Page 8, paragraph 33, should read as follows:

33. Another area requiring attention was environmental cost accounting. Most cost (management) accounting systems accounted for costs usually borne by the firms – and not for the external costs. Therefore, it was important to get a good system in place, as more and more of those external costs became internalized through growing obligations. It was difficult to identify best practices, but that might be an area for useful prototype work in the future.
