laws remained high in 1992(12) as a result of increased interest in GSP shown by beneficiaries and facilitated by UNDP and trust fund contributions to the GSP programme by UNCTAD member States. Extrabudgetary funding for global GSP activities in 1992 totalled $1,141,500, of which UNDP funds accounted for approximately $538,400 or 47 per cent, with the remainder ($603,100) coming from trust fund contributions. Trust fund contributions for specific purposes amounted to $343,800, in-kind contributions to $96,000 and central trust fund contributions to $163,320, or 27 per cent of total funding. During the year, 58 activities were undertaken in all regions of the world, including 22 training seminars/workshops, 16 advisory/consultation missions and 7 field research missions aimed primarily at assisting preference-receiving countries. In all, 853 participants from 20 preference-receiving countries benefited from these training activities.

Countries in Africa and Central and Eastern Europe were showing increasing awareness and interest in GSP, leading to more requests for training. It was expected that, following the conclusion of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations, there would be more requests, particularly from Asian and Latin American countries, for seminars and advisory missions.

UNCTAD VIII action. In the Cartagena Commitment,⁽³⁾ UNCTAD VIII noted that many developing countries had benefited from GSP treatment and encouraged preference-giving countries to continue to improve and renew the schemes and extend their operation periods. It recommended that preference-giving countries should comply with the multilaterally agreed principles of GSP, consider appropriate adjustments in country coverage and, if possible, consider comprehensive product coverage. It further recommended minimizing limitations and restrictions on preferential imports, as well as withdrawals of preferential benefits. The rules of origin should be simplified and harmonized, where possible, to impart stability, transparency and greater credibility to the schemes, and to reduce their complexity. The Conference expressed concern over the incidence of NTMs on benefits deriving from GSP schemes, and urged preference-giving countries to reduce or eliminate such barriers. It also called on preference-giving countries to implement fully the provisions of the Paris Declaration, adopted by the Second (1990) United Nations Conference on LDCs,⁽¹³⁾ in respect of GSP measures in favour of LDCs. It urged UNDP and potential donor countries to increase their contributions to the UNCTAD technical assistance programme on GSP in order to allow developing countries to benefit fully. Those preference-giving countries and their exporters which had not yet fully taken advantage of GSP should participate actively in these technical assistance activities. The Special Committee on Preferences was requested to examine the scope and possible modalities for extending preferential treatment to developing countries with respect to goods, in accordance with the principles and objectives underlying GSP. In expectation of MFN rates being brought down pending a successful conclusion of the Uruguay Round of multilateral negotiations, preference-giving countries should consider increasing preferential margins and duty-free treatment offered under existing preferential schemes.

Rules of origin

In order to facilitate discussions and find solutions to questions relating to the rules of origin under GSP, the UNCTAD secretariat submitted a report⁽¹⁴⁾ containing an examination of definitions of "substantial transformation" and implications of harmonization; possible initiatives in regard to simplification and liberalization. It examined and compared the two definitions of "substantial transformation", namely, the "process" criterion and the limitations which its applications placed upon the use of imported materials, components and parts in the manufacture of a product. In order to improve the rules of origin, the report also discussed the possibilities and implications of introducing harmonization of the current definition and other initiatives.

In August,⁽¹⁵⁾ the UNCTAD secretariat submitted responses to its questionnaire on this issue received from eight preference-giving countries. The questionnaire had sought information on practical problems encountered by manufacturers in seeking to produce goods to satisfy various origin rules and comments by manufacturers and certifying authorities.

Trade promotion and facilitation

In 1992, United Nations bodies continued to assist developing countries to promote their exports and facilitate the movement of goods in international commerce, with the main originator of technical cooperation projects in that area being the International Trade Centre (ITC).

International Trade Centre

During 1992, ITC, under the joint sponsorship of UNCTAD and GATT, continued its technical cooperation activities, serving as a focal point for United Nations assistance to developing countries in formulating and implementing trade promotion programmes. In response to a 1991 recommendation of its Joint Advisory Group (JAG), ITC conducted an independent programme evaluation of its activities in commodity trade, development and promotion⁽¹⁶⁾ for the purpose of assessing the relevance, effectiveness and impact of ITC's objectives and related strategy in the area of commodities, examining the factors associated with its results and formulating recommendations concerning future orientation and methodologies of its work in these areas.

The report concluded that ITC was the only organization which specialized in the marketing and distribution aspects of commodities and its exposure/effectiveness was very high; its commodity work was oriented to the specific needs of developing countries and met most of the United Nations global priorities; and it had been realistic in its project design and in getting the message across to the people doing the actual work. However, ITC was working under financial constraints as its resources never matched its technical cooperation requirements.

The evaluation recommended as a commodity strategy that the commodity-specific interregional approach should be continued and the commodity work/strategy extended to ensure follow-up on interregional work at the national level; more attention should be given to solving funding constraints by generating extra business; a strategic marketing group should be formed; the thinking of the country desk officers and the commodity group needed to be reoriented; more use should be made of dissemination seminars and workshops to demonstrate ITC capabilities; the commodity group should produce a series of commodity-specific modules; and ITC publications should be more widely distributed. In relation to commodity coverage, the evaluation recommended that minerals and metals should be assessed like other commodities; a minimum of one or two interregional projects at a time should be ensured in each commodity; market surveys in Eastern Europe should be expanded and seed money found for pilot projects, new project ideas and the investigation of other commodities. Other recommendations were made to improve ITC's project design and implementation and to address the financial implications of its strengthened mandate in commodities.

JAG action. JAG held its twenty-fifth session at Geneva on 26 and 27 November 1992.(17) It considered the report on ITC's 1991 activities(18) and underlined the key role played by ITC in assisting developing countries in their trade promotion and export development efforts. It stressed the importance of filling, as soon as possible, the ITC vacant post of Executive Director and other top management and professional vacancies to permit the organization to continue to provide steady support to developing countries' trade promotion efforts. It expressed particular concern about resource constraints that had affected the Centre's work in 1991 and exhorted the ITC trust fund donor community and UNDP to do their utmost to ensure an adequate flow of resources to ITC commensurate with the increasing trade promotion requirements of developing countries. JAG also singled out specific areas of global concern, such as the environment, as requiring special ITC emphasis.

Global trust fund

An ITC technical meeting was held at Geneva from 27 to 29 January 1992(19) to consider proposals for setting up a global trust fund and a consultative committee. The meeting recommended that JAG should accept the proposals for establishing a global trust fund and a consultative committee and invited the donor country representatives to consult with their capitals with a view to announcing possible contributions to the global fund at JAG's twenty-fifth session.

Financial report

In accordance with a 1991 General Assembly request,(20) the Secretary-General submitted an October report on ITC's administrative system.(21) He reported that a joint review had been conducted by ITC and United Nations Secretariat officials and the resulting understanding on financial issues was communicated to the ITC Executive Director. Subsequently, a corresponding revision to the administrative instruction on the delegation of authority in financial matters was issued in February 1992 and a revised delegation of authority on matters related to personnel administration was conveyed to the Centre. Based on the clear understanding that both the Staff Regulations and Rules and the Financial Regulations and Rules of the United Nations were applicable to ITC, the Secretary-General was of the view that the review's results constituted a reasonable and viable framework for ITC's administrative system. In the financial report and audited financial statements for ITC for the biennium ended 31 December 1991,(22) the Board of Auditors indicated that the United Nations Secretariat decision did not receive the approval of ITC and GATT and, consequently, certain issues were still under discussion. However, in the opinion of the Secretary-General, the only issue to be considered in the review requested by the Assembly was the degree of authority delegated by the Secretary-General to the Centre's Executive Director.

On 23 December 1992, by resolution 47/211, the Assembly accepted the financial report and audited financial statements for the biennium ended 31 December 1991 and took note of the Secretary-General's report on ITC's administrative system.

Trade efficiency

UNCTAD VIII action. In the Cartagena Commitment,(3) UNCTAD VIII noted that new techniques, such as electronic data interchange (EDI) and other procedures in international trade transactions, were capable of producing substantial time and money savings. It recommended that UNCTAD programmes should give special attention to integrating less advanced countries and regions into this process to give them access to new sources of trade competitiveness. It requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General to initiate consultations with member States to establish an expert group on trade efficiency. The culmination of the expert group's work, said the Conference, should be a 1994 international symposium on trade efficiency, which should reinforce international discussion on harmonized national and regional infrastructures for trade and trade efficiency, focusing especially on the need to involve all countries in efficient trade and to promote the participation of small and medium-sized enterprises in international trade.

Transparency in trade-related information should be fostered by increasing awareness of opportunities to access publicly available market information. Efforts to establish EDI standards should be supported so that the business interests and concerns of all countries, in particular developing countries, were represented and complemented through international cooperation. UNCTAD should continue to strengthen its analytical and technical cooperation in trade efficiency, including through experiments carried out jointly with the private and public sectors of pilot countries. The Conference urged countries to increase trade efficiency through the use of information technology, especially in the areas of trade facilitation and customs automation. All countries were encouraged to adopt laws, regulations and policies to reduce barriers to trade facilitation through the use of information technology.

Ad Hoc Working Group on Trade Efficiency

On 7 May,(23) TDB established an Ad Hoc Working Group on Trade Efficiency and decided on its terms of reference. At its first meeting (Geneva, 16-20 November),(24) the Working Group adopted its programme of work, which aimed at fostering greater participation in international trade, in particular by small and medium-sized enterprises, giving special attention to countries and regions less advanced in the area of trade efficiency. The main areas of the Group's work would include information flows to build trade efficiency, facilitating trade, working towards trade efficiency, implementing a pilot "Trade Point" programme, providing technical assistance and preparing for the 1994 international symposium on trade efficiency. The UNCTAD Secretary-General was invited to assess the workload and financial implications of the programme's activities, formulate proposals, identify additional funding needs and encourage extrabudgetary contributions. He was requested to establish a core advisory group of experts.

Trade and economic cooperation among developing countries

UNCTAD VIII action. In a section of the Cartagena Commitment(3) on ECDC, UNCTAD VIII stated that, in the new context of market-oriented reforms and export-oriented growth strategies being pursued by most developing countries, ECDC should be seen as a means to secure the integration of developing countries into the world economy and to increase their capacity to produce, achieve economies of scale and become internationally competitive.

Within subregional and regional groupings, the expansion of trade depended on reducing tariffs, eliminating non-tariff barriers, introducing more transparent and simple customs procedures, macroeconomic policy coordination to ensure convergence of national price trends and exchange-rate stability, and effective clearing and payments arrangements, as well as improving physical infrastructure. The allocation of aid resources should support regional trade liberalization among developing countries, and the international community should support the efforts of regional and subregional groupings of developing countries to promote and encourage enterprise and entrepreneurship. Work on the main impediments and disincentives to the expansion of trade among developing countries should be pursued. The secretariat and intergovernmental machinery of UNCTAD should examine the benefits to be derived by developing countries from reducing trade barriers and improving cooperation among them.

In the area of monetary and financial impediments to trade, UNCTAD VIII urged the UNCTAD secretariat to assist developing countries to strengthen and develop their national finance mechanisms. All countries and relevant institutions were invited to cooperate fully with the UNCTAD Secretary-General in his consultations on the feasibility of establishing an interregional trade finance mechanism among developing countries.

Other UNCTAD action. On 7 May,(23) TDB established, in accordance with the Cartagena Commitment,(3) the Standing Committee on ECDC and adopted its terms of reference. The aims of the Committee's activities were to strengthen cooperation, enhance economic growth, increase trade liberalization and transparency, promote developing-country enterprises, facilitate the integration of developing countries into the world economy so as to reduce impediments and disincentives that adversely affected the expansion of cooperation among them, and promote policies aimed at expanding trade.

Expansion of trading opportunities

On 7 May,(23) TDB established an Ad Hoc Working Group on Expansion of Trading Opportunities for Developing Countries. At its first meeting (Geneva, 14-18 December 1992),(25) the Working Group established its programme of work, under which it intended to study global trends and issues affecting the trading opportunities of developing countries, analyse prospects for expanding trade opportunities and consider technical cooperation issues.

Restrictive business practices

The UNCTAD Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Restrictive Business Practices held its eleventh session at Geneva from 23 to 27 November 1992.(26) It had before it a note by the UNCTAD secretariat(27) containing replies from 18 States and the Commission of the European Communities on steps taken by them to meet their commitment to the Set of Multilaterally Agreed Equitable Principles and Rules for the Control of Restrictive Business Practices (known as the Set).(28) Other notes submitted by the secretariat were on studies related to the provisions of the Set and technical assistance, advisory and training programmes(29) and on information and consultations procedures on restrictive business practices;(30) proposed amendments to the revised draft of possible elements for articles of a model law or laws, and commentaries on the elements;(31) and the compilation of a handbook on restrictive business practices legislation.(32) The secretariat also submitted a revised report on the concentration of market power, through mergers, take-overs, joint ventures and other acquisitions of control, and its effects on international markets, in particular the markets of developing countries.(33) Communications were received from France(34) and OECD.(35)

On 27 November,(26) the Group of Experts adopted its conclusions, agreeing that the secretariat should finalize the study on concentration of market power and prepare a study on competition policy and economic reforms in developing and other countries; revise the check-list for requests for information and consultations; prepare and circulate an updated directory on competition authorities; improve the dissemination of information on restrictive business practices in goods and services through its annual and quarterly reports and keep other bodies of UNCTAD informed as appropriate; continue the elaboration of the model law or laws and handbook; continue to provide technical assistance, advisory and training services in the area of competition policy to developing countries and countries in transition; and undertake a review of technical cooperation activities in the field of competition policy by member States and international organizations to enable the Group of Experts at its twelfth (1993) session to evaluate ways to improve the effectiveness of UNCTAD's technical assistance.

UNCTAD VIII action. In the Cartagena Commitment,(3) UNCTAD VIII agreed that UNCTAD should pursue, through the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Restrictive Business Practices, its work with regard to policies and rules for the control of restrictive business practices in order to encourage competition, promote the proper functioning of markets and resource allocation, and bring about further liberalization of international trade. Efforts should be made by national Governments or regional authorities to implement fully the provisions of the Set and develop cooperation between national competition authorities, including competent authorities of regional groupings. UNCTAD's work should cover goods and services and its secretariat and developed countries should provide upon request developing and other countries with technical cooperation in the area of competition policy.

Commodities

The World Economic Survey 1992(2) stated that the average price of non-fuel commodities, as measured by the combined index of nominal dollar prices of UNCTAD, declined by 6.3 per cent in 1991. Measured in special drawing rights (SDRs), the decline was 7.4 per cent, reflecting the slight overall depreciation of the dollar. In real terms, the decline in prices was around 6 per cent, as the prices of manufactured goods exports of industrialized countries remained practically unchanged. The continuing fall of commodity prices, which started to weaken in 1989, mainly reflected demand conditions as a consequence of the recession in developed market economies. Commodity prices were also influenced by the supply and demand shocks to several markets resulting from the breakup of the USSR and increased participation of Eastern European economies in Western commodity markets. The dismantling of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance (CMEA) and other trading arrangements between the former USSR and several developing countries created other types of market dislocations.

Among the major commodity groups, food prices declined by 6.6 per cent. Sugar led the decline with a loss of 27 per cent of free-market prices. Wheat prices recovered but tropical beverages fell. Surpluses of coffee and cocoa took prices to their lowest levels in 16 years. The vegetable oils and oilseeds commodity group was the only one to register an increase in prices. Prices of most agricultural raw materials declined, leading to an overall decline in the UNCTAD index of those prices of 8.1 per cent. The composite index of minerals, ores and metals prices declined by 9.4 per cent, the steepest decline of all commodity groups.

Negotiations aimed at reviving stalled price-stabilization schemes produced no significant results.

The Trade and Development Report, 1992(1) stated that the considerable difference in the behaviour of primary commodity export prices between the developed market economies and the developing economies in 1990 and 1991, with prices in the latter having risen more in 1990 and fallen more in 1991, was primarily due to large changes in petroleum prices over those two years and the greater importance of petroleum exports for the developing world. The fall in international prices of fuels was explained largely by the behaviour of crude oil prices.

In response to a 1990 General Assembly request,(36) the UNCTAD Secretary-General submitted a September report on world commodity trends and prospects, with particular emphasis on commodity-dependent developing countries in the light of the outcome of UNCTAD VIII.(37) It summarized developments in the commodity situation and outlook since his 1990 report to the Assembly,(38) and the agreed commitments on commodities at UNCTAD VIII (see below). It discussed recent developments in the functioning and transparency of commodity markets, changes in the commodity sector, with particular relevance to commodity export dependency, and developments in market access for commodity products. It also addressed the issue of management of natural resources in the context of sustainable development.

UNCTAD VIII action. The Cartagena Commitment(3) agreed that the international community's goals should be to improve the functioning of the commodity market by reducing distortions affecting supply and demand; optimize the contribution of the commodities sector to development; achieve a gradual reduction in excessive dependence on the export of primary commodities through horizontal and vertical diversification of production and exports; improve market access for commodity products through a progressive removal of barriers to international trade and improve market transparency; and ensure proper management of natural resources to achieve sustainable development. The Conference further agreed to a number of policy measures to achieve those goals. It urged producers and consumers of individual commodities to examine ways and means to reinforce and improve their cooperation towards solving problems in the commodity area. It recommended that an optimal functioning of commodity markets should be sought through, inter alia, improved market transparency involving exchanges of views and information on investment plans, prospects and markets for individual commodities. Substantive negotiations between producers and consumers should be pursued to achieve viable and more efficient international agreements, taking into account market trends or arrangements, and with particular attention being paid to the agreements on cocoa, coffee, sugar and tropical timber.

The Conference underlined the importance of full and active participation by consumers and producers in international commodity agreements and arrangements, taking into account occupational health and safety matters, technology transfer and services associated with production, marketing and promotion of commodities, as well as environmental considerations. Cooperation among producers and consumers should be strengthened, especially in situations of large stock overhangs.

Comprehensive commodity-sector strategies should be put in place within a macroeconomic policy framework, taking into consideration a country's economic structure, resource endowments and market opportunities. Such strategies should include the setting up of an enabling national environment to encourage the mobilization of domestic and international finance; the provision of specific incentives to encourage private enterprise and private investment; the development and maintenance of commodity-related power, transport and communications infrastructure; the provision of support services and training for human resources development; and support for commodity research arrangements. Strategies should equally encompass measures to improve the competitiveness of traditional commodity exports and programmes and action to encourage diversification, particularly in countries highly dependent on commodities for export earnings. Particular attention should also be paid to the financial and physical support structures for trading commodities, and new market possibilities should be assessed and exploited.

Concerning international support for national commodity policies, the Conference called for concerted efforts by developed countries and international organizations to support national commodity policies in developing countries and in countries undergoing transition to a market economy, including providing technical cooperation for commodity development. It was urgent to improve market access conditions, notably the progressive removal of barriers restricting imports, particularly from developing countries, of commodity products in primary and processed forms, as well as the substantial and progressive reduction of types of support that induced uncompetitive production, such as production and export subsidies. Improved market access through a successful conclusion to the Uruguay Round would contribute to a favourable international trading environment, and improved flows of technology to developing countries were important for lowering commodity production costs and encouraging economic development. The free flow of information and science to allow innovation and transfer of technology should be promoted and supported through policies to promote increased collaboration among firms in developing and developed countries.

The Conference affirmed the need for adequate official bilateral, multilateral and private resources, including private investment, to finance diversification projects and programmes, and the promotion and development of resource-based industries, including commodity-related services activities. In that regard it agreed support should be directed towards institution-building, promotion of entrepreneurship, horizontal diversification and crop substitution, and increased participation in processing, marketing and distribution, including transportation, as well as towards achieving a gradual reduction of excessive commodity dependency. It recognized that increased coordination among donor country Governments and international institutions was essential and should avoid inconsistencies in advice and potential over-investment in particular sectors.

Welcoming compensatory mechanisms introduced by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the European Economic Community (EEC), UNCTAD VIII invited other countries to consider introducing such mechanisms and called on Governments and institutions to improve those already existing. It recommended the avoidance of market manipulation in determining international commodity prices.

It also recognized the importance of commodities for sustainable development and recommended the manner in which prices of natural commodities and their synthetic competitors could reflect environmental costs and resource values; the means by which the competitiveness of natural products with environmental advantages could be improved, the commodity sector developed, and environmental concerns made mutually reinforcing; and additional international financial and technical support to developing countries for the development and dissemination of technologies to cope with environment problems that were specific to commodity production and processing.

With regard to UNCTAD's role, the Conference stated that UNCTAD should remain the principal forum and continue to coordinate the activities of all the bodies involved in the commodity field, including conducting periodic and global reviews of the situation of, and prospects for, commodities so as to be able to recommend appropriate actions for consideration by Governments and institutions. In order to evolve an international commodity policy for the 1990s, the UNCTAD secretariat should undertake a thorough review of the international commodity economy and policy and define a possible course of action for submission to TDB. UNCTAD should continue to assist in diversification, processing, marketing and distribution programmes, the improvement of information flows to aid investment decisions, and technical cooperation projects and programmes, particularly for human resources development. It agreed that UNCTAD should keep under continuous review the problems of shortfalls in the commodity export earnings of developing countries arising from market fluctuations and matters relating to compensatory financing of export earnings shortfalls.

The UNCTAD secretariat should follow developments in various compensatory financing schemes and their implications for developing countries. It should explore various mechanisms, including marked-linked price-hedging mechanisms, such as commodity futures, options, swaps and bonds, and obstacles to their potential use, including sovereign risk and problems of creditworthiness. UNCTAD should also explore the modalities for overcoming those obstacles and provide information and assistance in this regard. At the level of governmental and non-governmental experts, UNCTAD should examine the technical and regulatory conditions for encouraging maximum participation in, and usage of, commodity exchanges by both buyers and sellers of commodities and proposals to address these conditions. UNCTAD should also explore the links between commodity policies, use and management of natural resources and sustainable development and provide information and technical cooperation.

UNCED action. In its recommendations for improving international cooperation in commodity trade and the diversification of the sector, UNCED(39) echoed the conclusions and recommendations of UNCTAD VIII on commodity policies for the 1990s aimed at strengthening national capabilities for the design and implementation of commodity policy, the use and management of natural resources and the gathering and utilization of information on commodity markets. (For further details on UNCED, see PART THREE, Chapter VIII.)

Standing Committee on Commodities. In accordance with the Cartagena Commitment,(3) TDB, on 7 May 1992,(23) established the Standing Committee on Commodities and decided on its terms of reference. At its first meeting (Geneva, 19-23 October),(40) the Committee adopted its work programme covering the situation and prospects for commodities, its contribution to improving the functioning of commodity markets, compensatory financing mechanisms, reducing excessive dependence on primary commodities, fostering sustainable development in the commodity field and technical cooperation. The Committee established, as its subsidiary organs, the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Tungsten and the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Iron Ore.

Common Fund for Commodities

The Agreement Establishing the Common Fund for Commodities, a mechanism intended to stabilize the commodities market by helping to finance buffer stocks of specific commodities as well as commodity development activities such as research and marketing, entered into force in 1989, and the Fund became operational that year. The Common Fund for Commodities informed the Secretary-General that, pursuant to article 30 of the Agreement, Australia had notified it on 15 August 1991 of its decision to withdraw from the Fund with effect from 20 August 1992.

Signatures and ratifications

As at 31 December 1992,(41) taking into account Australia's withdrawal, the 1980 Agreement Establishing the Common Fund for Commodities had been signed by 118 States and EEC and, with the accession of Thailand on 6 August 1992, 105 States and EEC had become parties to it.

UNCTAD VIII action. In the Cartagena Commitment,(3) UNCTAD VIII welcomed the coming into force of the Common Fund for Commodities and its potential contribution to support international commodity cooperation. It urged maximum participation in the Fund and stressed that its resources should be fully exploited. Arrears in the payment of subscriptions to the Fund's capital, which could be an impediment to the achievement of its objectives, should be paid up as soon as possible; resources of its Second Account should be increased, particularly through the fulfilment of pledges of voluntary contributions, as soon as possible; efforts to elaborate and consider appropriate project proposals, including those for diversification, for financing through the Second Account should be speeded up; and every effort should be made to ensure that the account became fully operational as soon as possible to benefit, in particular, LDCs and the commodities of interest to developing countries, particularly those of small producers-exporters.

Individual commodities

Agricultural commodities

Cocoa. The United Nations Cocoa Conference, 1992, held three sessions at Geneva (21 April to 1 May, 6 to 24 July and 2 to 13 November 1992) to negotiate a successor arrangement to the International Cocoa Agreement, 1986,(42) which had been extended in part for two years, effective 1 October 1990.

On 13 November,(43) the Conference affirmed the determination of producing and consuming countries to conclude the negotiation of a new international cocoa agreement at the next meeting of the Conference, scheduled for early 1993. It requested the Conference's President to maintain contacts with producing and consuming countries with a view to assisting the Conference in achieving a successful conclusion.

Olive oil. The International Agreement on Olive Oil and Table Olives, 1986, due to expire on 31 December 1992, was prolonged until 31 December 1993. The International Olive Oil Council prepared a draft protocol for extending the 1986 Agreement with amendments which would be submitted to the United Nations Conference on Olive Oil and Table Olives, 1993.

Rubber. The International Natural Rubber Agreement, 1987, which entered into force provisionally on 29 December 1988 and definitively on 3 April 1989, would expire on 28 December 1993 unless extended before then by the International Natural Rubber Council. The Council held its twenty-fifth session from 25 to 27 May 1992, at which it set up a working group to consider the renegotiation of the 1987 Agreement. On 1 December 1992, the Council decided, inter alia, that a decision to renegotiate the Agreement would be taken not later than 30 March 1993.

Sugar. The International Sugar Agreement, 1987, due to expire on 31 December 1992, was extended to 31 December 1993 to allow for the negotiation of a new agreement. A working group, which met on 28 February to consider the terms of a new administrative agreement, prepared a revised draft text and submitted it to the United Nations Sugar Conference, 1992, held from 16 to 20 March 1992. The Conference established the text as the International Sugar Agreement, 1992,(44) which was open for signature at United Nations Headquarters from 1 May until 31 December 1992. The new Agreement would come into force on 1 January 1993 if instruments of ratification had been deposited by Governments holding 60 per cent of the votes allocated by the Conference. The agreement could be extended beyond 31 December 1995 for successive periods, not exceeding two years on each occasion.

As at 31 December 1992,(41) the International Sugar Agreement, 1992, had been signed by 27 States, 8 States had formally ratified, accepted or approved it, and 7 States had provided notifications of provisional application.

Minerals and metals

Copper. In accordance with the terms of reference of the International Copper Study Group, a meeting was held at Geneva on 23 and 24 January 1992⁽⁴⁵⁾ of States and intergovernmental organizations that had already notified their provisional or definitive acceptance of the terms of reference and other States that had attended the United Nations Conference on Copper, 1988, to decide whether to put the terms of reference into force provisionally or definitively. On 23 January,⁽⁴⁶⁾ Belgium/Luxembourg, Chile, China, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Peru, the Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Spain, the United States and EEC decided to put the terms of reference into force definitively among themselves in whole as of that date. The meeting also decided to hold the Study Group's inaugural meeting in July 1992 and requested members to send their views on the draft rules and amendments thereto to the UNCTAD secretariat before then.

The inaugural meeting of the International Copper Study Group took place at Geneva from 22 to 26 June 1992.⁽⁴⁷⁾ The Group established an Industry Advisory Panel and a Standing Committee, adopted its rules of procedure and amended its terms of reference. It postponed action on the location of its headquarters and on the appointment of its Secretary-General.

Iron ore. The first session of the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Iron Ore, established in accordance with a decision of the Standing Committee on Commodities,⁽⁴⁰⁾ was held at Geneva from 26 to 28 October 1992.⁽⁴⁸⁾ The meeting reviewed iron ore statistics, the current situation and outlook for iron ore and reviewed a bibliography of relevant studies on iron ore.

Tin. As at 31 December 1992, 12 countries and EEC, representing one third of world trade in tin, had notified their definitive or provisional acceptance of the terms of reference of the International Tin Study Group, adopted by the United Nations Tin Conference, 1988. Entry into force of the terms of reference required States accounting for 70 per cent of trade in tin to notify their acceptance.

An informal meeting of tin-producing and -consuming countries took place at Geneva on 10 December 1992. It requested the UNCTAD secretariat to continue to publish the International Tin Statistics Quarterly Bulletin.

Tungsten. In accordance with a 1991 decision of the Committee on Tungsten,⁽⁴⁹⁾ an Ad Hoc Meeting on Tungsten was held at Geneva on 2 and 3 July 1992.⁽⁵⁰⁾ It considered project proposals by Governments for possible financing under the Second Account of the Common Fund for Commodities. The Meeting examined a revised project by China⁽⁵⁾ and proposals by the International Tungsten Industry Association.⁽⁵²⁾

In accordance with the decision of the Committee on Commodities⁽³⁷⁾ to establish an Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Tungsten to succeed the former Committee on Tungsten, the Group held its first session from 7 to 11 December 1992,⁽⁵³⁾ and had before it an UNCTAD secretariat report on recent developments and the short-term outlook in the tungsten market.⁽⁵⁴⁾ The Group of Experts examined statistics and reviewed the current market situation of and outlook for the tungsten industry; considered industry views on particular aspects of tungsten; ways and means to improve the functioning and stability of the tungsten market through strengthened international cooperation between Governments and industries of producing and consuming countries; and considered project proposals by Governments and industry for possible financing under the Second Account of the Common Fund for Commodities.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December 1992, in accordance with the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/185 without vote.

Commodities

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 1995(XIX) of 30 December 1964, as amended, on the establishment of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, 41/168 of 5 December 1986, 43/27 of 18 November 1988, 44/218 of 22 December 1989 and 45/200 of 21 December 1990, as well as United Nations Conference on Trade and Development resolutions 93(IV) of 30 May 1976, on the Integrated Programme for Commodities, 124(V) of 3 June 1979, and 155(VI) and 157(VI) of 2 July 1983, the Final Act adopted by the Conference at its seventh session, held at Geneva from 9 July to 3 August 1987, and the Agreement Establishing the Common Fund for Commodities, which entered into force on 19 June 1989, and taking note of a document entitled "A New Partnership for Development: The Cartagena Commitment", adopted by the Conference at its eighth session, held at Cartagena de Indias, Colombia, from 8 to 25 February 1992,

Recalling also the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, and welcoming the importance attached in Agenda 21 to issues related to commodities in the context of sustainable development,

Recognizing that commodity exports continue to play a key role in the economies of developing countries as a whole, as a major source of export earnings, investment and livelihood, although recognizing also that this role should decrease as diversification expands,

Concerned about the difficulties experienced by developing countries in financing and implementing diversification programmes,

Concerned also that the prevalence of declining prices for most commodities contributes to many countries' problems with export earnings,

Recalling the proposal, made by the Government of Colombia at the eighth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, to consider convening a world conference on commodities which would bring together producers, consumers, marketing enterprises and other market actors and would be organized by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, recognizing that such a conference could contribute to shaping a coherent international commodity strategy that would take into account the specific problems of selected commodity sectors,

Welcoming the agreed conclusions establishing the work programme of the Standing Committee on Commodities,

1. Takes note with interest of the report of the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development on world commodity trends and prospects, with particular emphasis on commodity-dependent developing countries in the light of the outcome of the eighth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development;

2. Emphasizes the need for developing countries that are heavily dependent on primary commodities to continue to promote a domestic policy and an institutional environment that encourage diversification and enhance competitiveness, and stresses the need for international cooperation effectively to complement and support those national efforts and policies, inter alia, by way of creating a more favourable international economic and trading environment;

3. Stresses that the solution to commodity problems calls for sound, compatible and consistent policies at the national and international levels, bearing in mind the broad aims of the Integrated Programme for Commodities;

4. Urges producers and consumers of individual commodities to continue to explore ways and means of reinforcing their cooperation and to consider actively participating in international commodity agreements and arrangements that take into account market trends in order to achieve more efficient international commodity cooperation;

5. Notes the decision taken by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development at its eighth session to invite the Secretary-General of the Conference to hold consultations on the question of a world conference on commodities;

6. Expresses its conviction that supportive international policies, such as the use of commodity exchanges and commodity price risk management instruments, more stable and predictable conditions in commodity trade, and efficient and transparent price setting, all contribute significantly to the efforts of commodity-dependent countries to revitalize their development;

7. Emphasizes the importance of maximizing the contribution of the commodity sector to economic growth and transformation in commodity-dependent developing countries by ensuring that development in the commodity sector contributes effectively to the generation of growth and development in other sectors of the economy, as well as to the eradication of poverty, and, in this context, also stresses the importance of the diversification efforts of commodity-exporting developing countries;

8. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to identify, on the basis of relevant national experiences, potential developmental linkages between the commodity sector and other sectors of the economy, as well as appropriate actions required at the national and international levels to establish and develop such linkages in the context of an effective diversification policy, and to include them in his report to the General Assembly at its forty-ninth session;

9. Recognizes the need to strengthen efforts to analyse shortfalls in the commodity export earnings of developing countries with a view to addressing this problem, and takes note of the decision of the Standing Committee on Commodities that the issue of shortfalls in export earnings and compensatory financing should figure as a specific issue for consideration at its future sessions, in accordance with its terms of reference and work programme;

10. Reiterates once again its conviction that more stable and predictable market conditions for commodities would be conducive to the social and economic development of developing countries and could, inter alia, contribute to the international campaign against illicit production of, trafficking in and abuse of narcotic drugs, thus supporting the efforts undertaken by countries to combat such illicit activities;

11. Emphasizes that, in line with Agenda 21, sustainable development of the commodity sector may require, inter alia, the reflection of environmental and resource costs in prices, improvements in the market access and competitiveness of natural products from developing countries, with environmental advantages, and improvements in their access to international financial and technical support, including environmentally sound technologies to cope with environmental problems specific to commodity production and processing;

12. Urges once again all the parties involved, especially those developed countries that have not yet done so, to meet their agreed commitments and to work for a balanced, equitable, meaningful and satisfactory outcome to the multilateral trade negotiations within the Uruguay Round so as to ensure that the successful conclusion of the negotiations brings about further expansion and liberalization of trade in commodities, taking into account the special and differential treatment for developing countries, as well as all other principles contained in the Ministerial Declaration on the Uruguay Round;

13. Notes with satisfaction the establishment of the Common Fund for Commodities, urges its full exploitation and notes the hope expressed by member countries of the Fund that further voluntary contributions will be forthcoming;

14. Notes the desire of the members of the Common Fund that countries, particularly major exporters and consumers of commodities, that have not yet ratified the Agreement Establishing the Common Fund for Commodities should do so as soon as possible;

15. Decides to include the question of commodities in the agenda of its forty-ninth session.

General Assembly resolution 47/185

22 December 1992 Meeting 93 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/47/718/Add.2) without vote, 7 December (meeting 48); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/47/L.69), based on informal consultations on draft by Pakistan for Group of 77 (A/C.2/47/L.32), as orally amended; agenda item 78 (a).

Meeting numbers. GA 47th session: 2nd Committee 40, 42, 43, 48; plenary 93.

Environment and trade

The World Economic Survey 1992(2) noted that issues of the environment had become increasingly important at both national and international levels in recent years and international trade had important implications for the environment. Rules governing the multilateral trading system had not ignored environmental issues. Although GATT had no specific rules for the protection of the environment, its provisions allowed exceptions to the normal rules on environmental grounds. The Agreement on Technical Barriers to Trade under the Tokyo Round of multilateral trade negotiations also allowed signatories to deviate from international regulations and standards for health, safety and environmental considerations. A number of other areas of negotiations under the ongoing Uruguay Round involved issues relating to the environment. GATT had also established groups to promote environmental awareness in the trade sector. The United Nations Environment Programme listed 152 international agreements and instruments relating to environmental matters linked indirectly to international trade. However, the Survey contended that the protection of the environment and promotion of trade needed a set of rules that were acceptable to all trading nations.

UNCTAD VIII action. In the Cartagena Commitment,(3) UNCTAD VIII recognized that improved market access for developing-country exports, in conjunction with sound environmental policies, would have a positive environmental impact. It stressed that environmental policies should deal with the root causes of environmental degradation, thus preventing environmental measures from resulting in unnecessary restrictions to trade. Trade policy measures for environmental purposes should not constitute a means of arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination or a disguised restriction on international trade. Environmental measures addressing transborder or global environmental problems should, as far as possible, be based on an international consensus. The Conference also identified certain rules and principles which should apply should trade policies be required to enforce environmental policies.

The Conference recommended that UNCTAD, at both the intergovernmental and secretariat levels, should undertake in-depth work on clarifying the linkages between trade and environment and on the need for environmental protection to coexist with liberal trade policies and free market access. It should also contribute to consensus building with regard to appropriate principles and rules. The Conference also requested the UNCTAD secretariat to undertake studies, analyse policy measures and carry out technical cooperation in the area of trade and sustainable development. In particular, the secretariat should analyse the relationship between environmental policy and trade and the impact of developments in this field on developing countries, taking into account the work of GATT, OECD, UNCED and other relevant forums.

UNCTAD should continue to collect, analyse and disseminate information on environmental regulations and measures which could have an impact on trade, especially that of developing countries. It requested donor countries to continue contributing extrabudgetary resources to further strengthen UNCTAD's work on interlinkages between environment, trade and sustainable development, including the adjustment of the Trade Control Measures Information System.

The Conference, in its message to UNCED (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII), noted that UNCTAD was uniquely placed to undertake analysis and build consensus on relevant policies on the inter-related areas of trade and development and protection of the environment. It outlined action already taken by UNCTAD with respect to sustainable development, including environmental measures and trade rules, declaring that a revitalized UNCTAD could contribute to the implementation of the programmes to be adopted by UNCED.

Following UNCED in June, the UNCTAD secretariat submitted to TDB in August a report(55) on sustainable development. It discussed cross-sectoral issues and sectoral links, including commodities, industry, energy and the promotion of the transfer, adaptation and generation of environmentally sound technologies.

UNCED action. Agenda 21, adopted by UNCED,(39) dealt with the issue of international cooperation to accelerate sustainable development in developing countries and related domestic policies. It stressed that the international economy should provide a supportive international climate for achieving environment and development goals by promoting sustainable development through trade liberalization, making trade and environment mutually supportive. This would also provide adequate financial resources to developing countries to deal with international debt and encourage macroeconomic policies conducive to environment and development. In that regard, it identified two programme areas: promoting sustainable development through trade and making trade and environment mutually supportive. Governments should strive, through multilateral forums, to make international trade and environment policies mutually supportive in favour of sustainable development, clarify the role of GATT, UNCTAD and other international organizations in dealing with trade and environment-related issues, including conciliation procedures and dispute settlement, and encourage international productivity and competitiveness and a constructive role on the part of industry in dealing with environment and development issues.

UNCED recommended that Governments encourage GATT, UNCTAD and other international and regional economic institutions to examine a number of propositions and principles, namely: to elaborate adequate studies for the better understanding of the relationship between trade and environment; to promote a dialogue between trade, development and environment communities; in those cases where trade measures related to environment were used, to ensure transparency and compatibility with international obligations; to deal with the root causes of environment and development problems to avoid adopting environmental measures resulting in unjustified restrictions on trade; to avoid the use of trade restrictions or distortions as a means to offset differences in costs arising from differences in environmental standards and regulations; to ensure that environment-related regulations or standards, including those related to health and safety standards, did not constitute a means of arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination or a disguised restriction on trade; to ensure that special factors affecting environment and trade policies in the developing countries were borne in mind in applying environmental standards and in using any trade measures, since standards valid in most advanced countries could be inappropriate and of unwarranted social cost for the developing countries; to encourage participation of developing countries in multilateral agreements through such mechanisms as special transition rules; and to avoid unilateral actions to deal with environmental challenges outside the jurisdiction of the importing country.

Environment measures addressing transborder or global environment problems should, as far as possible, be based on an environmental consensus. Should trade policy measures be found necessary to enforce environment policies, certain principles and rules should apply, including the principle of non-discrimination; development of more precision and clarification of the relationship between GATT provisions and some of the multilateral measures adopted in the environment areas; ensuring public input into the formation, negotiation and implementation of trade policies as a means of fostering increased transparency in the light of country-specific conditions; and developing environmental policies that provided the appropriate legal and institutional framework to respond to new needs for the protection of the environment, resulting from changes in production and trade specialization.

In a chapter dealing with international institutional arrangements, UNCED stated that UNCTAD should play an important role in implementing Agenda 21, taking into account the importance of the interrelationship between development, international trade and the environment, in accordance with its mandate in the area of sustainable development.

The General Assembly, on 22 December, by resolution 47/191, requested TDB to examine the relevant provisions of Agenda 21 at its next session and report to the Assembly in 1993 on specific plans to implement them.

Consumer protection

In accordance with a 1990 Economic and Social Council request,⁽⁵⁶⁾ the Secretary-General submitted a July report on consumer protection.⁽⁵⁷⁾ The report covered activities relating to the implementation of the guidelines for consumer protection, adopted by the General Assembly in 1985.⁽⁵⁸⁾ The report discussed implementation of those guidelines by Governments and regional and international cooperation in their implementation, as well as the activities of NGOs. It examined the issue of the environment, financial services and the consumer and concluded that there was growing recognition that consumer policy was essential to the effective workings of modern market economies.

Within the United Nations Secretariat, the Department of Economic and Social Development had elaborated project proposals within the scope of the programme of action through 1995. However, the demand for assistance, particularly by developing and emerging market economies, far exceeded the current capacity of the Secretariat to meet it from the regular budget. In addition, many Governments made requests for regional seminars, training and advisory services and education and information programmes based on the guidelines. There were no resources to carry out the international programme for consumer protection and the report suggested that Member States might wish to consider, on the basis of progress already achieved and the continuing need for assistance, adopting the necessary measures to provide the resources required to carry out the programme activities envisaged.

By decision 1992/284 of 30 July 1992, the Economic and Social Council took note of the Secretary-General's report.

Services

UNCTAD VIII action. In the Cartagena Commitment,⁽³⁾ UNCTAD VIII agreed that developing countries should pursue policies to develop the services sectors of their economies, particularly producer services. Policies to be adopted by developing countries could include modernization and expansion of infrastructure, particularly telecommunications and information services; development of human resources and of knowledge-intensive services; measures to encourage investment and cross-border trade in the services sector and to make use of services from competitive domestic suppliers in developing countries; the progressive liberalization of the services sector and the formulation of strategies to improve domestic services capabilities and for internationally competitive services; enhancing cooperation at the interregional, regional and subregional levels, including mutual trade liberalization, and the improvement of skills and infrastructures to promote services exports; and improving the infrastructure to support effective participation in negotiations on services at the regional and multilateral levels.

With regard to international policies, UNCTAD VIII agreed that Governments should support progressive multilateral liberalization, under the draft General Agreement on Trade in Services, in order to promote economic growth and expand world trade in services, and to increase the participation of developing countries. The Conference endorsed the obligation that developed countries, and other national Governments, should maintain contact points, as established under the draft General Agreement on Trade in Services, to facilitate the access of developing countries' services providers to information related to their respective markets.

It further agreed that the international community should continue support for concerted policy actions, including providing financial assistance on concessional terms, promoting training and the acquisition and transfer of technology on terms and conditions agreed by the parties concerned, building up technological and human capabilities of developing countries to enhance their ability to absorb relevant technologies, and constructing and/or improving basic services infrastructures, including subregional and regional transportation, particularly in low-income countries and LDCs.

UNCTAD, in cooperation with other United Nations organizations dealing with services, should continue to promote international cooperation to help developing countries overcome their handicaps, enhance their international competitiveness in order to increase their participation in world trade in services, promote environmentally friendly services and enhance the contribution of services to their sustainable development. Attention should also be given to improving the role of services in countries undergoing transition to a market economy and increasing their trade in services.

The Conference also recognized that technology had increasingly become a determinant of the ability to participate in world trade in manufactures and services and recommended a series of measures for developing technology in developing countries (see PART THREE, Chapter VII).

Standing Committee on Developing Services Sectors. As recommended by UNCTAD VIII,(3) TDB, on 7 May,(23) established the Standing Committee on Developing Services Sectors: Fostering Competitive Services Sectors in Developing Countries, and adopted its terms of reference.

The Standing Committee held its first meeting (Geneva, 26-30 October 1992),(59) at which it established its programme of work, the elements of which were promoting transparency, fostering competitive services sectors and strengthening technical cooperation.

Finance

Financial policy

The Committee for Development Planning, in the report on its April 1992 session,(1) noted that, in the developed market economies, the slide to stagnation and, in some cases, recession and rising unemployment had not been followed by decisive steps on the fiscal or monetary fronts. Policy issues in the countries of Eastern Europe and the former USSR were dominated by the problems of transition from a command economy to a market economy. In developing countries, amidst a great diversity of situations ranging from prolonged stagnation or sharp decline to very high rates of growth, the focus of policy had in many cases shifted to economic liberalization.

The World Economic Survey 1992(2) noted that world economic growth was expected to be restrained in the medium term, not by a shortage of savings, but by an inadequate allocation of the world's resources to investment projects. Some developing countries had demonstrated the "virtuous cycles" that resulted from high investment, high growth policy in the context of relatively well-managed financial and fiscal systems. In other cases, debt overhang and fragile economic situations held back possible investment and growth levels. Among the developed market economies, government investment needed to be increased and international flows augmented to support capital formation in developing and transition economies.

UNCTAD VIII action. UNCTAD VIII(3) agreed that at the national level all countries should deploy sustained efforts to mobilize domestic savings for investment, growth and development to achieve macroeconomic stability and predictability, increased monetary control and greater financial discipline. However, monetary policy should not be overburdened, and use of a wider gamut of policy instruments was needed. Financial liberalization should be accompanied by appropriate institutional reform and by domestic supervisory and prudential arrangements required for a sound national banking system operating in a liberal and secure international financial system. It should be introduced in a context of macroeconomic stability and be compatible with the competitiveness and institutional development of capital markets. Liberalization in those circumstances could help to maximize the contribution of the financial sector to economic development.

UNCTAD VIII agreed that an economically and institutionally efficient public sector would contribute to fostering growth and development. In many countries, public sector reform was essential for improved mobilization and use of savings. Fiscal reform should be introduced, aimed at rationalizing and simplifying the taxation system, protecting government revenues from erosion by inflation and strengthening tax administration. Structural adjustment programmes and international cooperation programmes should take full account of the priorities of the development of human resources, especially with regard to women, particularly to improve the status of rural women, and the provision of basic public goods, including investment in infrastructure, and social services, such as health and education. It also recommended that the efforts of developing countries to improve their policy and regulatory environment so as to attract foreign direct investment (FDI), the return of flight capital and other non-debt-creating financial flows should be further strengthened.

It reiterated the need for developed countries to implement necessary adjustment measures to create a more favourable international economic environment so as to stimulate economic growth in developing countries. They were also encouraged to reduce external and fiscal imbalances and adopt appropriate mixes of fiscal and monetary policies conducive to a decline in interest rates consistent with price stability and an increased stability of exchange rates. UNCTAD VIII called on all countries to consider the possibilities for reducing military expenditure and for channelling the resulting savings towards socially productive uses. It welcomed reductions under way or planned by developed countries and urged them to continue those efforts in order to accelerate the reduction of external and fiscal imbalances and increase the availability of development finance. The Conference urged developing countries to reduce military spending, recognizing the positive effects that such a reduction could have on budgetary policies to accelerate growth and development.

Net transfer of resources

A significant turn-round in the transfer of resources between developed and developing countries took place in 1991. The World Economic Survey 1992(2) stated that the developed market economies transferred $25 billion to the developing and transition economies, whereas the year before the advanced industrialized countries had received $24 billion and a similar transfer of $25 billion the year before that. The developing countries, on the other hand, had made transfers abroad of $24 billion to $36 billion in each of the previous four years.

The developing countries did not all share in the inflow. The "capital-surplus" exporters of oil received $19 billion, largely financed by the sale of official reserves and other assets, as well as by capital-market borrowing, mainly to finance reconstruction activities in the Persian Gulf. However, the "capital-importing" countries also shared in the inflow. That was the first positive net transfer to that group of countries since the beginning of the debt crisis in 1982. Most of the change involved a group of countries that had been making very large net resource transfers since 1983, including 15 heavily indebted countries originally associated with a debt-restructuring plan. Aside from those countries, most changes in the net transfer in 1991 were not large, except for the group of "recent surplus countries", the first generation of Asian exporters of manufactures.

In accordance with a 1990 General Assembly resolution,(4) the Secretary-General submitted in September 1992 a report⁽⁵⁾ on the net transfer of resources between developing and developed countries, including consideration of the issue at the United Nations. It examined the reversal in the net financial flows of developing countries, their composition, the terms of trade and their relationship to net resource availability. The report concluded that it was unclear whether the positive trend in the transfer of financial resources to the developing countries would continue. The prospects depended on the international economic environment as well as the continuing confidence in those economies which had recently been attracting the flow of financial resources. On the whole, the reversal of the outflow was a highly welcome development, but its short-term nature created problems of macroeconomic management in some countries and the positive flow of financial resources to the capital-importing developing countries appeared far less impressive when the losses resulting from terms of trade were taken into account. Therefore, an improved international environment could help smooth out financial and terms-of-trade shocks.

The seven major industrial nations, at their eighteenth annual summit (Munich, Germany, 6-8 July),⁽⁶⁾ called for an early decision by IMF on the extension for one year of its Enhanced Structural Adjustment Facility and for the full examination of options for the subsequent period, including renewal of the Facility.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 47/178 without vote.

Net transfer of resources between developing countries and developed countries

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolutions S-18/3 of 1 May 1990, the annex to which contains the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, and 45/199 of 21 December 1990, the annex to which contains the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade,

Recalling its resolutions 44/232 of 22 December 1989, on trends in the transfer of resources to and from the developing countries and their impact on the economic growth and sustained development of those countries, and 45/192 of 21 December 1990, on the net transfer of resources between developing countries and developed countries, as well as Economic and Social Council resolutions 1989/112 of 28 July 1989 and 1990/56 of 26 July 1990,

Recalling also its resolution 43/197 of 20 December 1988 and taking note of Agenda 21, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, which address the question of the fulfilment of the internationally agreed commitment for official development assistance,

Taking note of the World Economic Survey 1992, in particular chapter IV thereof, entitled "Saving, investment and the international transfer of resources", and the report of the Secretary-General on the net transfer of resources between developing and developed countries,

Recognising that the international community has a responsibility to give strong support to the efforts of the developing countries to solve their grave economic and social problems through the creation of a favourable international economic environment,

Noting the fact that the net transfer of resources to the developing countries has been positive for the past two years and that its future course depends on a supportive international economic environment and domestic efforts,

Concerned about the insufficiency of resources of most developing countries over the past decade, in particular their inadequacies of savings and investment, which leaves developing countries with serious shortfalls in financial resources for development,

Noting the successful outcome of the eighth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the spirit of multilateralism that permeated the Conference, as reflected in its final document entitled "A New Partnership for Development: The Cartagena Commitment",

Bearing in mind that the major industrialized countries, which have significant weight in influencing world economic growth and the international economic environment, should continue their efforts to promote sustained growth and to narrow imbalances so as to enhance the ability of the developing countries to address and alleviate their major problems in the areas of money, finance, resource flows, trade, commodities and external indebtedness,

Noting the call by the group of seven major industrialized countries at the Munich Economic Summit, held from 6 to 8 July 1992, for a full examination of the options available for the forthcoming period of the Enhanced Structural Adjustment Facility of the International Monetary Fund, including the renewal of the Facility,

1. Stresses the need to enhance international efforts to ensure adequate resources for the reactivation of economic growth and sustainable development in the developing countries, taking into account the following:

(a) The developed countries should consider increasing financial flows to assist the developing countries in their diversification and structural adjustment efforts through, inter alia, an expansion of multilateral credits, promoting foreign direct investment and increasing concessional and non-debt resources;

(b) Where appropriate, national economic measures that are conducive to capital formation should be taken by the developing countries with insufficient savings and flow of external resources, including increasing domestic savings, raising investment and human resources development;

(c) Governments of the developed countries and of other countries in a position to do so should promote an adequate flow of resources to developing countries; developed countries, which have reaffirmed their commitment to reach the accepted United Nations target of 0.7 per cent of gross national product for official development assistance, to the extent that they have not yet achieved that target, should agree to augment their aid programmes in order to reach that target as soon as possible; some developed countries have agreed to reach the target by the year 2000; other developed countries, in line with their support for reform efforts in developing countries, should agree to make their best effort to increase their level of official development assistance;

(d) The developed countries should expedite negotiations towards the realization of the tenth replenishment of the International Development Association;

(e) Since, in a large number of developing countries, the burden of debt and debt service constitutes a major obstacle to the revitalization of growth and development, there is a need for further progress towards the solution of the external debt problems of those countries;

(f) Governments should work towards a more open, free, equitable and disciplined international trading system that improves access to all markets for the exports of the developing countries so as to ensure an increase in their export earnings; in this connection, the urgent need for a balanced and successful outcome of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations should be stressed;

(g) Producers and consumers of individual commodities should continue to explore ways and means of reinforcing their cooperation and consider participating actively in international commodity agreements and arrangements that take into account market trends in order to achieve more efficient international commodity cooperation;

(h) All Governments, particularly those of the developed countries, should cooperate more closely to achieve a higher degree of stability in financial markets, reduce the risk of financial crisis, such as high volatility in exchange rates, and help to promote an international financial system more conducive to stable economic growth;

(i) Appropriate measures should be taken by all Governments, particularly those of the developed countries, to create an international economic environment, to stabilize and lower real interest rates and to reduce uncertainties of financial flows;

(j) All Governments, particularly those of the developed countries, should strive to enhance the effectiveness of multilateral surveillance aimed at correcting existing external and fiscal imbalances so as to expand multilateral trade and foreign investment, particularly in the developing countries;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to monitor developments in respect of the net transfer of resources between developing and developed countries and utilize all relevant reports, such as those prepared by the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and the regional banks, and to report thereon in the World Economic Survey 1993; and also requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-ninth session on the implementation of the present resolution.

22 December 1992 Meeting 93 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/47/718/Add.1) without vote, 11 December (meeting 50); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/47/L.86), based on informal consultations on draft by Pakistan for Group of 77, and China (A/C.2/47/L.10) and orally revised; agenda item 78.

Meeting numbers. GA 47th session: 2nd Committee 25, 30, 45, 46, 50; plenary 93.

Development financing

The World Economic Survey 1992(2) stated that official development finance grew in 1990 and 1991, principally owing to the expansion of grants to countries seriously affected by the situation between Iraq and Kuwait. In 1990, grants more than doubled to $29 billion and, in 1991, they rose to $32 billion. In 1992, they were expected to begin to fall back as the international crisis ebbed, but the need for highly concessional development assistance remained, especially in countries needing to reconstruct in the aftermath of civil war and for low-income countries to undertake their proper global responsibilities in environmental protection and clean-up. There was insufficient aid being provided and the members of the Development Assistance Committee of OECD noted that, given the strong efforts towards democratization and economic policy reform throughout the developing world, substantial additional aid efforts would be required both quantitatively and qualitatively. Available evidence suggested that the real value of total official development assistance (ODA) in 1991 was the same as in 1990. However, the prospects for 1992 and years ahead were not encouraging. A major test of the prospects for ODA lay in the negotiations under way for the tenth replenishment of the International Development Association, the concessional lending facility of the World Bank, to cover the period July 1993 to June 1996.

UNCTAD VIII action. In the Cartagena Commitment,(3) UNCTAD VIII declared that the process of structural adjustment in developing countries needed to be supported and funded, and a substantial increase in the aggregate level of resources, particularly concessional resources, would provide a needed boost to that process. The related macroeconomic and structural policies should take account of the specificity of the economic needs and conditions of developing countries. The Conference underscored the substantial additional efforts required to enhance the quantity and quality of support for developing countries and the importance of official finance in its various forms. It urged the developed country donors to implement their undertakings to attain the agreed international target of devoting 0.7 per cent of gross national product to ODA. Other developed donor countries, in line with their support for reform efforts in developing countries, agreed to increase their level of ODA. In addition, other countries in a position to assist would share in the global efforts, each according to its capacity. Donors reaffirmed the commitment undertaken in the Paris Declaration, adopted by the Second (1990) United Nations Conference on LDCs,(7) to bring about a significant and substantial increase in the aggregate level of external support to those countries, taking into account that, since the Paris Conference, six States had been added to the list of LDCs.(8)

The effectiveness of aid should be strongly enhanced by both donor and recipient countries. On the recipient side, a stable policy environment would contribute to increasing the effective use of aid. On the donor side, aid effectiveness would be enhanced by improved aid coordination, by further untying of aid and by targeting aid on the genuine promotion of long-term development, in particular human resource development. Aid efforts should take into account the increasing differentiation among developing countries: while highly concessional assistance should be focused primarily on low-income countries, resources for cooperation with other developing countries in need of assistance could be of a less concessional character. Efforts to provide financial assistance to the countries of Central and Eastern Europe should not diminish the determination of the international community to give high priority to developing countries.

The resources of the World Bank's Special Programme of Assistance for debt-distressed low-income countries, and those of IMF's Structural Adjustment Facility and Enhanced Structural Adjustment Facility, should continue to play a key role in providing medium-term concessional loans to low-income countries.

The Conference recommended that industrialized and developing countries should encourage mutually beneficial flows of FDI to the developing world, including membership in, and wide utilization of, programmes under the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency and the International Finance Corporation, the conclusion of bilateral investment and double taxation treaties, and the provision of direct incentives. Consideration should also be given to innovative incentives and promotional measures that could be adopted by developed countries and the World Bank. The Conference recognized that the problems of the poor countries of Africa, especially the debt problem, needed special treatment, and urged the international community, particularly the donor developed countries and the multilateral financing institutions, to implement fully the measures agreed in the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s,(9) following the final review of the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990,(10) as well as the United Nations System-wide Plan of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development (see PART THREE, Chapter III). The Conference urged the speedy and full consideration of the Secretary-General's proposal to convene an international conference on the financing of development (see below). It agreed that the UNCTAD secretariat should undertake analysis and make proposals, as well as provide technical assistance to developing countries, in the above-mentioned areas. UNCTAD should be a forum to promote discussions and negotiate basic consensuses on the treatment of resources for development in the different competent organizations of the international economic system.

Environment and development finance

UNCTAD VIII action. In the Cartagena Commitment,(3) UNCTAD VIII stated that, for developing countries to achieve sustainable development and address the pressing problems of economic growth needed to combat poverty and improve environmental management domestically, they must have access to the financial resources necessary to meet those challenges. Donors pledged their continuing efforts to ensure that external resources available from both the public and private sectors and through existing bilateral and multilateral channels should be increased and used effectively and efficiently. For developing countries to play their full part in coping with global environmental problems, the Conference considered that appropriate additional financial resources should be made available to them as part of a strengthened partnership and agreed on the need for more funding to implement sustainable development policies at the national level. The Conference emphasized that government intervention for the protection of the environment and the achievement of sustainable development should pay more attention to, inter alia, control mechanisms that made use of market signals and generated additional financial flows. Creditor countries, multilateral financial institutions, developing countries and NGOs should cooperate in efforts to implement debt conversion schemes devised by debtor countries for the protection of the environment.

The Conference also agreed on the need to examine the terms and conditions under which developing countries could resort to economic and regulatory tools to integrate environmental costs into economic activities, without hampering their economic growth and development and jeopardizing their competitive position on international markets; as well as the need to study the implications for developing countries of principles such as the polluter-pays and user-pays principles and the use of a precautionary approach where uncertainty existed.

International conference on financing for development

In response to a 1991 General Assembly request,(11) the Secretary-General submitted a report in November 1992 on a proposal to convene an international conference on the financing of development.(12) The report gave the background to the proposal and examined development finance in relation to the current international financial situation, including the questions of ODA, net transfer of resources and private financing, treatment of the debt of debt-crisis countries, fear of crowding out development, supply of savings in developing countries and the global savings shortage. It also reviewed the conclusions and recommendations on development financing of UNCTAD VIII, UNCED and the Joint Ministerial Committee of the Board of Governors of the World Bank and IMF (Washington, D.C., 21 September). Annexed to the report were the views of the multilateral financial institutions consulted in its preparation.

In his report to the high-level segment of the Economic and Social Council, devoted to the theme of enhancing international cooperation for development,(13) the Secretary-General stressed the link between peace, security and social development.

On 18 December 1992, the General Assembly, by decision 47/436, decided to continue exploring the issue of the convening of an international conference on the financing of development, in close consultation and cooperation with the World Bank, IMF, the regional development banks and UNCTAD. In that regard, it requested the Secretary-General to submit in 1993 a report on the situation of the potential sources of financing for development. In related action, the Assembly, by decision 47/442 of 22 December, deferred until its fiftieth (1995) session consideration of a draft resolution entitled "International conference on money and finance for development".(14)

Debt problems of developing countries

The World Economic Survey 1992(2) stated that the current international debt strategy recognized that many heavily indebted countries could not work themselves out of their "debt overhang" and that some of the debt had to be written off as uncollectible, which creditors had been willing to do when debtor countries undertook the structural changes required for adjustment. The specific techniques of debt reduction had become extremely complex and varied, primarily to accommodate banks and official lenders operating under different legal, tax and regulatory systems.

Although the application of the new strategy had not brought about a major net reduction in the debt itself, progress towards resolution of the debt problem seemed well on the way. Certain heavily indebted countries that had been closed out of the financial markets were again considered creditworthy, secondary market quotations on bank debt had risen and the return of flight capital in some countries also pointed to renewed confidence in those economies. The situation in smaller economies, however, still seemed fragile and evidence that the situation had improved was still tenuous. The big improvement in the net transfer of resources of the heavily indebted countries indicated what seemed to be the principal benefit of the debt regularization process: new direct investment, the return of flight capital, foreign portfolio investment and new lending. Continuation of those flows depended on prospects for export earnings and the growth of the world economy, the unhampered access to major markets, continued progress in adjustment reforms with greater social equity, and political stability.

In accordance with a 1991 General Assembly resolution,(15) the Secretary-General submitted a report in September 1992 on recent experience under the international debt strategy.(16) The report examined the current state of indebtedness, the impact on net financial transfers, progress in adjustment of heavily indebted countries, the social dimensions of adjustment under debt, the international economic environment, and negotiations with commercial banks and official creditors.

The report concluded that, after a decade of international debt crisis, the outlook was finally improving, in particular for the middle-income countries. The net transfer of financial resources had turned positive on the strength of private flows to the largest heavily indebted countries, but remained stagnant to low-income countries. Official as well as private creditors acknowledged the existence of debt overhang requiring debt reduction in various circumstances. Domestic adjustment had also prepared the ground for more sustainable growth in many developing countries. However, there was no formal mechanism to restructure the debt owed to multilateral creditors and it was not clear if the debt and debt-service reduction agreements would end the cycles of debt negotiations for the participating countries. Those agreements had raised expectations in the financial community about the future prospects of the heavily indebted middle-income countries. A substantial part of the new capital inflows to the heavily indebted countries appeared to be highly speculative funds and there was concern that the inflow of funds had only to a limited degree found its way into higher aggregate investment in new plants and equipment and the rate of growth had remained sluggish.

The Trade and Development Report, 1992(17) stated that official debt reschedulings within the Paris Club, an informal group of creditors meeting at the French Treasury, slowed down in 1991. However, the reduced frequency of reschedulings did not reflect a substantial lessening of debt difficulties. In fact, for many Paris Club debtors, especially those which had repeatedly rescheduled their debt, debt-service ratios tended to increase. On the other hand, problems faced by a number of countries in obtaining new IMF arrangements had caused delays in reaching agreements with Paris Club creditors.

In December 1991, the low-income countries were granted new concessional terms (enhanced concessional treatment, by which the options of both debt reduction and interest rate reduction should result in a reduction of 50 per cent of net present value), which provided for larger debt reductions than the 1988 "Toronto terms". In terms of rescheduling practice, Paris Club creditors, in agreements with Egypt and Poland, for the first time in 20 years agreed to deal with the whole stock of eligible debt (all debt contracted before the cut-off date). In addition, the new agreements reached with low-income countries under the enhanced concessional treatment contained a provision whereby Paris Club creditor countries would consider the matter of the stock of debt three or four years after the date of the first agreement under the new terms. That could be understood as a commitment to consider a reduction of the entire stock of debt, conditional upon satisfactory performance of the debtor countries under appropriate arrangements with IMF.

The UNCTAD secretariat made a preliminary assessment of the likely impact of the enhanced concessional treatment on the projected debt-service ratio of 22 low-income debtor countries, which had so far benefited from the "Toronto terms" or were likely to benefit from enhanced concessional treatment. The assessment showed that for half of the potential beneficiaries the new terms would help to reduce considerably their debt-service ratios, to a level compatible with their capacity to pay. For the other half, however, the debt burden would still remain high, even after the full implementation of the new terms.

The seven major industrial nations, at their Munich summit⁽⁶⁾ (see above), welcomed the enhanced debt relief extended to the poorest countries by the Paris Club. They noted that the Paris Club had conditionally agreed to consider the stock-of-debt approach for the poorest countries that were prepared to adjust, and encouraged it to recognize the special situation of some highly indebted lower-middle-income countries on a case-by-case basis.

UNCTAD VIII action. In the Cartagena Commitment,⁽³⁾ UNCTAD VIII recommended that the international community continue to provide support, including, on a case-by-case basis, further debt relief for countries implementing sound economic reform programmes. With regard to external debt incurred with commercial banks, it encouraged more rapid implementation of the strengthened debt strategy, noting that some countries had already benefited from a combination of sound adjustment policies and commercial bank debt reduction or equivalent measures. It further encouraged other countries with heavy bank debts to negotiate similar reductions with their creditors. Parties to such a negotiation should take due account of both the medium-term debt reduction and new money requirements of the debtor country; multilateral institutions actively engaged in the strengthened international debt strategy were to continue to support debt-reduction packages related to commercial bank debt with a view to ensuring that the magnitude of such financing was consonant with the evolving debt strategy. Creditor banks were urged to participate in debt and debt-service reduction, and policies were to be strengthened to attract direct investment, avoid unsustainable levels of debt and foster the return of flight capital.

With regard to debt owed to official bilateral creditors, the Conference welcomed the substantial bilateral debt reduction undertaken by some creditor countries and encouraged others in a position to do so to take similar action. It recommended that particular attention be paid to the resource needs of low-income countries and other debt-distressed developing countries that continued to service their debt, safeguard their creditworthiness and meet their external obligations.

With regard to multilateral debt, the Conference urged that serious attention be given to continuing the work towards growth-oriented solutions to the problems of developing countries with serious debt-servicing difficulties. The use of support groups should be continued in providing resources to clear arrears of countries embarking on vigorous economic reform programmes supported by IMF and the World Bank. The international community should explore ways to improve coordination between all creditors, official and private, and donors to help meet, in an integrated manner and based on solid economic considerations, financing requirements of debtor countries in relation to their medium-term development programmes. The Conference urged continued technical cooperation among developing countries in the area of external debt, as well as UNCTAD's cooperation with developing countries in debt negotiation and in providing advice on debt issues.

UNCED action. UNCED,⁽¹⁸⁾ in its consideration of international cooperation to accelerate sustainable development in developing countries and related domestic policies, also addressed the debt issue and made recommendations in line with those of UNCTAD VIII. In its proposals for financial resources and mechanisms to implement Agenda 21, UNCED recommended that all creditors in the Paris Club promptly implement the agreement of December 1991 to provide debt relief for the poorest heavily indebted countries pursuing structural adjustment; debt relief measures were to be kept under review to address their continuing difficulties.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted resolution 47/198 by recorded vote.

International debt crisis and development: enhanced international cooperation towards a durable solution to the external debt problems of developing countries

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 41/202 of 8 December 1986, 42/198 of 11 December 1987, 43/198 of 20 December 1988, 44/205 of 22 December 1989, 45/214 of 21 December 1990 and 46/148 of 18 December 1991,

Reaffirming the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, contained in the annex to its resolution S-18/3 of 1 May 1990, the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade, contained in the annex to its resolution 45/199 of 21 December 1990, the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, adopted by the Second United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries, the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, contained in the annex to its resolution 46/151 of 18 December 1991, the document entitled "A New Partnership for Development: The Cartagena Commitment", adopted by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development at its eighth session, and the provisions on a durable solution to the external debt crisis, contained in the relevant chapters of Agenda 21, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development,

Noting that, owing to uneven developments, further progress is needed towards the solution of the external debt problems of a large number of developing countries, in the context of the evolving international debt strategy,

Noting also that a few indebted developing countries have regained relative access to international financial markets under the difficulties described in the report of the Secretary-General,

Noting with concern the continuing debt and debt-service problems of lower-middle-income developing countries, which adversely affect their development efforts and economic growth, and reiterating the need to address the continuing debt problems of those countries through effective debt-relief measures, bearing in mind, in this context, the special situation of lower-middle-income and certain middle-income African countries,

Also noting with concern the continuing existence of the heavy debt and debt-service burdens of low-income countries,

Noting with appreciation the recent initiatives towards the solution of the debt problems of some developing countries, such as the adoption by the Paris Club of the "enhanced terms" and the conclusion of several agreements on commercial debt and debt-service reduction,

Noting the substantial debt relief and debt reduction in favour of two middle-income countries agreed to by the Paris Club,

Stressing the importance of alleviating the debt and debt-service burdens of low- and middle-income developing countries with public debt problems,

Stressing also, in this context, the necessity of a supportive international economic environment, including an open and transparent multilateral trading system,

Emphasizing the importance for debtor developing countries to continue to pursue and intensify their efforts in their economic reform, stabilization and structural adjustment programmes, in order to raise savings and investment, reduce inflation and improve economic efficiency, taking into account their individual characteristics and the vulnerability of the poorer strata of their populations,

Expressing its concern that, in many developing countries, the burden of debt and debt service constitutes one of the major obstacles to the revitalization of growth and development, despite the often strenuous economic reforms of those countries,

Noting that those developing countries which have continued, at great cost, to meet their international debt and debt-service obligations in a timely fashion have done so despite severe external and domestic financial constraints,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General concerning the external debt crisis and development;

2. Welcomes the conclusion of several agreements on commercial bank debt and debt-service reduction under the evolving international debt strategy and takes note of relevant declarations recognizing the debt problems of some highly indebted lower-middle-income countries, taking into account their special and specific situations;

3. Also welcomes the write-off by certain donors of a significant part of the bilateral official debt of the least developed countries, and urges those countries that have not done so to cancel or provide equivalent relief for the official development assistance debt of the least developed countries;

4. Expresses its appreciation for the initiatives taken by developed countries, including recent initiatives to address the debt problems of some middle-income African countries, encourages the implementation thereof and invites all creditor countries to consider taking relevant measures for middle-income debtor developing countries;

5. Stresses the need for the broadest and most expeditious implementation of the recent initiatives and the need to continue to build upon them, in order, inter alia, to prevent the proliferation of debt problems;

6. Also stresses the need for the implementation of additional debt-relief measures, including further cancellation or reduction of debt and debt service related to official debt, and for more urgent action with regard to the remaining commercial debt owed by developing countries;

7. Recognises the urgent need to continue to provide a social safety net to vulnerable groups most adversely affected by the implementation of economic reform programmes in the debtor countries, in particular low-income groups, in order to ensure social and political stability;

8. Emphasizes the importance for developing countries to continue their efforts to promote a favourable environment for attracting foreign investment, thereby promoting economic growth and sustainable development;

9. Recognizes the need of debtor developing countries for a supportive international economic environment as regards, inter alia, terms of trade, commodity prices, improved market access and trade practices, and, in this connection, stresses the urgent need for a balanced and successful outcome of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations, which would result in the liberalization and expansion of world trade to the benefit of all countries, in particular the developing countries;

10. Reiterates the need for the implementation of initiatives involving developing debtor countries, developed creditor countries, commercial banks and multilateral financial institutions, with a view to easing the debt and debt-service burdens of severely indebted developing countries, which would contribute to recovery, growth and development in developing countries;

11. Stresses the need, in addition to debt-relief measures that include debt and debt-service reduction, for new financial flows to debtor developing countries, and urges the creditor countries and the multilateral financial institutions to continue to extend concessional financial assistance, as appropriate, in order to support the implementation by the developing countries of their economic reform, stabilization and structural adjustment programmes so as to enable them to extricate themselves from the debt overhang and to assist them in achieving economic growth and development;

12. Urges the international community to consider wider application of innovative measures, such as debt-for-equity swaps, debt-for-nature swaps and debt-for-development swaps;

13. Stresses the need for sustained action in addressing the debt problems of low-income countries and, in this regard, calls for early, expeditious and wide implementation of the enhanced terms currently offered to low-income countries by the Paris Club, as well as, where necessary, the extension thereof;

14. Calls upon private creditors to renew and expand initiatives and efforts in order to tackle the commercial debt problems of low- and middle-income developing countries;

15. Urges creditor countries, private banks and, within their prerogatives, multilateral financial institutions to consider the extension of appropriate new financial support to developing countries, in particular the low-income countries with substantial debt burdens that continue, at great cost, to service the debt and meet their international obligations;

16. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Investment and financial flows

According to the World Economic Survey 1992,(2) the total savings in the world would not be large enough to meet global investment needs over the 1990s. There was an inadequate allocation of the world's resources to investment projects. Developing countries, particularly in Asia, had demonstrated the "virtuous cycles" that resulted from a high-investment, high-growth policy in a context of well-managed financial and fiscal systems. In other cases, debt overhang and fragile economic situations held back possible investment and growth levels. Among the formerly centrally planned economies, disruptions of the transition process were deterring investment. Among the developed market economies, government investment needed to be increased and international flows augmented to support capital formation in developing and transition economies.

In accordance with a decision of UNCTAD VIII,(3) TDB, on 7 May,(19) established an ad hoc working group on investment and financial flows, non-debt-creating finance for development, and new mechanisms for increasing investment and financial flows. The Ad Hoc Working Group held its first session at Geneva from 9 to 13 November 1992(20) and adopted its work programme in the areas of global trends and issues, policies and measures to promote FDI, portfolio equity investment and new mechanisms, and strengthening technical cooperation.

The Group agreed that it would give particular attention to the situation of LDCs and suggest ways to improve their capacity. It recommended that it hold two sessions in 1993 and a final session in 1994. The 1993 sessions would focus on foreign investors' motivations, case-studies prepared by member States, country policies, multilateral measures and portfolio investment and new mechanisms. The Group noted the concerns expressed by several developing countries about the current constraints to country studies, and recommended that multilateral and bilateral donors should consider making funds available to assist those countries.

Taxation

The Secretary-General submitted a report in March 1992(21) on the work of the Ad Hoc Group of Experts on International Cooperation in Tax Matters, which had held its sixth meeting in December 1991.(22) The Group directed a set of recommendations to the tax administrations of developed and developing countries to enable them to enhance the formulation and working of double taxation conventions, maximize tax compliance, improve tax equity, minimize the cost of tax collection, decrease and/or eliminate tax evasion and avoidance and promote international cooperation in tax matters. The Group also recommended that its meeting should be held annually instead of biennially, because of the rapid rate of changes in international taxation issues, bearing on the globalization and regionalization of the world economy.

By decision 1992/281 of 30 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of the Secretary-General's report.

Transport

Maritime transport

Shipping

UNCTAD VIII(1) decided to suspend the existing main committees of TDB, including the Committee on Shipping, and to include its current terms of reference in those of the newly created Standing Committee on Developing Services Sectors: Fostering Competitive Services Sectors in Developing Countries. Accordingly, TDB, on 7 May,(2) established the Standing Committee and decided on its terms of reference, stating that its main task in the field of shipping, ports and multimodal transport should be, inter alia, the review of shipping policies so as to identify elements leading to the development of competitive shipping sectors, in order to enhance the participation of developing countries in world shipping.

The Standing Committee on Developing Services Sectors (Shipping) held its first session at Geneva from 2 to 6 November 1992.(3) It considered its draft work programme(4) and a number of reports that had been requested by the former Committee on Shipping: an UNCTAD secretariat report on industry and policy developments in world shipping and their impact on developing countries;(5) the report of an expert group on shipping policy;(6) the review of maritime transport in 1991;(7) and UNCTAD secretariat note on a review of activities in the field of shipping, ports and multimodal transport.(8) The Standing Committee adopted its work programme and decided that the UNCTAD secretariat should provide TDB with a list of specific outputs and activities, as well as estimated dates of completion of work for each of the elements of the work programme.

Multimodal transport

The Group of Experts on Multimodal Transport met at Geneva from 9 to 13 March 1992(9) and considered developments in the field of multimodal transport, containerization and technological development, as well as a draft work programme in those areas. It decided to keep the subject of container standards as a core element in the programme and suggested that the UNCTAD secretariat continue to monitor developments in that area and liaise with the International Standards Organization so as to draw attention to the specific problems of developing countries. It noted the new UNCTAD/International Chamber of Commerce (ICC) rules for multimodal transport documents(10) and suggested that the ICC Ad Hoc Working Group on Multimodal Transport continue to promote their use. It further recommended that the UNCTAD secretariat strengthen its assistance to Governments, transport operators and traders in the improved use of existing resources, as well as focus on changes in behavioural patterns leading to a high degree of action-oriented management; continue, through its technical assistance programme, to support efforts to improve the institutional and legal environment within which multimodal transport generally existed; and continue to work closely with ICC and other commercial parties in a programme whereby traders, government officials and transport providers could recognize the potential benefits arising from the control of the transport chain. In the light of the decisions of UNCTAD VIII, the Expert Group decided to submit its draft programme of work to the Secretary-General of UNCTAD for subsequent transmission to the Standing Committee on Developing Services Sectors.

Ports

The UNCTAD secretariat, through a programme of research, training and technical cooperation, sought to improve the performance of ports in developing countries and to raise the awareness of the benefits to be achieved by ports acting as trading centres.

As requested by the Ad Hoc Intergovernmental Group of Port Experts, the secretariat prepared a study on the management and development of human resources in ports.(11) It also completed another study on the legal and regulatory aspects of port management, presenting the essential legal principles required for the effective operation of a port.(12) Two monographs were prepared, on the planning and management of multi-purpose terminals(13) and on the use of computers to manage the container

Technical assistance and training

UNCTAD's activities in technical cooperation and training in shipping, ports and multimodal transport declined from a total of 37 projects with a gross expenditure of $3.2 million in 1991 to 32 projects with a total expenditure of $2 million in 1992.

Half of those projects were under the TRAINMAR programme and were designed to help training centres in developing countries provide a wide range of maritime management training, using a methodology that established professional standards at local centres and provided mechanisms for cooperation among those centres. Two new subregional projects, one in South America and one in the Caribbean, were initiated, while eight were terminated. Implementation of the Advance Cargo Information System continued in several African countries, and work was under way in Burkina Faso, Senegal and the Sudan. Other projects initiated in 1992 included a national project to develop multimodal transport in Pakistan, a subregional project to establish TRAINMAR in southern Latin America and a project to develop and deliver a new policy seminar on the commercial role of ports.

UNCTAD structure, programme and finances

Institutional matters

In the Cartagena Commitment,(1) UNCTAD VIII stated that institutional adaptation and revitalization were urgently needed to enable UNCTAD to seize the new opportunities to foster international cooperation for development. UNCTAD should promote international consensus on principles and strategies for policy action at the national and international levels to enhance development prospects of member States, particularly those of developing countries, and provide a forum for the exchange of experiences among member States. The substantive work of UNCTAD should involve the initial identification of a relevant set of issues; the carrying out of high-quality analytical work; and the conduct of intergovernmental consultations on areas of convergence and, when appropriate, negotiations. Consensus-building was an important function of UNCTAD, flowing from the identification of issues and the analytical work carried out by the secretariat to clarify the main aspects of such issues and shared perceptions.

On issues where other institutions were vested with the necessary powers of decision-making, UNCTAD should provide constructive approaches and viewpoints, and generate political impulses on matters within its purview, for consideration by those institutions. TDB should make the necessary arrangements to ensure that the outcomes of those processes were translated into concrete action. Technical cooperation should be strengthened, expanded within the resources available and integrated into all relevant areas of UNCTAD's work, taking into account the need for effective interaction among its main functions and for effective coordination with other technical cooperation agencies of the United Nations system. UNCTAD's policy review of technical cooperation activities midway between Conferences should assess the results and, as necessary, ensure continued support of those activities. Developing countries, in the context of their national priorities, should arrange for adequate provision to be made for technical cooperation as regards trade and development in the context of UNDP country and intercountry programmes and programmes financed by bilateral and other multilateral donors. The Conference invited interested countries to make use of the services of UNCTAD and ITC in that respect. UNCTAD and ITC should continue their efforts to achieve complementarity in their technical cooperation activities and UNCTAD, in particular, in accordance with its mandate, should continue to address long-standing trade and development problems.

UNCTAD intergovernmental structure

UNCTAD VIII, in the Cartagena Commitment,(1) agreed that UNCTAD's intergovernmental structure should consist of the Trade and Development Board, standing and special committees, and ad hoc working groups. The Board would continue to address annually matters relating to the international implications of macroeconomic policies and issues concerning interdependence, using the Trade and Development Report as background, as well as to consider topics relating to trade policies, structural adjustment and economic reform. Additional topics focusing on other key areas, including a new international partnership for development, global interdependence, other paths to development and sustainable development, should also be addressed at each annual session. TDB should also consider UNCTAD's contribution to the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s.(2) In addition, the Board would undertake, during the spring segment of its annual sessions, the review of the progress in the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s,(3) using the LDC Annual Report as background.

To strengthen its policy function, promote greater efficiency and give impetus to ongoing work, the Board would meet in short one-day or half-day sessions at the level of permanent representatives immediately before its regular sessions and periodically in between. The Board would conduct, midway between Conferences, a review and evaluation of the work programme of the intergovernmental machinery, including its own; of technical assistance programmes; and, bearing in mind the calendar established in this regard, of the programme budget and medium-term-plan, so as to ensure full integration of all work undertaken by UNCTAD and to establish or adjust priorities for the period up to the next Conference. In order to facilitate the full participation of representatives of LDCs in consideration of the implementation of the Programme of Action for LDCs for the 1990s, the Board should establish, in advance, the specific organizational arrangements and dates for such work.

UNCTAD VIII decided that, with the exception of the Special Committee on Preferences and the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Restrictive Business Practices, the existing committees of the Board should be suspended and standing committees should be established on commodities, poverty alleviation, economic cooperation among developing countries and developing services sectors: fostering competitive services sectors in developing countries. The standing committees should be geared to assist TDB in the effective discharge of its functions. The terms of reference of the Committee on Shipping and the Committee on Invisibles and Financing related to Trade would be included in the Standing Committee on Developing Services Sectors.

UNCTAD VIII also requested TDB, as an initial step, to establish ad hoc working groups for an initial period of two years to deal with investment and financial flows, non-debt-creating finance for development, new mechanisms for increasing investment and financial flows; trade efficiency; comparative experiences with privatization; expansion of trading opportunities for developing countries; and the interrelationship between investment and technology transfers. These groups would report directly or through the relevant committee to the Board for further action.

Methods of work

UNCTAD VIII(1) decided that, to enhance the effectiveness of the existing system of consultations with representatives of member States between sessions of the Board and to promote greater efficiency in the intergovernmental process, the informal consultative mechanism established by the Board in 1981(4) should be strengthened for the purpose of preparing and following up its work. The preparatory process for the informal consultative mechanism should take the form of exchanges of views by the UNCTAD Secretary-General with representatives of members of the TDB Bureau and should be held as often as necessary, so as to enable the Secretary-General to submit recommendations for approval by the informal consultative mechanism. At the same time, the Secretary-General should be granted a greater measure of discretion in preparing proposals on the sequencing and duration of meetings of the subsidiary bodies of the Board for the consideration of Governments, through the informal consultative mechanism. Non-governmental and other international bodies could be invited to participate in an advisory capacity at public meetings of the Board and its standing and special committees and ad hoc working groups.

The Conference invited the United Nations Secretary-General to consider granting UNCTAD greater operational flexibility in financial and administrative matters, and called on TDB to take the necessary follow-up measures to ensure the speedy implementation of the institutional reforms.

UNCTAD programme

The Trade and Development Board held three sessions in 1992: the second part of its seventeenth special session from 15 to 24 January,(5) the second part of its thirty-eighth session from 21 April to 7 May,(6) and the first part of its thirty-ninth session from 28 September to 14 October.(7) The January session was largely to discuss the preparations for UNCTAD VIII. On 7 May,(8) the Board adopted a decision establishing the standing committees and the ad hoc working groups. On 9 October, it established an ad hoc working group to explore the issue of structural adjustment for the transition to disarmament(9) and adopted an agreed conclusion on the subprogrammes to be designated high priority.(10)

In accordance with its new working methods, the Board, in September/October, considered the international implications of macroeconomic policies and issues concerning interdependence—the recent evolution of development problems and prospects; paths to development—performance, problems and reform of public enterprises; sustainable development, including UNCTAD's contribution to the implementation of UNCED's conclusions and recommendations; trade policies, structural adjustment and economic reform—issues relating to national transparent mechanisms in the context of the light against protectionism; review of progress in the implementation of the Programme of Action for LDCs for the 1990s; UNCTAD's contribution to the implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s; assistance to the Palestinian people in the light of the Cartagena decision; and other matters relating to trade and development.

On 7 February, the Economic and Social Council, by decision 1992/208 A, decided to consider at its substantive session of 1992 the report of TDB on the second part of its thirty-eighth session and to authorize the Secretary-General to transmit directly to the General Assembly the report of the Board on the first part of its thirty-ninth session.

On 31 July, by decision 1992/298, the Council took note of the TDB report on the second part of its thirty-eighth session.

Programme budget

At its twenty-first session (Geneva, 31 August-8 September),(11) the UNCTAD Working Party on the Medium-term Plan and the Programme Budget reviewed the proposed revisions and adopted amendments to the UNCTAD sections of the United Nations medium-term plan for 1992-1997.(12) On the question of prioritizing the subprogrammes, the Working Party agreed, in the light of the decisions taken at UNCTAD VIII on the reorientation of UNCTAD's work, that the matter of priority setting was for the whole membership of UNCTAD to determine; it proposed that the question be further addressed, after consideration by all member States of UNCTAD, at the next session of TDB.

The Committee for Programme and Coordination (CPC), in September 1992,(13) recommended approval by the General Assembly of the revisions to the medium-term plan of sections relating to UNCTAD. The Assembly approved them on 23 December by resolution 47/214.

In September,(14) in response to a 1991 Assembly request,(15) the Secretary-General submitted a report on the 13 posts formerly attached to the subprogramme on trade among countries having different economic and social systems. The report noted that 12 posts were redeployed to other subprogrammes and the incumbent of the D-2 post assumed responsibility for activities under the subprogramme on cross-sectoral issues and for assistance in the overall direction and supervision of international trade programmes in general. In the light of the results of UNCTAD VIII, the Secretary-General proposed to extend the 13 posts through 1993 on a temporary basis and to make proposals concerning their future status in the context of the programme budget proposals for the biennium 1994-1995. ACABQ(16) endorsed the proposal on the understanding that the financing details would be provided in respect of the redeployment of the posts and that no additional appropriations would be required.

On 23 December, by resolution 47/220 A, the Assembly approved a revised appropriation of $92,514,000 for UNCTAD in the framework of the 1992-1993 budget. On the same date, by resolution 47/219 A section XXVII, it took note of the Secretary-General's report on the 13 posts and endorsed the recommendations of CPC and ACABQ.

Technical cooperation

In 1992, about $20 million were allocated to UNCTAD technical cooperation activities. Although UNDP remained the most important source of funds, there was increasing financial support from bilateral donors and other sources. Activities relating to trade included support to developing countries participating in the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations; development of the services sector; trade policy reform; utilization of GSP; competition policies and the control of restrictive business practices; transfer of technology; and trade between developing countries and countries with economies in transition. UNCTAD's programme for the development of human resources for trade became fully operational and the programme on helping developing countries to manage their external debt liabilities continued to expand, in cooperation with the World Bank. Further assistance was provided in the areas of insurance, selected international monetary issues, and commodity production, diversification and marketing, including better management of food grain imports. Work was undertaken on the transit problems of land-locked countries in Africa, the development of shipping services, including assistance for better management of ports, multimodal transport, and the human resource development programme for the maritime sector. UNCTAD's largest single technical cooperation programme assisted over 50 countries to improve their management of customs.

The Working Party on the Medium-term Plan and the Programme Budget conducted its biennial review of the technical cooperation programme of UNCTAD for the period 1989-1991.⁽¹¹⁾ It had before it an UNCTAD secretariat report⁽¹⁷⁾ reviewing activities by programme area and examining the related issues and developments. The Working Party welcomed the increase in the level of UNCTAD's technical cooperation activities over the past few years as well as their relevance and effectiveness. It requested the secretariat to develop proposals in the areas identified in the Cartagena Commitment, bearing in mind the need to ensure balanced distribution among regions and countries, particularly LDCs, land-locked and island developing countries. It invited UNDP to continue to provide support for UNCTAD's intercountry technical cooperation and appealed to UNDP's Governing Council, in its mid-term review of the fifth programming cycle (1992-1996), to consider restoring the proportionate level of resources allocated for regional programmes. It also invited bilateral donors, multilateral agencies and all member States in a position to do so to increase the level of their budgetary contributions to UNCTAD for technical cooperation purposes.

Chapter V

Transnational corporations

Transnational corporations (TNCs) continued to exert a major influence on the global economy in 1992. Changes in the structure of international economic relations and policies in the early 1990s created conditions that placed TNCs in a position to play a significant role in development. Private sector development had become a major concern for many developing countries and countries in transition to market economies, while foreign direct investment was increasingly important as a force for promoting and integrating international flows of capital and of trade and technology.

The Commission on TNCs met twice in 1992. In January, it discussed its contribution to the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development. In April, the Commission conducted a general discussion on TNCs in the world economy and trends in foreign direct investment in developing countries. It also considered international agreements relating to TNCs and the activities of the former United Nations Centre on TNCs. Following the restructuring of the Secretariat in 1992, the Centre was incorporated into the new Transnational Corporations and Management Division of the Department of Economic and Social Development. The Intergovernmental Working Group of Experts on International Standards of Accounting and Reporting met in March.

In July, the Economic and Social Council invited TNCs to take measures to achieve the eradication of apartheid in South Africa and requested the Secretary-General to collect information on the activities of TNCs there (resolution 1992/34). The Council called on the TNCs and Management Division to strengthen its work on cooperation related to technology transfer, and requested it to assist developing countries to create a favourable investment climate and to develop their endogenous capacity to encourage foreign investment (1992/35).

Draft code of conduct

The Commission on TNCs, in April 1992, continued to consider work related to a draft code of conduct on TNCs, first considered in 1975.⁽¹⁾

In a February report to the Commission on an international framework for TNCs,⁽²⁾ the Secretary-General reviewed international principles and standards that had been elaborated during the second half of the century and evaluated the extent to which those norms were still relevant in the light of recent policy changes affecting foreign direct investment. He summarized the settled issues, including observance by TNCs of local laws and their non-interference in the internal affairs of host countries; fair and equitable treatment of TNCs by host countries and minimum protection under the law, including laws governing nationalization and expropriation; and specialized standards on business and trade practices, consumer and environmental protection, working conditions and labour safety. It was noted, however, that the manner in which those principles were applied by Governments and TNCs had changed, as Governments were liberalizing restrictions on the entry of foreign investment. The report also outlined a number of issues on which consensus was still to be achieved, such as foreign investment and international law, compensation for expropriation, extraterritoriality, national treatment, reciprocity, and the right of entry and establishment as an emerging standard.

Increased emphasis was being placed on a number of issues as a result of the changed economic climate in Eastern Europe and in many developing countries. Those issues included: privatization and competition; securities, banking and insurance supervision; transfer pricing; corrupt practices in international transactions; and environment and investment.

The report concluded that a global framework for the 1990s would integrate and consolidate what had been achieved so far and address the new issues arising in the international agenda. Those issues would give new perspectives to traditional standards, while defining new ones, and would complete the overall outline of the emerging international framework for foreign direct investment in the 1990s.

By a note of September 1992,⁽³⁾ the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly a report by the President of the forty-sixth (1991) Assembly session on the outcome of informal consultations aimed at achieving an agreement on the draft code of conduct. He stated that he had convened a new round of consultations (New York, 21-23 July 1992) pursuant to an understanding reached in 1991.⁽⁴⁾ It was the view of delegations that no consensus was possible on the draft code at that time. Delegations felt that a fresh approach should be examined, given the changed international economic environment. It was suggested that guidelines or any other international instrument on foreign investment should be prepared at the next (1993) session of the Commission on TNCs as part of that new approach.

In decision 47/439 of 22 December 1992, the Assembly took note of the Secretary-General's note transmitting the report of the Assembly President.

Bilateral, regional and international arrangements

In his report on an international framework for TNCs,(2) the Secretary-General noted that regional and global movements towards economic integration greatly affected the existing and future modalities of foreign direct investment. Concepts of home and host State jurisdiction, extraterritoriality, national treatment and right of establishment would lose some significance when certain aspects of national sovereignty were surrendered to regional economic institutions. Many States had commenced or concluded regional free trade agreements or frameworks for free trade agreements, developments that would inevitably be reflected in investment policy with a number of significant potential consequences. The report discussed some of those possible consequences, including whether regional arrangements would partially disrupt the global approach to investment and trade exemplified in the Uruguay Round of trade negotiations (see PART SEVEN, Chapter XVIII), the question of comity, harmonization, export of law, and uniform law and model law.

The report noted that in all those areas, the negotiations in the Uruguay Round, as well as the stream of bilateral and regional trade agreements, played both a causal and a consequential role. Unless investment was able to proceed easily across boundaries and was assured of equitable treatment once within foreign borders, trade could not flourish. Successful conclusion of the Uruguay Round would contribute to the harmonization of national investment and trade regimes, which would facilitate a symbiotic flow of productive investment across national boundaries.

Standards of accounting and reporting

At its tenth session (New York, 5-13 March 1992),(1) the Intergovernmental Working Group of Experts on International Standards of Accounting and Reporting had before it reports by the Secretary-General on current developments at the global(2) and national(3) levels in the field of accounting and reporting by TNCs; an international survey of environmental information disclosure by TNCs;(4) accounting problems arising during privatization;(5) and accountancy development in Francophone Africa(6) and in Central and Eastern Europe.(7)

The Group reviewed progress made in harmonizing national accounting standards and discussed efforts to reduce the options in such standards worldwide and increase their use by regulators of securities markets and international trade. The Group decided that it should analyse the adequacy of accounting and auditing standards for financial institutions at the national and international levels. It also decided to keep under review the direction of change in Central and Eastern Europe, the comparability of their new standards and further improvements that could be necessary.

According to the survey of corporate environmental reporting, 191 out of 222 TNCs studied reported at least some information on their environmental impact. The Group decided to transmit its conclusions on corporate environmental accounting and reporting to the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) (see below).

In addressing accounting problems during privatization, the Group took up seven country case-studies (Czechoslovakia, France, Germany, Hungary, Mexico, Poland, United Kingdom). The report on the subject(5) noted that lack of good accounting information and poor accounting practices of the past, which led to inaccurate valuations of the enterprises to be privatized, were the major causes of such problems. A distinction was made between privatization in countries with an established market infrastructure and those in transition to a market economy.

With regard to accounting training and education in Africa and in Central and Eastern Europe, the Group discussed the results of the first International Conference on Accountancy Development in Africa (Dakar, Senegal, 14-17 October 1991) and reviewed various programmes for countries in transition. It decided to devote its 1993 session to education and the strengthening of the profession.

In April,(8) the Commission on TNCs took note of the Group's report.(1)

Commission on TNCs

The Commission on TNCs held its eighteenth session in New York in two parts, from 23 to 25 January and from 8 to 16 April 1992.⁽¹⁾ The January meeting was devoted to finalizing its recommendations to the Preparatory Committee for UNCED (see below). In April, the Commission discussed TNCs in the world economy and trends in foreign direct investment in developing countries, TNCs in South Africa, international arrangements and agreements relating to TNCs, activities of the former Centre on TNCs and the question of expert advisers. It also considered the provisional agenda for its nineteenth (1993) session.

On 30 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of the Commission's report on its eighteenth session⁽¹⁾ (decision 1992/283) and approved the provisional agenda and documentation for its nineteenth session (decision 1992/282).

TNCs in South Africa

A March report of the Secretary-General on the role of TNCs in South Africa⁽²⁾ examined the role of sanctions in the South African economy that contributed to the Government's repeal of key apartheid legislation and the reaction of the international community to the repeal in terms of measures repealed and those remaining in force. It also examined disinvestments/investments undertaken by TNCs and analysed the domestic market and external constraints on attracting investments from TNCs. In addition, the report presented an optimistic scenario for attracting TNCs in the context of the medium- to long-term prospects of the South African economy and dealt with the role of TNCs in employment and education of black South Africans.

The Secretary-General noted that the pace of disinvestment in South Africa had slowed sharply since the end of 1989, with only two companies having disinvested in 1991. In the preceding two years, much international attention had switched from the issue of direct investment to that of non-equity ties. Again, the area of non-equity links between TNCs and South African business entities showed little change. Following the repeal of certain apartheid legislation,⁽³⁾ some Governments lifted their economic sanctions and increased trade with South Africa, filling the gap caused by trade sanctions.

The report emphasized that economic sanctions and restrictive measures against South Africa had been successful in exerting pressure on its economy. South Africa's heavy dependence on foreign capital markets had made financial sanctions very effective. Coupled with the financial sanctions was the decision by many TNCs to disinvest from South Africa. Although such disinvestment had had consequences for the economy and society in South Africa, the persistence of non-equity links, such as licensing and franchise agreements, might have negated the intentions of those who supported sanctions. The withdrawal of many TNCs from South Africa might also have undermined the country's efforts on behalf of rapid economic growth in the short term.

In another March report,⁽⁴⁾ the Secretary-General provided a list of TNCs based in 18 countries that had disposed of their equity interests in South Africa and a list of TNCs from 15 countries which had equity interests there of more than 10 per cent. The report also listed companies from five countries (France, Germany, Switzerland, United Kingdom, United States) engaged in social responsibility programmes benefiting employees and their families or benefiting the entire population or specified local communities.

In April,⁽¹⁾ the Commission on TNCs took note of the two reports.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 30 July, the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of its Economic Committee, adopted resolution 1992/34 without vote.

Activities of transnational corporations in South Africa

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolution 1991/54 of 26 July 1991,

Taking note with appreciation of the report of the Secretary-General on the role of transnational corporations in South Africa,

Recalling the Declaration on Apartheid and its Destructive Consequences in Southern Africa, adopted by the General Assembly at its sixteenth special session, which contains guidelines on how to end apartheid through genuine negotiations,

Welcoming the recent developments in South Africa, including the repeal or amendment of the major apartheid laws, the formation of the Patriotic/United Front, the ongoing process of negotiations, inter alia, under the auspices of the Convention for a Democratic South Africa, and the outcome of the whites-only referendum of 17 March 1992,

Gravely concerned about the escalation of politically inspired violence in South Africa despite the signing of the National Peace Accord on 14 September 1991,

Reiterating the urgent need for the removal of the remaining obstacles to the creation of an atmosphere conducive to constitutional negotiations,

Mindful of its obligations towards the complete eradication of apartheid, reaffirmed in General Assembly resolutions 44/244 of 17 September 1990, 45/176 A of 19 December 1990 and 46/79 A of 13 December 1991,

1. Welcomes the recent positive political developments in South Africa, which enhance the possibilities for the total eradication of apartheid in South Africa;

2. Reaffirms that Governments, entrepreneurs and enterprises, including transnational corporations, have contributed to the demise of the apartheid system, and invites them to give their full and concerted support to this end, as well as to take appropriate measures regarding the vulnerable and critical process now under way in South Africa, with a view to achieving the total eradication of the apartheid system and the establishment of a united non-racial and democratic South Africa;

3. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) In close cooperation with the relevant organs of the United Nations, to continue the work of collecting and disseminating information on the activities of transnational corporations in South Africa, including the list of transnational corporations conducting operations there;

(b) To continue preparing studies on the level, form and responsibilities of operation of transnational corporations in South Africa, including their non-equity business arrangements and their involvement in particular sectors of the South African economy;

(c) To continue examining possible contributions of transnational corporations to the construction of a united and non-racial democratic South Africa in the economic and social fields, taking into account the special need for development in the areas of human resources, particularly the training of black South African entrepreneurs, employment, housing and health;

(d) To report to the Commission on Transnational Corporations at its nineteenth session, the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly on the implementation of the present resolution.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1992/34

30 July 1992 Meeting 41 Adopted without vote

Approved by Economic Committee (E/1992/109/Add.3) without vote, 28 July (meeting 16); draft by Commission on TNCs (E/1992/26); agenda item 12 (e).

Contribution to UNCED

In response to a 1991 resolution of the Economic and Social Council,(5) the Secretary-General submitted to the January meeting of the Commission on TNCs a report on TNCs and sustainable development.(6) The report contained recommendations by the Executive Director of the former Centre on TNCs in five programme areas in which large enterprises, including TNCs, could contribute to the goals of sustainable development: global corporate environmental management; risk and hazard minimization; environmentally sounder consumption patterns; full-cost environmental accounting; and environmental conventions, standards and guidelines. The specific recommendations under each programme area, derived from the existing practices of environmentally leading businesses, also addressed Governments and international organizations, since incentives and regulatory standards could allow markets to function more effectively.

Particular recommendations included the establishment of clear corporate environmental policies, institutional structures and reporting systems for monitoring progress made towards sustainable development; minimization of hazardous processes through the assessment and anticipation of environmental risks, analysis and monitoring of environmental problems and awareness-building measures; identification of new markets, products and investments to replace environmentally degrading activities, and an increase in information flows on the environmental effects of such activities and products; incorporation of environmental costs into the production of goods and services, and creation of accounting methods to encompass sustainable development considerations; and compliance with and further development of international, regional and national environmental guidelines and instruments, as well as industry trade association standards and guidelines.

On 25 January,(7) the Commission on TNCs requested its Chairman to transmit the Secretary-General's report, the Commission's recommendations and the views expressed by member and observer States to the Preparatory Committee for UNCED (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII).

The Intergovernmental Working Group of Experts on International Standards of Accounting and Reporting(8) had before it a report of the Secretary-General(9) providing an international survey of corporate reporting practices. The survey found that TNCs demonstrated an awareness of environmental issues, even though their disclosures remained qualitative, descriptive and inconsistent across industries. The report also provided information on environmental policies and programmes of TNCs, key environmental improvements in their activities, emission levels, government legislation, legal proceedings and notes to the accounts, financial effects of environmental protection measures, and the availability of environmental information in special reports and information on environmental audits.

In its conclusions,(8) which were transmitted to the Secretary-General of UNCED, the Working Group listed a number of items that could be considered by a board of directors in its report or in management discussions: type of environmental issues pertinent to the enterprise and its industry; formal policies and programmes adopted by the enterprise with respect to environmental protection measures; improvements made in key areas since the introduction of environmental policies; environmental emission targets set by the enterprise for itself, and how the enterprise was performing relative to those targets; the extent to which environmental protection measures were undertaken due to governmental legislation and the extent to which governmental requirements were being achieved; any material proceedings under environmental law; the financial or operational effect of environmental protection measures on the capital expenditures and earnings of the enterprise; and the amount charged to operations and a description of the environmental measures to which they related, such as liquid effluent treatment, waste gas and air treatment, solid waste treatment, analysis, control and compliance, remediation and recycling. The Working Group suggested that financial statements could include the following environment-related accounting policy notes: recording liabilities and provisions; setting up catastrophe reserves; and disclosure of contingent liabilities. The following environment-related items could be included in contingent liabilities disclosures: liabilities, provisions and reserves set for the current period, and amounts accumulated to date; and contingent liabilities, with an estimate of the amount involved, unless the event was not likely to occur.

TNCs and international economic relations

In addressing questions relating to TNCs and international economic relations, the Commission on TNCs in April had before it three reports of the Secretary-General, requested by the Commission in 1991.(10)

A February report(11) surveyed global and regional trends in foreign direct investment, indicating the continued growth of world-wide flows in 1990 despite reduced economic growth in a number of large economies.

The report noted that, in 1990, world-wide foreign direct investment outflows increased by 7 per cent over 1989, reaching $225 billion, while inflows fell to $184 billion. The slow-down in the growth of outflows in 1990 was largely attributable to a slow-down in the growth of outflows from Japan, a possible plateauing of outflows from the United States and a decline in outflows from the United Kingdom. Outflows of foreign direct investment from developed countries other than those three grew by 27 per cent in 1990, a growth rate equivalent to the global average for the period 1983-1990. Outflows from developing countries declined in 1990 compared with 1989, having grown substantially in the late 1980s, driven by the growth in outflows from the Asian newly industrializing economies.

Inflows of foreign direct investment to developing countries grew by 7 per cent in 1990; they received 17 per cent of all inflows, which was equal to their share for the last half of the 1980s. Foreign direct investment to Central and Eastern Europe increased sharply, but remained at low levels.

The report stated that the continuing growth of foreign direct investment was an important element in the economies of most of the world's regions. Its relative importance could be shown in such indicators as its share in domestic capital formation and the growth of foreign sales by TNCs as a means of delivering goods and services to foreign markets.

In a report on TNCs and economic growth through technology,(12) the Secretary-General noted that evidence from both developed and developing countries demonstrated that technology was a key determinant of growth. The report analysed contributions by TNCs to technological change in host nations through increased research and development expenditures, higher factor productivity and change in the composition of manufactured output and exports in favour of research-and-development intensive products.

In discussing policy implications, the report noted that research and development by TNCs in developing countries was mainly located in countries already possessing some level of technological competence and a supply of trained personnel. Policy measures to induce TNCs to undertake greater research and development in host economies should be conceived. Although foreign direct investment had made a notable contribution to technology transfer, performance variations of TNCs again appeared to be related to host economies' indigenous technological capacities.

Also, while foreign direct investment was a useful means of quickly benefiting from the results of new innovation through the transfer of production, it did not necessarily imply dissemination of technological knowledge to domestic producers, raising the question of the choice between foreign direct investment and externalized forms as mode of transfer. Where TNCs were willing to transfer technologies in externalized form, technology purchasers should be provided with information on available alternatives, as excessive payment implied a drain on domestic resources. Highly restricted policies towards foreign direct investment could limit the scope for acquiring technology through other channels, unless the country concerned had a strong bargaining position because of its large market size or the capacity to develop technologies independent of an association with TNCs.

The report emphasized that the growth-promoting impact of technologies acquired through foreign direct investment and other forms of association with TNCs was ultimately dependent on the incentive structure faced by both foreign and domestic enterprises in acquiring, adapting, innovating upon and diffusing technologies. That structure required the formulation of public policies regarding physical infrastructure, human resources development, research and development, technology and foreign direct investment, competition, international trade, factor pricing, venture capital and subsidies. Without that kind of approach, the contribution of TNCs to growth through technology transfer would fall short of its potential.

In a report on TNCs in the new world economy,⁽¹³⁾ the Secretary-General discussed major economic changes in the 1990s. The expanded role of the private sector, the rapid pace of new technological developments and the central role of TNCs in organizing technological activity, globalization of enterprises and regionalization of business activity around the three Triad members (the European Community, Japan and the United States) enabled TNCs as integrating agents of those activities to affect significantly the economic performance of host developing countries.

The report noted that the ongoing phase of world economic growth and integration was likely to be driven by the activities of TNCs to a greater extent than ever before, with a corresponding rise in the impact of foreign direct investment on host countries' growth and development. Despite the major role of foreign direct investment in international economic relations, there was no mechanism through which Governments could provide information to other Governments and interested parties on their foreign direct investment policies. The report outlined measures to improve transparency in that area which, if adopted, would result in the establishment and dissemination of the policy statements, laws, regulations and administrative guidelines that comprised reporting countries' foreign direct investment policy frameworks. Such a reporting system could also provide the basis for improving investment policies through policy evaluations and reviews. Such policy reviews could amplify the efforts of countries to maximize the benefits of foreign direct investment to their economies.

In April,⁽¹⁾ the Commission took note of the Secretary-General's reports and requested the Secretariat to continue its work on foreign direct investment and the role of TNCs in development and to report in 1993.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 30 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1992/36 on privatization and foreign investment in the context of economic restructuring (see PART THREE, Chapter I).

Centre on TNCs

In April,⁽¹⁾ the Commission on TNCs considered three reports of the Secretary-General dealing with the 1991 activities of the Centre on TNCs and its joint units established with the regional commissions.

In a February report, ⁽²⁾ the Secretary-General described work being done by the Centre to secure an effective code of conduct and other international arrangements and agreements relating to TNCs (see above); to minimize the negative effects of TNCs and enhance their contributions to development; and to strengthen the capabilities of host developing countries to deal with matters related to TNCs. With regard to the scope of the programme during the 1990s, the Secretary-General stated that the Centre planned to implement the proposed medium-term plan for the period 1992-1997, which identified the basic scope of the United Nations programme on TNCs in foreign direct investment, trade, transition of certain countries to a market economy and technical cooperation.

In 1991, the Centre offered unpaid internships to approximately 50 students of business, economics and law from Germany, Hong Kong, India, the Netherlands, Romania, Thailand, Trinidad and Tobago, Turkey and the United States, among others. The interns were able to make a useful contribution to the Centre's work, while gaining insight into the functioning of the Organization.

Information system

The Centre continued to develop its information system covering individual TNCs, industries and sectors, laws and regulations, contracts, macroeconomic data and information sources. The system provided access to directory, financial and historical information on more than 100,000 public and private companies worldwide. In 1991, it received some 2,700 requests for information, plus approximately 2,500 short, usually verbal, queries from Governments, inter-governmental, trade union and business organizations, academic institutions, and media and public interest groups.

The Centre added to the system a database covering environmental policies of 170 TNCs and finalized a computerized analytical inventory of more than 400 non-petroleum contracts and agreements. It provided information system expertise for the development of the Investment Promotion Centre in Namibia, the Registry of Foreign Investment Agreements in Ghana, a monitoring system of foreign investment projects in Thailand and an information system on technology transfer in Nepal. The Centre also made an information technology assessment for a CD-ROM database on company information in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, and trained a number of officials from Nepal and the former USSR in the evaluation and use of information resources.

In a February report on information requirements for assessing the performance of corporate obligations,⁽³⁾ the Secretary-General examined the need for reporting systems and information exchange between Governments or local enterprises and TNCs to track company performance and to ensure compliance with local laws and accountability of transborder operations. The report noted the increasing importance of access to corporate information for evaluating the financial state of companies, monitoring their development and environmental impact, and assessing the effectiveness of their operations. It reviewed national and international mechanisms for the specification of reporting requirements and the definition of accounting standards, and discussed the sharing of information within and between countries, as well as the locus of responsibility for data collection and analysis. The report assessed performance tracking systems being developed and recommended that Governments review existing legislation and administrative practices to ensure adequacy of information obtained and to consolidate their own reporting systems, introduce standardized reporting procedures and accounting regulations, analyse the collected information and make it accessible, and promote regular information exchange with other Governments.

Joint units with the regional commissions

The joint units established by the Centre on TNCs with the five regional commissions, serving as focal points of its activities in the respective regions, continued to make contributions in the fields of research, information and liaison with Governments.⁽²⁾

The Joint Unit with the Economic Commission for Africa (ECA) focused its research on corporate operations in the region and issues related to development financing. It also studied the role of TNCs in technology transfer to the African developing countries and in agricultural export products, and collected data on foreign direct investment with a view to establishing a regional database on TNCs. It also provided technical support to ECA, particularly in the area of environment and services. Missions were undertaken to Burundi, Senegal and Zambia to review the development of information systems on TNCs and related problems, to collect data on corporate foreign investment and to assess the role of TNCs in technology transfer.

The Joint Unit with the Economic Commission for Europe focused on projects related to foreign direct investment, privatization and restructuring of State-owned enterprises in Central and Eastern Europe. An ad hoc expert group meeting on the last subject was held at Geneva in September 1991. The Unit assisted in analysing the environmental impact of TNCs and represented the Centre at international meetings and conferences held in the region. It continued to support international organizations, Governments and government agencies on matters related to TNCs.

The Joint Unit established with the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific (ESCAP) undertook and prepared for publication the following research projects: the impact of TNCs on the international trade of primary commodities; TNCs in selected service industries of developing countries in the region; and the contribution of TNCs to technology transfer in export processing zones and science parks in developing countries of Asia and the Pacific. The Unit also completed for publication a study of transnational technology towards the year 2000 and a review of the Asia-Pacific TNCs. It organized ad hoc expert group meetings on the role of TNCs in the international trade of primary commodities (Bangkok, Thailand 25-27 November 1991) and on the activities of TNCs and selected service industries of Asian and Pacific developing countries (Bangkok, 2-4 December). The Unit continued to collect, analyse and disseminate information and data on the activities of TNCs in the region. It also provided technical and information assistance and advisory services and disseminated information to ESCAP member States and its 13 focal points in the region.

The Joint Unit with the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC) placed particular emphasis on examining the role of foreign investment in changing production patterns and industrial restructuring in the region. The project included country case-studies on Brazil, Chile, Colombia and Mexico. The Unit continued its research on national policy frameworks on foreign direct investment in the region and related policy changes and published a number of manuals concerning transnational banks. It also carried out a study on investment opportunities in the former USSR and prepared a manual for a pilot computer programme on domestic information systems for decision-making on foreign investment (SITOD). The Unit continued to provide technical assistance to ECLAC member States, including a SITOD pilot project in Chile, legal advisory services to Peru and Venezuela and a technical cooperation project with Peru.

In September 1991, the Joint Unit with the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia resumed its activities, suspended in August 1990 owing to the events in the Persian Gulf. Research projects due for completion included a two-volume technical paper on Arab petrochemicals and related protectionist policies of the European Community. The Unit also contributed to the Centre's project on TNCs and industrial restructuring in developing countries.

Research

In 1991, in cooperation with the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD), the Centre on TNCs launched a project on the role of TNCs in world trade and exports from developing countries and undertook a study on the role of TNCs in the promotion of manufactured exports from developing countries through joint ventures and non-equity links, as well as a subsequently published study dealing with the impact of trade-related investment measures on trade and development. (4) A project on foreign direct investment, trade and international migration was initiated jointly with UNCTAD, the International Organization for Migration and the Friedrich Ebert Foundation. Together with the World Bank, the Centre began work on the Handbook: Issues in the Liberalization of International Transactions in Services. It also continued research on the role of small and medium-sized TNCs in the world economy.

The Centre published or completed for publication more than 80 studies, technical papers and parliamentary documents. The World Investment Report 1991: The Triad in Foreign Direct Investment(5) was the first in a series of annual reports on global trends in foreign direct investment and analyses of TNC-related subjects. The first two studies were issued in a new series on environmental responsibilities of TNCs, one of which recommended disclosure legislation for developing countries to enable accident prevention and emergency response.(6) The other focused on six transnational energy-producing and energy-consuming industries, in which corporate practices had an impact on global climate change.(7) The question of human resources development was addressed in a three-volume university curriculum on TNCs(8) that provided a basis for long-term training of government and public sector officials in economic development and international business and law. The Centre also prepared a 1991 review of international accounting and reporting issues(9) and published studies on the influence of government policies on foreign investment(10) and factors that caused TNCs to undertake investments abroad.(11)

The implications of free economic zones for foreign direct investment in Central and Eastern Europe were examined in The Challenge of Free Economic Zones in Central and Eastern Europe: International Perspectives,(12) issued in early 1991. As a follow-up to the study, the Centre organized a series of international workshops on free economic zones in Ukraine (13-24 May 1991) and an international conference on the subject (Saint Petersburg, Russia, 10-14 December).

The Centre complemented its reference library with a selective bibliography on TNCs for 1988-1990(13) and a manual on transnational business information.(14) It completed for publication the ninth volume of National Legislation and Regulations relating to Transnational Corporations(15) and initial issues of the six-volume World Investment Directory(16) covering Asia and the Pacific, developed countries, Latin America and the Caribbean, Africa and Western Asia, Central and Eastern Europe, and global trends of foreign investment. The Centre also finalized a Compendium of Selected International Instruments on Foreign Investment, reproducing about 80 multilateral and regional instruments, and began work on the Directory of the World's Largest Service Companies—Series Two. It continued research for the Fifth Survey on Transnational Corporations in World Development and on the 20 volumes of its UNCTC Library on Transnational Corporations.

Technical cooperation

In 1991, the Centre on TNCs continued to focus its technical assistance activities on matters relating to economic reform, human resources and private sector development, and environment and natural resources management. In addition to developing countries, countries in transition to a market economy and those that had recently liberalized their policies to attract foreign investment also received assistance. Advisory, information and training assistance was provided to Afghanistan, Albania, Angola, Bulgaria, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Ethiopia, Ghana, Guinea, Guyana, Mongolia, Mozambique, Myanmar, Namibia, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Romania, Seychelles and Thailand, as well as members of the Commonwealth of Independent States.

The Centre provided advisory services to the African National Congress in formulating investment policies and an investment code for a new South Africa, and assisted in harmonizing fisheries arrangements in West Africa and investment laws in the eastern Caribbean, as well as economic integration in East and southern Africa. Training workshops addressed project analysis and evaluation, biotechnology, accounting, international procurement, technology transfer, joint ventures, international banking, privatization, free economic zones and international auditing. The Centre extended its programme to promote the creation and growth of small and medium-sized enterprises using linkages with TNCs to Zimbabwe, and planned to undertake feasibility studies for Botswana, Egypt, Kenya, Malawi and Mozambique. It also provided training assistance and advisory services on financial systems, access to capital markets and privatization activities, and organized a high-level round table on fiscal and administrative strategies for petroleum exploration and development. The Centre continued to assist developing countries to implement structural adjustment programmes aimed at achieving a more efficient use of their resources.

In February 1992, the Secretary-General reported to the Commission on experience gained in technical assistance activities involving the formulation of negotiation strategies to be adopted by developing countries when negotiating with TNCs.⁽¹⁷⁾ The report focused on two aspects of major concern to developing countries—the sharing of financial benefits derived from TNCs' investment projects and the relationship between TNCs' activities and national development policy goals. It also highlighted the growing importance of environmental concerns in the negotiating process and the need of developing countries for technical assistance in formulating negotiating strategies. The report concluded that developing countries still faced serious limitations in obtaining up-to-date legal, economic and financial information and having available the expertise necessary to structure an appropriate contractual framework. The importance of efforts by the international community to provide such assistance on a priority basis was emphasized.

In April 1992,⁽¹⁾ the Commission requested the Secretary-General to submit to it in 1993 a report on the implementation of the programme on TNCs, including the activities of the joint units established with the regional commissions.

Financing

The resources for implementing the programme on TNCs were made available from the United Nations regular budget and from extrabudgetary funds from donor States.

During 1991, seven States contributed or pledged some $1.5 million to the Trust Fund of the Centre on TNCs. Expenditures in 1991 totalled $1.5 million; the Fund's balance at year's end, was $2.7 million. Projects executed by the Centre under the fourth programming cycle (1987-1991) of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) totalled approximately $8.9 million. In 1991, some $3.5 million of UNDP funds were expended by the Centre on its technical cooperation programme.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 30 July 1992, the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of its Economic Committee, adopted resolution 1992/35 without vote.

Chapter VI

Natural resources, energy and cartography

Natural resources exploration and energy resources development continued to be considered by a number of United Nations bodies in 1992, with the environmental aspects of increased exploitation of such resources receiving particular attention. The Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy met in February and considered, among other subjects, a paper on solar energy: a strategy in support of environment and development, which was submitted to the Preparatory Committee for the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development.

In January, the International Conference on Water and the Environment, in the Dublin Statement on Water and Sustainable Development, noted that scarcity and misuse of fresh water posed a serious and growing threat to sustainable development and protection of the environment. In December, the General Assembly declared that the World Day for Water would be observed on 22 March of each year, starting in 1993 (resolution 47/193).

In his annual report to the Assembly, the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) observed that expanded use of nuclear energy was an option for increasing energy generation without significantly adding to carbon dioxide emissions. The Assembly, in October, urged States to cooperate in carrying out IAEA's work and in promoting the use of nuclear energy and the application of measures to strengthen the safety of nuclear installations and to minimize risks to life, health and the environment.

The Sixth United Nations Conference on the Standardization of Geographical Names was held in New York in August/September 1992.

Natural resources

Exploration

UN Revolving Fund for Natural Resources Exploration

During 1992, the United Nations Revolving Fund for Natural Resources Exploration (UNRFNRE), established by the General Assembly in 1973,⁽¹⁾ continued to assist developing countries in natural resources exploration and development.

Administered by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), the Fund was financed from voluntary contributions and donations in cash and kind, and replenishment contributions were required to be made from successful exploration projects, based on the proceeds of production. The first such replenishment was received in 1991.⁽²⁾

In 1992, pre-investment follow-up activities for successful mineral discoveries were carried out in the Congo, Guatemala and Honduras. The Yuscaran gold-silver deposit in Honduras attracted several private investors. The Fund assisted Guatemala to prepare a call for bids to develop its El Pato gold deposit. It also initiated steps to collect a $200 million reimbursable loan to the Congo for a feasibility study of an offshore phosphorite deposit; as at the end of the year, no payment had been received.

UNRFNRE had mineral exploration projects ongoing in five countries in 1992: the final report of the exploration for gold in the Suches area of Bolivia was completed; a report on the exploration for pyrophyllite deposits was submitted to China; chromite exploration in the Philippines continued with test pitting in the Mahayahay target area and the Fund announced its readiness to explore for epithermal gold deposits in northern Surigao; and, in the United Republic of Tanzania, exploration for gold began in the Canuck and Geita areas.

The Fund received requests for assistance in mineral exploration programmes from the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Guinea, Mongolia, Myanmar, Namibia, Sri Lanka and Viet Nam, as well as for geothermal projects in China, Costa Rica, Mexico and Nicaragua. It was hoped that funds would become available to enable UNRFNRE to support those activities.

Committee on Natural Resources

Continuing its efforts to restructure and revitalize the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields (see PART THREE, Chapter XVIII), the General Assembly, at its resumed forty-sixth session in 1992, considered the status of its subsidiary bodies and those of the Economic and Social Council in those fields.

By resolution 46/235 of 13 April, the Assembly proposed that the Committee on Natural Resources should comprise 24 government-nominated experts from different Member States, elected by the Council for four-year terms. The Committee would have two working groups, one on minerals and one on water resources. Its mandate with respect to energy would be assumed by the Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and on Energy for Development (see below). The Committee would meet for two weeks every two years and report to the Council with policy options and recommendations.

By decision 1992/218 of 30 April, the Council abolished its standing Committee on Natural Resources and established a new expert Committee of the same name. It requested the Secretary-General to submit recommendations for the new Committee's programme of work, and decided that it should hold its first session from 22 March to 2 April 1993.

By resolution 1992/62 of 31 July, the Council reaffirmed the mandate of the new Committee and approved the draft provisional agenda and programme of work for its first session.

Coordination of UN activities

In response to a 1991 Economic and Social Council request, (3) the Secretary-General, in his capacity as Chairman of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC), included in ACC's annual overview report(4) a section on the most effective ways of enhancing coordination in the mineral and energy sectors.

Replying to a request by the Secretary-General, ACC members provided their views on the subject. New institutions and mechanisms were suggested by some organizations, while others felt that existing arrangements were adequate.

ACC members indicated a need for close coordination and cooperation among various parts of the system. In the past, ad hoc inter-agency consultations for specific purposes had been held as the need arose, a modality that should be retained.

The question of establishing new formal coordination mechanisms in the mineral and energy sectors would be taken up following action on restructuring by the General Assembly.

Mineral resources

In 1992,(5) the United Nations Department of Economic and Social Development (DESD) carried out 79 projects, with a total delivery of $13.1 million, in 40 countries in all phases of mineral development—prospecting, geological mapping, airborne geophysical surveys, establishment of a geological computerized database using the Geographic Information System, mineral policy and investment promotion advice, mineral economic surveys, mine design and engineering, and environment protection and management. Many projects included institutional and human resources development components. Africa received 66 per cent of assistance provided, with the needs of least developed and land-locked countries, notably in the Sahel area, being stressed.

Some 20 short-term advisory missions took place, providing assistance in such areas as mineral-sector review, impact assessment of geological, geographic and environmental factors on life and poverty, the role of geological surveys in mitigating risks, evaluation of geological hazards, strategies for mitigation of volcanic hazards, formulation of legislative regulation, diamond exploration methodology and promotion, on-site evaluation and small-scale mining.

Most projects included a mining investment promotion component, including the constitution of user-friendly computerized geo-scientific databases, and many included the provision of legal and investment promotion services. Projects were implemented in Angola, Bolivia, Burkina Faso, Chad, Gabon, Guinea-Bissau, Jamaica, Mali, Mozambique, the Niger, Pakistan, the Philippines, Togo, Uganda and Yemen. DESD organized an Interregional Seminar on Foreign Investment and Joint Ventures in the Mining Sector (Haikou, China, 7-11 December).

Small-scale mining activities gained recognition, particularly as a means of providing employment opportunities in rural areas: in Mali, river-beds were dredged for mining cooperatives; in Burkina Faso, auriferous alluvials were processed; in the Lao People's Democratic Republic, alluvial gold targets were evaluated and testing for sluice recovery of gold from the Mekong River was about to start; and in Jamaica, a mobile mining task force successfully opened seven marble quarry sites. Projects also included training components: in Ethiopia, national personnel would be trained to provide advisory services to mines and prepare models for demonstrations at selected sites; and, in Mozambique, coal degasification techniques were taught.

The protection of the environment was a major concern in formulating new projects. Environmental baseline studies were carried out as a part of feasibility studies of mineral deposits in Nepal, Pakistan and Thailand.

Water resources

During the year, DESD executed 95 projects in water resources development, with a total delivery of $15.4 million. Projects and advisory missions covered water resources planning, engineering, legislation, rural water supply (including well drilling), maintenance and community participation and computer applications to surface and groundwater development and management.

Innovative large-scale projects were developed in the Central African Republic and Guinea-Bissau, financed by the United Nations Capital Development Fund and UNDP, focusing on the socio-economic aspects of water supply and sanitation in rural areas, with special emphasis on community participation and the role of women. The goal of a project in southern Africa was the integrated and environmentally sound management of the area's water resources to allow sustainable development. Projects in China, Pakistan and the Lake Chad basin (involving Cameroon, Chad, the Niger and Nigeria) also had a strong environmental component.

Interregional workshops were organized on the role of women in environmentally sound and sustainable development (Beijing, China, 9-15 September) and on the testing of training modules on women, water supply and sanitation (Bangkok, Thailand, 21-25 September).

International Conference on Water and the Environment

The International Conference on Water and the Environment (Dublin, Ireland, 26-31 January 1992) adopted, at its closing session, the Dublin Statement on Water and Sustainable Development. In March,(6) the Conference's Secretary-General submitted the Statement and the report of the Conference to the Preparatory Committee for the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII). The Dublin Conference, attended by 500 participants, including government-designated experts from 100 countries and representatives of 80 international, inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations, was convened by the World Meteorological Organization on behalf of the organizations of the United Nations represented in the ACC Intersecretariat Group for Water Resources.

The Dublin Statement noted that scarcity and misuse of fresh water posed a serious and growing threat to sustainable development and protection of the environment. Human health and welfare, food security, industrial development and the ecosystems on which they depended were all at risk unless water and land resources were managed more effectively. The Statement listed four guiding principles on which action recommended in the Conference report was based: fresh water was a finite and vulnerable resource, essential to sustain life, development and the environment; water development and management should be based on a participatory approach, involving users, planners and policy makers; women played a central part in providing, managing and safeguarding water; and water had an economic value and should be recognized as an economic good.

Based on those principles, the Statement proposed an action agenda covering alleviation of poverty and disease, protection against natural disasters, water conservation and reuse, sustainable urban development, agricultural production and rural water supply, protecting aquatic ecosystems and resolving water conflicts. It also addressed the need for an enabling environment to implement the action agenda and the need for follow-up mechanisms.

The report of the Conference contained further recommendations dealing with integrated water resources development and management, water resources assessment and impacts of climate change on water resources, protection of water resources, water quality and aquatic ecosystems, water and sustainable urban development and drinking-water supply and sanitation in the urban context, water for sustainable food production and rural development and drinking-water supply and sanitation in the rural context, mechanisms for implementation and coordination at international, national and local levels, and options for follow-up.

UN Conference on Environment and Development

Agenda 21, adopted in June 1992 by UNCED,(7) contained a chapter on the protection of the quality and supply of freshwater resources: application of integrated approaches to the development, management and use of water resources.

The Conference proposed a number of programme areas: integrated water resources development and management; water resources assessment; protection of water resources, water quality and aquatic ecosystems; drinking-water supply and sanitation; water and sustainable urban development; water for sustainable food production and rural development; and impacts of climate change on water resources. For each programme area, the Conference set a number of objectives and recommended activities to achieve them.

Inter-agency coordination

The ACC Intersecretariat Group for Water Resources (New York, 7-9 October 1992)(8) discussed strengthening coordination and cooperation in the field of water resources, including follow-up action on issues stemming from the Dublin Conference and UNCED.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December 1992, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee, the General Assembly adopted without vote resolution 47/193.

Observance of World Day for Water

The General Assembly,

Recalling the relevant provisions of chapter 18 of Agenda 21, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development,

Considering that the extent to which water resource development contributes to economic productivity and social well-being is not widely appreciated, although all social and economic activities rely heavily on the supply and quality of fresh water,

Considering also that, as populations and economic activities grow, many countries are rapidly reaching conditions of water scarcity or facing limits to economic development,

Considering further that the promotion of water conservation and sustainable management requires public awareness at local, national, regional and international levels,

1. Decides to declare 22 March of each year World Day for Water, to be observed starting in 1993, in conformity with the recommendations of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development contained in chapter 18 of Agenda 21;

2. Invites States to devote the Day, as appropriate in the national context, to concrete activities such as the promotion of public awareness through the publication and diffusion of documentaries and the organization of conferences, round tables, seminars and expositions related to the conservation and development of water resources and the implementation of the recommendations of Agenda 21;

3. Invites the Secretary-General to make recommendations on ways and means by which the United Nations Secretariat could, within existing resources and without prejudice to ongoing activities, assist countries in organizing their national activities for the observance of World Day for Water;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to make the necessary arrangements in order to ensure the success of the observance of World Day for Water by the United Nations;

5. Also requests the Secretary-General to focus observance of World Day for Water by the United Nations on a particular theme relating to the conservation of water resources;

6. Recommends that the Commission on Sustainable Development, in the execution of its mandate, attach priority to the implementation of chapter 18 of Agenda 21.

General Assembly resolution 47/193

22 December 1992	Meeting	93	Adopted	without	vote
Approved by Second Committee (A/47/719) without vote, 16 December (meeting 51); draft by Malaysia (A/C.2/47/L.63), orally amended by Morocco; agenda item 79.

dealing with changing consumption patterns. The Conference recommended a number of activities to encourage greater efficiency in the use of energy and resources, noting that reducing the amount of energy and materials used per unit in producing goods and services could contribute to both the alleviation of environmental stress and greater economic and industrial productivity and competitiveness. It was therefore recommended that Governments should encourage the dissemination of existing environmentally sound technologies and promote research and development in such technologies, assist developing countries to use those technologies efficiently and develop technologies suited to their own circumstances, encourage the environmentally sound use of new and renewable sources of energy, and encourage the environmentally sound and sustainable use of renewable natural resources.

Energy resources development

In response to a General Assembly resolution of 1990,(2) the Secretary-General submitted in May 1992 a report on energy exploration and development trends in developing countries.(3) The report analysed trends in energy consumption, exploration, development and production and made projections for future financial requirements and investments. Forecasts to the year 2010 indicated that energy demand in the developing countries would grow at an average annual rate of 4.4 per cent, much higher than the expected rate of 1.8 per cent in the developed market economies. Half of the increase in world energy demand would be in the developing countries. However, on a per capita basis, only marginal improvement could be expected in the current situation, where the level of energy consumption in those countries was about 10 per cent of that in the developed market economies.

Oil would continue to dominate consumption in the developing world. Coal would retain its overall position and be of great importance to a few countries, particularly China and India. Natural gas, the third most important fuel, would be more widely used, and the fast growth in electricity consumption would continue. In the absence of technological breakthroughs in new and renewable sources of energy, their contribution would remain static. Massive capital investments and the application of modern technologies would be required in the developing countries to meet domestic demand. New arrangements would be needed to promote international cooperation in the energy area of the world economy.

Technical cooperation

During 1992,(4) DESD carried out 50 missions to developing countries to provide advice on energy policy, resource evaluation and exploration, project design and feasibility studies in the areas of petroleum, coal, natural gas, electric power, energy planning and conservation, geothermal, solar, wind and multi-source renewable energy packages, information systems and microcomputer-based energy analysis. The Department executed 89 projects in the energy field with a total delivery of $10.5 million.

Energy

In June,(1) UNCED (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII) adopted Agenda 21, which contained a chapter

On the basis of a survey at sites in 41 developing countries during the 1980s, DESD in 1992 launched a programme on enhancement of small-scale hydropower resources in developing countries. The programme included environmental and socio-economic considerations. DESD continued to review and update existing studies and to select sites for further investigation.

At their request, DESD assisted the countries of Eastern Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States to restructure energy-sector institutions, in energy/environmental impact assessment and with energy efficiency advisory services. In Viet Nam, DESD and the World Bank undertook a review of energy-sector investments and policies, covering energy/economic interactions, the feasibility of building a refinery and developments in the coal sector. It also analysed an option to interconnect the northern and southern electricity grids, and assessed the condition and investment requirements of existing hydro and thermal powerplants.

Embarking on a programme to expand and improve coal utilization, China assigned priority to implementing the following DESD-formulated programme elements: control of environmental pollution from coal combustion in four cities; transfer and development of methods to predict, mitigate and eliminate karst water inflows into coal beds under development; and access to and training in high-production mining techniques in thick coal seams through seminars, visits to productive mines and technical workshops with manufacturers of high-seam equipment.

Meetings organized by DESD included a study tour on small-scale hydropower (China, 14-27 June) and reinjection of geothermal fluids (Costa Rica, 10-12 November).

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 31 July 1992, on the recommendation of its Economic Committee, the Economic and Social Council adopted without vote resolution 1992/56.

Development of the energy resources of developing countries

The Economic and Social Council,

Reaffirming the critical importance of the development of energy resources of developing countries and the need for measures by the international community to assist and support the efforts of developing countries, in particular the energy-deficient among them, to develop their energy resources in order to meet their needs through cooperation, assistance and investment in the fields of conventional and of new and renewable sources of energy: consistent with their national policies, plans and priorities,

Reaffirming also that the developing countries have the primary responsibility for the strategies and policies for exploration and development of their energy resources,

Recognizing the importance of sustainable development,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the report of the Secretary-General on energy exploration and development trends in developing countries;

2. Reaffirms that an adequate flow of external resources in support of the national efforts of developing countries, in particular the energy-deficient among them, is needed to finance, within the legislative framework of each country, the exploration and development of their energy resources;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to, keep the matter under constant review and to submit to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1994 a report on the efforts made in this regard;

4. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1994 on the role of the United Nations in devising ways and means of mobilizing the international community to increase efforts for comprehensive national, bilateral and multilateral measures to accelerate the exploration and development of energy resources in developing countries, with full respect for their national sovereignty;

5. Further requests the Secretary-General to draw this matter to the attention of the Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and on Energy for Development at its first substantive session.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1992/56

----	------	------	---------	----	---------	---------	------

Approved by Economic Committee (E/1992/109/Add.) without vote, 28 July (meeting 16); draft by Vice-Chairman (E/1992/C.1/L.18), based on informal consultations on draft by Pakistan for Group of 77 (E/1992/C.1/L.1); agenda item 12 (h).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

By decision 47/435 of 18 December, the General Assembly took note of the Secretary-General's report on energy exploration and development trends in developing countries.

New and renewable energy resources

The Committee on the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy, established by the General Assembly in 1982,(5) held its sixth session in New York from 3 to 14 February 1992.(6) The Committee discussed the implementation of the 1981 Nairobi Programme of Action for the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy(7) and mobilization of financial resources for its implementation. It also considered two substantive themes: the contribution of new and renewable sources of energy to decentralized energy systems and to specific multi-purpose medium- to large-scale applications; and promotion of rapid and effective transfer of technology in new and renewable sources of energy to developing countries. The Secretary-General submitted reports on the first(8) and second(9) themes. He also submitted a report on the activities of the United Nations system regarding the two themes.(10)

Also before the Committee were reports by the Secretary-General on the following subjects: a strategy for solar energy in support of environment and development;(11) activities being carried out by the entities within the United Nations system in the field of new and renewable sources of energy;(12) mobilization of financial resources and inter-agency coordination;(13) and progress achieved in the follow-up of substantive themes selected for detailed consideration by the Committee at its 1988 and 1990 sessions.(14) The Committee also considered the report of the 1991 meeting of the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on New and Renewable Sources of Energy(15) and the report of an October 1991 symposium on hydropower, held at Oslo, Norway.(16)

On 14 February, the Committee adopted two decisions. By the first,(17) it requested the Secretary-General to transmit to the Preparatory Committee for UNCED his report on solar energy,(11) the report of the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on New and Renewable Sources of Energy,(15) the report of the symposium on hydropower(16) and a pre-feasibility survey on a proposed network of centres of excellence on new and renewable sources of energy. By the second decision,(18) the Committee approved the provisional agenda and documentation for its seventh (1994) session.

The ACC Inter-Agency Group on New and Renewable Sources of Energy (New York, 3 and 4 February)(19) also discussed the substantive themes chosen for consideration by the Committee.

On 7 February, the Economic and Social Council, by decision 1992/207, decided that, when considering the report of the Committee on its sixth session, it would not consider new draft proposals, except for specific recommendations that required action by the Council and proposals related to coordination aspects of the Committee's work. By decision 1992/299 of 31 July, the Council took note of the Committee's report.

On 18 December, the General Assembly also took note of the Committee's report by decision 47/434.

Committee name change

As part of the process of restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields, the General Assembly, by resolution 46/235 of 13 April, changed the name of the Committee on the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy to the Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and on Energy for Development. In addition to its current mandate, the new Committee would take over the mandate of the old Committee on Natural Resources (see above) as it pertained to energy.

By decision 1992/218 of 30 April, the Economic and Social Council established the Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and on Energy for Development. On 31 July, by resolution 1992/62, the Council reaffirmed the mandate of the new Committee.

Energy use and air emissions

In response to a 1988 General Assembly request,(20) the Secretary-General submitted in October 1992 a report(21) on structural change in the world economy and the implications for energy use and emissions of carbon dioxide, sulphur dioxide and nitrogen oxides. The report discussed macro-economic trends and gave projections of production and air emissions to the year 2020 under three different scenarios for economic growth, with particular reference to the energy-intensive economic sectors. Based on the same scenarios, future structural changes in the world economy were also considered; the possible changes were determined by projected trends in the level and composition of investment, foreign trade and consumption, and by assumed interregional patterns of moderate technology diffusion. In turn, those projected trends were used to determine different rates of growth of economic activities and thus of energy and materials requirements and levels of air emissions.

The report concluded that output of energy-intensive materials such as metals, chemicals, cement, fertilizers and paper typically grew rapidly during the intermediate stage of industrialization. That pattern of structural transformation was already taking place in a number of developing countries and was expected to continue. Even with considerable increases in energy-use efficiency and reductions in air emissions per unit of gross domestic product, the world's annual consumption of fossil fuels would double by the year 2020. Emissions of carbon dioxide and nitrogen oxides would increase proportionately, while emissions of sulphur dioxide would rise by more than 40 per cent.

To reduce or at least limit the long-term growth of global emissions, especially of carbon dioxide, options considered needed to be extended beyond slowing the world's economic growth. Technologies already existed to reduce nitrogen oxides and sulphur dioxide emissions substantially at costs that would be acceptable with high economic growth. The growth of carbon dioxide emissions could be limited through higher efficiency in energy use and lower inputs of materials in various production processes, and through a better mix of carbon fuels and substitution of other, carbon-free energy sources.

Reductions of carbon dioxide emissions through fuel switching would be feasible in many regions, especially those with large natural gas reserves. A massive change-over from coal and oil to natural gas, however, would require greatly expanded exploration and production, and the collaboration of the world's major coal and oil users. High capital investment would be required to develop an integrated system for world trade in natural gas and to develop the vast hydropower potential of developing countries, which was estimated to equal half of the world's annual consumption of oil.

By decision 47/444 of 22 December, the General Assembly took note of the Secretary-General's report.

Nuclear energy

IAEA report

In an August note, (22) the Secretary-General transmitted the 1991 report of the International Atomic Energy Agency to the General Assembly. Presenting and updating the report in the Assembly on 21 October, the IAEA Director General recalled that IAEA had been established 35 years earlier to promote the peaceful uses of the atom for development and to verify that commitments to exclusively peaceful uses were respected (see PART SEVEN, Chapter I, for further information on IAEA activities).

The Director General addressed the issue of non-proliferation of nuclear weapons (see PART ONE, Chapter II), IAEA's safeguards system, including inspections to monitor Iraq's compliance with Security Council resolutions (see PART TWO, Chapter III), peaceful applications, environmental protection and nuclear safety and public opinion.

The peaceful applications of nuclear technology were significant. For example, 17 per cent of the world's electricity came from nuclear-power reactors; every third patient in industrialized countries was being examined or treated by a nuclear-related method; and the cotton crop in Pakistan and the rice crop in Indonesia had been boosted by the use of suitable mutagens, new strains produced through mutations induced by irradiating seeds.

Nuclear techniques were also being used to monitor and protect the environment. Isotopes were a tool in the fight against groundwater and soil contamination through excessive use of fertilizers; they allowed precise measurement of the amount of fertilizer that went into the plant so that the most appropriate fertilizer regime could be established. Similarly, nuclear techniques allowed the determination of the amount of nitrogen that different crop plants obtained from the soil, leading to better fertilizer strategies. Most controversial was the question of how helpful nuclear power could be in generating the increasing amounts of electricity which the world would need without emitting carbon dioxide into the atmosphere and thereby contributing to a possible global warming. There was a growing awareness that expanded use of nuclear energy was one of the few options for increasing energy generation without significantly adding to carbon dioxide emissions.

However, it was still true that the use of nuclear power was opposed by a sizeable segment of public opinion for fear of accidental radioactive releases or from concern about the disposal of nuclear wastes. A draft convention on nuclear safety was being negotiated within IAEA and efforts were under way to work out internationally agreed radioactive-waste safety standards.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 October 1992, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/8 by recorded vote.

Cartography

During 1992, (1) DESD assisted various developing countries in applying remote sensing techniques for mapping and map updating. In Uganda, for example, satellite imagery was taken of the entire territory of the country. Comparison of that imagery with existing 30-year-old maps facilitated the preparation of revised and updated maps. Surveys of deep-sea areas were completed in Trinidad and Tobago. The country would be able to undertake work to manage and protect its marine environment effectively, particularly with regard to offshore hazards and the definition of sea lanes to cope with the heavy traffic of crude-oil carriers in the area.

In collaboration with the Earth Observation Satellite Company (United States) and the International Society for Photogrammetry and Remote Sensing, DESD organized a seminar on photogrammetry and remote sensing (Washington, DC., 2-14 August) to benefit developing countries.

Standardization of geographical names

The Sixth United Nations Conference on the Standardization of Geographical Names, held in New York from 25 August to 3 September 1992,(2) was attended by 154 representatives and observers from 67 countries, the Holy See, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization and the Commission of the European Communities (for participating States, see APPENDIX III). The Permanent Observer Mission of Palestine to the United Nations and five international scientific organizations also took part.

The Conference considered reports of linguistic/geographical divisions and of Governments on the situations in their regions and countries and on progress made in the standardization of geographical names since the Fifth (1987) Conference.(3)

It established three committees—on national, technical, and international programmes—to consider national standardization, the creation of toponymic data files, the reduction of exonyms, terminology, the naming of features beyond a single sovereignty, romanization and conversion into non-Roman writing systems, and toponymic education and practice. The Conference also considered the economic and social benefits of national and international standardization of geographical names, measures taken and proposed to implement United Nations resolutions on the standardization of geographical names, technical assistance and international cooperation.

The Conference adopted 15 resolutions. It recommended that an Africa South Division, a Baltic Division, and an Eastern Europe, Northern and Central Asia Division of the United Nations Group of Experts on Geographical Names be established, reflecting changes in those regions. Noting that the linguistic/geographical division of Latin America was not represented at the Conference, it recommended that Brazil, El Salvador, Mexico, Portugal, Spain and Venezuela reactivate the division. It also noted the increasing number of countries having toponymic guidelines for map editors and advised the United Nations to publish them in combined volumes. Owing to political changes in certain Member States, the Conference recommended that the affected countries should provide the Expert Group with information on changes of geographical names every six months. Given the sensitivity to deliberate changing of geographical names, the Conference reaffirmed a resolution of the Third (1977) Conference,(4) which had emphasized that geographical names given and/or standardized by a body other than the nationally authorized one should not be recognized by the United Nations. To facilitate uniform terminology, the Conference recommended that the Secretariat should translate the glossary of toponymic terminology, prepared in English by the Expert Group, into the live other official languages of the Organization. It also recommended that the United Nations should provide financial assistance to developing countries to organize seminars and training courses on applied toponymy.

The Conference approved the statute of the United Nations Group of Experts on Geographical Names and recommended that the Economic and Social Council also approve it. It also recommended to the Council that the Seventh Conference be held in 1997, that it accept Iran's offer to act as host and that it request the Secretary-General to take measures to implement the Sixth Conference's recommendations.

Group of Experts. The United Nations Group of Experts on Geographical Names held its sixteenth session in New York on 24 August and 4 September 1992.(5) On 24 August, it discussed the organization of the Sixth Conference and reviewed its own statute. On 4 September, it discussed the implementation of the Conference's recommendations, the status of its various working groups and the provisional agenda of its seventeenth (1994) session.

Chapter VII

Science and technology

In 1992, the United Nations continued its efforts to strengthen the scientific and technological areas of development. As a result of the restructuring of the United Nations Secretariat, the activities of the Centre for Science and Technology for Development were incorporated into the new Science, Technology, Energy, Environment and Natural Resources Division of the Department of Economic and Social Development. In April, as decided by the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council established a new Commission on Science and Technology for Development to replace the Assembly's Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development and its subsidiary body, the Advisory Committee on Science and Technology for Development.

During the year, two major United Nations conferences—the eighth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (Cartagena de Indias, Colombia, 8-25 February) and the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, 3-14 June)—contributed significantly to the new perspectives and directions of science and technology. The Cartagena Commitment and the Rio Declaration adopted by these Conferences made recommendations for the enhancement of the role of science and technology in developing countries, particularly with regard to the transfer and development of technology and transfer of environmentally sound technology.

Science and technology for development

Implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action

General aspects

Throughout 1992, several United Nations bodies and organizations continued to implement the 1979 Vienna Programme of Action on Science and Technology for Development.⁽¹⁾ The Programme of Action, whose goals were reaffirmed by the General Assembly in 1989 following an end-of-decade review,⁽²⁾ had as its objectives: strengthening the scientific and technological capacities of developing countries by mobilizing financial resources; upgrading institutional arrangements; improving the balance of international flows of technology; and restructuring the existing pattern of international scientific and technological relations.

In 1990,⁽³⁾ the Committee for Programme and Coordination (CPC) had requested the Secretary-General to submit in 1992 a conclusive report on problems associated with the implementation of the Programme of Action. In March 1992,⁽⁴⁾ the Secretary-General indicated that, in view of the need to take into account the decisions on the legislative organs expected to be taken by the General Assembly in April (see below), it would be untimely to prepare the requested report. The Department of Economic and Social Development (DESD) would therefore submit an oral report.

At the first part of its thirty-second session (May),⁽⁵⁾ CPC heard DESD's oral report and expressed regret that the report it had requested had not been prepared. It decided to discuss at the resumed session the issue of science and technology for development in the context of revisions to the medium-term plan for 1992-1997 and the revised estimates of the 1992-1993 programme budget.

At the resumed session (August/September),⁽⁵⁾ CPC recommended approval of revisions to programme 17 of the medium-term plan, dealing with science and technology for sustainable development. It also recommended that the General Assembly review the proposed revisions to the titles of the programme and its subprogramme 1 in the light of relevant mandates; pending an Assembly decision on the issue, the existing titles should remain.

Proposed global information network

In response to a 1991 Economic and Social Council request, ⁽⁶⁾ the Secretary-General submitted in June 1992 a report,⁽⁷⁾ containing information provided by organizations and agencies of the United Nations system on their international cooperation activities in the field of informatics, and on arrangements for cooperation and coordination with other parts of the system.

The report noted that the informatics activities reported reflected the diversity of the agencies' mandates and covered a broad range of informatics' wide spectrum. They included: general research and development with potential application in developing countries, including strategies and policies for informatics; technology dissemination; and development of international databases and information systems in specific fields, such as management, technical/scientific systems, bibliographic systems, statistics, and information networking and communications.

In terms of coordination, mechanisms existed, in intergovernmental bodies and under the aegis of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC), to coordinate technical cooperation in statistical data processing and informatics. Applications in developing countries were an ongoing concern of those bodies and coordination in developing countries' applications could be reinforced.

An ACC body-the Advisory Committee for the Coordination of Information Systems-provided advisory services to United Nations organizations on proposals for creating new information systems and for substantial modifications to existing ones. It also promoted the use of common standards to enhance compatibility of information systems.

Although various mechanisms existed for inter-agency coordination of work on management information systems, bibliographic and other specialized technical systems, publications and communications systems, there was no general framework for their overall coordination and consideration of applications in developing countries. It was suggested that such a framework could be considered by the DESD, which was the system's focal point for general research, policy and coordination issues affecting developing countries and whose responsibilities and programmes cut across a wide range of informatics and data-processing concerns.

Such a framework would require regular coordinating arrangements that would contribute to the effectiveness and quality of the system's activities for developing countries. The objectives of such arrangements would be: to identify problem areas in informatics suitable for tackling through inter-agency coordination for the benefit of developing countries (standardization of equipment, software, data or procedures); and to propose common informatics projects/programme activities at the national/regional level to foster the use of modern informatics technology for economic and social development.

The Secretary-General analysed the causes of the situation with respect to United Nations informatics systems in a report on harmonization and improvement of those systems for optimal utilization and accessibility by all States (8) (see PART SIX, Chapter III). On 31 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1992/60 on the topic.

Strengthening technological capacity in developing countries

The Cartagena Commitment, adopted by the eighth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD VIII) in February(9) (see PART THREE, Chapter IV), noted that technology had increasingly become a determinant of the ability of countries to participate in world trade in manufactures and services. The Conference recognized technological capability as a fundamental factor for social and economic development and recommended that emphasis be put on policies and measures to promote technological innovation in developing countries. High priority should be given to stimulating technology flows to developing countries, facilitating their access to it and enhancing their capacity to modify and adapt technology to local conditions and to generate and develop technology locally. Policies should also aim to expand and adapt educational systems, build up scientific and technological research and development capabilities, and encourage the diffusion of technology within developing countries. National technology policies should promote entrepreneurship and encourage technology transfer, including foreign direct investment, and provide incentives for investment in technology capacity-building, including research and development, innovation, adaptation and development of technologies to support national objectives and priorities.

Given the importance of technologies to the development process, developed countries should consider ways to facilitate technology cooperation with the developing world. Those countries should also encourage improved cooperation between their enterprises and scientific and technological institutions and those of developing countries. The Conference recognized the need to explore ways to provide developing countries with technical cooperation and support to enable them to undertake research and development and skill formation, including training programmes, as well as to import foreign technological inputs as a complement to local technological efforts. Multilateral and international financial institutions were encouraged to take account of the technological needs of developing countries.

High-level meeting of experts

A Meeting of High-level Experts on Science and Technology for Development was held at Bujumbura, Burundi, from 4 to 8 May 1992.(10) The substantive theme of the Meeting, which was attended by 14 high-level experts and 5 representatives from organizations and agencies of the United Nations system, was the role of science and technology in the development of the least developed countries (LDCs). The Meeting also discussed technology in industrialization, specifically privatization of publicly funded industrial research and development institutions and the role of technological cooperation in fostering regional economic integration. In addition, it reviewed the experience of the former Advisory Committee on Science and Technology for Development and expressed its views on the new Commission on Science and Technology for Development (see below).

With regard to science and technology for LDCs, the Meeting noted that the debate on the issue reflected the need for a new policy approach, in line with the changing global context and the new understanding of endogenous capacity in science and technology for development. That approach should address all aspects of science and technology policy, including those of application, development and transfer, which had previously been neglected or underemphasized.

The Meeting made a series of recommendations for action at the national and international policy levels in four areas: management of resources and building of endogenous capacities; infrastructures for and linkages of technology in science and technology policy; science and technology development and technology transfer as a response to demand; and generation of domestic demand for science and technology. As to implementation, the Meeting proposed a number of guidelines for consideration by entrepreneurs and policy makers at the political level.

Science for sustainable development

The United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) in June(11) adopted the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, in which it proclaimed that States should cooperate to strengthen endogenous capacity-building for sustainable development by improving scientific understanding through exchanges of scientific and technological knowledge, and by enhancing the development, adaptation, diffusion and transfer of technologies, including new and innovative technologies.

UNCED also adopted Agenda 21, a chapter of which dealt with science for sustainable development, focusing on the role and use of the sciences in support of the prudent management of the environment and development for the daily survival and future development of humanity. Noting that scientists were improving their understanding in areas such as climatic change, growth in resource consumption rates, demographic trends and environmental degradation, UNCED stated that changes in those areas needed to be taken into account in working out long-term strategies for development.

UNCED identified four programme areas—strengthening the scientific basis for sustainable management, enhancing scientific understanding, improving long-term scientific assessment, and building up scientific capacity and capability—and outlined objectives, activities and means of implementation for each.

Another chapter of Agenda 21, on the scientific and technological community, addressed the question of how to enable the scientific and technological community to make a more open and effective contribution to the decision-making processes concerning environment and development. UNCED outlined objectives, activities and means of implementation for two programme areas—improving communication and cooperation among the scientific and technological community, decision makers and the public, and promoting codes of practice and guidelines related to science and technology.

(For details of UNCED, see PART THREE, Chapter VIII.)

UN Fund for Science and Technology for Development

During 1992, the United Nations Fund for Science and Technology for Development received an estimated $1.56 million in resources from voluntary, cost-sharing and sub-trust fund contributions and from interest and other income. A total of $4.24 million was carried over from 1991. During the year, the Fund's expenditure amounted to some $2.01 million, leaving a balance of $3.79 million, less $2.42 million in unspent project allocations.

The Fund organized six policy meetings in 1992, in Cape Verde, Jamaica, Pakistan, Togo, Uganda and Viet Nam, to stimulate country-specific portfolios of science and technology activities to be supported by a combination of national, bilateral and multilateral resources. A pilot technology incubator scheme was implemented in 15 countries; it offered small businesses shared office services, marketing assistance and access to new capital. The repair and maintenance of scientific instruments programme, highly successful in southern Africa, was extended to West Africa and South Asia. A computerized referral system for journalists was launched in Asia to bring together scientists and journalists in order to improve the quality of scientific reporting in the media.

Operational activities

As requested by the General Assembly in 1991,(12) the Secretary-General submitted in September 1992 a comprehensive policy review of operational activities of the United Nations system, an addendum to which⁽¹³⁾ comprised an assessment of and recommendations on the contribution of the system's operational activities to the enhancement of national capacities of developing countries in science and technology. The report defined the concept of science and technology capacity and the functions of the United Nations organizations in science and technology. The latter included financing (funding of projects, programmes and training); capacity-building (funding of institution-building, policy analysis, and provision of technical experts and of management, administrative or legal expertise or support); and global policy coordination (providing forums for exchange of views on policy matters and for negotiations with donors). The report also provided data on financial flows to research and development and to development, noting that the large disparities in expenditures on research and development between industrialized and developing countries underlay the basis of the accelerating gap in development dividing the two groups of countries. It also included an assessment of transfer of technology and an evaluation of capacity-building.

Operational issues identified in the report as requiring attention included the growing role of the private sector in national development, ownership rights to intellectual property developed in United Nations-financed projects, coordination within the United Nations system and information management.

Technology transfer

UNCTAD activities. In February,⁽¹⁾ UNCTAD VIII recognized that, in order to stimulate transfer of technology and the development of endogenous technological capabilities, developing countries should emphasize policies to enhance their scientific and technological capability and devote adequate resources to that end. Policies should range from expanding and adapting their educational systems to building up their scientific and technological research and development capabilities, and should include measures to encourage diffusion of technology within developing countries, especially to small and medium-sized companies. UNCTAD VIII recommended that developed countries, in their trade and technology policies, should facilitate access of developing countries to efficient, best-practice and needed technologies. It identified public guarantee schemes to promote joint ventures, licensing agreements, and research and development collaboration agreements as means to encourage technology flows to developing countries, and considered that bilateral investment and double taxation agreements could provide a supportive framework for investment flows, inviting transfer of technology and collaborative research and development arrangements between firms of developed and developing countries. Bilateral and multilateral assistance programmes should give priority to the transfer of appropriate technology.

The Conference recognized that the establishment and implementation of internationally agreed standards of protection for intellectual property rights should facilitate international flows of technology and cooperation and create market incentives for indigenous innovation and the transfer, adaptation and diffusion of technologies. It also considered that attention needed to be given to the technological requirements of the transition economies of Central and Eastern Europe and other regions.

UNCTAD should focus its economic development and technology transfer work programme on: research and analysis of the interrelationship of technology issues with trade in goods and services, investment, finance and environment; analysis of technology transfer and the issue of transfer of environmentally sound technology to developing countries and LDCs; and technical cooperation activities in support of developing countries to enhance their technological capacities.

In a section of the Cartagena Commitment dealing with institutional matters, UNCTAD VIII decided that the work programme of the Trade and Development Board's Committee on the Transfer of Technology would be assumed by an ad hoc working group on the interrelationship between investment and technology transfer.

On 7 May,⁽²⁾ the Trade and Development Board established the Ad Hoc Working Group on Interrelationship between Investment and Technology Transfer. The Group's terms of reference were: to examine the interrelationship between investment flows, particularly to developing countries, including LDCs, and the transfer, absorption and generation of technology and related policy measures; to identify factors conducive to technology transfer through foreign investment and analyse the role of intellectual property protection; to examine the role played by private firms, Governments and international organizations in the transfer of technology; to consider the impact of technological change, including new and emerging technologies; and to examine and encourage new initiatives and exchange of experiences on policies to overcome constraints and facilitate technology transfer through investment.

Transfer of environmentally sound technology

UNCTAD VIII agreed that the transfer and development of environmentally sound technologies was an essential component of a successful strategy for sustainable development, and requested that effective modalities for the creation, development, favourable access to and transfer of such technologies, particularly to developing countries, including on concessional and preferential terms, be examined.

In Agenda 21,(3) UNCED recognized that the availability of scientific and technological information and access to and transfer of environmentally sound technology were essential requirements for sustainable development. Providing adequate information on the environmental aspects of existing and state-of-the-art technologies required upgrading information on such technologies, including their environmental risks, and improving access to environmentally sound technologies.

UNCED proposed a number of objectives, including helping to ensure access, in particular of developing countries, to scientific and technological information and to promote, facilitate and finance access to and transfer of environmentally sound technologies and corresponding know-how on favourable terms. Other objectives were: facilitating the maintenance and promotion of environmentally sound indigenous technologies; supporting endogenous capacity-building, particularly in developing countries, through human resource development, strengthening institutional capacities for research and development and programme implementation, and integrated sector assessments of technology needs; and promoting long-term technological partnerships between holders of environmentally sound technologies and potential users.

Programme activities proposed by UNCED were aimed at developing international information networks to link national, subregional, regional and international systems; supporting and promoting access to transfer of technology; improving the capacity to develop and manage environmentally sound technologies; establishing a collaborative network of research centres; supporting programmes of cooperation and assistance; promoting technology assessment to support the management of environmentally sound technologies; and developing collaborative arrangements and partnerships between enterprises of developed and developing countries to develop such technologies.

Draft code of conduct

In response to a 1991 General Assembly request,(4) the UNCTAD Secretary-General, in November 1992,(5) submitted a report on consultations carried out in 1992 on an international code of conduct on the transfer of technology. The report stated that UNCTAD VIII reviewed the work carried out on a draft code and the results of consultations held in 1991.(6) It recognized that conditions did not exist to reach full agreement on outstanding issues in the draft code; should Governments indicate that there was the convergence of views necessary to agree on those issues, the Trade and Development Board should continue its work to facilitate agreement on the code.

Subsequent to the adoption of the Cartagena Commitment by UNCTAD VIII, the UNCTAD Secretary-General requested Governments to provide him with their views on the issues outstanding in the draft code, particularly on the acceptability of the exclusive application of competition law principles to the evaluation of restrictive practices, and adherence to freedom of contract and freedom of choice in respect to applicable law and forum for dispute settlement. Since only 10 Governments had replied (Canada, China, Czechoslovakia, Iraq, Netherlands, Niger, Philippines, Saint Lucia, Switzerland, United States), the Secretary-General indicated that he intended to collect a wider sample of views and to prepare a more comprehensive report to the Assembly in 1993.

Organizational matters

Institutional arrangements

As part of the process of restructuring and revitalizing the United Nations in the economic and social fields, the General Assembly, by resolution 46/235 of 13 April 1992, decided to transform the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development and its subsidiary body, the Advisory Committee on Science and Technology for Development, into a functional commission of the Economic and Social Council.

By decision 1992/218 of 30 April, the Council established the Commission on Science and Technology for Development and requested the Secretary-General to submit to its substantive session of 1992 a draft provisional agenda for the Commission. On 31 July, by resolution 1992/62, the Council reaffirmed the Commission's mandate and approved the draft provisional agenda and programme of work for its first session, to be held in 1993.

Restructuring of the UN Secretariat

On 1 March, as part of the restructuring of the United Nations Secretariat, the Centre for Science and Technology for Development became part of the Science, Technology, Energy, Environment and Natural Resources Division of DESD.

DESD activities

In a report on DESD activities in science and technology for development,⁽¹⁾ the Secretary-General noted that the role of science and technology in the development process had received new impetus in 1991-1992 due to changes within the United Nations system designed to revitalize activities in the economic, social and related fields and to a new role attributed by UNCED to technology cooperation between developed and developing countries.

Since the 1991 meeting of the Intergovernmental Committee on Science and Technology for Development,⁽²⁾ considerable work had been undertaken in endogenous capacity-building and resource mobilization and in technology assessment. Additional projects for improving capacities in science and technology were initiated with Cape Verde, Jamaica, Pakistan, Togo, Uganda and Viet Nam, and DESD held a series of policy dialogues and specialized expert group meetings in those countries, based on their specific interests.

As the focal point for technology assessment within the United Nations system, DESD's Advanced Technology Assessment System (ATAS) carried out studies in different technological areas (biotechnology, micro-electronics, information technology, new materials, energy and environmentally sound technology, as well as technology assessment methodology) through ad hoc networks of experts on an international level. ATAS publications in 1992 included the ATAS Bulletin and the ATAS News, a regular supplement to the quarterly newsletter Update. In further pursuance of its technology assessment mandate, the former Centre for Science and Technology for Development, in cooperation with the United Nations Environment Programme, the French Ministry of the Environment and the United States Environmental Protection Agency, organized an expert group meeting on opportunities and risks for the environment of new technologies (Geneva, 13 and 14 January). Applications of technology assessment were also the focus of two conference series—on conversion of the military/industrial complex to peaceful uses and on clean coal technologies. In the conversion series, conferences were held on opportunities for development and environment (Dortmund, Germany, 24-27 February) and on conversion of the aerospace industry (Moscow, 12-16 October). Clean coal technology meetings were held at Madras, India, in January, and Berlin, Germany, in May. Together with the International Society for Photogrammetry and Remote Sensing, DESD cosponsored an interregional seminar on remote sensing and the transfer of technology (Washington, D.C., 2-14 August).

DESD continued to maintain a registry of national science and technology focal points identified by Member States and kept them informed about ongoing activities within the system. It studied a proposal by the United Nations University (UNU) that a United Nations register of research be established by UNU and DESD.

Coordination in the UN system

The ACC Task Force on Science and Technology for Development held its thirteenth session in 1992 (New York, 30 November-2 December).⁽³⁾

The Task Force discussed and made suggestions regarding its own functions and objectives, interaction between it and the new Commission on Science and Technology for Development, possible options for a coalition of resources for the promotion of science and technology in developing countries, capacity-building in science and technology, and new and emerging areas of science and technology for development.

Chapter VIII

Environment

With the global environment having grown worse than it was two decades previously, despite all efforts deployed, the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) in 1992 adopted the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, seeking international agreements to protect the integrity of the global environmental and developmental systems. The Conference also adopted Agenda 21, reflecting a global consensus on development and environment cooperation, and a statement of principles on the management, conservation and sustainable development of all types of forests. Two conventions—the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change and the Convention on Biological Diversity—were opened for signature at the Conference.

The General Assembly adopted resolutions endorsing the results of UNCED (resolution 47/190), establishing institutional arrangements to follow it up (47/191) and inviting the United Nations Development Programme to help developing countries to improve their capacity to implement Agenda 21 (47/194). The Assembly also welcomed the adoption of the Convention on Climate Change (47/195).

The Assembly established an intergovernmental negotiating committee to elaborate by 1994 a convention to combat desertification (47/188). It decided to convene an intergovernmental conference on straddling and highly migratory fish stocks in 1993 (47/192) and a global conference on the sustainable development of small island developing States in 1994 (47/189).

The Assembly appealed for international cooperation to mitigate the environmental consequences resulting from the situation between Iraq and Kuwait (47/151).

UN Conference on Environment and Development

The United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, or “Earth Summit”, took place at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, from 3 to 14 June 1992.⁽¹⁾ On 14 June, it adopted the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development; Agenda 21, a comprehensive plan of action for the sustainable development of the Earth into the twenty-first century; and a statement of principles for a global consensus on the management, conservation and sustainable development of forests. The United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change and the Convention on Biological Diversity were opened for signature at UNCED and signed by 154 States and 156 States, respectively; each Convention was also signed by one regional economic integration organization.

UNCED coincided with World Environment Day (5 June),⁽²⁾ which was also the twentieth anniversary of the opening of the 1972 United Nations Conference on the Human Environment.⁽³⁾

Representatives of 176 States and Territories (see APPENDIX III), the European Economic Community (EEC), Palestine and seven associate members of the regional commissions (American Samoa, Aruba, Hong Kong, Netherlands Antilles, Niue, Puerto Rico, United States Virgin Islands) attended the Conference. Two national liberation movements—the African National Congress and the Pan Africanist Congress of Azania—were represented, along with the secretariats of four of the regional commissions, several United Nations offices, organizations and specialized agencies, 35 intergovernmental organizations and some 1,500 non-governmental organizations (NGOs).⁽⁴⁾

The Conference elected as its President Fernando Collor, President of Brazil. Also elected were 39 Vice-Presidents, one ex-officio Vice-President from the host country, a Rapporteur-General and a Main Committee Chairman.

Action taken by the Conference

Rio Declaration on Environment and Development

The Rio Declaration aimed to establish a new and equitable global partnership on environment and development through cooperation among States, key sectors of society and individuals. It was hoped that the Declaration would serve as a basis for future negotiation of an Earth Charter that could be approved on the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations in 1995. The Declaration consisted of the following 27 principles:

1. Human beings are at the centre of concerns for sustainable development. They are entitled to a healthy and productive life in harmony with nature.
2. States have, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the principles of international law, the sovereign right to exploit their own resources pursuant to their own environmental and developmental policies, and the responsibility to ensure that activities within their jurisdiction or control do not cause damage to the environment of other States or of areas beyond the limits of national jurisdiction.

3. The right to development must be fulfilled so as to equitably meet developmental and environmental needs of present and future generations.

4. In order to achieve sustainable development, environmental protection shall constitute an integral part of the development process and cannot be considered in isolation from it.

5. All States and all people shall cooperate in the essential task of eradicating poverty as an indispensable requirement for sustainable development, in order to decrease the disparities in standards of living and better meet the needs of the majority of the people of the world.

6. The special situation and needs of developing countries, particularly the least developed and those most environmentally vulnerable, shall be given special priority. International actions in the field of environment and development should also address the interests and needs of all countries.

7. States shall cooperate in a spirit of global partnership to conserve, protect and restore the health and integrity of the Earth's ecosystem. In view of the different contributions to global environmental degradation, States have common but differentiated responsibilities. The developed countries acknowledge the responsibility that they bear in the international pursuit of sustainable development in view of the pressures their societies place on the global environment and of the technologies and financial resources they command.

8. To achieve sustainable development and a higher quality of life for all people, States should reduce and eliminate unsustainable patterns of production and consumption and promote appropriate demographic policies.

9. States should cooperate to strengthen endogenous capacity-building for sustainable development by improving scientific understanding through exchanges of scientific and technological knowledge, and by enhancing the development, adaptation, diffusion and transfer of technologies, including new and innovative technologies.

10. Environmental issues are best handled with the participation of all concerned citizens, at the relevant level. At the national level, each individual shall have appropriate access to information concerning the environment that is held by public authorities, including information on hazardous materials and activities in their communities, and the opportunity to participate in decision-making processes. States shall facilitate and encourage public awareness and participation by making information widely available. Effective access to judicial and administrative proceedings, including redress and remedy, shall be provided.

11. States shall enact effective environmental legislation. Environmental standards, management objectives and priorities should reflect the environmental and developmental context to which they apply. Standards applied by some countries may be inappropriate and of unwarranted economic and social cost to other countries, in particular developing countries.

12. States should cooperate to promote a supportive and open international economic system that would lead to economic growth and sustainable development in all countries, to better address the problems of environmental degradation. Trade policy measures for environmental purposes should not constitute a means of arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination or a disguised restriction on international trade. Unilateral actions to deal with environmental challenges outside the jurisdiction of the importing country should be avoided. Environmental measures addressing transboundary or global environmental problems should, as far as possible, be based on an international consensus.

13. States shall develop national law regarding liability and compensation for the victims of pollution and other environmental damage. States shall also cooperate in an expeditious and more determined manner to develop further international law regarding liability and compensation for adverse effects of environmental damage caused by activities within their jurisdiction or control to areas beyond their jurisdiction.

14. States should effectively cooperate to discourage or prevent the relocation and transfer to other States of any activities and substances that cause severe environmental degradation or are found to be harmful to human health.

15. In order to protect the environment, the precautionary approach shall be widely applied by States according to their capabilities. Where there are threats of serious or irreversible damage, lack of full scientific certainty shall not be used as a reason for postponing cost-effective measures to prevent environmental degradation.

16. National authorities should endeavour to promote the internalization of environmental costs and the use of economic instruments, taking into account the approach that the polluter should, in principle, bear the cost of pollution, with due regard to the public interest and without distorting international trade and investment.

17. Environmental impact assessment, as a national instrument, shall be undertaken for proposed activities that are likely to have a significant adverse impact on the environment and are subject to a decision of a competent national authority.

18. States shall immediately notify other States of any natural disasters or other emergencies that are likely to produce sudden harmful effects on the environment of those States. Every effort shall be made by the international community to help States so afflicted.

19. States shall provide prior and timely notification and relevant information to potentially affected States on activities that may have a significant adverse transboundary environmental effect and shall consult with those States at an early stage and in good faith.

20. Women have a vital role in environmental management and development. Their full participation is therefore essential to achieve sustainable development.

21. The creativity, ideals and courage of the youth of the world should be mobilized to forge a global partnership in order to achieve sustainable development and ensure a better future for all.

22. Indigenous people and their communities and other local communities have a vital role in environmental management and development because of their knowledge and traditional practices. States should recognize and duly support their identity, culture and interests and enable their effective participation in the achievement of sustainable development.

23. The environment and natural resources of people under oppression, domination and occupation shall be protected.

24. Warfare is inherently destructive of sustainable development. States shall therefore respect international law providing protection for the environment in times of armed conflict and cooperate in its further development, as necessary.

25. Peace, development and environmental protection are interdependent and indivisible.

26. States shall resolve all their environmental disputes peacefully and by appropriate means in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.

27. States and people shall cooperate in good faith and in a spirit of partnership in the fulfilment of the principles embodied in this declaration and in the further development of international law in the field of sustainable development.

Agenda 21

The preamble of Agenda 21 stated that humanity was confronted with a worsening of poverty, hunger, ill-health and illiteracy and the continuing deterioration of the ecosystems. Integration of environment and development concerns would lead to the fulfilment of basic needs, improved living standards for all, better protected and managed ecosystems and a safer, more prosperous future. Agenda 21 reflected a global consensus and political commitment at the highest level on development and environment cooperation. International cooperation should support and supplement national strategies and plans. In that context, the United Nations system had a key role to play. The objectives of Agenda 21 would require a substantial flow of financial resources to developing countries. The 115 programme areas defining areas of action under Agenda 21 were described in terms of the basis for action, objectives, activities and means of implementation.

Social and economic dimensions

Section I of Agenda 21 covered its social and economic dimensions. The Conference called for an international climate that would promote sustainable development through trade liberalization, make trade and environment mutually supportive, provide adequate financial resources to developing countries and deal with international debt, and encourage macroeconomic policies conducive to environment and development. It recommended halting and reversing protectionism, improving the competitiveness of the commodity sector, and diversifying to reduce dependence on commodity exports.

The Conference declared that an environmental policy focusing on the conservation and protection of resources would have to take into account those who depended on the resources for their livelihoods. A development policy focusing on increasing the production of goods without addressing the sustainability of the resources on which production was based would run into declining productivity. The United Nations system should make poverty alleviation a major priority and assist Governments in formulating action programmes on poverty alleviation and sustainable development.

Changing consumption patterns in regard to natural resources would require a multipronged strategy focusing on demand, meeting the basic needs of the poor, and reducing wastage and the use of finite resources in the production process. Governments should assist individuals and households in making environmentally informed choices.

The Conference agreed that the growth in world population and production combined with unsustainable consumption practices was placing increasingly severe stress on the life-supporting capacities of the planet. Demographic trends should be incorporated in the global analysis of environment and development issues, with full recognition of women's rights.

The Conference said that Agenda 21 should address the primary health needs of the world's population. Countries were urged to develop priority action plans based on the cooperative efforts of various levels of government, NGOs and local communities. Programme areas relating to health dealt with meeting rural health-care needs, controlling communicable diseases, protecting vulnerable groups, meeting the urban health challenge and reducing health risks from environmental pollution and hazards.

On the subject of promoting sustainable human settlements, the Conference called for providing shelter for all, improved management of settlements, sustainable land-use planning and management, the integrated provision of environmental infrastructure (water, sanitation, drainage and solid-waste management), sustainable energy and transport systems, planning and management of settlements in disaster-prone areas, sustainable construction industry activities and human resource development and capacity-building for human settlement development.

Conservation and management of resources for development

Section II of Agenda 21 covered the conservation and management of resources for development. It included four programme areas: improving the scientific basis for decision-making; promoting sustainable development; preventing stratospheric ozone depletion; and transboundary atmospheric pollution.

The Conference called for an integrated approach to the planning and management of soils, minerals, water and biota. Noting major weaknesses in the policies, methods and mechanisms adopted to support and develop the ecological, economic, social and cultural roles of trees, forests and forest lands, it recommended the following: enhancing the protection, management and conservation of all forests, as well as the greening of degraded areas, through rehabilitation, afforestation, reforestation and other means; promoting efficient utilization and assessment to recover the full valuation of the goods and services provided by forests, forest lands and woodlands; and establishing or strengthening capacities for the planning, assessment and systematic observations of forests.

Three chapters dealt with managing fragile ecosystems: combating desertification and drought, mountain development, and sustaining small islands and coastal areas. Agenda 21 called for strengthening the desertification knowledge base, developing information and monitoring systems for regions prone to desertification and drought, combating land degradation and promoting alternative livelihood systems in areas prone to desertification. In addition, the Conference proposed integrating comprehensive anti-desertification programmes into national development and environmental plans, developing comprehensive drought preparedness and drought-relief schemes for drought-prone areas, designing programmes to cope with environmental refugees and promoting education on desertification control and management of the effects of drought. The Conference called for the General Assembly to establish an intergovernmental negotiating committee to elaborate an international convention to combat desertification in countries experiencing serious drought and/or desertification.

Mountains were susceptible to accelerated erosion, landslides and rapid loss of habitat and genetic diversity. Programme areas covered strengthening knowledge about the ecology and sustainable development of mountain ecosystems and promoting integrated watershed development and alternative livelihood opportunities.

The protection and development of the marine environment, including the oceans, seas and adjacent coastal areas, was to be carried out in accordance with the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea.⁽⁵⁾ Agenda 21 called for the integrated management and sustainable development of coastal areas, including exclusive economic zones; marine environmental protection; the sustainable use and conservation of marine living resources; addressing critical uncertainties for the management of the marine environment and climate change; strengthening international cooperation and coordination; and the sustainable development of small islands. It identified small island developing States as a special case for both environment and development, given their vulnerability to global warming and sealevel rise, as well as their degree of biodiversity. The Conference called for a global conference on the sustainable development of island States and for an inter-governmental conference on straddling and highly migratory fish stocks (see below).

To protect the quality and supply of freshwater resources, the Conference proposed the following programme areas: integrated water resources development and management; water resources assessment; protection of water resources, water quality and aquatic ecosystems; drinking-water supply and sanitation; water and sustainable urban development; water for sustainable food production and rural development; and impacts of climate change on water resources.

In relation to promoting sustainable agriculture and rural development, the Conference stated that by the year 2025, 83 per cent of the expected global population of 8.5 billion would be living in developing countries. Major adjustments were needed in agricultural, environmental and macroeconomic policy to create sustainable agriculture and rural development. Agenda 21 included the following programme areas, among others: agricultural policy review, planning and integrated programming; human resource development for sustainable agriculture; improving of farm production and farming systems through diversification of farm and non-farm employment and infrastructure development; land-resource planning information and education for agriculture; land conservation and rehabilitation; and water for food production and rural development.

Regarding the conservation of biological diversity, the Conference observed that the planet's essential goods and services depended on the variety and variability of genes, species, populations and ecosystems. In its view, the current decline in biodiversity was largely the result of human activity and represented a serious threat to human development. Agenda 21 sought to improve the conservation of biological diversity and the sustainable use of biological resources, and to support the Convention on Biological Diversity (see below).

The Conference considered the environmentally sound management of toxic chemicals. It proposed six programme areas: expanding international assessment of chemical risks; harmonization of classification and labelling of chemicals; information exchange on toxic chemicals and chemical risks; establishment of risk-reduction programmes; strengthening of national capacities for management of chemicals; and prevention of illegal international traffic in toxic and dangerous products.

With respect to hazardous wastes, countries were urged to ratify the 1989 Basel Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes and Their Disposal and the 1991 Bamako Convention on the Ban of the Import of All Forms of Hazardous Wastes into Africa and the Control of Transboundary Movements of Such Wastes Generated in Africa.

For safe and environmentally sound management of radioactive wastes, the Conference said that States, in cooperation with international organizations, should limit the generation of such wastes; support efforts within the International Atomic Energy Agency to develop radioactive-waste safety standards or guidelines and codes of practice; and promote safe storage, transportation and disposal of radioactive wastes, and proper planning of their management, including emergency procedures.

Strengthening the role of major groups

The third section of Agenda 21 dealt with strengthening the role of various groups in implementing its objectives and policies. The commitment and involvement of all social groups was seen as critical to the success of the programmes. Among the groups addressed were women, children and youth, indigenous people, NGOs, local authorities, workers and trade unions, business and industry, the scientific and technological community, and farmers.

Means of implementation

The fourth and final section of Agenda 21 discussed means of financing its programmes. The Conference secretariat estimated that the average cost of implementing Agenda 21 in developing countries between 1993 and 2000 would exceed $600 billion per year, including $125 billion on grant or concessional terms from the international community.

The Conference stated that for developing countries, official development assistance (ODA) was a main source of external funding; substantial new funding would be required. Developed countries reaffirmed their commitment to reach the target of 0.7 per cent of gross national product for ODA. All available funding sources would be used, including multilateral development banks, the Global Environment Facility (see below), specialized agencies and other United Nations bodies, multilateral institutions, bilateral assistance programmes, debt relief and private funding.

The intergovernmental follow-up to the Conference was to take place within the framework of the United Nations system, with the General Assembly being the principal policy-making and appraisal organ. The Assembly would organize a regular review of the implementation of Agenda 21, and could consider holding a special session for that purpose not later than 1997. The Economic and Social Council would oversee the system-wide coordination and integration of environmental and developmental aspects of United Nations policies and programmes. The Conference recommended the creation of a high-level Commission on Sustainable Development to ensure effective follow-up (see below). The Commission, which would report to the Council, would enhance international cooperation, examine progress in implementing Agenda 21 at the national, regional and international levels, provide for the active involvement of organs, programmes and organizations of the United Nations system, international financial institutions and other inter-governmental organizations, and encourage the participation of NGOs.

Statement of Principles on forests

The Non-legally Binding Authoritative Statement of Principles for a Global Consensus on the Management, Conservation and Sustainable Development of All Types of Forests declared that States had the sovereign right to utilize, manage and develop their forests, including the right to convert them to other uses, in accordance with their own development needs and level of socioeconomic development. Governments were urged to manage their forest resources and lands so as to meet the social, economic, ecological, cultural and spiritual needs of current and future generations for wood, water, food, fodder, medicine, fuel, shelter, employment, recreation, wildlife habitats, landscape diversity, carbon reservoirs and other forest products.

The Statement called on Governments to recognize that forests played a vital role in protecting fragile ecosystems and water resources, were sources of genetic material for biotechnology products and met energy requirements. In addition, all countries, notably developed countries, were urged to take action towards reforestation, afforestation and forest conservation.

Representative or unique examples of forests that were ecologically viable should be protected, while access to biological resources, including genetic material, should be provided with due regard for the sovereign rights of the countries where the forests were located.

General Assembly resolution 47/190

22 December 1992 Meeting 93 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/47/719) without vote, 16 December (meeting 51); draft by Malaysia (A/C.2/47/L.51); agenda item 79.

The Assembly, by resolution 47/189, decided to convene a global conference on the sustainable development of small island developing States, as called for in Agenda 21. The conference was to be held in Barbados in 1994.

Preparations for UNCED

The UNCED Preparatory Committee held its fourth session in 1992 (New York, 2 March-3 April)(6) to finalize the proposals to be submitted to UNCED. The Committee adopted decisions allowing the participation of NGOs and observers at UNCED; appealing for contributions to facilitate the participation of developing countries; and adopting draft chapters of Agenda 21, the Statement of Principles on forests and the Rio Declaration. It also made recommendations to the General Assembly regarding the dates of the Conference, observer status for associate members of regional commissions, the status of EEC at UNCED and draft provisional rules of procedure of the Conference.

On 7 April,(7) the Secretary-General transmitted the four decisions containing those recommendations to the Assembly for action.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 13 April 1992, the Assembly adopted the four decisions recommended by the UNCED Preparatory Committee. Noting that the Moslem Feast of Ed-Al-Adha would start on 10 or 11 June, the Assembly, by decision 46/468, changed the dates of UNCED from 1 to 12 June 1992 to 3 to 14 June, with pre-session consultations to take place on 1 and 2 June. By decision 46/469, the Assembly requested the Secretary-General to invite associate members of regional commissions to participate in the Conference as observers and amended the draft provisional rules accordingly. By decision 46/470, the Assembly amended the rules to allow EEC to participate fully in the Conference and, by decision 46/471, revised the rule relating to the election of Conference officers.

Other action. Also in preparation for UNCED, the Department of Public Information implemented a system-wide information programme, described in a January report of the Secretary-General⁽⁸⁾ submitted to the Committee on Information in response to a 1991 request of the Assembly.⁽⁹⁾

In other action, the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) held its third special session (Nairobi, Kenya, 3-5 February)⁽¹⁰⁾ to consider reports to be submitted to UNCED concerning the state of the environment,⁽¹¹⁾ desertification⁽¹²⁾ and follow-up to previous Assembly resolutions on sustainable development.⁽¹³⁾

The Economic and Social Council, by decision 1992/296 of 31 July, and the Assembly, by decision 47/444 of 22 December, took note of the report of the Governing Council on its third special session.

The United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD), in the report on its eighth session (see PART THREE, Chapter IV), stressed the importance of UNCED and affirmed its readiness to participate in the follow-up process.

Follow-up to the Conference

Institutional arrangements

In October, the Secretary-General submitted a report to the General Assembly on institutional arrangements to follow up UNCED,⁽¹⁴⁾ which had recommended an institutional structure aimed at ensuring the implementation of Agenda 21. The Secretary-General discussed proposals related to the organization of a high-level Commission on Sustainable Development, inter-agency coordination arrangements, the role of a high-level advisory board on sustainable development, and the secretariat support structure. In an addendum, the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) offered its views on those institutional arrangements.

In December,⁽¹⁵⁾ the Secretary-General announced the future establishment in New York of a Department for Policy Coordination and Sustainable Development.

Capacity-building

In an April 1992 report to the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP),(16) the UNDP Administrator outlined a programme of support to developing countries as part of the planned follow-up to UNCED. UNDP, through its field offices, would organize United Nations capacity-building efforts, mobilize donor resources on behalf of Governments for capacity-building, assist countries in identifying and mobilizing domestic financial resources, raise awareness of the role of women and promote the participation of all parts of society, particularly NGOs and the private sector. UNDP support for Agenda 21 would focus on helping developing countries to prepare national sustainable development strategies and on building capacities for sustainable development.

On 26 May,(17) taking into account the report of the Joint Inspection Unit assessing the environmental focus of projects financed by UNDP and other agencies,(18) the Governing Council requested the Administrator to assist developing countries in strengthening their capacity to formulate and implement policies and programmes for sustainable development.

During the year, UNDP launched an initiative known as Capacity 21, which, according to the Administrator,(19) would complement existing programmes and be used to facilitate the integration of environmental considerations in all programmes. A goal of $100 million had been set for the pilot phase of the programme.(20)

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

Coordination within the UN system

In a November report to the UNEP Governing Council,(21) ACC reported that the Secretary-General had established an Inter-Agency Task Force on Environment and Development, composed of the Executive Heads of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the World Health Organization, the World Meteorological Organization (WMO), the World Bank, UNDP and UNEP, with UNCED invited to attend as an ex-officio member. The Task Force submitted to ACC recommendations relating to the allocation and sharing of responsibilities of the United Nations system stemming from Agenda 21.

ACC, in October, established an Inter-Agency Committee for Sustainable Development, comprising the member organizations of the Task Force and two additional organizations to be designated by the Secretary-General.

General aspects

Sustainable development

In April, (1) the Secretary-General, in response to a 1989 General Assembly resolution, (2) submitted a report on the follow-up to two 1987 resolutions dealing with sustainable development. One of the resolutions (3) had established a framework for the achievement of environmentally sound development, and the other (4) had emphasized the need for sustainable development.

In preparing the report, the Executive Director of UNEP, on behalf of the Secretary-General, had requested information from Governments and United Nations organizations on implementation of the two resolutions. In all, 38 countries and 28 United Nations bodies replied. The report concluded that while progress had been made, it was limited and uneven in relation to what was needed, and would remain so unless the structural aspects of the state of the world's environment and development received the attention of political leaders. Necessary structural changes included adjustments in the composition and distribution of production and consumption, population control, adjustments in international economic relations, alleviation of poverty and improvement of the quality and means of governance to minimize waste and injustice and maximize the creative involvement of people.

The UNEP Governing Council, on 5 February, (5) had taken note of an earlier version of the report (6) and called on Governments to devote more attention to achieving sustainable development and to allocate the necessary resources. It requested the Executive Director to report to the Council on the implementation of the decision in 1993.

The Economic and Social Council, on 31 July, by decision 1992/296, and the General Assembly, on 22 December, by decision 47/444, took note of the Secretary-General's report.

In other action, the Council, by decision 1992/252, approved the preparation of a progress report on human rights and the environment by a Special Rapporteur (see PART THREE, Chapter X).

UNCTAD action. In August, (7) the UNCTAD secretariat submitted to the Trade and Development Board a report on sustainable development, including UNCTAD's contribution to the implementation of UNCED's conclusions and recommendations. The report covered cross-sectoral issues, including policy principles, tradeable permits and poverty, and sectoral links, including commodities, industry and other sectors, energy policy and tradeable emission entitlements and the promotion of environmentally sound technologies.

International conventions

Climate change convention

The United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (8) was opened for signature on 4 June. During the year it was signed by 158 States and EEC, and ratified by nine States. (9) The Convention was to remain open for signing in New York from 20 June 1992 to 19 June 1993. It would enter into force on the ninetieth day after the date of deposit of the fiftieth instrument of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession.

The objective of the Convention was to stabilize atmospheric concentrations of "greenhouse gases", which absorbed and re-emitted infrared radiation, at a level that would prevent dangerous anthropogenic interference with the climate system. Developed countries and countries undergoing transition to a market economy were to set a goal of limiting the emission of greenhouse gases, including carbon dioxide, to 1990 levels. The developed countries were to provide financial and technological resources to the developing countries to assist them in implementing the Convention. The Convention defined a mechanism for providing financial resources on a grant or concessional basis through the Global Environment Facility (see below).

All parties to the Convention were to report periodically on national inventories of anthropogenic emissions and to cooperate in the development of processes that controlled them.

The Convention was drafted by an Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee, which was open to all United Nations Members or members of the specialized agencies, established pursuant to a 1990 General Assembly mandate. (10) One hundred and fifty-seven countries, including 118 developing countries, participated in the negotiations.

The Committee held its fifth session in two parts (New York, 18-28 February and 30 April-9 May),⁽¹¹⁾ in accordance with a 1991 Assembly resolution,⁽¹²⁾ to finalize the drafting of the Convention, which it adopted on 9 May.

In June, the Chairman of the Committee, pursuant to a 1990 Assembly request⁽¹⁰⁾ reiterated in 1991,⁽¹²⁾ submitted a report to UNCED on the results of the Committee's negotiations, for early entry into force of the Convention.⁽¹³⁾

In October, the Secretary-General, pursuant to a 1991 Assembly resolution,⁽¹²⁾ submitted a report on implementation of the resolution and possible requirements for future work.⁽¹⁴⁾ He said the Convention could be considered a first step, providing a framework for further elaboration as new scientific evidence became available.

The Committee held its sixth session at Geneva (7-10 December)⁽¹⁵⁾ to prepare for the first session of the Conference of the Parties and to draw up an interim work plan.

Voluntary funds. A review⁽¹⁶⁾ of the two funds established pursuant to a 1990 Assembly resolution⁽¹⁰⁾—the special voluntary fund to support the participation of developing countries and the trust fund for the negotiating process⁽¹⁷⁾—stated that, as at 18 November, contributions to assist developing countries totalled about $3 million. Contributions received or pledged towards support of the negotiating process stood at about $420,000.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/195 without vote.

Protection of global climate for present and future generations of mankind

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 43/53 of 6 December 1988 and 44/207 of 22 December 1989, in which it recognized climate change as a common concern of mankind,

Recalling also its resolutions 45/212 of 21 December 1990, by which it established an Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee to prepare an effective framework convention on climate change, and any related legal instruments as might be agreed upon, for signature during the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, and 46/169 of 19 December 1991, by which it provided for the continuation of work on climate change until the end of 1992,

Taking note with appreciation of the reports of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee for a Framework Convention on Climate Change on its work up to May 1992 and the report prepared on behalf of the Committee, by its Chairman, for submission to the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development,

Taking note of resolution 15(EC-XLIV), adopted by the Executive Council of the World Meteorological Organization at its forty-fourth session,

Noting that, in accordance with paragraph 4 of its resolution 46/169 and pursuant to resolution INC/1992/1 adopted by the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee on 9 May 1992, arrangements were made for the sixth session of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee,

Noting also that the sixth session of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee was held at Geneva from 7 to 10 December 1992,

7. Invites the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee, in this regard, to implement expeditiously the plan of preparatory work drawn up at its sixth session, and requests the Secretary-General to make arrangements within the overall calendar of conferences for the Committee to hold sessions, in accordance with the needs of that plan;

8. Requests the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee to promote a coherent and coordinated programme of activities by competent bodies aimed at supporting the entry into force and effective implementation of the Convention, including strengthening the capacities of developing and all other countries to prepare for their participation in the Convention;

9. Calls upon the organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system involved in work relating to climate change, including the interim secretariat of the Convention, to initiate and strengthen such activities, where possible in collaboration with each other, and invites them to make information on these activities and on any coordination arrangements regularly available to the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee, through its secretariat;

10. Invites the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee to convey information on its work to the General Assembly, as well as to the Economic and Social Council and the Commission on Sustainable Development, as appropriate, in particular in the context of chapter 9 of Agenda 21;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to strengthen the secretariat established by the General Assembly in its resolution 45/212 so that it may function as the interim secretariat of the Convention until the completion of the first session of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention and, in that capacity, provide adequate support to the evolving work of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee, and also requests him to make provisions for this purpose within the current and forthcoming programme budgets;

12. Invites the United Nations Environment Programme, the World Meteorological Organization and other United Nations bodies with relevant expertise, to continue to cooperate closely with, and to contribute staff to assist, the head of the interim secretariat;

13. Requests bilateral sources to continue to assist the interim secretariat as hitherto;

14. Requests the head of the interim secretariat to maximize opportunities for collaborative work with other secretariat entities, including the secretariat of the Commission on Sustainable Development;

15. Requests the Secretary-General to maintain the special voluntary fund established under paragraph 10 of General Assembly resolution 45/212 to support the participation of developing countries, in particular the least developed among them and small island developing countries, as well as developing countries stricken by drought and desertification, in the work of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee and in the first session of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention, bearing in mind, inter alia, resolution INC/1992/1 of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee;

16. Also requests the Secretary-General to maintain the trust fund established under paragraph 20 of General Assembly resolution 45/212 to contribute to the costs of the interim secretariat of the Convention;

17. Takes note with appreciation of the contributions made to these extrabudgetary funds and invites further adequate and timely contributions to both funds;

18. Decides that, subject to the relevant provisions of General Assembly resolutions 40/243 of 18 December 1985, 41/213 of 19 December 1986 and 42/211 of 21 December 1987, the costs of the work of the Committee and the interim secretariat should be funded within the current and forthcoming programme budgets, without adversely affecting the programmed activities of the United Nations, and through voluntary contributions to the trust fund, as appropriate;

General Assembly resolution 47/195

22 December 1992 Meeting 93 Adopted without vote

Draft by Uruguay (A/47/L.49), orally amended; agenda item 80. Financial implications. 5th Committee, A/47/815; S-G, A/C.5/47/83. Meeting numbers. GA 47th session: 5th Committee 49; plenary 93.

On the same date, the Assembly, by decision 47/446, took note of a report of the Second Committee,(18) which had considered two draft resolutions on protection of the global climate. The Committee decided to take no action on one draft,(19) but the Chairman announced that he would submit it, with amendments, directly to the Assembly in plenary meeting. The other draft text(20) was subsequently withdrawn by its sponsor.

Convention on Biological Diversity

The Convention on Biological Diversity was opened for signature at the Earth Summit on 5 June and was to remain open in New York until 4 June 1993. During the year it was signed by 160 States and EEC and ratified by six States.(9) The Convention would enter into force on the ninetieth day after the deposit of the thirtieth instrument of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession.

The Convention's objectives were the conservation of biological diversity, the sustainable use of its components and the fair and equitable sharing of the benefits arising from the use of genetic resources. Its 42 articles covered, among other things, the use of terms; jurisdictional scope; cooperation; identification and monitoring; in-situ and ex-situ conservation; sustainable use of components of biological diversity; incentive measures; research and training; public education; impact assessment and minimizing adverse impacts; access to genetic resources; access to and transfer of technology; exchange of information; technical and scientific cooperation; handling of biotechnology and distribution of its benefits; financial resources; settlement of disputes; and adoption of protocols.

The Convention was drafted by the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee for a Convention on Biological Diversity, which held two sessions in 1992 (Nairobi, 6-15 February(21) and 11-22 May(22)). It was adopted by the Conference for the Adoption of the Agreed Text of the Convention on Biological Diversity (Nairobi, 22 May). The Conference also adopted resolutions inviting the Global Environment Facility (see below) to serve as the interim financial mechanism for the Convention, calling for international cooperation in the conservation of biological diversity, and describing the interrelationship between the Convention and the promotion of sustainable agriculture.

Montreal Protocol

The parties to the 1987 Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer,(23) which entered into force on 1 January 1989, held their fourth meeting from 23 to 25 November at Copenhagen, Denmark.(24) They agreed to accelerate the Protocol's schedule for phasing out several ozone-depleting substances, including chlorofluorocarbons, carbon tetrachloride, halons and methyl chloroform. They also amended the Protocol to include hydrochlorofluorocarbons, hydrobromofluorocarbons and methyl bromide among the substances to be regulated. The amendment would enter into force on 1 January 1994, provided that 20 States parties to the Protocol had approved it. In addition, a multilateral fund was created to assist developing countries in eliminating the controlled substances. At the end of the year, 97 States and EEC were parties to the Protocol.(9)

The 1990 London Amendment to the Montreal Protocol(25) entered into force on 10 August 1992 with the ratification, acceptance, approval or accession of 27 States during the year. Forty-one States and EEC had become parties to the Amendment by the end of the year.(9)

Global Environment Facility

The Global Environment Facility (GEF), a joint effort of the World Bank, UNDP and UNEP, was established in 1991(26) to help developing countries respond to environmental problems in four programme areas: climate change, ozone depletion, pollution of international waters and biodiversity. UNCED, in Agenda 21, recommended that GEF be restructured to facilitate its financing of environmental activities.

GEF participants held two meetings during the year (Washington, D.C., 29 and 30 April; Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire, 3-5 December) to begin the process of evaluation and restructuring to meet those requirements.(27)

In April, participating Governments decided that land degradation issues, primarily desertification and deforestation, as they related to the four established programme areas, would be eligible for financing by GEF.(28) It was also agreed that GEF would operate as the funding mechanism for the climate change and biodiversity conventions signed at UNCED.

At the December meeting, participants reiterated the April decision, but did not reach consensus on including land degradation in GEF as a priority area.

Environmental activities

State of the environment

A report entitled "The state of the environment (1972-1992): saving our planet—challenges and hopes"(1) was prepared for presentation to UNCED by the UNEP Executive Director, pursuant to a 1989 request of the Governing Council.(2) It comprised five parts: the state of the environment; development activities and environment; human conditions and well-being; perceptions, attitudes and responses; and challenges and priorities for action.

The report said that the most significant concerns were the lack of many of the prerequisites for informed decision-making and good environmental management, in particular: the database was still of variable quality, with a shortage of data from developing countries; despite advances in the technical ability to monitor the world environment, those advances had not been generally applied, mainly because of a lack of equipment and trained personnel in many countries; there had been no agreement on the socio-economic indicators of a healthy relationship between people and their environment or on standards for a decent environment; and comprehensive assessments of the environmental situation and of the Earth's carrying capacity were, in consequence, difficult.

In his opening statement to the UNEP Governing Council (Nairobi, 3-5 February),(3) the Executive Director said the report showed that, despite the efforts undertaken, the global environment was worse than it had been 20 years earlier. Not one major environmental issue raised at the 1972 United Nations Conference on the Human Environment(4) had been solved, while new problems of planetary dimensions had emerged. The report, he said, outlined achievable targets that could constitute an agenda for action for the next decade.

On 5 February,(5) the Council took note of the report and requested the Executive Director to bring it to the attention of UNCED.

Protection against harmful products and wastes

The Secretary-General submitted in June 1992 a report(6) on products harmful to health and the environment, containing the third triennial review of the consolidated list of products whose consumption and/or sale had been banned, withdrawn, severely restricted or not approved by Governments. The first such review was submitted in 1986.(7)

In accordance with a 1989 General Assembly resolution,(8) the report reviewed the list and discussed issues and future directions. It concluded that the list should continue to refer to all the relevant work being accomplished within the United Nations system and ensure that for each product entry reference was made to the complementary publications and international conventions. The fourth issue of the list, published at the end of 1991, covered regulatory action taken by 92 Governments on more than 600 products.

The Economic and Social Council, by decision 1992/296 of 31 July, and the Assembly, by decision 47/439 of 22 December, took note of the report.

The Basel Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes and their Disposal, adopted in 1989, entered into force on 5 May 1992. It was ratified or acceded to by 19 States during the year.(9)

Ecosystems

Desertification and drought control

In response to a 1989 request of the General Assembly,(10) the UNEP Executive Director submitted a report(11) to UNCED on the status of desertification and implementation of the 1977 United Nations Plan of Action to Combat Desertification (PACD).(12) The report considered the world status of desertification, PACD, policy guidelines and course of action for combating desertification, and financing. Currently, desertification affected about 3.6 billion hectares—70 per cent of the total drylands, or nearly a quarter of the total land area of the world—and affected about one sixth of the world's population.

The report presented five preventive, corrective and rehabilitation measures, as well as six supporting measures.

On 5 February,(13) the Governing Council took note of the report and endorsed the preventive and corrective activities. It recommended that Governments provide additional financial and technical assistance on the most favourable terms, in particular to the developing countries, to deal with desertification, and invited countries participating in GEF to consider financing anti-desertification programmes. The Council further recommended that Agenda 21 address desertification and the financing of programmes to combat it, and requested the Executive Director to transmit the report to the UNCED Secretary-General for consideration by the Preparatory Committee. The Council also requested the Executive Director to give emphasis to refining the assessment of the status of desertification, promoting the adoption as well as the monitoring and evaluation of the effectiveness of the report's policy guidelines and course of action and assigning benchmarks and indicators of progress. The Executive Director was to report to the Council in 1993 on implementation of the decision.

Studies by the Secretary-General. In June 1992, in response to a 1991 request of the Economic and Social Council,(14) the Secretary-General presented an interim report on combating aridity, soil erosion, salinity, waterlogging, desertification and the effects of drought in South Asia.(15) Although the Council had requested him, in collaboration with the heads of UNEP, UNDP, UNCED and other organizations, to assess the problem and its effects on the peoples of the region, it was determined that a study of such magnitude could not be completed in the time-frame specified. The report was therefore limited to informing the Council of arrangements being made for the preparation of the study, and was submitted on the understanding that the full study would be presented in 1993.

In September, in response to a 1991 General Assembly request,(16) the Secretary-General submitted a report highlighting the requirements for implementing Agenda 21 in the areas of desertification and drought.(17) The Secretary-General hoped that the international community would increase assistance to such activities, and suggested that the Assembly might consider calling for a percentage of the expected increase in ODA funds to be specifically allocated to them.

UNEP activities. In a report(18) to the UNEP Governing Council on the implementation of PACD in 1991 and 1992, the Executive Director stated that UNEP, during that period, assisted Argentina, Bahrain, Mongolia, Oman, Peru, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen in developing national plans of action to combat desertification. In addition, UNEP, through its Desertification Control Programme Activity Centre, continued to provide assistance to Mozambique and Zimbabwe for the formulation and initiation of pilot village projects. In support of the African Ministerial Conference on Environment pilot village programme, which trained African villagers and technicians in ecological farming, UNEP in October organized a training workshop at Nanjing, China, for 20 participants from 17 French-speaking African countries.

The Desertification Control Research and Training Network for Asia and the Pacific (DESCONAP) was given high priority during the period. In February, the third DESCONAP regional consultative meeting and tripartite review meeting was held in Thailand, and, in November, an expert group meeting for the Asia-Pacific and West Asia regions was held at Tehran, Iran, with the aim of developing a unified approach to desertification assessment and mapping. In addition, UNEP participated in the organization of four regional seminars and workshops on desertification control. An international symposium on soil resilience and sustainable land use (Budapest, Hungary, 28 September-2 October) was attended by 164 scientists representing 33 countries and 18 international organizations.

UNEP continued to conduct training programmes on combating desertification. In 1991-1992, 231 participants from Africa, Asia and Latin America were trained in the management of dryland natural resources, sustainable food production, monitoring and assessment of desertification, increased application of new technologies and public information. A project was initiated to accumulate data on successful desertification control projects, with a view to their replication elsewhere.

UNEP continued to disseminate information on programme results and problems related to desertification control worldwide. Issues 20 and 21 of the Desertification Control Bulletin were published in 1992, and the World Atlas of Desertification, containing maps of thematic indicators of desertification, was published and distributed to Governments at UNCED.

During the year, the Governments participating in GEF decided that desertification projects would be eligible for financing by GEF (see above).

UNDP action. On 26 May,(19) the UNDP Governing Council requested the Administrator to report in 1993 on proposals on specific ways to combat desertification and drought, including strengthening the coordinated operations of the United Nations system.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 31 July, the Economic and Social Council, acting on a recommendation of its Economic Committee, adopted resolution 1992/55 without vote.

Combating aridity, soil erosion, salinity, water-logging, desertification and the effects of drought in South Asia

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolution 1991/97 of 26 July 1991,

Taking note of the interim note by the Secretary-General on the implementation of Economic and Social Council resolution 1991/97,

Stressing that south Asia, one of the most populous regions in the world, contains significant areas subject to aridity, soil erosion, salinity, water-logging, desertification and the effects of drought, which affect the lives of millions of people and the entire environment of the region,

Stressing also the importance of the study requested in its resolution 1991/97 in the context of national and international cooperative efforts,

1. Notes with concern that the complete implementation of resolution 1991/97 could not be carried out and its results presented to the Council at its substantive session of 1992;

2. Urges the Secretary-General, in full compliance with resolution 1991/97, to submit the study to the General Assembly at its forty-seventh session.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1992/55

31 July 1992 Meeting 42 Adopted without vote

Approved by Economic Committee (E/1992/109) without vote, 28 July (meeting 16); 4-nation draft (E/1992/C.1/L.10), orally revised following informal consultations; agenda item 12.

Sponsors: Bangladesh, India, Iran, Pakistan.

The Council, by resolution 1992/31, appealed to the international community to contribute generously, on a voluntary basis, to the second phase of the Special Programme for Sub-Saharan African Countries Affected by Drought and Desertification of the International Fund for Agricultural Development.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted without vote resolution 47/188.

Establishment of an intergovernmental negotiating committee for the elaboration of an international convention to combat desertification in those countries experiencing serious drought and/or desertification, particularly in Africa

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 44/172 A of 19 December 1989, 44/228 of 22 December 1989 and other relevant General

Assembly resolutions, as well as decisions adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, in particular the recommendation by which the Conference invited the General Assembly to establish at its forty-seventh session, under its auspices, an intergovernmental negotiating committee for the elaboration of an international convention to combat desertification in those countries experiencing serious drought and/or desertification, particularly in Africa, with a view to finalizing such a convention by June 1994,

1. Welcomes with satisfaction the results and the recommendations of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, particularly chapter 12 of Agenda 21, entitled "Managing fragile ecosystems: combating desertification and drought";

2. Decides to establish, under its auspices, an Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee for the elaboration of an international convention to combat desertification in those countries experiencing serious drought and/or desertification, particularly in Africa, taking into account proposals that may be submitted by States participating in the negotiating process, with a view to finalizing such a convention by June 1994, and welcomes the candidature of Ambassador Bo Kjellen (Sweden) for the chairmanship of the Committee;

3. Also decides that the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee shall be open to all States Members of the United Nations or members of the specialized agencies, with the participation of observers in accordance with the established practice of the General Assembly;

4. Further decides that the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee shall hold, in addition to an organizational session, five substantive sessions, each lasting for two weeks, at Geneva and Nairobi, in New York and, in accordance with paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 40/243 of 18 December 1985, in Paris; the dates of these sessions will be determined by the Committee at its organizational session, subject to review of the timetable at the end of each negotiating session and taking into account the schedule of other related meetings;

Marine ecosystems

Straddling and highly migratory fish stocks

The problems relating to straddling fish stocks (those occurring within the exclusive economic zones of two or more coastal States or both within the exclusive economic zone and in an area beyond and adjacent to it) and highly migratory fish stocks were considered in 1992 by UNCED and the General Assembly.

On 21 May, Mexico transmitted to UNCED the text of the Declaration of Cancun, adopted by the International Conference on Responsible Fishing (Cancun, Mexico, 6-8 May),(20) which called on States to take steps to ensure the supply of fish products and to improve management- systems and scientific knowledge.

UNCED noted in Agenda 21 that during the past decade fisheries on the high seas had expanded considerably. There were problems of unregulated fishing, excessive fleet size, the reflagging of vessels to escape controls, insufficiently selective fishing gear, unreliable databases and lack of sufficient cooperation between States. Agenda 21 said that States should convene an intergovernmental conference to promote implementation of the provisions of the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea(21) on straddling and highly migratory fish stocks.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted without vote resolution 47/192.

United Nations Conference on Straddling Fish Stocks and Highly Migratory Fish Stocks

The General Assembly,

Recalling Agenda 21, adopted at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, in particular chapter 17, programme area C, relating to the sustainable use and conservation of marine living resources of the high seas,

Decides to convene in 1993, under United Nations auspices and in accordance with the mandate agreed upon at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, an intergovernmental conference on straddling fish stocks and highly migratory fish stocks, which should complete its work before the forty-ninth session of the General Assembly;

2. Also decides that the intergovernmental conference, in accordance with the said mandate, shall take into account relevant activities at the subregional, regional and global levels, with a view to promoting effective implementation of the provisions of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea on straddling fish stocks and highly migratory fish stocks, and that, drawing, inter alia, on scientific and technical studies by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, it should:

(a) Identify and assess existing problems related to the conservation and management of such fish stocks;

(b) Consider means of improving fisheries cooperation among States;

(c) Formulate appropriate recommendations;

3. Reaffirms that the work and results of the conference should be fully consistent with the provisions of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, in particular the rights and obligations of coastal States and States fishing on the high seas, and that States should give full effect to the high seas fisheries provisions of the Convention with regard to fisheries populations whose ranges lie both within and beyond exclusive economic zones (straddling fish stocks) and highly migratory fish stocks;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to invite to the conference those listed in paragraph 9 of its resolution 46/168 of 19 December 1991 and in its decisions 46/469 and 46/470 of 13 April 1992, and also to invite regional and subregional fisheries organizations to attend as observers;

Decides to establish a voluntary fund for the purpose of assisting developing countries, especially those most concerned by the subject-matter of the conference, in particular the least developed among them, to participate fully and effectively in the conference, and invites Governments and regional economic integration organizations to contribute to the fund;

10. Also decides that the funds necessary for the preparatory process and the conference itself should, subject to the relevant provisions of General Assembly resolutions 40/243 of 18 December 1985, 41/213 of 19 December 1986 and 42/211 of 21 December 1987, be made available within the programme budget without adversely affecting other ongoing activities and without prejudice to the provision of extrabudgetary resources;

11. Invites relevant specialized agencies, particularly the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, and other appropriate organs, organizations and programmes of the United Nations system, as well as regional and subregional fisheries organizations, to contribute relevant scientific and technical studies and reports and to organize regional and subregional technical meetings in order to contribute to the work of the conference;

12. Invites relevant non-governmental organizations from developed and developing countries to contribute to the conference, within the areas of their competence and expertise, on the basis of procedures for their accreditation used for the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, as recommended in paragraph 38.44 of Agenda 21;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session a report on the work of the conference;

15. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-eighth session, under an item entitled "Implementation of the decisions and recommendations of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development", a sub-item entitled "Sustainable use and conservation of the marine living resources of the high seas: United Nations Conference on Straddling Fish Stocks and Highly Migratory Fish Stocks".

Drift-net fishing

In accordance with a 1991 General Assembly resolution,(22) the Secretary-General, in October 1992,(23) submitted a report on large-scale pelagic drift-net fishing and its impact on the living marine resources of the world's oceans and seas. The report reviewed region by region the activities of intergovernmental organizations and States that had been called on to implement a global moratorium on all large-scale pelagic drift-net fishing.

The Assembly, by decision 47/443 of 22 December, took note of the report and requested a further report in 1993.

Programme and finances of UNEP

On 8 December, on the recommendation of the Secretary-General,(1) the General Assembly appointed Elizabeth Dowdeswell of Canada as UNEP Executive Director for a four-year term beginning on 1 January 1993.

Finances

Environment Fund

As at 31 December 1992,(2) $62.5 million had been paid to the Environment Fund by 44 countries for 1992; another 32 countries were expected to make contributions totalling $1.2 million for the year. The estimated total of $63.7 million represented an increase of 6.8 per cent over the 1991 contributions of $60 million, but was significantly short of the Governing Council's target of $100 million.

1990-1991 accounts

On 23 December, the General Assembly, by resolution 47/211, accepted the financial report and audited financial statements of the Environment Fund for the biennium ended 31 December 1991(3) and the audit opinions and report of the Board of Auditors regarding the Fund.

Trust funds

Forty-five general and technical cooperation trust funds,(4) administered by UNEP, spent $32.7 million during the 1990-1991 biennium.

Environmental aspects of political, economic and other issues

Pursuant to a 1991 request of the General Assembly,(1) the Secretary-General submitted in June 1992 a report(2) on international cooperation to mitigate the environmental consequences on Kuwait and other countries in the region resulting from the situation between Iraq and Kuwait. The United Nations inter-agency plan of action to respond to the environmental crisis was led by UNEP, in cooperation with the Regional Organization for the Protection of the Marine Environment (ROPME) and a number of specialized agencies.

The Secretary-General reported that as a result of the massive oil spill in the Persian Gulf, estimated at between 6 million and 8 million barrels, about 600 kilometres of coastline along the Saudi coast from Khafgi to Abu Ali Island were severely damaged. At least 30,000 marine birds died; 20 per cent of the mangroves on the eastern coast of Saudi Arabia were oiled and about 50 per cent of the coral reefs were affected. The Iranian, Iraqi and Kuwaiti coasts were affected to a lesser extent.

Oil pollution was not limited to oil spills. Fallout from burning oil formed slicks on the surface of the water, releasing polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons and heavy metal-laden soot particles into the water column. Beaches were destroyed through the construction of defence installations. The destruction of sewage-treatment plants in Kuwait resulted in the release of more than 50,000 cubic metres per day of raw sewage into Kuwait Bay, threatening the intertidal ecosystem.

The United Nations effort to assess the state of the marine environment culminated in the launching, in late February 1992, of a 100-day cruise in the ROPME sea area by the Mount Mitchell, a 231-foot research vessel of the United States National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

Air pollution from the burning oil wells in Kuwait represented a potential health hazard. About 6 million barrels of oil were being burnt daily from more than 600 burning wells. However, a WMO/UNEP meeting of experts (Geneva, 25-29 May) analysed the atmospheric effects of the oil fires and found that the smoke had no effect on the weather or climate outside the region.

The destruction of terrestrial ecosystems was extensive, particularly in Iraq, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. In Kuwait, the impact on soil and vegetation was very serious owing to the formation of huge oil pools, extending over vast areas of the desert. Moreover, a layer of oil droplets and soot covered hundreds of square kilometres. In some areas, pulverization of the surface soil by off-road military vehicles had destabilized the soil, increasing its vulnerability to wind erosion. In addition, the presence of land-mines and unexploded ordnance and munitions still presented a serious hazard to human life and the environment.

In Iraq, the military activities devastated large areas of land and adversely affected the agricultural production and livestock of the country, while in Saudi Arabia, the main terrestrial impact was due to the fallout of soot, particularly south of the Saudi/Kuwaiti border.

While inter-agency activities were carried out at the technical level, further attention was given to the political and financial aspects of the environmental crisis. Following a request from Kuwait, Margaret Joan Anstee, Director-General of the United Nations Office at Vienna, was dispatched in October 1991 to Kuwait as the Personal Representative of the Secretary-General to coordinate United Nations efforts.

In March 1992, Joseph Verner Reed was named to succeed Miss Anstee, with the title of Special Representative. He visited Kuwait and other countries of the region to reassess the situation after the burning oil wells were capped. He assured the Kuwaiti Government of the continued support of the United Nations to redress the environmental damage in Kuwait and the region.

An environmental rehabilitation programme was prepared by UNEP in cooperation with ROPME. The programme included project proposals covering marine, atmospheric and terrestrial pollution, technical cooperation aspects and the needs of the countries of the region for oil clean-up, recovery and restoration.

On 30 July, the Economic and Social Council, by decision 1992/285, took note of the Secretary-General's report.⁽²⁾

UNEP action. On 5 February,⁽³⁾ the UNEP Governing Council invited the international community, Governments and intergovernmental organizations to participate technically and financially in rehabilitation programmes aimed at mitigating the environmental deterioration of the region and in strengthening ROPME's capability to coordinate and implement those programmes.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 47/151 by recorded vote.

International cooperation to mitigate the environmental consequences on Kuwait and other countries in the region resulting from the situation between Iraq and Kuwait

The General Assembly,

Aware of the disastrous situation caused in Kuwait and neighbouring areas by the torching and destruction of hundreds of its oil wells and of the other environmental consequences on the atmosphere and on land and marine life,

Bearing in mind all relevant Security Council resolutions, in particular section E of resolution 687(1991) of 3 April 1991,

Having taken note of the report submitted by the Secretary-General to the Security Council describing the nature and extent of the environmental damage suffered by Kuwait,^a

Recalling decision 16/11 A adopted by the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme on 31 May 1991,

Recalling also its resolution 46/216 of 20 December 1991, Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General,

Profoundly concerned at the degradation of the environment as a consequence of the damage, especially the threat posed to the health and well-being of the people of Kuwait and the people of the region, and the adverse impact on the economic activities of Kuwait and other countries of the region, including the effects on livestock, agriculture and fishing, as well as on wildlife,

Welcoming the recent Mount Mitchell Research Cruise, which was organized under the sponsorship of the Intergovernmental Oceanographic Commission of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the Regional Organization for the Protection of the Marine Environment and the United Nations Environment Programme, to make a scientific assessment of environmental conditions in the region, Awaiting the meetings due to be held in 1993, at which the results of the Mount Mitchell Research Cruise will be discussed and evaluated,

Acknowledging the fact that dealing with this catastrophe goes beyond the capabilities of the countries of the region and, in that regard, recognizing the need for strengthened international cooperation to deal with the situation,

Noting with appreciation the appointment by the Secretary-General of an Under-Secretary-General as his Personal Representative to coordinate United Nations efforts in this field,

Also noting with appreciation the efforts already undertaken by the Member States of the region, other States, the organizations of the United Nations system and governmental and non-governmental organizations to study, mitigate and minimize the consequences of this environmental catastrophe,

Bearing in mind the effective work of the Regional Organization for the Protection of the Marine Environment and the inter-agency task force established under the leadership of the United Nations Environment Programme especially to consider the environmental situation in the region, as well as the plan of action,

Expressing its special appreciation to the Governments that have extended financial support to the two trust funds established for the purpose by the Secretary-General of the International Maritime Organization and the Executive Director of the United Nations Environment Programme, and to the Governments and organizations that supported the recent international research cruise organized under the auspices of the Intergovernmental Oceanographic Commission, the Regional Organization for the Protection of the Marine Environment and the United Nations Environment Programme,

1. Appeals to all States Members of the United Nations, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, scientific bodies and individuals to provide assistance for programmes aimed at the study and mitigation of the environmental degradation of the region and for strengthening the Regional Organization for the Protection of the Marine Environment and its role in coordinating the implementation of these programmes;

2. Calls upon the organizations and programmes of the United Nations system, in particular the International Maritime Organization and the United Nations Environment Programme, to pursue their efforts to assess the short-term as well as the long-term impact of the environmental degradation of the region and to consider measures that may be needed to counteract these effects;

3. Requests the Secretary-General, through his Personal Representative, to render assistance to the members of the Regional Organization for the Protection of the Marine Environment in the formulation and implementation of a coordinated and consolidated programme of action comprising costed project profiles, to help identify all possible resources for the programme of action and, inter alia for strengthening the environmental capacities of the members of the Regional Organization for the Protection of the Marine Environment to deal with this problem, and to allocate, within existing resources, the minimum resources required to enable his Personal Representative to continue to help coordinate the activities of the United Nations system to that end;

4. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its forty-ninth session, through the Economic and Social Council, a report on the implementation of the present resolution;

5. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its forty-ninth session the sub-item entitled "International

Chapter IX

Population and human settlements

The United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) in 1992, while addressing the problems of population growth, distribution and movement, continued to support the right of women and men to family planning. Inadequate resources remained a major constraint, however, and despite significant improvements in reproductive health and increasing acceptance of family planning, the global population continued to grow at a rate of about 93 million per year.

The Economic and Social Council in 1992 decided to convene the International Conference on Population and Development from 5 to 13 September 1994 at Cairo, Egypt (decision 1992/37), and the General Assembly emphasized the need for comprehensive national population policies that were compatible with sustainable economic growth and development (resolution 47/176).

The United Nations Centre for Human Settlements, also known as Habitat, continued to assist developing countries in all aspects of human settlements activities through research and development and technical cooperation projects and information dissemination.

The General Assembly noted that the continuing deterioration of living environments in many countries was being aggravated by rapid population growth and urbanization, and decided to convene the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) from 3 to 14 June 1996 to address the human settlements problems and reassess related policies and programmes (47/180). The Assembly decided that the objectives of the Conference should be to arrest or reverse the deterioration of global living environments, to adopt a general statement of principles and commitments to sustainable improvements in human habitats and to formulate a global plan of action to guide national and international efforts through the first two decades of the next century.

Population

1994 International Conference on Population and Development

Following its 1989(1) and 1991(2) resolutions to convene an international meeting on population, the Economic and Social Council decided, in July 1992, to hold the International Conference on Population and Development, at Cairo, Egypt, from 5 to 13 September 1994; in December, the General Assembly endorsed that decision.

Preparatory activities

During 1992, preparatory activities for the 1994 International Conference on Population and Development, undertaken by UNFPA and the Population Division of the Secretariat's Department of Economic and Social Development (DESD), focused on the priority issues to be addressed, including population growth and demographic structure; population policies and programmes; population, environment and development; population distribution and migration; status of women and population; and family-planning programmes, health and family well-being. The Population Commission, acting as the Preparatory Committee for the Conference, was scheduled to hold its second session in August 1993.

In May,(3) the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) Governing Council noted with satisfaction the overall theme and objectives of the Conference, and encouraged Governments and organizations to prepare for it. The Council requested the Economic and Social Council to facilitate the participation of developing countries in the preparatory process.

Report of the Secretary-General of the Conference. In response to a 1991 Economic and Social Council resolution,(2) the Secretary-General of the Conference, Dr. Nafis Sadik, Executive Director of UNFPA, submitted a report in June 1992(4) reviewing the status of preparations and related financial and organizational questions.

The report noted that UNFPA and DESD had launched the seventh United Nations population inquiry to compile the views and policies of Member States pertaining to population. At the end of 1992,(5) about 40 Member States had replied to the inquiry, the results of which would be made available to the Conference. To ensure universal participation, the Conference Secretary-General had requested that national committees be established in each country as focal points for preparatory activities and to prepare national reports on the population situation, policies and programmes of the country concerned. The national reports would also highlight constraints on implementing the 1974 World Population Plan of Action(6) and the recommendations adopted at the 1984 International Conference on Population.(7)

The Conference Secretary-General reported that all United Nations agencies and organizations involved in population had appointed a focal point to coordinate their participation. She also reported that the Administrative Committee on Coordination had established an ad hoc task force for the Conference in 1991 to ensure inter-agency coordination and participation by United Nations bodies in the Conference and its preparatory process. The Task Force held its first formal meeting in New York on 6 July 1992(8) to review the preparations and related activities of the specialized agencies and organizations of the United Nations system.

DESD in 1992 organized a meeting of United Nations autonomous research institutes to discuss and coordinate their contributions to the Conference (New York, 2 October). The United Nations University was to act as a focal point, bringing together and synthesizing the inputs into a collective contribution to be transmitted to the Preparatory Committee.(5)

As part of its information programme, the Conference secretariat in 1992 published four issues of Population 94, a newsletter covering preparations for the Conference.

Expert group meetings

In 1991,(2) the Economic and Social Council had authorized the Secretary-General of the Conference to convene six expert group meetings on population and development issues. Five of those meetings, each including 15 internationally renowned experts, were held in 1992. They were described in a progress report on Conference preparations by the Secretary-General of the Conference.(5) The expert group meeting on population, environment and development (New York, 20-24 January) adopted 18 recommendations to the Conference Preparatory Committee; the meeting on population policies and programmes (Cairo, 12-16 April) adopted 21 recommendations; the meeting on population and women (Gaborone, Botswana, 22-26 June) adopted 32 recommendations; the meeting on family planning, health and family well-being (Bangalore, India, 26-29 October) adopted 35 recommendations; and the meeting on population growth and demographic structure (Paris, 16-20 November) adopted 19 recommendations. The sixth meeting, on population distribution and migration, was to be held in Bolivia in January 1993.

Regional activities

Also in 1991(2) the Economic and Social Council had invited the regional commissions to convene conferences on the status of population policies and programmes in their regions.(5)

The first of these conferences, the Fourth Asian and Pacific Population Conference (Bali, Indonesia, 19-27 August), jointly sponsored by the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific (ESCAP) and UNFPA, focused on the theme of population and sustainable development: goals and strategies into the twenty-first century. The Conference adopted the Bali Declaration on Population and Sustainable Development, which, according to a report of the UNFPA Executive Director,(9) called on countries in the region to make a firm political and financial commitment to incorporate population and environmental concerns fully into all national efforts towards sustainable development. It also urged countries with rapid population growth to reduce their fertility rates to 2.2 children per woman by 2010, to reduce infant mortality to 40 per 1,000 during the same period and to cut maternal mortality by at least half in those countries with high maternal death rates.

The Third African Population Conference (Dakar, Senegal, 7-12 December), was organized by the Economic Commission for Africa (ECA), the Organization of African Unity and UNFPA. The Conference adopted the Dakar Declaration on Population, Family and Sustainable Development, which called for a reduction in the rate of population growth in the region to 2.5 per cent by 2000 and 2 per cent by 2010, and an increase in the contraceptive prevalence rate to 20 per cent by 2000 and 40 per cent by 2010 for Africa as a whole. It also called for an increase in life expectancy from 45 to 55 years by 2000 and a 50 per cent decrease in maternal mortality.

The Economic Commission for Europe (ECE), the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC) and the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia (ESCWA) scheduled their population conferences for 1993 (see PART TWO, Chapter VI).

Trust funds

Two trust funds were established by the United Nations Secretary-General to support the Conference.(4) The first, the Trust Fund for the 1994 International Conference on Population and Development, was to be used for Conference preparatory activities. By June 1992, approximately $1 million had been contributed to the fund, and an additional $103,834 had been pledged. The second, the Voluntary Fund for Supporting Developing Countries' Participation in the Conference had received approximately $101,585 and an additional $250,000 had been pledged. A UNFPA Trust Fund was also established to support national preparatory activities, including meetings, studies and activities to increase awareness of the Conference.

The fund had received $235,320 and another $250,000 had been pledged.

UN Population Fund

UNFPA activities

According to a report of the Executive Director on 1992 activities,⁽¹⁰⁾ the bulk of UNFPA assistance once again went to family-planning services, followed by communication and education programmes, population policy formulation and evaluation, population dynamics, basic data collection, special programmes and multisectoral activities.

At the end of 1992, the Fund was assisting 1,499 projects—503 in Africa, 400 in Asia and the Pacific, 232 in Latin America and the Caribbean, 203 in the Arab States and Europe, and 161 in interregional projects.

Assistance to family-planning programmes totalled $80.7 million, almost half of the total allocation of $163.6 million. UNFPA supported numerous activities to strengthen and expand family-planning services, especially in rural and remote areas, by integrating family planning into maternal and child health care and into reproductive health programmes. Such programmes sought, inter alia, to provide a wide choice of safe and effective contraceptive methods as well as information and counselling to help users select and practise contraception effectively; to make clinical and referral services available for those methods requiring them; and to train service providers in family-planning techniques and counselling and in responsible sexual behaviour and parenthood.

In 1992, the Fund revised its policy guidelines on family-planning programme support to give greater emphasis to reproductive health and the Safe Motherhood Initiative, an inter-agency effort, begun in 1987,⁽¹¹⁾ to reduce maternal deaths by at least half by 2000. UNFPA continued to support skill-developing programmes in maternal and child health care and family planning (MCH/FP) in cooperation with Laval University, the University of Montreal (Canada), the Tunis Centre of International Family Planning Training (Tunisia) and the Mauritius Institute of Health. It also collaborated with the Université Libre de Bruxelles (Belgium) to produce a family-planning training manual in French, covering clinical techniques and programme management.

One of the Fund's primary activities during the year was to help Governments procure and distribute contraceptive supplies. With financial assistance from the Swedish International Development Authority (SIDA), the Rockefeller Foundation and the World Bank, UNFPA set up a unit to oversee the implementation of its Global Initiative on Contraceptive Requirements and Logistics Management Needs in developing countries.⁽¹²⁾ The unit organized in-depth studies in India, Nepal, Pakistan and Zimbabwe to assess logistics management systems and contraceptive requirements. The study identified an urgent need for intra-uterine devices (IUDs) in Pakistan, and UNFPA provided 650,000 units.

The Fund noted a number of significant donations during 1992. The British Overseas Development Administration provided $1.2 million for injectables and oral contraceptives in Ghana; SIDA funded the procurement of 2 million IUDs for India and procured, through UNFPA, some $1.6 million in contraceptives for Angola, Nicaragua, Sri Lanka, Uganda, Viet Nam, Zambia and Zimbabwe; Austria provided over $422,000 for injectables for Rwanda; the World Bank provided 2 million doses of injectables and 15 million cycles of oral contraceptives for Bangladesh; and the Finnish International Development Agency signed an agreement to allocate some $2.4 million over three years for supplies of NORPLANT contraceptive implants for Nepal. Germany provided some $233,000 in emergency contraceptive supplies to Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan. The Fund also prepared a guide for concerned government departments setting out procurement options and describing the procedures and structure needed for each of them.

During the year, the Fund supported human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS) prevention activities in 70 countries, compared with 41 in 1991. Activities focused on: the inclusion of AIDS-related components in population, family life and family-planning education and communication programmes; information and counselling on AIDS prevention and the distribution of condoms; the inclusion of AIDS education and information components in training programmes; and the conduct of socio-demographic, operational and biomedical research. (See also PART THREE, Chapter XI.)

UNFPA assistance for information, education and communication (IEC) activities amounted to $27.2 million, or 16.6 per cent of all programme allocations. Activities were aimed at helping countries develop comprehensive national IEC strategies; sensitizing decision makers and religious and community leaders about family planning as both a basic human right and a health measure; integrating information and education components into MCH/FP and reproductive health programmes; incorporating population and family-life education into school curricula and out-of-school programmes; and research to help in the design of messages to reach target groups. Peer education and youth-to-youth counselling on adolescent reproductive health proved to be particularly successful in a number of countries.

In a programme advisory note on youth, UNFPA recommended that more attention be paid to meeting young people's reproductive health needs and services and to facilitating their participation in population and development programmes. The note also stressed the importance of developing comprehensive national strategies on youth, population and development, combining IEC activities with reproductive health and family-planning services for youth. Such strategies should seek to involve young men in family planning and responsible parenthood, as well as to improve the health, welfare and status of young women.

The Fund provided support to the Mexican Family-Planning Federation to further develop and refine a sex education course and expanded its assistance to include some 60 formal population education activities worldwide. The content of population education also continued to expand, as most developing countries widened the scope to include such topics as responsible sexual behaviour; the role and status of women in society and development; and the interrelationship between population, the environment and resources. UNFPA collaborated with Egypt, Nigeria and Pakistan in formulating and implementing population education programmes aimed at workers and trade union leaders. In several countries, it supported projects to improve communication between parents and their children on such issues as human sexuality, family planning and contraception.

The Fund allocated some $14.7 million, or 9 per cent of its assistance, to population dynamics programmes, and some $14.8 million for the formulation, evaluation and implementation of population policies and programmes. High-quality technical assistance, provided by country support teams, was essential to the success of national execution and decentralization. In 1992, six such teams became operational—two in Africa, two in Asia, one in the Arab States and one in Latin America and the Caribbean. They conducted technical backstopping missions to 23 countries.

Basic data collection received some $9.9 million in assistance, or 6 per cent of the total allocation. The Fund continued to help developing countries generate population data and improve their capacity to collect, analyse and disseminate information on a timely basis. It kept abreast of new technologies and emerging issues in census design and helped to develop computer software packages to support population activities. UNFPA provided specialized training to some 75 professionals from 48 developing countries through the Global Programme of Training in Population and Development, and supported four multi-year studies on migration. To gain a better understanding of the population factor in economic development, UNFPA organized a consultative meeting of economists in September. The Fund also participated in a series of international meetings on ageing, two of which provided inputs for the 1994 International Conference on Population and Development. A 400-page study on changing population age structures, 1990-2015, in Europe, was jointly published by UNFPA and ECE. Other allocations included some $8.5 million, or 5.2 per cent of total assistance, for special programmes and $7.8 million, or 4.8 per cent, for multisectoral activities.

UNFPA continued to support improvements in the role and status of women in society and in development. As part of its efforts to improve the role and status of African women, the Fund supported some 40 projects addressing their reproductive and productive needs in 28 countries. In cooperation with the Arab Gulf Programme for United Nations Development Organizations, UNDP and the International Planned Parenthood Federation, it worked on establishing the Arab Women's Centre for Training and Research in Tunis to train Arab women in population-related activities. The Fund also helped several countries to establish income-generating activities for women and to provide training in micro-enterprise management and family welfare.

In line with its strategy to strengthen the Fund's capacity to deal with issues concerning women, population and development, UNFPA updated its sectoral policy guidelines as well as its guidelines for project formulation and appraisal to make them more gender-sensitive. Two training workshops on women, population and development helped UNFPA staff to incorporate gender into each of the Fund's programme areas. A status report on the strategy(13) was included in the Executive Director's 1992 annual report. To improve the technical aspect of women, population and development activities, UNFPA issued publications on women and micro-enterprise development; women, population and the environment; together with a training guide on incorporating women's issues into population and development programmes.

UNFPA continued to enhance its coordination with agencies and organizations within and outside the United Nations system. It actively participated in the work of several coordination committees and groups and entered into a number of new cooperative agreements to improve collaboration on population programme activities and help to ensure a regular exchange of information. The Fund also contributed to preparations for several international conferences, most notably the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII) and the 1994 International Conference on Population and Development (see above). As a follow-up to UNCED, it identified chapters and programme areas of Agenda 21(14) that had programmatic, institutional and financial implications for UNFPA, and began to develop guidelines on integrating environmental goals and considerations into national population policies and programmes.

In February, (15) the Executive Directors of UNFPA and the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) summarized their collaborative programming activities. The report examined the need and rationale for close collaboration between the two organizations and analysed their field- and headquarters-level collaboration.

On 26 May,(3) the Governing Council took note of the report and urged UNFPA and UNICEF to expand and strengthen their collaborative activities. It requested the two organizations to include a status report on those activities in the Executive Director's annual report to the Council.

In June, UNFPA launched a new monthly magazine, POPULI, in English, French and Spanish, which combined its quarterly journal with the same title with its monthly newsletter Population. UNFPA's 1992 State of World Population report, entitled "A World in Balance", called for immediate and determined action to balance population, consumption and development patterns as a prerequisite to ending absolute poverty.

UNDP Governing Council action. On 26 May 1992,(3) the UNDP Governing Council took note of the UNFPA Executive Director's report on the 1991 activities of the Fund(16) and requested her to take appropriate steps to increase voluntary contributions to UNFPA. The Council commended the progress made on the Fund's Global Initiative on Contraceptive Requirements and Logistics Management Needs, and requested that it submit a report on the subject at its forty-first (1994) session. On the same date,(17) the Council took note of a proposal by Germany to host the headquarters of UNFPA, along with UNDP and its affiliated funds, at Bonn from 1996 onwards, and requested the Administrator to hold consultations on the issue and report to the Council at its fortieth (1993) session.

In February, by decision 1992/208 C, the Economic and Social Council decided not to consider the part of the UNDP Governing Council's report dealing with UNFPA, except for recommendations that required action by the Council.

Country and intercountry programmes

In a March report,(18) the Executive Director provided the status of financial implementation of UNDP Governing Council-approved UNFPA country programmes and projects for the period 1986-1991, plus estimates for 31 new programmes to be submitted to the Council in 1992. The total amount estimated for the new submissions was $318.6 million, including $224.1 million from regular funds. The balance of UNFPA commitments for ongoing and new programmes amounted to $549.8 million.

The Governing Council, on 26 May,(19) approved the 31 multi-year assistance programmes—16 in sub-Saharan Africa, 8 in Asia and the Pacific, 4 in the Arab States and 3 in Latin America.

UNFPA concentrated on programmes in 58 priority countries (32 in Africa, 17 in Asia and the Pacific, 5 in Latin America and the Caribbean and 4 in the Arab States), which received $96.7 million, or 74.2 per cent, of the $130.3 million allocated to country programmes overall.(10) Allocations for intercountry activities (regional and interregional) totalled $33.2 million, or 20.3 per cent of the total, in 1992. The resources allocated to priority country programmes increased by 1.1 per cent over 1991, but the combined amount allocated to country and intercountry programmes dropped sharply, from $172 million in 1991 to $163.6 million in 1992.

Programmes for sub-Saharan Africa received $48.6 million in 1992, a decline from $55.1 million in 1991. The decline in support made it necessary for UNFPA to scale down plans to expand activities and to seek resources from other donors to cover projects that had already been developed. Most resources for the region (58.2 per cent) were allocated to family-planning and communication and education programmes.

A status report(13) on the implementation of the strategy for UNFPA assistance to sub-Saharan Africa(20) provided an overview of UNFPA expenditures for activities in the region between 1986 and 1992 and the progress made and constraints encountered in the main areas of the programme during 1990-1992. The report concluded that of the 41 countries covered by UNFPA for which fertility information was available, 11 had seen a decline in the total fertility rate; 6 showed an increase and 24 remained more or less unchanged. Evidence suggested however that the investment in population programmes had set the stage for declining fertility and population growth, reflected in part by an upswing in contraceptive use in most countries of the region.

The Arab States and Europe received $16.1 million in 1992, compared with $14.9 million in 1991. Improved access to family-planning services, particularly in rural areas, was a primary objective of programmes in most Arab States. In 1992, family-planning programmes accounted for 45.7 per cent of the total allocation for the Arab States and Europe.

In Europe, UNFPA assistance continued to focus on efforts to reduce the high incidence of abortion and relatively high rates of infant and maternal mortality. About one quarter of the $4 million allocated to Europe was earmarked for activities in Albania. UNFPA activities were suspended in the former Yugoslavia, and the UNFPA representative there was temporarily relocated to Vienna.

Asia and the Pacific received $60.7 million in 1992, compared with $57 million in 1991. Family-planning programmes accounted for 67 per cent of UNFPA resources allocated to the region. Ageing and AIDS prevention received special emphasis.

UNFPA resources allocated to Latin America and the Caribbean increased slightly in 1992—to $18 million from $17.3 million in 1991. Of that, 43.9 per cent was allocated to family-planning programmes. Illegal abortion and adolescent pregnancy were among the region's most pressing population problems. The Fund devised a strategy that concentrated on improving women's reproductive health, to address those issues.

Allocations for interregional and global programmes in 1992 totalled some $20.1 million, of which $7.8 million, or 38.9 per cent, went to family-planning programmes, focusing on contraceptive research.

Work programmes

In a February report on the Fund's work plan for 1993-1996 and request for programme expenditure authority,(21) the Executive Director provided information on UNFPA's current and projected resources, overall resource utilization and the distribution of programmable resources for 1993-1996 among country and intercountry activities.

On 26 May,(22) the Council approved the work plan for 1993-1996 and the request for new programme expenditure authority of $188.1 million for 1993. It endorsed the following estimates for new programmable resources for 1994-1996, subject to actual contributions: $207.4 million for 1994, $225 million for 1995 and $244.4 million for 1996.

Programme planning and evaluation

Reporting on the UNFPA medium-term operational strategy,(23) the Executive Director provided background information on the Fund's growth from its beginning in 1969 through 1991; its current organizational adaptations and staffing requirements; its goals, mandate and objectives; its actions at the policy and programme level, and the resources needed to meet ongoing and emerging needs in the 1990s. The report outlined areas requiring the increased attention of the Fund, namely maternal and child health and family planning; support for women, population and development activities; training in population issues; AIDS prevention; integration of population-related issues into the substantive programmes of other United Nations organizations; and collection and analysis of programme data. It was estimated that by the year 2000, $9 billion would be required to fund population activities in developing countries, of which $4 billion was to come from the international community, including $1 billion to be channelled through UNFPA.

On 26 May 1992,(3) the UNDP Governing Council took note of the UNFPA medium-term operational strategy.

During the year, UNFPA further strengthened and relined its programme implementation, focusing on strategic programming and its requisite technical assistance, national execution, decentralization, evaluation, coordination and procurement. The Programme Review and Strategy Development (PRSD) exercise was key to the success of strategic programming.(10)

The exercises, which normally lasted for two years and culminated in a four- to six-week PRSD mission to the country, analysed the country's population status and needs, assessed past population activities and recommended action in terms of an overall national strategy.

In 1992, the Fund organized 12 PRSD missions—9 in sub-Saharan Africa and 3 in Latin America and the Caribbean—published 13 PRSD reports, bringing their total number to 25, and finalized the PRSD guidelines.

Evaluation remained a regular and integral part of UNFPA's programming process. The Fund undertook two major thematic evaluations during the year. The first examined efforts to implement IEC strategies in support of family-planning service delivery, and the second focused on UNFPA-supported income-generating activities for women.

In a February report,(24) the Executive Director reviewed the Fund's evaluation activities in 1990-1991, including project evaluations, independent, in-depth evaluations, programme review and strategy development, and feedback and use of evaluation results. The report noted that in the period under review, UNFPA had undertaken 47 PRSD exercises, expanding their use to help countries develop coherent frameworks for national population programmes.

On 26 May,(3) the UNDP Governing Council took note of the report and requested the Executive Director to increase the number of independent evaluations. The Council also called for a review of the PRSD exercise and requested that the Executive Director include the findings in a report to the Council at its forty-first (1994) session.

The Executive Director in March submitted a report(25) on national execution guidelines, which analysed UNFPA's experience with national execution, describing the lessons learned and steps taken and proposing policy and operational guidelines.

On 26 May,(3) the Governing Council endorsed the proposed national execution policy guidelines, and requested the Population Fund to continue to provide financial support for personnel training, national institutional capacity-building and necessary equipment.

Financial and administrative questions

According to the annual financial review of the Population Fund,(26) its total income in 1992 amounted to $238.2 million. Expenditures totalled $193.6 million, resulting in an excess of income over expenditure of $44.6 million. During the year, 105 Governments contributed $233.8 million, an increase of $13.1 million (5.9 per cent) over the amount pledged in 1991. Interest on income amounted to $3.1 million. Other miscellaneous income and adjustments totalled $1.3 million. The 6.3 per cent overall increase in income, however, was largely due to favourable exchange rates.

As at 1 January 1992, the unexpended balance of the 26 trust funds managed by UNFPA was $7.6 million, which, when added to the total income of $43.1 million received under the funds-in-trust agreements, resulted in $50.7 million available for programming. Total expenditures in 1992 were $39.8 million. Transfers back to donor Governments in respect of completed projects totalled $0.1 million, leaving an unexpended balance as at 31 December of $11 million, which was available to finance trust fund activities in 1993.

In May,(27) the UNDP Governing Council took note of the annual review of the activities financed by UNFPA in 1991,(28) the audit reports for the year ended 31 December 1990(29) and the interim report of the Board of Auditors for the first year of the biennium 1990-1991.(30) The Council noted that the Fund's 1991 expenditure had exceeded its income, which, along with the income projected for 1992, fell considerably short of the original estimates. It urged UNFPA to ensure that future estimates of income reflected actual trends and that future expenditure plans accorded with those estimates. It also noted with concern the continued increase in the proportion of the Fund's administrative expenditures in relation to programme expenditures, and requested the Executive Director to propose steps to reduce that proportion, to strengthen internal financial management and control and to report to the Governing Council on those activities in 1993.

Also before the Council was a progress report⁽³¹⁾ on UNFPA successor support cost arrangements.⁽³²⁾ Acting on the report, the Governing Council urged the Executive Director to ensure that technical support services teams be established with clear lines of accountability, management structures, reporting and working relationships, and requested UNFPA to provide it with a progress report in 1993.

The Council also confirmed its 1991 decision⁽³²⁾ to keep the annual level of the Fund's operational reserve at 20 per cent.⁽²⁷⁾ It further approved a new financial regulation and requested the Executive Director to submit in 1993 proposed amendments to those regulations permitting her to enter into cost-sharing arrangements with recipient Governments and external donors.

In its financial report and audited financial statements on UNFPA for the biennium ended 31 December 1991,⁽³³⁾ the Board of Auditors expressed concern over the increase in the ratio of operational costs to programme expenditure from 28.8 per cent in 1988 to 33.4 per cent in 1991. It also indicated that in two trust funds, project expenditure had exceeded the funds available, contrary to UNFPA financial regulations. The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ), in an October report on the Board's report,⁽³⁴⁾ recommended that UNFPA should programme and commit funds only up to the level of pledges received, and endorsed the Board's view that it had to reduce, suspend or terminate project activity if no funds were received from the respective donor. The Board's report also identified major weaknesses with regard to property control at the field-office level, which it said management was addressing in its new policies and procedures manual. ACABQ noted the Board's view that audit coverage of headquarters activities was particularly inadequate in view of the considerable expansion of operations, and recommended that steps be taken immediately to establish and enhance the capability of internal audit in UNFPA.

Other population activities

Technical cooperation

In a report to the UNDP Governing Council on the 1992 technical cooperation programme of DESD,⁽³⁵⁾ the Secretary-General said the Department had executed 112 population projects in 67 developing countries, with a total delivery of $7.6 million. It had also undertaken 48 project-related or direct technical advisory missions to 34 countries. Some 43 projects were in population training and research, and 34 in population dynamics, with a major emphasis on the evaluation and analysis of data from the 1990 round of population censuses and demographic surveys. DESD, in cooperation with other international bodies, organized for African demographers and planners a four-month training programme in demographic data analysis, dissemination and utilization, and two workshops on the use of microcomputers and software for analysis of census data. Managerial and substantive backstopping was provided in 30 countries in the fields of population policy and population and development. Project activities included the strengthening of institutional arrangements, demographic research and studies, population policy formulation, the integration of population variables in development planning, and the training of national staff in the use of demographic models and related software for development planning.

UN Population Award

In September, the Secretary-General presented the 1992 United Nations Population Award to J. R. D. Tata (India), an industrialist and a pioneer in India's population movement, and to the Population Council, a United States-based international research NGO renowned for providing technical assistance in national population programmes and for its work in developing new contraceptives. Each received a diploma, a gold medal and a monetary prize. The award, established by the General Assembly in 1981,⁽³⁶⁾ is presented annually to individuals or institutions that have made outstanding contributions towards increasing awareness of population problems and to their solutions. The award's trust fund totalled $608,480 as at 31 December 1991.

By a note of 23 July,⁽³⁷⁾ the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly the UNFPA Executive Director's report on the status of the Award. The Assembly, by decision 47/439, took note of the Secretary-General's note.

Human settlements

Conference on human settlements

In September 1992, in response to a General Assembly request,⁽¹⁾ the Secretary-General submitted a report⁽²⁾ on a proposed United Nations conference on human settlements (Habitat II). The report evaluated the state of human settlements around the world and progress since the 1976 human settlements conference (Vancouver, Canada).⁽³⁾ It reviewed the objectives, scope and content of the proposed Habitat II and discussed its preparation and financial requirements.

By way of background to the call for Habitat II, the Secretary-General noted that the enormous strides made since 1976 towards solving the shelter problem had not been enough to arrest the deterioration of living conditions in many countries, where rapid urbanization, increasing landlessness and declining income yields from agriculture had led to increasing poverty in both urban and rural areas. The world's population was expanding by about one billion people per decade, with 94.1 per cent of this growth in the current decade in developing countries. Cities in the developing world were expected to absorb some 90 per cent of that population growth but already faced enormous backlogs in the availability of housing, infrastructure and services, and were confronted with overcrowded transportation systems, insufficient water supply, deteriorating sanitation and environmental pollution. One third of the urban population in those countries were living in slums or squatter settlements. The lack of access to modern amenities, the growing scarcity of affordable building materials, and the inadequacy of domestic energy sources were creating equally dramatic conditions for the rural poor. The Secretary-General said the health consequences of the situation were both tragic and appalling, with some 2.5 billion people suffering from ailments related to contaminated water and the lack of sanitation. He further noted that the external debt of developing countries and structural adjustment programmes aimed at strengthening their economies had in fact undermined prospects for improved living conditions in many countries. He also noted that conventional econometric models had failed to measure correctly the economic returns on investments in human settlements which had been given low priority in the mistaken belief that they were "social welfare".

Since Habitat I, Governments had made substantial advances in improving living conditions, and within the United Nations, the human settlements programme had shown considerable gains, he said. Such progress was accompanied by an evolution in thinking with respect to the problems of human settlements development and their solutions. He noted that the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED)⁽⁴⁾ had decided to address human settlements as a substantive framework for sustainable development and that programme areas, such as atmosphere, land, coastal areas, freshwater and waste management should include the human settlements dimension (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII).

Referring to the objectives of Habitat II, the Secretary-General recommended that the conference formulate a global plan of action, to arrest the deterioration of living conditions and facilitate their improvement, recognizing that the emphasis in solutions to the shelter problem had shifted in the past two decades from direct governmental involvement to government support for private-sector initiatives and the participation of communities and NGOs. He made recommendations on a variety of issues, including the role of Government and NGOs; the mobilization of financial resources; capacity-building and human resources development; sustainable development; new technologies; communications; transportation; water resources; waste management; energy; and information.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 December 1992, the Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee, adopted without vote resolution 47/180.

United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II)

The General Assembly,

Recalling the recommendations adopted by Habitat: United Nations Conference on Human Settlements, and its resolution 43/181 of 20 December 1988 on the Global Strategy for Shelter to the Year 2000, as well as its resolution 46/164 of 19 December 1991, in which it expressed its conviction that a world-wide conference with-broad, multidisciplinary and high-level participation could provide a suitable forum for considering the current situation in the planning, development and management of human settlements, and decided to consider at its forty-seventh session the question of convening, possibly in 1997, a United Nations conference on human settlements (Habitat II), with a view to taking a decision on the objectives, content, scope and timing of such a conference and the modalities and financial implications of holding it,

Noting the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, which recognized the proper management of human settlements as a prerequisite to the attainment of the overall goals for sustainable development, the centre-piece of which must be the human being,

Convinced of the need to reassess and systematically review the multifaceted aspects of human settlement policies and programmes in the light of important changes in the perception of human settlements problems and the solutions thereto since Habitat: United Nations Conference on Human Settlements, particularly the introduction of the concept of enabling strategies, and in the light of new developments and trends in international economic relations and population and migration patterns, as well as the recurrence of natural disasters,

Noting with concern that in many countries, especially many developing ones, the achievements in terms of policies, programmes and projects at the national level in the field of human settlements have not been sufficient to arrest or reverse the deterioration in the living environment of the people because, inter alia, of the pressure of population growth and urbanization and because the resource requirements for human settlement programmes far exceed the availability of resources in developing countries,

Cognizant of the fact that the continuing rapid rate of urbanization and population increase in the developing countries is contributing to the emergence and spread of large urban agglomerations, with adverse implications for the supply of adequate shelter, environmental infrastructure and services for the people, as well as for their employment prospects,

Recognizing the importance of giving due consideration to country-specific characteristics, such as the natural environment, the economic structure, the endogenous material base and culture, in the development and application of technology, planning and management in the area of human settlements,

Fully aware of the need for adequate resources to address the problems of human settlements and for more effective policies, programmes and projects, including public/private partnerships, as appropriate, to address those problems, and of the importance of improved management at the national and local levels,

Noting that the provision of external financial resources needed to implement the programmes set forth in chapter 7 of Agenda 21 would facilitate the mobilization of resources locally,

Stressing the need, for the implementation of Agenda 21, to promote, facilitate and finance, as appropriate, access to and transfer of environmentally sound technologies and corresponding know-how, in particular to developing countries on favourable terms, including concessional and preferential terms, as mutually agreed, taking into account the need to protect intellectual property rights as well as the special needs of developing countries,

Bearing in mind the need to take into consideration the work of other recent and planned United Nations conferences on related subjects,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on a United Nations conference on human settlements (Habitat II),

1. Decides to convene the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) from 3 to 14 June 1996, at the highest possible level of participation;

2. Also decides that the Conference, in addressing human settlements issues in the context of sustainable development, shall have the following objectives:

(a) In the long term, to arrest the deterioration of global human settlements conditions and ultimately create conditions for achieving improvements in the living environment of all people on a sustainable basis, with special attention to the needs and contributions of women and vulnerable social groups whose quality of life and participation in development have been hampered by exclusion and inequality, which affect the poor in general;

(b) To adopt a general statement of principles and commitments and formulate a related global plan of action suitable for guiding national and international efforts through the first two decades of the next century; such a plan of action should include:

- (i) A comprehensive set of programmes and sub-programmes, with realistic targets and timetables and provision for monitoring and evaluation of performance;
- (ii) Guidelines for national settlement policies and strategies that can effectively contribute to the alleviation of urban and rural poverty and the promotion of a sustainable economic development process, with due consideration given to the growth and distribution of population, urban transition, natural disasters, the availability of land and other resources and the interests of women and major groups;
- (iii) Programmes and subprogrammes relating to new and emerging issues in the field of technology, including the impact of the current communication and informatics revolution, energy, transportation and environmental infrastructure, that is, water-supply, sanitation and waste management;
- (iv) Programmes and subprogrammes that would carry forward relevant elements of Agenda 21 to promote the development of environmentally sustainable human settlements in the future;
- (v) Proposals for mobilizing, nationally and internationally, the necessary human, financial and technical resources, taking into account the enabling concept and the commitment of new and additional resources, as well as funding from countries' own public and private sectors, for the implementation of Agenda 21 programmes;
- (vi) Measures for the reorganization and strengthening of national, metropolitan and municipal institutions and machinery to enhance the development of human settlements and operational capabilities;
- (vii) Recommendations on ways in which the role of the United Nations and existing institutional arrangements for international cooperation and coordination in human settlements can be strengthened;

3. Affirms that the Conference shall, inter alia:

(a) Review trends in policies and programmes undertaken by countries and international organizations to implement the recommendations adopted by Habitat: United Nations Conference on Human Settlements;

(b) Conduct a mid-term review of the implementation of the Global Strategy for Shelter to the Year 2000 and make recommendations for the attainment of its objectives by the target date;

(c) Review the contribution to the implementation of Agenda 21 of national and international action in the area of human settlements;

(d) Review current global trends in economic and social development as they affect the planning, development and management of human settlements, and make recommendations for future action at the national and international levels;

4. Decides to establish a preparatory committee of the General Assembly for the second United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II); the Preparatory Committee will be open to all States Members of the United Nations and members of the specialized agencies, with the participation of observers in accordance with the established practice of the General Assembly;

5. Invites relevant or interested organizations, organs, programmes and agencies of the United Nations system and intergovernmental, subregional and regional organizations to participate actively in the preparatory process;

6. Invites non-governmental organizations, particularly those from developing countries and including those related to major groups, to participate in and contribute to the Conference and its preparatory process, and, to this end, decides that the Preparatory Committee shall formulate and adopt modalities for the accreditation and participation of those organizations, taking into account the procedures followed at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development;

7. Decides that an organizational session of the Preparatory Committee of three days' duration shall be held at United Nations Headquarters in March 1993 and that two preparatory sessions should be held, the first early in 1994 at Geneva or in New York, and the second in conjunction with the 1995 session of the Commission on Human Settlements, with the detailed arrangements for the preparatory discussions to be determined at the organizational session;

8. Also decides that, in the event of there being a clear need for further preparatory discussions, an appropriate request might be made by the Preparatory Committee to the General Assembly;

9. Further decides that the Preparatory Committee, at its organizational session, shall elect, with due regard to equitable geographical representation, a chairman, three vice-chairmen and a rapporteur;

10. Notes with appreciation the generous offer made by the Government of Turkey to act as host to the Conference, and decides that the Conference will be held in Turkey in 1996;

11. Decides that the host country shall be ex officio an officer of the Preparatory Committee;

12. Requests the Secretary-General, following the organizational session of the Preparatory Committee, in accordance with resolutions 41/213 of 19 December 1986 and 42/211 of 21 December 1987, to establish, through redeployment to the maximum extent possible and within existing resources, an ad hoc secretariat for the Conference, which shall be organizationally part of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat);

13. Decides that the ad hoc secretariat will be headed by the Secretary-General of the Conference, who will be appointed by the Secretary-General of the United Nations;

14. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations to prepare a report for the organizational session of the Preparatory Committee containing recommendations on an adequate preparatory process, taking into account the provisions of the present resolution and the views expressed by Governments in the discussion of this matter at the forty-seventh session of the General Assembly;

15. Decides that the Preparatory Committee shall:

(a) Draft the provisional agenda of the Conference, in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution;

(b) Adopt guidelines to enable States to take a harmonized approach in their preparations and reporting;

(c) Prepare draft decisions, including the plan of action, for the Conference and submit them to the Conference for consideration and adoption;

16. Requests all organs, organizations and programmes of the United Nations system, as well as other relevant intergovernmental organizations, to cooperate with the secretariat of the Conference and contribute fully to the preparations for the Conference on the basis of guidelines and requirements to be established by the Preparatory Committee;

17. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations to ensure the coordination of contributions from the United Nations system, through the Administrative Committee on Coordination;

18. Invites all States to take an active part in the preparations for the Conference, to prepare national reports, as appropriate, to be submitted to the Preparatory Committee in a timely manner and to promote international cooperation and broad-based national preparatory processes involving the scientific community, industry, trade unions and non-governmental organizations concerned;

19. Recommends that regional and subregional preparatory meetings should be held in conjunction with meetings of subregional and regional intergovernmental bodies, wherever possible;

20. Decides that the preparatory process and the Conference itself shall be funded through existing United Nations budgetary resources, without negatively affecting its programmed activities, and through voluntary contributions to a trust fund established specifically for that purpose;

UN Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) Activities

In 1992, UNCHS supported 262 technical cooperation projects and programmes in 96 countries, with an overall budget in excess of $43 million. An additional 85 projects in 44 countries were awaiting funding. Sectoral support missions were sent to Angola, Cambodia, Ecuador, Fiji, the Gambia, Guatemala, Panama, Papua New Guinea, the United Republic of Tanzania and the Caribbean subregion, and the Centre supported human settlements sector analysis and needs assessment missions to Albania, Bangladesh, Cambodia, the Central African Republic, Ecuador, Fiji, the Gambia, Ghana, Indonesia, Nepal, Nigeria, Panama, Rwanda, the United Republic of Tanzania, Zambia and the Caribbean subregion.

The 1992-1993 UNCHS work programme once again had eight subprogrammes: global issues and strategies; national policies and instruments; integrated settlements management; financial resources; land management; infrastructure development and operation; housing production; and the construction sector. Those activities were described in a report of the Executive Director to the Commission on Human Settlements.(5)

Under the first subprogramme, the Centre assisted developing countries in formulating and implementing national shelter strategies in accordance with the Global Strategy for Shelter to the Year 2000, adopted by the General Assembly in 1988.(6) As part of its series of subregional seminars, UNCHS sponsored the Arab States Regional Conference on National Shelter Strategies (Cairo, Egypt, December). A pilot project was being carried out in Kenya under the City Data Programme to test a preliminary urban data framework and to train municipalities in the collection and computerized storage of key urban data. A workshop for mayors and town clerks of the pilot study cities was held in June.

Under the second subprogramme, emphasis was given to the analysis of national human settlements policies and instruments; the preparation of options and guidelines for sustainable human settlements policies and programmes; assistance with methods and instruments for investment planning; and translation of the global strategy at the national level. Within the framework of the UNCHS/World Bank Housing Indicators Programme, the Centre hosted an international seminar (Nairobi, 27-30 January) which reviewed data and information from a number of countries in Africa, Europe and North America. A concise list of global indicators was prepared for consideration by the Commission on Human Settlements at its fourteenth (1993) session. In 1992, UNCHS carried out 82 ongoing projects and programmes in 47 countries, with a budget of over $10.7 million. Many of these programmes focused on the strengthening of human settlements management in the national development planning process.

The third subprogramme was the Centre's largest in terms of financial resources, with over $12.5 million budgeted for 1992 within its integrated settlements management projects and programmes. During the year, UNHCS collaborated with 36 developing countries on 66 settlements management projects and programmes. Activities focused on metropolitan, secondary-centre and subnational-systems management, as well as human resource development. In cooperation with the League of Arab States, the Centre held a training of trainers workshop in urban finance and management for Arab States from the Mashrig subregion (Cairo, April). A senior-level seminar on national policies for local government training in South Asia was held at Colombo, Sri Lanka, in November.

Under the financial resources subprogramme, a housing in development workshop was held (Bandung, Indonesia, May) for officials and practitioners from Asian countries, with a follow-up course for the same target group (Leuven, Belgium, October). The Centre supported eight technical cooperation projects and programmes on the mobilization of financial resources for human settlements development, and provided advisory services to Indonesia, Nepal, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, the Philippines, Sri Lanka, Uganda, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen. Activities included the training of trainers workshops in municipal economic development (Costa Rica, February), in local government management for Central and Eastern Europe (Hungary, April/May), in local government institutional development (Peru, June), in local government training methods and techniques (Ecuador, August), and in needs assessment and the use of training materials (Morocco, December). In addition, a pilot training course was held for local government-elected officials (Uganda, October/November) to train mayors and councillors in the skills required for improved management of cities.

Activities under the land-management subprogramme in 1992 focused on developing mechanisms and instruments to address land-management problems and to ensure the availability of a steady, adequate and affordable supply of land to meet all settlement needs. Work continued on reviewing and updating technical and administrative requirements for improving the operation of land-registration systems as a prerequisite for effective land policies, including land title-registration. The Centre supported eight technical cooperation projects and programmes in eight countries.

UNCHS emphasized management and financing issues relevant to improved infrastructural services. The Centre's activities under this subprogramme expanded considerably in 1992, with the development of an integrated approach to the provision, development and maintenance of environmental infrastructure. This resulted in the consolidation of existing and new UNCHS initiatives and activities under the umbrella of the Centre's Settlement Infrastructure and Environment Programme, to meet the infrastructure needs of the urban and rural poor in a sustainable way. As part of its contribution to Agenda 21,(4) UNCHS conducted a research project on strategies for solid waste recycling and reuse in developing countries and organized, in August and September, workshops in live cities (Kanpur, India; Karachi, Pakistan; Bangkok, Thailand; Manila, Philippines; Jakarta, Indonesia). The Centre undertook missions to Ghana, Guinea-Bissau and Indonesia to formulate a research project on the relationship between crowding and health in low-income settlements. Developing policies and practices to facilitate the delivery of infrastructure services was the focus of 38 technical cooperation projects and programmes in 22 countries.

The work programme for housing production paid special attention to the needs and potentials of the poorest groups. In collaboration with the World Bank and the Institute for Housing and Development Studies, UNCHS arranged an expert group meeting (Rotterdam, Netherlands, 12-15 February) to discuss the development and implementation of policies to guide the relocation process. The Centre had 30 ongoing technical cooperation projects and programmes in 18 countries, which focused on support for both the informal and formal private sector in housing development.

In the construction sector, work concentrated on the transfer of small-scale technologies to local building-materials industries as well as on skills development and upgrading. The Centre convened an expert group meeting on appropriate, intermediate, cost-effective building materials, technologies and transfer mechanisms for housing delivery (Madras, India, February). The Centre's 23 projects in 13 countries helped to develop standards, technologies and regulatory frameworks to encourage the use and production of durable local building materials.

The Centre's information activities included the production of technical publications, audiovisual aids, press releases and information kits, as well as several periodicals and newsletters.

The 1992 Habitat Scroll of Honour Awards to recognize outstanding contributions by individuals, organizations and projects to the advancement of the shelter delivery process, were presented to Laurie Baker, Yona Friedman, Evgueni Rozanov, John F. C. Turner and Mayor Jaime Lerner of Curitiba (Brazil), as well as to the Shenzhen Housing Bureau of China, the Habitat International Coalition and the Intermediate Technology Development Group of the United Kingdom. Awards were also presented to seven projects: the East Wahdat Upgrading Project in Jordan, the Earthquake Emergency Reconstruction and Rehabilitation Programme in Nepal, the Rural Housing Reconstruction with Appropriate Technologies in Ecuador, the Namuwongo Upgrading and Low-cost Housing Project in Uganda, the New Communities Programme in Egypt, the World Relief El Salvador Housing Reconstruction Project, and the Woodless Construction Project in the Niger.

Coordination

Coordination and cooperation activities within the United Nations system(7) and with inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations(8) were described by the Executive Director in separate reports to the Commission on Human Settlements.

During the year, the Centre continued to work with other organizations on urban and rural development projects, including the Urban Management Programme and the Sustainable Cities Programme. UNCHS participated in the Seventh Conference on Urban and Regional Research (Ankara, Turkey, July), the twentieth meeting of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) Task Force on Rural Development (New York, April), an international seminar on local and regional development options for the next decade focusing on eastern and southern Africa (Nairobi, September), and co-sponsored an international seminar on rural centre and settlements planning with the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific (Tehran, Iran, July). The Centre continued its collaboration with the World Food Programme in projects related to human settlements development that required food-assisted activities. In February, the Centre participated in the eleventh session of the Inter-agency Group on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and the sixth session of the Committee on the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy. In the area of science and technology, UNCHS participated in the thirteenth session of the ACC Task Force on Science and Technology (New York, November), which discussed the organization of resources for the promotion of science and technology in developing countries, the review of endogenous capacity-building projects and the contribution of biotechnology to sustainable development. The Centre also participated in the International Symposium on Transfer of Environmentally Sound Technology (Osaka and Otsu, Japan, October), which considered the promotion of the transfer of environmentally sound technologies and the establishment of global networks.

UNCHS actively participated in the preparatory process of the Earth Summit and in the formulation of several of the action programmes of Agenda 21(4) (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII). In the areas of water and sanitation, UNCHS served as a member of the Steering Committee for the International Conference on Water and Environment (Dublin, Ireland, January), which provided the major input on freshwater problems to UNCED, and assisted in the preparation of the chapter of Agenda 21 dealing with solid wastes. It also provided input to Agenda 21 in the area of transport, especially in the context of air pollution, through its participation in the International Seminar on Sustainable Transportation (Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, June).

In 1992, UNCHS launched the Settlement Infrastructure and Environment Programme (SIEP) to help Governments, the private sector and communities in planning, providing, maintaining and managing environmental infrastructure, and in August, UNCHS and the United Nations Environment Programme approved a framework for cooperation in the integrated planning and management of coastal areas.

The Centre and the Caribbean Community (CARICOM) co-sponsored a subregional meeting (Georgetown, Guyana, October) to analyse countries' priorities in the human settlements field as a basis for project formulation.

The Meeting on Governmental-Non-Governmental Cooperation in the Field of Human Settlements (The Hague, Netherlands, 2-6 November) identified the following priorities for action: defining the roles and responsibilities of the different actors in human settlements; providing sustainable support at the community level; providing access to land and finance for low-income groups; alleviation of poverty; supporting the role of women in human settlements development; and decentralization of powers, responsibilities and resources from central to local levels.

Global Parliamentarians on Habitat

The Conference of Global Parliamentarians on Human Settlements and Development (Vancouver, Canada, 15-20 March)(9) adopted the Vancouver 1992 Declaration of Global Parliamentarians on Habitat (Human Settlements and Sustainable Development). The Declaration recommended action in such areas as human settlements management, effective land-resource management, adequate shelter for all, integrated provision of environmental infrastructure, sustainable transport and energy systems, human resources development and capacity-building, promoting human settlements planning and management in disaster-prone areas and promoting sustainable construction industry activities. It also made recommendations in such areas as management of the atmosphere, coastal area conservation, deforestation, biodiversity preservation, public health, protection of the water supply and waste management, and called for the implementation of a Global Human Settlements Strategy.

Women and human settlements

In response to a request of the Commission on Human Settlements, the Executive Director in December submitted a report(10) on women's participation in the Global Strategy for Shelter to the Year 2000.(6)

The Women in Human Settlements Development Programme, launched by UNCHS in 1990, was directed at: involving women in the formulation and implementation of human settlements policies and programmes; opening up employment opportunities for women in the human settlements sector; improving women's access to credit for both property ownership and business development; protecting and improving women's shelter and land tenure; and improving the living and working environment of women, especially low-income women, their families and their communities. The Centre emphasized training in gender awareness; capacity-building for women already involved in the settlements sector; hands-on training in construction skills; improved access to land by changing laws related to land tenure and housing finance; training for women as educators on the subjects of environmental protection and natural resources management; improving women's access to the mass media; support for women's exchange networks; and the development of training materials to foster a clearer gender perspective in human settlements and enable women's active involvement.

Three workshops were held on gender-aware approaches to human settlements development (United Republic of Tanzania and Bolivia, February, and Colombia, March), and two workshops addressed issues related to women and sustainable development in Latin America (Bolivia, February; Colombia, March). A gender-specific component was incorporated into a workshop on training local government elected officials (Kampala, Uganda, October/November), and a workshop on gender-aware approaches to human settlements development was held (Dar-es-Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania, February). In addition, the Centre held an ad hoc expert group meeting on the Global Strategy for Shelter to the Year 2000 in Action: Enhancing the Role of Women in Community Development (Nairobi, 7-9 December).

Financing

During 1992, the Centre's work programme was financed from the United Nations regular budget and from extrabudgetary resources. Programme support income from projects financed by UNDP and trust funds amounted to $3.6 million, while income for the United Nations Habitat and Human Settlements Foundation was $11.3 million.

UNCHS project delivery amounted to $41.2 million, including projects financed by UNDP ($31.8 million), the Foundation ($4.8 million) and other sources ($4.6 million). In 1992, the Foundation received contributions totalling $8 million from 40 countries.

UN Habitat and Human Settlements Foundation

Income for the Foundation for the biennium ended 31 December 1991(11) amounted to $15,889,460, while expenditures totalled $17,187,260, resulting in a deficit of $1,297,800. The Board of Auditors noted overspending of allotments issued for contractual services, the untimely review of unliquidated obligations, restrictive procurement practices in the award of publications contracts to local printers, lack of prompt updating of project records, delays in the closing of operationally completed projects, the lack of a centralized roster of consultants, the lack of effective procedures for recording and monitoring non-expendable property, and long delays in the liquidation of travel advances. The Board recommended that: expenditures on contractual services should be kept within appropriations through effective monitoring; stringent procedures should be introduced to ensure adequate control of non-expendable property; competition for publications contracts should be encouraged among the identified local printers; the systematic use of a centralized roster of consultants by all units should be enforced; project implementation should be further improved through adequate record-keeping and the timely closure of completed projects; and regular reviews of unliquidated obligations should be conducted.

In an October report,(12) ACABQ considered the Board of Auditors' report and reviewed the Administration's responses to its recommendations.

Chapter X

Human rights

In 1992, the United Nations continued its efforts to promote and protect universally recognized human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The General Assembly, in December, proclaimed the Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance as a set of principles for all States (resolution 47/133) and adopted the Declaration on the Rights of Persons Belonging to National or Ethnic, Religious and Linguistic Minorities (47/135).

On 10 December 1992 (Human Rights Day), the International Year of the World's Indigenous People (1993) was launched under the theme "Indigenous people—a new partnership". The Working Group on Indigenous Populations continued work on the draft declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples. Elaboration of the declaration on the right and responsibility of individuals, groups and organs of society to promote and protect universally recognized human rights and fundamental freedoms moved forward. In March, the Commission on Human Rights established a working group to elaborate a draft optional protocol to the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, which would establish a system of visits to places of detention.

Alleged violations of human rights on a large scale in several countries were again examined. During 1992, the Commission held two special sessions (13 and 14 August 1992, 30 November and 1 December) to consider the situation of human rights in the former Yugoslavia, as well as its forty-eighth session (27 January-6 March). Its Subcommission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities held its forty-fourth session (3-28 August).

Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination (1983-1993)

Implementation of the Programme for the Decade

In 1992, United Nations efforts to implement the Programme of Action for the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination continued to be carried out in accordance with the plan of activities for 1985-1989 put forward in 1984(1) and the plan approved by the General Assembly in 1987,(2) covering the remainder of the Decade, 1990-1993.

Reports of the Secretary-General. In response to a 1991 request of the Commission on Human Rights,(3) the Secretary-General, in January 1992,(4) reported on progress made in carrying out the plan of activities. He described action taken by United Nations bodies, coordination of United Nations activities under the Decade, seminars, training courses and workshops, the status of the Trust Fund for the Programme for the Decade and the implementation of activities for the Decade, including seminars, publications, studies and future activities.

In accordance with Economic and Social Council requests of 1985(5) and 1991,(6) the Secretary-General submitted in June 1992,(7) his annual report summarizing activities carried out or planned by Governments, United Nations bodies, specialized agencies, and regional, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) to achieve the Decade's objectives.

As requested by the Council in resolution 1992/13 of 20 July (see below), the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly in September a report on the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade and a draft programme of action for a third decade (1993-2003).(8) He stated that the activities that were not completed for the second half of the Second Decade owing to a lack of resources could be integrated into the proposed programme for a third decade. It was suggested that the goals and objectives of the third decade be those adopted by the Assembly in 1973 for the first Decade.(9) The elements for the programme of action for the third decade were: action to combat apartheid; action to combat racism and racial discrimination at the international, national and regional levels; basic research and studies on racism and racial discrimination; coordination of and reporting on the implementation of the programme and evaluation of its activities; and annual consultations between the United Nations, specialized agencies and NGOs to review and plan decade-related activities. Annexed to the Secretary-General's report was a table showing the status of government contributions to the Trust Fund for the Programme for the Second Decade as at 7 August 1991.

Human Rights Commission action. On 21 February 1992,(10) the Commission commended all States that had ratified or acceded to the international instruments relevant to the Decade and appealed to others to do the same. It asked Governments., international organizations and NGOs to increase and intensify their activities to combat racism, racial discrimination and apartheid and appealed for generous contributions to the Trust Fund. Within the 1990-1993 plan of activities, the Commission recalled having selected as its topic for 1992 the treatment of political prisoners and detainees in South Africa, particularly women and children; it decided that a global study on the extent of dissemination of the 1965 International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination(11) would be its topic for 1993.

The Commission recommended that the General Assembly take steps to launch a third decade, to begin in 1993, and asked the Secretary-General to finalize the text of the model legislation to guide Governments in enacting further legislation against racial discrimination and the handbook of recourse procedures for victims of racial discrimination and to publish and distribute those texts. It welcomed the publication of the global compilation of national legislation against racism and racial discrimination(12) and asked the Secretary-General to transmit it to Governments as soon as possible. The Commission also asked him to continue to keep it informed of measures taken to ensure that resources for implementing the Second Decade's activities were included in the proposed 1992-1993 budget and to inform it in 1993 of progress made in carrying out the 1992-1993 plan of activities. It took note of the report of a 1991 meeting of experts to review the experience of countries in the operation of schemes of internal self-government for indigenous peoples,(13) and asked the Secretary-General to continue to study the effects of racial discrimination on children of minorities, particularly migrant workers, in the areas of education, training and employment, and to submit recommendations on measures to combat those effects.

Subcommission action. On 21 August 1992,(14) the Subcommission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities took note of a July report by the Secretary-General(15) describing current trends in racism, racial discrimination, intolerance and xenophobia and decided to submit it to the Commission in 1993. It recommended that the General Assembly take steps to launch a third decade to combat racism and racial discrimination, beginning in 1993, and that the Commission appoint a special rapporteur to address contemporary forms of racism, racial discrimination and xenophobia.

Other action. In August,(16) the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination requested the Centre for Human Rights to revise the 1991 draft model legislation to guide Governments in enacting legislation against racial discrimination in view of comments made by its members, and to present the revised draft in 1993. The Committee appointed a working group to consider measures to ensure that legal remedies were effective in reducing discrimination and exchanged views on a possible third decade to combat racism and racial discrimination.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 30 July 1992, the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of its Social Committee, adopted resolution 1992/13 without vote.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committee, adopted resolution 47/77 without vote.

Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its objective set forth in the Charter of the United Nations to achieve international cooperation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural or humanitarian character and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion,

Reaffirming also its firm determination and its commitment to eradicate totally and unconditionally racism in all its forms, racial discrimination and apartheid,

Recalling the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid, and the Convention against Discrimination in Education adopted by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization on 14 December 1960,

Recalling also its resolution 3057(XXVIII) of 2 November 1973, on the first Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, and its resolution 38/14 of 22 November 1983, on the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination,

Recalling further the two World Conferences to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, held at Geneva in 1978 and 1983,

Bearing in mind the Report of the Second World Conference to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination,

Convinced that the Second World Conference represented a positive contribution by the international community towards attaining the objectives of the Decade, through its adoption of a Declaration and an operational Programme of Action for the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination,

Noting with grave concern that despite the efforts of the international community, the principal objectives of the two Decades for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination have not been attained and that millions of human beings continue to this day to be the victims of varied forms of racism, racial discrimination and apartheid,

Deeply concerned about the current trend of the evolution of racism into discriminatory practices based on culture, nationality, religion or language,

Recalling, in particular, its resolution 46/85 of 16 December 1991,

Emphasizing once again the necessity of attaining all the objectives of the Second Decade,

Having considered the report submitted by the Secretary-General within the framework of the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade,

Firmly convinced of the need to take more effective and sustained international measures for the elimination of all forms of racism and racial discrimination and the total eradication of apartheid in South Africa,

Recognizing the importance of strengthening, where necessary, national legislation and institutions for the promotion of racial harmony,

Aware of the importance and the magnitude of the phenomenon of migrant workers, as well as the efforts undertaken by the international community to improve the protection of the human rights of migrant workers and members of their families,

Recalling the adoption at its forty-fifth session of the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families,

Reaffirming the Declaration on Apartheid and its Destructive Consequences in Southern Africa, unanimously adopted by the General Assembly at its sixteenth special session, on 14 December 1989, which offers guidelines on how to end apartheid,

1. Declares once again that all forms of racism and racial discrimination, particularly in their institutionalized form, such as apartheid, or resulting from official doctrines of racial superiority or exclusivity, are among the most serious violations of human rights in the contemporary world and must be combated by all available means;

2. Urges all Governments to take all necessary measures to combat new forms of racism, in particular by ongoing adjustment of the methods used to combat them;

3. Decides that the international community, in general, and the United Nations, in particular, should continue to give the highest priority to programmes for combating racism, racial discrimination and apartheid and intensify their efforts, during the latter part of the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, to provide assistance and relief to the victims of racism and all forms of racial discrimination and apartheid;

4. Appeals to all Governments and to international and non-governmental organizations to increase and intensify their activities to combat racism, racial discrimination and apartheid and to provide relief and assistance to the victims of these evils;

5. Notes and commends the efforts made to coordinate all the programmes currently under implementation by the United Nations system that relate to the objectives of the Second Decade, and encourages the Coordinator for the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination to continue his efforts;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to accord special attention to the situation of migrant workers and members of their families and to include regularly in his reports all information on such workers;

7. Calls upon all Member States to consider signing and ratifying or acceding to the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families as a matter of priority, to enable its early entry into force;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to continue the study on the effects of racial discrimination on the children of minorities, in particular those of migrant workers, in the field of education, training and employment, and to submit, inter alia specific recommendations for the implementation of measures to combat the effects of that discrimination;

9. Also requests the Secretary-General to revise and finalize the draft model legislation for the guidance of Governments in the enactment of further legislation against racial discrimination, in the light of comments made by members of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination at its fortieth and forty-first sessions and to publish and distribute the text as soon as possible;

10. Renews its invitation to the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to expedite the preparation of teaching materials and teaching aids to promote teaching, training and education activities on human rights and against racism and racial discrimination, with particular emphasis on activities at the primary and secondary levels of education;

11. Considers once again that all the parts of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination should be given equal attention in order to attain the objectives of the Second Decade;

12. Regrets that most of the activities scheduled for the period 1992-1993 have not been implemented because of lack of adequate resources;

13. Calls upon the international community to provide the Secretary-General with appropriate financial resources for efficient action against racism and racial discrimination;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to accord the highest priority to activities of a programme of action for a third decade to combat racism and racial discrimination, aiming at monitoring the transition from apartheid to a non-racist society in South Africa;

15. Also requests the Secretary-General, pursuant to General Assembly resolutions 42/47 of 30 November

1987, 44/52 of 8 December 1989 and 45/105 of 14 December 1990, to ensure that the necessary and additional resources are included in the programme budget for the biennium 1992-1993 to provide for the implementation of the activities of the Second Decade;

16. Further requests the Secretary-General to continue to accord the highest priority, in executing the plan of activities, to measures for combating apartheid;

17. Calls upon Governments to encourage further positive change in South Africa based on the guidelines set out in the Declaration on Apartheid and its Destructive Consequences in Southern Africa, in particular by maintaining effective and sustained international pressure against South Africa;

18. Invites all Governments, United Nations bodies, the specialized agencies and other intergovernmental organizations, as well as interested non-governmental organizations in consultative status with the Economic and Social Council, to participate fully in the activities scheduled for the period 1990-1993 which have not yet been carried out;

19. Considers that voluntary contributions to the Trust Fund for the Programme for the Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination are indispensable for the implementation of the above-mentioned programmes;

20. Notes with regret that, since its establishment, contributions to the Fund have been scarce despite repeated appeals by the Secretary-General;

21. Strongly appeals, therefore, to all Governments, organizations and individuals in a position to do so to contribute generously to the Fund, and to this end requests the Secretary-General to continue to undertake appropriate contacts and initiatives to encourage contributions;

22. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade and the launching of a third decade to combat racism and racial discrimination, and requests him to prepare a draft programme of action for the third decade and to submit it to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session, taking into account, inter alia, the elements of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade that have not yet been implemented;

23. Invites the Commission on Human Rights at its forty-ninth session to recommend activities to be undertaken during the third decade to combat racism and racial discrimination;

24. Decides to keep the item entitled "Elimination of racism and racial discrimination" on its agenda and to consider it as a matter of highest priority at its forty-eighth session.

Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination

Accessions and ratifications

As at 31 December 1992,(17) there were 133 parties to the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, adopted by the General Assembly in 1965(11) and in force since 1969.(18) Croatia, Latvia and Slovenia became parties during 1992.

The Commission on Human Rights, in February,(10) appealed to those States that had not done so to ratify, accede to and implement the Convention, among other international instruments to combat racism.

In September,(19) the Secretary-General reported to the Assembly on the status of the Convention as at 14 August 1992.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Third Committee, adopted resolution 47/78 without vote.

Status of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination

The General Assembly,

Recalling its relevant resolutions adopted since 1973, the most recent of which is resolution 45/89 of 14 December 1990,

Expressing its satisfaction once again at the entry into force, on 3 December 1982, of the competence of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination to receive and consider communications from individuals or groups of individuals under article 14 of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination,

Bearing in mind the decision taken at the Fourteenth Meeting of States Parties to the Convention on 15 January 1992 to amend paragraph 6 of article 8 of the Convention and to add a new paragraph as paragraph 7 of article 8, by which the members of the Committee established under the Convention would henceforth receive emoluments from United Nations resources on such terms and conditions as may be decided by the General Assembly,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the status of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination;

2. Expresses its satisfaction at the number of States that have ratified the Convention or acceded thereto;

3. Reaffirms once again its conviction that ratification of or accession to the Convention on a universal basis and implementation of its provisions are necessary for the realization of the objectives of the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination and for action beyond the Decade;

4. Requests those States which have not yet become parties to the Convention to ratify it or accede thereto;

5. Requests the States parties to the Convention to consider the possibility of making the declaration provided for in article 14 of the Convention;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its forty-ninth session a report concerning the status of the Convention, in accordance with Assembly resolution 2106 A (XX) of 21 December 1965.

Implementation of the Convention

The Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD), set up under article 8 of the Convention, held its forty-first session at Geneva from 3 to 14 August 1992.⁽¹⁶⁾ The Committee, which normally held two three-week sessions annually, cancelled its session scheduled for March 1992 and curtailed its August session to two weeks owing to the critical financial situation arising from the non-payment of assessed contributions by a number of States parties.

Most of CERD's work was devoted to examining reports submitted by States parties on measures taken to implement the Convention's provisions. Under article 9 of the Convention, it considered the updated reports of Austria, Bangladesh, Belgium, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ghana, Greece, Maldives and Yemen. The review of the implementation of the Convention by Botswana, Cape Verde, Lesotho, Papua New Guinea, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Solomon Islands and Viet Nam, whose last reports had been submitted in 1983, was based on their previous reports. The same applied to Burkina Faso and the Lao People's Democratic Republic, from which no reports had been received since 1984. At the request of Somalia, the Committee decided to defer consideration of the Convention's implementation there for one year. Consideration of the eleventh and twelfth periodic reports of Ecuador and the seventh periodic report of the Republic of Korea was postponed until 1993 at their request. States parties were urged to fulfil their reporting obligations as soon as possible and reminded that they could request technical assistance from the United Nations Centre for Human Rights in preparing their reports.

In its report,⁽¹⁶⁾ CERD provided a summary of its members' views on each country report and of statements made by the States parties concerned. Regarding reporting obligations under article 9, the Committee requested the Secretary-General to continue sending reminders to States parties from which two or more reports were due but had not been received before 14 August—the closing date of its session—asking them to submit their reports by 31 December 1992. Also in accordance with article 9, the Committee, on 12 August, requested further information by 1 March 1993 from Burundi⁽²⁰⁾ and Rwanda,⁽²¹⁾ where continuing ethnic conflict was cause for concern. It also requested further information from Papua New Guinea on the situation in Bougainville (for details on the situation in Bougainville, see below, under "Human rights violations").

The Committee also considered, in conformity with article 14, communications from individuals or groups of individuals claiming violation of their rights under the Convention by a State party recognizing CERD competence to receive and consider such communications. Sixteen States parties—Algeria, Costa Rica, Denmark, Ecuador, France, Hungary, Iceland, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Peru, the Russian Federation, Senegal, Sweden, Ukraine and Uruguay—had declared such recognition. In 1992, the Committee decided to send two communications before it to the States parties concerned for information and observations.

CERD also considered activities to implement the Programme of Action for the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination (see above).

Owing to a lack of time, the Committee did not consider petitions and other information relating to Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories (see PART FOUR, Chapter I) in accordance with article 15 of the Convention.

Concerning a special session of the Commission on Human Rights, being convened to consider developments in the former Yugoslavia (see below, under "Human rights violations"), the Committee approved a letter to the Commission's Chairman, stating its readiness to cooperate in ending human rights violations and human suffering and providing protection for civilians within the mandate entrusted to it by the Convention.

The fourteenth meeting of the States parties was held on 15 January 1992 in New York and, as requested by the General Assembly in 1991,⁽²²⁾ considered an amendment proposed by Australia in respect of article 8, paragraph 6, of the Convention, by which States parties were responsible for the expenses of CERD members while they were performing CERD duties. The States parties adopted the proposed amendment,⁽²³⁾ replacing paragraph 6 with a paragraph stating that the Secretary-General would provide the necessary staff and facilities for the effective performance of the functions of the Committee under the Convention, and adding a new paragraph, stating that CERD members would, with the approval of the General Assembly, receive emoluments from United Nations resources on the terms and conditions decided by the Assembly. In addition, the States parties recommended that the Assembly approve the amendment in 1992 and decided that it would enter into force when approved by the Assembly and accepted by a two-thirds majority of States parties.

In a January note to the meeting of the States parties,⁽²⁴⁾ the Secretary-General stated that the delayed payment or non-payment of financial assessments by a significant number of States parties had seriously impeded the functioning of CERD for several years and had given rise to concern about the Committee's ability to carry out its responsibilities efficiently. In October,(25) he informed the Assembly that, as at 31 August 1992, outstanding assessments and arrears totalled $195,288 from 76 States. Annexed to the report was a list of States parties and assessments outstanding as at 31 August and the text of the decision adopted by the States parties on amending article 8.

On 21 February,(26) the Commission on Human Rights asked meetings of States parties to consider ways to strengthen the collection of contributions and to make procedures more effective, and, if necessary, to reconsider the position of States parties that were substantially in default on their assessed contributions.

ticle 8, by which the members of the Committee established under the Convention would henceforth receive emoluments from United Nations resources on such terms and conditions as may be decided by the General Assembly, and aware of the need to consider that decision during its forty-seventh session,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the financial situation of the Committee,
