On 16 April [E/1997/23 (dec. 1997/121)], the Commission decided to retain the item on its agenda, on the understanding that actions required by previous resolutions would continue to remain operative, including its request to the Secretary-General to report on their implementation.

The former Yugoslavia

By a 5 March letter [E/CN.4/1997/118], the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) (FRY) transmitted to the Commission on Human Rights its comments on the Special Rapporteur's October 1996 report on the human rights situation in the former Yugoslavia [YUN 1996, p. 708] and on her 1996 special report on minorities in FRY [ibid., p. 709].

Commission action. On 15 April [res. 1997/57], the Commission on Human Rights reaffirmed in the strongest terms its previous condemnations of past human rights violations in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, FRY and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (FYROM) and expressed its concern over continuing human rights violations within those countries and delays in fully implementing the human rights provisions of the 1995 Peace Agreement [YUN 1995, p. 544] (see also PART ONE, Chapter V). It called on all States and parties to the Peace Agreement to cooperate with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 (see PART FOUR, Chapter II), established by the Security Council in 1993 [YUN 1993, p. 440], and urged all States and the Secretary-General to support the Tribunal.

The Commission called on the authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina to comply with the human rights provisions of the country's Constitution, to prevent human rights violations and to ensure that persons under their control who committed violations were held accountable. The Government of Croatia was asked to make greater efforts to adhere to democratic principles and the highest level of standards of human rights and fundamental freedoms and to respect the protection of free and independent media. The Commission called on the Government of FRY to make greater efforts to institute and implement democratic norms, especially regarding respect for the principle of free and fair elections and protection of free and independent media, and to ensure full respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. It reminded FRY of its responsibility to investigate enforced disappearances, to enhance its cooperation with Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina in tracing missing persons and to provide complete and precise information on the subject.

Regarding missing persons, the Commission, considering the resignation of the expert member of the Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances responsible for the special process on missing persons in the territory of the former Yugoslavia (see PART TWO, Chapter II), asked the Special Rapporteur to act on behalf of the United Nations in dealing with those missing and to report to the Commission thereon.

The Commission made a number of requests to the Special Rapporteur concerning her work, which were approved by the Economic and Social Council in decision 1997/266 (see below). The Commission extended the Special Rapporteur's mandate for another year and asked her to submit periodic reports to the General Assembly. The Secretary-General was asked to continue to make the Special Rapporteur's reports available to the Security Council and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), and urged him to assist her. The Commission decided to discontinue consideration of the human rights situation in FYROM, unless the Special Rapporteur recommended otherwise.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July [meeting 38], the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of the Commission on Human Rights [E/1997/23], adopted decision 1997/266 without vote [agenda item 7 (d)].

Situation of human rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)

At its 38th plenary meeting, on 22 July 1997, the Economic and Social Council, taking note of Commission on Human Rights resolution 1997/57 of 15 April 1997:

(a) Approved the Commission's request to the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on the situation of human rights in the territories of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), in addition to the activities mandated in Commission resolutions 1994/72 of 9 March 1994 and 1996/71 of 23 April 1996:

- (i) To focus her future activities on the prevention and reporting of violations of, and lack of action to protect, all human rights and fundamental freedoms by governmental authorities, particularly violations that exacerbate ethnic tension, and on protecting the rights of persons belonging to minorities, women and vulnerable groups such as children and the elderly, particularly their right to return to their homes in safety and dignity;
- (ii) To continue to support the efforts of the High Representative for Implementation of the Peace Agreement on Bosnia and Herzegovina to report on the implementation of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement") by exchanging information and advice on the human rights situation in the territories covered by her mandate with the High Representative, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and other competent organizations, and by providing to the High Representative her recommendations concerning compliance with the human rights elements of the Peace Agreement;
- (iii) To contribute to the efforts for the building of democratic institutions and the improvement of the administration of justice, for the prevention and reporting of violations by civil authorities, particularly violations that exacerbate ethnic tension, and for the protection of the rights of persons belonging to minorities, women and vulnerable groups such as children and the elderly, particularly their right to return to their homes in safety and dignity;
- (iv) To act on behalf of the United Nations in dealing with the question of the missing, including through participation in the Expert Group on Exhumation and Missing Persons of the Office of the High Representative and the Working Group on the Process for Tracing Persons Unaccounted For, chaired by the International Committee of the Red Cross, and attendance at meetings of the International Commission on Missing Persons in the Former Yugoslavia, to contribute to a smooth transition between the mandate of the expert for the special process and the organizations to which his functions are to be transferred, and to report to the Commission on Human Rights about activities concerning missing persons in the former Yugoslavia;
- (v) To provide the Commission at its fifty-fourth session with her overview of the human rights situation in the territories covered by her mandate, as requested in Commission resolution 1996/71;

(b) Endorsed the Commission's decision to extend the mandate of the Special Rapporteur for one year, as revised in Commission resolution 1997/57, and its request that she continue her vital efforts, especially by continuing to carry out missions to Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia, including Eastern Sla-vonja, Baranja and Western Sirmium, and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), including to Kosovo, as well as to Sandjak and Vojvodina, and that she continue to submit periodic reports to the General Assembly and the Commission on Human Rights;

(c) Also endorsed the Commission's decision:

- (i) To request the Special Rapporteur to submit a final report on the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia to the Commission no later than 30 September 1997 and, unless the Special Rapporteur recommends otherwise in her report, to discontinue its consideration of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia upon delivery of that report;
- (ii) To request the Secretary-General to continue to make the reports of the Special Rapporteur available to the Security Council and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe;
- (iii) To urge the Secretary-General to make available, from within existing resources, all necessary resources for the Special Rapporteur to carry out her mandate successfully and, in particular, to provide her with adequate staff based in the territories covered by her mandate to ensure effective continuous monitoring of the human rights situation there and coordination with other international organizations involved.

Reports of Special Rapporteur. In an October report [E/CN.4/1998/13], Special Rapporteur Elizabeth Rehn (Finland) reported on the human rights developments from January to September in Bosnia and Herzegovina, which comprised two entities, the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Republika Srpska. She conducted three missions to the country in March, July and August/September.

The Special Rapporteur described political developments and noted that progress made in implementing the human rights provisions of the 1995 Peace Agreement had been far from satisfying. The same was true of the Agreement's other non-military aspects (for political aspects, see PART ONE, Chapter V). Under the Agreement, Bosnia and Herzegovina was bound by 21 international human rights instruments, and three national institutions dealing with human rights issues were established: the Human Rights Ombudsman and the Human Rights Chamber (which constituted the Commission on Human Rights), and the Commission for Real Property Claims. All three institutions and the office of the Federation Ombudsmen, established in 1994, had been hampered in their work by a low level of cooperation from the authorities. In addition, the Constitution provided for a Federation Human Rights Court, which had not yet started to function. The situation of the judiciary in both entities that made up the country was characterized by problems inherent in an ethnically divided State and a justice system in transition. Regarding criminal law, in January the Federation established an expert team which presented a draft code of criminal procedure and a criminal code complying with the minimum requirements of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. In the Republika Srpska, pre-war criminal and criminal procedure codes were still applicable.

As to human rights violations, the right to life was endangered because of a slow demining process, reports of ethnically motivated killings and the use of the death penalty. The right to liberty and security of person continued to be jeopardized by police involvement in beatings. Illegal arrests and detentions continued to occur. Within the legal system, the right to a fair trial had not been satisfactorily implemented and the principle of an independent judiciary had not been achieved. A large number of war criminals enjoyed impunity, with a number of them holding positions of power. Although some improvements were noted concerning respect for freedom of movement, serious restrictions remained. There were obstacles to the right to return, including violence against returnees and their properties, as well as administrative measures such as illegal demands for visas and taxes. Legal regulations affecting occupancy rights and the right to private property were among factors preventing the return of refugees and displaced persons. Freedom of expression was seriously restricted. Regarding missing persons, the parties had failed to respect their obligations to take all possible measures to determine the fate of the missing. Although there had been positive developments in restructuring the police in the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, a similar agreement had not been reached in Republika Srpska.

The Special Rapporteur recommended that the Government: accelerate the demining process, eliminate the death penalty and revoke all death sentences; try and prosecute police officials, with proceedings to be monitored by the international community; release those detained without legal grounds; order retrials where the rights of the defendant were violated; change the procedures for appointing judges in order to ensure judicial independence; arrest and extradite to The Hague those indicted for war crimes by the International Tribunal, with the international Stabilization Force intensifying its efforts to apprehend those indicted; cease all practices that limited freedom of movement, adopt a uniform car-registration system and punish law enforcement officials responsible for violating freedom of movement; facilitate the return of people to their homes; amend property laws; end pressure on the media and broaden telecommunications links between the entities; involve the International Police Task Force (IPTF) in exhumation activities; establish strict control of the prisons, including inspections by qualified inspectors and systematic registration of detainees; resolve outstanding issues in the Federation to enable a restructured police force to start functioning efficiently, and entry by Republika Srpska into a restructuring agreement with IPTF; support human rights institutions and comply with their findings and recommendations; comply with reporting obligations to UN treaty bodies; and adopt a law covering NGOs and remove provisions hampering their activities. The international community was asked to provide more support to conduct exhumations and identifications and to place additional pressure on parties to conduct exhumations. International agencies were urged to establish an efficient and transparent mechanism to respond systematically to allegations of secret detention. The Special Rapporteur proposed that the Security Council consider further strengthening the IPTF mandate by expanding its authority to impose sanctions for non-compliance with its recommendations.

Annexed to the report was a review of the Special Rapporteur's past recommendations and an assessment of their implementation between 3 November 1995 and 29 January 1997. She noted that overall the human rights situation had improved but that institutional paralysis and a lack of political will had prevented its positive evolution. All parties had re-committed themselves to the protection and promotion of human rights, but implementation had to take place without delay.

Also in October, the Special Rapporteur reported on the human rights situation in Croatia [E/CN.4/1998/14], covering the period from January to September 1997 and based on four fact-finding missions to the country. Major human rights concerns relating to the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (henceforth called "the Region"), still under UN administration at the time of the report, were included.

The security situation in the former Sectors North, South and West remained unstable, and acts of looting, harassment, discrimination and killings, sometimes by explosive devices, continued to be reported. The ongoing violence remained one of the main impediments to the return of Croatian Serb refugees and displaced persons. There had been minimal progress on returns. The situation in the former Sectors was aggravated by difficult economic circumstances, especially for Croatian Serbs who were often victims of discriminatory practices. Despite the establishment of bilateral commissions, little progress had been achieved in establishing the fate of missing persons. The Special Rapporteur had been informed of possible measures that could indicate a weakening of judicial independence; she called on the authorities to ensure that competent judges were never dismissed because of their political opinion or ethnicity. As to freedom of the media, she expressed concern about continuing publication of materials advocating nationality-based hatred; the Government had to show clearer support for social reconciliation in its statements to the media. The Special Rapporteur recommended that the Croatian police further increase its activity in the former Sectors to restore law and order. She urged the immediate suspension of the Law on the Temporary Takeover and Administration of Specified Property, and urged the Government and local housing commissions to accelerate the return of Croatian Serbs to their homes or to ensure just compensation where such return was not possible. Missing persons should be dealt with as a top priority.

In the Region, some progress had been made regarding its reintegration into Croatia but many obstacles remained. The Special Rapporteur recommended the cessation of discrimination against ethnic Serbs by Croatian officials, the continuation of reconstruction, and implementation of legislation regarding reintegration of the local judiciary. With the mandate of the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (UN-TAES) possibly coming to an end, she urged the deployment of an international presence, including the possible participation of the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, OSCE, the Council of Europe and other international organizations.

The Special Rapporteur hoped for the early initiation of a technical cooperation project planned by the Office of the High Commissioner in consultation with the Government of Croatia that would emphasize human rights training for professionals involved in law enforcement and the rule of law, as well as universal human rights education.

In another October report [E/CN.4/1998/15], the Special Rapporteur considered human rights developments in FRY from January to September 1997; she had conducted three missions to the country during that period. The Special Rapporteur continued to receive reports of torture and ill-treatment, of which the most serious came from Kosovo. Prosecutions against police for such practices were extremely rare. On the other hand, Montenegro appeared to pursue an active policy against perpetrators of police abuse. As to the administration of justice, judges were appointed for a life term by a parliamentary panel, from a list drawn up by the Ministry of Justice. In Serbia, a new draft law, if adopted, would draw judges and legal experts into the nomination procedure, thereby enhancing potential for an independent judiciary. Fair trial standards were particularly at risk in cases connected with political activities and access to lawyers was a major problem. In reviewing the situation of freedom of expression and the media, the Special Rapporteur noted that, by July, 77 radio and television stations, privately owned or owned by local municipalities, had been closed by the Government. The vast majority of them had operated in cities where opposition parties had won local elections.

Regarding the situation of minorities, the Special Rapporteur focused on the areas of Kosovo, Sandzak, Vojvodina and Montenegro. She continued to receive reports of serious ill-treatment and torture committed in Kosovo against persons in police custody and had also received allegations of "hostage" arrests, in which the police had detained relatives or family members of persons being sought by the police. Violent attacks against Serbian police and persons employed by the local authorities in Kosovo continued. Regarding repatriation, under an agreement between FRY and Germany on the return of rejected asylum seekers and other persons without legal residence, concluded at the end of 1996, as at 31 July 1997, 1,600 persons had been forcibly repatriated, some 90 per cent of them Albanians from Kosovo. The agreement included a human rights clause, under which returns were to be carried out with respect for the returnees' human rights and dignity. The return programme had proceeded without serious incidents but there were reports that the returnees had been verbally abused or summoned for "informative talks" by the police, while others had been temporarily detained upon arrival. The Government of Switzerland concluded a similar agreement with FRY in July, which provided for the repatriation of some 12,000 FRY citizens, almost all Kosovo Albanians, whose applications for political asylum had been rejected. Inequalities existed in the right to education for Kosovo Albanians, and ethnic Albanians and other minorities faced discrimination in property transactions.

In the Sandzak area, the security situation had improved in recent years. However, the Special Rapporteur was informed of some violent attacks against Muslims in early 1997. A long-standing issue in Sandzak was the situation of internally displaced persons in Pljevlja and Priboj. While the majority of the families in Pljevlja appeared to have left due to fear of the war in neighbouring Bosnia and Herzegovina, some were forced to leave because of violence and harassment, mainly by Bosnian Serb army and paramilitary units passing through the area. However, reservists of the Yugoslav National Army were also said to bear responsibility for some of those acts. Homes left behind by the fleeing Muslims were badly damaged by the military and looting neighbours. A group of 217 internally displaced persons in Priboj was still waiting to return to their homes in the Sjeverin-Kukurovici area. The majority of them felt that the Serbian authorities had not taken adequate measures to make their return home safe.

In the northern province of Vojvodina, minority groups encountered problems of representation in public offices and companies, the use of minority languages in official matters and education, as well as refugee settlement in the region. There were reports of "informative talks" with the State Security Service, which included verbal abuse and threats. In Montenegro, minority problems involved the Roma community.

Major humanitarian problems existed throughout FRY, with large parts of the population struggling for survival in a depleted post-war economy. Educational, health and other public sector staff faced delayed salary payments and had increasingly resorted to strikes. The situation of refugees, 561,000 of whom were officially registered, had not improved. Food aid for refugees, mostly from foreign sources, was drastically cut during the year. Only a small number of refugees had been able to return to their homes from FRY. UNHCR reported that, as at the end of August 1997, only 959 refugees had been repatriated to Bosnia and Herzegovina and no more than 1,030 to Croatia.

The Special Rapporteur recommended that the Government should review her previous recommendations, most of which had gone unimplemented. In particular, the Government should: ratify the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, contained in Assembly resolution 2200 A (XXI) [YUN 1966, p. 431]; create an accessible, independent and impartial supervisory institution, such as an ombudsman; establish a programme of human rights education in schools and academic and legal institutions, as well as police training institutions; revise the current legal system; grant lawyers prompt access to their clients after arrest; ensure that procedural requirements in criminal and administrative law were enforced; bring to justice those responsible for torturing or ill-treating persons in custody and those who had ordered or participated in using force against peaceful demonstrators in early 1997; end police abuse in Kosovo; ensure the independence of the judiciary; and create conditions for the free and safe return of refugees and the return of their property or just compensation. The Special Rapporteur urged all parties to find peaceful means to solve the problems in Kosovo and recommended that the Government investigate acts of violence or vandalism directed against the Muslim community in Sandzak. The Government of Serbia should permit all major political parties access to State-run television and should provide conditions for balanced reporting on their activities.

Communications. In a 25 March letter [E/CN.4/1998/152], the Government of FRY presented its comments on sections of the Special Rapporteur's report to the Commission on Human Rights. It expressed surprise that the Special Rapporteur had complained of unsatisfactory cooperation from FRY authorities, drawing attention to the fact that federal and republican authorities had offered maximum assistance.

In a joint letter [E/CN.4/1998/171] regarding the Special Rapporteur's report on the human rights situation in FRY, Bosnia and Herzegovina, on behalf of itself, Croatia, FYROM and Slovenia, stated that the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had ceased to exist and that FRY, as a new State, could not automatically continue the membership of the former State in the United Nations. All States that had emerged from the dissolved predecessor State had equal succeeding rights and legal status, including legal status regarding international instruments. Consequently, FRY should give notification of its succession to all relevant international instruments, including human rights instruments.

Periodic and final reports of Special Rapporteur. By an October note [A/52/490], the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly, the Security Council and OSCE a periodic report prepared by the Special Rapporteur, which was an abridged version of the separate country reports on Bosnia and Herzegovina [E/CN.4/1998/13], Croatia [E/CN.4/1998/14] and FRY [E/CN.4/1998/15] (see above).

In her final report [E/CN.4/1998/63], the Special Rapporteur described the main achievements made in the area of human rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and FRY since 1995 when she accepted the position of Special Rapporteur. She also indicated the problems remaining. Her appointment as the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in Bosnia and Herzegovina would become effective on 16 January 1998.

The return of some 2 million people from Bosnia and Herzegovina who were refugees or internally displaced had been slow and difficult. Since 1995, some 400,000 refugees and displaced persons had returned, including 110,000 from abroad. However, it was estimated that over 600,000 Bosnians remained abroad and over 800,000 were still displaced. Those returns were mostly majority returns. Suitable conditions for minority returns needed to be ensured, including respect for freedom of movement and general respect for human rights. Further improvement in the human rights situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina would require the restructuring of the local police and the reform of the judiciary. The process for establishing the cantonal judicial structure in the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina was nearing completion. However, judicial appointments continued to be based on ethnic or political criteria rather than on professional merit. Progress had been made in the Federation in bringing its criminal legislation into general compliance with the standards of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and its Protocols. The Special Rapporteur drew attention to the plight of the families of the nearly 20,000 persons estimated to be missing in Bosnia and Herzegovina. She stressed that those guilty of war crimes should be brought to justice.

While still more needed to be accomplished in Croatia, there were good reasons for optimism, said the Special Rapporteur. According to recent information received from the Government, as at October 1997 a total of 5,580 criminal proceedings had been carried out in relation to military operations in the former Sectors North and South, of which 559 were at the investigative stage, 3,785 were in the first instance proceedings, and 1,236 had been brought through to final decisions. Incidents of violence against remaining Croatian Serbs in the former Sectors gradually decreased. The Region would be the last of the former Sectors to revert to Croatian government control, on 15 January 1998, when the mandate of UNTAES would come to an end. The question of returns continued to be a contentious issue in Croatia. Factors inhibiting returns had been not only bureaucratic but had also stemmed from legal and financial obstacles to the recovery of property, as well as the occupation of homes by newly arrived Croat immigrants, unrealistic government deadlines for Croatian Serbs to apply for reconstruction assistance, delays in funding for reconstruction, and the dire economic situation of the former Sectors. The failure to resolve the issue of property rights had been a major obstacle to return. Concern also remained over discriminatory practices applied in granting Croatian citizenship papers, and discrimination by employers against Croatian Serbs continued to be reported. Identifying the fate of some 2,000 missing persons was one of the most urgent humanitarian problems facing Croatia. The extent of mine contamination in Croatia was enormous and presented the serious threat of many deaths and injuries. Regarding other humanitarian and social issues, the Government had restored basic infrastructure such as electricity and water systems, although imbalances remained in providing reconstruction assistance for destroyed houses, with priority still given to ethnic Croats. On the positive side, Croatia had signed various human rights instruments and had strengthened the office of the Croatian Ombudsman. Late in the year, Croatia surrendered to the International Criminal Tribunal 10 war-crime suspects who had been indicted for alleged involvement in atrocities committed in central Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1993.

With respect to FRY, the Special Rapporteur was concerned that the Government had still not authorized the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights to establish an office in Pristina. An office had been opened in Belgrade in 1996[YUN1996,p.715],buttheneedforsuchapresence in Pristina was becoming increasingly urgent with tensions and violence mounting in Kosovo. Other areas of concern were the absence of strong national mechanisms for redress, such as an Ombudsman; allegations of police abuse, torture and ill-treatment in custody; weak safeguards for an independent judiciary; and violations of the right to a fair trial. In Kosovo, armed attacks against the police and private individuals had claimed several lives and left many people wounded. The continuing occurrence of serious abuses by the police and security forces was alarming. Following international pressure, the so-called 3+3 Commission for the implementation of the September 1996 memorandum of understanding on education in Kosovo met in Pristina and Belgrade in October 1997. It appeared that the talks were inconclusive, with both parties adhering to their original positions. The Albanian side claimed that the Serbians refused to agree on a timetable for the return of Albanian students to schools and university premises, and that they demanded integration into the Serbian educational system as a precondition. The Albanian side insisted on a comprehensive approach, demanding the return of all students to all levels of education at the same time. The Serbian side favoured a step-by-step approach, starting with the normalization of the primary and secondary schools. The situation in Sandzak was currently relatively stable, and serious abuses were reported only sporadically. However, the Special Rapporteur continued to receive information indicating that Muslims experienced discrimination, especially in employment and education, and that laws were unevenly and selectively applied depending on a person's ethnicity. Montenegro had shown an increased willingness to cooperate with the Special Rapporteur. The challenges ahead for the area were legislative reform, the rule of law and the issue of accountability and transparency in the work of State bodies. The Special Rapporteur recommended that the Government strengthen legal and other safeguards for the protection of human rights; end police brutality, ill-treatment and torture in detention, particularly in Kosovo; reconsider its refusal to authorize the opening of an office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights in Kosovo; and allow equal access of all main political parties to State-run electronic media. Alarmed by the escalating violence in Kosovo, she called on the parties to refrain from the use of force and to end all armed activities.

In a 25 March letter [E/CN.4/1998/152] transmitting its comments on parts of the Special Rapporteur's report, FRY did not deny that the situation in Kosovo and Metohija was complex but averred that the situation had been brought about by the secessionist aspirations of the Albanian national minority in those areas (see below).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 12 December [meeting 70], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Third Committee [A/52/644/Add.3], adopted resolution 52/147 by recorded vote (133-2-27) [agenda item 112(c)].

Situation of human rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

The General Assembly,

Guided by the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenants on Human Rights and all other human rights instruments and instruments of international humanitarian law, including the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 on the protection of victims of war and the Additional Protocols thereto, of 1977, as well as the principles and commitments undertaken by participating States of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe,

Reaffirming that all Member States have an obligation to promote and protect human rights and fundamental freedoms and to fulfil their obligations under the human rights instruments to which they are party, and reaffirming the obligation of all to respect international humanitarian law,

Reaffirming also the territorial integrity of all States in the region, within their internationally recognized borders,

Welcoming the entry into force and the implementation of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement"), initialled at Dayton, United States of America, on 21 November 1995, and signed by the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, representing also the Bosnian Serb party, in Paris on 14 December 1995, which, inter alia, committed the parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina fully to respect human rights,

Gravely concerned nonetheless at the continuing evidence of violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms taking place to varying degrees in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia,

Expressing its concern for the fostering of democracy and the rule of law in the area, noting the recommendations made by the personal representative of the Chairman-in-Office of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe on the situation in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and expressing its disappointment that those recommendations have not been followed,

Calling attention to the reports and recommendations of the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on the situation of human rights in the territory of the former Yugoslavia on the situation of human rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including her most recent report, of 17 October 1997,

Recalling all relevant General Assembly resolutions, especially its resolution 51/116 of 12 December 1996, Commission on Human Rights resolution 1997/57 of 15 April 1977 and all relevant resolutions of the Security Council and statements by the President of the Security Council, in particular resolution 1009(1995) of 10 August 1995 and the President's statement of 20 October 1997,

1. Calls for the full and consistent implementation of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto (collectively the "Peace Agreement"), initialled at Dayton, United States of America, on 21 November 1995, and signed by the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, representing also the Bosnian Serb party, in Paris on 14 December 1995, and the Basic Agreement on the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (the "Basic Agreement"), signed on 12 November 1995 by the Government of the Republic of Croatia and the local Serb representatives;

2. Expresses its serious concern about continuing human rights violations within Bosnia and Herzegovina and the delays in fully implementing the human rights provisions of the Peace Agreement;

3. Condemns in the strongest terms the continued forcible expulsion of individuals from their homes in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the practice of destroying the homes of those forcibly expelled, and calls for the immediate arrest and punishment of individuals engaged in these actions;

4. Also condemns the continuing restrictions on freedom of movement between the Republika Srpska and the Federation, as noted by the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on the situation of human rights in the territory of the former Yugoslavia in her report, and urges all parties to guarantee the freedom of movement of returnees and residents of Bosnia and Herzegovina;

5. Urges all parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina immediately to create conditions conducive to the safe and voluntary return of refugees and internally displaced persons to their pre-war homes, and calls upon all entities to repeal property laws which prevent pre-war residents from returning to their homes, in accordance with annex 7 of the Peace Agreement, and to ensure the passage of non-discriminatory legislation as soon as possible;

6. Encourages all parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina to cooperate with and support the work of the Commission for Real Property Claims of Displaced Persons and Refugees to resolve outstanding property claims;

7. Expresses concern for women and children, especially in Bosnia and Herzegovina, who were victims of rape used as a weapon of war, and calls for the perpetrators of rape to be brought to justice while ensuring that victims and witnesses receive adequate assistance and protection;

8. Urges all States and relevant organizations to continue to give serious consideration to the recommendations in the reports of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, in particular the recommendation concerning provision for the continuation of necessary medical and psychological care to victims of rape within the framework of programmes to rehabilitate women and children traumatized by war, as well as the provision of protection, counselling and support to victims and witnesses;

9. Recognizes the extraordinary suffering of the victims of rape and sexual violence and the necessity for an appropriate response to provide assistance to those victims, and expresses its concern, in particular, for the welfare of those victims who are currently among the internally displaced or otherwise affected by the war and who have experienced severe trauma and require psychological and other assistance;

10. Insists that all parties implement fully the commitments made in the Peace Agreement to protect human rights, that they act to promote and protect democratic institutions of government at all levels in their respective countries, to ensure freedom of expression and of the media, to allow and encourage freedom of association, including with respect to political parties, and to ensure freedom of movement, and that the parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina comply with the human rights provisions of their national Constitution;

11. Calls upon all parties and States in the region to ensure that the promotion of human rights, including the fulfilment of their respective human rights obligations by the parties to the Peace Agreement, as well as the strengthening of national institutions, will be a central element in the new civilian structure implementing the Peace Agreement, as promised at the Peace Implementation Conference held in London on 4 and 5 December 1996 and at the Ministerial Meeting of the Steering Board of the Peace Implementation Council and the Presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina held at Sintra, Portugal, on 30 May 1997;

12. Calls upon the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to undertake substantially greater efforts to institute democratic norms, especially in regard to the promotion and protection of free and independent media, and full respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms;

13. Also calls upon the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to ensure the speedy and consistent investigation of acts of discrimination and violence against refugees and to ensure the arrest and punishment of those responsible for those acts;

14. Further calls upon the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to allow for the return of Federal Republic of Yugoslavia nationals and refugees currently outside its territory;

15. Urgently demands that the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia take immediate action to put an end to the repression of, and prevent violence against, non-Serb populations in Kosovo, including acts of harassment, beatings, torture, warrantless searches, arbitrary detention and unfair trials, and also to respect the rights of persons belonging to minority groups in the Sandjak and Vojvodina and of persons belonging to the Bulgarian minority and to allow the immediate, unconditional return of the long-term mission of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe to Kosovo, the Sandjak and Vojvodina, as called for in Security Council resolution 855(1993) of 9 August 1993;

16. Calls upon the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to respect the democratic process and to act immediately to allow freedom of expression and assembly and full and free participation by all residents in Kosovo in the political, economic, social and cultural life of the region, particularly in the areas of education and health care, and to ensure that all the residents of the region are guaranteed equal treatment and protection regardless of ethnic affiliation;

17. Strongly urges the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to revoke all discriminatory legislation and to apply all other legislation without discrimination and to take urgent action to prevent arbitrary evictions and dismissals and discrimination against any ethnic or national, religious or linguistic group;

18. Calls upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia to undertake greater efforts to strengthen its adherence to democratic norms, especially in regard to the promotion and protection of free and independent media, to cooperate fully with the United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium to ensure that the reintegration of Eastern Slavonia occurs peacefully and with respect for the human rights of all residents and returning displaced persons and refugees, including those belonging to minorities, and for their right to remain, leave or return in safety and dignity and to enable refugees to return, as agreed by the Government of the Republic of Croatia, on 5 August 1997;

19. Strongly condemns instances of harassment of displaced Serbs and reports of collusion or active participation in such acts by Croatian members of the Transitional Police Force of the Region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium, and calls upon the Government of the Republic of Croatia to strengthen and to take continuing measures to end all forms of discrimination by Croatian authorities in, inter alia, the areas of employment, promotion, education, pensions and health care;

20. Welcomes the recent establishment by the Government of the Republic of Croatia of the national programme for the re-establishment of trust, and calls for its full and prompt implementation;

21. Insists that all authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina cooperate fully with the Commission on Human Rights for Bosnia and Herzegovina, created under annex 6 of the Peace Agreement, in particular by providing information and resource reports requested by the Human Rights Ombudsman and by participating in hearings before the Human Rights Chamber, and demands that the Republika Srpska cease its pattern of non-cooperation with the Commission;

22. Calls upon the Commission on Human Rights for Bosnia and Herzegovina to intensify its activities concerning alleged or apparent violations of human rights or alleged or apparent discrimination of any kind;

23. Urges the parties to implement the results of recent municipal elections without delay, through the constitution of councils in all municipalities of Bosnia and Herzegovina;

24. Calls for the continuing implementation by the Republic of Croatia of the new general amnesty law, enacted on 20 September 1996 and intended in part to promote confidence on the part of the local Serb population;

25. Welcomes the signing of a cross-border agreement between the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Republic of Croatia on 15 September 1997 and the easing of border crossing between Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Republic of Croatia;

26. Calls upon the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to undertake a consistent border regime with all neighbouring countries;

27. Strongly urges the Government of the Republic of Croatia to allow the expeditious voluntary return of all refugees, including those from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and of displaced persons, to take all appropriate measures to secure their safety and human rights, to resolve, in the framework of the rule of law, in conformity with international standards, the issue of property rights, to make a sustained effort to ensure the provision of equal access to protection and to social and housing reconstruction assistance regardless of ethnicity and to investigate and arrest those responsible for acts of violence and intimidation aimed at driving people away;

28. Urgently calls upon all States and all parties to the Peace Agreement to meet their obligations to cooperate fully with the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991, as required by Security Council resolution 827(1993) of 25 May 1993, including with respect to surrendering persons sought by the International Tribunal, urges all States and the Secretary-General to support the Tribunal to the fullest extent possible, in particular by helping to ensure that persons indicted by the Tribunal stand trial before it, and urges all States to consider providing the Tribunal with legal and technical expertise not available to the organization, as provided for in General Assembly resolution 51/243 of 15 September 1997;

29. Strongly condemns the continuing refusal of the authorities of the Republika Srpska and the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to arrest and surrender indicted war criminals known to be present in their territories, as they have agreed to do;

30. Welcomes with satisfaction the measures recently taken by the Government of the Republic of Croatia to facilitate the voluntary return of ten persons indicted by the International Tribunal, in accordance with the Peace Agreement, and welcomes in this regard the increased cooperation with the Tribunal by the Republic of Croatia and the central authorities of Bosnia and Herzegovina, which have enacted implementing legislation and have transferred indictees to the Tribunal;

31. Demands that the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina, in particular the authorities of the Republika Srpska, and the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia ensure full and free access to their territories to all institutions and organizations concerned with the implementation of the present resolution, including non-governmental organizations;

32. Welcomes the reports on the situation of human rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia submitted by the Special Rapporteur, and commends her and the United Nations Human Rights Field Operation in the Former Yugoslavia for their continuing efforts;

33. Urges all parties to implement fully the recommendations of the Special Rapporteur;

34. Calls upon the authorities of the States and entities within the mandate of the Special Rapporteur to cooperate with her and to provide her on a regular basis with information about the actions they are taking to implement her recommendations;

35. Welcomes technical cooperation and assistance programmes planned by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights in consultation with the Government of Croatia, and calls upon the Office of the High Commissioner to initiate, at the earliest possible opportunity, projects emphasizing human rights training for professionals involved in law enforcement and the rule of law, as well as human rights education;

36. Reaffirms, as recommended previously by the Special Rapporteur, that major reconstruction aid must be made conditional on demonstrated respect for human rights, emphasizes, in that context, the necessity of cooperation with the International Tribunal, and welcomes in this regard the conclusions of the Ministerial Meetings of the Steering Board of the Peace Implementation Council and the Presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina held in Paris on 14 November 1996 and Sintra, Portugal, on 30 May 1997;

37. Welcomes the commitments of the international community for post-war reconstruction and development assistance, and encourages the expansion of that assistance, while noting that such assistance should be conditioned on full compliance by the parties with the agreements that have been made;

38. Welcomes also the efforts of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, the Council of Europe, the Organization of the Islamic Conference, the European Community Monitoring Mission and the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights in monitoring and strengthening respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in the region, and welcomes the Republic of Croatia's adherence to, and firm and formal commitment to abide by, the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and its additional protocols, the European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, the European Charter of Local Self-Government, the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities and the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages;

39. Calls for an immediate end to illegal and/or hidden detention by all parties, and requests that the Special Rapporteur investigate allegations of hidden detainees;

40. Calls upon the parties to the Peace Agreement to take immediate steps to determine the identity, the whereabouts and the fate of missing persons, inter alia, near Srebrenica, Zepa, Prijedor, Sanski Most and Vukovar, including through close cooperation with the International Commission on Missing Persons in the Former Yugoslavia, other international humanitarian organizations and independent experts, the Special Rapporteur, the Working Group on the Process for Tracing Persons Unaccounted For, chaired by the International Committee of the Red Cross, and the Expert Group on Exhumation and Missing Persons, chaired by the High Representative for Implementation of the Peace Agreement on Bosnia and Herzegovina, and stresses the importance of coordinating work in this area;

41. Encourages all Governments to respond favourably to the appeals for voluntary contributions for the benefit of the Commission on Human Rights for Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Commission for Real Property Claims of Displaced Persons and Refugees for Bosnia and Herzegovina, the International Commission on Missing Persons in the Former Yugoslavia, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and other institutions of reconciliation, democracy and justice in the region;

42. Encourages the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, the Council of Europe, the Organization of the Islamic Conference, the European Community Monitoring Mission, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and other relevant international organizations to coordinate closely their efforts in the field of human rights, with a view to contributing to the implementation of the present resolution;

43. Decides to continue its examination of this question at its fifty-third session under the item entitled "Human rights questions".

Kosovo

Report of Special Rapporteur. In a September report [E/CN.4/1998/9], the Special Rapporteur reviewed two trials held in Pristina involving 35 Kosovo Albanians charged with offences against the State of FRY. An observer from the Belgrade office of the High Commissioner attended major parts of the trials.

In the first trial (19-30 May), 20 Kosovo Albanian men and women were tried and sentenced by the Pristina District Court. Two were tried in absentia. The accused were charged with preparing to conspire to participate in activities endangering the territorial integrity of FRY. Six of the defendants were also charged with using dangerous or violent means in attempts to threaten the constitutional order or security of FRY. All the accused, many of whom denied the charges against them or parts thereof, in particular the charge of terrorism, were found guilty. The second trial, held for five days in June/July, tried 15 Kosovo Albanian men, 12 of them in absentia. According to the indictment, the accused, having received military training in Albania, had formed a terrorist organization active in Kosovo with the aim of endangering the constitutional order and security of the State and of forming a separate State joined to Albania. They were charged with preparing violent acts and with carrying out several attacks, killing four persons and attempting to kill 16 others. All of the accused were found guilty.

The trials were conducted in public and in both cases the courts generally respected Yugoslav procedural rules for trial conduct. Major breaches, however, occurred during the period of pre-trial detention. Both trials failed to meet important minimum guarantees for fair trial provided in UN standards. The absence of credible material evidence linking the accused to the crimes they allegedly committed was a matter of grave concern. By international standards provided in human rights instruments to which FRY was party, the accused were denied a fair trial. In addition, the independence and impartiality of the judicial process was questionable.

Based on the UN trial observer's report, the Special Rapporteur recommended that the Government: order an impartial investigation into the claims of defendants and their lawyers that statements relied upon by the prosecution were extracted under torture or duress; ensure that statements so obtained were not admitted into evidence and were removed from the record; ensure that judges were impartial and independent; review legal provisions that permitted broad restrictions on free communication between lawyers and their clients; introduce clear rules for the duration of interrogation of arrested persons, for intervals between interrogations and for recording the identity of the persons conducting the interrogation; provide arrested persons with prompt access to a lawyer; conduct an independent investigation into allegations that the authorities refused to acknowledge that two defendants in the second trial were held for 16 days in September 1996 in secret detention and tortured; ensure that those responsible were brought to justice if those allegations were true; ensure that statements obtained from an accused person in violation of the law were not admitted into evidence; grant lawyers access to medical records of examinations of clients in custody; ensure that sanctions were imposed when procedural requirements for taking and recording evidence were not met; provide a court interpreter when the defendant did not speak the language of the court; and guarantee the rights of defendants tried in absentia.

Report of Secretary-General. In October [A/52/502], the Secretary-General reviewed access granted or denied by FRY to UN human rights missions and OSCE missions.

Having described the establishment of the office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights in Belgrade [YUN 1996, p. 715], the Secretary-General noted that, although the office had unimpeded access to Kosovo, its inability to establish a permanent presence in the area continued to hamper monitoring activities. Regarding the reinstatement of the OSCE monitoring mission, which had ceased in 1993 [YUN 1993, p. 495], FRY had consistently denied OSCE access to the region for general monitoring purposes. It did, however, grant OSCE permission to send an electoral observer mission to monitor presidential and parliamentary elections in Serbia in September.

The Secretary-General concluded that, in view of the continuing widespread human rights violations in Kosovo as reported by the Special Rapporteur, the opening of an office of the High Commissioner in Pristina, as well as an increased presence of other international organizations, would be indispensable for gathering reliable information on future human rights developments.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 12 December [meeting 70], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Third Committee [A/52/644/Add.3], adopted resolution 52/139 by recorded vote (106-2-56) [agenda item 112 (c)].

Situation of human rights in Kosovo

The General Assembly,

Guided by the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenants on Human Rights and other human rights instruments,

Taking note with concern of the reports on the situation of human rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia submitted by the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on the situation of human rights in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, which describe the continuing grave human rights situation in Kosovo,

Noting with regret that a memorandum of understanding on the educational system in Kosovo, signed in 1996, has not yet been implemented, and calling for full and immediate implementation of that memorandum,

Noting with concern the use of force by Serbian police against peaceful Albanian student protesters of Kosovo on 1 October 1997 and the failure of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to make reasonable accommodation to address the legitimate grievances of the students,

1. Expresses its deep concern about all violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Kosovo, in particular the repression of the ethnic Albanian population and discrimination against it, as well as acts of violence in Kosovo;

2. Calls upon the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia:

(a) To take all necessary measures to bring to an immediate end all human rights violations against ethnic Albanians in Kosovo, including, in particular, discriminatory measures and practices, arbitrary searches and detention, the violation of the right to a fair trial and the practice of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, and to revoke all discriminatory legislation, in particular that which has entered into force since 1989;

(b) To release all political prisoners and to cease the persecution of political leaders and members of local human rights organizations;

(c) To allow the return in safety and dignity of Albanian refugees from Kosovo to their homes;

(d) To allow the establishment of genuine democratic institutions in Kosovo, including the parliament and the judiciary, and to respect the will of its inhabitants as the best means of preventing the escalation of the conflict there;

(e) To allow the reopening of the educational, cultural and scientific institutions of the ethnic Albanians;

3. Urges the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to pursue constructive dialogue with the representatives of the ethnic Albanians of Kosovo;

4. Welcomes the visits to Kosovo of the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on the situation of human rights in the territory of the former Yugoslavia and her relevant reports, and calls upon her to continue to monitor closely the human rights situation in Kosovo and to continue to pay due attention to that matter in her reporting;

5. Urges the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to allow the immediate unconditional return of the mission of long duration of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe to Kosovo, as called for in Security Council resolution 855(1993) of 9 August 1993;

6. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General on the situation of human rights in Kosovo, submitted pursuant to General Assembly resolution 51/111 of 12 December 1996, and requests him to continue his efforts to seek ways and means, including through consultations with the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and relevant regional organizations, to establish an adequate international monitoring presence in Kosovo and to report thereon to the Assembly at its fifty-third session;

7. Encourages the Secretary-General to pursue his humanitarian efforts in the former Yugoslavia, in liaison with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the United Nations Children's Fund and other appropriate humanitarian organizations, with a view to taking urgent practical steps to tackle the critical needs of the people in Kosovo, and to assist in the voluntary return of displaced persons to their homes in conditions of safety and dignity;

8. Emphasizes the importance of laws and regulations concerning citizenship applied by the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia being in accordance with the standards and principles of non-discrimination, equal protection before the law and the reduction and avoidance of statelessness, as set out in the relevant international human rights instruments;

9. Also emphasizes that improvements in the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Kosovo will assist the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to establish the full range of relations with the international community;

10. Decides to continue the examination of the situation of human rights in Kosovo at its fifty-third session under the item entitled "Human rights questions".

RECORDED VOTE ON RESOLUTION 52/139:

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Andorra, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Azerbaijan, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Bolivia, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Canada, Cape Verde, Chile, Comoros, Costa Rica, Croatia, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Estonia, Fiji, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Guatemala, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, Indonesia, Iran, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Jordan, Kazakhstan, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lebanon, Lesotho, Libya, Liechtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Marshall Islands, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Micronesia, Monaco, Mongolia, Morocco, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Paraguay, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Republic of Korea, Samoa, San Marino, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Slovenia, Solomon Islands, South Africa, Spain, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Thailand, Tunisia, Turkey, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Uzbekistan, Vanuatu.

Against: India, Russian Federation.

Abstain: Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Belarus, Bhutan, Botswana, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cameroon, Chad, China, Colombia, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Gabon, Ghana, Grenada, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Israel, Jamaica, Kenya, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Liberia, Malawi, Mozambique, Myanmar, Namibia, Nepal, Nigeria, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Republic of Moldova, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Singapore, Slovakia, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Uganda, Ukraine, United Republic of Tanzania, Venezuela, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

FYROM

In a September report [E/CN.4/1998/12], the Special Rapporteur submitted a final report on FYROM, as requested by the Commission on Human Rights in April [res. 1997/57]. The Commission had decided that unless the Special Rapporteur recommended otherwise, it would discontinue consideration of FYROM upon submission of her report. She visited the country in August when she met with high-level government officials, representatives of local authorities, the Macedonian Helsinki Human Rights Committee and the media, among others.

Based on her observations and on commitments from the Government, the Special Rapporteur recommended that the Commission remove FYROM from her mandate. She recommended that she retain the right to comment on any developments in the country that might occur between September 1997 and the date of the beginning of the Commission's 1998 session (16 March). She also recommended that the Office of the High Commissioner maintain its presence in Skopje to work on implementing its technical cooperation project with the Government.

The Special Rapporteur observed slow but steady achievements in legislative reform. She was encouraged by the creation of the Office of the Ombudsman and the passage of a new Law of Criminal Procedure. The Government had implemented policies that had protected and advanced minority rights, while at the same time preserving the rights of all citizens. Positive developments were seen in freedom of the media. The Special Rapporteur remained concerned by the abuse of police authority and urged the Government to prevent those abuses in future. She had proposed a strengthened training programme for police, which was favourably received by the Government. Underlining the importance of peace for human rights protection, the Special Rapporteur urged the Government to maintain a constructive dialogue in its bilateral relations with its neighbours, particularly with Albania.

Rape and abuse of women

In response to General Assembly resolution 51/115 [YUN 1996, p. 716], the Secretary-General submitted an October report [A/52/497] on the rape and abuse of women in the areas of armed conflict in the former Yugoslavia. He discussed action taken by the Commission on Human Rights, the Special Rapporteur, UNHCR and the International Criminal Tribunal to gather information and report on those practices, assist victims and prosecute perpetrators.

The Secretary-General stated that incidents of rape were no longer reported as a widespread phenomenon. Although the international community had responded to the need for investigation, continuing attention should be given to preventive and curative measures. Protection and assistance for victims and witnesses should continue, as the effects of rape and sexual violence continued to traumatize the victims well beyond the act itself.

On 12 December, by decision 52/425, the General Assembly took note of the Secretary-General's report.

Russian Federation

Republic of Chechnya

Report of Secretary-General. In response to a 1996 request [YUN 1996, p. 718], the Secretary-General submitted to the Commission on Human Rights a March report on the human rights situation in Chechnya [E/CN.4/1997/10], based on information submitted by the Russian Federation; information available under UN human rights mechanisms and procedures; and that received from UN bodies and programmes, and from intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations.

The Secretary-General described the activities of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, stating that in February the High Commissioner and the Government of the Russian Federation agreed on a third visit of the High Commissioner's envoy to the Russian Federation to hold consultations with the Secretary of the Russian Security Council.

The situation in Chechnya was discussed in reports of the Special Rapporteurs on extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions and on the question of torture. The Committee against Torture considered a report of the Russian Federation and in its concluding observations expressed concern regarding widespread reported abuses of human rights in the conflict in Chechnya.

The report stated that ICRC had been providing protection and assistance to civilians. However, following the murder of six ICRC expatriate delegates, it had suspended part of its operation. After 17 December 1996, all programmes requiring the presence of expatriates were suspended in the region. Several limited programmes continued.

The Secretary-General summarized information received from the Russian Federation and noted the signing by the President of a 23 November 1996 decree on measures to ensure further peaceful settlement in the Chechen Republic and an agreement on principles of cooperation between the sides until the election of the president and parliament of the Chechen Republic.

Following an August 1996 ceasefire, reports from NGOs focused on accountability for past abuses, the need for demining, and the general need for increased law enforcement and advisory services on legislative initiatives.

An annex described assistance provided to Chechnya by the UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, UNHCR, the World Food Programme and the World Health Organization.

Latin America and the Caribbean

Colombia

Communications. By a 21 March letter [E/CN.4/1997/128], Colombia transmitted to the Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights a memorandum on action taken by the Government to establish an office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights in Santa Fé de Bogotá.

On 18 April [E/CN.4/1997/149], Colombia transmitted to the Chairman a statement by the Government regarding the High Commissioner's report on the country [YUN 1996, p. 719]. The Government stressed that it had taken the initiative to establish the office in Colombia, and it stated that there were several omissions and inaccuracies in the High Commissioner's report.

Commission action. On 16 April [E/1997/23], the Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights, on behalf of the Commission, made a statement welcoming the opening of the office of the High Commissioner in Santa Fé de Bogotá. The office would assist the Colombian authorities in developing policies and programmes to promote and protect human rights and to observe human rights violations.

Expressing concern at the persistence of thousands of violations of the right to life, the practice of enforced disappearances and torture, the increasing involvement in the conflict of paramilitary groups and the persistence of an alarming level of impunity, the Commission urged the Government to continue to strengthen its support for those promoting the defence of human rights. The Commission urged guerrilla groups in Colombia to respect the norms of international law and especially to abandon the use of kidnapping, hostage-taking, anti-personnel landmines, indiscriminate killings and all attacks on the civilian population.

The High Commissioner was asked to present a report in 1998 on the establishment and activities of the office and on developments in the human rights situation in Colombia.

Report of High Commissioner. In a report on the human rights situation in Colombia [E/CN.4/1998/16], the High Commissioner stated that the office in Santa Fé de Bogotá became operational on 6 April 1997. State and government institutions had cooperated with the office, which had been able to conduct its activities without any impediment. The High Commissioner was deeply concerned at the gravity and scale of the human rights violations and breaches of international humanitarian law reported by the office. Particularly deplorable were the massacres, extrajudicial executions, murders, practice of torture, enforced disappearances and kidnappings, threats and the enforced displacement of the population. She condemned the practice of abduction, which was widespread and provided a livelihood for armed groups.

The High Commissioner noted that the internal armed conflict was a major cause of human rights violations, but that many violations of the right to life, due process and freedom of opinion, association and assembly occurred outside that context. She regretted that the office's recommendations on the draft legislation on enforced disappearances submitted to the Colombian Congress had not been incorporated in the final draft. Draft legislation on the reform of the Military Penal Code did not include all the international recommendations for ensuring that the military criminal courts met the requirements of the human rights Covenants. Although the Government had taken measures to deal with the obstruction of the enjoyment of human rights and there were human rights monitoring institutions and agents, not all the initiatives followed international recommendations or those made by the Office of the High Commissioner.

The High Commissioner urged the Government to ensure the recognition of the rights contained in the international instruments that Colombia had ratified; eradicate the practice of abduction and arrest those responsible; remove from its armed forces and police those who supported paramilitary groups; improve prison conditions in conformity with international standards; guarantee economic, social and cultural rights; and support institutions relating to human rights, the rule of law and the administration of justice. She recommended that parties to the conflict abide by international humanitarian law and refrain from recruiting children. The Colombian State was urged to ensure that the draft legislation characterizing the offence of enforced disappearances conformed to the 1992 Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance, contained in Assembly resolution 47/133 [YUN 1992, p. 744]; ensure that the Penal Military Code reform bill conformed to international norms; and abolish the regional justice system so that proceedings were conducted impartially and in public, with full observance of the guarantees of due process. The Colombian authorities were asked to guarantee the full operation of the justice system; take more effective measures against impunity; ensure that human rights advocates could conduct their activities without interference or unlawful hindrance; guarantee effective exercise of political rights, freedom of thought and expression, and trade-union freedom; seek measures to prevent enforced displacement; and take account of the recommendations of treaty bodies and special mechanisms of the Commission on Human Rights. The High Commissioner urged the Government, armed groups and society to ensure that children enjoyed the rights accorded to them in international treaties, and to continue to explore ways to bring about national reconciliation and a just and stable peace based on the observance of human rights and compliance with the international instruments recognizing and guaranteeing them.

Cuba

Report of Special Rapporteur. In a January report [E/CN.4/1997/53], Special Rapporteur Carl-Johan Groth (Sweden) reported on the human rights situation in Cuba. As the Government had not responded to his requests to visit the country, the Special Rapporteur had met with experts on the situation in Cuba, people who had recently left the country and had suffered human rights violations and representatives of various organizations and groups. He received written material from human rights NGOs and communications from individuals sent from Cuba and abroad.

The Special Rapporteur continued to receive information about persons who had been imprisoned and harassed and subjected to house searches, threats, temporary arrest, loss of employment or other kinds of reprisal connected with exercise of the freedom of expression and association or due to discrimination on political grounds. Nevertheless, the number of trials and sentences had been reduced and the length of prison sentences had decreased. The situation regarding the right to leave and to return to the country had not changed. The authorities maintained their policy of forcing dissidents out of the country by threatening them with prosecution or releasing them on the condition that they left the country immediately. Concerning violations of the right to life, the Special Rapporteur referred to the sinking of the tugboat 13 de Marzo in the Straits of Florida on 13 July 1994, in which 40 people died and no investigation took place. He also cited an incident that occurred in 1996 when Cuban Air Force pilots shot down two civil aircraft, registered in the United States, which were on a mission for Brothers to the Rescue, a Miami-based (Florida, United States) volunteer organization. The Special Rapporteur considered that the shooting down of the aircraft was a premeditated act and that it constituted a violation of the right to life of four people. The severity of the economic crisis continued to have a serious effect on the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights.

The Special Rapporteur recommended that Cuba: cease persecution for reasons relating to the exercise of freedom of peaceful expression and association; release unconditionally persons serving sentences on grounds related to the exercise of the rights provided for in international human rights instruments; permit legalization of independent associations without interference from authorities; ratify the principal human rights instruments to which it was not a party; delete from penal legislation offences for which citizens might be tried for exercising their right to freedom of expression and association; review legal provisions relating to "social danger", defined in Cuba's Penal Code as a state of habitual inebriation and dipsomania, drug addiction or antisocial behaviour, which might warrant security measures involving therapy, re-education or surveillance by the National Revolutionary Police; repeal legal provisions that implied discrimination between citizens on political grounds and that barred citizens from exercising their right to enter and leave the country freely; reform trial law to safeguard the guarantees of due process; investigate incidents involving violations of the right to life; ensure greater transparency and guarantees in prisons; and allow human rights NGOs to enter the country more frequently. The Special Rapporteur recommended that the international community continue to support the establishment of a process of peaceful political transition in Cuba to accompany the ongoing economic reforms. It should also provide humanitarian assistance and facilitate multilateral and bilateral technical and financial cooperation with Cuba. He urged the Government to consider requesting the establishment of a programme of advisory services and technical assistance to facilitate the dissemination of information on human rights.

Commission action. By a roll-call vote of 19 to 10, with 24 abstentions, the Commission on Human Rights, on 16 April [res. 1997/62], regretting the numerous reports of violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms described by the Special Rapporteur, urged the Government to ensure freedom of expression and assembly and freedom to demonstrate peacefully. It called on the Government to allow the Special Rapporteur to visit the country and to carry out his recommendations. It also called on the Government to release persons detained for political reasons and to safeguard workers' rights. The Government was asked to consider requesting the establishment of a programme of advisory services.

The Commission decided to extend the Special Rapporteur's mandate for one year and asked him to maintain direct contacts with the Government and citizens of Cuba, to submit an interim report to the General Assembly in 1997 and to report to the Commission in 1998. The Secretary-General was asked to assist the Special Rapporteur.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July [meeting 38], the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of the Commission on Human Rights [E/1997/23], adopted decision 1997/271 by a roll-call vote (20-8-21) [agenda item 7 (d)].

Situation of human rights in Cuba

At its 38th plenary meeting, on 22 July 1997, the Economic and Social Council, taking note of Commission on Human Rights resolution 1997/62 of 16 April 1997, endorsed the Commission's decision to extend for one year the mandate of the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on the situation of human rights in Cuba, approved its request to the Secretary-General to provide all necessary assistance to the Special Rapporteur, and also approved the Commission's request to the Special Rapporteur to submit an interim report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session and a report to the Commission at its fifty-fourth session on the results of his endeavours pursuant to Commission resolution 1997/62.

ROLL-CALL VOTE ON DECISION 1997/271:

In favour: Australia, Canada, Chile, Czech Republic, Finland, France, Germany, Iceland, Japan, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Nicaragua, Poland, Republic of Korea, Romania, Spain, Sweden, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States.

Against: Belarus, China, Cuba, India, South Africa, Sudan, Uganda, Zambia.

Abstain: Argentina, Bangladesh, Brazil, Cape Verde, Colombia, Djibouti, El Salvador, Gabon, Jamaica, Jordan, Latvia, Lebanon, Malaysia, Mexico, Mozambique, Philippines, Russian Federation, Sri Lanka, Thailand, Togo, Tunisia.

Reports of Special Rapporteur. By an October note [A/52/479], the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly the Special Rapporteur's interim report on the human rights situation in Cuba. The Special Rapporteur stated that, faced with the lack of cooperation by the Government, he continued to base his report on information from non-governmental sources, much of it originating in Cuba and disseminated by groups of Cuban exiles in the United States.

Since his previous report, the Special Rapporteur had noted no significant changes in the human rights situation or in the pattern of repression engaged in by the security forces, which had kept up an intensive campaign of harassment against all those whose attitude differed in any way from the official line. There was no change with regard to the rights to non-discrimination on political grounds and freedom of expression, assembly and association. Nor had any changes been observed in the lack of independence in the administration of justice, prison conditions, the lack of trade union freedoms or the precarious working conditions caused by the economic situation. The Special Rapporteur presented comments on various aspects, both positive and negative, of human rights in Cuba made by UN bodies, including the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, the Committee on the Rights of the Child and the International Labour Organization.

The Special Rapporteur reiterated most of his previous recommendations and added that international human rights NGOs should be allowed to enter the country frequently to evaluate the human rights situation and assist in making improvements.

In a later report [E/CN.4/1998/69], the Special Rapporteur stated that since his January report there had been no significant changes in the human rights situation in Cuba or in the pattern of repression engaged in by the security forces, which harassed those whose attitude differed from the official line. The ongoing United States embargo against Cuba contributed to the rigidity of the system, serving as a pretext for keeping the population under strict control and for punishing or suppressing those who worked for political change. The Special Rapporteur continued to be concerned by the labour situation, particularly the lack of free trade unions and regulations governing self-employment, which were based on support for government policies. The Special Rapporteur reiterated his previous recommendations.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 12 December [meeting 70], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Third Committee [A/52/644/Add.3], adopted resolution 52/143 by recorded vote (64-29-75) [agenda item 112 (c)].

Situation of human rights in Cuba

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming that all Member States have an obligation to promote and protect human rights and fundamental freedoms, as stated in the Charter of the United Nations and elaborated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other applicable human rights instruments,

Reaffirming also that all States have an obligation to fulfil the commitments they have freely undertaken under the various international instruments,

Taking particular note of Commission on Human Rights resolution 1997/62 of 16 April 1997, in which the Commission commended the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Cuba for his report and for his efforts to carry out his mandate, and extended his mandate for one year,

Expressing concern about continuing violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Cuba, as outlined in the interim report on the situation of human rights in Cuba submitted to the General Assembly by the Special Rapporteur,

Deploring, in this regard, the arbitrary arrest, detention and harassment of Cuban citizens, in particular members of the Dissident Working Group and the independent press, for peacefully seeking to exercise their civil and political rights,

Recalling the continued refusal of the Government of Cuba to cooperate with the Commission on Human Rights with regard to its resolutions 1992/61 of 3 March 1992, 1993/63 of 10 March 1993, 1994/71 of 9 March 1994, 1995/66 of 7 March 1995, 1996/69 of 23 April 1996 and 1997/62, including its repeated opposition to a visit to Cuba by the Special Rapporteur,

1. Commends the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on the situation of human rights in Cuba for his interim report;

2. Expresses its full support for the work of the Special Rapporteur;

3. Calls once more upon the Government of Cuba to cooperate fully with the Special Rapporteur by permitting him full and free access to establish contact with the Government and the citizens of Cuba so that he may fulfil the mandate entrusted to him;

4. Regrets profoundly the numerous violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Cuba, as described in the report of the Special Rapporteur submitted to the Commission on Human Rights and in his interim report submitted to the General Assembly;

5. Urges the Government of Cuba to ensure freedom of expression and assembly and the freedom to demonstrate peacefully, including by allowing political parties and non-governmental organizations to function freely in the country and by reforming legislation in this area;

6. Calls especially upon the Government of Cuba to release the numerous persons detained for activities of a political nature, including those specifically mentioned in the interim report of the Special Rapporteur, who suffer from inadequate medical care while imprisoned or whose rights as journalists or jurists are impeded or denied;

7. Calls upon the Government of Cuba to carry out the recommendations contained in the interim report of the Special Rapporteur to bring its observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Cuba into conformity with international standards and applicable international human rights instruments and to end all violations of human rights including, in particular, the detention and imprisonment of human rights defenders and others who are engaged in the peaceful exercise of their rights, and to grant access to its prisons to non-governmental humanitarian organizations and international humanitarian agencies;

8. Decides to continue its consideration of this question at its fifty-third session.

RECORDED VOTE ON RESOLUTION 52/143:

In favour Albania, Andorra, Argentina, Armenia, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, Bulgaria, Canada, Chile, Costa Rica, Croatia, Czech Republic, Denmark, El Salvador, Estonia, Finland, France, Georgia, Germany, Greece, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Japan, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Liechtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malta, Marshall Islands, Mauritius, Micronesia, Monaco, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Poland, Portugal, Republic of Korea, Republic of Moldova, Romania, Samoa, San Marino, Slovakia, Slovenia, Solomon Islands, Spain, Sweden, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Uzbekistan, Vanuatu.

in the occupied zone in southern Lebanon and West Bekaa and called on Israel to end those practices, which included the abduction and arbitrary detention of civilians, the destruction of their dwellings, confiscation of their property, expulsion from their land, and the bombardment of peaceful villages and civilian areas. Israel was also called on to comply with the Geneva Conventions of 1949, particularly the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (Fourth Geneva Convention), and to release all Lebanese who had been abducted and imprisoned and other detainees. The Commission asked the Secretary-General to bring its resolution to Israel's attention and to invite Israel to provide information on its implementation. He was also asked to report to the General Assembly in 1997 and to the Commission in 1998.

In July, the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of the Commission on Human Rights [E/1997/23], adopted decision 1997/265 by roll-call vote (46-1-1) [agenda item 7 (d)].

Human rights situation in southern Lebanon and West Bekaa

At its 38th plenary meeting, on 22 July 1997, the Economic and Social Council, taking note of Commission on Human Rights resolution 1997/55 of 15 April 1997, approved the Commission's request to the Secretary-General:

(a) To bring the resolution to the attention of the Government of Israel and to invite that Government to provide information concerning the extent of its implementation thereof;

(b) To report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session and to the Commission on Human Rights at its fifty-fourth session on the results of his efforts in that regard.

ROLL-CALL VOTE ON DECISION 1997/265:

In favour: Argentina, Australia, Bangladesh, Belarus, Brazil, Canada, Cape Verde, Chile, China, Colombia, Cuba, Czech Republic, Djibouti, El Salvador, Finland, France, Germany, Iceland, India, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Latvia, Lebanon, Luxembourg, Malaysia, Mexico, Mozambique, Netherlands, Nicaragua, Philippines, Poland, Republic of Korea, Romania, Russian Federation, South Africa, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Sweden, Thailand, Togo, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, United Kingdom.

Against: United States.

Abstain: Gabon.

Reports of Secretary-General. As requested by the Commission in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 721], the Secretary-General reported [E/CN.4/1997/49] that he had asked Israel for information on efforts made to implement the Commission's 1996 resolution on the situation of human rights in southern Lebanon, but had received no reply.

In an October report [A/52/527], the Secretary-General informed the General Assembly that he had asked Israel for information on the imple-

Lebanon

Commission action. By a roll-call vote of 51 to 1, with 1 abstention, the Commission on Human Rights, on 15 April [res. 1997/55], deplored continued Israeli practices that violated human rights mentation of the Commission's 1997 resolution and had received no reply to his June request.

Territories occupied by Israel

During 1997, the question of human rights violations in the territories occupied by Israel as a result of the 1967 hostilities in the Middle East was again considered by the Commission on Human Rights. Political and other aspects were considered by the General Assembly, its Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Palestinian People and Other Arabs of the Occupied Territories (Committee on Israeli Practices) and other bodies (see PART ONE, Chapter VI).

Reports of Secretary-General. As requested by the Commission on Human Rights in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 723], the Secretary-General submitted a report [E/CN.4/1997/13] stating that he had brought the Commission's 1996 resolution concerning the occupied Syrian Golan to the attention of all Governments, the Committee on Israeli Practices, the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People (Committee on Palestinian Rights), the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, the specialized agencies, regional intergovernmental organizations and international humanitarian organizations. He also stated that UN press coverage was provided for all meetings of the Committee on Israeli Practices, and information was distributed through documents, press releases and UN information centres and services.

In response to a 1996 Commission request [YUN 1996, p. 723], the Secretary-General submitted a further report [E/CN.4/1997/14] in which he indicated that he had brought the resolution on the violation of human rights in the occupied Arab territories to the attention of the same bodies. He had received no reply from Israel regarding efforts to implement the Commission's 1996 resolution.

The Secretary-General also submitted to the Commission in February 1997 [E/CN.4/1997/15] a list of all General Assembly and other UN reports issued since 26 April 1996 on the situation of the population living in the occupied Arab territories.

Report of Special Rapporteur. In a February report [E/CN.4/1997/16], Special Rapporteur Hannu Halinen (Finland) discussed the human rights situation in the occupied Palestinian territories.

The Special Rapporteur observed that the issue of settlements was emerging as the greatest preoccupation of the inhabitants of the occupied territories, especially in the West Bank. Settlement expansion presupposed the confiscation of Arab-owned land in the occupied territories. He stated that settler violence, particularly in Hebron, had been observed repeatedly and there were reports that excessive and indiscriminate force was used by Israeli forces against civilians. Closure imposed by Israeli authorities on the occupied territories in the wake of security incidents remained the principal human rights concern of those living in the Gaza Strip. Closures had continued to devastate the fragile Palestinian economy, maintaining unemployment at some 40 per cent in the Gaza Strip and 30 per cent in the West Bank. The deterioration of the situation of women had been reported as one of the hidden effects of closure. Another adverse effect was an increase in the rate of divorce. In addition, closure affected the mental well-being of some segments of the population, had a detrimental effect on the health situation, and seriously impacted education since 1,200 Gaza students were unable to attend classes in the West Bank institutions where they were enrolled.

A development regarding the treatment of Palestinian detainees that had given rise to concern was the permission granted to the General Security Service by the Israeli High Court of Justice regarding the use of force in interrogating suspects in connection with security matters such as the prevention of terrorist attacks. Persons were also believed to have died as a result of torture and ill-treatment in detention centres under the control of the Palestinian Authority due to the overwhelming pressure reportedly placed on the Authority to deal with its own and Israeli security concerns.

The Special Rapporteur concluded that despite the serious incidents reported to him, both Israel and the Palestinian Authority were showing concern and making efforts to advance respect for human rights. He noted the recent decision by the Government of Israel to release all Palestinian women prisoners. The Special Rapporteur welcomed the decision of the Israeli authorities to increase to 55,000 the number of work permits issued to Palestinians allowing them to work in Israel, and called for further increases in the near future.

The Special Rapporteur proposed implementation of a recommendation made by the Committee against Torture to end interrogation practices and grant victims access to rehabilitation and compensation measures. Other recommendations to Israel called for the release or granting of a fair trial to persons being held in administrative detention; increasing the number of work permits issued to Palestinians; ceasing to build new settlements and not expanding existing ones; and discontinuing closure.

Commission action. By a roll-call vote of 25 to 1, with 23 abstentions, the Commission on Human Rights, on 26 March [res. 1997/1], condemned the continued human rights violations in the occupied Palestinian territories since the signing in 1993 of the Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements by the Government of Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization [YUN 1993, p. 521], and called on Israel to stop committing the violations immediately. It also called on Israel to abolish the use of torture against Palestinians during interrogation; cease its policy of enforcing collective punishments; and desist from all human rights violations in the Palestinian and other occupied Arab territories and respect the bases of international law, the principles of international humanitarian law and its commitments to the UN Charter and UN resolutions. The Secretary-General was asked to bring the Commission's resolution to the attention of the Government of Israel and all other Governments, competent UN organs, the specialized agencies, regional intergovernmental organizations and international humanitarian organizations, to disseminate it as widely as possible and to report in 1998 on its implementation by Israel. He was also asked to provide the Commission with all UN reports issued between its sessions that dealt with conditions in which the Palestinians were living under Israeli occupation.

On the same date [res. 1997/2], by a roll-call vote of 26 to 1, with 23 abstentions, the Commission called on Israel to comply with UN resolutions on the Syrian Golan and demanded that it rescind its decision to impose its laws, jurisdiction and administration on that occupied territory. It also called on Israel to desist from imposing Israeli identity cards on citizens of the Syrian Golan and to desist from its repressive measures against them. The Secretary-General was asked to bring the Commission's resolution to the attention of all Governments, UN organs, specialized agencies, regional intergovernmental organizations and international humanitarian organizations, to give the resolution wide publicity and to report in 1998.

Also on 26 March [res. 1997/3], by a roll-call vote of 47 to 1, with 2 abstentions, the Commission expressed its deep concern at Israeli settlement activities, which were illegal and therefore constituted a violation of the relevant provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention. It called on Israel to comply with the Commission's previous resolutions; to cease its policy of expanding the settlements and related activities in the occupied territories; to forgo and prevent any new installation of settlers; and to address the question of Israeli settlements during the negotiations on the final status of the territory, which were due to resume within two months after implementing the protocol concerning the redeployment in Hebron (see PART ONE, Chapter VI).

PART THREE

Economic and social questions

Chapter I

Development policy and international economic cooperation

The world economy grew by just over 3 per cent in 1997 for the second consecutive year and a further year of 3 per cent growth was forecast for 1998. Despite favourable economic growth, there were a number of negative developments. Following financial crises in several developing Asian economies, the international community had to mobilize more than $100 billion in less than six months for financial rescue packages, and many countries saw their exchange rates challenged by market forces. Another major concern was Japan's difficulty in overcoming its own financial-sector problems and launching a sustained economic expansion. Unemployment, particularly in much of Western Europe, was also a salient issue.

In June, the General Assembly held its nineteenth special session at which it adopted the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21—a comprehensive plan of action for the sustainable development of the Earth into the twenty-first century adopted at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, held in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, in 1992. Participants in the special session—also known as Earth Summit+5—assessed progress made since 1992 in the implementation of Agenda 21 and made a commitment to ensuring that its next review in the year 2002 would demonstrate greater measurable progress in achieving sustainable development.

On 20 June, only three days before the start of Earth Summit+5, the Assembly adopted the Agenda for Development—an action-oriented document aimed at invigorating a renewed and strengthened partnership for development based on the imperatives of mutual benefits and genuine interdependence. An ad hoc working group of the Assembly had been working on the elaboration of the Agenda since early 1995, although the concept of such an agenda had originally been proposed by the Secretary-General in 1992.

The eradication of poverty—described as a fundamental goal of the international community—was a major theme in both the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21 and the Agenda for Development. In December, in a resolution on the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty (1997-2006), the Assembly called on all donors to give high priority to poverty eradication in their assistance budgets and programmes. Having considered the role of microcredit in the eradication of poverty, the Assembly adopted a resolution in which it encouraged all involved in poverty eradication programmes to consider incorporating microcredit schemes in their strategies.

The need to take account of the development experiences and circumstances of countries in special situations—the countries of Africa and the least developed, small island developing and landlocked developing countries—was addressed by a number of United Nations bodies during 1997. Action on behalf of those groups of countries was called for by the Assembly in both the Agenda for Development and the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21, and their particular problems were discussed in the Commission on Sustainable Development, the Committee for Development Planning, and the Trade and Development Board of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development. The Assembly decided to convene, in 2001, the Third UN Conference on the Least Developed Countries.

Noting the need to give impetus to international economic cooperation for development, particularly in the context of an effective follow-up to the Agenda for Development, the Assembly in December reaffirmed the need to strengthen constructive dialogue and genuine partnership. It requested the Assembly President to arrange a two-day high-level dialogue on the theme of the social and economic impact of globalization and interdependence.

International economic relations

Development and international economic cooperation

Development and international economic cooperation issues were discussed by a number of UN bodies during 1997, including the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council.

By decision 52/438 of 18 December, the Assembly took note of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee's report [A/52/626] on its discussion of matters relating to macroeconomic policy questions.

By decision 52/434 of 18 December, the Assembly deferred consideration of the launching of global negotiations on international economic cooperation for development and included the item in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third (1998) session.

Economic and Social Council consideration. At its high-level segment (2-4 July) [A/52/3/Rev.1], the Economic and Social Council carried out a comprehensive review of the theme "Fostering an enabling environment for development: financial flows, including capital flows, investment and trade" (see PART THREE, Chapter IV).

In the agreed conclusions of the high-level segment [A/52/3/Rev.1 (agreed conclusions 1997/1)], the Council stated that an enabling international environment for development called for better integration into the world economy of developing countries, particularly the African countries, the least developed countries, landlocked developing countries, small island developing States and countries with economies in transition. The international community should support national efforts for capacity-building in the developing countries, including infrastructure and manpower development and research and development. South-South cooperation and technical assistance from developed countries were also essential elements. Also required was coordination of macroeconomic policies by the international community to foster conditions of stability, predictability and growth in the world economy, stable exchange rates, low interest rates and low fiscal deficits, as well as trade liberalization, more equitable access of developing countries to global markets, an increased flow of productive investments, technologies and knowledge to developing countries, and new and additional financial resources from all sources. Broadening and strengthening the participation of developing countries in international economic decision-making processes was also needed.

Among the documents considered at the Council's high-level segment was the World Economic and Social Survey 1997 [Sales No. E.97.II.C.1] (see below).

By decision 52/451 of 18 December, the General Assembly took note of the relevant chapters of the report of the Economic and Social Council [A/52/3/Rev.1].

Agenda for Development

On 20 June, the Ad Hoc Open-ended Working Group of the General Assembly on an Agenda for Development completed its work by adopting its report [A/51/45] and recommending to the Assembly the adoption of a draft resolution, to which was annexed the text of the Agenda for Development (see below).

The Working Group, established by Assembly resolution 49/126 in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 759], began its work in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 830] under the chairmanship of the Assembly President; it continued to meet during 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 728] and 1997. The proposal to establish an agenda for development as an integrated approach to the wide range of economic and social issues dealt with by the United Nations was first put forward by the Secretary-General in his 1992 report on the work of the Organization [YUN 1992, p. 15]. In response to an Assembly request made in resolution 48/166 in December 1993 [YUN 1993, p. 658], the Secretary-General submitted a 1994 report containing his recommendations for such an agenda [YUN 1994, p. 759], which the Working Group took into consideration, together with other input from the Economic and Social Council [YUN 1994, p. 759], the World Hearings on Development [YUN 1994, p. 758] and the Assembly itself [YUN 1994, p. 759].

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 20 June [meeting 103], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Ad Hoc Open-ended Working Group [A/51/45], adopted resolution 51/240 without vote [agenda item 96 (b)].

Agenda for Development

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 49/126 of 19 December 1994, in which it decided to establish an ad hoc open-ended working group of the Assembly to elaborate further an action-oriented, comprehensive agenda for development, which was to begin its work as early as possible in 1995 under the chairmanship of the President of the Assembly,

1. Takes note of the report of the Ad Hoc Open-ended Working Group of the General Assembly on an Agenda for Development;
2. Adopts the Agenda for Development, as set forth in the annex to the present resolution.

ANNEX

Agenda for Development

1. Development is one of the main priorities of the United Nations. Development is a multidimensional undertaking to achieve a higher quality of life for all people. Economic development, social development and environmental protection are interdependent and mutually reinforcing components of sustainable development.

Sustained economic growth is essential to the economic and social development of all countries, in particular developing countries. Through such growth, which should be broadly based so as to benefit all people, countries will be able to improve the standards of living of their people through the eradication of poverty, hunger, disease and illiteracy, the provision of adequate shelter and secure employment for all and the preservation of the integrity of the environment.

Democracy, respect for all human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the right to development, transparent and accountable governance and administration in all sectors of society, and effective participation by civil society are also an essential part of the necessary foundations for the realization of social and people-centred sustainable development.

The empowerment of women and their full participation on a basis of equality in all spheres of society is fundamental for development.

2. Building on the outcome of recent United Nations conferences and other relevant agreements, the Agenda for Development aims at invigorating a renewed and strengthened partnership for development, based on the imperatives of mutual benefits and genuine interdependence. It testifies to the renewed commitments of all countries to mobilize national and international efforts in pursuit of sustainable development and to revitalize and strengthen international cooperation for development. In that context, the Agenda for Development acknowledges the primacy of national policy and measures in the development process and calls for action towards a dynamic and enabling international economic environment, including an open, rule-based, equitable, secure, non-discriminatory, transparent and predictable multilateral trading system and promotion of investment and transfer of technology and knowledge, as well as for enhanced international cooperation in the mobilization and provision of financial resources for development from all sources, the strategy for durable solutions to the external debt and debt-servicing problems of developing countries and the efficient use of available resources.

I. Setting and objectives

A. Setting

Development, peace and security

3. Peace and development are closely interrelated and mutually supportive. Development should also be pursued in its own right. Development is indispensable to the achievement and maintenance of peace and security both within and among nations. Without development there can be neither peace nor security. There is complementarity between the processes related to the Agenda for Development and the Agenda for Peace. For peace and stability to endure, national action and effective international cooperation are required to promote a better life for all in larger freedom, a critical element of which is the eradication of poverty.

4. Development cannot be attained in the absence of peace and security or in the absence of respect for all human rights and fundamental freedoms. Under conditions of war, and during periods of short-term emergencies and humanitarian needs, development efforts are often neglected, diminished or abandoned. Excessive military expenditures, arms trade and investment for arms production, acquisition and stockpiling have a negative impact on development prospects. With the relaxation of international tensions the opportunity exists for reducing, as appropriate, military expenditures and investments for arms production and acquisition, consistent with national security requirements, in order to increase resources for social and economic development.

(a) Globalization, regional cooperation and interdependence: the need for a commitment for partnership

5. Profound changes have occurred, especially coupled with the end of the cold war, which question some of the traditional ways of addressing the challenge of development.

6. One such increasingly important change affecting all countries is the process of market-driven globalization, including as a result of rapid progress in information exchange and telecommunications. Globalization encompasses the varying degrees of increasing integration of world markets of goods, services, capital, technology and labour. This has generated greater openness and freer movement of factors of production and has created greater opportunities for international cooperation. Greatly increased trade and capital flows and technological developments open new opportunities for growth of the world economy, particularly in developing countries. Wider dissemination of ideas, cultures and lifestyles brought about by innovations in transportation and communications are also important manifestations of the globalization process. Globalization permits countries to share experiences and to learn from one another's achievements and difficulties and promotes a cross-fertilization of ideals, cultural values and aspirations, taking into account the recognition of cultural diversity.

7. Globalization of the world economy presents opportunities and challenges for the development process, as well as risks and uncertainties. As a result of the process of globalization and growing interdependence in the economic, social and environmental fields, an increasing number of issues cannot be effectively addressed by countries individually. Therefore, international cooperation is required. Furthermore, non-State actors with a global reach, such as transnational corporations, private financial institutions and non-governmental organizations, have important roles to play in the emerging network of international cooperation.

8. Greater interdependence among States has accelerated the international transmission of macroeconomic policy decisions and therefore their effects throughout the global economy. This is particularly true for the development prospects of the developing countries, which have been particularly affected by globalization.

9. Global financial integration presents new challenges and opportunities for the international community. Sound domestic macroeconomic policies in each country for promoting macroeconomic stability and growth are primary elements for determining private capital flows, and the coordination of macroeconomic policies, where appropriate, and a favourable international economic environment play an important role in reinforcing their effectiveness. The globalization of financial markets can generate new risks of instability, including interest rate and exchange rate fluctuations and volatile short-term capital flows, which require all countries to pursue sound economic policies and to recognize the external economic impact of their domestic policies. There is a need for the expansion of private capital flows and for broader access by all developing countries to these flows, and therefore a need for the international community to assist low-income countries, especially those in Africa, in their efforts to create an enabling environment necessary to attract such flows.

10. Increasing the capacity to respond to these trends requires sound domestic policies as well as a favourable international economic environment. Although new growth poles are emerging in a number of developing countries which will provide an increasing share of the stimulus to world development, it is likely that the role of the developed countries in world finance will remain preponderant for a long time. The policies they follow in their domestic affairs will, in the increasingly globalized capital markets, be of decisive importance for the rest of the world as they have a significant influence on world economic growth and, consequently, over the international economic environment.

11. Notwithstanding the importance of a favourable international economic environment, ultimately each country bears primary responsibility for its own economic and social policies for development. In order to take advantage of a rapidly integrating world economy, all countries should adopt sound and stable domestic policies, address external and internal imbalances and encourage a continuous process of adjustment. Sound national policies are also essential for cushioning external shocks. National policies of all countries would also benefit from improved political institutions and legal systems. In this context, the international community should give strong support to the efforts of developing countries to solve their serious social and economic problems and should promote a favourable international economic environment for development.

12. Globalization and interdependence are deepening the need and creating greater opportunities for international cooperation. The problems and questions that globalization and interdependence bring in their wake show that there clearly exists a shared, common interest among all countries in solving and answering them. International development cooperation, which is not only founded in solidarity but also based on mutual interest and partnership, forms an essential part of this effort. With the waning of ideological confrontations, the rise in globalization and the deepening of interdependence among nations, the historic opportunity has arisen for constructive dialogue among all countries, in particular among the developed and developing countries, and political mobilization for the promotion of international cooperation for development based on genuine partnership and mutuality of interests and benefits. The present Agenda for Development manifests our commitment to grasp this opportunity.

13. The deepening interdependence among countries has already led to the emergence and strengthening of regional economic groupings and arrangements. They are recognized as important catalysts for global economic growth and expansion of trade. They offer a framework for fostering and enhancing cooperation among States not only on economic policy but on other areas of common concern as well. Regional economic groupings and arrangements that are outward oriented, supportive of and complementary to the multilateral trading system are important actors in the global development process.

(b) Variety of development experiences and impact of globalization

14. Development experiences among countries reflect differences with both progress and setbacks. A number of developing countries have experienced rapid economic growth in the recent past and have become dynamic partners in the international economy. These countries, which maintain a high rate of economic growth, have increased their share in world trade and foreign direct investment, thereby expanding their role in the global economy.

15. At the same time, developing countries continue to face difficulties participating in the globalization process. Many risk being marginalized and effectively excluded from the globalization process. Many of them continue to be mired in poverty, hunger, malnutrition and economic stagnation, including slow or negative economic growth. The global changes in finance, communications and technology have largely bypassed them, despite their efforts at undertaking economic reforms, including structural adjustment programmes. The gap between the developed and developing countries remains unacceptably wide. Imbalances and uncertainties continue to exist in the global economy, which affect all countries but in particular the interests of the developing countries. We reiterate the need for broadening and strengthening the participation of developing countries in the international economic decision-making process.

16. The development spectrum ranges widely not only among countries but also within countries. The varied country situations indicate that, in addition to overall measures needed for the promotion of a favourable international economic environment for development, there is a need for specific measures in particular country situations. Success will often depend on the removal of key constraints, which vary greatly from country to country. Cooperation among developing countries and sharing their experiences can greatly contribute to achieving such success. It also requires that international development cooperation has to take into account the respective plans, programmes, needs, priorities and policies of developing countries. A new international partnership is required for development at the national, subregional, regional and international levels.

(c) Critical situations and special problems in developing countries

Critical situation in Africa

17. The critical socio-economic situation in Africa is of priority concern. Africa is the only region where poverty is expected to continue to increase substantially. Much of the continent suffers from, inter alia, inadequate physical and institutional infrastructure, poor human resource development, lack of food security, malnutrition, hunger, widespread epidemics and diseases and unemployment and underemployment.

These conditions are further compounded by a number of conflict and disaster situations. All these diverse limitations and constraints make it difficult for Africa to benefit fully from the processes of globalization and liberalization of trade and to integrate fully into the world economy. Increased mobilization of domestic and external resources for development, as well as their more effective use, are critical for the success of the economic and political reforms undertaken by African countries. International solidarity is fundamental to Africa's development and international cooperation and support must necessarily complement the national resources mobilized by the African countries themselves.

Critical situation in the least developed countries

18. The critical situations of the least developed countries, which are particularly marginalized from the world economy, require the priority attention of the entire international community, in support of appropriate domestic economic and social policies. The heavy burden of debt and debt servicing on their economies, deterioration in the terms of trade, decline in real terms in recent years in the overall level of official development assistance and limited flows of private resources are some of the main factors that impede the already limited opportunities for these countries to participate in and benefit from the processes of globalization and liberalization. By most measures of economic and human well-being, the least developed countries lag seriously behind. Their social indicators are consistently low and have worsened in some cases. Their institutional and physical infrastructures are fragile and therefore enhanced national and international support is required to strengthen them.

Special problems in small island developing States

19. The special problems of small island developing States also need to be given priority attention by the international community. The special challenges and constraints to their development arising from, inter alia, their limited market size and resource base, their particular transportation and communication problems and their high degree of vulnerability to natural and environmental disaster need to be addressed.

Special problems in landlocked developing countries

20. Lack of territorial access to the sea, aggravated by remoteness and isolation from world markets and prohibitive transit costs and risks, impose serious constraints on the overall socio-economic development efforts of the landlocked developing countries. The special challenges and constraints specific to these countries need to be addressed.

(d) Post-cold-war realities and challenges

(i) Special problems and features of countries with economies in transition

21. The special problems and features of countries with economies in transition require particular attention in the post-cold-war era. The dual transition to democracy and to a market economy makes their situation especially complex, particularly regarding their economic growth and sustainable development. This ongoing process is guided by and based on respect for human rights, transparent, representative and accountable governance, the rule of law and civil peace.

22. Considerable strains are put on the social fabric of the societies of the countries with economies in transition. Structural adjustments bring economic benefits but are causing social problems which were unknown before the transition. Severe environmental degradation, a worsening population situation and the problem of conversion of military production to civilian in those countries are of primary concern.

23. The completion of the transition process and the integration of those countries into the world economy and their effective involvement in the multilateral institutions will have a positive impact not only on the countries themselves but also on the global economy. Thus, it is especially important for them to promote effective cooperation in trade, economy, finance, science and technology with all countries and regions. Their integration should contribute to economic cooperation with developing countries and to mutually beneficial exchanges of scientific and industrial know-how. Increased cooperation among countries with economies in transition will also be important. In order to bring this integration about in a speedy manner, effective international support for reforms in those countries is essential both in terms of financial resources and of institutional expertise. The measures that should be undertaken in this regard must ensure the maximization of the benefits from, and the minimization of the negative effects of, trends in the world economy for all countries, in particular for developing countries.

(ii) The end of the cold war and the developing countries

24. While the end of the cold war has fostered a new spirit of dialogue and cooperation at the global political level, there is a need to improve the international economic environment so that it is more conducive to the socio-economic development of developing countries, including through the fulfilment of commitments agreed to at the recent major United Nations conferences.

25. In the post-cold-war situation, the record of development is so far a mixed one. The successful conclusion of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations, the consensus on development arising from recent major United Nations conferences and the expansion in private flows to developing countries are positive developments. On the other hand, the recent decline in real terms of official development assistance, the deterioration in terms of trade and the risk of marginalization from the world economy of developing countries, in particular the least developed countries, are particular concerns. The international community and multilateral financial institutions and the World Trade Organization should focus their attention on ways to address these concerns effectively.

(e) Democracy, transparent and accountable governance and the promotion and protection of all human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the right to development

26. The waning of ideological conflicts has improved the climate of cooperation at all levels. Although there is no universal prescription for successful development, a consensus has emerged, inter alia, that economic development, social development and environmental protection are interdependent and mutually reinforcing components of sustainable development, which is the framework of our efforts to achieve a higher quality of life for all people. In this context, we reaffirm that democracy, development and respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the right to development, are interdependent and mutually reinforcing.

27. Respect for all human rights and fundamental freedoms, democratic and effective institutions, combating corruption, transparent, representative and accountable governance, popular participation, an independent judiciary, the rule of law and civil peace are among the indispensable foundations for development. At the same time, we reaffirm that the right to development is a universal and inalienable right and an integral part of human rights. As stated in the Declaration on the Right to Development, the human person is the central subject of development. Development facilitates the enjoyment of all human rights, but the lack of development may not be invoked to justify the abridgement of internationally recognized human rights.

28. Efforts to reinforce democratic institutions and actions are vital for achieving peace and economic and social progress. Social stability, needed for productive growth, is nurtured by conditions in which people can readily express their will. For this, strong national participatory institutions are essential.

29. The existence of widespread absolute poverty inhibits the full and effective enjoyment of human rights and renders democracy and popular participation fragile. It is unacceptable that absolute poverty, hunger and disease, lack of adequate shelter, illiteracy and hopelessness should be the lot of over one billion people. We commit ourselves to the goal of eradicating poverty in the world through decisive national actions and international cooperation as an ethical social, political and economic imperative of humankind.

30. Democracy, which is spreading everywhere, has raised development expectations everywhere. Their non-fulfilment risks the rekindling of non-democratic forces. Structural reforms that do not take social realities into account could destabilize democratization processes as they impede the fulfilment of those expectations. While it is recognized that States have the primary responsibility for securing a sound and stable national political, economic and social environment for development, international support, at the request of interested Governments, and the creation of a favourable international economic environment are crucial ingredients in this effort.

31. It is increasingly recognized that the State's role in development should be complemented by other relevant actors of civil society, including the private sector. The State has the overall responsibility in various areas, including social, economic and environmental policy formulation, and for creating an enabling environment for the private sector; the State should encourage effective participation by the private sector and major groups in activities that complement and reinforce national objectives.

32. Every State has an inalienable right to choose its political, economic, social and cultural systems, without interference in any form by another State. By virtue of the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations, all peoples have the right freely to determine, without external interference, their political status and to pursue their economic, social and cultural development, and every State has the duty to respect this right in accordance with the provisions of the Charter.

B. Objectives

1. Strengthening international cooperation for development

(a) Implementing all international agreements and commitments for development

33. The new opportunities, challenges and risks opened by the globalization of and growing interdependence in the world economy, the critical situation and special problems in many developing countries and the special problems of economies in transition heighten the need for strengthened international cooperation. A strong political will is essential to sustain such cooperation. Through the present Agenda, we renew our commitment and seek to impart new vigour to a global partnership for development.

34. The international community has convened over the past five years or so a number of major conferences and meetings that have adopted decisions and made commitments on key development issues aimed at reinvigorating the development process and international cooperation for development. These include the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade, the World Conference on Education for All held at Jomtien, Thailand, the Second United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries, the World Summit for Children, the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, the Cartagena Commitment, Agenda 21 and the various consensus agreements and conventions adopted before, at or after the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, the World Conference on Human Rights, the Global Conference on the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States, the International Conference on Population and Development, the World Summit for Social Development, the Fourth World Conference on Women, the ninth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) and the World Food Summit.

35. Those conferences bear witness that the United Nations system is and should continue to be more actively involved in the full spectrum of development issues. The accords, commitments and internationally agreed targets reached at those conferences should be fully implemented by all States and international organizations. Only through full implementation can we give credence to the notion that these development initiatives are truly a priority issue for the international community.

36. Such implementation requires foremost political will by all actors at all levels. Too often the gap between what has been agreed and what has been implemented leaves much to be desired at both the national and the international levels. The commitments we have made individually and collectively need to be fulfilled if the development needs of all countries, particularly the developing countries, are to be addressed effectively.

37. To this end we reaffirm, through the present Agenda for Development, the continued relevance of the agreements reached at these international conferences and other meetings of the United Nations and stress the need for an integrated, interrelated and coherent implementation of and coordinated follow-up to the outcomes of those conferences.

- (b) Enhancing the role, capacity, effectiveness and efficiency of the United Nations system in development

38. As we approach the twenty-first century, it is the collective responsibility of the international community to ensure that within the multidimensional and integrated character of its mandate the United Nations system is equipped to show leadership in the fulfilment of the commitments made on international cooperation for development and to serve as a forum for the expression of global goals and as an advocate for the promotion and protection of all human rights, including the right to development and the protection of the environment, as well as to respond to humanitarian assistance requirements and to maintain peace and international security.

39. The United Nations system, by virtue of its global reach, its universal membership, its impartiality and the unique and comprehensive mandate reflected in its Charter, has a vital role to play in the development process. Enhancing that role, capacity, effectiveness and efficiency requires a continuous focus on development issues and ensuring its sound financial basis.

40. The wide array of issues which the United Nations system addresses is reflected in its various functions, such as those of the specialized agencies, including the Bretton Woods institutions, and the regional commissions. Each part of the system has a specific role to play in addressing those issues. Relative strengths and weaknesses among the various parts of the system cannot be ignored. Enhancing the role, capacity, effectiveness and efficiency of the United Nations system has to take those basic facts into account and programmes should be concentrated on areas where particular needs and the special capacity of the Organization converge.

41. However, overarching these considerations of efficiency and effectiveness of delivery is the political dimension of the development agenda. The United Nations is unique because it conducts international political debates on all issues in the economic, social and related fields. These debates should provide political impetus to other forums to undertake the necessary policies and measures. Hence, the political interaction of the United Nations not only with Member States, the specialized agencies, including the Bretton Woods institutions, and the regional commissions, as well as with organizations such as the World Trade Organization, but also with non-State actors should be intensified with a view to enhancing effective action and co-ordination among them in the economic, social and related fields.

42. The present Agenda for Development sets out a new framework for international cooperation, defines the role of the United Nations and how both can make a particular contribution, sets out the development priorities as well as time-frames for implementation and keeps the implementation of the development agenda under political review.

- 2. Promoting development based on an integrated approach

43. Sustained economic growth is essential for expanding the resource base for development and hence for economic, technical and social transformation. It generates the required financial, physical, human and technological resources. It is also essential to the eradication of poverty. An open and equitable framework for trade, investment and technology transfer, as well as enhanced cooperation in the management of a globalized world economy and in the formulation and implementation of macroeconomic policies, are critical for the promotion of growth and development. While the private sector is a motor for economic growth, the Government has an active and essential role in the formulation of economic, social and environmental policies.

44. In order to ensure an integrated approach to development centred on human beings and to achieve sustainable development, economic growth on its own is not sufficient and environmental protection cannot be considered in isolation from the development process. The goal of development is the improvement of human well-being and the quality of life. This involves the eradication of poverty, the fulfilment of the basic needs of all people and the protection of all human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the right to development. It requires that Governments apply active social and environmental policies and promote and protect all human rights and fundamental freedoms on the basis of democratic and widely participatory institutions.

45. Investments in health, education and training are particularly critical in the development of human resources and should be pursued in such a way that everyone, both women and men, are given an equal opportunity to participate actively and productively in the development process. The improvement of the role and status of women, including their empowerment, is central to all efforts to achieve sustainable development in its economic, social and environmental dimensions. Diversion of resources away from social priorities and needs should be avoided and, where it has occurred, be corrected. Basic social programmes and expenditures, in particular those affecting people living in poverty and the disadvantaged and vulnerable groups of society, should be protected from budget reductions. When formulating and implementing structural adjustment policies and programmes such considerations should be taken into account.

46. Development is and should be centred on human beings. Economic development, social development and environmental protection are interdependent and mutually reinforcing components of sustainable development, which is the framework of efforts to achieve a higher quality of life for all people. As the well-being of human beings depends on all facets of development, a multidimensional approach to development is essential. Therefore, any formulation of strategies, policies and national, subregional, regional and international actions has to be based on an integrated and comprehensive approach. It is in this spirit that we frame the present Agenda for Development.

All of the areas identified for action are closely inter-related for implementation of the Agenda.

II. Policy framework, including means of implementation

47. An encouraging development in recent years has been the almost universal pursuit of increased economic openness and integration. This has contributed to a growing economic and social interdependence among countries. It is a common responsibility and in the common interest to ensure that these trends continue and also to ensure that all countries benefit from them. The last point is fundamental: the benefits attributable to these various changes have been widespread, but they have been neither universal nor achieved without costs. A primary objective of the implementation of the present Agenda should be to contribute in such a way that the benefits stemming from future growth and development are distributed equitably among all countries and peoples.

48. Achieving and maintaining an international environment favourable to all countries is in the interest of all countries. Global economic, environmental and social issues can be approached effectively only through a constructive dialogue and genuine partnership among all countries. This requires recognition not only of the mutuality of interests and benefits but also of common, though differentiated, responsibilities. This mutual understanding has permeated the ongoing sequence of United Nations world conferences and summits.

49. However, some of the commitments and agreements for development, including those referring to international development cooperation, resulting from these conferences and summits, as well as from previous international undertakings, remain to be fulfilled. Those commitments, as well as the new and additional priority actions identified here, should be implemented in the spirit of solidarity and partnership. In this context, efforts should be made to mobilize public support for development cooperation, inter alia, through a strategy based on partnership between developed and developing countries, which incorporates, as appropriate, mutually agreed goals for development.

A. Economic development

1. Macroeconomic policies geared towards sustained economic growth and sustainable development

50. National developmental policies should be formulated in conformity with national needs, conditions and development priorities and should take into account the lessons learned from decades of development experience. Among the latter, the dynamic role of the private sector and the contribution of human resource development in creating wealth figure prominently. The challenge for public authorities is, inter alia, to develop and implement policies that are conducive to prosperity and that eradicate poverty and conserve the environment.

51. To this end, Governments should encourage a supportive environment for the private sector, including active competition policies, the application of the rule of law, an open framework for trade and investment and sound fiscal and monetary policies. In the area of finance, policies need both to promote domestic savings and to attract external resources for productive investment. For both purposes, it is necessary to improve the efficiency of domestic financial markets. Addressing the needs of people living in poverty and the disadvantaged and vulnerable groups of society, and the creation of more and better jobs, requires attention to be given to conducive macroeconomic policies and to such issues as human resources development, gender equality, public participation and social integration. Social and environmental factors should be considered as important elements to be taken into account by all countries in the formulation and implementation of macroeconomic policies. Particular attention should be paid to the effect of structural adjustment programmes on people living in poverty and on disadvantaged and vulnerable groups of society.

52. Increased economic integration and interdependence place greater responsibilities than before on all countries, but particularly the developed countries, to contribute to ensuring that their domestic policies are favourable to economic growth and development in the rest of the world. National and international actions are closely interrelated and should be seen as mutually reinforcing components of the overall goal of achieving development. In order to foster a supportive international environment for development, countries should pursue economic stability, full employment, a low rate of inflation, sustainable external and internal balances, including the avoidance of excessive budget deficits, low long-term real interest rates and a measure of exchange rate stability. They should also ensure open financial and commercial markets and, where appropriate, provide concessional aid flows.

53. International cooperation in the formulation and implementation of macroeconomic policies should be reinforced with a view to promoting greater coherence and consistency of domestic policies and thereby enhancing their effectiveness. Measures should also be taken to broaden cooperation among monetary authorities in order to maintain a sound international financial system. This enhanced cooperation should take full account of the interests and concerns of all countries. Multilateral surveillance should correspondingly address the policies and measures of all countries.

2. International trade and commodities

54. The growing, though far from complete, integration of all countries in world trade and investment represents a historic structural change in international economic relations. In recent years, trade of developing countries has increased, largely as a result of their liberalization policies concerning trade and investment. The expansion of their markets appears to be creating a virtuous circle in which mutually beneficial liberalization of trade and investment can become a major means for generating the resources necessary for development.

55. The liberalization of trade regimes and the promotion of an open and secure multilateral trading system are central requirements for the promotion of economic development. All Governments should commit themselves to the liberalization of trade and investment policies and should foster international cooperation towards this goal. All countries have a shared interest in an open, ruled-based, equitable, non-discriminatory, transparent and predictable multilateral trading system. While many provisions in this area have been identified by the General Assembly over the last five years, the agreements as represented by the World Trade Organization are particularly important. In this regard, the World Trade Organization's dispute settlements mechanism is a key element for the credibility of the multilateral trade system. The commitments agreed upon in the Final Act of the Uruguay Round should be implemented fully. Unilateral actions of a protectionist nature, inconsistent with multilateral trade agreements, should be avoided and prevented. Appropriate monitoring measures should be established to ensure that, in the implementation of the Uruguay Round, the rights, interests and concerns of all countries are protected, recognized and redressed.

56. There is a need to promote greater integration in the world economy of those countries that have not yet benefited from the overall increase in trade and investment flows, in particular African countries and the least developed countries. Special attention should be given to the full implementation of the specific provisions for the least developed countries, including the provisions emanating from the Marrakesh agreements, and to the needs of the net food-importing developing countries, so that all countries benefit fully from the results of the Uruguay Round. These measures will also require domestic efforts to promote greater diversification of trade of those countries and to increase the competitiveness of their trading sectors.

57. Efforts to make trade and environment policies mutually supportive in favour of sustainable development should continue. Trade liberalization measures should be complemented by sound environmental policies, but measures adopted for environmental purposes should not become a means of arbitrary and unjustifiable trade discrimination or a disguised form of protectionism. In the same vein, social concerns should not be used for protectionist purposes.

58. Commodity exports continue to play a key role in the economies of many developing countries, especially in terms of their export earnings, the livelihoods of their people, and the dependence of general economic vitality on those exports. This makes the continuing deterioration in their terms of trade of special concern, even if there is some recent evidence of improvement in the prices of some primary commodities. Increased participation of developing countries in the processing, marketing and distribution of their commodities, if accompanied by improved market access, provides an alternative means for ensuring greater value added, as well as predictability and increased export earnings, from commodity production. This diversification will require such countries to continue their macroeconomic, trade and investment policy reforms.

59. It will also require a strong commitment by the international community to support such policy reforms. The international community should endeavour to improve the functioning of commodity markets, with greater transparency and more stable and predictable conditions. There should be further evaluation of the usefulness of commodity agreements in this regard, taking into account the potential of new financial and trading instruments and techniques. Improved market access for primary commodities, especially in their processed forms, should be provided, particularly by developed countries. They should also respond favourably to requests for technical assistance aimed at enhancing the diversification of the export sector in those developing countries which are highly dependent on the export of a limited number of commodities. The strengthening of multilateral compensatory financing schemes is a further means of addressing the short-term difficulties that can arise as a result of heavy dependence on commodity exports.

60. The United Nations Conference on Trade and Development must build upon its comparative advantage and offer support appropriate to the needs of developing countries to ensure that they participate in the world economy on a more equitable basis. Its policy research and analytical work must illuminate the changes in the global economy as they relate to trade, investment, technology, services and development. This work should be undertaken in cooperation with the World Trade Organization and other relevant international institutions.

3. Issues of internal and external finance

(a) Mobilization of domestic resources for development

61. Both domestic and external resources are required for development. In most countries, domestic savings contribute by far the larger part of the resources utilized for investment and are mainly mobilized through national fiscal and monetary policies, including equitable taxation and fiscal incentives. Exploring new ways of generating new public and private financial resources, inter alia, through the appropriate reduction of excessive military expenditures, including global military expenditures and the arms trade and investments for arms production and acquisition, taking into consideration national security requirements, will be undertaken so as to allow possible allocation of additional funds for social and economic development.

62. The experiences of those developing countries which have achieved high rates of economic growth in recent years show that sustained economic growth is linked to an effective strategy for domestic resource mobilization. Those economies have maintained significantly higher rates of national savings and investment than other developing countries. However, some developing countries have limited scope for increasing savings because of their low per capita income levels and because levels of consumption are already low and are difficult to restrain further; those countries will continue to need substantial external resources as an important complement to domestic efforts to stimulate their development.

(b) External resources

63. Total net resource flows to developing countries have expanded rapidly in the 1990s. However, the trend has not been universal, in terms of either the types of financing or the recipients. Within the total, official (public sector) flows have languished; all the growth has been accounted for by an increase in the private sector component. Secondly, while some low-income countries have been the recipients of the increased private sector capital flows, others have not benefited at all.

(c) External debt

64. There is an urgent need for effective, equitable, development-oriented and durable solutions to the external debt and debt-servicing problems of developing countries and to help them to exit from the rescheduling process. The evolving debt strategy has contributed to the improvement in the debt situation of a number of developing countries. Debt-relief measures have been undertaken by creditor countries both within the framework of the Paris Club and through their cancellation and equivalent relief of bilateral official debt. Nevertheless, external debt and debt-servicing problems have persisted, particularly for the poorest and most heavily indebted countries. Debt-servicing problems of middle-income countries should continue to be addressed effectively.

65. Those developing countries that have continued, at great cost to themselves, to meet their international debt and debt-servicing obligations in a timely fashion have done so despite serious external and domestic financial constraints.

(d) Official development assistance

66. Official development assistance is a small proportion of a country's total resources for development, but is a significant source of external resources for many developing countries, particularly African countries and the least developed countries. As such, it can play an important complementary and catalytic role in promoting economic growth. Despite its critical importance, the overall decline in official development assistance is a serious cause for concern.

(e) Role of multilateral financial institutions

67. The multilateral financial institutions have an important role to play in meeting the challenges and urgent needs of development and the commitments made at a series of recent international conferences. Renewed efforts should be made in order to provide them with resources commensurate with their role, while pursuing ongoing efforts to increase efficiency and effectiveness. So that international financial facilities, particularly the International Development Association, have more positive effects on development, the commitments for their replenishment should be fully implemented in a timely manner, thereby contributing more effectively to development.

(f) United Nations financing for development

68. At present, the capacity of United Nations funds and programmes to respond to the needs of developing countries is being threatened by the persistent insufficiency of resources for the operational development activities of the United Nations, in particular the decline in contributions to core resources. At the same time, the present sequence of global conferences and other international meetings has resulted in a wide range of additional development demands being imposed on the United Nations. The efficiency, effectiveness, accountability and impact of the operational activities of the United Nations system must also be enhanced.

(g) Private investment flows

69. Private resource flows to developing countries, including foreign direct investment, have increased in recent years. Key determinants for attracting external private sector capital are, inter alia, a stable domestic political, legal and economic environment, based on the rule of law, sound economic policies and an openness to foreign investment. Other factors include the prospects for growth and a favourable external environment.

70. The growth in foreign direct investment in developing countries is of particular importance since, in addition to finance, the recipient economy usually benefits in terms of technology transfer and enhanced access to export markets. However, foreign direct investment in developing countries, as well as the recent parallel surge in international portfolio investment, has been concentrated in the more advanced economies, the larger economies and those with high rates of economic growth. This situation needs to be addressed. There is also a need to promote favourable conditions for achieving international stability in private capital flows and to prevent the destabilization arising from swift movements of private capital flows.

(h) Peace dividend

71. When the cold war ended, a peace dividend appeared at hand. The relaxation of international tensions was thought to offer opportunities for reducing military spending worldwide and for using the resources so released to enhance spending on social and economic development for the benefit of all countries. There should be an appropriate reduction of excessive military expenditures, including global military expenditures and the arms trade, and investments for arms production and acquisition, taking into consideration national security requirements, so as to allow possible allocation of additional funds for social and economic development. While the reduction in global political tensions has yielded many benefits, the impact on development has not materialized in a tangible form or to the extent that was foreseen.

4. Science and technology

72. The ability of countries to participate in, benefit from and contribute to the rapid advances in science and technology can significantly influence their development. Hence, international cooperation efforts should be intensified and strengthened towards endogenous capacity-building in science and technology of developing countries, including their capacity to utilize scientific and technological developments from abroad and to adapt them to suit local conditions. There is a need to promote, facilitate and finance, as appropriate, access to and transfer of environmentally sound technologies and the corresponding know-how in particular to the developing countries on favourable terms, including on concessional and preferential terms, as mutually agreed, taking into account the need to protect intellectual property rights as well as the special needs of developing countries. In this regard, the international community is called upon to meet all the objectives reaffirmed in chapter 34 of Agenda 21.

73. Promotion of science and technology for development calls for a clear definition of the respective roles in this area of the private sector, Governments and international organizations. The private sector plays a role in the productive application of science and technology and most commercially relevant technology is controlled by the private sector. Governments play a role in ensuring that there is a propitious environment for the development, access to, transfer, adaptation and application of environmentally sound technologies and in providing appropriate regulatory frameworks and incentives for the development of scientific and technological capabilities. Promotion of science and technology for development also requires a labour force that has the professional and technical training necessary to utilize newly introduced technologies.

74. Developing countries should further advance their collective efforts in promoting technology research, training, development and dissemination, as well as facilitating access and exchange through information and technology centres. This development calls for continued and enhanced support from the international community through technical assistance and financing. The international community should also continue to promote the development of effective and mutually beneficial technological cooperation between countries with economies in transition and all other countries, including in the area of new and emerging technologies.

75. International cooperation can complement national science and technology policy measures and is necessary in areas where global interests are at stake. The world community has a common interest in the development and widespread dissemination of technology geared towards environmental protection and conservation and the rational use of energy and raw materials. Governments should implement the commitments they made in Agenda 21 on this subject.

5. South-South cooperation

76. South-South cooperation is an integral and dynamic part of international development cooperation. The end of the cold war, increasing globalization, liberalization, regional cooperation and interdependence are all making such cooperation more imperative. The countries of the South exhibit common as well as varying development experiences and know-how that offer many opportunities at the bilateral, subregional, regional, interregional and international levels for greater cooperation between them. Grasping these opportunities will result in a stronger basis for their self-reliance and development as well as provide an important complement to international development cooperation.

77. Exploiting trade opportunities among countries of the South by undertaking trade promotion activities, devising payment arrangements and expanding availability of trade information is particularly important. At the same time, there are many other areas, such as communications, information, transportation, investments, science and technology, environment, food and agriculture, population, education and human resource development, in which South-South cooperation can be fostered and promoted.

78. Technical cooperation, arrangements to improve market access, technical and financial assistance, sharing of knowledge and technology and exchange of information are some of the many ways and actions by which developing countries that have been able to achieve social and economic progress can assist those that have been less successful. The concept of triangular cooperation, which involves, inter alia, technical, financial and other support by developed countries and international organizations for South-South cooperation, can also make a significant contribution to the promotion of cooperation among developing countries. All these collaborative efforts should be accorded high priority and increased support from the international community and assistance from all sources, including relevant multilateral institutions and non-State actors.

6. Regional economic cooperation

79. Regional economic integration and cooperation is increasingly recognized as a means towards expanding trade and investment opportunities, and for promoting economic growth and sustainable development and other forms of cooperation between countries of various regions. Regional arrangements can also contribute to growth of the world economy.

80. Regional economic integration and cooperation should be actively considered as a means of eliminating obstacles to trade and investment and of fostering economic cooperation within a region. However, there is the risk that regional organizations may turn inward and that the world will evolve into competing economic blocs. Therefore, reductions of barriers to trade and investment among members or participants in regional groupings should be consistent with internationally agreed rules, where applicable, and without detriment to other economies.

81. Regional economic groupings should be outward-oriented and supportive of the multilateral trading system. This requires a strong commitment by the international community, in its pursuit of regional economic integration and cooperation, to open regionalism within the framework of an equitable, non-discriminatory and rule-based multilateral trading system.

82. Regional cooperation also provides a vehicle for addressing environmental and social issues of common concern. The development of common approaches to environmental problems of a transboundary nature is particularly pertinent. National efforts at combating poverty and unemployment and promoting social integration can also benefit from regional cooperation. Furthermore, possibilities could be explored for using regional forums as a means of cooperation in supporting national action to promote and protect all human rights and fundamental freedoms, the rule of law and democratic institutions.

83. Regional integration and cooperation should be complementary and contributory to national policies and to global multilateralism. In order to take advantage of regionalism, multilateral economic and trade institutions must have the capacity to accommodate regional arrangements in their structures. The challenge is to use both global and regional arrangements in a mutually supportive way.

7. Development in agriculture, industry and the services sectors

84. The agricultural, industrial and services sectors need to be developed in a balanced manner. While it is recognized that the private sector is the primary contributor to sectoral development, Governments have an important role to play in creating the enabling environment for sectoral development to flourish, particularly in the agricultural and services sectors. Besides promoting a dynamic and competitive domestic economy, based on comparative advantages, and providing physical and institutional infrastructures, domestic sectoral policies should also seek to integrate the protection and conservation of the environment and the achievement of social development objectives into sectoral development plans.

85. In implementing sectoral policies, particular attention should be given to the potential of such policies to generate employment and contribute to the eradication of poverty. In this context, the important contribution of small and medium-sized enterprises should be recognized. It is also essential to facilitate equal access of women to resources, training, employment, market and trade and to strengthen their economic capacity and commercial networks, as well as their equal access to, and equal opportunity to participate in, scientific and technological areas.

86. The agricultural sector remains the main source of income for the majority of the population in developing countries. Its marginalization from the overall process of economic development should be avoided. Agricultural policies should particularly aim at increasing food production, improving access to food by low-income people and enhancing the income-generating potential of agriculture. Developing countries, with the support of the international community, should promote the development of small and medium-sized agro-industries and cooperatives and improve the processing, transportation, distribution and marketing of food and other agricultural products. Governments should enhance, at the national and local levels, the income-generating potential of rural women by facilitating their equal access to and control over productive resources, land, credit, capital, property rights, development programmes and co-operative structures.

87. The industrial sector constitutes one of the key factors in sustained economic growth and in achieving social objectives. In order to promote industrial development, policies in this area should be geared towards ensuring the legal and institutional framework that fosters entrepreneurship and attracts foreign investment, protecting intellectual property rights and facilitating technology cooperation. Moreover, special support should be given to the promotion and development of environmentally sustainable industry and attention needs to be directed to rural industrial development, to industrialization programmes for marginalized segments and regions and to enhancing the role of women in industrial development.

88. The services sector is of increasing importance for the economies of developing countries. Developing countries should continue to pursue policies to create conditions for the development of their national services sector through the modernization of the necessary infrastructure. Measures should include enhancing the efficiency of domestic sectors by encouraging human resource development and by ensuring appropriate investment policies.

89. All countries should enhance the efficiency of domestic service sectors through greater internal and external competition and by ensuring the transparency, effectiveness and non-discriminatory nature of domestic regulations, in accordance to each country's commitments, and with the provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, including article IV on the increasing participation of developing countries. The developing countries face a major challenge of strengthening the capabilities of their domestic services to derive full benefits from the implementation of the General Agreement on Trade in Services. In this context, as reaffirmed at the ninth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, appropriate technical assistance should be extended to developing countries to develop and strengthen their service sectors to help to ensure that they reap the maximum benefits from liberalization of trade in services.

90. The domestic sectoral policies elaborated by developing countries should be supported by favourable international action. Trade liberalization should be pursued on a global basis. It should include the liberalization of market access in sectors and modes of supply of exports of interest to developing countries and should cover access to technology on a commercial basis, to distribution channels and to information networks. With the growing internationalization of the services sector, further action should be taken to facilitate the participation of developing countries in international service transactions.

B. Social development

91. Equitable social development is a necessary foundation for development and an important factor in the eradication of poverty. The commitments agreed upon at the World Summit for Social Development should be fully implemented.

92. The ultimate goal of development is to improve and enhance human well-being and the quality of life of all people. Social development is best pursued if Governments actively promote empowerment and participation in a democratic and pluralistic system respectful of all human rights and fundamental freedoms. Efforts to sustain broad-based economic growth reinforce the promotion of social development. Processes to promote increased and equal economic opportunities, to avoid exclusion and to overcome socially divisive disparities while respecting diversity are also part of an enabling environment for social development.

93. It is the primary responsibility of States to attain social development. But the international community, the United Nations system, the multilateral financial institutions, all regional organizations and local authorities and all actors of civil society also need to contribute their own share of efforts and resources to promote social development and to reduce inequalities among people and narrow the gap between developed and developing countries. As part of these shared responsibilities, interested developed and developing country partners could agree on mutual commitments to allocate, on average, 20 per cent of official development assistance and 20 per cent of their national budget, respectively, to basic social programmes.

1. Eradication of poverty and hunger

94. Poverty continues to affect far too many people in the world. Hunger and malnutrition, ill-health, lack of access to safe drinking water, little access to education and other public services and resources, exclusion, lack of participation and violence are some of the many aspects that characterize poverty. Widespread poverty affects the future of societies, as children growing up in poverty are often permanently disadvantaged. The burden of poverty is disproportionately borne by women. Although poverty occurs in all countries, its extent and manifestation are particularly severe in developing countries.

95. The goal of eradicating poverty in the world is an ethical, social, political and economic imperative. It can be achieved only through a multidimensional and integrated approach that combines programmes targeted at people living in poverty with policies and strategies that meet the basic needs of all, strengthen their productive capacities, empower them to participate in decision-making on policies that affect them, ensure access of all to productive resources, opportunities and public services, enhance social protection and reduce vulnerability. Sustained and broad-based economic growth, social development and environmental protection are crucial for raising living standards and for eliminating poverty in a sustained manner.

96. At international conferences organized by the United Nations in the recent years, Governments committed themselves to meet the basic needs of all. High priority should be placed on achieving and monitoring the goals and targets set in the areas of education, health, food security, shelter and access to safe drinking water and sanitation, in partnership with major development actors.

97. At the World Summit for Social Development, it was decided to formulate or strengthen, preferably by 1996, national policies and strategies geared to substantially reducing overall poverty in the shortest possible time, reducing inequalities and eradicating absolute poverty by a target date to be specified by each country. National budgets and policies should be designed with the strategic objective of meeting basic needs, eradicating poverty and reducing inequalities.

98. The eradication of poverty requires determined national actions. At the same time, the international community, bilaterally and through the multilateral financial institutions and other international organizations, should support the efforts of developing countries in the eradication of poverty and in ensuring basic social protection.

99. Commitments and targets agreed upon since 1990 to achieve the overall goal of poverty eradication should be fully implemented by Governments, in partnership with all development actors, the United Nations system, including financial institutions, non-governmental organizations and the international community as a whole. The United Nations system should make every effort to enhance the coordination of actions relative to poverty eradication and to support developing countries and other countries in that endeavour.

100. Hunger and malnutrition continue to be the fate of hundreds of millions of people, most of whom live in Africa and the least developed countries. Eliminating hunger and malnutrition and achieving food security are major objectives of the present Agenda. Therefore, the institutional structures of the United Nations system must be made more effective in this respect.

101. The key to increasing food production lies in the sustainable development of the agricultural sector and in improving market opportunities. Solving the problems in developing countries calls not only for improving agricultural productivity, but also for financial incentives to encourage investment in agriculture. It is also important to promote secure land tenure and access to resources and technology for farmers, in particular women, whose role is crucial in food supply and food security. The macroeconomic and trade policy issues and the social factors that constrain and limit the achievement of food security in the least developed countries should also be addressed.

102. The international community should support the efforts of Africa and the least developed countries to increase food security. It should strive to ensure co-ordinated and rapid delivery of food assistance in situations of transitory food insecurity, in full awareness of longer-term national and local development objectives and the need to improve access to food of the most vulnerable groups of the population.

2. Employment

103. Creating adequately and appropriately remunerated employment for all and reducing unemployment and underemployment are essential for combating poverty and for promoting social integration.

104. Pursuing the goal of full employment should be a basic priority of economic and social policies, so as to enable all men and women to attain secure and sustainable livelihoods through freely chosen productive employment and work. At the World Summit for Social Development, Governments agreed on those common goals and on a set of objectives, policies and strategies to achieve them.

105. Economic growth as well as the expansion of productive employment should go hand in hand. The expansion of adequately and appropriately remunerated employment and the reduction of unemployment should be placed at the centre of economic and social policies with the participation of employers, workers and their respective organizations. The basic rights and interests of workers and the quality of jobs should be ensured and the relevant conventions of the International Labour Organization should be fully respected. Also essential is ensuring equal employment opportunities for women and men. Special efforts should be made against long-term and structural unemployment and underemployment, particularly among youth and women. In employment creation, employment development strategies should take into account the role of self-employment, entrepreneurship, small and medium-sized enterprises and the informal sector.

106. The United Nations should elaborate ways and means to implement, follow up on and assess the outcome of the World Summit for Social Development in relation to the goal of full employment through expansion of productive employment and the reduction of unemployment. The General Assembly, through the Economic and Social Council with the support of the Commission for Social Development and other relevant bodies as well as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, should be involved in the implementation of, follow-up to and assessment of international commitments on employment. The International Labour Organization, because of its mandate, has a special role to play in this regard.

3. Social integration

107. The aim of social integration is to create "a society for all", where every individual, each with rights and responsibilities, has an active role to play. Since the founding of the United Nations, the quest for humane, stable, safe, tolerant and just societies has shown a mixed record. While progress has been achieved in many areas, there have also been negative developments, such as social polarization and fragmentation, widening disparities and inequalities of income and wealth within and among nations and marginalization of people, families and social groups. Even entire countries have been negatively affected owing to rapid social change, economic transformation, migration and major dislocations, particularly in areas of armed conflicts and violence in its various manifestations.

108. These are compelling reasons for actions by Governments, individually and, as appropriate, jointly, to foster social cohesion, while recognizing and protecting diversity. An inclusive society must be based on respect for all human rights and fundamental freedoms, on non-discrimination, tolerance, equality of opportunity, solidarity, security and respect for diversity, and on participation of all people, including the vulnerable and disadvantaged groups and persons. The problems of crime, violence and abuse of and trafficking in drugs should also be addressed. International cooperation in the area of drugs should be reinforced in accordance with the Global Programme of Action adopted in the context of the international decade to fight drug abuse. In this context, the convening of a special session of the General Assembly in order to consider the fight against the illicit production, supply, demand, trafficking and distribution of narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances and related activities, and to propose new strategies, methods, practical activities and specific measures to strengthen international co-operation in addressing the problem of illicit drugs is of the highest importance.

4. Human resources development

109. At the World Conference on Education for All and the World Summit for Social Development, Governments committed themselves to ensuring universal access to quality education, attaining the highest possible standards of physical and mental health and ensuring access of all to primary health care. This should include efforts to rectify inequalities relating to social conditions, race, national origin, age or disability, and between urban and rural areas. Appropriate steps should be taken to close the gender gap at all levels of education and to ensure the full access of women to health care throughout the life cycle.

110. Quality education is critical for enabling people to develop their full capacities in health and dignity and to participate actively in the social, economic and political process of development. It is also crucial for achieving the objectives of economic development. Education and vocational training are the key to higher productivity and allow faster and easier adaptation to technological and economic change. They are vital for job creation and combating unemployment and for sustained growth.

111. Resolute and vigorous national actions are crucial for developing human resources. Governments have committed themselves to formulating or strengthening strategies for the eradication of illiteracy and universalization of basic education. The link between education and training and labour market policies should be strengthened, so as to facilitate the adaptation of workers and employers to changing economic conditions, technologies and labour markets. Not only should the importance of higher education and scientific research be emphasized, but also that of broadening the means and scope of basic education, of enhancing the learning environment and of promoting lifelong learning.

112. From the perspective of the economy at large, it is of great importance that the requisite policies be applied to ensure human resources development, including a satisfactory level of education and training of the workforce and increasing their receptivity to technological innovations, in particular in the field of information technology.

113. Efforts to achieve the goals of national "health for all" strategies, in line with the Alma Ata conference declaration on primary health care, should be expedited. The need for an integrated and intersectoral approach to health strategies has been recognized, as well as the importance of strengthening national and international efforts to prevent and combat epidemics and other diseases that are endemic in many developing countries, and in particular to address malaria and the spread of human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS) more effectively.

114. At previous international conferences, Governments agreed upon a set of goals and objectives for national and international efforts in the areas of education, literacy and health, in particular maternal and child health, and the control of major communicable diseases. We are committed to achieving those goals within the time-frame we agreed to.

115. Enhanced international cooperation is also called for to advance human resources development. Concerted efforts should be made to support the efforts of developing countries, especially the least developed countries and other countries in need to develop their human resources. Developed countries have an important role to play. Human resources development and institution-building can also be promoted through cooperation among developing countries. International organizations, including the international financial institutions, must give high priority to supporting the objectives of human resources development and to integrating them into their policies, programmes and operations. Support might include exchange of information and training and skill development programmes, as well as the provision of other forms of assistance.

5. Human settlements

116. More people than ever are living in absolute poverty and without adequate shelter. Inadequate shelter and homelessness are growing plights in many countries, threatening standards of health, security and even life itself. Urban settlements have the ability to support large numbers of people while limiting their impact on the natural environment. Yet many cities are witnessing harmful patterns of growth, production and consumption, land use, mobility and degradation of their physical infrastructure.

117. At the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II), the international community adopted the goals and principles of adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development in an urbanizing world. It reaffirmed its commitment to the full and progressive realization of the right to adequate housing, as provided for in international instruments. The international community also subscribed to the principles and goals of equitable human settlements, in which all people have equal access to housing, infrastructure, health services, adequate food and water, education and open spaces. It affirmed that eradication of poverty is essential for sustainable human settlements.

118. Sustainable development is essential to human settlements development and gives full consideration to the needs and necessities of achieving economic growth, social development and environmental protection. Special consideration should be given to the specific situation and needs of developing countries, and, as appropriate, of countries with economies in transition. Human settlements shall be planned, developed and improved in a manner that takes full account of sustainable development principles and all their components, as set out in Agenda 21 and related outcomes of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development.

119. Formulation and implementation of strategies for human settlements development are primarily the responsibility of each country at national and local levels within the legal framework of each country. National plans of action and other relevant national programmes and actions to achieve the goals of adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development will need to be developed or strengthened, where appropriate, and their implementation will need to be monitored and evaluated by Governments in close cooperation with their partners in development at the national level. There is also a need for an enabling international environment and for integrated approaches at the national and international levels to support these efforts.

120. New and additional financial resources from various sources are necessary to achieve the goals of adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development in an urbanizing world. The existing resources available to developing countries—public, private, multilateral, bilateral, domestic and external—need to be enhanced through appropriate and flexible mechanisms and economic instruments to support adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development. These should be accompanied by concrete measures for international technical cooperation and information exchange.

121. The United Nations system, in cooperation with all States and with relevant international and non-governmental organizations also has a key role to play in promoting international cooperation on the provision of adequate shelter and sustainable human settlements development in an urbanizing world as well as in rural areas.

C. Empowerment of women

122. While the status of women has advanced in some important respects in the past decade, progress has been uneven, inequalities between men and women have persisted and major obstacles remain to women's empowerment, with serious consequences for the well-being of all people.

123. The Beijing Declaration and the Platform for Action adopted by the Fourth World Conference on Women are important contributions to the advancement of women worldwide and must be translated into effective action by all States, the United Nations system and other organizations concerned, as well as non-governmental organizations.

124. Empowering women is essential for achieving the goals of sustainable development centred on human beings. It requires appropriate public policies to ensure that women enjoy all human rights and fundamental freedoms and participate fully and equally in all spheres of public life, including decision-making. Public policies to promote women's economic potential and independence and their full and equal participation in development are also essential for the empowerment of women. Before decisions are taken in the areas of social and economic development and of the environment, an analysis should be made of their impact on women and men respectively.

125. Measures should be taken to ensure the full enjoyment by women and the girl child of all human rights and fundamental freedoms. Actions to be taken by States in this regard include fulfilling their commitments regarding the ratification of, accession to and the implementation of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women so that universal ratification of the Convention can be achieved by the year 2000, and avoiding as far as possible resorting to reservations. Measures should also be taken to ensure women's full and equal access to economic resources and social services through full respect for their human rights and fundamental freedoms.

126. Measures are needed to ensure women's equal access to education and to training and retraining. The targets set by the Fourth World Conference on Women for achieving gender equality in primary and secondary education should be implemented. Measures should be taken to ensure women's equal rights with men and their equal access to economic resources and social services, including land, credit, science and technology, vocational training, information, communication, markets and education and the right to inheritance. Eliminating occupational segregation and wage inequality and creating a flexible work environment that facilitates the restructuring of work patterns and the sharing of family responsibilities are also major goals. Methods should be developed for assessing the value of unremunerated work outside national accounts. Policies and development strategies that address the needs and efforts of women living in poverty should be reviewed, adopted or maintained in line with the recommendations of the Platform for Action.

127. Measures are also needed to achieve the full participation of women in decision-making processes in all walks of life and at all levels. The success of policies and measures aimed at supporting or strengthening the promotion of gender equality and the improvement of the status of women should be based on the integration of the gender perspective in general policies relating to all spheres of society as well as the implementation of positive measures with adequate institutional and financial support at all levels. Enhanced participation by women will also contribute to ensuring that all policies and programmes are designed, implemented and monitored in full awareness of their possible or actual gender-specific effects.

128. The Beijing Declaration and the Platform for Action should be urgently implemented in their entirety. Adequate mobilization of resources at the national and international levels, as well as new and additional resources to developing countries from all available funding mechanisms to strengthen the advancement of women, are required. The implementation of the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women, aimed at achieving equality by the year 2000, should be accelerated. Also called for is implementation of the relevant sections of Agenda 21 and of the Programme of Action adopted by the International Conference on Population and Development and the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development, as well as of the Geneva Declaration for Rural Women adopted by the Summit on the Economic Advancement of Rural Women and the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action adopted by the World Conference on Human Rights.

D. Rights of the child

129. Children are the most important resource for the future. Greater investment in children by parents and societies is essential to the achievement of sustained economic growth, social development and environmental protection. Therefore, the promotion, to the fullest extent, of the health, well-being and potential of all children, adolescents and youth is a crucial objective. The international community expressed its commitment to that objective when it adopted the Convention on the Rights of the Child and at the World Summit for Children. We call for full implementation of the Convention on the Rights of the Child and encourage States to remove all reservations to that Convention.

130. Measures must be undertaken by States, with the support of the international community, to achieve, by the year 2000, the goals contained in the plan of action adopted at the World Summit for Children and to reach the goals set by subsequent international forums for the year 2000 and beyond. The rights of children must be ensured, with special attention paid to the particular situation of girls. Their rights to a standard of living adequate for their health and well-being, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services, and their rights to education must be ensured, recognizing the rights, duties and responsibilities of parents and other persons legally responsible for children to provide, in a manner consistent with the evolving capacity of the child, appropriate direction. The efforts of developing countries to achieve those major goals must be supported.

131. Exploitation, maltreatment, child prostitution and child abuse should be combated, and the root causes of these phenomena have to be addressed. Actions are also needed for improving the situation and protecting the rights of children in especially difficult circumstances and ensuring that the vital importance of family reunification is recognized, in line with the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development, and taking into account the relevant provisions of the 1951 Convention relating to the Status of Refugees.

132. Another key issue with regard to the rights of the child is child labour, which is pervasive in many parts of the world. Overall socio-economic conditions, income uncertainty, women's health and education, schooling opportunities and the size of households all have an impact on child labour. Abolishing child labour requires setting specific target dates for eliminating all forms of child labour that are contrary to accepted international standards, in particular article 32 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, for ensuring the full enforcement of relevant existing laws and, where appropriate, for enacting the legislation necessary to implement the Convention on the Rights of the Child, and relevant International Labour Organization standards. In this context, priority should be given to the elimination of all extreme forms of child labour, such as forced labour, bonded labour and other forms of slavery. National efforts to deal with the problem of working children can be complemented by international support measures, which may include provision of education facilities as well as compensatory support measures for their families.

E. Population and development and international migration

133. The Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development emphasized the importance of translating the Conference's recommendations into actions at all levels. This will involve decisive actions by Governments and increased support from the international community. The effective implementation of the Programme of Action will require an increased commitment of financial resources, both domestically and externally. The developed countries have committed themselves to complementing the national efforts of developing countries on population and development. The Programme of Action includes commitments to increase substantially the availability of international financial assistance to the developing countries in the field of population and development in order to ensure that population and development objectives and goals are met.

134. In this connection, Governments should commit themselves at the highest political level to achieving the goals and objectives contained in the Programme of Action and should take a lead role in coordinating the implementation, monitoring and evaluation of follow-up actions. The Programme of Action endorsed the crucial role of non-governmental organizations, reflected in an effective partnership between Government and non-governmental organizations in all aspects of population and development-related programmes and policies. The capacity of non-governmental organizations for entering into such a partnership needs to be enhanced.

135. The Programme of Action and Agenda 21, among others, affirm that demographic trends cannot be considered in isolation from development. Therefore, population programmes are not simply about numbers and demographic targets, but rather about the human beings who are at the centre of population and development activities. Consequently, the Programme of Action is grounded in a development and human rights framework and underscores the need to reconcile the aspirations and requirements of individual women and men with long-term development objectives.

136. Countries have learned much about the relationships between population growth and sustainable development. There is general agreement that persistent widespread poverty as well as serious social and gender inequalities have significant influences on, and are in turn influenced by, such demographic parameters as population growth, structure and distribution. Gender equality, including full and equal access to education by women, and universal access to basic health care services, including those relating to reproductive health services, are essential to achieving population and development objectives. Furthermore, integrating population into economic and development strategies will both speed up the pace of sustainable development and poverty eradication and contribute to the achievement of population objectives and an improved quality of life of the population.

137. Successful reproductive health care, including family planning programmes, must be based on the principle of free and responsible choice of family size and child-spacing, which includes the ability of men and women to make informed decisions on the number and spacing of their children. Such choice calls for access to the widest possible range of health-care programmes and services and for greater support for reproductive health services and appropriate educational programmes.

138. Concomitant support is needed for stronger, better coordinated global actions against major diseases that take a heavy toll of human lives, such as malaria, tuberculosis, cholera, typhoid and HIV/AIDS. In this context, the Joint and Co-sponsored United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS should be brought into full operation as quickly as possible and the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council on malaria should be implemented.

139. The international community also has a vital role to play in attaining the objectives of the Programme of Action regarding international migration and development, which reflects the special importance attached to the impact of international migration on both countries of origin and receiving States. The flow of people between countries, and indeed within countries, affects and is affected by the development process. As underlined in the Programme of Action, international economic imbalances, poverty and environmental degradation, combined with the absence of peace and security, violations of human rights and the varying degrees of development of judicial and democratic institutions are all factors in the movement of people.

140. There is a need to formulate or strengthen measures at the national level to ensure respect for and protection of the human rights of migrants, migrant workers and their families, to eliminate the increasing acts of racism and xenophobia in sectors of many societies and to promote greater harmony and tolerance in all societies. Ultimately, the long-term manageability of international migration hinges on making the option to remain in one's country a viable one for all people. The possibility of convening an international conference on migration and development could be considered.

F. Environment and development

1. Full implementation of Agenda 21 and other outcomes of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development

141. The consensus on and basis for actions at global, regional, subregional, national and local levels to ensure sustainable development has been established by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development in Agenda 21, the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development and the Non-legally Binding Authoritative Statement of Principles for a Global Consensus on the Management, Conservation and Sustainable Development of All Types of Forests, as well as in all international conventions on the environment and development. Priority must be given to the prompt and full implementation of these commitments and recommendations.

142. At the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development an integrated approach towards development and environment was adopted, whereby the protection of the environment would constitute an integral part of the development process and could not be viewed in isolation from it. Depletion and degradation of nature and its resources endanger the prospects for development for our generation and even more so for future generations. The cost of reversal will be far higher than the cost of prevention. Therefore, sustainable development strategies and programmes which aim at integrating environmental protection requirements into economic, social and development policies should be formulated and implemented at all levels. All States have, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the principles of international law, the sovereign right to exploit their own resources pursuant to their own environmental and development policies and the responsibility to ensure that activities within their jurisdiction or control do not cause damage to the environment of other States or of areas beyond the limits of national jurisdiction, in keeping with the principles contained in the Rio Declaration, Agenda 21 and relevant international environment conventions.

143. Eradication of poverty should have the highest priority on the international agenda. One of the adverse effects of poverty, which affects mostly developing countries, is related to environmental and natural resource degradation. The essential task of eradicating poverty is an indispensable requirement for sustainable development in order to decrease the disparities in standards of living and better meet the needs of the majority of the people of the world. Strategies aimed at poverty eradication are also important in avoiding degradation of resources.

144. While poverty results in certain kinds of environmental stress, the major cause of the continued deterioration of the global environment is the unsustainable patterns of consumption and production, particularly in industrial countries, which is a matter of grave concern, aggravating poverty and imbalances. Promoting changes in such consumption and production patterns should also be of the highest priority. All countries should strive to promote sustainable consumption and production patterns. In view of the different contributions to global environmental degradation, States have common but differentiated responsibilities. Developed countries bear a special responsibility and should take the lead in this area. Action is required to promote changes in unsustainable production and consumption patterns through behavioural changes and through the promotion of internalizing environmental costs and the potential use of economic instruments that can both generate revenue for financing sustainable development and send signals to the market to help to change unsustainable consumption and production patterns.

145. In general, the financing for the implementation of Agenda 21 will come from a country's own public and private sectors. For developing countries, particularly the least developed countries, official development assistance is a main source of external funding, and substantial new and additional funding for sustainable development and implementation of Agenda 21 is required. So far, the financial resources provided to developing countries have fallen short of expectations for the means of implementation set forth in Agenda 21. All countries should honour their commitments related to financial resources and mechanisms for implementation, as laid down in chapter 33 of Agenda 21. Both domestic budgets and development assistance, including assistance by the United Nations system, should be consistent with and supportive of the objectives of sustainable development. The potential of innovative, additional financial resources should be urgently explored.

146. The Global Environment Facility, whose additional grant and concessional funding is designed to achieve global environmental benefits, should meet the agreed incremental costs of relevant activities under Agenda 21, in accordance with the Facility instrument, in particular for developing countries. The restructured Facility, with initial commitments of 2 billion United States dollars for three years, constitutes a first step in providing resources to address global environment concerns. The prime task now is for the Facility to pursue its operational phase in line with its agreed operational strategy, while ensuring that it continues to be consistent with the guidelines of relevant conventions. Facility procedures could be further improved to speed up project implementation without compromising the quality of appraisal and participation.

147. Another essential dimension of the commitments of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development concerns concrete measures for the transfer of environmentally sound technologies to developing countries on favourable terms, including concessional and preferential terms, as mutually agreed. The Governments of developed countries have a major role to play, both as a conduit for such transfers and by providing market incentives for the private sector. Recognizing the importance of protecting intellectual property rights and taking into account the special needs of developing countries are two essential considerations in the transfer of environmentally sound technology.

148. The process relating to the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development culminated in a new global partnership for sustainable development. Implementing the recommendations of Agenda 21 is essential for strengthening this partnership based on common but differentiated responsibilities. In this partnership, the special situation and needs of developing countries, particularly the least developed countries and those most environmentally vulnerable, must receive special priority.

149. The United Nations system has a key role in stimulating and supporting countries and major groups in the implementation of Agenda 21, in helping to build further consensus and in preparing the ground for standard-setting on issues of sustainable development.

2. Implementation of international conventions on the environment

150. International legal instruments for the regulation of activities affecting the environment form an essential framework for practical efforts by the international community to reduce environmental degradation and promote sustainable development. In this context, it is important to promote further the implementation and development of international conventions in the field of environment and development, taking into account the principles contained in the Rio Declaration.

151. The full implementation of these instruments will be an important contribution to ensuring the sustainable use of land, marine and air resources, including through reduction and recycling of waste and through nature management. Governments should become parties to and comply with the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change and the Convention on Biological Diversity, signed at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development. They should also become parties to and implement the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa; the Basel Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes and their Disposal; and the Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer. Countries are encouraged to sign and become parties to the Agreement for the Implementation of the Provisions of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea of 10 December 1982 relating to the Conservation and Management of Straddling Fish Stocks and Highly Migratory Fish Stocks, and to implement that agreement. Implementation of the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States is also called for.

152. Developed countries parties to the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa, should support, through fulfilling their commitments to mobilize substantial financial resources and to facilitate the transfer of technology, knowledge and know-how, the efforts of affected developing countries parties, in particular African countries, to develop and implement their own long-term plans and strategies to combat desertification and mitigate the effects of drought.

153. Developed country parties should fulfil their financial commitments and enhance cooperative efforts to support developing country parties in implementing the Convention on Biological Diversity and the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change. The effective implementation of the two conventions and their strengthening, in accordance with decisions adopted by the respective conferences of the parties, should be ensured by the parties with the support of the international community. Developed country parties should continue their efforts to support parties undergoing the process of transition to a market economy in the implementation of those conventions.

154. Action towards sustainable development is an evolving process: additional commitments, actions and instruments may be required in the light of new global, regional and subregional or national developments and needs. But this should in no way delay the implementation of what has been agreed.

G. Humanitarian issues and development

155. Humanitarian assistance is essential for the victims of natural disasters and other emergencies, including major technological and man-made disasters. Emergency measures should be seen as a first step towards long-term development.

156. The General Assembly has recognized that humanitarian assistance must be provided with the principles of humanity, neutrality and impartiality. It has also recognized that the sovereignty, territorial integrity and national unity of States must be fully respected in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. Humanitarian assistance should be provided with the consent of the affected country and in principle on the basis of an appeal by the affected country.

157. At the same time, each State has the responsibility first and foremost to take care of the victims of natural disasters and other emergencies occurring on its territory and to provide for the security of humanitarian personnel. Hence, the affected State has the primary role in the initiation, organization, coordination, and implementation of humanitarian assistance within its territory. To this end, the United Nations is continuing to identify ways of strengthening the co-ordination of emergency humanitarian assistance of the United Nations system.

158. Many emergencies reflect the underlying crisis of development facing many developing countries, which needs to be addressed by Governments and the international community if the emergency is not to recur. Therefore, in order to prevent the occurrence or recurrence of emergency situations, support is required for medium- and long-term social and economic development. The implementation of commitments to sustainable development, including those related to economic growth, will contribute to the ability of developing countries to undertake disaster prevention and preparedness, including support for food security and strengthening health and education systems in affected countries, as well as equal access to education and the building up of national institutions, and the rule of law, as well as for strengthening the capacity of recipient institutions to manage emergency situations.

1. Continuum from relief to rehabilitation and development

159. Where emergency situations arise, rapid provision of humanitarian assistance by the international community remains, of course, imperative. However, this form of assistance must be planned with a view to an equally rapid transition to rehabilitation and reconstruction and be part of the continuum concept which aims at resuming development at the earliest opportunity. At the same time, it should be recognized that the continuum concept may require different approaches in different situations.

160. Prevention, preparedness, emergency response, economic recovery and rehabilitation are all part of a comprehensive response to reduce developing country vulnerability to emergencies. Thus far, however, the international community has mostly been able only to react to emergencies through the provision of humanitarian assistance, which can only alleviate human suffering in a short-term perspective. Expenditure on relief activities should not have a negative impact on development programmes.

161. In virtually all post-emergency situations, resettlement of refugees, displaced persons and other disaster victims, as well as the restoration of physical infrastructure, are some of the major conditions for recovery. In cases of post-conflict peace-building situations, programmes such as demining, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants as well as confidence-building and reconciliation measures are essential for moving forward in the continuum towards development. Equally important are restoring public institutions, police and judicial systems and resuming economic and social development, in preventing the possible resurgence of conflict situations.

162. Although certain intermediate phases can be established, the distinction between different stages of the emergency-to-development continuum is often vague. This requires a comprehensive and coordinated response not only to rehabilitation and reconstruction but also to development needs by the United Nations system, including the Bretton Woods institutions, the international community and Governments. The mandates of humanitarian agencies and development organizations must be delineated clearly in order to counter the tendency of these agencies and organizations to extend mandates, either from relief to development or vice versa, without having necessarily the institutional capacity to take on such new roles effectively.

163. In order for the international community to respond rapidly and effectively to humanitarian emergencies at the various stages of the continuum, the establishment of an international network of voluntary humanitarian relief teams that can be deployed rapidly to cope with humanitarian emergencies, such as the white helmet initiative acting within the framework of the United Nations Volunteers, could be considered.

2. Early warning, prevention, preparedness and reduction of natural disasters

164. In recent years, with, in many areas, ever larger populations at risk, disasters have had increasingly stronger impacts in terms of human and economic losses, impoverishment and long-term displacement of populations. The commitments of the Yokohama Strategy for a Safer World, adopted by the World Conference on Natural Disaster Reduction, which has defined concrete actions for disaster reduction, should be implemented.

165. Disaster prevention, mitigation and preparedness are of primary importance for reducing the need for disaster relief. They should become an integral part of national strategies and programmes for sustainable development. There should be greater efforts to enhance national capabilities for early warning and disaster mitigation, which should be supported with adequate financial resources and transfer of technologies to developing countries and, as appropriate, countries with economies in transition.

166. Enhanced subregional, regional and international cooperation are essential for disaster preparedness. Prevention, mitigation and preparedness for natural disasters, and actions to implement the Yokohama Strategy, could be integrated into the country strategy note, where appropriate. A coordinated and timely preventive response of Governments, non-governmental and other organizations, and agencies and communities requires strengthening of the early-warning potential of the United Nations system.

3. Response to other humanitarian emergencies

167. Humanitarian emergency situations have become more frequent, more widespread, more complex and longer lasting, combining inter-State and internal conflicts, large-scale displacements of people, mass famine, disruption of economic, political and social institutions and, in some cases, natural disasters. A result has been that a growing percentage of development assistance is being devoted to such complex emergencies. There is a need to avoid the situation in which such a trend has a negative impact on long-term development programmes.

168. The response of the international community to complex humanitarian emergencies has become better coordinated, more effective and more efficient. The United Nations plays a central role in the international response to this daunting challenge, working closely with other international agencies. The creation of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat illustrates the determination of the United Nations to respond more effectively to this task. The coordinating role of the Department among the various relevant agencies should be further strengthened, including by developing formal memoranda of understanding with them.

169. Further progress requires the provision of adequate contingency funds and the establishment of planning and logistical mechanisms to allow a faster and more effective response to complex emergencies.

170. Ways also have to be found to address basic needs during complex emergencies. Issues such as humanitarian needs of displaced persons, which are not under the direct mandate of humanitarian agencies, should also be addressed. Coordination and clear mandates and responsibilities, particularly in the field, are also essential in cases where there is a humanitarian component to a peacekeeping operation. While peacekeeping, civilian, humanitarian, economic, social and political activities are all part of the integrated process of peace-building, special attention should be given to the observance of the norms and principles of international law, including international humanitarian law.

171. The effective delivery assistance of relevant non-governmental organizations and volunteers in situations of complex emergencies should be further recognized as an important complementary part of the coordinated international, regional and subregional response and incorporated into the programming of actions.

4. Refugees and displaced persons

172. The number of refugees and displaced persons has been rapidly increasing owing to a number of complex factors which include armed conflicts, human rights violations, political instability, absolute poverty, social disintegration, lack of resources and environmental degradation. Most of the refugees are located in or move into developing countries, often imposing an enormous burden on those States which already face difficult economic and social conditions. International support for the activities of recipient countries for refugees and displaced persons is hence a necessity.

173. Some countries with economies in transition also face burdens related to refugees and displaced persons. There is, therefore, a need for the international community to support them in order to address those problems.

174. The root causes of movements of refugees and displaced persons should be tackled in a coordinated and integrated manner. A durable solution to the plight of the present large numbers of refugees and asylum seekers should be found. Their needs as regards protection in accordance with internationally recognized standards and national law, and as regards assistance, must receive the necessary support. Governments should strive to meet their basic needs and build their self-sufficiency. The conditions for voluntary repatriation of refugees and returnees in safety and dignity, and for ensuring adequate reception arrangements and smooth reintegration, should be created.

H. Participatory approach to development

175. There has been a multiplication of non-State actors in development—those of the civil society—who are playing an increasingly important role in development. The State has overall responsibility for policy formulation in the economic, social and environmental spheres, including the correction of market failures, the provision of public goods and the creation of a favourable enabling environment for the private sector as well as a favourable legal and regulatory framework. It should also encourage effective participation by the private sector and major groups in activities that complement and reinforce national objectives.

176. Participation is an essential component of successful and lasting development. It contributes to equity by involving people living in poverty and other groups in planning and implementation. Participatory decision-making, together with the rule of law democracy and transparent and accountable governance and administration in all sectors of society, is an important requirement for the effectiveness of development policies.

177. Full participation in society should be achieved through the promotion and protection by Governments of all human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the right to development, bearing in mind the interdependent and mutually reinforcing relationship between democracy and respect for human rights. Governments should make public institutions more responsive to people's needs. Therefore, full respect for all human rights and fundamental freedoms, in accordance with the conclusions of the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action, should be promoted.

178. There is a large potential benefit to be derived from increased participation. In order for it to be realized, Governments should establish institutional and legal frameworks and decentralized processes that allow their people greater involvement in the decisions that affect their lives. This requires that Governments give adequate support to the administration of justice as well as to public administration, which should be responsive to the requirements of their people.

179. Governments are encouraged, where appropriate, to decentralize their public institutions and services to a level that, compatible with their overall responsibilities, priorities and objectives, responds properly to local needs and facilitates local participation. To ensure effective decentralization and strengthening of local authorities and their associations and networks, Governments, at the appropriate levels, should review and revise, as necessary, legislation to increase local autonomy and participation in decision-making, implementation and resource mobilization and use, especially with respect to human, technical and financial resources and local enterprise development, within the overall framework of a national economic, social and environmental strategy. Governments, when they consider it appropriate, could work on decentralization programmes with the support of donors and international institutions.

180. The key to participatory development means fulfilling the potential of people by enlarging their capabilities, and this necessarily implies empowerment of people, enabling them to participate actively in their own development. In order to fulfil their potential, people, especially those who are vulnerable and disadvantaged, must participate actively in establishing and maintaining independent organizations representing their interests, within each country's constitutional framework. Political empowerment is an integral aspect of participatory development.

181. A vigorous civil society is indispensable for popular participation at all levels and an essential component of any successful development strategy. Community organizations, business and workers' organizations, non-governmental organizations and self-help groups must be actively involved. Governments should view them as important actors and partners in development. Greater accountability and transparency in the activities of such organizations would be helpful in this regard. In countries where the participation of civil society is weak, it should be a major purpose of public policy to strengthen it.

182. Broadening and strengthening the participation of developing countries in the international economic decision-making process is also necessary.

I. Actions related to countries in special situations

183. International cooperation for development should take account of the development experiences and circumstances of countries in formulating and implementing comprehensive development approaches.

184. Action on many fronts is needed. A combination of grant aid, concessional loans and technical assistance, which can contribute to the financing of the necessary economic and social infrastructure, together with strategies designed, inter alia, to increase export earnings, attract foreign direct investment and reduce external debt, can provide sufficient conditions for development.

185. The critical situation of Africa and the least developed countries requires that priority should be given to those countries in international cooperation for development and in the allocation of official development assistance. Those countries should implement at the national level structural adjustment policies that take into account social development goals, as well as effective development strategies that create a more favourable climate for trade and investment, give priority to human resources development and further promote the development of democratic institutions. These national efforts should be supported by the international community.

1. Africa

186. The critical socio-economic condition in Africa concerns the international community as a whole and requires global partnership and solidarity in order to address and resolve it. Although Africa is faced with enormous problems, it also has great potential, both in human and natural resources, for economic growth and development. The obstacles to the socio-economic development of Africa are well known. Tackling these problems and paving the way to accelerated and self-sustaining growth and sustainable development through decisive implementation of commitments and actions have, however, been lacking.

187. The external debt problems of African countries require further attention. The measures taken by the Paris Club, including the Naples terms, should be further implemented in a full, constructive and expeditious manner. Effective, equitable, development-oriented and durable solutions have to be found to the problems of external debt and the burden of debt, which continue to impede the socio-economic development of African countries despite measures taken on both a bilateral and a multilateral basis to reduce or reschedule their debt.

188. The international community should reaffirm its commitment to give full support to the development efforts of Africa. This requires, inter alia, measures to contribute to durable solutions to the external debt and debt-servicing problems, to increase foreign direct investment, to enhance national capacity-building, to deal with the shortage of domestic resources for development and to facilitate the integration of the African countries into subregional and regional trade as well as into world trade.

189. The international community should support African countries so that they benefit fully from the results of the Uruguay Round and to mitigate any adverse effect of the Final Act. It is essential to implement the measures decided upon in the Final Act and the complementary provisions specified in the Marrakesh agreement in favour of least developed countries and concerning the possible negative effects of the reform programme on these countries and on the net food-importing developing countries. In this regard, there is urgent need for financial and technical assistance to African countries to enable them to evaluate the impact of the Final Act and to identify and implement adaptive measures to enhance their competitiveness and trade performance in order to benefit from the Uruguay Round. In addition, it is essential to support the efforts of African countries to diversify their economies. New export capacities and opportunities have to be created and diversification across markets and products should be encouraged. The call for financing the preparatory phase of commodity diversification projects and programmes should be pursued. State participants in the African Development Fund and multilateral institutions are urged to pay special attention to the diversification of African commodities and to contribute to the preparatory phase of African diversification projects. In order to support effectively efforts to diversify commodity exports and boost earnings, the international community, particularly the major trading partners, should continue to commit themselves to granting enhanced market access to Africa's exports through substantial reduction in or removal of trade barriers and through preferential arrangements, in accordance with the Uruguay Round agreements.

190. There is an urgent need for concerted and better coordinated international action on the myriad of adverse socio-economic factors that compound poverty in Africa and hamper its prospects for growth and development. This includes addressing effectively and comprehensively the issues of conflict resolution, including post-conflict peace-building and the continuum from relief to rehabilitation and development; stronger and better coordinated global actions against major diseases that take a heavy toll in human lives; and alleviating the effects of natural disasters through programmes on early warning, preparedness, prevention and mitigation. The international community should also assist African countries in their efforts to eradicate poverty and meet basic human needs.

191. The United Nations system also has a major role to play in coordinating and implementing activities that address the critical situation in Africa, including through the implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s and the follow-up to the outcome of the Tokyo International Conference on African Development and other related initiatives.

2. Least developed countries

192. Despite the adoption of the Paris Declaration and the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, there has been a decline in real terms of total official development assistance for least developed countries and continued marginalization of those countries, and their number has increased from 41 to 48 without a proportionate increase in support measures despite national and international efforts. Reversing the further marginalization of the least developed countries and achieving their integration in the world economy are essential for their growth and development and pose a major challenge to the international community.

193. In order to succeed, the full support of the international community is required. Appropriate economic and social policies are also required and technical capacity and physical and institutional infrastructures need to be built up. Special support should therefore be given to the least developed countries in their development efforts, in order to facilitate their integration into the world economy, to enable them to participate in and to allow them to fully benefit from the processes of globalization and liberalization of trade and the increase in international private resource flows.

194. In view of their limited domestic resources, the least developed countries will continue to need enhanced external financial assistance and other support. Achieving the accepted United Nations target for official development assistance to the least developed countries of 0.15 per cent of the gross national product of donor countries is particularly urgent. Donor countries that have not met this target should make their best efforts to reach it as soon as possible, and donor countries that have met the 0.15 per cent target should undertake to reach 0.20 per cent by the year 2000. Further improvements should be made in aid coordination and effectiveness.

195. Many least developed countries face serious debt problems and more than half are considered debt-distressed. Most of their debt is owed to official creditors, both bilateral and multilateral. The serious debt problems of least developed countries necessitate continued efforts in the framework of the international debt strategy. This strategy includes concrete measures to alleviate the debt burden and economic policy measures, which will be critical to the revitalization of growth and development. Those least developed countries should continue to benefit from substantial debt relief schemes. Paris Club creditors are invited to continue to implement fully, constructively and expeditiously the very concessional treatment under the Naples terms, and the Bretton Woods institutions are encouraged to expedite the ongoing consideration of ways to address the issue of the multilateral debt, including those concerning the least developed countries.

196. The international community should support least developed countries so that they benefit fully from the results of the Uruguay Round and to mitigate any adverse effect of the Final Act. It is essential to implement the measures decided upon in the Final Act and the complementary provisions specified in the Marrakesh agreement in favour of the least developed countries and concerning the possible negative effects of the reform programme on these countries and on the net food-importing developing countries. Urgent steps are needed to provide enhanced market access to major markets for products originating from least developed countries. There is also scope for further improvement of the Generalized System of Preferences schemes and other supportive measures in favour of least developed countries.

197. In 1990, through the adoption of the Declaration and Programme of Action of the Second United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries, the international community agreed on measures to revitalize the development of the least developed countries. At the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, the International Conference on Population and Development and the World Summit for Social Development, and within the framework of other relevant conferences, agreements and conventions, further commitments have been made to support the efforts of those countries. At the Mid-term Global Review of the Implementation of the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, concrete measures and recommendations were agreed upon to implement the Programme of Action. They should be operationalized and implemented as appropriate. The international community must give high priority to the full and timely implementation of the Programme of Action and fulfil all its commitments in favour of the least developed countries.

3. Small island developing States

198. The international community, international organizations and the United Nations system should cooperate in the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States and of Agenda 21 and support the economic transformation of those States. This requires adequate, predictable, new and additional financial resources, transfer of environmentally sound technologies, including on concessional and preferential terms as mutually agreed, and promoting fair and non-discriminatory trading arrangements. Appropriate exchanges among small island developing States and between them and other States with similar development experiences are also to be encouraged. The Global Environment Facility should constitute an important channel of assistance to small island developing States in responding to their special needs and vulnerabilities.

199. The sustainable development of small island developing States requires concrete action by the international community to address the constraints to their development outlined in the Programme of Action and in Agenda 21. It also requires a supportive international institutional framework, including a strong monitoring and review role by the Commission on Sustainable Development. Appropriate support should be given to the information network for small island developing States, known as SIDSNET, and the technical assistance programme, known as SIDSTAP, which are important instruments for technical cooperation and for promoting information exchange.

4. Landlocked developing countries

200. Specific action at national, bilateral, sub-regional, regional and international levels should be taken as a matter of urgency and priority to address the special development problems and needs of landlocked developing countries. To that end, international support, through appropriate technical cooperation and financial assistance by developed countries and multilateral financial and development institutions, is needed to enhance the capacity of the landlocked developing countries to participate effectively in the rapidly globalizing world economy, including global trading, investment and technology transfer processes.

201. Particular emphasis should be given to the cooperative and collaborative efforts of the landlocked and transit developing countries in dealing with the transit problems, inter alia, through improving the transit transport infrastructure facilities and concluding bilateral agreements to govern transit transport operations; development of joint ventures in the area of transit transport; and strengthening of institutions and human resources dealing with transit transport. Active and consistent efforts are needed to implement the Global Framework for Transit Transport Cooperation between Landlocked and Transit Developing Countries and the Donor Community endorsed by the General Assembly at its fiftieth session. Since most transit countries are themselves developing countries facing serious economic problems, their efforts at developing a viable transit infrastructure also need financial and technical support.

5. Countries with economies in transition

202. The international community should continue to give attention to the needs of countries with economies in transition and support in particular their efforts to integrate into the world economy. A number of international meetings and conferences, including those held under United Nations auspices, have recognized the specific needs of those countries in various areas of development and the necessity to provide them with temporary assistance upon their request aimed at solutions to the most acute problems. Such recommendations should be fully implemented by the international community and the United Nations system. To this end, an appropriate strategy should be defined for strengthening solidarity with these countries, taking into account the need to preserve the United Nations system's high priorities in development, in particular international development cooperation.

J. Means of implementation

203. The effective implementation of the present Agenda, as well as of the decisions and commitments reached at the recent series of United Nations global conferences, summits and other meetings, requires the urgent mobilization and more efficient use of resources for development. It is critical to generate the political will to mobilize and make available the necessary resources—public and private, financial and human, national and international—if all States, the United Nations system and the international community as a whole are to mount a full and effective response to the Agenda. In formulating this response, attention has to be given to both the quantitative and the qualitative aspects of development as well as to timeframes for implementation.

1. Mobilization of domestic resources for development

204. All countries should continue to implement policies and measures to mobilize domestic resources according to national strategies and priorities and to achieve an appropriate level of domestic savings. Measures should include the maintenance of sound fiscal and monetary policies, efficient and equitable taxation systems, low budget deficits and an efficient allocation of budgetary resources in which due priority is given to productive expenditure.

205. Political institutions and legal systems that ensure the equitable distribution of domestic resources enhance the effectiveness and flexibility of national policy frameworks. Public expenditures offer significant opportunities for promoting growth and the equitable redistribution of resources.

206. All countries should explore new ways of generating new public and private financial resources, inter alia, through the appropriate reduction of excessive military expenditures, including global military expenditures and the arms trade and investments for arms production and acquisition, taking into consideration national security requirements, so as to allow possible allocation of additional funds for social and economic development.

2. External resources

207. The savings efforts of developing countries, in particular African countries and the least developed countries, to generate sufficient domestic savings need to be supplemented by external resources so as to raise investment to the levels necessary for adequate sustained economic growth. New and innovative ideas for generating resources for development should be explored.

(a) External debt

208. The international community, including the international financial institutions, is invited to continue to explore ways of implementing additional and innovative measures to alleviate substantially the debt burdens of developing countries, in particular the highly indebted low-income countries, in order to help them to achieve sustained economic growth without falling into a new debt crisis.

209. In this context, the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Debt Initiative endorsed by the Interim Committee of the International Monetary Fund and the Development Committee of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, which is designed to enable eligible heavily indebted poor countries to achieve a sustainable debt situation through coordinated action by all creditors on the basis of adjustment efforts by the debtor countries, is welcomed. It is recognized that the implementation of the Initiative requires additional financial resources from both bilateral and multilateral creditors without affecting the support required for development activities of developing countries. The importance of implementing the Initiative's eligibility criteria flexibly so as to ensure sufficient coverage of the heavily indebted countries is stressed.

210. All the members of the Paris Club are encouraged to implement fully the initiatives which aim at substantially reducing the bilateral component of the debt burden of the poorest and most heavily indebted countries and at permitting countries sufficiently advanced in an adjustment strategy to exit from the re-scheduling process. To achieve the first aim mentioned above, the Paris Club should continue to apply the Naples terms in a full, expeditious and constructive manner in order to contribute to a durable solution to the debt problems of these countries.

211. Private creditors and, in particular, commercial banks should be encouraged to continue their initiatives and efforts to address the commercial debt of developing countries.

212. The international community should implement fully the appropriate actions identified in the Mid-term Global Review of the Progress towards the Implementation of the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s concerning the external debt problems of those countries.

213. Multilateral debt accounts for a high proportion of the external debt of a number of heavily indebted developing countries. The international financial institutions are invited to examine further proposals to tackle the problems of a number of developing countries with regard to multilateral debt, taking into account the specific situation of each country. Such proposals need to preserve the preferred creditor status of the multilateral financial institutions, in order to ensure that they can continue to provide concessional financing for development to developing countries.

(b) Official development assistance

214. It is important to reverse the overall decline in official development assistance flows and to achieve internationally agreed official development assistance targets as soon as possible. Such assistance should focus on developing countries, with particular priority given to Africa and the least developed countries. Some donor countries have achieved or exceeded the accepted United Nations targets to allocate 0.7 per cent of gross national product for overall official development assistance and 0.15 per cent of gross national product for official development assistance for the least developed countries and are encouraged to continue to do so. Other developed countries reaffirm the commitments undertaken to fulfil these targets as soon as possible. Countries that are in a position to do so should strive to augment their assistance in the framework of development cooperation. Countries should also honour the commitments made in Agenda 21 to provide resources to promote sustainable development.

(c) Role and resources of multilateral financial institutions, including regional development banks

215. The multilateral financial institutions should continue to play a major role in development and in promoting the stability of the international financial system. In their responses to the development needs, priorities and specific circumstances of developing countries, the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund should continue to adjust to the wide-ranging changes in global circumstances. Their programmes should respond to the economic and social conditions, concerns and needs of each country, and should also explicitly include social development goals, in particular eradicating poverty, promoting productive employment, enhancing social integration, and supporting people living in poverty and vulnerable and disadvantaged groups of society. To this end, they are urged to increase cooperation with other development activities of the United Nations system. At the same time, both the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund need an enhanced capacity to fulfil their roles effectively. In particular, resources for the International Development Association should be replenished adequately and in a timely manner.

216. Regional development banks should continue to play an important role in the financing of development. In this context, the adequate and timely replenishment of their concessional mechanisms is essential. Regional development banks should respond effectively to development priorities.

(d) United Nations financing for development

217. The fulfilment of the role of the United Nations system in development and in promoting development cooperation requires resources to be provided on a sound, predictable, continuous and assured basis. The international community should support the development efforts of the United Nations system by providing a substantial increase in resources for operational activities commensurate with the needs of the developing countries and the overall resources of the United Nations. This requires both political commitment by all States and an appropriate balance in terms of resources devoted to all United Nations activities and to development. New approaches to financing the international development cooperation activities undertaken by the United Nations, including innovative funding sources, should continue to be examined.

(e) Private investment flows

218. Special attention should be given by all countries to measures aimed at promoting international investment flows and enhancing their contribution to development. In order to encourage domestic investment and to attract foreign direct investment, it is essential to have in place a stable, supportive, effective and transparent legal framework. Intellectual property protection is an essential component of an environment conducive to the creation and international transfer of technology. Investment agreements which signal that investment is valued and that all investors will be treated fairly also promote investment. Governments in the developed countries should facilitate long-term investment flows to developing countries. All countries should take measures to ensure that these flows have a positive impact on development, equitable growth, productive capacity, infrastructure, transfer of technology, eradication of poverty, trade expansion, employment and social programmes.

219. The globalization and growth of financial markets has given rise to the need for improved measures to address the negative effects of the volatility of international capital flows. The prevention of financial crises will require enhanced early warning mechanisms, including improved and effective surveillance of national and international financial market developments. If prevention fails, responding to financial market distress will require enhancing the capacity of multilateral institutions to respond in a quick and coordinated fashion. Financial mechanisms need to be developed for this purpose as well as to meet the challenges of the twenty-first century. In this context, the international community should explore ways to broaden appropriate enhanced cooperation and, where appropriate, coordination of macroeconomic policy among interested countries and monetary and financial authorities and institutions, so as to enhance preventive consultation arrangements between such institutions as a means of promoting a stable international financial environment conducive to economic growth, particularly in developing countries, taking into account the needs of developing countries as well as situations that may have a significant impact on the international financial system.

3. Qualitative aspects of development cooperation

220. The quantitative efforts set out above should be complemented by measures to improve the qualitative aspects of international development cooperation, particularly a better focus on its distribution; greater national capacities to coordinate national and international resources; improved national ownership of externally financed programmes; international cooperation based on national priorities, involving other development partners, including civil society; and strengthened national capacities to plan for, manage, monitor and evaluate the impact of development cooperation.

221. To translate the Agenda for Development into practical action, it is essential that further steps are taken to enhance the performance of the United Nations in development. Maintaining adequate levels of funding for United Nations operational activities must be coupled with continued improvements in their performance, including monitoring and evaluation and the measurement of output rather than input.

4. Capacity-building

222. If development activities are to have a lasting impact, the future provision of technical cooperation must focus on strengthening national capacities rather than using international expertise, which is often expensive, and procuring equipment tied to aid. The United Nations system needs to scrutinize whether its activities contribute to the promotion of national ownership and capacity-building. Such promotion should be the central objective of its field-level activities.

223. The international community, including the United Nations system, shall give preference, wherever possible, to the utilization of competent national experts or, where necessary, of competent experts from within the subregion or region or from other developing countries, in project and programme design, preparation and implementation and to the building of local expertise where it does not exist.

224. National execution should be the principal modality for the implementation of programmes by the United Nations system. The pace at which national execution is utilized by recipient countries must depend upon their needs and capacities. Effective national execution also requires both the United Nations system and other actors involved in the provision of technical assistance to give increased priority to assisting recipient countries in building or enhancing the necessary capacity to undertake services at the field level.

225. The need to promote capacity-building and national execution should be taken into account in the design stage of development programmes. Governments will need to take a lead role in identifying such needs at the planning stage and in ensuring that there is adequate national ownership of the programmes as well as in maximizing the efficiency of projects and programmes by keeping overhead costs to a minimum.

226. The United Nations system must also be prepared to address the capacity requirements of different national development partners, including, in addition to Governments, members of civil society, such as the private sector and non-governmental organizations.

227. When building national capacities a number of issues will need to be taken into consideration. These include the articulation of clear development goals, strategies and priorities that are nationally prescribed and supported, where necessary, by external partners; effective performance of functions through a well-trained human resource base; competent organizations and management effectively to utilize and retain skilled people; a policy and institutional environment that can facilitate the performance and accountability of the public sector and other national institutions; and sensitivity to the overall social, economic and cultural environment in which capacity development is to take place.

228. Technical and economic cooperation among developing countries is an instrument that can make important contributions to building national capacities through exchange of information, experiences and expertise.

III. Institutional issues and follow-up

A. Strengthening of international cooperation for development

229. The international community is entering a new and challenging phase in invigorating institutions in support of international cooperation for development. Globalization, liberalization and interdependence have become key features of the world economy. In addition, economic growth and progress in a growing interdependent world are influenced by the process of globalization. Particular attention should be accorded to national and international action to broaden the benefits of the process of globalization and to avoid the risk of marginalization of developing countries, in particular the least developed countries, in the world economy. For developing countries, the most important challenge is the realization of development, which, among other things, calls for economic growth and favourable external conditions. International cooperation for development is more than ever acknowledged as a necessity that derives from recognized mutual interest. Therefore, it is necessary that such cooperation be strengthened. In this effort the United Nations occupies a central position and key role.

230. The United Nations system has a crucial role to play in international cooperation for revitalizing development. In this regard, the United Nations has convened a number of global conferences on major issues. From these conferences, a consensus has emerged on a multidimensional, comprehensive and integrated approach to development which recognizes, among other things, that economic development, social development and environmental protection are interdependent and mutually reinforcing components of sustainable development. Fulfilling the goals and commitments reached at major international conferences, particularly on international cooperation for development, is essential if development is to materialize to its fullest extent and in all its facets. There is, therefore, a need to revitalize the system of international cooperation for development, which plays an important role in realizing those goals and commitments.

231. Among the many actors in international development, the United Nations, because of its unique universal character and impartiality and because of its physical presence in many parts of the world, plays a central role in promoting international development cooperation. Through the present Agenda, recommendations are made for a stronger and more effective and efficient United Nations so that it and the United Nations system as a whole can better contribute to development in all countries, in particular the developing countries, through the strengthening of its role in all relevant fields of international development cooperation. Institutional issues must, therefore, be addressed while safeguarding the transparent, democratic and truly universal character of the Organization and taking into account the overall ongoing processes of reform of the United Nations.

B. Role of the United Nations in development

232. In accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, the Organization aims at the creation of conditions of stability and well-being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations, based on respect for the principles of sovereign equality of all its Members, equal rights and self-determination of peoples, and at achieving international cooperation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural or humanitarian character. The role and functions of the United Nations in international economic and social cooperation, as defined in the Charter and as further elaborated in various international agreements, including in the outcomes of major United Nations conferences, range wide and deep and should be fulfilled.

233. Among the key characteristics of the United Nations are its universal membership and comprehensive mandate. The United Nations occupies a unique position for addressing the challenges of promoting development in the context of the globalization of the world economy and deepening interdependence among nations. It must play a central and more active and effective role in promoting international cooperation for development and providing policy guidance on global development issues. The responsibilities of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields should be fulfilled, taking into account the importance of its activities in these spheres vis-a-vis those in other fields.

234. The United Nations constitutes a unique forum for building international consensus on global priorities for which there exists no substitute. Forging consensus and commitments through, inter alia, various international conferences on international economic, social and related issues is one of the most important functions of the United Nations system. To this end, the capacity of the United Nations and its various bodies to undertake analytical and policy-oriented work in the economic and social fields must be fully utilized.

235. The United Nations is also singularly well placed to forge international consensus in the field of development through intergovernmental processes and instruments. Furthermore, the United Nations plays a prominent role in raising public awareness and in promoting and advocating internationally agreed principles and commitments, and their implementation, in this context. It also implements concrete programmes which aim to respond to developmental and humanitarian needs and to promote social justice and the protection of the environment through its activities at the field level and through the collection and dissemination of information.

236. The United Nations has the unique mandate to address issues of peace and development in an integrated manner. In addition, the United Nations has a vital role to play in mobilizing the international community to respond in a comprehensive and coordinated way to rehabilitation and reconstruction as well as to longer-term development needs in connection with humanitarian emergency situations. At the same time, a balance should be ensured between those activities and the Organization's consideration of and actions on development issues.

237. The United Nations, in cooperation with the Bretton Woods institutions, other bodies of the United Nations system, including its specialized agencies, and the World Trade Organization, has a key role in fostering greater coherence, complementarity and coordination in economic policy-making at the global level, including macroeconomic policy issues, and in ensuring the principles of transparency and effective participation and representation, as well as the effective implementation of internationally agreed policies and goals. In this context, the respective competencies of these institutions should be taken into account.

238. An important feature of the United Nations is its operational activities for development in the field. Their fundamental characteristics should be, inter alia, their universal, voluntary and grant nature, their neutrality and their multilateralism, as well as their ability to respond to the needs of the developing countries in a flexible manner. The United Nations development system should take into account the specific needs and requirements of the countries with economies in transition and other recipient countries. Furthermore, because of its mandate, the Organization is well suited to promote a balanced approach to development. Therefore, the challenge for the United Nations and its funds and programmes is to effectively support Governments, particularly those of the developing countries, in their efforts to address increasingly complex issues of development in an interdependent world.

239. The Organization will become more effective and relevant in responding to the needs of the Member States only as a result of ensuring adequate and predictable funding; high-quality performance in the field of international cooperation for development; transparency and full accountability to its Member States; revitalization of its institutional structures; avoidance of overlapping and duplication; and responsiveness to changing conditions and trends.

240. There is a need for a clear relationship between the policy work of the United Nations and its operational role.

C. Enhancing the role, capacity, effectiveness and efficiency of the United Nations system in development

241. Over the past 50 years the United Nations system has grown and expanded in the economic, social and related sectors. Through its activities, the system has contributed significantly to the development process. The Organization should respond more effectively to changing development needs, particularly to the needs of enhancing international cooperation for development and promoting the development of the developing countries. Strengthening system-wide coordination of activities and institutions will contribute to enhancing the role, capacity, effectiveness and efficiency of the United Nations system in development. In this context, building collaboration between national Governments and regional and other multilateral agencies in support of country-driven processes should be taken into account.

242. Essential to improving the coordination and focus of the development activities of the United Nations system is to ensure that it is guided by a clear set of priorities and strategies identified by the General Assembly, with the support of the Economic and Social Council, that incorporate the outcomes of recent major international conferences. Also essential is that the Council has the capacity to fulfil its role in overall coordination in the economic, social and related sectors and in guidance of operational activities.

243. Efforts are needed to continue the process of enhancing the effectiveness and efficiency of the Assembly, the Council and its subsidiary bodies, the United Nations Secretariat and other parts of the United Nations system as well as the framework for operational activities. Furthermore, achieving greater coordination, coherence and complementarity among related activities and improving linkages between them will also contribute to strengthening the organizational structure of the United Nations system.

244. Ensuring complementarity and avoiding overlapping and duplication of work between the Assembly and the Council, including its functional commissions, is of particular importance for an effective and coordinated follow-up to major United Nations conferences.

1. General Assembly

245. The General Assembly is the highest intergovernmental mechanism for the formulation and appraisal of policies in the economic, social and related fields and the main forum where Governments pursue the development dialogue in its political context. This dialogue aims both at promoting an integrated view of matters relating to the economic, social and related fields, thus fostering the deeper political understanding needed for enhanced international development cooperation, and at generating impulses for action and launching initiatives. The Assembly should exert greater policy leadership on development issues inasmuch as the Charter of the United Nations provides the Assembly with broad mandates concerning these issues.

246. Measures have to be identified to enhance the ability of the debate in the General Assembly to generate substantive solutions to specific policy problems and to take an integrated approach to development. To facilitate discussions based on an integrated approach to development issues, the possibility should be explored of choosing a principal theme or themes in order to focus substantive debate under each "cluster" in the agenda without prejudice to the right of delegations to raise any other specific issue in the debates.

247. In the strengthening and revitalization of the Assembly, this body should consider, in the context of all its Main Committees, promoting the use of innovative mechanisms, in accordance with its rules of procedure, such as panel discussions with delegations and interactive debates with the active participation of Secretariat and agency representatives as well as outside experts.

248. Better use should be made of the forum of the Assembly to deal with major economic, social and related issues. The Assembly has the overall responsibility for ensuring the implementation of the results of United Nations conferences and facilitating and reviewing progress achieved. In this context, the Assembly should provide policy guidance and carry out, on a periodic basis, an overall review of the implementation of the outcomes of the conferences. Such conferences should be complementary to the Assembly's in-depth consideration of major issues of concern to the international community.

249. At the same time, for the Assembly to perform fully its Charter role, measures also have to be taken in addition to the strengthening of the Assembly itself to ensure that priorities set by the Assembly are fully implemented and followed up by the entire United Nations system. The policy guidance role of the Assembly in promoting international cooperation to solve international problems of an economic and social character should be fully exercised in all areas of development, including macroeconomic issues.

250. The United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, as a principal organ of the Assembly, has a contribution to make in strengthening policy-oriented debates in the Second Committee.

2. Economic and Social Council

251. In accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter, the Economic and Social Council must continue to strengthen its role as the central mechanism for coordination of the United Nations system and its specialized agencies and supervision of subsidiary bodies, in particular its functional commissions, in the economic and social fields. The ongoing efforts to reform the Council call for more effective procedures and review of its work programme and working methods and should result in an increased capacity of the Council to provide overall guidance and to monitor and coordinate the United Nations development system. These reforms should be allowed to take root and be built upon.

252. In this context, the Council should:

(a) Consider, in a high-level segment with ministerial participation, major issues for international cooperation in the economic, social and related fields. The high-level segment should be used for improving the synergy between the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system. In doing so, the Council should also contribute towards enhancing the interaction between the United Nations, the Bretton Woods institutions and the World Trade Organization;

(b) Ensure a coordinated follow-up to the implementation of major United Nations conferences through its subsidiary machinery and provide overall guidance and coordination to the United Nations system as a whole in the economic, social and related fields. A strengthened coordination function also requires closer interaction between the Council and the Administrative Committee on Coordination, which should include in its reports to the Council action-oriented recommendations to improve United Nations system-wide coordination on issues for consideration by the Council;

(c) Fully exercise its role as the overall coordinating body of all United Nations development funds and programmes. This should include providing guidance to the Executive Boards of funds and programmes and monitoring the implementation of General Assembly policies and guidelines, including operational aspects of the follow-up to major United Nations conferences. The Council should promote greater coherence and closer interaction between the work of its subsidiary bodies and the work of the United Nations funds and programmes;

(d) Encourage its subsidiary bodies to improve their working methods as mandated by the Assembly;

(e) In the context of its general segment, whose primary function is that of an action-oriented review of the activities, reports and recommendations of its subsidiary bodies, avoid a repetition of the debates held in those bodies and focus attention on major policy issues that require a prioritized and coordinated response from the United Nations system as a whole.

253. The Bureau of the Council should play an active role by meeting regularly, including by convening open-ended informal consultations of the Council. The Bureau shall brief the Council on its deliberations and shall not have the authority to make decisions on any substantive matters. The Bureau should be encouraged to continue its role as facilitator.

(a) Subsidiary bodies of the Economic and Social Council

254. The Council should fully exercise its authority vis-a-vis its subsidiary bodies. Better guidance by the Council to its functional commissions and expert groups and bodies is particularly important. The functional commissions should in a coordinated way be able to give the best possible support to the Council in its role of providing overall coordination and guidance and in the follow-up to major United Nations conferences. It is therefore crucial to ensure that these commissions, groups and bodies can effectively serve as catalysts for action.

255. In the case of the functional commissions with primary responsibility for the follow-up to and review of the implementation of the outcome of a major conference, the Council shall ensure the harmonization and coordination of their agendas and work programmes by promoting a clearer division of labour among them and providing clear policy guidance to them. Within their respective mandates, functional commissions should focus on the core issues relating to the Conference for which they are responsible and obtain inputs from other relevant bodies on related issues.

256. The Council shall undertake a review of its functional commissions, expert groups and bodies as mandated by the relevant sections of annex I to General Assembly resolution 50/227 of 24 May 1996. Following this review, which the Council should complete by the fifty-second session of the General Assembly, the Council should continue to monitor the effectiveness and efficiency of its subsidiary bodies.

(b) Regional commissions

257. The regional commissions play an important role in bringing the work of the United Nations closer to specific development situations and concerns of countries and regions. This would include fostering economic cooperation, economic integration and economic development by providing the Assembly, through the Council, with substantive analytical and policy-oriented work, and assisting countries in each region in the implementation and monitoring of recommendations of conferences as well as other commitments. The United Nations should also give a stronger focus to regional problems and prospects in the socio-economic fields in a cost-effective manner. For this purpose, the regional commissions should be more fully utilized, in accordance with their respective mandates. In this context, the results of the review mandated by the Assembly should be taken into account. The Council shall ensure the active participation of the regional commissions in its examination of the follow-up to major conferences. The Council shall also encourage the regional commissions, under the guidance of their member States, to continue to undertake their own management and functional assessment for adjusting their priorities, mandates, tasks and structures, taking into account the fact that numerous other regional institutions have been created.

3. United Nations funds and programmes

258. United Nations funds and programmes are important vehicles for advancing development cooperation. There is need for a substantial increase in resources for operational activities for development on a predictable, continuous and assured basis commensurate with the increasing needs of developing countries, which should be addressed urgently and expeditiously. Innovative sources of funding could be an additional element for the provision of resources for operational activities for development. The urgent and specific needs of the low-income countries, in particular the least developed countries, should receive priority allocation of grant resources of programmes and projects provided through the funds and programmes.

259. The United Nations operational activities for development should be implemented by the funds and programmes in accordance with Assembly resolutions adopted, particularly in the context of the triennial policy review of operational activities. The Council should provide overall guidance to the funds and programmes in accordance with policies and priorities formulated by the Assembly. The funds and programmes should build capacities for national execution in recipient countries and should seek out, as appropriate, the expertise of the specialized agencies with a view to improving the quality of services and carrying out cooperation activities more effectively and efficiently. Memoranda of understanding that clearly outline individual responsibilities and areas of cooperation have proved useful and should be encouraged between related funds, programmes and specialized agencies.

260. The roles of the funds and programmes should be periodically reviewed with a view to ensuring their responsiveness to the needs of Member States and improving the quality and impact of United Nations operational activities. The efficiency, effectiveness and impact of the operational activities of the United Nations system must be enhanced by, inter alia, a substantial increase in their funding on a predictable, continuous and assured basis, commensurate with the increasing needs of developing countries, as well as through the full implementation of relevant Assembly resolutions. At the same time, operational activities should be country-driven, carried out for the benefit of recipient countries at their request and in accordance with their own policies and priorities.

261. The United Nations system has made a serious effort to improve the impact of its development assistance at the country level. Efforts have been and continue to be made to improve the functioning of funds and programmes at the country and headquarters levels. However, further simplification and harmonization of rules of procedure used by the United Nations development system in its operational activities is called for, in particular by the promotion of greater consistency in the presentation of budgets at the headquarters level, as well as in sharing administrative systems and services in the field, where possible, and in developing common databases in consultation with national Governments. The country programming cycles of the United Nations Development Programme, the United Nations Population Fund and the United Nations Children's Fund should also be harmonized.

262. National plans and priorities constitute the only viable frame of reference for the national programming of operational activities within the United Nations system, which should be country-driven. In this context, individual mandates and complementarities of the organizations and bodies of the United Nations development system should be taken into account. Also, the country strategy note, which remains a voluntary initiative of the recipient countries, should be formulated by interested recipient countries with the assistance of and in cooperation with the United Nations system, under the leadership of the resident coordinator, in all recipient countries where the Government so decides. Reform efforts, in accordance with relevant Assembly resolutions, should aim at, inter alia, enhancing the effectiveness and efficiency of the delivery of United Nations assistance at the country level including through the resident coordinator system. The Secretary-General, in support of the inter-governmental process, has an important role to play in this respect. The resident coordinator, in full consultation with Governments, should facilitate a coherent and coordinated United Nations follow-up to major international conferences at the field level.

4. United Nations Conference on Trade and Development

263. The United Nations Conference on Trade and Development is the focal point within the United Nations for the integrated treatment of development and interrelated issues in the areas of trade, finance, technology, investment and sustainable development. Having a comparative advantage in tackling trade-related development issues, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development should continue to facilitate the integration of developing countries and countries with economies in transition into the international trading system, in a complementary manner with the World Trade Organization, and to promote development through trade and investment in cooperation and coordination with the International Trade Centre, relevant institutions of the United Nations system and other international organizations.

264. The United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, as part of the United Nations system and as a contributor to its revitalization, has adopted far-reaching reforms, as embodied in the Midrand Declaration and the document entitled "A Partnership for Growth and Development", adopted by consensus at the ninth session of the Conference, thus adapting itself to new economic and institutional modalities created by the process of globalization, the conclusion of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations agreements and the creation of the World Trade Organization. These reforms should be implemented, take root and be built upon, in accordance with the decisions taken at the ninth session of the Conference.

265. The efforts of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to facilitate the integration of developing countries, in particular the least developed countries, particularly those in Africa, into the global economy and the international trading system are important for the successful implementation of the Agenda for Development. The tenth session of the Conference, to be held in Thailand in the year 2000, should provide an opportunity to assess progress made and to advance the global partnership for growth and development.

5. Specialized agencies of the United Nations system

266. Specialized agencies, as defined in Chapter IX of the Charter, play a vital role in furthering the implementation of various aspects of the global consensus on international cooperation for development and in promoting and securing the international cooperation needed. Activities, priorities and basic programmes of specialized agencies should be periodically assessed in order to ensure that they remain relevant to the interests of their Member States. In accordance with Article 58 of the Charter, the Organization shall make recommendations for the coordination of the policies and activities of the specialized agencies. The Secretary-General is invited to make recommendations thereon.

267. Mechanisms should be elaborated to enable the Economic and Social Council, within its mandate, to provide guidance to the specialized agencies and to transmit institutional priorities as formulated by the Assembly. The specialized agencies and the United Nations funds and programmes should engage in a focused dialogue with the Council with a view to identifying how their activities can be adjusted in response to such priorities. The Council should also provide appropriate recommendations in order to ensure coherence and complementarity of efforts of all bodies, taking into account the role of the funds and programmes.

268. Efforts are also called for to enhance the transparency of the operations of the agencies. Cooperation and coordination on themes of common interest among the specialized agencies, and where appropriate between these agencies and other bodies of the United Nations system, need to be strengthened. The effectiveness and efficiency of activities of the Council could also be improved by increasing interaction with specialized agencies, including the provision of regular reports to the Assembly, through the Council, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter. In this regard, it will be essential to effectively monitor the follow-up to the conclusions of the Council by the different entities of the United Nations system.

269. Cooperation and coordination within the United Nations system in providing effective support in the field of industrial development is essential. In this context, the ongoing process of reform and revitalization pursued by the United Nations Industrial Development Organization should lead to better defining and enhancing its role and to increasing the relevance, effectiveness and impact of the activities of the United Nations system in the field of industrial development in line with the priorities of its Member States.

6. Secretariat

270. The structure and functioning of the Secretariat and the support services that it provides in the economic, social and related fields are important and must be strengthened and improved in order to increase the effectiveness of the United Nations in the field of development. They cannot be considered in isolation from the overall management structure, desired lines of authority and decision-making processes of the Organization. In particular, a dispersion of efforts and resources leading to unnecessary overlapping of responsibilities and fragmentation of the decision-making processes in the Secretariat should be avoided. Furthermore, the relationship of the Secretary-General with the specialized agencies is crucial and needs to be further enhanced.

271. Ways and means should be explored in accordance with priorities set by the Assembly to reallocate the savings resulting from reform and improved overall cost effectiveness with a view to strengthening United Nations development activities. The Secretary-General is requested to present proposals to this end.

272. It is acknowledged that the Secretary-General, as the chief administrative officer of the Organization, is responsible for the functioning of the Secretariat in accordance with the Charter. The restructuring of the Secretariat is a vital part of the revitalization of the United Nations role in the economic, social and related fields. In order for the United Nations to act more effectively in support of development with greater coherence, coordination and complementarity, further reform should be aimed at:

(a) Ensuring a comprehensive and effective implementation of the objectives of the Agenda for Development and of the relevant objectives of the Charter and the mandates entrusted by the policy-making organs;

(b) Rationalizing the structure of the Secretariat in such a manner that would improve the effectiveness and efficiency of its work, avoid duplication, meet the requirements of Member States and ensure accountability in its operations;

(c) Ensuring transparency and effective implementation of recruitment procedures, principles and practices; ensuring the exclusively international character of the staff; and securing the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity as well as a more effective application of the principles governing the recruitment of staff, including recruitment on as wide a geographical basis as possible, respecting the relevant articles of the Charter;

(d) Ensuring that any reorganization of the economic and social departments of the Secretariat and other proposals for Secretariat reform preserve and promote the independence, intellectual diversity and visibility of the United Nations in policy analysis;

(e) Ensuring that initiatives for Secretariat reform consider measures already adopted and allow for these to take root. The restructuring of the Secretariat should be conducted in a manner that effectively meets the requirements of Member States and takes fully into account the development concerns of all Member States, in particular the developing countries;

(f) Giving consideration to decentralization, as appropriate, from Headquarters to the regional and field levels, including the regional commissions, in order to enhance the capacity of the United Nations to provide stronger focus on regional problems and prospects in a cost-effective manner, taking into consideration the ongoing process of restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields.

7. Reporting

273. Reports to intergovernmental bodies should be concise and action-oriented. Where necessary, intergovernmental bodies should make efforts to rationalize and simplify reporting procedures. All documentation should be provided within the specified timetables and in all the official languages of the United Nations.

8. Inter-agency coordination

274. Better inter-agency coordination within the system is essential to support the goals of the Agenda for Development. This includes coordination and cooperation on themes of common interest and identification of respective strengths and weaknesses in order to ensure a more effective and efficient role of the United Nations system while taking into account respective mandates. In this context, the Administrative Committee on Coordination should have an enhanced function for inter-agency coordination purposes for the United Nations system. The Committee should bring system-wide coordination issues to the attention of the Economic and Social Council and make recommendations thereon. Further efforts should be made to enhance the role of the Committee and its standing committees to ensure that the United Nations system operates in a coherent, coordinated and complementary manner. A systematic exchange of information and an appropriate distribution of tasks should be ensured within the Committee machinery and with any specific inter-agency mechanism, including ad hoc inter-agency thematic task forces set up in the context of the follow-up to conferences. Full information for the Member States on the work of the Committee should be made available and wider distribution of the report of the Committee should be pursued.

9. Participation of non-governmental organizations and other major groups

275. The constructive contribution of non-governmental organizations and other major groups, including the private sector, to the implementation of the Agenda for Development should be encouraged. The existing mechanisms for the involvement and participation of non-governmental organizations in United Nations activities should be fully utilized and, as appropriate, be further improved, taking into account the relevant rules of procedure of the United Nations and the outcome of the meetings of the Open-ended High-level Working Group of the General Assembly on the Strengthening of the United Nations System.

D. Interaction between the United Nations and other multilateral development institutions, including the Bretton Woods institutions and the World Trade Organization

276. Increased interaction and cooperation between the United Nations and the multilateral development institutions, including the Bretton Woods institutions and the World Trade Organization, are necessary to respond to the challenges of development. Also, cooperative working relations between the United Nations and other international organizations should be strengthened. Examples of such cooperation already exist. There is a need to develop further effective and innovative approaches to this interaction and cooperation.

277. The strengthening of collaboration between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions requires an integrated approach, encompassing a closer policy dialogue at the intergovernmental level on relevant areas of international development policy issues, taking into account their respective competencies. In support of this dialogue, closer relationships should be developed between the United Nations, through the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, and the Bretton Woods institutions, in particular the Interim Committee of the International Monetary Fund and the Development Committee of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. In this regard, the Assembly should play a more active role in global economic matters, including the deliberations on macroeconomic issues.

278. International financial and trade institutions should be more closely involved in the preparations and deliberations, when appropriate, of the high-level segment of the Council. Their heads should actively contribute to the discussion on the topic chosen for that segment. Decisions already taken by the Council to ensure their closer involvement, through, inter alia, furnishing relevant reports, should be implemented.

279. A further opportunity to consider global issues of high priority and to identify areas where these institutions can mutually support their respective efforts in promoting development could be provided by high-level special meetings of the Council.

280. Concrete modalities for strengthening the exchange of information on development issues between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions should be explored. Similar modalities may also be explored with the World Trade Organization. Joint meetings between the Secretary-General and the executive heads of the United Nations funds and programmes, the World Trade Organization and the Bretton Woods institutions and other relevant organizations on selected themes, including those identified by the Assembly, should be encouraged.

281. At the field level, the United Nations development system and the Bretton Woods institutions, acting pursuant to their respective mandates, should cooperate more closely, including in the areas of capacity-building and field operations, in accordance with priorities determined by recipient countries. Under the overall guidance of national Governments, they should expand, whenever appropriate, their collaboration in co-financing of field programmes and projects and explore innovative ways to combine and maximize their resources. In consultation and agreement with Governments, efforts should be made to promote complementarity between the country strategy notes, where they exist, the policy framework papers of the Bretton Woods institutions and the World Bank's country assistance strategies. In channelling financial and technical assistance through multilateral development finance institutions, donor countries are encouraged to take into account the respective roles and functions of the United Nations programmes and funds and the Bretton Woods institutions so as to ensure the complementarity of development assistance.

282. In post-emergency situations, the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions must support the transition from emergency to rehabilitation, reconstruction and long-term development. To this end, coordination between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions should be improved.

E. Follow-up and implementation

283. The intergovernmental follow-up to the Agenda for Development shall be undertaken by the General Assembly as the highest intergovernmental mechanism and the principal policy-making and appraisal organ of the United Nations system. The Assembly has called for the renewal of the dialogue on strengthening international cooperation for development through partnership, which should serve as an important mechanism through which the intergovernmental follow-up and assessment of the Agenda and its implementation will be conducted. Such dialogue should also be used as an opportunity to discuss new and emerging issues concerning international cooperation for development.

284. The Economic and Social Council, within its mandate, shall assist the Assembly in overseeing United Nations system-wide implementation of the Agenda and by providing recommendations in this regard. At the same time, Governments as well as regional economic integration organizations have an important role to play at their respective levels in the follow-up to the Agenda.

285. Closely related to the follow-up to and implementation of the Agenda is the urgent need for an integrated, interrelated and coherent implementation of and follow up at the national, subregional, regional, and international levels to the recommendations and commitments of recent United Nations major conferences and agreements on development. The progress of the implementation of the results of those conferences should be reviewed so as to identify progress achieved as well as obstacles hindering their full and effective implementation. While Governments have the primary responsibility for the implementation of the declarations and programmes of action adopted by international conferences, the international community, in particular the United Nations system, including the multilateral and regional financial institutions, has an important role in contributing to, assisting in, facilitating and reviewing the progress of the implementation of the results of those conferences at all levels and in further promoting their goals and objectives.

286. A strong political commitment by the international community is needed to implement a strengthened international cooperation for development as reflected in the present Agenda. The mobilization of domestic and international financial resources for development from all sources is an essential component for the comprehensive and effective implementation of the Agenda. In this connection, enhanced efforts should be made for the mobilization and provision of new and additional financial resources for the development of developing countries. Despite an increase in private capital flows, official development assistance remains an essential source of external funding. Developed countries reaffirm the commitments undertaken to fulfil as soon as possible the agreed United Nations targets of 0.7 per cent of their gross national product for overall official development assistance and of 0.15 per cent of the gross national product for official development assistance for the least developed countries. Donor countries that have met the 0.15 per cent target will seek to undertake to reach 0.20 per cent. Further efforts are also needed to improve the effectiveness of official development assistance and to focus such aid on the poorest countries.

287. Due consideration should be given to modalities for conducting an intergovernmental dialogue on the financing of development, taking into account the recommendation by the Secretary-General.

Development through partnership

In response to General Assembly resolution 51/174 [YUN 1996, p. 730], the Secretary-General in October reported on renewal of the dialogue on strengthening international economic cooperation for development through partnership [A/52/425]. The Secretary-General observed that the need to promote such a dialogue had been reiterated in various intergovernmental bodies, including the Ad Hoc Open-ended Working Group on an Agenda for Development. He noted that the Agenda was aimed at invigorating a renewed and strengthened partnership for development, based on the imperatives of mutual benefits and genuine interdependence.

With regard to possible future themes for dialogue, the Secretary-General indicated that a number of themes had been recommended in his 1995 report on the subject [YUN 1995, p. 830], including: globalization and the rules of the game; competition; regional integration and the global economy; new information technologies and the global economy; international migration; prevention and management of emergencies and post-conflict peace-building; and crime, drugs, violence and global stability. In resolution 50/122 [YUN 1995, p. 831], the Assembly had decided that the theme for the first high-level dialogue (to be held in 1998) would be the social and economic impact of globalization and interdependence and their policy implications. Taking into account subsequent developments, the Secretary-General suggested the following possible themes: development finance; strengthening the means for development cooperation, including South-South cooperation; information technologies and development; international migration and development; prevention and management of emergencies and post-conflict peace-building; and uncivil society (terrorism, drug trafficking, organized prostitution, and trafficking in women and children).

The Secretary-General also made suggestions with regard to the modalities of the proposed high-level dialogues, including that the themes to be chosen should engage the interest of all groups and be clearly defined; the theme to be selected should be chosen at least one year or more in advance to allow for preparations; and, in addition to the UN system, preparations for the discussions should also involve other actors in development and the academic and scientific community.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/186 without vote [agenda item 97 (a)]. The draft was recommended by the Second Committee following a recorded vote of 151 to 2 (Israel, United States) [A/52/628/Add.1].

Renewal of the dialogue on strengthening international economic cooperation for development through partnership

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 48/165 of 21 December 1993, 49/95 of 19 December 1994, 50/122 of 20 December 1995 and 51/174 of 16 December 1996,

Noting the adoption of the Agenda for Development and the relevant provisions on its follow-up and implementation, and the need to give impetus to international economic cooperation for development so as to effectively follow up on the Agenda,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General entitled "Sustainable development and international economic cooperation: renewal of the dialogue on strengthening international economic cooperation for development through partnership",

1. Reaffirms the continued need to strengthen constructive dialogue and genuine partnership in order to promote further international economic cooperation for development;

2. Also reaffirms that such a dialogue should be conducted in response to the imperatives of mutual interests and benefits, genuine interdependence, shared responsibility and the partnership for achieving sustained economic growth and sustainable development, in accordance with the relevant General Assembly resolutions and recent United Nations conferences, as well as for improving the international economic environment that is conducive to such development, and that the United Nations system should reinforce its activities in order to facilitate such a dialogue;

3. Requests the President of the General Assembly to begin consultations with Member States so as to arrive at an early decision on the modalities, focus of the discussion and date of the two-day high-level dialogue on the theme of the social and economic impact of globalization and interdependence and their policy implications, to be held at an appropriate time conducive to maintaining the entity and character of the two-day high-level dialogue;

4. Invites Governments to contribute their views to the high-level dialogue, including its preparation, and encourages them to participate in the dialogue;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, in close cooperation with Governments, all relevant parts of the United Nations system, relevant intergovernmental organizations and other development actors, to initiate preparations for such a dialogue;

6. Recognizes the need to work out modalities and themes for future high-level dialogues, building on the experience of the high-level dialogue and, in this context, invites Member States to provide inputs to this process;

7. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session, under the appropriate item, the sub-item entitled "Renewal of the dialogue on strengthening international economic cooperation for development through partnership".

Business and development

In response to General Assembly resolution 48/180 [YUN 1993, p. 663], the Secretary-General submitted his second biennial report on entrepreneurship and privatization for economic growth and sustainable development [A/52/428]. The first such report was considered by the Assembly in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 834].

The Secretary-General noted that 13 United Nations departments, funds or specialized agencies of the 29 requested had provided inputs to the report. Special emphasis was placed on developing economies and those in transition from centrally planned to market-based economies. Giving a brief background to entrepreneurship, the Secretary-General stated that the degree of entrepreneurship prevailing in a country and the extent to which the potential for business creation was allowed to be realized was a determining factor in the economic growth of a society. Experience had shown that the best results in entrepreneurial development were attained with programmes to promote and train entrepreneurs that were linked to support services with direct help to the potential entrepreneur in accessing finance, technical, managerial and marketing advice, and suitable physical facilities. There was some evidence that the behavioural characteristics of persons needed to be taken into account in screening potential entrepreneurs.

The report described action being taken within the UN system in the areas of the development of small and medium-sized enterprises; micro-finance; privatization; restructuring of the military industry for civilian markets; the enabling environment (legal and regulatory framework, taxation, foreign investment); and partnerships between the public and private sectors.

The Secretary-General recommended that the United Nations and the organizations of the system should be encouraged to build partnerships and consult with the private sector with a view to achieving developmental objectives, including the goals established by international conferences. He welcomed the recommendations of the Microcredit Summit (see below, under "Eradica-lion of poverty") and stated that the organizations of the UN system should be encouraged to continue and enhance their microcredit programmes and to support the gender objectives in particular. It was further recommended that Governments and UN organizations should strengthen and better coordinate their support to small and medium-sized enterprises and strengthen their support for the conversion of military industries and bases to civilian use; UN organizations should provide more assistance to Governments in streamlining and simplifying their tax systems and strengthening tax administration; and the UN system and other donors should work together to advise and assist Governments in ensuring that the public interest was respected in privately run public services.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/209 without vote [draft: A/52/L.70] [agenda item 96 (b)].

Business and development

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 47/171 of 22 December 1992 entitled "Privatization in the context of economic restructuring, economic growth and sustainable development", 48/180 of 21 December 1993 entitled "Entrepreneurship and privatization for economic growth and sustainable development" and 50/106 of 20 December 1995 entitled "Business and development", as well as the Agenda for Development,

Welcoming the fact that many countries continue to attach major importance to the privatization of enterprises, demonopolization and administrative deregulation in the context of their economic restructuring policies, as a means to increase efficiency, economic growth and sustainable development,

Recognizing the importance of the market and the private sector for the efficient functioning of economies in various stages of development,

Recognizing the sovereign right of each State to decide on the development of its private and public sectors, taking into account the comparative advantages of each sector, bearing in mind the economic, social and cultural diversity in the world,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General entitled "Entrepreneurship and privatization for economic growth and sustainable development";

2. Underlines the positive role of the private sector in supporting economic growth and development as well as in the mobilization of resources;

3. Emphasizes the role of the private sector in each country, including international investors, to contribute positively to the implementation of national macroeconomic policies and macroeconomic stabilization programmes;

4. Recognizes that business and industry, including transnational corporations, play a crucial role in the social and economic development of a country, that a stable policy regime enables and encourages business and industry to operate responsibly and efficiently and to implement longer-term policies and that the activities of business and industry are the primary contributors to increasing prosperity, which is a major goal of the development process;

5. Expresses the conviction that a stable and transparent environment for commercial transactions in all countries is essential for the mobilization of investment, finance, technology, skills and other important resources across national borders, in order to promote growth and development, and recognizes in this context that effective efforts at all levels to combat corruption and bribery are essential elements of an improved international business environment;

6. Recognizes the important role of Governments in creating, through transparent and participatory processes, an enabling environment supportive of entrepreneurship and facilitative of privatization, in particular in establishing the judicial, executive and legislative frameworks necessary for a market-based exchange of goods and services and for good management;

7. Emphasizes the importance of a supportive international economic environment, including investment and trade, for the promotion of entrepreneurship and privatization;

8. Recognizes the need to increase private sector involvement in the provision of infrastructure services, inter alia, through joint ventures between public and private entities, particularly in countries with economies in transition, while protecting essential services and safeguarding the environment;

9. Recognizes that in many countries the informal sector accounts for a significant part of all economic activity and is a particularly important source of income for women and that the progressive integration of the informal sector should be encouraged;

10. Stresses the importance of micro-credit to people living in poverty, allowing them to establish micro-enterprises, which in turn generate self-employment and contribute to achieving empowerment, particularly of women, and calls for the strengthening of institutions supportive of micro-financing, in particular, micro-credit;

11. Values the promotion of entrepreneurship, including through the informal sector and micro-enterprises, in the development of small and medium-sized enterprises and industries by various actors throughout civil society and of privatization, demonopolization and the simplification of administrative procedures;

12. Recognizes the important role of cooperatives in the development and promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises;

13. Encourages the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to continue to provide a forum for intergovernmental discussions, with the participation of representatives from the private sector, concerning issues related to privatization, enterprise development and international flows of investment, and welcomes the efforts by the Secretary-General of the Conference to build a lasting partnership for development with non-governmental actors, including through the "Partners for Development" initiative to be held at Lyon, France, in 1998;

14. Invites the United Nations Industrial Development Organization and the other relevant United Nations bodies to further strengthen their activities, in particular for Africa and the least developed countries, in promoting the development of entrepreneurship, especially for small and medium-sized enterprises, and calls upon the international community to lend its support to the United Nations Industrial Development Organization in this regard;

15. Stresses that the outsourcing of work from transnational corporations to small and medium-sized enterprises supports the development of entrepreneurship and privatization in developing countries;

16. Calls upon the United Nations funds and programmes, in accordance with their mandates, to continue to strengthen support to the promotion of entrepreneurship and, in their work in implementing the present resolution, to give due consideration to the role of the private sector in development, taking into account the priorities set by each country, while ensuring a gender perspective, and, in this connection, states that there is a need to assist in particular the Governments of developing countries, as well as countries with economies in transition, in strengthening their capacity to encourage wider participation of the private sector;

17. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-fourth session the item entitled "Business and development", and requests the Secretary-General, in cooperation with relevant United Nations bodies, to prepare a report which includes analytical work on the implementation of the present resolution for submission to the General Assembly at that session.

Coercive economic measures

In response to General Assembly resolution 50/96 [YUN1995, p.836], the Secretary-General submitted an October 1997 report [A/52/459] on economic measures as a means of political and economic coercion against developing countries. The report contained a summary of replies received from 12 Member States and the observer of the Holy See in response to a request from the Secretary-General for their views and other relevant information. It also reviewed recent action taken by relevant components of the UN system, based on information provided by them.

In addition, the report contained a summary of the deliberations of an ad hoc expert group meeting on economic measures as a means of political and economic coercion against developing countries (New York, 30 June-1 July), organized by the Department for Economic and Social Information and Policy Analysis in accordance with Assembly resolution 50/96. The expert group expressed deep concern about the potential adverse effects of coercive economic measures on the structure of international relations, particularly in the area of trade and development. The importance of international cooperation and of positive economic measures involving adequate incentives and reward systems to induce policy changes was reaffirmed and stressed as a more rational and viable alternative to unilateral coercive economic measures in most cases. The expert group recommended that, within the United Nations, analytical and conceptual work should be carried out both at the specialized level (through continued efforts for developing methodologies and criteria for impact assessment) and on an interdisciplinary scale (interrelationship between the political, legal, economic and social dimensions of the problem). It further noted that there should be effective cooperation and coordination of monitoring activities within the UN system and beyond (with the Trade Policy Review Mechanism of the World Trade Organization, for example), based on clearly defined mandates.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/181 by recorded vote (109-1-50) [agenda item 95 (b)]. The draft was recommended by the Second Committee [A/52/626/Add.2].

Unilateral economic measures as a means of political and economic coercion against developing countries

The General Assembly,

Recalling the relevant principles set forth in the Charter of the United Nations,

Reaffirming the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, which states, inter alia, that no State may use or encourage the use of unilateral economic, political or any other type of measure to coerce another State in order to obtain from it the subordination of the exercise of its sovereign rights,

Bearing in mind the general principles governing the international trading system and trade policies for development contained in relevant resolutions, rules and provisions of the United Nations and the World Trade Organization,

Recalling its resolutions 44/215 of 22 December 1989, 46/210 of 20 December 1991, 48/168 of 21 December 1993 and 50/96 of 20 December 1995,

Gravely concerned that the use of unilateral coercive economic measures particularly adversely affects the economy and development efforts of developing countries and has a general negative impact on international economic cooperation and on worldwide efforts to move towards a non-discriminatory and open multilateral trading system,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General;
2. Urges the international community to adopt urgent and effective measures to eliminate the use of unilateral coercive economic measures against developing countries which are not authorized by relevant organs of the United Nations or are inconsistent with the principles of international law as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations, and which contravene the basic principles of the multilateral trading system;
3. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to monitor the imposition of measures of this nature and to study the impact of such measures on the affected countries, including the impact on trade and development;

4. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit a report to the General Assembly at its fifty-fourth session on the implementation of the present resolution.

RECORDED VOTE ON RESOLUTION 52/181:

In favour. Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belize, Benin, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cote d'Ivoire, Cuba, Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Gabon, Ghana, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kyrgyzstan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Liberia, Libya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Marshall Islands, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Myanmar, Namibia, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Qatar, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Samoa, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Singapore, Solomon Islands, South Africa, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Swaziland, Syria, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Uzbekistan, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Viet Nam, Yemen, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Elimination of coercive economic measures

In response to General Assembly resolution 51/22 [YUN 1996, p. 734], the Secretary-General submitted a report [A/52/343 & Add.1] containing replies received from five Governments (Belgium, Iran, Iraq, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, San Marino) in response to his request for information on the elimination of coercive economic measures as a means of political and economic compulsion.

By decision 52/413 of 8 December, the Assembly deferred consideration of the matter and included the item in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third (1998) session.

Sustainable development

In June, the General Assembly held its nineteenth special session to review and appraise the implementation of Agenda 21—a comprehensive plan of action for the sustainable development of the Earth into the twenty-first century, which was adopted by the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. The session culminated in the adoption of the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21, which included a statement of commitment to Agenda 21 and to the goals of sustainable development—the integration of economic, social and environmental policies and actions at all levels—and to global partnership aimed at achieving sustainable development worldwide and meeting equitably the needs of current and future generations. The Programme also included an assessment of progress made since UNCED; a broad range of recommendations aimed at fostering progress in various sectoral and cross-sectoral areas of Agenda 21; decisions aimed at strengthening global and regional institutional arrangements for achieving sustainable development; and recommendations on the future methods of work of the Commission on Sustainable Development and the programme of work for the Commission for the period 1998-2002.

The Commission on Sustainable Development held high-level discussions on preparations for the special session at its fifth session in April.

Nineteenth special session

A special session of the General Assembly to review and appraise the implementation of Agenda 21—a programme of action for sustainable development worldwide—was held in New York from 23 to 28 June 1997, as decided by the Assembly in resolution 50/113 [YUN 1995, p. 840]. Following the adoption of Agenda 21 in 1992 by UNCED [YUN 1992, p. 672], the Assembly, in resolution 47/190 [YUN 1992, p. 675], had decided to convene a special session to review and appraise Agenda 21 not later than 1997.

Preparations for the session were discussed during the fifth session of the Commission on Sustainable Development (see below).

The nineteenth special session—also known as Earth Summit+5—was attended by 55 heads of State or Government or similar level officials, 178 ministers of various rank, and executive heads and high-level officials of a large number of international organizations and institutions, as well as representatives of numerous non-governmental organizations accredited to the United Nations. The special session concluded with the adoption of the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21.

In other action, the Assembly approved the report of the Credentials Committee on 27 June (resolution S-19/1). With regard to procedural matters, the Assembly on 23 June appointed the members of the Credentials Committee (decision S-19/11); elected the President of the Assembly (decision S-19/12); elected the Chairmen of the Main Committees (decision S-19/13); elected the Vice-Presidents of the Assembly (decision S-19/14); and elected the officers of the Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole of the Nineteenth Special Session (decision S-19/15) (for details, see APPENDIX III). The Assembly, also on 23 June, adopted the agenda for the special session (decision S-19/22) and made arrangements with regard to the organization of the session (decision S-19/21).

In his opening statement, the Assembly President said that the task of reviewing the implementation of Agenda 21 had to go beyond simply calculating ratios of progress versus deterioration. It was a time for critical reflection and concrete action. There had been, he said, some notable achievements since UNCED in 1992, although they had been somewhat scattered and uneven. Prime among them was the unfolding of Agenda 21 into a living document beyond the realm of conferences. National strategies, local initiatives, public consciousness and environmental agreements had proliferated, accompanied by tentative reforms of institutions and programmes. On the global level, population growth had stabilized, infant mortality had fallen, life expectancy had increased and nutrition had improved.

However, five years after UNCED, the visionary ambition of Agenda 21 was tempered by some damning statistics that showed that the world was heading further away from, not towards, sustainable development. The Earth's current inhabitants continued to consume resources, pollute, and spread and entrench poverty as though they were to be the last generation. The fact that those who had made serious commitments at Rio had not followed through on their promises was a shame, made tragic because impressive gains in science and technology had advanced understanding and presented policy options and choices of action to those in power who could make a difference.

It was fitting, said the President, that the special session was being held three days after the adoption of the Agenda for Development (see above). The United Nations continued to work on all aspects of development, seeing it as the vital ingredient in achieving global security and improving social quality and conditions of life for millions. If true value continued to be placed on finding global solutions to global problems, a strengthened United Nations was essential.

Commission on Sustainable Development. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 51/181 [YUN 1996, p. 740], the Commission on Sustainable Development devoted the meeting of its Ad Hoc Open-ended Inter-Sessional Working Group (New York, 24 February-7 March) [E/CN.17/1997/13] to preparing for the special session. In line with that resolution also, the Commission, at its fifth session (New York, 7-25 April) [E/1997/29], held a high-level discussion from 8 to 10 April on the preparations for the special session and on the report of the Ad Hoc Intergovernmental Panel on Forests (see PART THREE, Chapter VII).

Among the documents before the Commission relating to preparations for the special session was an omnibus report of the Secretary-General on the overall progress achieved since UNCED [E/CN.17/1997/2 & Add.1-31]. The main body of the report contained a global assessment of the current status of economic and social development and environmental sustainability and appraised progress made since UNCED, focusing on the main achievements and unrealized expectations. It also attempted to identify the main challenges and priorities in the implementation of Agenda 21 and of other outcomes of UNCED for the period after the 1997 review, including the future role of the Commission on Sustainable Development. The addenda to the report provided information on progress or lack thereof in the implementation of individual chapters of Agenda 21. A number of conclusions presented in the report were based on information contained in other reports before the Commission: on critical trends in sustainable development (see below); on the results of the comprehensive freshwater assessment (see PART THREE, Chapter VI); and on activities posing a major threat to the environment (see PART THREE, Chapter VII).

Another report of the Secretary-General [E/CN.17/1997/5] assessed progress achieved at the national level on the basis of information contained in country profiles, prepared in cooperation with Governments concerned.

In its report to the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council on preparations for the special session [A/S-19/14-E/1997/60], the Commission included a draft text on the proposed outcome of the special session and annexed to it the Chairman's summary of the Commission's high-level segment and the summary reports of the Commission's working group. The Economic and Social Council took note of that report by decision 1997/308 of 25 July.

In addition to negotiating the final preparations for the special session, the Commission considered a number of substantive issues (see below).

Other preparatory meetings. Other meetings held in preparation for the Assembly's nineteenth special session included the High-level Advisory Board on Sustainable Development, which held its seventh session in Monaco from 14 to 17 January [E/CN.17/1997/17]. The Board prepared a report on critical issues and policies for sustainable development: energy, transport and water [E/CN.17/1997/17/Add.1], which contained recommendations for concrete actions to complement Agenda 21 in those areas.

By an 18 February note verbale [E/CN.17/1997/18], the Netherlands transmitted to the Secretary-General the report of the Fourth Expert Group Meeting on Financial Issues of Agenda 21 (Santiago, Chile, 8-10 January). The conclusions and recommendations of an Expert Workshop on Fostering the Linkage between Energy and Sustainable Development within the International Institutions (Vienna, 22-24 January) [E/CN.17/1997/16] were submitted to the Secretary-General by Austria on 29 January. Bangladesh, on 8 April, brought to the Secretary-General's attention the report of the Ad Hoc Expert Group Meeting on the Implementation of Special Measures for the Least Developed Countries in Agenda 21 (New York, 3-4 April) [E/CN.17/1997/22], and Belarus, on 21 April, forwarded the Final Document of the International Conference on Sustainable Development of Countries with Economies in Transition (Minsk, 16-18 April) [E/CN.17/1997/24].

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 28 June [meeting 11], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole of the Nineteenth Special Session [A/S-19/29], adopted resolution S/19-2 without vote [agenda item 8].

Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21

I. Statement of commitment

1. At the nineteenth special session of the United Nations General Assembly, we—heads of State or Government and other heads of delegations, together with our partners from international institutions and non-governmental organizations—have gathered to review progress achieved over the five years that have passed since the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development and to re-energize our commitment to further action on goals and objectives set out by the Earth Summit.

2. The United Nations Conference on Environment and Development was a landmark event. At that Conference, we launched a new global partnership for sustainable development—a partnership that respects the indivisibility of environmental protection and the development process. It is founded on a global consensus and political commitment at the highest level. Agenda 21, adopted at Rio de Janeiro, addresses the pressing environment and development problems of today and also aims at preparing the world for the challenges of the next century in order to attain the long-term goals of sustainable development.

3. Our focus at this special session has been to accelerate the implementation of Agenda 21 in a comprehensive manner and not to renegotiate its provisions or to be selective in its implementation. We reaffirm that Agenda 21 remains the fundamental programme of action for achieving sustainable development. We reaffirm all the principles contained in the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development and the Forest Principles. We are convinced that the achievement of sustainable development requires the integration of its economic, environmental and social components. We recommit to working together—in the spirit of global partnership—to reinforce our joint efforts to meet equitably the needs of present and future generations.

4. We acknowledge that a number of positive results have been achieved, but we are deeply concerned that the overall trends with respect to sustainable development are worse today than they were in 1992. We emphasize that the implementation of Agenda 21 in a comprehensive manner remains vitally important and is more urgent now than ever.

5. Time is of the essence in meeting the challenges of sustainable development as set out in the Rio Declaration and Agenda 21. To this end, we recommit ourselves to the global partnership established at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development and to the continuous dialogue and action inspired by the need to achieve a more efficient and equitable world economy, as a means to provide a supportive international climate for achieving environment and development goals. We therefore pledge to continue to work together, in good faith and in the spirit of partnership, to accelerate the implementation of Agenda 21. We invite everyone throughout the world to join us in our common cause.

6. We commit ourselves to ensuring that the next comprehensive review of Agenda 21 in the year 2002 demonstrates greater measurable progress in achieving sustainable development. The present Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21 is our vehicle for achieving that goal. We commit ourselves to fully implementing this Programme.

II. Assessment of progress made since the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development

7. The five years that have elapsed since the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development have been characterized by the accelerated globalization of interactions among countries in the areas of world trade, foreign direct investment and capital markets. Globalization presents new opportunities and challenges. It is important that national and international environmental and social policies be implemented and strengthened in order to ensure that globalization trends have a positive impact on sustainable development, especially in developing countries. The impact of recent trends in globalization on developing countries has been uneven. A limited number of developing countries have been able to take advantage of those trends, attracting large inflows of external private capital and experiencing significant export-led growth and acceleration of growth in per capita gross domestic product. Many other countries, however, in particular African countries and the least developed countries, have shown slow or negative growth and continue to be marginalized. As a result, they generally experienced stagnating or falling per capita gross domestic product through 1995. In these and in some other developing countries, the problems of poverty, low levels of social development, inadequate infrastructure and lack of capital have prevented them from benefiting from globalization. While continuing their efforts to achieve sustainable development and to attract new investments, these countries still require international assistance in their efforts directed towards sustainable development. In particular the least developed countries continue to be heavily dependent on a declining volume of official development assistance for the capacity-building and infrastructure development required to provide for basic needs and more effective participation in the globalizing world economy. In an increasingly interdependent world economy, the responsible conduct of monetary and other macro-economic policies requires that their potential impact on other countries be taken into account. Since the Conference, the countries with economies in transition have achieved significant progress in implementing the principles of sustainable development. However, the need for full integration of these countries into the world economy remains one of the crucial problems on their way towards sustainable development. The international community should continue to support these countries in their efforts to accelerate the transition to a market economy and to achieve sustainable development.

8. Although economic growth—reinforced by globalization—has allowed some countries to reduce the proportion of people in poverty, for others marginalization has increased. Too many countries have seen economic conditions worsen and public services deteriorate; the total number of people in the world living in poverty has increased. Income inequality has increased among countries and also within them, unemployment has worsened in many countries, and the gap between the least developed countries and other countries has grown rapidly in recent years. On a more positive note, population growth rates have been declining globally, largely as a result of expanded basic education and health care. That trend is projected to lead to a stable world population in the middle of the twenty-first century. There has also been progress in social services, with expanding access to education, declining infant mortality and increasing life expectancy in most countries. However, many people, particularly in the least developed countries, still do not have access to adequate food and basic social services or to clean water and sanitation. Reducing current inequities in the distribution of wealth and access to resources, both within and among countries, is one of the most serious challenges facing humankind.

9. Five years after the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, the state of the global environment has continued to deteriorate, as noted in the Global Environment Outlook of the United Nations Environment Programme, and significant environmental problems remain deeply embedded in the socio-economic fabric of countries in all regions. Some progress has been made in terms of institutional development, international consensus-building, public participation and private sector actions and, as a result, a number of countries have succeeded in curbing pollution and slowing the rate of resource degradation. Overall, however, trends are worsening. Many polluting emissions, notably of toxic substances, greenhouse gases and waste volumes are continuing to increase although in some industrialized countries emissions are decreasing. Marginal progress has been made in addressing unsustainable production and consumption patterns. Insufficient progress has also been identified in the field of environmentally sound management and adequate control of transboundary movements of hazardous and radioactive wastes. Many countries undergoing rapid economic growth and urbanization are also experiencing increasing levels of air and water pollution, with accumulating impacts on human health. Acid rain and transboundary air pollution, once considered a problem only in the industrialized countries, are increasingly becoming a problem in many developing regions. In many poorer regions of the world, persistent poverty is contributing to accelerated degradation of natural resources and desertification has spread. In countries seriously affected by drought and/or desertification, especially those in Africa, their agricultural productivity, among other things, is uncertain and continues to decline, thereby hampering their efforts to achieve sustainable development. Inadequate and unsafe water supplies are affecting an increasing number of people worldwide, aggravating problems of ill health and food insecurity among the poor. Conditions in natural habitats and fragile ecosystems, including mountain ecosystems, are still deteriorating in all regions of the world, resulting in diminishing biological diversity. At the global level, renewable resources, in particular fresh water, forests, topsoil and marine fish stocks, continue to be used at rates beyond their viable rates of regeneration; without improved management, this situation is clearly unsustainable.

10. While there has been progress in material and energy efficiency, particularly with reference to non-renewable resources, overall trends remain unsustainable. As a result, increasing levels of pollution threaten to exceed the capacity of the global environment to absorb them, increasing the potential obstacles to economic and social development in developing countries.

11. Since the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, extensive efforts have been made by Governments and international organizations to integrate environmental, economic and social objectives into decision-making by elaborating new policies and strategies for sustainable development or by adapting existing policies and plans. As many as one hundred and fifty countries have responded to the commitments established at the Conference through national-level commissions or coordinating mechanisms designed to develop an integrated approach to sustainable development.

12. The major groups have demonstrated what can be achieved by taking committed action, sharing resources and building consensus, reflecting grass-roots concern and involvement. The efforts of local authorities are making Agenda 21 and the pursuit of sustainable development a reality at the local level through the implementation of "local Agenda 21s" and other sustainable development programmes. Non-governmental organizations, educational institutions, the scientific community and the media have increased public awareness and discussion of the relations between environment and development in all countries. The involvement, role and responsibilities of business and industry, including transnational corporations, are important. Hundreds of small and large businesses have made "green business" a new operating mode. Workers and trade unions have established partnerships with employers and communities to encourage sustainable development in the workplace. Farmer-led initiatives have resulted in improved agricultural practices contributing to sound resource management. Indigenous people have played an increasing role in addressing issues affecting their interests and particularly concerning their traditional knowledge and practices. Young people and women around the world have played a prominent role in galvanizing communities into recognizing their responsibilities to future generations. Nevertheless, more opportunities should be created for women to participate effectively in economic, social and political development as equal partners in all sectors of the economy.

13. Among the achievements since the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development have been the entry into force of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, the Convention on Biological Diversity and the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa; the conclusion of the Agreement on the Implementation of the Provisions of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea of 10 December 1982 relating to the Conservation and Management of Straddling Fish Stocks and Highly Migratory Fish Stocks; the adoption of the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States; the elaboration of the Global Programme of Action for the Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities; and the entry into force of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. Implementation of these important commitments and of others adopted before the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development by all the parties to them remains, however, to be carried out, and in many cases further strengthening of their provisions is required as well as the mechanisms for putting them into effect. The establishment, restructuring, funding and replenishment of the Global Environment Facility were a major achievement. However, its levels of funding and replenishment have not been sufficient fully to meet its objectives.

14. Progress has been made in incorporating the principles contained in the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development—including the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities, which embodies the important concept of and basis for international partnership; the precautionary principle; the polluter pays principle; and the environmental impact assessment principle—in a variety of international and national legal instruments. While some progress has been made in implementing United Nations Conference on Environment and Development commitments through a variety of international legal instruments, much remains to be done to embody the Rio principles more firmly in law and practice.

15. A number of major United Nations conferences have advanced international commitment for the achievement of long-term goals and objectives directed towards sustainable development.

16. Organizations and programmes of the United Nations system have played an important role in the progress made in the implementation of Agenda 21. The Commission on Sustainable Development was established to review progress achieved in the implementation of Agenda 21, advance global dialogue and foster partnerships for sustainable development. The Commission has catalysed new action and commitments and has contributed to the deliberations on sustainable development among a wide variety of partners within and outside the United Nations system. Although much remains to be done, progress has also been made at the national, regional and international levels in implementing the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development Forest Principles, including through the Commission's Ad Hoc Intergovernmental Panel on Forests.

17. Provision of adequate and predictable financial resources and the transfer of environmentally sound technologies to developing countries are critical elements for the implementation of Agenda 21. However, while some progress has been made, much remains to be done to activate the means of implementation set out in Agenda 21, in particular in the areas of finance and technology transfer, technical assistance and capacity-building.

18. Most developed countries have still not reached the United Nations target, reaffirmed by most countries at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, of committing 0.7 per cent of their gross national product to official development assistance or the United Nations target, as agreed, of committing 0.15 per cent of gross national product as official development assistance to the least developed countries. Regrettably, on average, official development assistance as a percentage of the gross national product of developed countries has drastically declined in the post-Conference period, from 0.34 per cent in 1992 to 0.27 per cent in 1995, but official development assistance has taken more account of the need for an integrated approach to sustainable development.

19. In other areas, results have been encouraging since the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development. There has been a sizeable expansion of private flows of financial resources from developed to a limited number of developing countries and, in a number of countries, efforts have been made in support of domestic resource mobilization, including the increasing use of economic instruments to promote sustainable development.

20. In many developing countries, the debt situation remains a major constraint on achieving sustainable development. Although the debt situation of some middle-income countries has improved, there is a need to continue to address the debt problems of the heavily indebted poor countries, which continue to face unsustainable external debt burdens. The recent World Bank/International Monetary Fund Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Initiative could help to address that issue with the cooperation of all creditor countries. Further efforts by the international community are still required to remove debt as an impediment to sustainable development.

21. Similarly, technology transfer and technology-related investment from public and private sources, which are particularly important to developing countries, have not been realized as outlined in Agenda 21. Although increased private flows have led to investments in industry and technology in some developing countries and economies in transition, many other countries have been left behind. Conditions in some of these countries have been less attractive to private sector investment and technological change has been slower, thus limiting their ability to meet their commitments to Agenda 21 and other international agreements. The technology gap between developed countries and, in particular, the least developed countries has widened.

III. Implementation of Agenda 21 in areas requiring urgent action

22. Agenda 21 and the principles contained in the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development established a comprehensive approach to the achievement of sustainable development. While it is the primary responsibility of national Governments to achieve the economic, social and environmental objectives of Agenda 21, it is essential that international co-operation be reactivated and intensified, recognizing, inter alia, the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities as set forth in Principle 7 of the Rio Declaration. This requires the mobilization of stronger political will and the invigoration of a genuine new global partnership, taking into account the special needs and priorities of developing countries. Such an approach remains as relevant and as urgently needed as ever. It is clear from the assessment above that, although progress has been made in some areas, a major new effort will be required to achieve the goals established at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, particularly in areas of cross-sectoral matters where implementation has yet to be achieved. The proposals set out in sections A to C below outline strategies for accelerating progress towards sustainable development. The sections are equally important and must be considered and implemented in a balanced and integrated way.

A. Integration of economic, social and environmental objectives

23. Economic development, social development and environmental protection are interdependent and mutually reinforcing components of sustainable development. Sustained economic growth is essential to the economic and social development of all countries, in particular developing countries. Through such growth, which should be broadly based so as to benefit all people, countries will be able to improve the standards of living of their people through the eradication of poverty, hunger, disease and illiteracy and the provision of adequate shelter and secure employment for all, and the preservation of the integrity of the environment. Growth can foster development only if its benefits are fully shared. It must therefore also be guided by equity, justice and social and environmental considerations. Development, in turn, must involve measures that improve the human condition and the quality of life itself. Democracy, respect for all human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the right to development, transparent and accountable governance in all sectors of society, as well as effective participation by civil society, are also an essential part of the necessary foundations for the realization of social and people-centred sustainable development.

24. Sustainable development strategies are important mechanisms for enhancing and linking national capacity so as to bring together priorities in social, economic and environmental policies. Hence, special attention must be given to the fulfilment of commitments in the areas set out below, in the framework of an integrated approach towards development, consisting of mutually reinforcing measures to sustain economic growth, as well as to promote social development and environmental protection. Achieving sustainable development cannot be carried out without greater integration at all policy-making levels and at operational levels, including the lowest administrative levels possible. Economic sectors, such as industry, agriculture, energy, transport and tourism, must take responsibility for the impact of their activities on human well-being and the physical environment. In the context of good governance, properly constructed strategies can enhance prospects for economic growth and employment and at the same time protect the environment. All sectors of society should be involved in their development and implementation, as follows:

(a) By the year 2002, the formulation and elaboration of national strategies for sustainable development that reflect the contributions and responsibilities of all interested parties should be completed in all countries, with assistance provided, as appropriate, through international cooperation, taking into account the special needs of the least developed countries. The efforts of developing countries in effectively implementing national strategies should be supported. Countries that already have national strategies should continue their efforts to enhance and effectively implement them. Assessment of progress achieved and exchange of experience among Governments should be promoted. Local Agenda 21s and other local sustainable development programmes, including youth activities, should also be actively encouraged;

(b) In integrating economic, social and environmental objectives, it is important that a broad package of policy instruments, including regulation, economic instruments, internalization of environmental costs in market prices, environmental and social impact analysis, and information dissemination, be worked out in the light of country-specific conditions to ensure that integrated approaches are effective and cost-efficient. To this end, a transparent and participatory process should be promoted. This will require the involvement of national legislative assemblies, as well as all actors of civil society, including youth and indigenous people and their communities, to complement the efforts of Governments for sustainable development. In particular, the empowerment and the full and equal participation of women in all spheres of society, including participation in the decision-making process, are central to all efforts to achieve such development;

(c) The implementation of policies aiming at sustainable development, including those contained in chapter 3 (Combating poverty) and in chapter 29 (Strengthening the role of workers and their trade unions) of Agenda 21, may enhance the opportunities for job creation, thus helping to achieve the fundamental goal of eradicating poverty.

An enabling international economic climate

25. A mutually supportive balance between the international and the national environment is needed in the pursuit of sustainable development. As a result of globalization, external factors have become critical in determining the success or failure of developing countries in their national efforts. The gap between developed and developing countries points to the continued need for a dynamic and enabling international economic environment supportive of international cooperation, particularly in the fields of finance, technology transfer, debt and trade, if the momentum for global progress towards sustainable development is to be maintained and increased.

26. To foster a dynamic and enabling international economic environment favourable to all countries is in the interest of all countries. Moreover, issues, including environmental issues, that bear on the international economic environment can be approached effectively only through a constructive dialogue and genuine partnership on the basis of mutuality of interests and benefits, taking into account that, in view of the different contributions to global environmental degradation, States have common but differentiated responsibilities.

Eradicating poverty

27. Given the severity of poverty, particularly in developing countries, the eradication of poverty is one of the fundamental goals of the international community and the entire United Nations system, as reflected in Commitment 2 of the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development, and is essential for sustainable development. Poverty eradication is thus an overriding theme of sustainable development for the coming years. The enormity and complexity of the poverty issue could very well endanger the social fabric, undermine economic development and the environment, and threaten political stability in many countries. To achieve poverty eradication, efforts of individual Governments and international cooperation and assistance should be brought together in a complementary way. Eradication of poverty depends on the full integration of people living in poverty into economic, social and political life. The empowerment of women is a critical factor for the eradication of poverty. Policies that promote such integration to combat poverty, in particular policies for providing basic social services and broader socio-economic development, are effective as well since enhancing the productive capacity of poor people increases both their well-being and that of their communities and societies, and facilitates their participation in resource conservation and environmental protection. The provision of basic social services and food security in an equitable way is a necessary condition for such integration and empowerment. The 20/20 initiative as referred to in the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development is, among other things, a useful means for such integration. However, the five years since the Rio Conference have witnessed an increase in the number of people living in absolute poverty, particularly in developing countries. In this context, there is an urgent need for the timely and full implementation of all the relevant commitments, agreements and targets already agreed upon since the Rio Conference by the international community, including the United Nations system and international financial institutions. Full implementation of the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development is essential. Priority actions include:

(a) Improving access to sustainable livelihoods, entrepreneurial opportunities and productive resources, including land, water, credit, technical and administrative training, and appropriate technology, with particular efforts to broaden the human and social capital basis of societies so as to reach the rural poor and the urban informal sector;

(b) Providing universal access to basic social services, including basic education, health care, nutrition, clean water and sanitation;

(c) Progressively developing, in accordance with the financial and administrative capacities of each society, social protection systems to support those who cannot support themselves, either temporarily or permanently; the aim of social integration is to create a "society for all";

(d) Empowering people living in poverty and their organizations by involving them fully in the formulation, implementation and evaluation of strategies and programmes for poverty eradication and community development and by ensuring that these programmes reflect their priorities;

(e) Addressing the disproportionate impact of poverty on women, in particular by removing legislative, policy, administrative and customary barriers to women's equal access to productive resources and services, including access to and control over land and other forms of property, credit, including micro-credit, inheritance, education, information, health care and technology. In this regard, full implementation of the Beijing Platform for Action is essential;

(f) Having interested donors and recipients work together to allocate increased shares of official development assistance to poverty eradication. The 20/20 initiative is an important principle in this respect, as it is based on a mutual commitment among donors and recipients to increasing resources allocated to basic social services;

(g) Intensifying international cooperation to support measures being taken in developing countries to eradicate poverty, to provide basic social protection and services and to approach poverty eradication efforts in an integral and multidimensional manner.

Changing consumption and production patterns

28. Unsustainable patterns of production and consumption, particularly in the industrialized countries, are identified in Agenda 21 as the major cause of continued deterioration of the global environment. While unsustainable patterns in the industrialized countries continue to aggravate the threats to the environment, there remain huge difficulties for developing countries in meeting basic needs such as food, health care, shelter and education for people. All countries should strive to promote sustainable consumption patterns; developed countries should take the lead in achieving sustainable consumption patterns; developing countries should seek to achieve sustainable consumption patterns in their development process, guaranteeing the provision of basic needs for the poor, while avoiding those unsustainable patterns, particularly in industrialized countries, generally recognized as unduly hazardous to the environment, inefficient and wasteful, in their development processes. This requires enhanced technological and other assistance from industrialized countries. In the follow-up of the implementation of Agenda 21, the review of progress made in achieving sustainable consumption patterns should be given high priority. Consistent with Agenda 21, the development and further elaboration of national policies and strategies, particularly in industrialized countries, are needed to encourage changes in unsustainable consumption and production patterns, while strengthening, as appropriate, international approaches and policies that promote sustainable consumption patterns on the basis of the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities, applying the polluter pays principle, and encouraging producer responsibility and greater consumer awareness. Eco-efficiency, cost internalization and product policies are also important tools for making consumption and production patterns more sustainable. Actions in this area should focus on:

(a) Promoting measures to internalize environmental costs and benefits in the price of goods and services, while seeking to avoid potential negative effects for market access by developing countries, particularly with a view to encouraging the use of environmentally preferable products and commodities. Governments should consider shifting the burden of taxation onto unsustainable patterns of production and consumption; it is of vital importance to achieve such an internalization of environmental costs. Such tax reforms should include a socially responsible process of reduction and elimination of subsidies to environmentally harmful activities;

(b) Promoting the role of business in shaping more sustainable patterns of consumption by encouraging, as appropriate, the voluntary publication of environmental and social assessments of its own activities, taking into account specific country conditions, and actions as an agent of change in the market, and actions in its role as a major consumer of goods and services;

(c) Developing core indicators to monitor critical trends in consumption and production patterns, with industrialized countries taking the lead;

(d) Identifying best practices through evaluations of policy measures with respect to their environmental effectiveness, efficiency and implications for social equity, and disseminating such evaluations;

(e) Taking into account the linkages between urbanization and the environmental and developmental effects of consumption and production patterns in cities, thus promoting more sustainable patterns of urbanization;

(f) Promoting international and national programmes for energy and material efficiency with time-tables for their implementation, as appropriate. In this regard, attention should be given to studies that propose to improve the efficiency of resource use, including consideration of a ten-fold improvement in resource productivity in industrialized countries in the long term and a possible factor-four increase in industrialized countries in the next two or three decades. Further research is required to study the feasibility of these goals and the practical measures needed for their implementation. Industrialized countries will have a special responsibility and must take the lead in this respect. The Commission on Sustainable Development should consider this initiative in the coming years in exploring policies and measures necessary to implement eco-efficiency and, for this purpose, encourage the relevant bodies to adopt measures aimed at assisting developing countries in improving energy and material efficiency through the promotion of their endogenous capacity-building and economic development with enhanced and effective international support;

(g) Encouraging Governments to take the lead in changing consumption patterns by improving their own environmental performance with action-oriented policies and goals on procurement, the management of public facilities and the further integration of environmental concerns into national policy-making. Governments in developed countries, in particular, should take the lead in this regard;

(h) Encouraging the media, advertising and marketing sectors to help to shape sustainable consumption patterns;

(i) Improving the quality of information regarding the environmental impact of products and services and, to that end, encouraging the voluntary and transparent use of eco-labelling;

(j) Promoting measures favouring eco-efficiency; however, developed countries should pay special attention to the needs of developing countries, in particular by encouraging positive impacts, and to the need to avoid negative impacts on export opportunities and on market access for developing countries and, as appropriate, for countries with economies in transition;

(k) Encouraging the development and strengthening of educational programmes to promote sustainable consumption and production patterns;

(l) Encouraging business and industry to develop and apply environmentally sound technology that should aim not only at increasing competitiveness but also at reducing negative environmental impacts;

(m) Giving balanced consideration to both the demand side and the supply side of the economy in matching environmental concerns and economic factors, which could encourage changes in the behaviour of consumers and producers. A number of policy options should be examined; they include regulatory instruments, economic and social incentives and disincentives, facilities and infrastructure, information, education, and technology development and dissemination.

Making trade and environment mutually supportive

29. In order to accelerate economic growth, poverty eradication and environmental protection, particularly in developing countries, there is a need to establish macroeconomic conditions in both developed and developing countries that favour the development of instruments and structures enabling all countries, in particular developing countries, to benefit from globalization. International cooperation and support for capacity-building in trade, environment and development should be strengthened through renewed system-wide efforts, and with greater responsiveness to sustainable development objectives, by the United Nations, the World Trade Organization and the Bretton Woods institutions, as well as by national Governments. There should be a balanced and integrated approach to trade and sustainable development, based on a combination of trade liberalization, economic development and environmental protection. Trade obstacles should be removed with a view to contributing to the achievement of more efficient use of the Earth's natural resources in both economic and environmental terms. Trade liberalization should be accompanied by environmental and resource management policies in order to realize its full potential contribution to improved environmental protection and the promotion of sustainable development through the more efficient allocation and use of resources. The multilateral trading system should have the capacity to further integrate environmental considerations and enhance its contribution to sustainable development, without undermining its open, equitable and non-discriminatory character. The special and differential treatment for developing countries, especially the least developed countries, and the other commitments of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations should be fully implemented in order to enable those countries to benefit from the international trading system, while conserving the environment. There is a need for continuing the elimination of discriminatory and protectionist practices in international trade relations, which will have the effect of improving access for the exports of developing countries. This will also facilitate the full integration of economies in transition into the world economy. In order to make trade, environment and development mutually supportive, measures need to be taken to ensure transparency in the use of trade measures related to the environment, and should address the root causes of environmental degradation so as not to result in disguised barriers to trade. Account should be taken of the fact that environmental standards valid for developed countries may have unwarranted social and economic costs in other countries, in particular developing countries. International cooperation is needed and unilateralism should be avoided. The following actions are required:

(a) There should be timely and full implementation of the results of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations and full use of the Comprehensive and Integrated World Trade Organization Plan of Action for the Least Developed Countries;

(b) An open, non-discriminatory, rule-based, equitable, secure, transparent and predictable multilateral trading system should be promoted. In this context, effective measures are called for to achieve the complete integration of developing countries and countries with economies in transition into the world economy and the new international trading system. In this connection, there is a need to promote the universality of the World Trade Organization and to facilitate the admission to membership in that organization, in a mutually beneficial way, of developing countries and countries with economies in transition applying for membership. Actions should be taken to maximize the opportunities and to minimize the difficulties of developing countries, including the net food-importing ones, especially the least developed countries, and of countries with economies in transition, in adjusting to the changes introduced by the Uruguay Round. Decisions on further liberalization of trade should take into account effects on sustainable development and should be consistent with an open, rule-based, non-discriminatory, equitable, secure and transparent multilateral trading system. The relationship between multilateral environmental agreements and the World Trade Organization rules should be clarified;

(c) Implementation of environmental measures should not result in disguised barriers to trade;

(d) Within the framework of Agenda 21, trade rules and environmental principles should interact harmoniously;

(e) Further analysis of the environmental effects of the international transport of goods is warranted;

(f) Cooperation and coordination between the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, the World Trade Organization, the United Nations Environment Programme and other relevant institutions should be strengthened on various issues, including (i) the role of positive measures in multilateral environmental agreements as part of a package of measures including, in certain cases, trade measures; (ii) the special conditions and needs of small and medium-sized enterprises in the trade and environment interface; and (iii) trade and environment issues at the regional and subregional levels, including within the context of regional economic and trade as well as environmental agreements;

(g) Cooperation and coordination between the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and other relevant bodies within their existing respective mandates should be enhanced, inter alia, on environment and sustainable development issues. Without prejudice to the clear understanding in the World Trade Organization that future negotiations, if any, regarding a multilateral agreement on investment will take place only after an explicit consensus decision, future agreements on investments should take into account the objectives of sustainable development and, when developing countries are parties to these agreements, special attention should be given to their needs for investment;

(h) National Governments should make every effort to ensure policy coordination on trade, environment and development at the national level in support of sustainable development;

(i) There is a need for the World Trade Organization, the United Nations Environment Programme and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to consider ways to make trade and environment mutually supportive, including through due respect for the objectives and principles of the multilateral trading system and for the provisions of multilateral environmental agreements. Such considerations should be consistent with an open, rule-based, non-discriminatory, equitable, secure and transparent multilateral trading system.

Population

30. The impact of the relationship among economic growth, poverty, employment, environment and sustainable development has become a major concern. There is a need to recognize the critical linkages between demographic trends and factors and sustainable development. The current decline in population growth rates must be further promoted through national and international policies that promote economic development, social development, environmental protection, and poverty eradication, particularly the further expansion of basic education, with full and equal access for girls and women, and health care, including reproductive health care, covering both family planning and sexual health, consistent with the report of the International Conference on Population and Development.

Health

31. The goals of sustainable development cannot be achieved when a high proportion of the population is afflicted with debilitating illnesses. An overriding goal for the future is to implement the Health for All strategy and to enable all people, particularly the world's poor, to achieve a higher level of health and well-being, and to improve their economic productivity and social potential. Protecting children from environmental health threats and infectious disease is particularly urgent since children are more susceptible than adults to those threats. Top priority should be attached to supporting the efforts of countries, particularly developing countries, and international organizations to eradicate the major infectious diseases, especially malaria, which is on the increase, to improve and expand basic health and sanitation services and to provide safe drinking water. It is also important to reduce indigenous cases of vaccine-preventable diseases through the promotion of widespread immunization programmes, promote accelerated research and vaccine development and reduce the transmission of other major infectious diseases, such as dengue fever, tuberculosis and human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS). Given the severe and irreversible health effects of lead poisoning, particularly on children, it is important to accelerate the process of eliminating unsafe uses of lead, including the use of lead in gasoline worldwide, in light of country-specific conditions and with enhanced international support and assistance to developing countries, particularly through the timely provision of technical and financial assistance and the promotion of endogenous capacity-building. Strategies at the regional, national and local levels for reducing the potential risk due to ambient and indoor air pollution should be developed, bearing in mind their serious impacts on human health, including strategies to make parents, families and communities aware of the adverse environmental health impacts of tobacco. The clear linkage between health and the environment needs to be emphasized and the lack of information on the impact of environmental pollution on health should be addressed. Health issues should be fully integrated into national and subnational sustainable development plans and should be incorporated into project and programme development as a component of environmental impact assessments. Important to efforts at national levels is international cooperation in disease prevention, early warning, surveillance, reporting, training and research and treatment.

32. Sustainable human settlements development is essential to sustainable development. The need to intensify efforts and cooperation to improve living conditions in the cities, towns, villages and rural areas throughout the world is recognized. Approximately half the world's population already lives in urban settlements, and by early in the next century the majority—more than 5 billion people—will be urban residents. Urban problems are concerns common to both developed and developing countries, although urbanization is occurring most rapidly in developing countries. Urbanization creates both challenges and opportunities. Global urbanization is a cross-sectoral phenomenon that has an impact on all aspects of sustainable development. Urgent action is needed to implement fully the commitments made at the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) consistent with its report, and in Agenda 21. New and additional financial resources from various sources are necessary to achieve the goals of adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development in an urbanizing world. Transfer of expertise and technology, capacity-building, decentralization of authority through, inter alia, strengthening of local capacity and private-public partnerships to improve the provision and environmentally sound management of infrastructure and social services should be accelerated to achieve more sustainable human settlements development. Local Agenda 21 programmes should also be actively encouraged. Global targets could be established by the Commission on Sustainable Development to promote local Agenda 21 campaigns and to deal with obstacles to local Agenda 21 initiatives.

B. Sectors and issues

33. The present section identifies a number of specific areas that are of widespread concern since failure to reverse current trends in these areas, notably in resource degradation, will have potentially disastrous effects on social and economic development, on human health and on environmental protection for all countries, particularly developing countries. All sectors covered by Agenda 21 are equally important and thus deserve attention by the international community on an equal footing. The need for integration is important in all sectors, including the areas of energy and transport because of the adverse effects that developments in those areas can have on human health and ecosystems; the areas of agriculture and water use, where inadequate land-use planning, poor water management and inappropriate technology can result in the degradation of natural resources and human impoverishment and where drought and desertification can result in land degradation and soil loss; and the area of management of marine resources, where competitive overexploitation can damage the resource base, food supplies and the livelihood of fishing communities, as well as the environment. The recommendations made in each of the sectors take into account the need for international co-operation in support of national efforts, within the context of the principles of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, including the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities. It is likewise understood that these recommendations do not in any way prejudice the work accomplished under legally binding conventions, where they exist, concerning these sectors.

34. Water resources are essential for satisfying basic human needs, health and food production, and the preservation of ecosystems, as well as for economic and social development in general. It is a matter of urgent concern that more than one fifth of all people still do not have access to safe drinking water and more than one half of humanity lacks adequate sanitation. From the perspective of developing countries, fresh water is a priority and a basic need, especially taking into account that in many developing countries fresh water is not readily available for all segments of the population, inter alia, owing to lack of adequate infrastructure and capacity, water scarcity and technical and financial constraints. Moreover, fresh water is also crucial for developing countries in order to satisfy the basic needs of their population in the areas of agricultural irrigation, industrial development, hydroelectric generation, and so forth. In view of the growing demands on water, which is a finite resource, it will become a major limiting factor in socio-economic development unless early action is taken. There is growing concern regarding the increasing stress on water supplies caused by unsustainable use patterns, affecting both water quality and quantity, and the widespread lack of access to safe water supply and suitable sanitation in many developing countries. Because the commitments of the International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade of the 1980s have not been fully met, there is still a need to ensure the optimal use and protection of all fresh-water resources, so that the needs of everyone on this planet, including access to safe drinking water and sanitation, can be met. This calls for the highest priority to be given to the serious fresh-water problems facing many regions, especially in the developing world. There is an urgent need:

(a) To assign high priority, in accordance with specific national needs and conditions, to the formulation and implementation of policies and programmes for integrated watershed management, including issues related to pollution and waste, the interrelationship between water and land, including mountains, forests, upstream and downstream users, estuarine environments, biodiversity and the preservation of aquatic ecosystems, wetlands, climate and land degradation and desertification, recognizing that subnational, national and regional approaches to fresh-water protection and consumption following a watershed basin or river basin approach offer a useful model for the protection of fresh-water supplies;

(b) To strengthen regional and international co-operation for technological transfer and the financing of integrated water resources programmes and projects, in particular those designed to increase access to safe water supply and sanitation;

(c) To ensure the continued participation of local communities, and women in particular, in the management of water resources development and use;

(d) To provide an enabling national and international environment that encourages investments from public and private sources to improve water supply and sanitation services, especially in fast growing urban and peri-urban areas, as well as in poor rural communities in developing countries; and for the international community to adopt and implement commitments to support the efforts to assist developing countries in achieving access to safe drinking water and sanitation for all;

(e) To recognize water as a social and economic good with a vital role in the satisfaction of basic human needs, food security, poverty alleviation and the protection of ecosystems. Economic valuation of water should be seen within the context of its social and economic implications, reflecting the importance of meeting basic needs. Consideration should be given to the gradual implementation of pricing policies that are geared towards cost recovery and the equitable and efficient allocation of water, including the promotion of water conservation, in developed countries; such policies could also be considered in developing countries when they reach an appropriate stage in their development, so as to promote the harmonious management and development of scarce water resources and generate financial resources for investment in new water supply and treatment facilities. Such strategies should also include programmes assigned to minimize wasteful consumption of water;

(f) To strengthen the capability of Governments and international institutions to collect and manage information, including scientific, social and environmental data, in order to facilitate the integrated assessment and management of water resources, and foster regional and international cooperation for information dissemination and exchange through cooperative approaches among United Nations institutions, including the United Nations Environment Programme, and centres for environmental excellence. In this regard, technical assistance to developing countries will continue to be important;

(g) For the international community to give support to the efforts of developing countries, with their limited resources, to shift to higher-value, less water-intensive modes of agricultural and industrial production and to develop the educational and informational infrastructure necessary to improve the skills of the labour force required for the economic transformation that needs to take place if use of fresh-water resources is to be sustainable. International support for the integrated development of water resources in developing countries, and appropriate innovative initiatives and approaches at the bilateral and regional levels are also required;

(h) To encourage watercourse States to develop international watercourses with a view to attaining sustainable utilization and appropriate protection thereof and benefits therefrom, taking into account the interests of the watercourse States concerned.

35. Considering the urgent need for action in the field of fresh water, and building on existing principles and instruments, arrangements, programmes of action and customary uses of water, Governments call for a dialogue under the aegis of the Commission on Sustainable Development, beginning at its sixth session, aimed at building a consensus on the necessary actions, and in particular, on the means of implementation and on tangible results, in order to consider initiating a strategic approach for the implementation of all aspects of the sustainable use of fresh water for social and economic purposes, including safe drinking water and sanitation, water for irrigation, recycling and waste-water management, and the important role fresh water plays in natural ecosystems. This intergovernmental process will be fully fruitful only if there is a proved commitment by the international community to the provision of new and additional financial resources for the goals of this initiative.

36. Progress has been achieved since the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development in the negotiation of agreements and voluntary instruments for improving the conservation and management of fishery resources and for the protection of the marine environment. Furthermore, progress has been made in the conservation and management of specific fishery stocks for the purpose of securing the sustainable utilization of these resources. Despite this, the decline of many fish stocks, high levels of discards and rising marine pollution continue. Governments should take full advantage of the challenge and opportunity presented by the International Year of the Ocean in 1998. There is a need to continue to improve decision-making at the national, regional and global levels. To address the need for improving global decision-making on the marine environment, there is an urgent need for Governments to implement decision 4/15 of the Commission on Sustainable Development, in which the Commission, inter alia, called for a periodic intergovernmental review by the Commission of all aspects of the marine environment and its related issues, as described in chapter 17 of Agenda 21, and for which the overall legal framework was provided by the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. There is a need for concerted action by all countries and for improved cooperation to assist developing countries in implementing the relevant agreements and instruments in order that they may participate effectively in the sustainable use, conservation and management of their fishery resources, as provided for in the Convention and other international legal instruments, and achieve integrated coastal zone management. In that context, there is an urgent need for:

(a) All Governments to ratify or to accede to the relevant agreements as soon as possible and to implement effectively such agreements as well as relevant voluntary instruments;

(b) All Governments to implement General Assembly resolution 51/189 of 16 December 1996, including the strengthening of institutional links to be established between the relevant intergovernmental mechanisms involved in the development and implementation of integrated coastal zone management. Following progress on the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, and bearing in mind Principle 13 of the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, there is a need to strengthen the implementation of existing international and regional agreements on marine pollution, with a view in particular to ensuring better contingency planning, response, and liability and compensation mechanisms;

(c) Better identification of priorities for action at the global level to promote the conservation and sustainable use of the marine environment, as well as better means for integrating such action;

(d) Further international cooperation to support the strengthening, where needed, of regional and sub-regional agreements for the protection and sustainable use of the oceans and seas;

(e) Governments to prevent or eliminate overfishing and excess fishing capacity through the adoption of management measures and mechanisms to ensure the sustainable management and utilization of fishery resources and to undertake programmes of work to achieve the reduction and elimination of wasteful fishing practices, wherever they may occur, especially in relation to large-scale industrialized fishing. The emphasis given by the Commission on Sustainable Development at its fourth session to the importance of effective conservation and management of fish stocks, and in particular to eliminating overfishing, in order to identify specific steps at national or regional levels to prevent or eliminate excess fishing capacity, will need to be carried forward in all appropriate international forums including, in particular, the Committee on Fisheries of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations;

(f) Governments to consider the positive and negative impact of subsidies on the conservation and management of fisheries through national, regional and appropriate international organizations and, based on these analyses, to consider appropriate action;

(g) Governments to take actions, individually and through their participation in competent global and regional forums, to improve the quality and quantity of scientific data as a basis for effective decisions related to the protection of the marine environment and the conservation and management of marine living resources; in this regard, greater international cooperation is required to assist developing countries, in particular small island developing States, to operationalize data networks and clearing houses for information-sharing on oceans. In this context, particular emphasis must be placed on the collection of biological and other fisheries-related information and the resources for its collation, analysis and dissemination.

Forests

37. The management, conservation and sustainable development of all types of forests are a crucial factor in economic and social development, in environmental protection and in the planet's life-support system. Forests are one of the major reservoirs of biological diversity; they act as carbon sinks and reservoirs; and they are a significant source of renewable energy, particularly in the least developed countries. Forests are an integral part of sustainable development and are essential to many indigenous people and other forest-dependent people practising traditional lifestyles, forest owners and local communities, many of whom possess important traditional forest-related knowledge.

38. Since the adoption of the Forest Principles at the Rio Conference, tangible progress has been made in sustainable forest management at the national, sub-regional, regional and international levels and in the promotion of international cooperation on forests. The proposals for action contained in the report of the Ad Hoc Intergovernmental Panel on Forests on its fourth session, which were endorsed by the Commission on Sustainable Development at its fifth session, represent significant progress and consensus on a wide range of forest issues.

39. To maintain the momentum generated by the Intergovernmental Panel process and to facilitate and encourage the holistic, integrated and balanced intergovernmental policy dialogue on all types of forests in the future, which continues to be an open, transparent and participatory process, requires a long-term political commitment to sustainable forest management worldwide. Against this background, there is an urgent need for:

(a) Countries and international organizations and institutions to implement the proposals for action agreed by the Intergovernmental Panel, in an expeditious and effective manner, and in collaboration and through effective partnership with all interested parties, including major groups, in particular indigenous people and local communities;

(b) Countries to develop national forest programmes in accordance with their respective national conditions, objectives and priorities;

(c) Enhanced international cooperation to implement the Intergovernmental Panel's proposals for action directed towards the management, conservation and sustainable development of all types of forests, including provision for financial resources, capacity-building, research and the transfer of technology;

(d) Further clarification of all issues arising from the programme elements of the Intergovernmental Panel process;

(e) International institutions and organizations to continue their work and to undertake further coordination and explore means for collaboration in the informal, high-level Inter-agency Task Force on Forests, focusing on the implementation of the Intergovernmental Panel's proposals for action, in accordance with their respective mandates and comparative advantage;

(f) Countries to provide consistent guidance to the governing bodies of relevant international institutions and instruments with respect to taking efficient and effective measures, as well as to coordinating their forest-related work at all levels, in respect of incorporating the Intergovernmental Panel's proposals for action into their work programmes and under existing agreements and arrangements.

40. To help to achieve this, it is decided to continue the intergovernmental policy dialogue on forests through the establishment of an ad hoc open-ended Intergovernmental Forum on Forests under the aegis of the Commission on Sustainable Development to work in an open, transparent and participatory manner, with a focused and time-limited mandate, and charged with, inter alia:

(a) Promoting and facilitating the implementation of the Intergovernmental Panel's proposals for action;

(b) Reviewing, monitoring and reporting on progress in the management, conservation and sustainable development of all types of forests;

(c) Considering matters left pending as regards the programme elements of the Intergovernmental Panel, in particular trade and environment in relation to forest products and services, transfer of technology and the need for financial resources.

The Forum should also identify the possible elements of and work towards consensus on international arrangements and mechanisms, for example, a legally binding instrument. The Forum will report on its work to the Commission on Sustainable Development in 1999. Based on that report, and depending on the decision of the Commission at its eighth session, the Forum will engage in further action on establishing an intergovernmental negotiation process on new arrangements and mechanisms or a legally binding instrument on all types of forests.

41. The Forum should convene as soon as possible to further elaborate its terms of reference and decide on organizational matters. It should be serviced by a small secretariat within the Department for Policy Coordination and Sustainable Development of the United Nations Secretariat supported by voluntary extrabudgetary contributions from Governments and international organizations.

Energy

42. Energy is essential to economic and social development and improved quality of life. However, sustainable patterns of production, distribution and use of energy are crucial. Fossil fuels (coal, oil and natural gas) will continue to dominate the energy supply situation for many years to come in most developed and developing countries. What is required then is to reduce the environmental impact of their continued development and to reduce local health hazards and environmental pollution through enhanced international cooperation, notably in the provision of concessional finance for capacity development and transfer of the relevant technology and through appropriate national action.

43. In developing countries, sharp increases in energy services are required to improve the standard of living of their growing populations. The increase in the level of energy services would have a beneficial impact on poverty eradication by increasing employment opportunities and improving transportation, health and education. Many developing countries, in particular the least developed, face the urgent need to provide adequate modern energy services, especially to billions of people in rural areas. This requires significant financial, human and technical resources and a broad-based mix of energy sources.

44. The objectives envisaged in this section should reflect the need for equity, adequate energy supplies and increasing energy consumption in developing countries and should take into account the situation of countries that are highly dependent on income generated from the production, processing and export, and/or consumption, of fossil fuels and that have serious difficulties in switching to alternative sources of energy, and the situation of countries highly vulnerable to the adverse effects of climate change.

45. Advances towards sustainable energy use are taking place and all parties can benefit from progress made in other countries. It is also necessary to ensure international cooperation for promoting energy conservation and improvement of energy efficiency, the use of renewable energy and research, and the development and dissemination of innovative energy-related technology.

46. Therefore there is a need for:

(a) A movement towards sustainable patterns of production, distribution and use of energy. To advance this work at the intergovernmental level, the Commission on Sustainable Development will discuss energy issues at its ninth session. Noting the vital role of energy in the continuation of sustained economic growth, especially for developing countries, be they importers or suppliers of energy, and recognizing the complexities and interdependencies inherent in addressing energy issues within the context of sustainable development, preparations for this session should be initiated at the seventh session and should utilize an open-ended intergovernmental group of experts on energy and sustainable development to be held in conjunction with inter-sessional meetings of the eighth and ninth sessions of the Commission. In line with the objectives of Agenda 21, the ninth session of the Commission should contribute to a sustainable energy future for all;

(b) Evolving concrete measures to strengthen international cooperation in order to assist developing countries in their domestic efforts to provide adequate modern energy services, especially electricity, to all sections of their population, particularly in rural areas, in an environmentally sound manner;

(c) Countries to promote policies and plans, bearing in mind the specific needs and priorities of developing countries, that take into account the economic, social and environmental aspects of the production, distribution and use of energy, including the use of lower-pollutant sources of energy such as natural gas;

(d) Evolving commitments for the transfer of relevant technology, including time-bound commitments, as appropriate, to developing countries and economies in transition so as to enable them to increase the use of renewable energy sources and cleaner fossil fuels and to improve efficiency in energy production, distribution and use. Countries need to systematically increase the use of renewable energy sources according to their specific social, economic, natural, geographical and climatic conditions and cleaner fuel technologies, including fossil fuel technologies, and to improve efficiency in energy production, distribution and use and in other industrial production processes that are intensive users of energy;

(e) Promoting efforts in research on and development and use of renewable energy technologies at the international and national levels;

(f) In the context of fossil fuels, encouraging further research, development, and the application and transfer of technology of a cleaner and more efficient nature, through effective international support;

(g) Encouraging Governments and the private sector to consider appropriate ways to gradually promote environmental cost internalization so as to achieve more sustainable use of energy, taking fully into account the economic, social and environmental conditions of all countries, in particular developing countries. In this regard, the international community should cooperate to minimize the possible adverse impacts on the development process of developing countries resulting from the implementation of those policies and measures. There is also a need to encourage the reduction and the gradual elimination of subsidies for energy production and consumption that inhibit sustainable development. Such policies should take fully into account the specific needs and conditions of developing countries, particularly least developed countries, as reflected in the special and differential treatment accorded them in the Agreement on Subsidies and Countervailing Measures of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations;

(h) Encouraging better coordination on the issue of energy within the United Nations system, under the guidance of the General Assembly and taking into account the coordinating role of the Economic and Social Council.

Transport

47. The transport sector and mobility in general have an essential and positive role to play in economic and social development, and transportation needs will undoubtedly increase. Over the next twenty years, transportation is expected to be the major driving force behind a growing world demand for energy. The transport sector is the largest end-user of energy in developed countries and the fastest growing one in most developing countries. Current patterns of transportation with their dominant patterns of energy use are not sustainable and on the basis of present trends may compound the environmental problems the world is facing and the health impacts referred to in paragraph 31 above. There is a need for:

(a) The promotion of integrated transport policies that consider alternative approaches to meeting commercial and private mobility needs and improve performance in the transport sector at the national, regional and global levels, and particularly a need to encourage international cooperation in the transfer of environmentally sound technologies in the transport sector and implementation of appropriate training programmes in accordance with national programmes and priorities;

(b) The integration of land-use and urban, peri-urban and rural transport planning, taking into account the need to protect ecosystems;

(c) The adoption and promotion, as appropriate, of measures to mitigate the negative impact of transportation on the environment, including measures to improve efficiency in the transportation sector;

(d) The use of a broad spectrum of policy instruments to improve energy efficiency and efficiency standards in transportation and related sectors;

(e) The continuation of studies in the appropriate forums, including the International Civil Aviation Organization, on the use of economic instruments for the mitigation of the negative environmental impact of aviation in the context of sustainable development;

(f) Accelerating the phasing-out of the use of leaded gasoline as soon as possible, in pursuit of the objectives of reducing the severe health impacts of human exposure to lead. In this regard, technological and economic assistance should continue to be provided to developing countries in order to enable them to make such a transition;

(g) The promotion of voluntary guidelines for environmentally friendly transport, and actions for reducing vehicle emissions of carbon dioxide, carbon monoxide, nitrogen oxides, particulate matter and volatile organic compounds, as soon as possible;

(h) Partnerships at the national level, involving Governments, local authorities, non-governmental organizations and the private sector, for strengthening transport infrastructures and developing innovative mass transport schemes.

Atmosphere

48. Ensuring that the global climate and atmosphere are not further damaged, with irreversible consequences for future generations, requires political will and concerted efforts by the international community in accordance with the principles enshrined in the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change. Under the Convention, some first steps have been taken to deal with the global problem of climate change. Despite the adoption of the Convention, the emission and concentration of greenhouse gases continue to rise, even as scientific evidence assembled by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change and other relevant bodies continues to diminish the uncertainties and points ever more strongly to the severe risk of global climate change. So far, insufficient progress has been made by many developed countries in meeting their aim to return greenhouse gas emissions to 1990 levels by the year 2000. It is recognized as one critical element of the Berlin Mandate that the commitments set out under article 4, paragraph 2 (a) and (b), of the Convention are inadequate and that there is therefore a need to strengthen them. It is most important that the Conference of the Parties to the Convention, at its third session, to be held at Kyoto, Japan, in December 1997, adopt a protocol or other legal instrument that fully encompasses the Berlin Mandate. The Geneva Ministerial Declaration, which was noted without formal adoption, but which received majority support among ministers and other heads of delegation attending the second session of the Conference of the Parties, also called for, inter alia, the acceleration of negotiations on the text of a legally binding protocol or other legal instrument.

49. At the present nineteenth special session of the General Assembly, the international community has confirmed its recognition of the problem of climate change as one of the biggest challenges facing the world in the next century. The leaders of many countries have stressed the seriousness of this problem in their statements to the Assembly, and have outlined the actions they had in hand to respond to the challenge, both in their own countries and internationally.

50. The ultimate goal that all countries share is to achieve stabilization of greenhouse gas concentrations in the atmosphere at a level that would prevent dangerous anthropogenic interference with the climate system. This requires efficient and cost-effective policies and measures that will be sufficient to result in a significant reduction in emissions. At the present session, countries reviewed the status of the preparations for the third session of the Conference of the Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change. All agreed that a satisfactory result was vital.

51. The position of many countries with respect to these negotiations is still evolving, and it was agreed that it would not be appropriate to seek to predetermine the results; however, useful discussions on evolving positions took place.

52. There is already widespread, but not universal, agreement that it will be necessary to consider legally binding, meaningful, realistic and equitable targets for countries listed in annex I to the Convention that will result in significant reductions in greenhouse gas emissions within specified time frames, such as 2005, 2010 and 2020. In addition to establishing targets, there is also widespread agreement that it will be necessary to consider ways and means of achieving them and to take into account the economic, adverse environmental and other effects of such response measures on all countries, particularly developing countries.

53. International cooperation in the implementation of chapter 9 of Agenda 21, in particular in the transfer of technology to and capacity-building in developing countries, is also essential to promote the effective implementation of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change.

54. There is also a need to strengthen systematic observational networks so as to identify the possible onset and distribution of climate change and assess potential impacts, particularly at the regional level.

55. The ozone layer continues to be severely depleted and the Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer needs to be strengthened. The Copenhagen Amendment to the Protocol needs to be ratified. The recent successful conclusion of the replenishment negotiations with respect to the Montreal Protocol Multilateral Fund is welcomed. This has made available funds for, among other things, earlier phase-out of ozone-depleting substances, including methyl bromide, in developing countries. Future replenishment should also be adequate to ensure timely implementation of the Montreal Protocol. An increased focus on capacity-building programmes in developing countries within multilateral funds is also needed, as well as the implementation of effective measures against illegal trade in ozone-depleting substances.

56. Rising levels of transboundary air pollution should be countered, including through appropriate regional cooperation to reduce pollution levels.

Toxic chemicals

57. The sound management of chemicals is essential to sustainable development and is fundamental to human health and environmental protection. All those responsible for chemicals throughout their life cycle bear the responsibility for achieving this goal. Substantial progress on the sound management of chemicals has been made since the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, in particular through the establishment of the Intergovernmental Forum on Chemical Safety and the Inter-organizational Programme for the Sound Management of Chemicals. In addition, domestic regulations have been complemented by the Code of Ethics on the International Trade in Chemicals and by voluntary industry initiatives, such as Responsible Care. Despite substantial progress, a number of chemicals continue to pose significant threats to local, regional and global ecosystems and to human health. Since the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, there has been an increased understanding of the serious damage that certain toxic chemicals can cause to human health and the environment. Much remains to be done and the environmentally sound management of chemicals should continue to be an important issue well beyond 2000. Particular attention should also be given to cooperation in the development and transfer of technology of safe substitutes and in the development of capacity for the production of such substitutes. The decision concerning the sound management of chemicals adopted by the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme at its nineteenth session should be implemented in accordance with the agreed timetables for negotiations on the conventions relating to prior informed consent and persistent organic pollutants. It is noted that inorganic chemicals possess roles and behaviour that are distinct from organic chemicals.

Hazardous wastes

58. Substantial progress has been made in the implementation of the Basel Convention, the Bamako Convention, the Fourth Lome Convention and other regional conventions, although more remains to be done. Important initiatives aimed at promoting the environmentally sound management of hazardous wastes under the Basel Convention, include (a) activities undertaken to prevent illegal traffic in hazardous wastes; (b) the establishment of regional centres for training and technology transfer regarding hazardous waste minimization and management; and (c) the treatment and disposal of hazardous wastes as close as possible to their source of origin. These initiatives should be further developed. It is also important and urgent that work under the Basel Convention be completed to define which hazardous wastes are controlled under the Convention and to negotiate, adopt and implement a protocol on liability and compensation for damage resulting from the transboundary movement and disposal of hazardous wastes. Land contaminated by the disposal of hazardous wastes needs to be identified and remedial actions put in hand. Integrated management solutions are also required to minimize urban and industrial waste generation and to promote recycling and reuse.

Radioactive wastes

59. Radioactive wastes can have very serious environmental and human health impacts over long periods of time. It is therefore essential that they be managed in a safe and responsible way. The storage, transportation, transboundary movement and disposal of radioactive wastes should be guided by all the principles of the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development and by Agenda 21. States that generate radioactive wastes have a responsibility to ensure their safe storage and disposal. In general, radioactive wastes should be disposed of in the territory of the State in which they are generated as far as is compatible with the safety of the management of such material. Each country has the responsibility of ensuring that radioactive wastes that fall within its jurisdiction are managed properly in accordance with internationally accepted principles, taking fully into account any transboundary effects. The international community should make all efforts to prohibit the export of radioactive wastes to those countries that do not have appropriate waste treatment and storage facilities. The international community recognizes that regional arrangements or jointly used facilities might be appropriate for the disposal of such wastes in certain circumstances. The management of radioactive wastes should be undertaken in a manner consistent with international law, including the provisions of relevant international and regional conventions, and with internationally accepted standards. It is important to intensify safety measures with regard to radioactive wastes. States, in cooperation with relevant international organizations, where appropriate, should not promote or allow the storage or disposal of high-level, intermediate-level or low-level radioactive wastes near the marine environment unless they determine that scientific evidence, consistent with the applicable internationally agreed principles and guidelines, shows that such storage or disposal poses no unacceptable risk to people or the marine environment and does not interfere with other legitimate uses of the sea. In the process of the consideration of that evidence, appropriate application of the precautionary approach principle should be made. Further action is needed by the international community to address the need for enhancing awareness of the importance of the safe management of radioactive wastes, and to ensure the prevention of incidents and accidents involving the uncontrolled release of such wastes.

60. One of the main recommendations of Agenda 21 and of the Commission on Sustainable Development at its second session in this area was to support the ongoing efforts of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the International Maritime Organization and other relevant international organizations. The Joint Convention on the Safety of Spent Fuel Management and on the Safety of Radioactive Waste Management currently being negotiated under the auspices of the Agency is now close to completion. It will provide a comprehensive codification of international law and a guide to best practices in this area. It will rightly be based on all the principles of best practice for this subject that have evolved in the international community, including the principle that, in general, radioactive wastes should be disposed of in the State in which they were generated as far as is compatible with the safety of the management of such material. Governments should finalize this text and are urged to ratify and implement it as soon as possible so as to further improve practice and strengthen safety in this area. Transportation of irradiated nuclear fuel and high-level waste by sea should be guided by the INF Code, which should be considered for development into a mandatory instrument. The issue of the potential transboundary environmental effects of activities related to the management of radioactive wastes and the question of prior notification, relevant information and consultation with States that could potentially be affected by such effects, should be further addressed within the appropriate forums.

61. Increased global and regional cooperation, including exchange of information and experience and transfer of appropriate technologies, is needed to improve the management of radioactive wastes. There is a need to support the clean-up of sites contaminated as a result of all types of nuclear activity and to conduct health studies in the regions around those sites, as appropriate, with a view to identifying where health treatment may be needed and should be provided. Technical assistance should be provided to developing countries, recognizing the special needs of small island developing States in particular, to enable them to develop or improve procedures for the management and safe disposal of radioactive wastes deriving from the use of radionuclides in medicine, research and industry.

62. Land degradation and soil loss threaten the livelihood of millions of people and future food security, with implications for water resources and the conservation of biodiversity. There is an urgent need to define ways to combat or reverse the worldwide accelerating trend of soil degradation, using an ecosystem approach, taking into account the needs of populations living in mountain ecosystems and recognizing the multiple functions of agriculture. The greatest challenge for humanity is to protect and sustainably manage the natural resource base on which food and fibre production depend, while feeding and housing a population that is still growing. The international community has recognized the need for an integrated approach to the protection and sustainable management of land and soil resources, as stated in decision III/11 of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity, including identification of land degradation, which involves all interested parties at the local as well as the national level, including farmers, small-scale food producers, indigenous people(s), non-governmental organizations and, in particular, women, who have a vital role in rural communities. This should include action to ensure secure land tenure and access to land, credit and training, as well as the removal of obstacles that inhibit farmers, especially small-scale farmers and peasants, from investing in and improving their lands and farms.

63. It remains essential to continue efforts for the eradication of poverty through, inter alia, capacity-building to reinforce local food systems, improving food security and providing adequate nutrition for the more than 800 million undernourished people in the world, located mainly in developing countries. Governments should formulate policies that promote sustainable agriculture as well as productivity and profitability. Comprehensive rural policies are required to improve access to land, combat poverty, create employment and reduce rural emigration. In accordance with the commitments agreed to in the Rome Declaration on World Food Security and the World Food Summit Plan of Action, adopted by the World Food Summit, sustainable food security for both the urban and the rural poor should be a policy priority, and developed countries and the international community should provide assistance to developing countries to this end. To meet these objectives, Governments should attach high priority to implementing the commitments of the Rome Declaration and Plan of Action, especially the call for a minimum target of halving the number of undernourished people in the world by the year 2015. Governments and international organizations are encouraged to implement the Global Plan of Action for the Conservation and Sustainable Utilization of Plant Genetic Resources for Food and Agriculture, adopted by the International Technical Conference on Plant Genetic Resources held at Leipzig, Germany, from 17 to 23 June 1996. At the sixth session of the Commission on Sustainable Development, in 1998, the issues of sustainable agriculture and land use should be considered in relation to freshwater. The challenge for agricultural research is to increase yields on all farmlands while protecting and conserving the natural resource base. The international community and Governments must continue or increase investments in agricultural research because it can take years or decades to develop new lines of research and put research findings into sustainable practice on the land. Developing countries, particularly those with high population densities, will need international cooperation to gain access to the results of such research and to technology aimed at improving agricultural productivity in limited spaces. More generally, international cooperation continues to be needed to assist developing countries in many other aspects of basic requirements of agriculture. There is a need to support the continuation of the reform process in conformity with the Uruguay Round agreements, particularly article 20 of the Agreement on Agriculture, and to implement fully the World Trade Organization Decision on Measures Concerning the Possible Negative Effects of the Reform Programme on Least-Developed and Net Food-Importing Developing Countries.

Desertification and drought

64. Governments are urged to conclude, by signing and ratifying, accepting, approving and/or acceding to, and to implement as soon as possible the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa, which entered into force on 26 December 1996, and to support and actively participate in the first session of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention, which is to be held in Rome in September 1997.

65. The international community is urged to recognize the vital importance and necessity of international cooperation and partnership in combating desertification and mitigating the effects of drought. In order to increase the effectiveness and efficiency of existing financial mechanisms, the international community, in particular developed countries, should therefore support the global mechanism that would have the capacity to promote actions leading to the mobilization and channelling of substantial resources for advancing the implementation of the Convention and its regional annexes, and to contribute to the eradication of poverty, which is one of the principal consequences of desertification and drought in the majority of affected countries. Another view was that the international community, in particular developed countries, should provide new and additional resources towards the same ends. The transfer to developing countries of environmentally sound, economically viable and socially acceptable technologies relevant to combating desertification and/or mitigating the effects of drought, with a view to contributing to the achievement of sustainable development in affected areas, should be undertaken without delay on mutually agreed terms.

Biodiversity

66. There remains an urgent need for the conservation and sustainable use of biological diversity and the fair and equitable sharing of benefits arising from the utilization of components of genetic resources. The threat to biodiversity stems mainly from habitat destruction, over-harvesting, pollution and the inappropriate introduction of foreign plants and animals. There is an urgent need for Governments and the international community, with the support of relevant international institutions, as appropriate:

(a) To take decisive action to conserve and maintain genes, species and ecosystems with a view to promoting the sustainable management of biological diversity;

(b) To ratify the Convention on Biological Diversity and implement it fully and effectively together with the decisions of the Conference of the Parties, including recommendations on agricultural biological diversity and the Jakarta Mandate on Marine and Coastal Biological Diversity, and pursue urgently other tasks identified by the Conference of the Parties at its third meeting under the work programme on terrestrial biological diversity, within the context of the ecosystems approach adopted in the Convention;

(c) To undertake concrete actions for the fair and equitable sharing of the benefits arising from the utilization of genetic resources, consistent with the provisions of the Convention and the decisions of the Conference of the Parties on, inter alia, access to genetic resources and the handling of biotechnology and its benefits;

(d) To pay further attention to the provision of new and additional financial resources for the implementation of the Convention;

(e) To facilitate the transfer of technologies, including biotechnology, to developing countries, consistent with the provisions of the Convention;

(f) To respect, preserve and maintain knowledge, innovations and practices of indigenous and local communities embodying traditional lifestyles, and encourage the equitable sharing of the benefits arising from traditional knowledge so that those communities are adequately protected and rewarded, consistent with the provisions of the Convention on Biological Diversity and in accordance with the decisions of the Conference of the Parties;

(g) To complete rapidly the biosafety protocol under the Convention on Biological Diversity, on the understanding that the United Nations Environment Programme International Technical Guidelines for Safety in Biotechnology may be used as an interim mechanism during its development, and to complement it after its conclusion, including the recommendations on capacity-building related to biosafety;

(h) To stress the importance of the establishment of a clearing-house mechanism by Parties to the Convention, consistent with the provisions of the Convention;

(i) To recognize the role of women in the conservation of biological diversity and the sustainable use of biological resources;

(j) To provide the necessary support to integrate the conservation of biological diversity and the sustainable use of biological resources into national development plans;

(k) To promote international cooperation to develop and strengthen national capacity-building, including human resource development and institution-building;

(l) To provide incentive measures at the national, regional and international levels to promote the conservation and sustainable use of biological diversity, and to consider means to enhance developing countries' capabilities to compete in the emerging market for biological resources, while improving the functioning of that market.

Sustainable tourism

67. Tourism is now one of the world's largest industries and one of its fastest growing economic sectors. The expected growth in the tourism sector and the increasing reliance of many developing countries, including small island developing States, on this sector as a major employer and contributor to local, national, subregional and regional economies highlights the need to pay special attention to the relationship between environmental conservation and protection and sustainable tourism. In this regard, the efforts of developing countries to broaden the traditional concept of tourism to include cultural and eco-tourism merit special consideration as well as the assistance of the international community, including the international financial institutions.

68. There is a need to consider further the importance of tourism in the context of Agenda 21. Tourism, like other sectors, uses resources, generates wastes and creates environmental, cultural and social costs and benefits in the process. For sustainable patterns of consumption and production in the tourism sector, it is essential to strengthen national policy development and enhance capacity in the areas of physical planning, impact assessment, and the use of economic and regulatory instruments, as well as in the areas of information, education and marketing. A particular concern is the degradation of biodiversity and fragile ecosystems, such as coral reefs, mountains, coastal areas and wetlands.

69. Policy development and implementation should take place in cooperation with all interested parties, especially the private sector and local and indigenous communities. The Commission should develop an action-oriented international programme of work on sustainable tourism, to be defined in cooperation with the World Tourism Organization, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the United Nations Environment Programme, the Conference of the Parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity and other relevant bodies.

70. The sustainable development of tourism is of importance for all countries, in particular for small island developing States. International cooperation is needed to facilitate tourism development in developing countries—including the development and marketing of eco-tourism, bearing in mind the importance of the conservation policies required to secure long-term benefits from development in this sector—in particular in small island developing States, in the context of the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States.

71. The international community reaffirms its commitment to the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States. The Commission on Sustainable Development carried out a mid-term review of selected programme areas of the Programme of Action at its fourth session, in 1996. At its sixth session, in 1998, the Commission will undertake a review of all the outstanding chapters and issues of the Programme of Action. A full and comprehensive review of the Programme of Action, consistent with the review of other United Nations global conferences, is scheduled for 1999. The Commission, at its fifth session, adopted a resolution on modalities for the full and comprehensive review of the Programme of Action, in which it recommended that the General Assembly hold a two-day special session immediately preceding its fifty-fourth session for an in-depth assessment and appraisal of the implementation of the Programme of Action. The full implementation of the decision would represent a significant contribution to achieving the objectives of the Global Conference for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States.

72. Considerable efforts are being made at the national and regional levels to implement the Programme of Action. These efforts need to be supplemented by effective financial support from the international community. External assistance for building the requisite infrastructure and for national capacity-building, including human and institutional capacity, and for facilitating access to information on sustainable development practices and the transfer of environmentally sound technologies, in accordance with paragraph 34.14 (b) of Agenda 21, is crucial for small island developing States to effectively attain the goals of the Programme of Action. To assist national capacity-building, the small island developing States information network and small island developing States technical assistance programme should be made operational as soon as possible, with support for existing regional and subregional institutions.

73. Natural disasters have disproportionate consequences for developing countries, in particular small island developing States and countries with extremely fragile ecosystems. Programmes for sustainable development should give higher priority to the implementation of the commitments made at the World Conference on Natural Disaster Reduction held at Yokohama, Japan, from 23 to 27 May 1994. There is a particular need for capacity-building for disaster planning and management and for the promotion and facilitation of the transfer of early-warning technologies to countries prone to disasters, in particular developing countries and countries with economies in transition.

74. Given that further work is needed throughout the world, there is a special need to provide developing countries with further assistance in:

(a) Strengthening mechanisms and policies designed to reduce the effects of natural disasters, improve preparedness and integrate natural disaster considerations in development planning, through, inter alia, access to resources for disaster mitigation and preparedness, response and recovery;

(b) Improving access to relevant technology and training in hazard and risk assessment and early warning systems, and in protection from environmental disasters, consistent with national, subregional and regional strategies;

(c) Providing and facilitating technical, scientific and financial support for disaster preparedness and response in the context of the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction.

Major technological and other disasters with an adverse impact on the environment

75. Major technological and other disasters with an adverse impact on the environment can be a substantial obstacle in the way of achieving the goals of sustainable development in many countries. The international community should intensify cooperation in the prevention and reduction of such disasters and in disaster relief and post-disaster rehabilitation in order to enhance the capabilities of affected countries to cope with such situations.

C. Means of implementation

Financial resources and mechanisms

76. Financial resources and mechanisms play a key role in the implementation of Agenda 21. In general, the financing for the implementation of Agenda 21 will come from a country's own public and private sectors. For developing countries, official development assistance is a main source of external funding, and substantial new and additional funding for sustainable development and the implementation of Agenda 21 will be required. Hence, all financial commitments of Agenda 21, particularly those contained in chapter 33, and the provisions with regard to new and additional resources that are both adequate and predictable need to be urgently fulfilled. Renewed efforts are essential to ensure that all sources of funding contribute to economic growth, social development and environmental protection in the context of sustainable development and the implementation of Agenda 21.

77. For developing countries, particularly those in Africa and the least developed countries, official development assistance remains a main source of external funding; it is essential for the prompt and effective implementation of Agenda 21 and cannot generally be replaced by private capital flows. Developed countries should therefore fulfil the commitments undertaken to reach the accepted United Nations target of 0.7 per cent of gross national product as soon as possible. In this context the present downward trend in the ratio of official development assistance to gross national product causes concern. Intensified efforts should be made to reverse this trend, taking into account the need for improving the quality and effectiveness of official development assistance. In the spirit of global partnership, the underlying factors that have led to this decrease should be addressed by all countries. Strategies should be worked out for increasing donor support for aid programmes and revitalizing the commitments that donors made at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development. Some countries already meet or exceed the 0.7 per cent agreed target. Official financial flows to developing countries, particularly the least developed countries, remain an essential element of the partnership embodied in Agenda 21. Official development assistance plays a significant role, inter alia, in capacity-building, infrastructure, combating poverty and environmental protection in developing countries, and a crucial role in the least developed countries. Official development assistance can play an important complementary and catalytic role in promoting economic growth and may, in some cases, play a catalytic role in encouraging private investment and, where appropriate, all aspects of country-driven capacity-building and strengthening.

78. Funding by multilateral financial institutions through their concessional mechanisms is also essential to developing countries in their efforts to implement fully the sustainable development objectives contained in Agenda 21. Such institutions should continue to respond to the development needs and priorities of developing countries. Developed countries should urgently meet their commitments under the eleventh replenishment of the International Development Association.

79. Continued and full donor commitment to adequate, sustained and predictable funding for Global Environment Facility operations is important for developing countries so that global environmental benefits can be further achieved. Donor countries are urged to engage in providing new and additional resources, with a view to equitable burden-sharing, through the satisfactory replenishment of the Facility, which makes available grant and concessional funding designed to achieve global environmental benefits, thereby promoting sustainable development. Consideration should be given to exploring further the flexibility of the existing mandate of the Facility in supporting activities to achieve global environmental benefits. With regard to the project cycle, further efforts should be made to continue streamlining the decision-making process in order to maintain an effective and efficient, as well as transparent, participatory and democratic framework. The Global Environment Facility, when acting as the operating entity of the financial mechanism of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change and the Convention on Biological Diversity, should continue to operate in conformity with those Conventions and promote their implementation. The Facility implementing agencies, the United Nations Development Programme, the United Nations Environment Programme and the World Bank, should strengthen, as appropriate and in accordance with their respective mandates, their cooperation at all levels, including the field level.

80. The efficiency, effectiveness and impact of the operational activities of the United Nations system must be enhanced by, inter alia, a substantial increase in their funding on a predictable, continuous and assured basis, commensurate with the increasing needs of developing countries, as well as through the full implementation of General Assembly resolutions 47/199 of 22 December 1992 and 48/162 of 20 December 1993. There is a need for a substantial increase in resources for operational activities for development on a predictable, continuous and assured basis, commensurate with the increasing needs of developing countries.

81. Private capital is a major tool for achieving economic growth in a growing number of developing countries. Higher levels of foreign private investment should be mobilized, given its mounting importance. To stimulate higher levels of private investment, Governments should aim at ensuring macroeconomic stability, open trade and investment policies, and well-functioning legal and financial systems. Further studies should be undertaken, including studies on the design of an appropriate environment, at both the national and the international levels, for facilitating foreign private investment, in particular foreign direct investment flows to developing countries, and enhancing its contribution to sustainable development. To ensure that such investments are supportive of sustainable development objectives, it is essential that the national Governments of both investor and recipient countries provide appropriate regulatory frameworks and incentives for private investment. Therefore further work should be undertaken on the design of appropriate policies and measures aimed at promoting long-term investment flows to developing countries for activities that increase their productive capability, and at reducing the volatility of these flows. Official development assistance donors and multilateral development banks are encouraged to strengthen their commitment to supporting investment in developing countries in a manner that jointly promotes economic growth, social development and environmental protection.

82. The external debt problem continues to hamper the efforts of developing countries to achieve sustainable development. To resolve the remaining debt problems of the heavily indebted poor countries, creditor and debtor countries and international financial institutions should continue their efforts to find effective, equitable, development-oriented and durable solutions to the debt problem, including debt relief in the form of debt rescheduling, debt reduction, debt swaps and, as appropriate, debt cancellation, as well as grants and concessional flows that will help to restore creditworthiness. The joint World Bank/International Monetary Fund Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Debt Initiative supported by the Paris Club creditor countries is an important development to reduce the multilateral debt problem. Implementation of the Initiative requires additional financial resources from both bilateral and multilateral creditors without affecting the support required for the development activities of developing countries.

83. A fuller understanding of the impact of indebtedness on the pursuit of sustainable development by developing countries is needed. To this end, the United Nations Secretariat, the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund are invited to collaborate with the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development in further considering the interrelationship between indebtedness and sustainable development for developing countries.

84. While international cooperation is very important in assisting developing countries in their development efforts, in general financing for the implementation of Agenda 21 will come from countries' own public and private sectors. Policies for promoting domestic resource mobilization, including credit, could encompass sound macroeconomic reforms, including fiscal and monetary policy reforms, review and reform of existing subsidies, and the promotion of personal savings and access to credit, especially micro-credit, in particular for women. Such policies should be decided by each country, taking into account its own characteristics and capabilities and different levels of development, especially as reflected in national sustainable development strategies, where they exist.

85. There is a need for making existing subsidies more transparent in order to increase public awareness of their actual economic, social and environmental impact, and for reforming or, where appropriate, removing them. Further national and international research in that area should be promoted in order to assist Governments in identifying and considering phasing-out subsidies that have market-distorting, and socially and environmentally damaging impacts. Subsidy reductions should take full account of the specific conditions and the different levels of development of individual countries and should consider potentially regressive impacts, particularly on developing countries. In addition, it would be desirable to use international cooperation and coordination to promote the reduction of subsidies where these have important implications for competitiveness.

86. In order to reduce the barriers to the expanded use of economic instruments, Governments and international organizations should collect and share information on their use and introduce pilot schemes that would, inter alia, demonstrate how to make the best use of them while avoiding adverse effects on competitiveness and the terms of trade of all countries, particularly developing countries, and on marginalized and vulnerable sectors of society. When introducing economic instruments that raise the cost of economic activities for households and small and medium-sized enterprises, Governments should consider gradual phase-ins, public education programmes and targeted technical assistance as strategies for reducing distributional impacts. Various studies and practical experience in a number of countries, in particular developed countries, indicate that the appropriate use of relevant economic instruments may help to generate positive possibilities for shifting consumer and producer behaviour to more sustainable directions in those countries. There is, however, a need to conduct further studies and test practical experience in more countries, taking into account country-specific conditions and the acceptability, legitimacy, equity, efficiency and effectiveness of such economic instruments.

87. Innovative financial mechanisms are currently under discussion in international and national forums but have not yet fully evolved conceptually. The Secretary-General is to submit a report concerning innovative financing mechanisms to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1997. In view of the widespread interest in those mechanisms, appropriate organizations, including the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, are invited to consider conducting forward-looking studies of concerted action on such mechanisms and to share them with the Commission on Sustainable Development, other relevant intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations. In this regard, innovative funding should complement official development assistance, not replace it. New initiatives for co-operative implementation of environment and development objectives under mutually beneficial incentive structures should be further explored.

Transfer of environmentally sound technologies

88. The availability of scientific and technological information and access to and transfer of environmentally sound technologies are essential requirements for sustainable development. There is an urgent need for developing countries to acquire greater access to environmentally sound technologies if they are to meet the obligations agreed at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development and in the relevant international conventions. The ability of developing countries to participate in, benefit from and contribute to rapid advances in science and technology can significantly influence their development. This calls for the urgent fulfilment of all the Conference commitments concerning concrete measures for the transfer of environmentally sound technologies to developing countries. The international community should promote, facilitate and finance, as appropriate, access to and transfer of environmentally sound technologies and the corresponding know-how, in particular to developing countries, on favourable terms, including concessional and preferential terms, as mutually agreed, taking into account the need to protect intellectual property rights as well as the special needs of developing countries for the implementation of Agenda 21. Current forms of cooperation involving the public and private sectors of developing and developed countries should be built upon and expanded. In this context, it is important to identify barriers and restrictions to the transfer of publicly and privately owned environmentally sound technologies, with a view to reducing such constraints while creating specific incentives, fiscal and otherwise, for the transfer of such technologies. Progress in the fulfilment of all the provisions contained in chapter 34 of Agenda 21 should be reviewed regularly as part of the multi-year work programme of the Commission on Sustainable Development.

89. Technology transfer and the development of the human and institutional capacity to adapt, absorb and disseminate technologies, as well as to generate technical knowledge and innovations, are part of the same process and must be given equal importance. Governments have an important role to play in providing, inter alia, research and development institutions with incentives to promote and contribute to the development of institutional and human capacities.

90. Much of the most advanced environmentally sound technology is developed and held by the private sector. The creation of an enabling environment, on the part of both developed and developing countries, including supportive economic and fiscal measures, as well as a practical system of environmental regulations and compliance mechanisms, can help to stimulate private sector investment in and transfer of environmentally sound technology to developing countries. New ways of financial intermediation for the financing of environmentally sound technologies, such as "green credit lines", should be examined. Further efforts should be made by Governments and international development institutions to facilitate the transfer of privately owned technology on concessional terms, as mutually agreed, to developing countries, especially the least developed countries.

91. A proportion of technology is held or owned by Governments and public institutions or results from publicly funded research and development activities. The Government's control and influence over the technological knowledge produced in publicly funded research and development institutions open up the potential for the generation of publicly owned technologies that could be made accessible to developing countries, and could be an important means for Governments to catalyse private sector technology transfer. Proposals for the further study of the options with respect to those technologies and publicly funded research and development activities are to be welcomed.

92. Governments should create a legal and policy framework that is conducive to technology-related private sector investments and long-term sustainable development objectives. Governments and international development institutions should continue to play a key role in establishing public-private partnerships, within and between developed and developing countries and countries with economies in transition. Such partnerships are essential for linking the advantages of the private sector—access to finance and technology, managerial efficiency, entrepreneurial experience and engineering expertise—with the capacity of Governments to create a policy environment that is conducive to technology-related private sector investments and long-term sustainable development objectives.

93. The creation of centres for the transfer of technology at various levels, including the regional level, could greatly contribute to achieving the objective of transfer of environmentally sound technologies to developing countries. For this purpose, existing United Nations bodies, including, as appropriate, the Commission on Science and Technology for Development, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, the United Nations Environment Programme and the regional commissions, should cooperate and mechanisms be used, such as technical cooperation among developing countries and economic cooperation among developing countries.

94. Governments and international development institutions can also play an important role in bringing together companies from developed and developing countries and countries with economies in transition so that they can create sustainable and mutually beneficial business linkages. Incentives should be provided to stimulate the building of joint ventures between small and medium-sized enterprises of developed and developing countries and countries with economies in transition, and cleaner production programmes in public and private companies should be supported.

95. Governments of developing countries should take appropriate measures to strengthen South-South cooperation for technology transfer and capacity-building. Such measures could include the networking of existing national information systems and sources on environmentally sound technologies, and the networking of national cleaner production centres, as well as the establishment of sector-specific regional centres for technology transfer and capacity-building. Interested donor countries and international organizations should further assist developing countries in those efforts through, inter alia, supporting trilateral arrangements and contributing to the United Nations Voluntary Trust Fund for South-South Cooperation.

96. Attention must also be given to technology needs assessment as a tool for Governments in identifying a portfolio for technology transfer projects and capacity-building activities to be undertaken to facilitate and accelerate the development, adoption and dissemination of environmentally sound technologies in particular sectors of the national economy. It is also important for Governments to promote the integration of environmental technology assessment with technology needs assessment as an important tool for evaluating environmentally sound technologies and the organizational, managerial and human resource systems related to the proper use of those technologies.

97. There is a need to further explore and enhance the potential of global electronic information and telecommunication networks. This would enable countries to choose among the available technological options that are most appropriate to their needs. In this respect, the international community should assist developing countries in enhancing their capacities.

98. Renewed commitment and support from the international community is essential to support national efforts for capacity-building in developing countries and countries with economies in transition.

99. The United Nations Development Programme, inter alia, through its Capacity 21 programme, should give priority attention to building capacity for the elaboration of sustainable development strategies based on participatory approaches. In this context, developing countries should be assisted, particularly in the areas of the design, implementation and evaluation of programmes and projects.

100. Capacity-building efforts should pay particular attention to the needs of women in order to ensure that their skills and experience are fully used in decision-making at all levels. The special needs, culture, traditions and expertise of indigenous people must be recognized. International financial institutions should continue to give high priority to funding capacity-building for sustainable development in developing countries and countries with economies in transition. Special attention should also be given to strengthening the ability of developing countries to absorb and generate technologies. International cooperation needs to be strengthened to promote the endogenous capacity of developing countries to utilize scientific and technological developments from abroad and to adapt them to local conditions. The role of the private sector in capacity-building should be further promoted and enhanced. South-South cooperation in capacity-building should be further supported through "triangular" cooperative arrangements. Both developed and developing countries, in cooperation with relevant international institutions, need to strengthen their efforts to develop and implement strategies for more effective sharing of environmental expertise and data.

Science

101. Public and private investment in science, education and training, and research and development should be increased significantly, with emphasis on the need to ensure equal access to opportunities for girls and women.

102. International consensus-building is facilitated by the availability of authoritative scientific evidence. There is a need for further scientific cooperation, especially across disciplines, in order to verify and strengthen scientific evidence and make it accessible to developing countries. This evidence is important for assessing environmental conditions and changes. Steps should also be taken by Governments, academia and scientific institutions to improve access to scientific information related to the environment and sustainable development. The promotion of existing regional and global networks may be useful for this purpose.

103. Increasing efforts to build and strengthen scientific and technological capacity in developing countries is an extremely important objective. Multilateral and bilateral donor agencies and Governments, as well as specific funding mechanisms, should continue to enhance their support for developing countries. Attention should also be given to countries with economies in transition.

104. The international community should also actively collaborate in promoting innovations in information and communication technologies for the purpose of reducing environmental impacts, inter alia, by taking approaches to technology transfer and cooperation that are based on user needs.

Education and awareness

105. Education increases human welfare and is a decisive factor in enabling people to become productive and responsible members of society. A fundamental prerequisite for sustainable development is an adequately financed and effective educational system at all levels, particularly the primary and secondary levels, that is accessible to all and that augments both human capacity and well-being. The core themes of education for sustainability include lifelong learning, interdisciplinary education, partnerships, multicultural education and empowerment. Priority should be given to ensuring women's and girls' full and equal access to all levels of education and training. Special attention should also be paid to the training of teachers, youth leaders and other educators. Education should also be seen as a means of empowering youth and vulnerable and marginalized groups, including those in rural areas, through intergenerational partnerships and peer education. Even in countries with strong education systems, there is a need to reorient education, awareness and training so as to promote widespread public understanding, critical analysis and support for sustainable development. Education for a sustainable future should engage a wide spectrum of institutions and sectors, including but not limited to business/industry, international organizations, youth, professional organizations, non-governmental organizations, higher education, government, educators and foundations, to address the concepts and issues of sustainable development, as embodied throughout Agenda 21, and should include the preparation of sustainable development education plans and programmes, as emphasized in the work programme of the Commission on Sustainable Development on the subject adopted in 1996. The concept of education for a sustainable future will be further developed by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, in cooperation with others.

106. It is necessary to support and strengthen universities and other academic centres in promoting cooperation among them, particularly cooperation between those of developing countries and those of developed countries.

International legal instruments and the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development

107. The implementation and application of the principles contained in the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development should be the subject of regular assessment and reporting to the Commission on Sustainable Development by the Secretariat in collaboration with the United Nations Environment Programme, in particular.

108. Access to information and broad public participation in decision-making are fundamental to sustainable development. Further efforts are required to promote, in the light of country-specific conditions, the integration of environment and development policies, through appropriate legal and regulatory policies, instruments and enforcement mechanisms at the national, state, provincial and local levels. At the national level, each individual should have appropriate access to information concerning the environment that is held by public authorities, including information on hazardous materials and activities in the communities, and the opportunity to participate in decision-making processes. Governments and legislators, with the support, where appropriate, of competent international organizations, should establish judicial and administrative procedures for legal redress and remedy of actions affecting environment and development that may be unlawful or infringe on rights under the law, and should provide access to individuals, groups and organizations with a recognized legal interest. Access should be provided to effective judicial and administrative channels for affected individuals and groups to ensure that all authorities, both national and local, and other civil organizations remain accountable for their actions in accordance with their obligations, at the appropriate levels for the country concerned, taking into account the judicial and administrative systems of the country concerned.

109. Taking into account the provisions of chapter 39, particularly paragraph 39.1, of Agenda 21, it is necessary to continue the progressive development and, as and when appropriate, codification of international law related to sustainable development. Relevant bodies in which such tasks are being undertaken should cooperate and coordinate in this regard.

110. Implementation of and compliance with commitments made under international treaties and other instruments in the field of the environment remain a priority. Implementation can be promoted by secure, sustained and predictable financial support, sufficient institutional capacity, human resources and adequate access to technology. Cooperation on implementation between States on mutually agreed terms may help to reduce potential sources of conflict between States. In this context, States should further study and consider methods to broaden and make more effective the range of techniques available at present, taking into account relevant experience under existing agreements and, where appropriate, modalities for dispute avoidance and settlement, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. It is also important to improve further reporting and data-collection systems and to develop further appropriate compliance mechanisms and procedures, on a mutually agreed basis, to help and encourage States to fulfil all their obligations, including means of implementation, under multilateral environmental agreements. Developing countries should be assisted to develop these tools according to country-specific conditions.

Information and tools for measuring progress

111. The further development of cost-effective tools for collecting and disseminating information for decision makers at all levels through strengthened data collection, including, as appropriate, gender-disaggregated data and information that makes visible the unremunerated work of women for use in programme planning and implementation, compilation and analysis is urgently needed. In this context, emphasis will be placed on support for national and international scientific and technological data centres with appropriate electronic communication links between them.

112. A supportive environment needs to be established to enhance national capacities and capabilities for information collection, processing and dissemination, especially in developing countries, to facilitate public access to information on global environmental issues through appropriate means, including high-technology information and communication infrastructure related to the global environment, in the light of country-specific conditions, using, where available, such tools as geographic information systems and video transmission technology, including global mapping. In this regard, international cooperation is essential.

113. Environmental impact assessments are an important national tool for sustainable development. In accordance with Principle 17 of the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, environmental impact assessments should be undertaken for proposed activities that are likely to have a significant adverse impact on the environment and are subject to a decision of a competent national authority; where appropriate, they should be made available early in the project cycle.

114. The work programme of the Commission on Sustainable Development on indicators of sustainable development should result in a practicable and agreed set of indicators, suited to country-specific conditions, including a limited number of aggregated indicators, to be used at the national level, on a voluntary basis, by the year 2000. Such indicators of sustainable development, including, where appropriate, and subject to nationally specific conditions, sector-specific ones, should play an important role in monitoring progress towards sustainable development at the national level and in facilitating national reporting, as appropriate.

115. National reports on the implementation of Agenda 21 have proved to be a valuable means of sharing information at the international and regional levels and, even more important, of providing a focus for the coordination of issues related to sustainable development at the national level within individual countries. National reporting should continue (see also para. 133 (b) and (c) below).

IV. International institutional arrangements

116. The achievement of sustainable development requires continued support from international institutions. The institutional framework outlined in chapter 38 of Agenda 21 and determined by the General Assembly in its resolution 47/191 of 22 December 1992 and other relevant resolutions, including the specific functions and roles of various organs, organizations and programmes within and outside the United Nations system, will continue to be fully relevant in the period after the nineteenth special session of the General Assembly. In the light of the ongoing discussions on reform within the United Nations, international institutional arrangements in the area of sustainable development are intended to contribute to the goal of strengthening the entire United Nations system. In this context, the strengthening of the institutions for sustainable development, as well as the achievement of the goals and objectives set out below are particularly important.

A. Greater coherence in various intergovernmental organizations and processes

117. Given the increasing number of decision-making bodies concerned with various aspects of sustainable development, including international conventions, there is an ever greater need for better policy coordination at the intergovernmental level, as well as for continued and more concerted efforts to enhance collaboration among the secretariats of those decision-making bodies. Under the guidance of the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council should play a strengthened role in coordinating the activities of the United Nations system in the economic, social and related fields.

118. The conferences of the parties to conventions signed at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development or as a result of it, as well as other conventions related to sustainable development, should cooperate in exploring ways and means of collaborating in their work to advance the effective implementation of the conventions. There is also a need for environmental conventions to continue to pursue sustainable development objectives consistent with their provisions and be fully responsive to Agenda 21. To this end, inter alia, the conferences of the parties to or governing bodies of the conventions signed at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, or as a result of it, and of other relevant conventions and agreements should, if appropriate, give consideration to the co-location of secretariats, to improving the scheduling of meetings, to integrating national reporting requirements, to improving the balance between sessions of the conferences of the parties and sessions of their subsidiary bodies, and to encouraging and facilitating the participation of Governments in those sessions, at an appropriate level.

119. Institutional arrangements for the convention secretariats should provide effective support and efficient services, while ensuring the appropriate autonomy necessary for them to be efficient at their respective locations. At the international and national levels there is a need for, inter alia, better scientific assessment of ecological linkages between the conventions; identification of programmes that have multiple benefits; and enhanced public awareness-raising with respect to the conventions. Such tasks should be undertaken by the United Nations Environment Programme in accordance with the relevant decisions of its Governing Council and in full cooperation with the conferences of the parties to and governing bodies of relevant conventions. Efforts of convention secretariats, in response to requests from the respective conferences of the parties, to explore, where appropriate, modalities for suitable liaison arrangements in Geneva and/or New York for the purpose of enhancing linkages with delegations and organizations at those United Nations centres are welcomed and fully supported.

120. It is necessary to strengthen the Inter-Agency Committee on Sustainable Development of the Administrative Committee on Coordination and its system of task managers, with a view to further enhancing system-wide intersectoral cooperation and coordination for the implementation of Agenda 21 and for the promotion of coordinated follow-up to the major United Nations conferences in the area of sustainable development.

121. The Commission on Sustainable Development should promote increased regional implementation of Agenda 21 in cooperation with relevant regional and subregional organizations and the United Nations regional commissions, in accordance with the results of their priority-setting efforts, with a view to enhancing the role such bodies play in the achievement of sustainable development objectives agreed at the international level. The regional commissions could provide appropriate support, consistent with their work programmes, to regional meetings of experts related to the implementation of Agenda 21.

B. Role of relevant organizations and institutions of the United Nations system

122. In order to facilitate the national implementation of Agenda 21, all organizations and programmes of the United Nations system, within their respective areas of expertise and mandates, should strengthen, individually and jointly, the support for national efforts to implement Agenda 21 and make their efforts and actions consistent with national plans, policies and priorities of member States. Coordination of United Nations activities at the field level should be further enhanced through the resident coordinator system in full consultation with national Governments.

123. The role of the United Nations Environment Programme, as the principal United Nations body in the field of the environment, should be further enhanced. Taking into account its catalytic role, and in conformity with Agenda 21 and the Nairobi Declaration on the Role and Mandate of the United Nations Environment Programme, adopted on 7 February 1997, the Programme is to be the leading global environmental authority that sets the global environmental agenda, promotes the coherent implementation of the environmental dimension of sustainable development within the United Nations system, and serves as an authoritative advocate for the global environment. In this context, decision 19/32 of 4 April 1997 of the United Nations Environment Programme Governing Council on governance of the Programme and other related Governing Council decisions are relevant. The role of the United Nations Environment Programme in the further development of international environmental law should be strengthened, including the development of coherent interlinkages among relevant environmental conventions in cooperation with their respective conferences of the parties or governing bodies. In performing its functions related to the conventions signed at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development or as a result of it, and other relevant conventions, the United Nations Environment Programme should strive to promote the effective implementation of those conventions in a manner consistent with the provisions of the conventions and the decisions of the conferences of the parties.

124. The United Nations Environment Programme, in the performance of its role, should focus on environmental issues, taking into account the development perspective. A revitalized Programme should be supported by adequate, stable and predictable funding. The Programme should continue providing effective support to the Commission on Sustainable Development, inter alia, in the form of scientific, technical and policy information and analysis of and advice on global environmental issues.

125. The United Nations Development Programme should continue to strengthen its contribution to and programmes in sustainable development and the implementation of Agenda 21 at all levels, particularly in the area of promoting capacity-building (including through its Capacity 21 programme) in cooperation with other organizations, as well as in the field of poverty eradication.

126. The United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 51/167 of 16 December 1996 and relevant decisions of the Trade and Development Board on the work programme, should continue to play a key role in the implementation of Agenda 21 through the integrated examination of linkages among trade, investment, technology, finance and sustainable development.

127. The Committee on Trade and Environment of the World Trade Organization, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the United Nations Environment Programme should advance their coordinated work on trade and environment, involving other appropriate international and regional organizations in their cooperation and coordination. In coordination with the World Trade Organization, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the United Nations Environment Programme should continue to support efforts to promote the integration of trade, environment and development. The Commission on Sustainable Development should continue to play its important role in the deliberations on trade and environment so as to facilitate the integrated consideration of all factors relevant for achieving sustainable development.

128. Implementation of the commitment of the international financial institutions to sustainable development should continue to be strengthened. The World Bank has a significant role to play, bearing in mind its expertise and the overall volume of resources that it commands.

129. Operationalization of the global mechanism of the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa, is also essential.

C. Future role and programme of work of the Commission on Sustainable Development

130. The Commission on Sustainable Development, within its mandate as specified in General Assembly resolution 47/191, will continue to provide a central forum for reviewing progress and for urging further implementation of Agenda 21 and other commitments made at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development or as a result of it; for conducting a high-level policy debate aimed at consensus-building on sustainable development; and for catalysing action and long-term commitment to sustainable development at all levels. It should continue to undertake these tasks in complementing and providing interlinkages to the work of other United Nations organs, organizations and bodies acting in the field of sustainable development. The Commission has a role to play in assessing the challenges of globalization as they relate to sustainable development. The Commission should perform its functions in coordination with other subsidiary bodies of the Economic and Social Council and with related organizations and institutions, including making recommendations, within its mandate, to the Economic and Social Council, bearing in mind the interrelated outcomes of recent United Nations conferences.

131. The Commission should focus on issues that are crucial to achieving the goals of sustainable development. It should promote policies that integrate economic, social and environmental dimensions of sustainability and should provide for integrated consideration of linkages, both among sectors and between sectoral and cross-sectoral aspects of Agenda 21. In this connection, the Commission should carry out its work in such a manner as to avoid unnecessary duplication and repetition of work undertaken by other relevant forums.

132. In the light of the above, it is recommended that the Commission on Sustainable Development adopt the multi-year programme of work for the period 1998-2002 contained in the appendix below.

D, Methods of work of the Commission on Sustainable Development

133. Based on the experience gained during the period 1993-1997, the Commission, under the guidance of the Economic and Social Council, should:

(a) Make concerted efforts to attract the greater involvement in its work of ministers and high-level national policy makers responsible for specific economic and social sectors, who, in particular, are encouraged to participate in the annual high-level segment of the Commission, together with the ministers and policy makers responsible for environment and development. The high-level segments of the Commission should become more interactive, and should focus on the priority issues being considered at a particular session. The Bureau of the Commission should conduct timely and open-ended consultations with the view to improving the organization of the work of the high-level segment;

(b) Continue to provide a forum for the exchange of national experience and best practices in the area of sustainable development, including through voluntary national communications or reports. Consideration should be given to the results of ongoing work aimed at streamlining requests for national information and reporting and to the results of the "pilot phase" relating to indicators of sustainable development. In this context, the Commission should consider more effective modalities for the further implementation of the commitments made in Agenda 21, with appropriate emphasis on the means of implementation. Countries may wish to submit to the Commission, on a voluntary basis, information regarding their efforts to incorporate the relevant recommendations of other United Nations conferences in national sustainable development strategies;

(c) Take into account regional developments related to the implementation of the outcomes of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development. It should provide a forum for the exchange of experience on regional and subregional initiatives and regional collaboration for sustainable development. This could include the promotion of the voluntary regional exchange of national experience in the implementation of Agenda 21 and, inter alia, the possible development of modalities for reviews within regions by and among those countries that voluntarily agree to do so. In this context, the Commission should encourage the availability of funding for the implementation of initiatives related to such reviews;

(d) Establish closer interaction with international financial, development and trade institutions, as well as with other relevant bodies within and outside the United Nations system, including the World Bank, the Global Environment Facility, the United Nations Development Programme, the World Trade Organization, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the United Nations Environment Programme, which, in turn, are invited to take full account of the results of policy deliberations in the Commission and to integrate them in their own work programmes and activities;

(e) Strengthen its interaction with representatives of major groups, including through greater and better use of focused dialogue sessions and round tables. These groups are important resources in operationalizing, managing and promoting sustainable development and contribute to the implementation of Agenda 21. The major groups are encouraged to adopt arrangements for coordination and interaction in providing inputs to the Commission. Taking into account the Commission's programme of work, this could include inputs from:

- (i) The scientific community and research institutions, relating to the greater understanding of the interactions between human activity and natural ecosystems and on how to manage global systems sustainably;
- (ii) Women, children and youth, indigenous people and their communities, non-governmental organizations, local authorities, workers and their trade unions and farmers on the elaboration, promotion and sharing of effective strategies, policies, practices and processes to promote sustainable development;
- (iii) Business and industry groups on the elaboration, promotion and sharing of sustainable development practices and the promotion of corporate responsibility and accountability;

(f) Organize the implementation of its next multi-year programme of work in the most effective and productive way, including through shortening its annual meeting to two weeks. The inter-sessional ad hoc working groups should help to focus the Commission's sessions by identifying key elements to be discussed and important problems to be addressed within specific items of the Commission's programme of work. Government-hosted and-funded expert meetings will continue to provide inputs to the work of the Commission.

134. The Secretary-General is invited to review the functioning of the High-level Advisory Board on Sustainable Development and present proposals on ways to promote more direct interaction between the Board and the Commission, with a view to ensuring that the Board contributes to the deliberations on specific themes considered by the Commission in accordance with its programme of work.

135. The work of the Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and on Energy for Development and the Committee on Natural Resources should be more compatible with and supportive of the programme of work of the Commission. The Economic and Social Council, in carrying out its functions related to the implementation of General Assembly resolution 50/227 of 24 May 1996, should consider, at its substantive session of 1997, the most effective means of bringing this about.

136. The arrangements for the election of the Bureau should be changed in order to allow the same Bureau to provide guidance in the preparations for and to lead the work during the annual sessions of the Commission. The Commission would benefit from such a change. The Economic and Social Council should take the necessary action at its substantive session of 1997 to ensure that these new arrangements take effect.

137. The next comprehensive review of progress achieved in the implementation of Agenda 21 by the General Assembly will take place in the year 2002. The modalities of this review should be determined at a later stage.

2002 session

Comprehensive review

Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States not covered in the in-depth review carried out by the Commission on Sustainable Development at its fourth session.

Outcome of special session

In an August report [A/52/280], the Secretary-General summarized the outcome of the nineteenth special session and recommended follow-up measures being taken within the UN Secretariat.

He noted that the ongoing consolidation of the three Secretariat departments in the economic and social fields into one Department for Economic and Social Affairs would lead to integration of the Secretariat's functions related to substantive support for intergovernmental processes, relevant analytical work and policy advisory services to Governments.

Accordingly, it was expected that the new functions of the Division for Sustainable Development ment would enhance the Secretariat's capacity to support action at all levels to implement Agenda 21 and to ensure greater coherence in the Secretariat's work in sustainable development in general. That would include stronger support to regional, national and local activities, as well as further enhancing the dialogue and interaction with the major groups and other actors involved in implementing Agenda 21.

Although the Assembly, in the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21, had invited the Secretary-General to review the functioning of the High-level Advisory Board on Sustainable Development and present proposals on ways to promote more direct interaction between the Board and the Commission on Sustainable Development, the Secretary-General felt that, with the Commission's introduction of new arrangements for consultations with various actors from civil society, the Board could be discontinued.

With regard to future reviews of the implementation of Agenda 21, the Secretary-General would present his suggestions on the modalities for the next comprehensive review, scheduled for 2002, at the Assembly's fifty-fifth session in the year 2000.

By decision 52/444 of 18 December, the Assembly noted the Secretary-General's report on the outcome of the nineteenth special session and included a sub-item on the subject in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third (1998) session.

Commission on Sustainable Development

The Commission on Sustainable Development held its fifth session in New York from 7 to 25 April [E/1997/29]. In addition to dealing with preparations for the nineteenth special session of the General Assembly (see above), the Commission had before it reports on other subjects, including: activities posing a major threat to the environment (see PART THREE, Chapter VII); freshwater resources of the world (see PART THREE, Chapter VI); and the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development: application and implementation (see PART THREE, Chapter VII).

Other matters considered by the Commission included: a review of the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States; global change and sustainable development: critical trends; and the proposed programme of work in the area of sustainable development for the biennium 1998-1999 (see below).

On 25 April, the Commission adopted one resolution and three decisions. The resolution concerned modalities for the full and comprehensive review of the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States (see below). In a decision on the proposed programme of work in the area of sustainable development for 1998-1999 [E/1997/29 (dec. 5/101)], the Commission noted a preliminary proposed programme of work and invited the Committee for Programme and Coordination, the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and the Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary) Committee of the Assembly, in their deliberations on the 1998-1999 programme budget, to take into account the outcome of the Assembly's nineteenth special session and the results of the ongoing reform of the UN Secretariat. By the second decision [dec. 5/102], the Commission took note of the report of the Ad Hoc Intergovernmental Panel on Forests on its fourth session (see PART THREE, Chapter VII); and, by the third decision [dec. 5/103], it noted a number of reports related to the work of its fifth session.

By decision 1997/308 of 25 July, the Economic and Social Council noted the report of the Commission on its fifth session.

Global change and sustainable development

In a January report on global change and sustainable development [E/CN.17/1997/3 & Corr.1], the Secretary-General examined critical trends in sustainable development. He reviewed developments since the 1972 United Nations Conference on the Human Environment [YUN 1972, p. 318] and considered the future, focusing throughout on the role of policy.

Although population growth in recent decades had increased the overall pressure on the natural resource base, greater environmental pressure appeared to be exerted by the level and patterns of production and consumption of modern industrialeconomies. As stated in Agenda 21 [YUN 1992, p. 672], energy and materials use in the developed world was the leading cause of global environmental degradation. The consequences of prevailing trends in population growth and consumption were potentially most serious when they led to damage to the natural resources of land and water. Land supported the livelihood of over half the world's population and provided most of the global food supply, and fresh water was indispensable to all life forms and an essential input to economic activity, especially agriculture. Society's response to trends in those key areas could be measured in terms of human development—the extent to which people enjoyed adequate income, health, education and other, more intangible goods such as freedom of choice and personal dignity.

An assessment of recent decades revealed some broad but clear trends in the economic, social and environmental spheres of development, concluded the report. Socio-economic development in many middle- and higher-income developing countries appeared to be experiencing the same transitions as in the developed world, albeit at a faster pace. Despite record rates of global economic growth, wealth disparities had increased between the rich, developed countries and the developing world; differentiation was also becoming more apparent between more successful developing countries and the least developed. Environmental quality with respect to air and fresh water had generally improved in the developed world, but was still worsening in many areas of newly industrializing regions.

As to future prospects, the report noted that many goals relating to human development and environmental protection established in the 1960s and 1970s had been reaffirmed by the international conferences of the 1990s, indicating that they had yet to be achieved. Notable examples included the eradication of poverty, hunger, illiteracy and discrimination, as well as the protection of certain threatened natural resources, habitats and species. The prospects for achieving more sustainable patterns of development in the coming decades appeared mixed.

Trends and projections were cause for serious concern in the following key areas: persistent and growing poverty; population growth and urbanization; fossil fuel consumption; and rapid and continuous degradation of the natural resource base. On the other hand, there had been positive developments, such as declining fertility rates and improved education and health in many developing countries; positive economic forecasts for most world regions; accelerating technological innovation; and the spread of democratic institutions.

Policy intervention had had a positive effect on a number of trends, including high standards of public health and education in developed countries, and rapid falls in infant, child and maternal mortality rates, the eradication of a number of killer diseases, and rising adult literacy rates in most developing countries. Although there were many reasons for the slowing rate of world population growth, government programmes involving education, child health care and access to family planning services had clearly contributed to falling fertility rates. Although global numbers of malnourished people remained high, these would have been far higher were it not for national and international policy commitment to develop and introduce more productive crop varieties and improve agricultural management techniques. While the dramatic decline in industrial pollution of air and water in developed countries could be partly accounted for by market-driven technological change, the process had been accelerated by government regulation.

Other trends had either resisted policy intervention or had not been seriously addressed: macroeconomic policies had not succeeded in eradicating poverty, only in slowing its rate of growth; and the rate of natural resource degradation was accelerating in many regions of the world. Common characteristics of those failures included lack of financial resources and institutional capacity in many developing countries, and political unwillingness, in all countries, to reform traditional property rights and fiscal policies.

The report stated that policy had had a significant role to play in promoting economic development, social equity, stable, educated and healthy populations, well-managed natural resources, and a clean environment. Three strategies that presented promising policy approaches were: increased investment in people through social services, especially basic education and health care; the encouragement of clean and efficient technologies through regulatory requirements and economic incentives; and pricing reform, which was critical in internalizing the social and environmental costs of key economic activities if more sustainable use of natural resources was to be achieved. Although positive developments were evident in each of those areas, the pace of change was slow.

At its 1997 substantive session, the Economic and Social Council considered the multi-year programme of work for the Commission on Sustainable Development, 1998-2002, as recommended by the General Assembly at its nineteenth special session (see above).

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 25 July [meeting 42], the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1997/63 [draft: E/1997/L.50] without vote [agenda item 7 (b)].

Programme of work of the Commission on Sustainable Development for the period 1998-2002 and future methods of work of the Commission

The Economic and Social Council

1. Approves the multi-year programme of work for the Commission on Sustainable Development, 1998-2002, as recommended by the General Assembly at its nineteenth special session;

2. Invites the Commission to draw up the provisional agendas for its future sessions in accordance with the approved multi-year programme of work, without prejudice to rules 5 to 9 of the rules of procedure of the functional commissions of the Economic and Social Council;

3. Approves the following provisional agenda for the sixth session of the Commission:

1. Election of officers.
2. Adoption of the agenda and other organizational matters.
3. Sectoral theme: strategic approaches to freshwater management.
4. Cross-sectoral theme: transfer of technology/capacity-building/education/science/awareness-raising.
5. Economic sector/major group: industry.
6. Review of progress in the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States (those chapters of the Programme of Action that were not covered in the in-depth review carried out at the fourth session of the Commission).
7. Other matters.
8. Provisional agenda of the seventh session.
9. Adoption of the report.

4. Invites the Commission to adjust its future methods of work in accordance with the provisions of paragraphs 132 and 133 of the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21;

5. Decides that during the period 1998-2002 the Commission should continue the practice of establishing, subject to approval by the Council, up to two inter-sessional ad hoc working groups in a given year with a view to assisting the Commission in the preparations for its forthcoming regular sessions;

6. Also decides that the issues to be addressed by such working groups should, as a rule, be decided by the Commission in the context of its consideration of the provisional agendas of its forthcoming sessions and taking into account the provisions of paragraph 133 (f) of the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21;

7. Further decides that, on an exceptional basis, the provisional agendas of the 1998 meetings of the working group or groups of the Commission shall be recommended by the bureau of the Commission in consultation with member States;

8. Decides on the following future arrangements for the election of the bureau of the Commission in order to implement the provisions of paragraph 136 of the Programme for Further Implementation of Agenda 21:

(a) The Commission, immediately following the closure of a regular session, shall hold the first meeting of its subsequent regular session for the sole purpose of electing the new chairman and other members of the bureau in accordance with rule 15 of the rules of procedure of the functional commissions of the Council;

(b) In this context, the provisions of paragraph (d) of its decision 1993/207 of 12 February 1993 apply only to the substantive part of the sessions of the Commission;

(c) The terms of office of the members of the Commission shall begin immediately after the conclusion of work of the regular session of the Commission held after 1 January following their election by the Council at its resumed organizational session for the previous year and shall end at the conclusion of the regular session held after 1 January following the election of the States that are to succeed them as members of the Commission, unless they are re-elected;

(d) The Council shall decide on the specific modalities for the period of transition from the current arrangements to those outlined above at its resumed substantive session of 1997.

By decision 1997/316 of 8 October, the Council authorized the Commission on Sustainable Development to convene an organizational meeting in 1997 for the sole purpose of electing a new chairman and other members of the bureau of its sixth session; the terms of office of the new bureau would begin immediately upon election and would end at the conclusion of the sixth session in 1998. The Council decided to extend the terms of office of those Commission members whose terms were to expire on 31 December 1997 until the conclusion of the sixth session.

In accordance with that decision, the Commission met in New York on 22 December [E/1998/29].

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

The General Assembly, by decision 52/439 of 18 December, took note of part one of the report of the Second Committee on its discussion of matters relating to sustainable development and international economic cooperation [A/52/628].

Inter-Agency Committee

The Inter-Agency Committee on Sustainable Development (IACSD) of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) held two sessions in 1997. At its ninth meeting (New York, 20-21 February) [ACC/1997/1], IACSD discussed the follow-up to the outcome of meetings of ACC and of intergovernmental bodies, reviewed preparations for the nineteenth special session of the General Assembly, and considered reports of the ACC Subcommittees on Water Resources (see PART THREE, Chapter VI) and on Oceans and Coastal Areas (see PART THREE, Chapter VII). It also considered proposals for streamlining national reporting in the field of sustainable development, coordination of the geoscience programmes of the UN system, and a proposed global initiative to protect and promote health and environment in border areas.

At its tenth meeting (Geneva, 17-18 September) [ACC/1997/12], IACSD again discussed the issues addressed at its ninth meeting, and considered follow-up to the nineteenth special session of the General Assembly, including guidance for national action, planning of sustainable development workshops, and preparations for the sixth (1998) session of the Commission on Sustainable Development.

Eradication of poverty

Commission on Sustainable Development. In a January report [E/CN.17/1997/2/Add.2], the Secretary-General reviewed overall progress achieved since UNCED [YUN 1992, p. 670] in the area of combating poverty (chapter 3 of Agenda 21). The report, prepared in the context of preparations for the nineteenth special session of the General Assembly to review the implementation of Agenda 21, observed that the period since 1992 was too short for substantial progress to have been achieved in reducing global poverty, or for reliable assessments of the effectiveness of new approaches to poverty reduction undertaken. It described new initiatives undertaken at national and international levels, particularly those of the UN system, noting that alleviation and reduction of poverty was one of three major themes in the Programme of Action of the 1995 World Summit for Social Development [YUN 1995, p. 1115].

The report also reviewed recent global trends in poverty, using a longer time-frame than the period since 1992 in order to measure meaningful changes. Using household income of less than $ 1 per day per person as an indicator of poverty, World Bank estimates showed a modest but significant decrease in the incidence of poverty in developing countries in recent years. Regionally, the incidence of poverty had declined in East Asia and in the Middle East and North Africa, but not in other regions. Infant mortality rates had fallen in all regions. Other data showed that life expectancy had increased in all regions, and that school enrolment rates had expanded in all regions except sub-Saharan Africa. However, steady population growth in developing countries meant that the total number of people living in poverty in the world had increased despite those positive trends.

With regard to aspects that had deteriorated since 1992, the report stated that in Latin America as a whole, the poverty rate had risen despite increases in gross national product per capita, while the rates in sub-Saharan Africa and South Asia remained very high. Despite generally improved health indicators in developing countries, sub-Saharan Africa had seen increasing numbers of infant deaths and malnourished children, as the decline in the mortality rate had been offset by population growth. In Eastern Europe and the former USSR, the economies in transition had experienced considerable deterioration of living conditions and increases in poverty rates as a result of declines in production and employment. Many Western European countries were also experiencing persistently high levels of unemployment and, in a number of developed countries, inequality in income distribution had increased.

Poverty-related issues that had increased in importance since 1992 included: the growing number of urban poor; chronic undernutrition; rural poverty; the interlinkages between poverty and environment; the need to promote the use of commercial fuels by people with low incomes, thus reducing their reliance on traditional biomass; the disproportionate numbers of women and girl children who were suffering from poverty; and the need for increased attention to be paid to the development challenges facing small island developing States.

Nineteenth special session. In the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21 (resolution S/19-2), the General Assembly, at its nineteenth special session, identified the eradication of poverty as an area that required urgent action. Priorities included: improving access to sustainable livelihoods, entrepreneurial opportunities and productive resources; providing universal access to basic social services; progressively developing social protection systems to support those who could not support themselves; empowering people living in poverty by involving them in the formulation, implementation and evaluation of strategies and programmes for poverty eradication and community development; addressing the disproportionate impact of poverty on women; having interested donors and recipients work together to direct increased shares of official development assistance to poverty eradication; and intensifying international cooperation to support measures in developing countries to eradicate poverty, to provide basic social protection and services and to approach poverty eradication efforts in an integral and multi-dimensional manner.

Poverty eradication coordination. In a June report [E/1997/58], the Secretary-General described the follow-up to agreed conclusions 1996/1 on coordination of UN system activities for poverty eradication, adopted by the Economic and Social Council in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 742].

The report provided information on action taken by UN system members to coordinate UN support and availability of resources for poverty eradication activities at the field level; to mainstream the gender perspective in such activities; and to attain a harmonized and integrated approach to intergovernmental consideration of poverty eradication.

With regard to the last issue, the report recommended that: the Council should determine the date for an overall review of poverty eradication in preparation for the special session of the General Assembly in 2000 to review the implementation of the outcome of the 1995 World Summit for Social Development [YUN 1995, p. 1113]; the Council should continue to enhance complementarity in the work of its functional commissions on cross-sectoral themes emanating from recent UN global conferences; the Commission for Social Development might wish to request specific inputs from the Commission on the Status of Women in preparing for its future priority themes; functional commissions might wish to request that: a gender perspective be reflected in documents prepared by their secretariats, enabling them to include gender implications in their decisions; the Council might wish to consider future arrangements for the contributions of the UN system to the implementation of the outcome of the Summit and other international conferences once the mandates of inter-agency task forces had expired; the Commission for Social Development might wish to invite Governments to provide national reports outlining successes, problems and obstacles in implementing the outcome of the Summit for its thirty-eighth (2000) session; and the Commission, when considering the theme "Social services for all" at its 1999 session, might wish to focus on education.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 25 July [meeting 42], the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1997/60 [draft: E/1997/L.54] without vote [agenda item 5].

Eradication of poverty

Recalling its agreed conclusions 1996/1 on the co-ordination of United Nations system activities for poverty eradication,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the agreed conclusions of the 1996 coordination segment of the Council on the eradication of poverty,

1. Reaffirms that the goal of eradicating poverty in the world is an ethical, social, political and economic imperative;

2. Also reaffirms that the Council will continue to provide overall guidance and oversee system-wide co-ordination in the implementation of its agreed conclusions 1996/1 on the eradication of poverty by all organizations of the United Nations system;

3. Stresses the need for implementation by the United Nations system of agreed conclusions 1996/1 of the Council as regards coordinated United Nations support and the availability of resources for poverty eradication activities at the field level;

4. Welcomes the steps already taken by its functional commissions, in particular the Commission for Social Development and the Commission on the Status of Women, to implement the recommendations of the Council on the coordination of the multi-year programmes of the functional commissions related to poverty eradication, and calls upon all relevant functional commissions to implement fully the recommendations contained in its agreed conclusions 1996/1;

5. Decides, in accordance with its agreed conclusions 1996/1, to carry out in 1999, under the agenda item on integrated and coordinated implementation and follow-up of the major United Nations conferences and summits, an overall review of the theme of poverty eradication in order to contribute to the special session of the General Assembly in the year 2000 for the overall review of the World Summit for Social Development and to the five-year review of the Platform for Action of the Fourth World Conference on Women, also in the year 2000.

UNDP activities. In his annual report covering 1997 [DP/1998/17/Add.2], the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) said that the Poverty Strategies Initiative, launched in 1996 to support country implementation of the commitments in the World Summit for Social Development Programme of Action, had expanded in 1997. Projects in 98 programme countries provided upstream support in enhancing capacity for poverty analysis, policy review and the formulation of national poverty eradication strategies.

UNDP had actively promoted greater recognition of the multidimensional nature of poverty and of the need to integrate the political, social, cultural and environmental facets of human deprivation in efforts to combat poverty. Gender disparities in status, both within the household and in broader society, were being actively addressed as socio-economic policy frameworks were developed. In all facets of sustainable human development programme development, UNDP encouraged integrative approaches that engaged the Government, civil society and the private sector as vested stakeholders in comprehensive poverty-reduction strategies.

UNDP collaborative efforts with civil society organizations (CSOs) were fundamental to building country capacity for combating poverty. The CSO programme supported three immediate objectives: to enhance civic participation in selected countries; to generate new knowledge and strengthen CSOs' competencies to promote sustainable human development policies; and to promote learning through the dissemination of sustainable human development practices drawn from different contexts. A global meeting—Building Partnerships for Sustainable Human Development: a Government, Civil Society and Donor Round Table—was held in Warsaw, Poland, in February to help to shape the analytical framework for UNDP cooperation with CSOs.

In 1997, UNDP further developed the sustainable livelihoods programme to promote poverty eradication through enhancing access to productive resources. The programme analysed policies that reinforced or disrupted sustainable livelihood strategies and recommended appropriate policy changes, investments and technology inputs to reinforce and build on existing coping and adaptive strategies. The gender and environmental dimensions, particularly poor women's access to land, water, sources of energy and credit, were fundamental to those strategies. Pilot programmes included one in Malawi that integrated food security, entrepreneurship and natural resources management, and another to design an approach to urban livelihoods security, in Cairo, Egypt.

An international working group of scholars, researchers and practitioners, formed as a resource network for knowledge development, met for the first time in November.

International Year and UN Decade for Eradication of Poverty

In accordance with General Assembly resolution 51/178 [YUN 1996, p. 743], the Secretary-General in November [A/52/573] reported on the observance of the International Year for the Eradication of Poverty (1996) and recommendations for the remainder of the UN Decade for the Eradication of Poverty (1997-2006).

The report noted that two major reports described the extent of poverty, analysed trends and discussed poverty reduction strategies: the Report on the World Social Situation 1997 (see PART THREE, Chapter IX), and the Human Development Report 1997 (see below). The World Bank, had concluded that the incidence of poverty in developing countries and in countries with economies in transition had fallen slightly from 30 per cent in 1987 to 29.5 per cent in 1993, but that the absolute number of the world's poor had risen from 1.23 billion to 1.31 billion over the same period. The overwhelming majority of people living on $1 a day or less were located in sub-Saharan Africa, South Asia and China, but there were many tens of millions also in Latin America, the Caribbean and West Asia. There was also considerable poverty in developed countries and in countries with economies in transition.

The report concluded that while opening up more widely to the world economy was beneficial to some countries, many had seen few net benefits. Greater international support was needed for countries that had less capacity to benefit so that they could boost their pace of development and more resources could be devoted to social purposes. The renewed commitments made at the 1995 World Summit for Social Development had to be more effectively applied, national strategies revised to reflect priorities, and international cooperation strengthened and extended to increase the pace of poverty reduction. The UN system was attempting to work more closely and more pointedly in furthering action at national and subregional levels and in monitoring progress. Principal requirements were a stronger political will and commitment and more focused technical work.

The report recalled that poverty eradication was more than just a national or international issue. Networks of people committed to poverty eradication were a necessary part of what had to become a successful global campaign.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee [A/52/628/Add.6], adopted resolution 52/193 without vote [agenda item 97 (f)].

First United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 48/183 of 21 December 1993, 49/110 of 19 December 1994, 50/107 of 20 December 1995 and 51/178 of 16 December 1996 related to the observance of the International Year for the Eradication of Poverty (1996) and to the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty (1997-2006), and all its other relevant resolutions relating to international cooperation for the eradication of poverty in developing countries,

Recalling also all declarations and programmes of action of the United Nations major conferences and summits organized since 1990 and the reports and publications on the outcomes of those conferences and summits as they relate to poverty eradication,

Taking note of the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21, adopted by the General Assembly at its nineteenth special session for the purpose of an overall review and appraisal of the implementation of Agenda 21, the Report on the World Social Situation, 1997, the Human Development Report, 1997 and the Trade and Development Report, 1997,

Expressing its concern that, as underlined in the reports mentioned above, the number of people living in absolute poverty is still increasing, especially in developing countries, and that a majority of them are women,

Noting decisions, measures and activities undertaken to eradicate poverty by countries and by organizations, agencies, funds, programmes and bodies of the United Nations system, including the World Bank, as well as by non-governmental organizations and the entire civil society within the framework of the International Year for the Eradication of Poverty and the first year of the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty,

1. Reiterates that the main objective of the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty is to achieve the goal of eradicating absolute poverty and reducing overall poverty substantially in the world through decisive national actions and international cooperation in implementing fully and effectively the relevant resolutions and decisions of the United Nations and all agreements and commitments agreed upon at the United Nations major conferences and summits organized since 1990 as they relate to poverty eradication;

2. Reaffirms that, within the context of overall action for the eradication of poverty, special attention should be given to the multidimensional nature of poverty, to the national and international framework conditions and policies that are conducive to its eradication, which should aim at the social and economic integration of people living in poverty, and to the promotion and protection of all human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, including the right to development;

3. Reaffirms also that the causes of poverty should be addressed in the context of sectoral strategies, such as those on environment, food security, population, migration, health, shelter, human resources development, including education, fresh water, including clean water and sanitation, rural development and productive employment, and of the specific needs of disadvantaged and vulnerable groups, in such a way as to increase opportunities and choices of people living in poverty and enable them to build their strengths and assets so as to achieve social and economic integration;

4. Reaffirms further that all Governments and the United Nations system, in particular the relevant funds, programmes and agencies, should promote an active and visible policy of mainstreaming a gender perspective and use gender analysis as a tool for the integration of a gender dimension into the planning and implementation of policies, strategies and programmes on poverty eradication;

5. Emphasizes that, in developing countries, rural development remains central to poverty eradication efforts, and this often includes agrarian reform, investment in infrastructure, extension of rural financial intermediation ensuring food security, better education and greater utilization of appropriate technology, ensuring fair prices to provide incentives for agricultural investment, and increasing productivity, including productivity in the informal sector;

6. Emphasizes also that in all countries, urban poverty should be addressed, inter alia, by promoting sustainable livelihoods for people living in urban poverty through the provision or expansion of access to training, education and other employment assistance services, in particular for women, youth, the unemployed and the underemployed;

7. Decides that, every year, the International Day for the Eradication of Poverty (17 October) should be marked by concentrating on the themes that the General Assembly chooses for that year;

8. Renews its recommendation that all Governments formulate or strengthen integrated poverty eradication strategies and policies and implement national poverty eradication plans or programmes in a participatory manner, to address the structural causes of poverty, encompassing action at local, national, sub-regional, regional and international levels, and stresses that those plans or programmes should establish, within each national context, strategies and affordable time-bound goals and targets for the substantial reduction of overall poverty and the eradication of absolute poverty;

9. Calls upon developed countries to reaffirm the commitments undertaken to fulfil, as soon as possible, the agreed target of 0.7 per cent of their gross national product for overall development assistance and, where agreed, within that target, to earmark 0.15 to 0.20 per cent of the gross national product for the least developed countries;

10. Invites the international community, including multilateral financial institutions, to implement fully and effectively all initiatives taken regarding debt relief for developing countries, including the Naples terms and the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Debt Initiative, and to continue their efforts in this field with a view to contributing to a durable solution to the debt problems of developing countries, and encourages donors to ensure adequate financing of these mechanisms or initiatives, particularly in African countries and the least developed countries, and thus support their efforts to eradicate poverty;

11. Takes note of the various international microfinance initiatives launched in recent years, such as the Microcredit Summit, held in Washington, D.C., from 2 to 4 February 1997, and the Consultative Group to Assist the Poorest, and invites all Governments, the United Nations system, including the Bretton Woods institutions, the relevant non-governmental organizations, the private sector and other actors of civil society to focus on the importance of increasing access to microcredit and related financial services for self-employment and income-generating activities for people living in poverty, in particular women in developing countries, particularly in Africa and the least developed countries, and to support the corresponding programmes and actions;

12. Invites the Executive Board of the United Nations Development Programme/United Nations Population Fund to consider extending projects under the rubric "Poverty Strategies Initiative" to all developing countries in order to make the initiative closely geared to the poverty eradication goals of the commitments adopted at the World Summit for Social Development and to strengthen assistance in the elaboration of national plans, programmes and strategies to eradicate poverty, particularly in African countries and the least developed countries, and calls upon all countries to contribute to the Initiative;

13. Calls upon all donors to give high priority to the eradication of poverty in their assistance budgets and programmes, on both bilateral and multilateral bases, and invites the relevant funds, programmes and agencies of the United Nations system to support developing countries, particularly African countries and the least developed countries, in their efforts to achieve the overall goal of eradicating poverty and ensuring basic social services, by supporting national efforts to formulate, coordinate, implement, monitor and assess integrated poverty strategies, including capacity-building, and by supporting efforts to empower people living in poverty;

14. Reaffirms the importance of agreeing on a mutual commitment between interested developed and developing country partners to allocate, on average, 20 per cent of official development assistance and 20 per cent of the national budget, respectively, to basic social programmes, and recalls the outcome of the Oslo meeting which reaffirmed that promoting access for all basic social services was essential for sustainable development and should be an integral part of any strategy to overcome poverty;

15. Requests the Secretary-General to report to it at its fifty-third session on progress made in the implementation of measures, themes, recommendations and activities related to the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty, including recommendations for possible actions and initiatives for the rest of the Decade, as well as proposals for better co-ordination of actions taken by the United Nations system;

16. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session an item entitled "Implementation of the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty (1997-2006)".

Role of microcredit

By a 19 March letter [A/52/113-E/1997/18], Bangladesh transmitted to the Secretary-General several documents issued at the Microcredit Summit, held in Washington, D.C., from 2 to 4 February.

The Summit's Declaration and Plan of Action stated that the meeting's purpose was to launch a global movement to reach 100 million of the world's poorest families, especially women, with credit for self-employment and other financial and business services, by the year 2005. The movement to achieve the Summit's goal had two central mechanisms: the institutional action plan and the Microcredit Summit council.

Institutional action plans would contain quantitative goals, a description of methods and a timetable. Members of councils of donor agencies, microcredit practitioners, UN agencies and international financial institutions had agreed to arrive at the Summit having prepared their institution's action plan for helping to fulfil the Microcredit Summit's goals. Other council members had agreed to announce their institution's action plan for contributing to the Summit's goals by February 1998.

Each representing a different sector of civil society, the Microcredit Summit councils were forums for similar organizations to support one another in developing and implementing institutional action plans for contributing to the Summit goal. The councils, with the support of the Microcredit Summit secretariat, would: work to enlist others in the campaign to meet the Summit's goal; promote a learning agenda and an exchange of best practices among council members; and encourage the development and fulfilment of institutional action plans.

The report outlined suggestions for what members of each of the 15 councils might commit to in their institutional action plans.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second

Committee [A/52/628/Add.6], adopted resolution 52/194 without vote [agenda item 97 (f)].

Role of microcredit in the eradication of poverty

The General Assembly,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the observance of the International Year for the Eradication of Poverty (1996) and recommendations for the rest of the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty (1997-2006),

Recognizing that people living in poverty are innately capable of working their way out of poverty with dignity, and can demonstrate creative potentials to improve their situation when an enabling environment and the right opportunities exist,

Noting that in many countries of the world, microcredit programmes, by providing access to small amounts of capital to people living in poverty, have succeeded in generating productive self-employment,

Also noting that microcredit programmes have proved to be an effective tool in freeing people from the bondage of poverty and have led to their increasing participation in the mainstream economic and political process of society,

Bearing in mind that microcredit programmes have especially benefited women and have resulted in the achievement of their empowerment in a world where more women than men live in absolute poverty and that the imbalance continues to grow,

Recognizing that microcredit programmes, in addition to their role in the eradication of poverty, have also been a contributing factor to the social and human development process,

Noting that the qualitative and quantitative development of microcredit institutions and their capacity to reach the marginalized groups requires the provision of an enabling environment, including a policy framework for the financial sector, as well as linkages to the formal financial sector,

Bearing in mind the importance of microfinance instruments such as credit, savings and related business services in providing access to capital for people living in poverty,

Noting that the provision of finance to microcredit institutions should be commensurate with their absorptive capacity and that efforts should be made to strengthen and enhance that capacity,

Noting also the positive references in support of the role of microcredit contained in the final documents of the Twelfth Ministerial Conference of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, held at New Delhi on 7 and 8 April 1997, the Ninth Summit of the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation, held at Male from 12 to 14 May 1997, the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity at its thirty-third ordinary session, held at Harare from 2 to 4 June 1997, the substantive session of 1997 of the Economic and Social Council, held at Geneva from 30 June to 25 July 1997, and the meeting of the Commonwealth Heads of Government, held at Edinburgh from 24 to 27 October 1997, as well as the statement on economic and financial issues of the Group of Seven, issued at Denver, United States of America, on 21 June 1997,

1. Welcomes the launching of different microcredit initiatives in recent years, and acknowledges their important contribution to the eradication of poverty, empowerment of women and social upliftment;

2. Also welcomes the outcome of the Microcredit Summit, held in Washington, D.C., from 2 to 4 February 1997, which, through its Declaration and Plan of Action, endorsed a global campaign to reach 100 million of the world's poorest families, especially women of those families, with credit for self-employment and other financial and business services, by the year 2005;

3. Notes with satisfaction that, as called for in Assembly resolution 51/178 of 16 December 1996, many United Nations agencies and the World Bank actively participated in the Summit and thus contributed to its successful outcome;

4. Takes note of the Declaration and Plan of Action of the Microcredit Summit, the communique issued by the Council of Heads of State and Government at the Summit, and messages to the Summit from the Chairman of the Group of 77 and China and from the Secretary-General;

5. Recognizes the important contributions being made by the United Nations system and by the Consultative Group to Assist the Poorest, sponsored by the World Bank, to develop and disseminate best practices among all organizations engaged in the provision of financial services on a sustainable basis to people living in poverty;

6. Encourages all involved in poverty eradication programmes to consider incorporating microcredit schemes in their strategies;

7. Also encourages them to adopt policies that support the development of microcredit institutions and their capacities so that credit and related services may be made available to increasing numbers of people living in poverty;

8. Calls upon the international donor community to support the strengthening of existing and emerging microcredit institutions in the developing countries, especially the least developed and the African countries;

9. Also calls upon the relevant organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, in particular its funds and programmes and the regional commissions, as well as relevant international and regional financial institutions and donor agencies involved in the eradication of poverty, to explore including the microcredit approach in their programmes as a tool for the eradication of poverty and further developing, where appropriate, other microfinance instruments;

10. Calls upon all concerned non-governmental organizations, other actors of civil society and the private sector to support and incorporate, as appropriate, microcredit and related services in their programmes for the eradication of poverty;

11. Requests the Secretary-General, in collaboration with relevant organizations of the United Nations system, including funds and programmes and the World Bank, to submit to it at its fifty-third session a report on the role of microcredit in the eradication of poverty in the follow-up to resolution 52/193 entitled "First United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty";

12. Decides to include future discussions of the role of microcredit under an item entitled "Implementation of the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty (1997-2006)".

Economic cooperation among developing countries

In response to resolution 50/119 [YUN 1995, p. 848], the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly a report on the state of South-South cooperation [A/52/402]. The report noted that the international scene was witnessing a marked upsurge in cooperation among developing countries. In the preceding four years alone, more than 100 actions could be recorded involving efforts to establish, revise, reinvigorate and launch initiatives in economic cooperation among developing countries (ECDC) and technical cooperation among developing countries (TCDC), as well as in other modes of developing country cooperation.

With regard to the institutional state of South-South cooperation, the report described various approaches employed to achieve consolidated economic spaces for trade, investment and financial growth at the subregional, regional and global levels, and reviewed the implications of the new international trading framework resulting from the successful conclusion in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 1474] of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations.

As to the operational state of South-South cooperation, the report addressed the issues of trade cooperation and trade promotion instruments. It stated that over the period 1990-1995 mutual trade among developing countries had risen from $800 billion to $1,400 billion, or by 15.4 per cent annually. The dynamism of mutual trade gave a significant boost to the expansion of total exports of developing countries as a group (an average rate of 11.6 per cent over the five-year period), since it contributed half of the increase in their world exports.

In the area of monetary and financial cooperation, it was noted that developing countries faced major bottlenecks in trade finance on account of both the inadequate level of resources available and the inappropriate institutional setting for delivering services related to export financing. Regional cooperation in the area of export finance, insurance and guarantees could help to overcome difficulties, provide linkages between national institutions, and encourage the exchange of information within regions. Moreover, regional institutions had better access to international financial markets. Regional schemes were found in the Arab, African and Latin American regions, but their number was small and their volume of operations quite modest.

The report drew attention to the San Jose Plan of Action, adopted by the Group of 77 developing countries at the South-South Conference on Trade, Investment and Finance (San Jose, Costa Rica, 13-15 January 1997) [A/C.2/52/8]. Trade-finance recommendations contained in the Plan of Action called for expanding the risk-taking capacity of southern banking systems so as to provide both normal and structural trade-finance for South-South trade transactions with multilaterally agreed guarantee cover for credit enhancement and country risk. To that end, credit insurance institutions in the South should exchange experiences on export financing through the dissemination of information.

As it had been widely recognized that stock markets could be valuable and efficient sources of financing for enterprises, cooperation among developing countries on capital market development could represent an option for countries facing obstacles in establishing efficient national stock markets. The establishment of regional capital markets would require more intensive coordination of private and public agents at the national and regional levels.

As to South-South cooperation in the area of investment, innovation and enterprise development, the report noted that intra-South investment had emerged in recent years as a significant tool for industrial cooperation among developing countries. That phenomenon had developed most rapidly among the Asian countries, but was also fast-growing among the Latin American countries, and was emerging in Africa. Within the last decade, said the report, a number of South-based enterprises had increased in importance. Some of them had become genuine transnational corporations, and there was considerable scope for cooperation among them, both within regions and across regions. With regard to the promotion of investment cooperation, the report cited a number of recommendations for action contained in the San Jose Plan of Action.

In resolution 52/205, the Assembly stressed the need to intensify the process of strengthening the various interregional dialogues and the exchange of experiences among subregional and regional economic groupings for the purposes of expanding South-South cooperation through integrating the modalities of ECDC/TCDC. It decided to include a sub-item on ECDC/TCDC in the provisional agenda of its fifty-fourth (1999) session, and asked the Secretary-General to report to it on the implementation of the resolution at that time.

Science and technology for development

Commission on Science and Technology for Development

The Commission on Science and Technology for Development, at its third session (Geneva, 12-16 May) [E/1997/31], had as its substantive theme "Information and communication technologies for development". Other substantive issues considered by the Commission were: science, technology and innovation policy reviews; action arising from the Commission's second (1995) session [YUN 1995, p. 849]; ways to commemorate in 1999 the twentieth anniversary of the UN Conference on Science and Technology for Development [YUN 1979, p. 633]; the Commission's role and activities regarding the coordination of science and technology for development; and procedural matters.

It recommended that the Economic and Social Council adopt a draft resolution covering the items considered and draft decisions on the election of members of the Commission Bureau other than the Chairman and on the Commission report on its third session and provisional agenda for its fourth session (see below). It brought to the Council's attention its decision [E/1997/31 (dec. 3/101)] to include the Chairman's summaries of discussions at the third session in the Commission's report.

Information and communication technologies

With regard to its substantive theme, the Commission had before it a report of the Working Group on Information and Communication Technologies for Development [E/CN.16/1997/4]. The Working Group, which had held several meetings throughout 1996, reviewed evidence regarding the implications of information and communication technologies (ICTs) for developing countries and countries in transition, concluding that there were substantial indicators that the new technologies were transforming some sectors of society. There was great risk, however, that if effective national ICT strategies were not put in place, the capacity-building that was needed in order to benefit from those technologies might not occur.

Stating that Governments and other stakeholders had to be called on to design new roles for the public and business sectors to harness ICTs to economic, social and environmental development goals, the Working Group recommended that: each developing country and country in transition establish a national ICT strategy, and existing strategies be reviewed to ensure that they noted guidelines proposed by the Working Group; immediate action be taken by Governments to establish a task force or commission to ensure that another entity was charged with establishing guidelines for national ICT strategies; and each UN agency review the financing, production and use of ICTs for social and economic development in their area of responsibility.

The Working Group further recommended that the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) prepare a study for the Commission's fourth (1999) session on the implications of new forms of revenue generation, focusing especially on those involving ICTs that might support social and economic development priorities. In particular, it should report on the implications of the ongoing discussions and studies on a "bit tax".

The Working Group had developed guidelines, which, it stated, should be noted by Governments, other stakeholders, and UN agencies and organs. They were intended to help developing countries and countries in transition design new roles for the public and business sectors so that ICTs could be harnessed to economic, social and environmental development goals.

Twentieth anniversary of Vienna Conference

In response to Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/4 [YUN 1995, p. 850], the UNCTAD secretariat submitted to the Commission on Science and Technology for Development a note [E/CN.16/1997/7] on ways to commemorate in 1999 the twentieth anniversary of the Vienna Conference on Science and Technology for Development [YUN 1979, p. 633]. The note reviewed some of the science and technology-related questions considered by the institutions set up at the Vienna Conference, as well as some of the policy issues facing the international community. In many parts of the world, the problems raised at the Vienna Conference had not disappeared and additional countries that were not its focus in 1979, such as those with economies in transition, were seeking ways to address science and technology-related issues in the new socio-economic setting.

A December 1996 panel meeting convened by the Commission raised several policy issues for possible consideration. According to that panel, there seemed to be frustration with the limited implementation of the Vienna Programme of Action. As to formulating a common vision regarding the future contribution of science and technology for development, a starting point would be to discuss what had been functional and useful and what had helped to further technological capacity-building in the developing world. Such activities could consider the Vienna Programme and the dynamics surrounding it, for example the lack of political will and of conditions for its implementation.

It was clear that a large section of the population in many parts of the world had not benefited from science and technology, and that might have contributed to social imbalances.

Thus, any approach for the future consideration of science and technology would have to take into account the concerns of a broad range of actors and stakeholders in development, including Governments, enterprises, the scientific and research and development community, and non-governmental organizations. The elements of a common vision for the future would need to reflect both the varied interest and perceptions of those different development actors and the changes that had occurred in the international economy.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 25 July [meeting 42], the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of the Commission on Science and Technology for Development [E/1997/31], adopted resolution 1997/62 without vote [agenda item 7 (b)].

Science and technology for development

Recognizing, without prejudice to the ongoing review being undertaken on the implementation of General Assembly resolution 50/227 of 24 May 1996 with regard to its subsidiary bodies, the role of the Commission on Science and Technology for Development as a forum for the examination of science and technology questions, for improving understanding of science and technology policies for development and for the formulation of recommendations and guidelines on science and technology matters within the United Nations system, all in relation to development,

Recognizing also that the Commission, in carrying out its work, should pay special attention to the needs and requirements of developing countries, in particular the least developed countries and landlocked and small island developing States, and that it should in addition take into consideration the relevant problems of countries with economies in transition,

Taking note with appreciation of the report of the Working Group on Information and Communication Technologies for Development of the Commission on Science and Technology for Development and the conclusions and recommendations contained therein,

Recognizing that the social and economic potential of information and communication technologies is enormous, and that the risks for those without the capabilities to access, design, produce and use the new products and service applications may lead to their marginalization from active participation in the global economy,

Taking note with satisfaction of the note by the secretariat of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development on the scientific and technological aspects of sustainable energy systems,

Taking note with satisfaction also of the report by the Gender Advisory Board on its work,

Noting with satisfaction that the science, technology and innovation policy reviews directed at a broad spectrum of sectors, including industry, social sectors and government itself, have started, with one review already completed, another under way and a third awaiting financing,

Taking note of the other relevant documentation submitted to the Commission for consideration at its third session,

Noting that the fourth session of the Commission is scheduled to take place twenty years after the United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development, held at Vienna from 20 to 31 August 1979, and recognizing that there is a need to define a new vision and to enhance continuously the role for the United Nations system in the area of science and technology for development,

Recalling Commission decision 2/101 of 24 May 1995 on its working methods, which was ratified by the Council,

Recognizing that enhanced transparency and accountability are essential for the efficient and effective functioning of the Commission,

Welcoming the initiative taken by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in holding a World Science Conference in 1999 to strengthen the commitment of countries to scientific research and development in the service of societal progress,

Activities to follow up the earlier work of the Commission

A. Information and communication technologies for development

1. Recommends that all developing countries and countries with economies in transition establish a national strategy for information and communication technologies, taking into account, inter alia, the guidelines proposed by the Working Group on Information and Communication Technologies for Development of the Commission on Science and Technology for Development and that, where such strategies already exist, they could be reviewed in the light of those guidelines;

2. Also recommends that action be taken by national Governments to establish a task force or commission or to ensure that an existing entity is charged with the design of the national strategy for information and communication technologies;

3. Invites countries, in order to facilitate the exchange of experience among them at the international and regional levels, to prepare a report on their strategies for information and communication technologies for the next session of the Commission, to be held in 1999, and stresses that the reports should include the priorities of each national strategy, the mechanisms for updating and the procedures for implementing the strategy and that, to enhance the value of the reports, consideration might be given to the organization of workshops, all of which should be financed from extrabudgetary resources;

4. Invites relevant bodies of the United Nations system to assess their capability to provide assistance and promote cooperation in the area of information and communication technologies and to suggest areas in which they are best able to assist developing countries and countries with economies in transition in the design and implementation of their national strategies for information and communication technologies;

5. Requests the secretariat of the Commission to synthesize the results of those assessments and to hold an inter-agency meeting within existing resources in cooperation with the Commission to review that synthesis;

6. Invites Governments, the public and business sectors, academia and non-governmental organizations in industrialized countries to engage in technological co-operation activities with their counterparts in developing countries and countries with economies in transition in order to facilitate their access to and encourage the use, production and development of information and communication technologies and to ensure their effective participation in building the global information infrastructure;

7. Requests the Commission to identify an independent institute to prepare a study, subject to the availability of extrabudgetary resources, for the next session of the Commission on new forms of resource generation, focusing on information and communication technologies that might support social and economic development priorities;

B. Science, technology and innovation policy reviews

8. Decides that the Commission shall organize a workshop comparing experiences in science, technology and innovation policy or similar reviews in developing countries and countries with economies in transition in order to stimulate a learning process in those innovative efforts, subject to the availability of extrabudgetary resources;

9. Recommends the continuation of cooperation between the Commission and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development on science, technology and information policy reviews;

C. Common vision of the future of science and technology for development

10. Recommends that the Commission, in the form of expert group meetings, carry out a programme of preparation, as outlined in the report of the meeting of the preparatory working group on that subject, held at Geneva on 20 and 21 December 1996, taking into account regional inputs;

D. Gender Advisory Board

11. Requests the Gender Advisory Board to continue its work as reported, in collaboration with all relevant organizations, in particular those within the United Nations system;

E. New substantive theme and other activities

12. Decides that the substantive theme for the inter-sessional period 1997-1999 shall be "Science and technology partnerships and networking for national capacity-building" and that the theme shall include North-South as well as South-South partnerships and networks involving, inter alia, enterprises, educational bodies, research institutions, governmental science and technology departments and other actors in the field of science and technology, with particular attention to be paid to biotechnology and energy;

13. Also decides to hold a panel meeting on biotechnology and its impact on development, bringing together country experts and experts from relevant institutions and United Nations agencies working on that subject, in order to identify critical issues relevant to development that are not sufficiently covered by existing forums, with particular attention to food production, and to recommend how further work on those issues might be undertaken;

F. Budget and inter-sessional activities

14. Recommends that at future sessions of the Commission, the report on the budget and inter-sessional activities of the Commission be considered under a separate agenda item;

G. Coordination of science and technology for development in the United Nations system

15. Decides that the secretariat of the Commission shall be requested to study the possibility of setting up, in collaboration with other United Nations bodies, including the regional commissions, an electronic network on their activities in science and technology for development, making that network widely accessible to science and technology institutes around the world;

16. Also decides that, in order to promote better interaction with United Nations bodies, especially the regional commissions, the Commission shall give consideration to including suitably qualified members of those bodies in the working groups of the Commission and that, in addition, meetings of the working groups of the Commission might be held in the offices of the regional commissions, whenever possible;

H. Coalition of resources

17. Recommends that a workshop be convened by the Commission to provide a forum for coalition of resources, in particular in relation to information and communication technologies.

In other action, the Council, by decision 1997/306 of 25 July, took note of the report of the Commission on Science and Technology for Development on its third session and approved the provisional agenda and documentation for the fourth (1999) session. By decision 1997/305 of the same date, the Council decided that an organizational meeting of the Commission should be held in Geneva or New York in early January 1998 to elect Commission Bureau members other than the Chairman.

Report of Secretary-General. The Secretary-General reported to the General Assembly in September [A/52/320] on the implementation of resolution 50/101 [YUN 1995, p. 855] on science and technology for development. The report covered the activities of the Commission on Science and Technology for Development and its supporting secretariat, UNCTAD. It described the work of the Commission on: information and communication technologies (see above); science, technology and innovation policy reviews—the first having been undertaken in Colombia, the second under way in Jamaica; gender, science and technology and the establishment of the Gender Advisory Board; the formulation of a common vision regarding the future contribution of science and technology for development in the context of the twentieth anniversary of the adoption of the Vienna Programme of Action (see above); the coalition of resources for science and technology for development; and the coordination of UN system activities in the area of science and technology for development.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee [A/52/626/Add.3], adopted resolution 52/184 without vote [agenda item 95 (c)].

Science and technology for development

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the continuing validity of the Vienna Programme of Action on Science and Technology for Development, adopted in 1979, its resolution 50/101 of 20 December 1995 and all other relevant United Nations resolutions and decisions, as well as the outcomes of United Nations major conferences concerning science and technology for development,

Taking note of the Meeting of Experts on Science and Technology of the Non-Aligned Countries held at Cartagena de Indias, Colombia, in March 1997, in the field of biological diversity,

Recognizing the importance for developing countries of having access to science and technology so as to enhance their productivity and competitiveness in the world market, and stressing the need to promote, facilitate and finance, as appropriate, access to and transfer of environmentally sound technologies and the corresponding know-how, in particular to the developing countries, on favourable terms, including concessional and preferential terms, as mutually agreed, taking into account the need to protect intellectual property rights as well as the special needs of developing countries,

Stressing, given the fact that much of the most advanced environmentally sound technology is developed and held by the private sector, that the creation of an enabling environment on the part of both developed and developing countries, including supportive economic and fiscal measures as well as a practical system of environmental regulations and compliance mechanisms, can help to stimulate private-sector investment in and transfer of environmentally sound technologies to developing countries, as affirmed by the General Assembly in paragraph 90 of the annex to its resolution S-19/2 of 28 June 1997,

Stressing also that further efforts should be made by Governments and international development institutions to facilitate the transfer of privately owned technologies on concessional terms, as mutually agreed, to developing countries, especially least developed countries, as affirmed by the General Assembly in paragraph 90 of the annex to its resolution S-19/2,

Expressing concern over the risk of marginalization of many developing countries, in particular the least developed and the African countries, in the process of globalization, which has resulted in increased benefits from advances in science and technology,

Recognizing the importance of the efforts of developing countries in the field of science and technology for development,

Noting the proposal by the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to convene a world science conference in 1999,

Recognizing that information technologies are important requisites for planning, development and decision-making in science and technology, and recognizing also their far-reaching implications for society,

Reaffirming that the United Nations should play an important role in the promotion of cooperation in science and technology, as one of its priorities, and in the enhancement of support and assistance to developing countries in their efforts to achieve sustainable development, and emphasizing the need to enhance the capability of the relevant United Nations organizations, including the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, to address relevant issues in the field of science and technology,

Noting the work being undertaken by the Commission on Science and Technology for Development on its work programme for member States, especially the developing countries, and reaffirming its unique role as a global forum for examining science and technology questions, improving the understanding of science and technology policies and formulating recommendations and guidelines on science and technology matters within the United Nations system, all in relation to development, without prejudice to the Economic and Social Council review of its subsidiary bodies, as initiated under General Assembly resolution 50/227 of 24 May 1996, bearing in mind other relevant Assembly resolutions,

Recognizing the need for adequate resources to be devoted to fostering science and technology for development,

Recognizing also the need for Governments and regional and international bodies to take measures to ensure women better access to and participation in scientific and technological areas, especially where they are not represented or are under-represented,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General entitled "Macroeconomic policy questions: science and technology for development",

1. Reaffirms Economic and Social Council decision 1997/306 of 25 July 1997, in which the Council approved the provisional agenda for the fourth session of the Commission on Science and Technology for Development on the basis of the report of the Commission on its third session;

2. Recognizes the ongoing work of the Commission on Science and Technology for Development, emphasizes the importance of the activities that are to be pursued within the framework of the Commission, including a broad spectrum of new global challenges in science and technology, encourages support to those undertakings and, in that regard, reaffirms that the substantive theme for the inter-sessional period 1997-1999 of the Commission will be "Science and technology partnerships and networking for national capacity-building";

3. Reaffirms that capacity-building in science and technology in developing countries should remain a priority issue on the United Nations agenda, and urges that international cooperation efforts be intensified and strengthened towards endogenous capacity-building of developing countries in science and technology, including their capacity to utilize scientific and technological developments from abroad as well as to modify and adapt them to suit local conditions;

4. Also recognizes the role of Governments in science and technology for development, in particular in providing appropriate regulatory frameworks and incentives for the development of science and technology capabilities;

5. Further recognizes the role of the private sector in science and technology for development, in particular in the transfer and development of science and technology capabilities;

6. Stresses the need to strengthen the important role of the United Nations in the field of science and technology as a cross-cutting concern within the work of the United Nations, particularly through effective policy guidance and better coordination, including international cooperation in technology assessment, monitoring and forecasting, as well as in the area of information and communication technologies, and in providing an environment conducive to the development of new environmentally sound technologies, and calls upon the organizations, funds and programmes of the United Nations to continue to work in a coordinated and expeditious manner to develop a catalogue of proved technologies to enable effective technology choice, by developing countries, of state-of-the-art technologies;

7. Reaffirms the need to fulfil the commitments on the provision of financial resources and transfer of technology contained in chapter 34 of Agenda 21, the outcome of the nineteenth special session of the General Assembly and the Agenda for Development;

8. Also reaffirms the need for adequate financial resources on a continuous and assured basis to foster science and technology for development, in particular to promote endogenous capacity-building in developing countries in accordance with their priorities;

9. Stresses that the current forms of cooperation involving the public and private sectors of developing and developed countries should be built upon and expanded, and, in that context, also stresses the importance of identifying barriers and restrictions to the transfer of publicly and privately owned technologies, as affirmed by the General Assembly in paragraph 88 of the annex to its resolution S-19/2 as well as other relevant General Assembly resolutions and decisions, with a view to reducing such constraints while creating specific incentives, fiscal and otherwise, for the transfer of such technologies;

10. Recognizes the importance of cooperation among developing countries in the field of science and technology, building on their complementarities, and the need for further advancing such cooperation through the establishment or strengthening of national technology and information centres in developing countries and networking on subregional, regional, interregional and global levels to promote technology research, training and dissemination as well as joint projects in developing countries, and urges the organizations and bodies of the United Nations system and other relevant international, regional and subregional organizations and programmes to provide continued and enhanced support through technical assistance and financing for such efforts;

11. Reiterates the affirmation of the General Assembly, as set forth in paragraph 93 of the annex to its resolution S-19/2, that the creation of centres for the transfer of technology at various levels, including the regional level, could greatly contribute to achieving the objective of transfer of environmentally sound technologies to developing countries and that, for that purpose, existing United Nations bodies and mechanisms, including, as appropriate, mechanisms for technical and environmental cooperation among developing countries, the Centre for Science and Technology for Development, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, the United Nations Environment Programme and the regional commissions, should cooperate;

12. Invites the relevant bodies of the United Nations system to assess their capability to provide assistance and promote cooperation in the area of information and communication technologies, and to suggest areas in which they are best able to assist interested countries, in particular the developing countries, in the design and implementation of national strategies on such technologies;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-fourth session a report on the progress made in the implementation of the present resolution.

Economic and social trends and policy

Economic surveys and trends

The World Economic and Social Survey 1997 [Sales No. E.97.II.C.1], prepared in mid-1997, stated that the world economy was experiencing widespread economic growth as it moved towards the close of the millennium. Barring unpredictable shocks, the level and pattern of growth were likely to be maintained and, in some cases, improved in 1997. However, although the momentum was encouraging, it was not spread widely enough. The economic and social setbacks brought about by previous disruptions were far from overcome in some parts of the developing world and in the economies that were in transition from planned to market systems. Unemployment was an immediate concern in the transition economies and in many parts of the developing world; it was also a highly salient issue even in the richest countries.

The world economy grew 3 per cent in 1996 and was forecast to grow at the same rate in 1997. After a disappointing start to the decade, the world economy was on a growth trend that exceeded that of the 1980s. It also appeared to be a sustainable growth trend in that inflation rates had fallen in most countries and were being further reduced in others, while excessive fiscal deficits had been broadly curtailed.

In 1996, the developed economies grew by 2.4 per cent, a figure representing somewhat faster growth than in 1995, and growth in 1997 was expected to show a further modest increase. Growth was accelerating in North America and Western Europe, while in Australia and Japan, economic activity was expected to be slower in 1997 than in 1996. That moderate growth at a time of favourable monetary conditions was partly due to simultaneous multi-year efforts to cut budget deficits. In 1997, fiscal policy was expected to stay tight in most developed countries. There had been considerable success in achieving the objectives of low inflation, with the average rate of inflation at its lowest since the 1960s. Consumer price increases in 1997 were likely to remain at an average of somewhat above 2 per cent. Most developed economies, however, had not generated adequate job growth, and unemployment rates, remaining excessive, represented a waste of human resources and a drain on fiscal budgets. That was especially the case in Western Europe, where unemployment remained high and had even worsened in France and Germany when economic growth faltered in 1996.

The year 1996 had seen a further contraction of output in the transition economies as a group (the Baltic States, Central and Eastern Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS)). However, the year 1997 could be more promising as most transition economies had begun their economic recovery, although only Poland had reached a level of output that matched that of the pre-transition years. An important disappointment in 1996 was the failure of recorded economic growth in the Russian Federation to materialize, owing to unanticipated uncertainties. Although it was expected that 1997 might see the first increase in output in the region as a whole since 1989, resumption of output growth was not the same thing as reduction in unemployment. The total number of unemployed in transition economies was 14.4 million at the end of 1996, 370,000 more than a year earlier. Given the scale of the measured output contraction since the transition began, even those rates of unemployment signified either serious overmanning or under-reporting of output. One condition for the sustained revival of economic activity was the achievement of macroeconomic stabilization. Progress in 1996 could be seen in the decline in inflation, with rates in 1996 having fallen sharply below those of the preceding three years.

The rate of growth of the developing countries as a group was at its highest in many years. That strong growth could be seen in Latin America and West Asia, while Africa appeared to be maintaining its recent greater dynamism; the strong overall growth in East and South Asia and China continued but at moderated rates. The least developed countries (see below, under "Developing countries") were in their third year of relatively strong growth and rising per capita output. That acceleration was due more to a broadening of the numbers of growing countries than to faster rates of growth in a limited number. Of the 95 developing countries monitored for the preparation of the Survey, only 11 failed to increase per capita output in 1996, compared with 24 in 1995.

The most significant economic development in Africa was the return to rising gross domestic product (GDP) per capita in 1996 and its anticipated continuation in 1997. The recovery was rather widely shared, with at least 22 countries in 1996 reaching a GDP growth rate of 5 per cent or higher, and 11 reaching a rate of 6 per cent or higher. GDP declined in only 2 countries of the 44 for which estimates were available in 1996—Burundi and the Central African Republic—and in both cases the decline was associated with political turmoil (see PART ONE, Chapter II). It appeared that 1996-1997 might mark the first time since 1979-1980 that the average GDP per capita had increased for two consecutive years. However, that followed on a protracted decline. A higher and sustained growth rate would be required to alleviate widespread poverty and reduce high unemployment and underemployment. Improvement in output growth since 1994 in Africa could be attributed to a number of international and domestic economic developments and improved weather conditions. In particular, higher commodity prices in 1994 and 1995 and higher oil prices in 1996 played a critical role. Moreover, favourable weather conditions in 1996 had enabled a brisk recovery in agricultural output and Africa also benefited from strong international demand for its exports, which was expected to be sustained in 1997 and 1998. Other factors had been of a more lasting nature; improved and sustained macroeconomic stability and policy reforms, which could be discerned in a growing number of countries, had created a more conducive environment for investment in some cases and removed obstacles to increasing production in others. The growth of GDP was expected to slow slightly in 1997, as the effect of recovery from drought, which had helped fuel growth in 1996, would wear off, and the stimulus from strong commodity prices was forecast to diminish. Growing conditions for agricultural crops in 1997 appeared to be generally favourable in most regions with the exception of northern and eastern Africa. The forecast also looked towards an end to civil strife and instability, which had affected several countries on the continent.

port growth in many countries and with business confidence and foreign capital flows encouraged by the continuity in economic policy experienced since the financial crisis in Mexico in 1995. Output in the region was growing at about 4 per cent a year, after a decline in 1995, and GDP expanded in 1996 at a rate of 5 per cent or more in seven countries, while the pace of recovery in the countries hit by recession in 1995 (Argentina, Mexico, Uruguay) exceeded most forecasts in the second half of 1996. Prospects for growth, however, fell short of the region's trend rate of growth of 5.5 per cent per year between 1945 and 1980, and were still far from the 6 per cent annual rate deemed necessary to reduce growing unemployment and address urgent social needs. Regional inflation continued its decline towards single digits, and further curbing of inflation remained a priority for the Governments of the region. Inflation was lower in 10 countries and stable in 11 others. In Argentina price rises were, at less than 1 per cent, among the lowest in the world, while in Brazil they were, at 10 per cent, the lowest since 1950.

Buoyant exports and external finance were particularly important in the 1996 turnaround of the economies of Argentina, Mexico and Uruguay and in the continued strong expansion of Chile. In some countries, economic dynamics were heavily affected by political and security factors, Haiti being a case in point (see PART ONE, Chapter III). Poverty in the region still affected more than two fifths of the population—about 200 million people—and was hurting them more than ever before. An important feature of urban poverty in the region was that it had an impact on not only the large share of workers in low-productivity, informal jobs, but also on a high percentage of unskilled labour employed in the formal economy. The ultimate requirement for poverty alleviation and unemployment reduction was sustained economic growth at a strong pace. That would entail both high overall investment and savings and strengthened human capital development. Thus, several countries were widening efforts to improve education systems to enhance labour skills. As to the saving-investment nexus, at 19 per cent of GDP in 1996, saving was at the highest level since 1990, but was both lower than the Latin American average in the previous decade and much lower than that of the more dynamic economies of South and East Asia.

While continuing the phenomenon of sustained rapid economic expansion, growth in the East and South Asia region decelerated in 1996 from 7.3 per cent in 1995 to 6.5 per cent in 1996, largely due to a slowdown in the more rapidly growing countries (Indonesia, Malaysia, Republic of Korea, Singapore, Thailand). The regional rate of economic growth was expected to continue in 1997 at about the same rate for similar reasons. A more restrictive monetary policy had reined in economic expansion in those countries in order to bring about more sustainable growth. In addition, export growth weakened more than expected in the second half of 1996, owing to a substantial slowdown in world trade and the cyclical downturn in international demand for semiconductor and information technology products, as well as the appreciation of the dollar against the yen. Structural problems of differing severities in individual economies accentuated the slowdown. The long-term decline of competitiveness of traditional exports threatened sustained high export growth in a number of economies. In addition, in the Republic of Korea and Thailand in particular, the fragility of the financial system had become a serious concern. The economies of Hong Kong and Taiwan Province of China were expected to continue recent growth trends in 1997, with GDP rising 5.5 per cent and 6.3 per cent, respectively. They would benefit from the recovery of world trade and, in the case of Taiwan Province of China, the upturn in international demand for semiconductors and information-technology products. In some countries that had begun to achieve higher growth only in recent years, economic expansion continued to accelerate, for example in the Philippines, or remained at a high level, such as in Viet Nam. In India as well, economic growth was at a high level in 1996 after several years of acceleration. Other major southern Asian economies had been seeking to improve macroeconomic stability and implement economic reform in order to sustain economic growth. In Pakistan, civil unrest and industrial strikes in response to austere policies to reduce fiscal deficits had adversely affected industrial output in 1996. In Bangladesh, strong agricultural production sustained GDP growth of 5 per cent in 1996, while garment exports were depressed by the worldwide slowdown in demand, and private and public investment remained weak.

China's economy had been achieving the "soft landing" objective of the macroeconomic stabilization policies initiated in 1993. The rate of consumer price inflation, which reached 24 per cent in 1994, declined to 17 per cent in 1995 and was reduced further to 8.3 per cent in 1996. Meanwhile, the GDP growth rate moderated to 9.7 per cent in 1996, from 12.6 per cent in 1994. The high growth of fixed investment, which was the main impetus to rapid growth of demand and rising inflation, had successfully been slowed. A persistent tight monetary policy restricting credit—the main instrument used to restrain growth—was accompanied by other more direct measures, including postponement or cancellation of public investment projects, stricter enforcement of credit ceilings, and reinstitution of government control over certain prices. Good harvests also aided the government effort to reduce inflation, and industrial output rose almost 13 per cent based on the dynamism of the non-State sector. Prospects for 1997 were for continued strong economic growth of about 10 per cent, with a relatively low rate of inflation. However unemployment remained a concern.

Economic output in the West Asia region strengthened significantly in 1996, reflecting strong growth in the member countries of the Gulf Cooperation Council, owing primarily to the sharp rise in oil prices. After near-stagnation in 1994, output growth had been accelerating and the region's GDP rose 5 per cent. Economic growth in the region was expected to accelerate to about 6 per cent in 1997, reflecting a strong recovery in economic activity in Iraq, while GDP growth in the other fuel-exporting countries would moderate as oil prices eased. The rate of economic growth would continue to depend to a large extent on international oil prices and oil revenues, the extent of economic reforms, diversification of the economy and regional economic integration. The private sector was expected to contribute more to economic activity as a result of new policies aimed at encouraging privatization. More accommodating fiscal policy and more robust productivity in the non-oil sector would also contribute to sustaining the growth of GDP. In fuel-importing countries, economic activity had decelerated in 1996. Growth of economic activity in Jordan, albeit slower, was still occurring at a rate of 5 per cent, and inflation remained low despite a rise in subsidized prices of some essential items. In Lebanon, GDP growth fell to 3 per cent in 1996, owing mainly to a slowdown in public and private investment earlier in the year. In Israel, economic growth fell sharply from an average of 6 per cent per annum in the period 1990-1995 to 3.8 per cent in 1996, owing to a tighter fiscal policy to control inflation and reduce the external deficit and a slowdown in investment due to concerns over the peace process. Turkey enjoyed a marked expansion of output for the second consecutive year, following a sharp contraction in 1994 in the aftermath of fiscal and monetary tightening. Notwithstanding the marked growth in economic output over the preceding two years, unemployment remained a key concern throughout the region.

In a report providing updated data on the world economy [E/1998/INF/1], the Secretary-General stated that world output was estimated to have grown more than 3 per cent in 1997 and a further year of 3 per cent growth was forecast for 1998. The financial turmoil emanating from the emerging market economies of Asia was expected to cause an inflection in world economic growth, with the slowdown in the more seriously affected countries and its impact on their major trading partners being partially offset by strengthened momentum elsewhere. The continued dynamism of world trade would be crucial to a successful recovery from current setbacks. Among developed economies, major elements in 1997 were the relative weakness of the Japanese and strength of the United States economies. The efforts of European Union members to meet the macroeconomic criteria for entry into the Economic and Monetary Union (EMU), particularly regarding budget deficits, had constrained recovery and were an added burden on unemployment. Moreover, the uncertainty surrounding the start of EMU had caused some hesitation with regard to investment. In the developing world, aggregate growth of GDP was almost 6 per cent in 1997, but depended less than previously on the dynamism of East and South Asia. The transition economies as a group had begun to grow, although growth prospects in many of them, particularly the Russian Federation, were still fragile.

The Trade and Development Report, 1997 [Sales No. E.97.II.D.8] observed that the big story of the world economy since the early 1980s had been the unleashing of market forces. The deregulation of domestic markets and their opening up to international competition had become universal features. Many commentators were optimistic about prospects for faster growth and for convergence of incomes and living standards that greater global competition should bring. On the other hand, the world economy since the early 1980s had been characterized by rising inequality and slow growth. Income gaps between North and South had continued to widen. In 1965, the average per capita income of the Group of Seven major industrialized countries was 20 times that of the world's poorest seven countries; by 1995, it was 39 times as much. (See also PART THREE, Chapter IV.)

Human Development Report 1997

The challenge of eradicating poverty was reviewed from a human development perspective in the Human Development Report 1997, prepared by UNDP. The Report focused not just on poverty of income but on poverty as a denial of choice and opportunities to live a tolerable life. It offered ideas for eradicating absolute poverty with an agenda that included but went beyond income and encompassed gender, pro-poor growth, globalization and governance.

Progress in reducing poverty during the twentieth century had been remarkable, said the Report, citing the fact that key indicators of human development had advanced strongly over the past few decades. Since 1960, child death rates in developing countries had been more than halved, malnutrition rates had declined by almost a third, the proportion of children out of primary school had fallen from more than half to less than a quarter, and the share of rural families without access to safe water had fallen from nine tenths to about a quarter.

However, advances had been uneven and marred by setbacks. More than a quarter of the developing world's people still lived in poverty; about a third—1.3 billion people—lived on incomes of less than $1 a day. South Asia had the most people affected by human poverty and the largest number of people in income poverty: 515 million. Sub-Saharan Africa had the highest proportion of people—and the fastest growth—in human poverty. Some 220 million people in the region were income-poor. In Latin America and the Caribbean, income poverty was more pervasive than human poverty—affecting 110 million people—and it continued to grow. Eastern Europe and the CIS countries had seen the greatest deterioration in the preceding decade, with income poverty having spread from a small part of their population to about a third—120 million people living below a poverty line of $4 a day. In industrial countries also, more than 100 million people lived below the income poverty line, set at half the individual median income, and 37 million were jobless. Within those broad groups, some people suffered more than others—particularly children, women and the aged.

The latest data showed that the human development index had declined in the preceding year in 30 countries, more than in any year since the Report was first issued in 1990. Between 1987 and 1993, the number of people with incomes of less than $1 a day increased by almost 100 million, to 1.3 billion, and the number appeared to be still growing in every region except South-East Asia and the Pacific.

The actions required to eradicate poverty in the twenty-first century were to: empower individuals, households and communities to gain greater control over their lives and resources; strengthen gender equality to empower women and release their vast underused energy and creativity; accelerate pro-poor growth in the 100 or so developing and transition countries, the economies of which were growing only slowly, stagnating or declining; improve the management of globalization, nationally and internationally, to open opportunities, not close them; ensure an active State, committed to eradicating poverty and providing an enabling environment for broad political participation and partnerships for pro-poor growth; and take special actions for special situations to support progress in the poorest and weakest countries and to prevent reversals.

The Report ranked 175 countries in its human development index, which measured human development by combining indicators of life expectancy, educational attainment, and income, among other factors.

Development planning and public administration

Development planning

The Committee for Development Planning (CDP), which held its thirty-first session in New York from 5 to 9 May [E/1997/35], focused its main substantive discussion on globalization in the 1990s and development policy challenges. In its main findings and recommendations, CDP covered the deepening globalization process; new opportunities offered by global integration; developing countries as outsiders to the globalization process; financial volatility; policy constraints and convergence; regional cooperation and expanding markets; appropriate sequencing of liberalization; expanding domestic savings and public resources; maintaining and improving social services; social protection and poverty reduction; governance and participation; environmental protection; access to developed-country markets; official development assistance and debt relief; international codes of conduct for corporate transnational activities and for Governments; the need for a world financial organization; and the need for an economic and social security council, parallel to the Security Council.

The Committee also carried out its triennial review of the list of least developed countries (LDCs) (see below) and reviewed its working methods. It recommended that its name should be changed to the Committee for Development Policy, which would better reflect its main functions. For its 1997-1998 work programme, CDP decided to consider the questions of intergenerational transfers and social security, international migration and employment, and criteria and methods for the designation of LDCs.

Preparations for CDP's 1997 session had been carried out by three working groups that dealt with: re-examining stabilization, structural adjustment and economic reform in the context of globalization (New York, 18-20 December 1996); a general review of the list of LDCs (New York, 22-24 January 1997); and rethinking the impact of globalization on development (New York, 24-25 February 1997).

In preparation for the 1998 session, two of four working groups met in 1997: on international migration and employment (New York, 29-31 October) and on the criteria and methodology for identifying LDCs (New York, 17-19 December).

By decision 1997/308 of 25 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of the CDP report on its thirty-first session. Both the Council and the General Assembly took action with regard to CDP recommendations on LDCs (see below).

Public administration

In accordance with Economic and Social Council decision 1997/207 of 7 February, the Thirteenth Meeting of Experts on the United Nations Programme in Public Administration and Finance was held in New York from 27 May to 4 June [E/1997/86]. It was the first Meeting following the resumed fiftieth session of the General Assembly, several meetings of which were held in 1996 expressly to explore the relationship of public administration to development and the role of the United Nations in that regard [YUN 1996, p. 750].

The overall theme of the Meeting was "Redesigning the State for socio-economic development and change". Within that theme, five specific issues were identified as particularly relevant to redesigning the State: promoting an enabling environment for sound governance; enhancing the professionalism, ethical values and image of the public service; rethinking the State for social development; creating an enabling environment for private sector development; and strengthening governmental capacity in the mobilization, management and accountability of financial resources.

The Meeting also reviewed the UN programme in public administration and finance; discussed implementation of the information clearing house and coordination with other UN bodies and specialized agencies; and heard presentations by the World Bank and UNDP on their programmes in governance, public administration and finance.

The Meeting stressed the need for the United Nations to continue discussions at the policy-making level on issues relating to governance, the role of the State, improvement of the public sector, public financial management and the strengthening of the State as facilitator to the private sector and civil society, since those were at the core of the development agenda of most countries. Most of the Meeting's recommendations stressed the need for the UN Secretariat to be active in fostering an exchange of information and experience in those areas, with particular emphasis on South-South cooperation. The Meeting also underlined the need to promote global and collective approaches to those themes, as well as the particular role that the United Nations should fulfil in translating them into country-specific programmes. It strongly approved the Secretariat's establishment of an information clearing house aimed at making available electronically information, good practices and advice to developing countries and economies in transition. The Meeting requested the Secretariat to accelerate its work in implementing resolution 50/225 [YUN 1996, p. 750], adopted at the resumed session of the Assembly, and recommended that the Fourteenth Meeting be convened in May 1998 to review progress made in implementing that resolution.

By decision 1997/222 of 18 July, the Economic and Social Council endorsed the Thirteenth Meeting's recommendation with regard to its Fourteenth Meeting and, by decision 1997/308 of 25 July, the Council took note of the Secretary-General's report on the Thirteenth Meeting [E/1997/86].

Developing countries

Least developed countries

Review of LDC list

In response to General Assembly resolution 46/206 [YUN 1991, p. 356], the Committee for Development Planning (CDP), at its May 1997 session [E/1997/35], carried out its triennial review of the list of low-income countries in order to identify which should qualify for inclusion in, or should be graduated from, the list of the least developed countries (LDCs). The review was conducted applying the indicators adopted by CDP in 1991 [YUN 1991, p. 355]: gross domestic product (GDP) per capita, three-year average for 1993-1995, in United States dollars at the official exchange rate; augmented physical quality-of-life index (APQLI), incorporating life expectancy, per capita calorie consumption, primary and secondary school enrolment and adult literacy; economic diversification index, incorporating share of manufacturing in GDP, share of labour in industry, per capita electricity consumption and export concentration ratio; and population.

The 48 countries on the list of LDCs considered by CDP were: Afghanistan, Angola, Bangladesh, Benin, Bhutan, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cambodia, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Comoros, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Gambia, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Kiribati, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Liberia, Madagascar, Malawi, Maldives, Mali, Mauritania, Mozambique, Myanmar, Nepal, Niger, Rwanda, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sudan, Togo, Tuvalu, Uganda, United Republic of Tanzania, Vanuatu, Yemen, Zambia. CDP established that 43 did not meet the criteria for graduation and recommended that they be retained on the list. Five countries met the criteria: Cape Verde, Maldives, Myanmar, Samoa and Vanuatu. One country not on the list—Cameroon—met the criteria for inclusion as a result of a large decline in GDP, but CDP noted that the decline was the result of a 50 per cent devaluation of its currency in 1994 and did not reflect a real proportionate decline in production; it recommended that Cameroon not be added to the list.

CDP recommended that Vanuatu be graduated from the list with immediate effect, and that Cape Verde, Maldives and Samoa be graduated at the time of the next review in 2000, provided that they continued to meeting the criteria at that time.

While Myanmar appeared to meet the criteria with respect to GDP per capita and APQLI, CDP felt that the data for GDP per capita did not accurately reflect the economic situation of the country, due to an official exchange rate that did not reflect the value of the currency. It therefore recommended that Myanmar be retained on the list and that efforts be made to obtain improved data for the 2000 review.

The Committee also reviewed the criteria for the designation of LDCs; it concluded that improvements adopted in 1991 and refined in 1994 remained valid. One proposed change—namely, the introduction of per capita commercial energy consumption, instead of per capita electricity consumption—appeared to improve the criteria; the Committee decided to further examine that proposal.

By decision 1997/223 of 18 July, the Economic and Social Council endorsed CDP's recommendations that Vanuatu be graduated from the list of LDCs with immediate effect, and that Cape Verde, Maldives and Samoa be graduated at the time of the 2000 review, provided that they continued to meet the graduation criteria.

Communication. On 29 September [A/C.2/52/5], the Economic and Social Council President transmitted to the General Assembly President a 22 August letter from the Prime Minister of Vanuatu, who noted with concern CDP's proposal to graduate Vanuatu from the list of LDCs. Vanuatu urged the Council to defer consideration of Vanuatu as an LDC until the year 2000, citing serious doubts about the quality of the statistics used for the graduation exercise. In addition, Vanuatu had had no technical input into the computation exercise, nor had it been invited to make observations on the qualitative judgements that had to be made in the face of inadequate statistics and the set of indicators employed.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee [A/52/625], adopted resolution 52/210 without vote [agenda item 12].

Report of the Committee for Development Planning

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 46/206 of 20 December 1991 on the report of the Committee for Development Planning and criteria for identifying the least developed countries,

Taking note of subparagraph (a) of Economic and Social Council decision 1997/223 of 18 July 1997, by which the Council endorsed the recommendation of the Committee for Development Planning that Vanuatu be graduated from the list of least developed countries,

Taking note also of subparagraph (b) of Economic and Social Council decision 1997/223,

Taking note further of the content of the letter of the Prime Minister of Vanuatu advancing reasons to support his position that the review of the status of Vanuatu should be deferred until the year 2000,

Taking note of the decision of the Committee for Development Planning, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 51/183 of 16 December 1996, to examine, as part of its work programme for 1997-1998, the report to be prepared by the Secretary-General on the vulnerability index for small island developing States and to consider the usefulness of such an index as a criterion for the designation of least developed countries in its examination of issues related to improvements to the criteria and methodology for the designation of least developed countries,

Taking into account statements made by several delegations during the debate on the report of the Economic and Social Council at the meetings of the Second Committee on 11 November 1997,

1. Reaffirms paragraphs 4 and 5 of its resolution 46/206 relating to transitional arrangements;

2. Welcomes the convening in New York from 17 to 19 December 1997 of Working Group III of the Committee for Development Planning to review the results of the technical work and the outcome of the expert group meeting concerning the vulnerability index, as requested by the General Assembly in its resolution 51/183;

3. Decides to postpone its consideration of subparagraph (a) of Economic and Social Council decision 1997/223, in consideration of the views and recommendations to be submitted by the Committee for Development Planning to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session, through the Economic and Social Council, in accordance with paragraphs 9 and 10 of resolution 51/183, on the usefulness of the vulnerability index as a criterion for the designation of least developed countries and without prejudice to the full development and examination of the vulnerability index and its potential application in assessing the graduation of Vanuatu, a small island developing State, from the list of least developed countries, and to take a decision accordingly.

By decision 52/448 of 18 December, the Assembly decided that Cape Verde, Maldives and Samoa should graduate from the list of LDCs at the time of the next review, in 2000, provided that they continued to meet the criteria for graduation.

Programme of Action for the 1990s

Report of Secretary-General. In response to General Assembly resolution 50/103 [YUN 1995, p. 864], the Secretary-General submitted an August 1997 report [A/52/279] on the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, which was adopted by the Second (1990) United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries (Paris Conference) [YUN 1990, p. 369] and endorsed by the Assembly in resolution 45/206 [YUN 1990, p. 373]. A mid-term review of the implementation of the Programme of Action had been carried out in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 863].

The report surveyed the recent economic performance and policy developments in LDCs, noting that many of those countries had recently undertaken wide-ranging reform policies and measures, often under internationally agreed frameworks, for structural and sectoral adjustment. Preliminary estimates indicated that the growth rates of GDP in the LDCs for which data were available averaged 4.7 per cent in 1996. The growth rate of the African LDCs in 1996 was estimated at 4.6 per cent, which implied that per capita output rose for the second consecutive year, after a very long period in which levels had declined. The average growth rate of the Asian LDCs rose slightly in 1996 but remained significantly lower than the regional average for developing countries. Among the Pacific and Indian Ocean island LDCs, there was robust growth of over 6 per cent in Maldives and 4 per cent in Solomon Islands in 1996. Haiti, the only LDC in the Western hemisphere, experienced an economic slowdown in 1996, with growth in GDP falling to 2 per cent from 4 per cent in the previous year.

While the overall economic performance in LDCs had improved, poverty remained pervasive and the majority of the population in those countries suffered from reduced caloric intakes, increased mortality and morbidity, the re-emergence and spread of disease, and lower school enrolment.

The report set out the overall arrangements made for implementation, follow-up, monitoring and review of the Programme of Action, and described measures taken by UN organs, organizations and bodies. It also presented information on international support measures in the areas of external resources, debt and trade.

The report concluded that while the recent economic performance of a number of LDCs was encouraging, recovery was still fragile and the medium- and long-term challenges facing those countries were complex. The 1995 mid-term review of the implementation of the Programme of Action had identified the following as primary challenges facing LDCs in the second half of the 1990s: to reverse the decline in economic and social conditions; to promote sustainable economic growth, development and structural transformation; and to avoid further marginalization in the international economy.

To succeed in coping with those challenges, LDCs would need to further strengthen their national development efforts. Economic reforms had to be sustained and further trade liberalization measures effected; policies should address supply-side constraints, and agricultural efficiency be improved. For a number of LDCs, an early end to political conflicts and civil strife and restoration of a viable system of government was prerequisite to any development programmes.

Challenges facing LDCs were beyond their capacity to overcome on their own. International support measures—financial, technical and commercial—were of critical importance in continuing to influence their future growth and development.

UNCTAD action. At its October 1997 session, the Trade and Development Board of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) reviewed progress in implementing the Programme of Action for LDCs for the 1990s in the area of policy reforms in agriculture and their implications for development.

The Board had before it The Least Developed Countries, 1997 Report [Sales No. E.97.II.D.6], which examined economic developments in LDCs during 1996 and discussed prospects for 1997. A section of the Report focused on the agricultural sector in LDCs, reviewing the impact of their agricultural policy reforms, major constraints on sustainable agricultural development, and likely effects of changes in the international trading system on LDCs' agriculture. Finally, the Report considered the circumstances of a number of LDCs whose performance with regard to certain economic and social indicators over the preceding decade had been significantly low.

Also before the Board was the Declaration adopted by the Seventh Annual Ministerial Meeting of LDCs (New York, 30 September) [TD/B/44/17].

In agreed conclusions of 22 October [A/52/15 (agreed conclusions 44I(XLIV))], the Board expressed concern at the continued decline in the overall share of official development assistance (ODA) to LDCs and called for further efforts to reverse that trend, with a view to fulfilling the ODA targets and commitments in the Programme of Action. It emphasized that the debt burden of LDCs, particularly those in Africa, remained exceptionally high and was a serious constraint on their development.

The Board encouraged LDCs to accelerate policy reform efforts in the agricultural sector, observing that, in the short to medium term, improved agricultural performance offered many LDCs the most effective path to raise economic growth rates, expand and diversify exports, ensure food security and reduce poverty. Reforms already implemented in many LDCs had improved the environment for agriculture, but the small-scale farmers who dominated the sector in most countries still faced serious constraints with respect to raising productivity and output. The Board stressed that the problems facing those producers required sectoral and institutional policy reforms, such as building effective research and development institutions and agricultural extension services, improving rural infrastructure and credit, and developing more efficient markets in rural areas. Those efforts would continue to be supplemented by international support measures.

The Board stressed that improved market access was a key element to improving the performance of the agricultural sector in LDCs, although it noted that some existing market opportunities had not been fully utilized. It emphasized the importance of strengthening the capacity of LDCs to export, including through vertical and horizontal diversification, and of appropriate sequencing of agricultural liberalization measures.

In a 22 October recommendation [A/52/15 (rec. 442(XLIV))], the Board requested the General Assembly to consider convening a third UN conference on LDCs, which would: assess the results of the Programme of Action during the 1990s at the country level; review implementation of international support measures, particularly in the areas of ODA, debt, investment and trade; and consider the adoption of national and international policies and measures for sustainable development of LDCs and their progressive integration into the world economy. The conference would take place at the end of the decade and an intergovernmental preparatory committee would prepare for it.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee [A/52/628/Add.2], adopted resolution 52/187 without vote [agenda item 97 (b)].

Implementation of the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 45/206 of 21 December 1990, in which it endorsed the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, and its resolution 48/171 of 21 December 1993, in which it decided to convene a high-level intergovernmental meeting to conduct a mid-term global review,

Recalling also its resolution 50/103 of 20 December 1995, in which it recalled that at the end of the decade, a global review and appraisal of the implementation of the Programme of Action would be carried out, in accordance with paragraph 140 of the Programme of Action and paragraph 7 (c) of its resolution 45/206,

Taking note of The Least Developed Countries, 1997 Report, prepared by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, and the report of the Secretary-General on implementation of the Programme of Action, which highlights the main developmental difficulties the least developed countries continue to face,

Recognizing that the significant policy reform efforts undertaken by the least developed countries, which in many cases have been wide-ranging and difficult to implement, should be pursued further and that structural adjustment poses real challenges and resource issues for those countries, and, in this context, encouraging the international community to support these further reform efforts by the least developed countries, including helping to minimize any social cost of adjustments,

Noting with concern the reduced flow of development resources to the least developed countries, the resulting need to accord them priority in the allocation of concessional resources and their continued marginalization in world trade, as well as the fact that many least developed countries face serious debt problems and more than half are considered debt-distressed,

Taking note of the outcome of the Trade and Development Board at its forty-fourth session on the item relating to the annual review of progress in the implementation of the Programme of Action, including its agreed conclusions and its recommendation to the General Assembly to consider at its fifty-second session the convening of a third United Nations conference on the least developed countries, its preparatory process, and the designation of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development as the focal point for the preparation of the conference,

1. Decides:

(a) To convene the Third United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries at a high level in the year 2001. The mandate of the Conference will be the following:

(i) To assess the results of the Programme of Action during the 1990s at the country level;

(ii) To review the implementation of international support measures, particularly in the areas of official development assistance, debt, investment and trade;

(iii) To consider the formulation and adoption of appropriate national and international policies and measures for sustainable development of the least developed countries and their progressive integration into the world economy;

(b) To convene an intergovernmental preparatory committee in due time to prepare for the Conference. That meeting would be preceded by three expert-level preparatory meetings, two in Africa, one of which would include the Americas, and one in Asia and the Pacific. These preparatory activities should be carried out within the budget level proposed by the Secretary-General for the biennium 1998-1999;

2. Also decides that the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development will be the focal point for the preparation of the Conference;

3. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to include in future issues of the annual report on the least developed countries substantive contributions to the Conference and its preparatory process;

4. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session the sub-item entitled "Implementation of the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s" and to consider, inter alia, the date, duration and venue of the Conference, its preparatory process and the funding for participation of representatives from each least developed country, both at the preparatory committee meeting and at the Conference itself, from extrabudgetary resources;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to it at its fifty-third session a report on issues relevant to this item.

Island developing countries

Implementation of the Programme of Action

Commission on Sustainable Development. At its April 1997 session (see above), the Commission on Sustainable Development had before it a report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States [E/CN.17/1997/14], which was adopted in 1994 by the Global Conference on the subject [YUN 1994, p. 783].

The report described progress, or lack thereof, in addressing the particular sustainable development concerns of small island developing States (SIDS) since the Global Conference. It identified areas calling for priority attention, considering the state of implementation in a number of key priority areas reviewed by the Commission in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 753]. Those areas were coastal area management, tourism, energy resources, air transport, marine transport, telecommunication development, management of natural and environmental disasters, resource flows and international trade.

On 25 April, the Commission adopted a resolution [E/1997/29 (res. 5/1)] in which it recognized the need to review outstanding chapters of the Programme of Action prior to its full review in 1999. It urged the task managers within the Inter-Agency Committee on Sustainable Development and the small island developing states unit of the Secretariat to prepare reports on outstanding chapters of the Programme of Action for its Ad Hoc Inter-sessional Working Group in 1998. The Commission decided that it would undertake a review of all outstanding chapters in 1998, and it recommended that the General Assembly convene a two-day special session, immediately preceding its fifty-fourth (1999) session, for an in-depth assessment and appraisal of the implementation of the Programme of Action. It further decided to carry out the full review of the Programme of Action at its seventh (1999) session. That review would be the preparatory process for the Assembly's special session that same year.

Report of Secretary-General. In response to General Assembly resolution 51/183 [YUN 1996, p. 756], the Secretary-General in September 1997 [A/52/319] reported on the implementation of the outcome of the 1994 Global Conference on the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States. Work had begun on the development of a vulnerability index for SIDS, a report on which would be submitted to the Assembly in 1998, through the Economic and Social Council, he said.

Regarding the mobilization of resources to facilitate the implementation of the Programme of Action, the Secretariat would hold a meeting of donors and representatives of SIDS. The latter had been requested to prepare portfolios of documents on priority projects in the areas covered by the Programme of Action, which could not be implemented without external support.

The United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) was coordinating requests from SIDS for technical assistance in preparing project documents, and the meeting would be scheduled depending on progress made in preparing the portfolios.

The report described UNDP's technical assistance programme for SIDS and other work under way to assist SIDS—which were particularly vulnerable to natural disasters—in the context of the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction (the 1990s), as well as energy-related projects in SIDS that were being funded by the Global Environment Facility.

With regard to the future programme of work, the report drew attention to the Commission on Sustainable Development's proposal to hold a special session of the Assembly on issues related to SIDS (see above).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee [A/52/629/Add.6], adopted resolution 52/202 without vote [agenda item 98 (f)].

Implementation of the outcome of the Global Conference on the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 50/116 of 20 December 1995 and 51/183 of 16 December 1996 on and related to the implementation of the outcome of the Global Conference on the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States, held at Bridgetown, Barbados, from 25 April to 6 May 1994,

Convinced that small island developing States are particularly vulnerable to the potential effects of global climate change and sea-level rise, and that tropical storms, the El Niño phenomenon and drought have resulted in the inundation of some islands and have caused serious loss of resources in their exclusive economic zones, economic infrastructure, human settlements and culture,

Reaffirming the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21 adopted by the General Assembly at its nineteenth special session held from 23 to 28 June 1997 and resolution 5/1 adopted by the Commission on Sustainable Development at its fifth session, held from 7 to 25 April 1997,

Reaffirming also the decision taken at its nineteenth special session to convene a two-day special session, preceding its fifty-fourth session, for the review and appraisal of the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General, and welcomes in particular the action that has been taken by the Department of Economic and Social Affairs of the Secretariat to support the system-wide implementation of the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States;

2. Welcomes the action of the Secretary-General to restructure the Small Island Developing States Unit within the above-mentioned Department in accordance with General Assembly resolutions 49/122 of 19 December 1994 and 51/183 and his proposal to suitably strengthen the Unit;

3. Appreciates the support that has been provided by the Commission on Sustainable Development in following up the implementation of the Programme of Action in accordance with resolution 49/122 and the Programme of Action itself, and welcomes the multi-year programme of work for the Commission on Sustainable Development, 1998-2002, as adopted by the Assembly at its nineteenth special session, pursuant to which the Commission will, inter alia, review the outstanding chapters of the Programme of Action;

4. Decides to invite States members of the specialized agencies that are not members of the United Nations to participate in the two-day special session for the review and appraisal of the Barbados Programme of Action, and in the preparatory meetings therefor in the capacity of observers;

5. Welcomes the progress made by the United Nations Development Programme in implementing resolution 49/122, invites the Programme to continue to implement all the provisions of the technical assistance programme, known as SIDSTAP, and the small island developing States information network, known as SIDS-NET, and welcomes the regional and subregional efforts by small island developing States that have enabled the commencement of the implementation of both programmes;

6. Also welcomes the actions taken by the regional commissions and organizations in support of activities related to the outcome of the Global Conference on the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development continues to have the strengthened capacity to carry out, in accordance with its mandate, the research and analysis necessary to complement the work of the Department of Economic and Social Affairs with respect to the implementation of the Programme of Action, and in that context notes with satisfaction the strengthening of the Office of the Special Coordinator for Least Developed, Landlocked and Island Developing Countries as reflected in the above-mentioned report of the Secretary-General, following the recent restructuring of the Conference;

8. Calls upon Governments, as well as the organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, other intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations, to continue to take the necessary actions for effective follow-up to the Barbados Programme of Action, including action to ensure the provision of the means of implementation under chapter XV thereof, the commitments and recommendations that were made at the Global Conference, and the modalities that it adopted for the full and comprehensive review of the Programme of Action;

9. Takes note with appreciation of modalities that have been instituted by the Department of Economic and Social Affairs, in collaboration with the United Nations Development Programme, to mobilize resources, including technical capacity for small island developing States, with respect to the further implementation of the Programme of Action, and in that regard requests the Secretary-General to implement fully the relevant provisions of General Assembly resolutions 51/183 and 51/185 of 16 December 1996;

10. Calls upon the bilateral and multilateral donor communities to mobilize adequate financial resources to supplement efforts by small island developing States, at both the national and the regional levels, in the implementation of the programmes referred to in paragraph 5 above, including support to existing regional and subregional institutions;

11. Welcomes the action taken by the Department of Economic and Social Affairs, in collaboration with the United Nations Development Programme, as regards a meeting between representatives of small island developing States and prospective bilateral and multilateral donors, and stresses the need for further collaboration among small island developing States and agencies, funds and programmes of the United Nations system to facilitate preparation of project portfolios;

12. Requests the secretariat of the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction, in cooperation with the international community, to enhance efforts in respect of coordination activities within the United Nations system and to strengthen national and regional partnerships for a disaster reduction strategy for the twenty-first century, including requirements for effective disaster reduction and prevention capacities and measures for small island developing States in line with resolution 51/183;

13. Urges the international donor community, including international financial institutions, to support adaptation efforts by small island developing States to cope with the threatening sea-level rise that may be experienced as a consequence of the impact of greenhouse gas emissions into the atmosphere;

14. Welcomes the activities undertaken by the Global Environment Facility, in accordance with its operational strategy, and invites it, in accordance with relevant provisions of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change and the Convention on Biological Diversity, and the decisions of its Council, to support further the objectives of the Barbados Programme of Action;

15. Notes the progress in the development and compilation of a vulnerability index for small island developing States, in collaboration with the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and other relevant organizations, and invites all relevant actors to continue to support the Department of Economic and Social Affairs on further work in refining the index, as necessary;

16. Invites the Commission on Sustainable Development, the United Nations Environment Programme and other relevant United Nations bodies, funds and programmes, and the World Tourism Organization, to develop urgently strategies with existing national, regional and subregional tourism organizations in small island developing States to further facilitate sustainable tourism development as an essential element towards an action-oriented international programme of work on sustainable tourism;

17. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session, under the item entitled "Environment and sustainable development", the sub-item entitled "Implementation of the outcome of the Global Conference on the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States";

18. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session a report on actions taken to implement the present resolution and paragraph 10 of Assembly resolution 50/116 of 20 December 1995.

Landlocked developing countries

In response to General Assembly resolution 50/97 [YUN 1995, 876], the Secretary-General, by a September 1997 note [A/52/329], transmitted an UNCTAD secretariat progress report on specific actions related to the particular needs and problems of landlocked developing countries.

The report presented the conclusions and recommendations of the Third Meeting of Governmental Experts from Landlocked and Transit Developing Countries and Representatives of Donor Countries and Financial and Development Institutions (New York, 18-20 June 1997) [TD/B/44/7]. It also described UNCTAD's programme of work with regard to developing transit systems in the landlocked and transit developing countries, including the organization of meetings between the two groups of countries and of an expert meeting on the use of information technologies to make transit arrangements more effective.

The report also contained information provided by several landlocked and transit developing countries, other countries—both developed and developing—as well as international and intergovernmental organizations, on activities related to improving transit transport systems.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee [A/52/626/Add.2], adopted resolution 52/183 without vote [agenda item 95 (b)].

Specific actions related to the particular needs and problems of landlocked developing countries

The General Assembly,

Recalling the provisions of its resolutions 44/214 of 22 December 1989, 46/212 of 20 December 1991, 48/169 of 21 December 1993 and 50/97 of 20 December 1995, as well as the relevant parts of the Agenda for Development,

Recognizing that the lack of territorial access to the sea, aggravated by remoteness and isolation from world markets, and prohibitive transit costs and risks impose serious constraints on the overall socio-economic development efforts of the landlocked developing countries,

Recognizing also that sixteen of the landlocked developing countries are also classified by the United Nations as least developed countries and that their geographical situation is an added constraint on their overall ability to cope with the challenges of development,

Recognizing further that most transit countries are themselves developing countries facing serious economic problems, including the lack of adequate infrastructure in the transport sector,

Recalling that measures to deal with the transit problems of landlocked developing countries require closer and even more effective cooperation and collaboration between those countries and their transit neighbours,

Noting the importance of strengthening, and in this respect recognizing the important role played by, bilateral cooperative arrangements and subregional cooperation and integration, as well as the activities of the regional commissions, in alleviating the transit problems of the landlocked developing countries and improving the transit transport systems in landlocked and transit developing countries,

Noting also the importance of strengthening the existing international support measures with a view to addressing further the problems of landlocked developing countries,

Noting further the holding of the third Meeting of Governmental Experts from Landlocked and Transit Developing Countries and Representatives of Donor Countries and Financial and Development Institutions, in New York from 18 to 20 June 1997,

Welcoming the holding of the first North-East Asia Subregional Consultative Meeting of Landlocked and Transit Countries on transit transport cooperation, held at Ulaanbaatar from 20 to 22 May 1997 under the auspices of the United Nations Development Programme Special Unit for Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development,

1. Welcomes the note by the Secretary-General transmitting the progress report of the secretariat of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development on specific actions related to the particular needs and problems of landlocked developing countries;

2. Reaffirms the right of access of landlocked developing countries to and from the sea and freedom of transit through the territory of transit States by all means of transport, in accordance with international law;

3. Also reaffirms that transit developing countries, in the exercise of their full sovereignty over their territory, have the right to take all measures necessary to ensure that the rights and facilities provided for landlocked developing countries in no way infringe upon their legitimate interests;

4. Calls upon landlocked developing countries and their transit neighbours to implement measures to strengthen further their cooperative and collaborative efforts, including bilateral cooperation, in dealing with transit issues, inter alia, by improving the transit transport infrastructure facilities and bilateral and subregional agreements to govern transit transport operations, developing joint ventures in the area of transit transport and strengthening institutions and human resources dealing with transit transport, and, in this respect, notes that South-South cooperation also plays an important role in this field;

5. Appeals once again to all States, international organizations and financial institutions to implement, as a matter of urgency and priority, the specific actions related to the particular needs and problems of landlocked developing countries agreed upon in the resolutions and declarations adopted by the General Assembly and the outcomes of recent major United Nations conferences relevant to landlocked developing countries, as well as in the Global Framework for Transit Transport Cooperation between Landlocked and Transit Developing Countries and the Donor Community;

6. Takes note of the agreed conclusions and recommendations and proposals for future action adopted at the third Meeting of Governmental Experts from Landlocked and Transit Developing Countries and Representatives of Donor Countries and Financial and Development Institutions;

7. Welcomes the Ulaanbaatar Memorandum of Understanding adopted at the first North-East Asia Subregional Consultative Meeting of Landlocked and Transit Countries on transit transport cooperation;

8. Also welcomes the continuing efforts being made by the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, in collaboration with donor countries and institutions, in particular the United Nations Development Programme, the regional commissions and relevant subregional institutions, to organize specific consultative groups, as appropriate, when requested by the landlocked and transit developing countries concerned, to identify priority areas for action at the national and subregional levels and draw up action programmes;

9. Emphasizes that assistance for the improvement of transit transport facilities and services should be integrated into the overall economic development strategies of the landlocked and transit developing countries and that donor assistance should consequently take into account the requirements for the long-term restructuring of the economies of the landlocked developing countries;

10. Invites donor countries, the United Nations Development Programme and multilateral financial institutions to provide landlocked and transit developing countries with appropriate financial and technical assistance in the form of grants or concessional loans for the construction, maintenance and improvement of their transport, storage and other transit-related facilities, including alternative routes and improved communications, and to promote subregional, regional and interregional projects and programmes;

11. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations to convene in 1999, within the overall level of resources for the biennium 1998-1999, another meeting of governmental experts from landlocked and transit developing countries and representatives of donor countries and financial and development institutions, including relevant regional and subregional economic organizations and commissions, to review progress in the development of transit systems, including sectoral aspects as well as transit transportation costs, with a view to exploring the possibility of formulating necessary action-oriented measures;

12. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to seek voluntary contributions to ensure the participation of representatives of landlocked and transit developing countries, donor countries and financial and development institutions at the meeting referred to in paragraph 11 above;

13. Notes with appreciation the contribution of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to formulating international measures to deal with the special problems of the landlocked developing countries, and urges the Conference, inter alia, to keep under constant review the evolution of transit transport infrastructure facilities, institutions and services, monitor the implementation of agreed measures, including by means of a case study as necessary, collaborate in all relevant initiatives, including those of the private sector and non-governmental organizations, and serve as a focal point for cross-regional issues of landlocked developing countries;

14. Invites the Secretary-General of the United Nations, in consultation with the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, to take appropriate measures for the effective implementation of the activities called for in the present resolution, and to staff and equip adequately, in accordance with the outcome of the ninth session of the Conference, the Office of the Special Coordinator for Least Developed, Landlocked and Island Developing Countries of the Conference so as to allow it to implement effectively its mandate to continue to support the landlocked developing countries;

15. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations, together with the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, to prepare a report on the implementation of the present resolution and submit it to the Trade and Development Board and to the General Assembly at its fifty-fourth session.

Chapter II

Operational activities for development

The total income of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP)—the central United Nations funding body for technical assistance to developing countries—amounted to $2,323 million in 1997, down by 1 per cent from $2,349 million in 1996. However, contributions to UNDP regular resources fell by 10.3 per cent to $760.9 million, largely due to the reduced level of pledges for 1997 and the strength of the United States dollar. Total 1997 expenditures under regular resources rose to $961 million from $847 million in 1996.

UNDP continued to focus on assisting countries to develop the capacity to achieve sustainable human development, giving overriding priority to poverty eradication. To that end, its work lay in empowerment of the poor, including helping to provide them with access to productive assets such as credit, skills, legal rights, job opportunities, natural resources and links to national and international markets. Another priority area was strengthening good governance, by building capacities of Governments and civil society for policy formulation and programme implementation, and promoting democratization and market-oriented transitions. UNDP also remained concerned with building a more efficient and effective organization through internal reform.

The United Nations Office for Project Services remained fully self-financing, with no assessed budget funding. By 1997, it managed more than 2,000 projects in 146 countries, with project budgets in excess of $1 billion.

In 1997, the United Nations Volunteers (UNV) had the highest number of serving UNVs (3,620 as compared to 3,242 in 1996) and the most diversified programme in its 27-year history. It participated in preparations for the International Year of Volunteers, 2001, which was proclaimed by the General Assembly in December.

Activities supported by the United Nations Capital Development Fund focused on local governance, decentralization, participation and microfinancing, among others. The Fund delivered $38.2 million in projects in 1997, a drop of 9 per cent.

Having considered the operational activities for development of the UN system, particularly the follow-up to policy recommendations made by the Assembly in 1996, the Economic and Social Council in July reaffirmed the need for funding operational activities on a predictable, continuous and assured basis. The objective of capacity-building and its sustainability, the Council stated, should be an essential part of UN system operational activities at the country level, and those activities should be situation specific and consistent with national development plans. In December, the Assembly, also noting the need for increased resources for operational activities for development, called for improvement in the effectiveness, efficiency and impact of the UN system in delivering development assistance.

The High-level Committee on the Review of Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries (CTCDC), in May, reviewed progress made in implementing the 1978 Buenos Aires Plan of Action for Promoting and Implementing TCDC. It stated that South-South cooperation should not be viewed as a substitute for but rather as a complement to North-South cooperation, and emphasized the need to promote triangular approaches to facilitate South-South programmes and projects. In December, the Assembly urged bodies of the UN system and other intergovernmental organizations to mainstream the implementation of TCDC modalities by considering them in the design and implementation of operational activities.

System-wide activities

Operational activities segment of the Economic and Social Council

The Economic and Social Council, at its 1997 substantive session (Geneva, June/July) [A/52/3/Rev.1], considered the question of operational activities of the United Nations for international development cooperation. Among the documents before the Council was a June report [E/1997/65 & Add.1-4 & Add.4/Corr.1] of the Secretary-General on progress in the implementation of General Assembly resolution 50/120 [YUN 1995, p. 883], which dealt with the triennial policy review of operational activities for development of the UN system. The report focused on capacity-building, field-level and regional-level coordination, and resources—the topics chosen by the Council in resolution 1996/42 [YUN 1996, p. 761] for consideration in 1997. In addressing those topics, the report provided an assessment and recommendations on related subjects within the scope of the resident coordinator system (country strategy note (CSN), programme approach, national execution, harmonization of cycles, common premises and shared services, and simplification and harmonization of procedures, among others). The addenda to the report (see below) dealt with trends in core and non-core resources, field- and regional-level coordination, capacity-building, and 1995 statistical data on operational activities for development.

The Secretary-General emphasized that the operational activities for development undertaken through the UN system continued to support developing countries in the management of their own development process. Reform of operational activities was a continuous process that had been given renewed impetus by the policy directives established by the General Assembly in resolutions 47/199 [YUN 1992, p. 552] and 50/120. The aim of the central objective of country-level cooperation reform was to achieve greater coherence in responding to national priorities in all developing countries, involving further strengthening of the resident coordinator system, increased efficiency through common premises and shared services, and adaptation of the field establishment to programme needs and priorities at the country level.

The report reviewed issues related to capacity-building in order to follow up the Assembly's decisions to promote a common understanding of the concept within the context of the current and prospective requirements of developing countries. Impact evaluations focusing on capacity-building were under way pursuant to resolution 50/120.

The Secretary-General stated that although progress was being made in field and regional coordination, particularly by strengthening the resident coordinator system, much remained to be done to achieve the Assembly's goals. The team leadership role of the resident coordinator was being reinforced by updated guidelines covering follow-up to UN conferences; implementation of parts of resolution 50/120 dealing with review of substantive activities by field-level committees and enhancement of the resident coordinators' authority regarding planning and coordination of programmes; support to the CSN process; preparation of UN development assistance frameworks; common databases; common country assessments linked to the development of programmes; and specification of various duties and responsibilities within the context of a team approach and in relation to the programme needs of the host country.

As to resources, the Secretary-General provided an analysis of issues and trends in core and non-core resources and made suggestions on how core resources might be increased and made more predictable.

Also before the Council was a July note [E/1997/89] on policy issues arising from the reports of the Executive Boards of UN funds and programmes, in which the Secretary-General identified matters that might be of interest to the Council when considering operational activities for development and that had system-wide implications and a relationship to the implementation of resolution 50/120. A review of decisions of the Executive Boards revealed that a number of country programmes, or similar instruments, were approved over the previous year, but there was no indication that those programmes were reviewed in the context of the CSN, where available. The Secretary-General drew the attention of the Council to the fact that in establishing the CSN, the Assembly, in resolution 47/199, had foreseen that it should be used by the governing bodies of each funding organization as a reference for considering a specific country programme. He suggested that the Council might recommend that the Boards give their views on implementation of that provision regarding the CSN, as they could be relevant in the context of the 1998 triennial policy review of operational activities when the subject of the CSN as a frame of reference for country programmes would be considered.

The subject of the follow-up to UN conferences was considered in 1997 by the Executive Boards of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP)/United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) and of the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF). The UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board, in a 16 May decision [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/14)], invited its President to submit to the Assembly through the Council a proposal for an overall review and appraisal of the implementation of the Programme of Action of the 1994 International Conference on Population and Development [YUN 1994, p. 955]. The UNICEF Executive Board, in a 6 June decision [E/1997/32/Rev.1 (dec. 1997/20)], requested the Executive Director to take action, as part of the country programme process, to support efforts by national Governments and others to achieve the goals of the 1990 World Summit for Children [YUN 1990, p. 797] within the framework of national and sub-national programmes of action. During the previous year, the Secretary-General said, the Boards had considered management reform issues. He drew the attention of the Council to the relationship of reform decisions taken by the Boards to the strengthening of the resident coordinator system, programming modalities, decentralization, and monitoring and evaluation, as well as resource mobilization.

According to the annual reports of the heads of funds and programmes and to the Secretary-General's report on implementation of resolution 50/120 [E/1997/65 & Add.1,4], non-core and other resources for operational activities had increased, but core resources were either stagnant or declining. That, the Secretary-General said, posed a major challenge to the Economic and Social Council, which might wish to identify, as called for in Assembly resolution 50/227 [YUN 1996, p. 1249], those funding issues that it deemed to be germane within the context of the 1998 triennial policy review.

The UNDP Administrator, in his annual report to the Council [E/1997/79], described follow-up to the implementation of Assembly resolution 50/120, stating that UNDP had played a key role in developing a common understanding of the programme approach as contained in the Operational Activities Reference Manual published in 1996 by the Consultative Committee on Programme and Operational Questions (CCPOQ) of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC). It also continued efforts to further refine the procedures for the programme approach in order to facilitate its application in regions where UNDP operated. UNDP had participated in a CCPOQ workshop on best practices for the strengthening of the resident coordinator system and related mechanisms (Turin, Italy, 18-21 February), at which the UN system-wide common understanding on the programme approach was reviewed and improved in the light of country-level experience. The actual application of the programme approach varied greatly and was not yet widespread among UN agencies. Efforts continued to be made to harmonize programme cycles and by June 1997 they had been harmonized in 27 countries. In another 54 countries, programme cycles were expected to be harmonized by 1999, followed later by another 26 countries. UNDP had participated in the implementation of the common country assessment (CCA), an inter-agency exercise to rationalize the collection of socioeconomic data at country level for purposes of preparing, monitoring and assessing country programmes. CCA was to become the basis for all country programmes in the current programming cycle.

Capacity-building continued to be a primary tool of UNDP for helping programme countries to strive for sustainable human development. In addition to the emphasis on the need to develop good governance, the importance of capacity-building, particularly in the management and coordination of and by nationals, was an integral part of UNDP's mission.

Monitoring and evaluation guidelines, which had been finalized in 1996, were distributed to all country offices by UNDP. They dealt with monitoring and evaluation at the project and programme levels and recommended a common approach to mid-term reviews of country programmes and country cooperation frameworks. UNDP was in the process of developing a more comprehensive system for absorbing lessons learned into its managerial and decision-making forums. Several mechanisms were in operation for disseminating lessons learned and promoting their application in new projects and programmes, including: decentralization of institutional memory, in which summaries of individual project/programme evaluations were registered in a central evaluation database; training and workshops; publication and dissemination of strategic thematic evaluation results; and application of lessons learned.

UNDP continued to promote coordination at the regional level by holding meetings between high-level officials of UNDP and the regional commissions. Collaboration included policy analysis, involvement in regional meetings, exchange of information and joint efforts in project implementation. UNDP continued to fund the resident coordinator function and had taken steps to strengthen the resident coordinator system by broadening the selection pool of candidates to include other agencies; providing operational funding for resident coordinator work; expanding training programmes held in connection with the United Nations Staff College in Turin; and supporting the management process to ensure implementation of General Assembly resolution 50/120.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 24 July [meeting 41], the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1997/59 without vote [draft: E/1997/L.53] [agenda item 3 (b)].

Operational activities of the United Nations for international development cooperation: follow-up to policy recommendations of the General Assembly

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 47/199 of 22 December 1992 and 50/120 of 20 December 1995 on the triennial policy review of operational activities for development of the United Nations system, as well as Assembly resolution 50/227 of 24 May 1996 on further measures for the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields and Council resolution 1996/42 of 26 July 1996,

Recalling also that, in order to fulfil its coordination role and in accordance with the policies formulated by the General Assembly, the Council should consider, on an annual basis in the operational activities segment, the overall financial picture of the United Nations funds and programmes, including the availability of resources, the priorities and programmes agreed upon in the funds and programmes, the adopted targets and further guidance on priorities, and should make recommendations thereon to the Assembly and the funds and programmes,

Reaffirming that operational activities for development within the United Nations system have a critical and unique role to play in enabling developing countries to continue to take a lead role in the management of their own development process and that the funds and programmes constitute important vehicles for advancing international development cooperation,

Noting with regret that, although significant progress has already been made in the restructuring and rationalization of the governance and functioning of the United Nations funds and programmes, there has not been, as part of the overall reform process, any substantial increase in resources for operational activities for development on a predictable, continuous and assured basis and that the consultations on prospective new modalities for financing have not reached a conclusion,

Expressing serious concern at the persistent insufficiency of resources for the operational development activities of the United Nations, in particular the decline in contributions to core resources,

Recognizing the importance of non-core resources as a supplement to core resources aimed at enhancing the capacity of the United Nations development system to deliver operational activities,

Stressing that the fundamental characteristics of the operational activities of the United Nations system should be, inter alia, their universal, voluntary and grant nature, their neutrality and their multilateralism, as well as their ability to respond to the needs of developing countries in a flexible manner, and that the operational activities of the United Nations system are carried out for the benefit of the developing countries at the request of those countries and in accordance with their own policies and priorities for development,

Recognizing the need for priority allocation of scarce grant resources to programmes and projects in low-income countries, in particular the least developed among them,

Recognizing also that the United Nations development system should take into account the specific needs and requirements of the countries with economies in transition,

Noting with appreciation the sustained contributions of many donors and recipient countries to the operational activities for development in a spirit of partnership and the recently expressed willingness of some donors to increase their contribution to the funds and programmes,

Recognizing that capacity-building and its sustainability are an essential element for the operational activities of the United Nations system at the country level, which should be country-led and country-driven, bearing in mind the individual mandates and complementarities of the organizations and bodies of the United Nations development system,

Noting that General Assembly resolution 50/120, Council resolution 1996/42 and the present resolution provide an opportunity to review all aspects of operational activities,

Noting also that much remains to be done to achieve the goals set by the General Assembly in its resolution 50/120,

1. Takes note of the reports and notes by the Secretary-General and the reports of the United Nations funds and programmes;

2. Strongly reaffirms that the efficiency, effectiveness and impact of the operational activities of the United Nations system must be enhanced by, inter alia, a substantial increase in their funding on a predictable, continuous and assured basis, commensurate with the increasing needs of developing countries, as well as through the full implementation of General Assembly resolutions 47/199, 48/162 of 20 December 1993, 50/120 and 50/227;

3. Urges the developed countries, in particular those countries whose overall performance is not commensurate with their capacity, taking into account established official development assistance targets, including targets established at the Second United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries, and their current level of contribution, to increase substantially their official development assistance, including contributions to the operational activities for development of the United Nations system;

4. Stresses that other countries that are in a position to do so should strive to augment their assistance within the framework of development cooperation;

5. Recommends that the Executive Boards of the United Nations funds and programmes review and monitor their funding arrangements, as a matter of priority and within the context of their regular meetings, with a view to making funding more secure and predictable with respect to core resources and to meeting their funding targets, their programme objectives and the priorities and needs of programme countries, and calls upon the Executive Boards to take decisions on their own funding arrangements in accordance with General Assembly resolution 50/227, in particular annex I, paragraph 12, and to report thereon to the Council at its substantive session of 1998;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to update proposals for funding modalities within the context of the efforts to provide United Nations operational activities with resources, in particular core resources, on a predictable, continuous and assured basis, taking into account that voluntary contributions from official sources should remain the main source for funding those activities;

7. Reaffirms that the objective of capacity-building and its sustainability should continue to be an essential part of the operational activities of the United Nations system at the country level, should be country-driven and situation-specific and should be based on the programme approach, to the extent possible, consistent with national development plans and priorities;

8. Notes the preparations for the impact evaluation of operational activities on capacity-building requested in paragraph 56 of General Assembly resolution 50/120, and invites the bodies of the United Nations system to participate actively and to support the ongoing study of the Secretariat;

9. Emphasizes that capacity-building should aim at strengthening national execution, in particular with regard to the institutional and human resource development of all relevant participants in the development process, with a view to enhancing local ownership and management of the development process, utilizing available local capacities and expertise;

10. Reaffirms that the United Nations development system should continue to work on developing a common understanding of the concept of capacity-building as it applies to the respective mandates of each organization, taking into account the experience acquired to date and the new and emerging requirements of programme countries;

11. Requests the Secretary-General, in the context of the preparations for the next triennial policy review, to report to the General Assembly, through the Council, on the implementation of Assembly resolution 50/120, Council resolution 1996/42 and the present resolution and on the progress made and problems encountered and to make appropriate recommendations, including recommendations on delegating authority and decision-making to the field-level staff, establishing a more coordinated system-wide approach to monitoring and evaluation and strengthening the coordination of regional, subregional and field-level activities of the United Nations system.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, having considered the Secretary-General's report on funding modalities of operational activities (see below), adopted, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee [A/52/630], resolution 52/203 without vote [agenda item 99].

Operational activities for development of the United Nations

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 44/211 of 22 December 1989, 47/199 of 22 December 1992, 50/120 of 20 December 1995 and 50/227 of 24 May 1996, as well as Economic and Social Council resolution 1997/59 of 24 July 1997 and other relevant resolutions,

Reaffirming that operational activities for development within the United Nations system have a critical and unique role to play in enabling developing countries to continue to take a lead in the management of their own development process and that the funds and programmes constitute important vehicles for advancing international development cooperation,

Recalling that the General Assembly is the highest intergovernmental mechanism for the formulation and appraisal of policy matters relating to the economic, social and related fields, in accordance with Chapter IX of the Charter of the United Nations, and that the functions and powers of the Economic and Social Council are provided for in Chapters IX and X of the Charter and are elaborated in relevant Assembly resolutions, including resolutions 45/264 of 13 May 1991 and 48/162 of 20 December 1993, in which the Assembly defined the relationship between the Assembly, the Council and the executive boards of the funds and programmes, in particular the Council function of overall guidance and coordination of the operational activities for development of the United Nations system,

Stressing that the fundamental characteristics of the operational activities of the United Nations system should be, inter alia, their universal, voluntary and grant nature, their neutrality and their multilateralism, as well as their ability to respond to the needs of developing countries in a flexible manner, and that the operational activities of the United Nations system are carried out for the benefit of the developing countries, at the request of those countries and in accordance with their own policies and priorities for development,

Recognizing the need to take into account the individual mandates and complementarities of the organizations and bodies of the United Nations development system, and the priorities agreed upon in the executive boards of the funds and programmes,

Expressing serious concern at the persistent insufficiency of resources for operational activities for development of the United Nations system, in particular the decline in contributions to core resources,

Recognizing the need for priority allocation for scarce grant resources to programmes and projects in low-income countries, in particular the least developed countries,

Recognizing also that the United Nations development system should take into account the specific needs and requirements of the countries with economies in transition,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on funding modalities of operational activities, as requested by the Economic and Social Council;

2. Strongly reaffirms the need for a substantial increase in resources for operational activities for development on a predictable, continuous and assured basis, commensurate with the increasing needs of developing countries;

3. Stresses the need for a continuous overall improvement in the effectiveness, efficiency and impact of the United Nations system in delivering its development assistance, and welcomes steps that have been taken towards that end;

4. Also stresses that other countries that are in a position to do so should strive to augment their assistance in the framework of development cooperation;

5. Recalls that the executive boards of the United Nations funds and programmes, in accordance with resolution 50/227, should initiate work on reviewing their funding policies and strategies with a view to meeting their agreed targets, particularly of core resources as the main source of funding of operational activities;

6. Calls upon the governing bodies of the United Nations Development Programme, the United Nations Children's Fund, the United Nations Population Fund and the World Food Programme to adopt a specific and achievable target for core resources for the period 1999-2001, taking into account the relationship between their programme arrangements and financial plans;

7. Urges the executive boards to complete the review as soon as possible and to report thereon to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1998;

8. Acknowledges the supplementary role of non-core resources in enhancing the financing of the United Nations operational activities for development;

9. Requests the Secretary-General, when presenting his comprehensive report on the triennial policy review of operational activities for development of the United Nations system at the fifty-third session of the General Assembly, to consider the implications of steps adopted by the United Nations system to implement reform initiatives on operational activities, and to make recommendations for their effective and expeditious implementation, bearing in mind the views of Member States;

10. Also requests the funds and programmes, in their regular reporting on the triennial policy review to the General Assembly through the Economic and Social Council, to include in their reports, to the extent possible and in a clearly identifiable way, actions taken to implement adopted reform measures of the Secretary-General, including an analysis of the implications of those reforms for operational activities as well as for inter-agency coordination;

11. Welcomes the ongoing efforts of the Secretariat to seek information from Member States on all issues to be considered by the triennial policy review, invites Member States to actively participate in that important data-collection exercise, including through timely completion of the relevant questionnaire, and to the extent needed requests the resident coordinators to facilitate its successful implementation;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session, through the Economic and Social Council, a comprehensive analysis of the implementation of its resolution 50/120, as well as subsequent relevant decisions and resolutions of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, in the context of the triennial policy review, and to make appropriate recommendations.

Capacity-building

In an addendum to his June report on the follow-up to the General Assembly's policy recommendations regarding operational activities for development [E/1997/65/Add.3], the Secretary-General addressed the issue of capacity-building, noting that the subject had been retained by both the Assembly and the Economic and Social Council as a focus area for the Council's review of operational activities in 1997.

Building, nurturing and strengthening national capacities in policy-making, planning, programming and implementation were important elements of the global consensus on people-centred development, said the report. The emergence of capacity-building as a major dimension of development effort was partly a reflection of a broad conclusion that international development cooperation had not yielded commensurate returns and partly as a response to changing needs. While many countries could identify a development problem—poverty, illiteracy, ill health, low or negative rates of growth—many were deficient in capabilities to address a problem with an appropriate policy and then transform the policy into a practical programme. Effective capacity-building was based on a participatory approach that required a dialogue with beneficiaries and target populations to ensure their responsibility in identifying problems, finding solutions, establishing goals, learning methods and controlling the impact of their actions. Although capacity-building had to be undertaken primarily in a country context, there were also certain areas that might be more efficiently and effectively addressed by a regional and subregional approach.

The Secretary-General listed a number of new dimensions and emerging areas that should be reconciled with, and integrated into, the concept of capacity-building: sustainability of development efforts; technology, particularly information and communications, which had altered the dynamics of development; trade; South-South cooperation; human development to create an educated and skilled workforce; peace-building to prevent or resolve conflict; optimization of aid through such modalities as the programme approach; good governance to provide a basis for stability, development and economic reform; the involvement of civil society (the private sector and the cooperative sector) in economic growth and social stability; and economic reform.

The Secretary-General noted that a number of obstacles had hindered efforts to shift development assistance from economic cooperation to capacity-building, such as uncertainty about the concept and how to measure it, a confusing array of processes and techniques, and a wide gap between prescriptions and practice. He made five recommendations for enhancing capacity-building: external assistance for developing national capacity had to be far more selective, sensitive and better internalized and integrated into domestic processes and a new profile was needed in the presence and representation of external development partners; the UN development system bore a particular responsibility as pacesetter and catalyst and there was a need to establish system-wide guidelines and criteria to be used as benchmarks and points of reference by the system; an enduring transition from traditional technical assistance to capacity-building could require more fundamental changes in the way operational activities were conceived and carried out; for capacity-building to become a more focused mission of the UN development system, existing policies and procedures had to be reviewed and the consistency and compatibility of extant policies with capacity-building objectives had to be addressed; and a more system-wide and systemic approach in the UN system was needed, as efforts in capacity-building were largely uncoordinated and mainly focused on their counterparts. With regard to the last recommendation, the Secretary-General stated that field staff should be supported with the required resources and empowered to do the job, and political push from the intergovernmental level, especially in the framework of the 1998 triennial policy review of operational activities, would be indispensable for leading that effort.

In the main part of his report on implementing Assembly resolution 50/120 [E/1997/65], the Secretary-General stated that the record of technical cooperation devoted to capacity-building, while impressive, remained inadequate. Although such cooperation was a significant part of the global effort to liberate people from poverty, 1.5 billion people were still without the basic necessities of human well-being. The number of least developed countries had increased from 24 in 1970 to 48 in 1996. Too much emphasis might have been placed on immediate economic outputs through manufacturing, equipment and experts, and too little on the policy framework and on social, cultural and environmental questions, he commented.

A key challenge was how to reorient traditional approaches to capacity-building to meet the new and changing requirements of recipient countries. The Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development, the World Bank and the UN development system had introduced new guidelines and new modalities. Recent UN conferences, particularly the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development [YUN 1992, p. 670], the 1995 World Summit for Social Development [YUN 1995, p. 1113] and the 1996 United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) [YUN 1996, p. 992], had focused on the contributions that capacity-building would play in their follow-up. Assembly decisions concerning the setting of the triennial comprehensive policy review of operational activities, such as the CSN, the programme approach and national execution, were providing important new support.

The UN system could serve as a pacesetter and catalyst in international development cooperation and in responding to national needs; at both the field and headquarters levels, it could lead a systemic transformation to help focus on the central problems of the countries concerned. The 1998 triennial comprehensive policy review would provide the forum and opportunity for a strong political push. Meanwhile, a two-pronged approach was being pursued: to continue to refine concepts and ideas; and to undertake in-depth impact studies in selected countries, not only to assess current work but also to test emerging ideas in specific situations.

The Secretary-General suggested that the Economic and Social Council might wish to consider his recommendations (see above) and to reaffirm that the UN system should continue to develop a common understanding of capacity-building.

The evaluation of the impact of operational activities for development, as mandated by the Assembly in resolution 50/120, was under way, said the Secretary-General, and its overarching theme was capacity-building. The method employed would be to prepare three initial case studies, to be completed no later than February 1998.

Field and regional coordination

In a May report [E/1997/65/Add.2], the Secretary-General addressed matters relating to field- and regional-level coordination. He reviewed current issues in field coordination, with special reference to the relevant provisions of General Assembly resolutions 47/199 [YUN 1992, p. 552] and 50/120 [YUN 1995, p. 883]. The report covered a range of subjects that facilitated cooperation by the UN system at the country level, and included information on, among other issues, common premises and shared services, joint evaluation and monitoring.

The report analysed progress in the functioning of the resident coordinator system at three levels: action at the global level to clarify mandates and functions and strengthen the system by widening the recruitment base, improving performance appraisal and providing guidance to the field; action at the country level; and emerging issues and requirements.

At the global level, practical measures were being introduced to better define the dual responsibilities of resident coordinators and the UNDP resident representatives and to ensure a broader selection of qualified candidates with recent UN experience, build an appraisal system focused on competence and results, foster the team concept at the country level, provide support to the resident coordinator system (resources and headquarters backstopping), support training and simplify the clearance process.

At the ACC level, in particular CCPOQ, new guidelines for the resident coordinator system and related programme issues were being developed. The CCPOQ working group had agreed on the scope and content of the new guidelines, approved the steps taken by UNDP to widen the recruitment pool for resident coordinators, and agreed to introduce an appraisal system focused on competence and results, as well as a training system for resident coordinators, improvements in the annual reports of the resident coordinator system, and the extension of the common country assessment project to all interested UN system organizations. The results of a workshop on best practices in the resident coordinator system held in February in Turin would lead to system-wide guidelines.

With regard to regional and subregional development cooperation, the Secretary-General stated that, although the regional and subregional presence of the UN system was increasing, there was no apparent overarching framework to guide that process, and each organization was pursuing its distinctive approach. That might have practical value, but the overall value and impact of the UN system could be enhanced through a more coordinated approach.

There was a need for greater clarity in the definition of regional and subregional activities funded by the system since it was proving difficult to provide an overall picture of the current situation. Rough estimates based on figures provided by agencies indicated that some 10 per cent of operational activities expenditure was devoted to intercountry programmes (not including the Bretton Woods (the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank Group) institutions) and total annual expenditures by the system on intercountry programmes could be estimated at $500 million. A further $100 million to $150 million was contributed by regional development banks.

With regard to approaches to coordination at the regional and subregional levels, there was an increasing effort by UNDP to link regional and subregional programmes and country cooperation frameworks. Moreover, the role of the principal programme resident representative (usually in the host country of a project) in managing an intercountry programme had been strengthened. The resident coordinator system was important for increasing coordination at the country and intercountry levels, as it provided the framework for linkages across agencies. Furthermore, the CSN could facilitate such linkages. Country framework documents, such as the country cooperation framework of UNDP, already made explicit provision for recognizing linkages with UNDP intercountry operational activities.

Cooperation at the policy level and in a region-wide context was facilitated primarily by the regional commissions. Coordination at the policy level created further opportunities for continued collaboration in more directly operational issues.

The Secretary-General also addressed the question of national ownership of regional programmes, noting that, at the intercountry level, the sense of ownership was not clear cut. Greater material involvement and ownership could be promoted through a better flow of useful information on a regular and consistent basis, and full consultations with participating Governments was important for ensuring ownership of intercountry programmes.

In the main part of his report on implementing Assembly resolution 50/120 [E/1997/65], the Secretary-General made a number of recommendations to the Economic and Social Council on ways to improve country-level coordination. He suggested that the Council recommend that all organizations, particularly the funds and programmes, issue instructions and guidelines as part of their programming procedures in order to enhance the responsibility and authority of resident coordinators for the planning and coordination of programmes. The Council might also request UN system organizations to take measures to establish joint programme and project appraisal committees as an integral part of country-level programme management, and to issue instructions to field personnel on their role in the resident coordinator system in general, and in the field-level committees and thematic groups in particular.

Regarding the growing trend to use thematic working groups as a device to promote a more concerted approach to system-wide programming of operational activities, the Secretary-General proposed that the Council recommend that UN organizations, in staffing their country offices, take into account the technical professional capacity and resources required to support those groups in relation to the programme requirements of recipient countries.

It was further suggested that the Council recommend to UN system organizations that they ensure that programmes and project ideas were shared at the outset with the resident coordinator, facilitating collaborative programming within an agreed framework, including a resource framework at the country level. Furthermore, the Council might recommend that those bodies attach greater priority to providing quality and timely support to the resident coordinator system when asked to give support to national coordination of external cooperation.

Noting that the matter of common premises and shared services would be evaluated as part of preparations for the 1998 triennial policy review, the Secretary-General said such arrangements were in effect in several areas, including security, maintenance, reception, staff services, communication, conference rooms, travel agents, financial and banking services, and local transportation. He suggested that the Council request UN funds and programmes to achieve further progress in that area at the country level.

The Secretary-General also suggested that the Council encourage further initiatives by the system towards more coherent and coordinated monitoring and evaluation of operational activities, including the establishment of baseline data for major programmes, and urge that that process be continued and extended to cover the support of headquarters to operational activities.

In addition, the Secretary-General suggested that the Council, in considering field coordination, might wish to determine whether the functioning of the resident coordinator system was supported by consistent and mutually reinforcing mandates, or whether clarification might be required. He recommended that the Council consider the extent to which the 1998 triennial comprehensive policy review should address the issues of coordination of regional development activities of the UN system, as well as other issues arising from resolution 50/120, including national ownership of regional activities and enhancing the role of regional commissions in those activities. He further recommended that the Council consider whether the concept of a regional strategy note should be tested in one region and a few subregions.

Funding modalities of operational activities

In an addendum to his June report on the follow-up to the General Assembly's policy recommendations regarding operational activities for development [E/1997/65/Add.1], the Secretary-General, in response to Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/42 [YUN 1996, p. 761], reported on trends in core and non-core resources. Core resources were those contributed voluntarily to the funds and programmes for general resources, to be utilized according to their mandates, without any constraints or conditions. The funds and programmes—UNDP, UNICEF, the World Food Programme (WFP) and UNFPA—were the principal avenues through which the operational activities of the UN system were financed. Combined total resources channelled through the funds and programmes in 1994, 1995 and 1996 were estimated at $4.5 billion, $4.3 billion and $4.5 billion, respectively.

Of total resources, core funds in 1996 constituted 55 per cent in UNDP, 58 per cent in UNICEF, 82 per cent in UNFPA and 54 per cent in WFP. The stagnation and/or decline in core funding had inhibited the capacity of UN funds and programmes to play the roles assigned to them and to respond effectively to national needs while maintaining their multilateral and universal character.

The question of increasing resources in relation to the growing needs of recipient countries and making the funding system more predictable had been a concern of the General Assembly for 20 years. A notable feature of core funding of funds and programmes was that a small number of countries contributed close to 90 per cent of such funding. In 1996, 15 countries contributed over 95.9 per cent of UNDP resources, 98.5 per cent of UNFPA resources, 95.2 per cent of UNICEF resources and 94.2 per cent of WFP resources. The share of core resources in total income had decreased from approximately 76 per cent in 1992 to approximately 45 per cent in 1996, a trend expected to continue in 1997.

Non-core resources were more varied, and definitions and the composition of non-core funding differed among organizations. For example, UNDP included trust funds as part of its non-core funding, whereas UNICEF did not. The importance of non-core resources as a means of funding operational activities was recognized by the Assembly in resolution 44/211 [YUN 1989, p. 302], in which it recognized the value of special-purpose grant resources provided that they were designed as a means to ensure additional resource flows and that their projects were integrated in the technical cooperation programme of the UN system, in conformity with each country's development plan.

In the case of UNDP, non-core resources were constituted by funds contributed by governmental or private sources and intended for specific purposes. They were contributed generally through two modalities: cost-sharing of projects or programmes, provided either by programme country Governments (government cost-sharing) or by other Governments (third-party cost-sharing); and trust funds as receptacles for funds contributed by one donor or several donors for a common purpose. UNDP non-core resources increased from $382 million in 1992 to $1.27 billion in 1996, of which cost-sharing represented $957.6 million in 1996 ($271.9 million in 1992), with government cost-sharing representing 71.8 per cent and third-party cost-sharing 28.2 per cent (compared to 62.2 and 37.8 per cent, respectively, in 1992). Although the UNDP Executive Board had stressed that contributions to core resources should remain the central effort of all donors, it recognized the importance of non-core resources as a mechanism for enhancing the capacity and supplementing the means to achieve UNDP goals and priorities. Non-core resources had begun to be reflected in the new country cooperation frameworks under resource mobilization targets.

In the case of UNICEF, each country programme included programme components for which general resources were not available, but for which regular supplementary funding was sought from the donor community, particularly donor Governments. Non-core funds of UNFPA for 1996 were estimated at $49.3 million, an increase of 16.4 per cent over 1995. Non-core resources were a major source of financing for WFP, amounting to some 50 per cent of total resources.

The report pointed out that in the mid-1980s, official development assistance (ODA) was the major part of resource flows to developing countries. In the mid-1990s, private flows were exceeding official sources, with ODA shrinking to an all-time low of 0.27 per cent of gross national product. Resources channelled through multilateral institutions accounted for 10 per cent of total flows to developing countries, and those made available to the UN development system were stagnant.

Although both core and non-core resources were related to established mandates and financial rules, some aspects of non-core resources were outside the direct decision-making of the executive boards. If taken to an extreme, excessive reliance on non-core resources could distort national and global priorities and affect the multilateral and universal character of the UN system. Faced with that situation, the funds and programmes were attempting to increase core resources by enhancing the efficiency and transparency of their operations, obtaining a larger share from existing traditional sources and developing new sources of funding.

In the main part of his report on implementing Assembly resolution 50/120 [E/1997/65], the Secretary-General made a number of recommendations concerning core and non-core funding: that the core resource base be broadened to include additional sources; that the possibility of attracting more contributions from non-governmental sources in addition to those provided by Governments, including from private international foundations and the private sector, as well as the policy adjustments necessary to permit such a possibility, be reviewed; that stronger political commitment by all countries, including developing countries, was needed for resource mobilization; that with the convergence of the mission statements of the funds and programmes and their follow-up mandates to UN conferences, more coordinated fund-raising could be explored, including in the context of current reforms; that the Secretary-General's earlier proposals to enhance core resources should be reviewed; and that experience gained with open-ended, informal consultations on new modalities for financing could be used by Governments to consider the most appropriate process for further consultations on funding.

Among the earlier proposals made for enhancing core resources were assessed contributions, negotiated pledges, multi-year pledges for voluntary contributions, and linking funding to programmes endorsed by the relevant governing body.

In response to Economic and Social Council resolution 1997/59 (see above), the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly an October report [A/52/431] on funding modalities of operational activities. The report gave figures for core and other contributions to UN funds and programmes for the years 1991 to 1997 and concluded that the current funding modality for core resources was not generating the contributions required to meet the established programme targets and new requirements arising from the recent round of UN conferences. Any new modality would require wide political support, the report stated. It noted that an important feature of the funding situation was that, as core resources declined, there was a relatively rapid increase in non-core and earmarked resources.

The report suggested that, in assessing the potential of new funding modalities, it might be useful to examine the rationale prompting some countries to favour non-core funding avenues. Such examination might help develop a more responsive mechanism and programme policies guiding core funding, bringing them into closer alignment with policies guiding non-core contributions. Moreover, separate consideration was being given to the subject of new and innovative funding of global development requirements, involving a review of possible new sources (see PART FIVE, Chapter I). The link of any new funding modality and new and innovative funding ideas might need to be clarified, particularly as it pertained to funding of operational activities for development.

In resolution 52/203, the Assembly strongly reaffirmed the need for a substantial increase in resources for operational activities for development on a predictable, continuous and assured basis, commensurate with the needs of developing countries.

Collaboration between UN and IMF

By a June note [E/1997/78], the Secretary-General submitted to the Economic and Social Council a report prepared by IMF on collaboration between it and the United Nations. The report was written in response to General Assembly resolution 50/227 [YUN 1996, p. 1249], which requested an assessment of the relationship between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions (IMF and the World Bank Group) at the field, headquarters and intergovernmental levels, with a view to identifying areas in which collaboration in the field of development activities could be improved.

At the institution-wide level, collaboration between IMF and the United Nations had intensified in recent years as IMF had increasingly integrated social concerns into the structural adjustment programmes it supported and had begun to take into account the recommendations of major UN global conferences on the environment, population, social development and women. Collaboration with the United Nations entailed increased participation by IMF staff in meetings and initiatives organized by intergovernmental and inter-agency committees and commissions, exchange of information and collaboration in the statistical area and post-conflict situations.

Country-level collaboration took place mainly between IMF missions and/or resident representatives and the UN resident coordinators (who were generally UNDP representatives) and representatives of other specialized agencies.

The collaboration between IMF and the UN system had helped IMF increasingly to incorporate social and environmental concerns into its policy advice and the design of adjustment programmes. The collaboration at the country level had generally been satisfactory, but there was scope for a more focused exchange of information between IMF staff and resident coordinators on poverty and social issues. There might be a need to define more clearly specific areas of collaboration in selected countries to benefit from complementarity of expertise. Such areas could include capacity-building for transparent management of public resources through joint technical assistance programmes to prepare for, and underpin, comprehensive macroeconomic and structural adjustment reforms. In the preparation of CSNs, there were elements for their preparation that could be improved—the CSN was sometimes too much donor-driven with insufficient participation of Governments, which had hampered consistency and complementarity with other government policy documents, and CSNs had not always benefited from comments by IMF staff. In countries where IMF did not have representatives, more regular contacts between IMF and UN staff during missions might be necessary. More timely communication regarding plans for CSNs would also be useful.

Regarding capacity-building through technical assistance, the collaboration would benefit from streamlining and simplifying the procedures for drafting, negotiating and reviewing technical assistance programmes. Moreover, the recipient countries would also benefit from a more timely indication of magnitude and duration of planned technical assistance programmes.

Coordination of policy and programming frameworks

By an April note [A/52/115-E/1997/47], the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council ACC's comments on the 1996 report of the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) on coordination of policy and programming frameworks for more effective development cooperation [YUN 1996, p. 763]. ACC stated that the JIU report was based on the premise that one way to achieve optimum efficiency in the network of multilateral development cooperation institutions was to integrate the numerous policy and programming institutional formats, mechanisms or frames of reference (known as frameworks), which were used by donor organizations to formulate, implement and evaluate their development cooperation policies, strategies, programmes and projects.

In dealing with relevant issues relating to coordination and harmonization of operational activities, ACC said, the JIU report could have addressed the larger issue of aid coordination in greater depth, including multilateral and bilateral sources other than the UN system. ACC agreed with JIU that the multiplicity of programming procedures imposed a considerable burden on Governments. In general, ACC agreed with the thrust of the report's recommendations but believed that it suffered from a number of shortcomings, primarily that it covered ground that had received considerable attention by the UN system, in particular through the triennial policy reviews. It would have been more helpful to identify best practices and other practical elements to facilitate implementation at the country level of those established policies. Furthermore, ACC said, the report did not take sufficient account of recent developments in the areas under consideration. It made insufficient distinctions between operational activities at the country, regional and UN system levels, and therefore sometimes offered conclusions and recommendations that had either been rejected by Governments or were already being implemented.

The Economic and Social Council, in decision 1997/299 of 24 July, took note of ACC's comments on the JIU report. On 18 December, the General Assembly, in decision 52/446, took note of the report and of ACC's comments.

Strengthening field representation

In October [A/52/457], the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly a JIU report on strengthening field representation of the UN system. The report noted that despite efforts to strengthen coordination in the field in support of programme countries, the desired results had not been achieved and in many cases the proliferation of offices of different UN organizations continued. Basic issues that the report looked into included: the resident coordinator system; cooperation between UN system representatives in the field; relationships between field offices and Headquarters; support to host countries; complementarities and division of labour on an inter-agency basis to cope with the specific needs of the country concerned; efficient and effective use of tools and mechanisms such as the CSN, thematic groups and field committees; and rationalization and streamlining of administrative services on an inter-agency basis. The report described the evolution of field representation within the UN system, noting that in the 1985-1995 period the number of country and regional offices had risen from 704 to 1,125, an increase of 60 per cent, and the number of field staff had grown from 11,677 to 18,728, or 63 per cent. Costs during the period rose by close to 200 per cent.

JIU's recommendations were: organizations should refrain from having new representations and make use of existing common representations, especially through the resident coordinator, and should harmonize as much as possible their representations at the regional and sub-regional levels; the resident coordinator should be the single UN official representing the whole UN family, and other agency representatives, who would continue to promote activities related to their respective organizations' mandates, would be part of a team under the leadership of the resident coordinator; thematic groups with a lead agency should be further strengthened in the context of a well-defined division of labour, responsibilities and complementarities; all UN organizations represented in the field should accelerate efforts to establish and/or enhance common premises and common services; the Secretary-General should designate a high official to be in charge of the resident coordinator system, to be supported by a unit within UNDP established for that purpose; host countries should consider creating an interministerial committee composed of representatives of sectoral ministries and departments to advise the UN support system in the country; coordination at the field level, with both bilateral and non-UN multilateral donors, should be more institutionalized by the parties concerned, especially between the UN system and the multi-bi community; and Member States should scrutinize and harmonize decisions, and a more vigorous monitoring of the decision-making process should be undertaken by all legislative bodies of the UN system, with the Economic and Social Council having primary responsibility for coordination and harmonization.

Commenting on the recommendations in November [A/52/457/Add.1], ACC strongly supported the strengthening of the resident coordinator system. Furthermore, the Secretary-General had emphasized those efforts in his report on UN reform (see PART FIVE, Chapter I). While questioning some of the data in the JIU report, ACC noted that the number of non-headquarters staff of the United Nations and the specialized agencies had remained fairly constant in the previous decade, while the growth in numbers of such staff had mainly been identified among UN funds and programmes for development and programmes for humanitarian assistance. The reason for that growth was the emergence of new recipient countries and expanded humanitarian operations.

ACC also noted that the Secretary-General had emphasized the importance of strengthening teamwork at the field level, including through thematic groups, and plans to establish common premises and common services were under way. With regard to the proposal for a single official to be in charge of the resident coordinator system, the Secretary-General had moved in that direction by deciding that UNDP should continue as the manager and funder of the system, with appropriate staff support. ACC supported the recommendation for coordination between the UN system and other donors, and it took note of those recommendations addressed to Governments and intergovernmental bodies of the UN system.

The General Assembly, in decision 52/446 of 18 December, took note of the JIU report and of the ACC comments thereon.

Internal oversight mechanisms

In response to resolution 48/218 B [YUN 1994, p. 1362], the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly a report [A/51/801] by the Office of Internal Oversight Services (OIOS) containing recommendations on the implementation of that resolution as it pertained to the internal oversight functions of UN operational funds and programmes.

OIOS identified organizational structures and procedures established by 13 operational funds and programmes that enabled them to exercise internal oversight to varying degrees. That first step was followed by gathering information provided by those funds or programmes, analysing the data, and making eight recommendations suggesting methods by which OIOS could assist those bodies in enhancing their internal oversight mechanisms. Entities that were fully financed by the UN regular budget and those financed by trust funds administered by the United Nations or UNDP were not addressed in the report.

Recommendation 1 called for the monitoring concept to be viewed as part of the managerial responsibility. The monitoring function should be modified to that of a facilitator, gathering appropriate data and, most importantly, independently analysing and reporting on the implementation of programme activities. The OIOS guidelines on programme monitoring and evaluation should be embraced as a minimum requirement and implemented by those funds and programmes that had deficiencies in those areas.

In recommendation 2 dealing with the inspection function, OIOS noted the need for specialized knowledge of the area to be inspected when forming the inspection team, as well as stating that consideration should be given to forming separate inspection units in the larger funds and programmes. Where that was not practical, an inspection team should be formed within the audit unit. OIOS offered to assist in those cases where funds or programmes did not establish their own inspection function. Recommendation 3 stated that OIOS could continue to provide investigation services to any fund or programme if requested. However, resources would have to be allocated to OIOS by the requesting organization. Those bodies that established their own investigation function should ensure the operational independence of the unit.

Recommendation 4 noted that cooperation among oversight units was approached in an informal manner. OIOS recommended that regular monthly meetings be held among the heads of the oversight units and other units performing oversight functions to exchange information. In recommendation 5, OIOS observed that the effectiveness of the oversight function could be increased if timely implementation of recommendations was emphasized. It therefore recommended that internal oversight units in the funds and programmes should develop a mechanism for continually monitoring the implementation of their recommendations, including procedures for addressing non-compliance and reporting on the status of implementation to the executive head.

Noting that most of the funds and programmes lacked adequate reporting procedures, recommendation 6 stated that they should follow procedures similar to those established for OIOS by the Assembly in resolution 48/218 B. Therefore, internal oversight units should be authorized to submit periodic comprehensive reports and ad hoc reports on specific issues to their governing bodies. OIOS reports on a particular fund or programme should be made available to its governing body, together with comments of the executive head.

Recommendation 7 advised strengthening reporting procedures by complementing the reporting line of OIOS to the Assembly with a report containing summary records on internal oversight issues of each operational fund and programme. The report would provide a tool for the Assembly to monitor internal oversight activities within those organizations and provide an overview of achieved improvements and areas of concern to be addressed.

Recommendation 8 called for OIOS to have the authority to seek and obtain any relevant information from the internal oversight entities or concerned executive heads, as well as the right to comment, if necessary, on the quality of the oversight activities of funds and programmes as they would be reported to the Assembly.

Common premises and services

In 1997, the General Assembly considered the 1994 JIU report on UN system common premises and services in the field [A/49/629] and ACC's 1996 comments thereon [YUN 1996, p. 763]. In general, ACC supported the principle of UN agencies and programmes sharing, whenever possible, common premises and services. By decision 51/469 A of 13 June, the Assembly took note of the JIU report and the ACC comments.

Financing of operational activities

During 1996 [E/1998/48/Add.1], the most recent year for which complete figures were available, expenditures by the UN system on operational activities, excluding loans and grants through the World Bank Group, totalled $4.26 billion, compared with $4.8 billion for 1995 and $4.61 billion for 1994. That amount was distributed in development grants through UNDP or UNDP-administered funds ($1.49 billion), UNFPA ($216.5 million), UNICEF ($683.7 million), WFP ($1.07 billion), and specialized agencies and other organizations from regular and extrabudgetary sources ($800.3 million).

In addition, concessional loans of $259.3 million were disbursed by the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD), and a total of $157.9 million was provided through the United Nations Office for Project Services in services engaged by Governments receiving loans and credits from international development banks or resources from bilateral donors.

By region, 38 per cent of total expenditures on operational activities went to Africa, 24 per cent to Asia and the Pacific, 24 per cent to Latin America and the Caribbean, 7 per cent to Europe and 7 per cent to Western Asia.

Contributions from Governments and other sources for operational activities of the UN system, including IFAD but excluding the World Bank Group, totalled $5.45 billion in 1996, compared with $5.6 billion in 1995 and $5.59 billion in 1994.

The 1997 United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities (New York, 4-5 November) [A/CONF.182/3] received pledges by a number of Governments to UN programmes and funds concerned with development and related assistance. It took note of the fact that several Governments were not in a position to announce their contributions but proposed to communicate their pledges to the Secretary-General as soon as they were in a position to do so.

The Secretary-General, in a September note [A/CONF.180/2 & Corr.1] to the General Assembly, provided a statement of contributions, as at 30 June 1997, pledged or paid at the 1996 Pledging Conference to 25 funds and programmes. The total came to almost $1.2 billion, with an estimated $605 million designated for UNDP.

Technical cooperation through UNDP

The Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), in his annual report covering 1997 [DP/1998/17 & Add.1-7], said that the year was important on several fronts: UNDP strengthened its identity in policy dialogue and in programme activities based on its mission to help to eradicate poverty through sustainable human development (SHD) and provided support to good governance—a key part of the enabling environment for poverty eradication.

UNDP implemented organizational changes designed to make it a more efficient and more effective organization with stronger accountability, a culture of cost-consciousness and a sharper focus on country operations. Issues identified in the 1996 annual report [YUN 1996, p. 767] had been addressed, namely, strengthening the country offices and the organization's commitment to the resident coordinator system; narrowing the focus of UNDP work, giving priority to gender issues and countries in special circumstances; and implementing management actions to accelerate change and improve the organization's governance.

Within the UN system, UNDP actively sought to fulfil its role as an integrating force at the country level by implementing measures to reform the United Nations, strengthening the resident coordinator system and actively promoting strategic follow-up to major global conferences. In the context of UN reform, the Administrator chaired the United Nations Development Group (UNDG), created by the Secretary-General to achieve greater coordination and policy coherence of the Organization's development work. In the UNDG Executive Committee (composed of UNDP, the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) and the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), and with the participation of the World Food Programme (WFP), UNDP led the process for the preparation of a United Nations System-wide Approach for the Eradication of Poverty. The Group sought to make the right to development a central feature of UN development activities in the context of promoting poverty eradication. To stimulate further work in that area, UNDP authored a paper entitled "Integrating human rights with sustainable human development".

At the operational level, the United Nations Development Assistance Framework (UNDAF) was a core element in implementing UN reform at the country level. The exercise aimed to accelerate the harmonization of the policies, programmes and procedures of the UN system in response to the SHD needs of programme countries. UNDG members cooperated in preparing guidelines for producing frameworks and piloting the exercise in 18 countries.

UNDP pursued the harmonization of programming periods with those of other UN funds and programmes through the country cooperation framework (CCF) process and the extension of country programmes. By the end of 1997, programming periods in 27 countries had been harmonized, with 54 more planned by 1999. The country strategy note (CSN) process was active in 27 countries, with drafts prepared in a further 19 countries and a work plan established in another 15 countries. The resident coordinator system facilitated the CSN process in all countries where the Government had expressed an interest in it. The process of establishing resident coordinator system guidelines on administrative management at the country level was under way in areas such as communications, procurement, personnel, financial and legal services, buildings and maintenance, and joint security.

UNDP, as the manager and funder of the resident coordinator system, made progress in widening the pool for the selection of resident coordinators. With its UNGD partners, it drafted comprehensive job descriptions for resident coordinators, and competency assessment was introduced to judge candidates for appointment. The Administrator provided written guidance to resident coordinators on the reporting lines and accountability for their function, instructing them to distinguish between their roles as resident coordinator and UNDP resident representative. In addition, guidelines were issued for the annual reports of resident coordinators. With regard to the implementation of the programmes of action emanating from UN global conferences, the Administrator, working with the UN Department of Economic and Social Affairs and ACC, provided guidance to the resident coordinator and the UN country team on how to use conference outcomes in UN operational activities. As specific follow-up to the 1995 World Summit for Social Development [YUN 1995, p. 1113], for example, thematic groups on poverty eradication (see PART THREE, Chapter I) were established in 40 countries by the end of 1997. In addition, UNDP had helped 98 countries to design and implement anti-poverty strategies. UNDP also participated in conference follow-up in employment, human settlements, gender-mainstreaming and the advancement of women, population and development, environment, food security and agriculture, and sustainable development.

Achievements of 1997. The Administrator stated that UNDP had met its overall targets for 1997. It had streamlined its headquarters, separating corporate and operational functions, and had aligned finance, human resources and information systems with the corporate strategic-planning function. The new Operations Support Group linked the regional bureaux to one another and was responsible for cross-functional teamwork and standardization of problem-solving strategies in all countries. A new Evaluation Office was formed to ensure that the evaluation function remained independent. Resident representatives organized meetings to accelerate change in country offices and 10 resident representatives/resident coordinators were included in an expanded Executive Committee on change to ensure that the field perspective was fully explored in decision-making on change.

At the policy level, UNDP cooperated closely with programme countries to refine its focus through: programming instruments such as advisory notes, CCFs, regional frameworks, a global cooperation framework and the UNDAF exercise; and application of the resource-allocation criteria developed with the Executive Board of UNDP/UNFPA in the context of applying the successor programming arrangements. By the end of 1997, the Board had approved 119 CCFs and regional cooperation frameworks for each of the geographic regions in which UNDP operated.

Governance was an area in which demand for UNDP support had increased in recent years, and good governance was predicated on a proper balance between State action, the private sector and civil society, the Administrator stated. Concern to find effective local solutions to governance was reflected in the UNDP-hosted Conference on Governance for Sustainable Growth and Equity (New York, July), in which over 1,000 ministers, parliamentarians, mayors and representatives of civil society, business and development organizations participated. Support to governance for poverty eradication represented a significant share of UNDP programming. Almost 70 per cent of CCFs covering 1997-1999 included a component in support of decentralization; 65 per cent of them had a component in support of civil society organizations; and just under 65 per cent of them had a component in support of governing institutions. The Administrator announced a $36 million pilot programme in 1997 to support innovative approaches to governance in developing countries. The four-year global initiative, which would involve assistance to over 75 countries, aimed to test new approaches to promoting good governance and to support activities by a range of partners, including civil society organizations, the media, human rights organizations and parliaments.

By the end of 1997, UNDP had carried out over 120 interventions in 36 countries and three sub-regional groupings in special development situations. Those interventions, costing about $100 million, fell into three broad categories: programme responses to complex development situations, during and after crisis, through strategic frameworks or special programme initiatives; immediate support to strengthen the ability of the country (or the UN system) to provide an urgent and coordinated response to sudden crisis; and capacity-building to prevent crises, to mitigate their effects and to rebuild after their occurrence.

To facilitate the participation of programme countries in a globalizing world, UNDP launched a special information and communications technology programme. The programme aimed to strengthen national capacity for, and use of, information and communications technology in education, health, natural resource management, small enterprise development and participatory decision-making processes.

To move technical support closer to country offices and to promote exchange of learning across regions, UNDP prepared a strategy for launching the subregional resource facilities concept approved by the Executive Board [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/15)]. Based on the experience of pilot projects already operating in Pakistan and Thailand, it was envisaged that one country office in each of the other four geographic regions would be selected to pilot the application of the concept.

At the operational level, priority was given to fostering a culture of accountability and ensuring that business was done economically and effectively, with staff held accountable for their performance and use of resources. UNDP issued its first annual accountability bulletin to guide staff on organizational values and acceptable performance and conduct.

UNDP improved its use of information and communications technology, putting materials for capacity development—such as the Electronic Resource Book on Capacity Development—on the UNDP MagNet Web site. The central evaluation database was made available to all country offices, and the Evaluation Office launched a Web site on the Intranet and Internet. All country offices were scheduled to be linked to the Internet by the end of 1998.

Efforts were made to enhance the understanding between the Executive Board and UNDP on the application of national execution, culminating in important legislation with regard to UNDP non-core and national execution activities. National execution procedures were revised and simplified, taking into account the results of evaluation and of consultations with the Board and UN entities, among other things. Compliance with national execution audit requirements improved in 1997. UNDP strengthened the regional audit service centres in Malaysia and Zimbabwe and contracted further country office audits with the aim that 50 per cent of country offices in Africa, Asia and the Pacific, and the Arab States would have contracted audits by the end of 1998.

Emphasis was placed on the need for UNDP to become more results-oriented. The Evaluation Office concentrated on developing results-based monitoring and evaluation policies, methodologies and tools. The main achievements in that area were a joint study with the Swedish International Development Cooperation Agency on performance measurement and management, and a user-friendly guide entitled Results-oriented Monitoring and Evaluation: A Handbook for Programme Managers. In the area of impact and performance measurement, the Evaluation Office prepared an action plan with three main elements: providing more access to evidence gathered by UNDP and other development organizations on performance in SHD areas; strengthening accountability by making management responsible for implementing recommendations made in evaluations; and developing an operational framework for assessing and reporting on results.

In human resource management, UNDP emphasized organizational values and accountability. It implemented a new competency-based human resource strategy and paid special attention to the competencies of, and career opportunities for, national Professional staff, accounting for over 80 per cent of UNDP staff. Work was initiated to establish a UNDP emergency roster, to identify staff who could be trained and quickly redeployed to countries with temporary staff needs.

UNDP took a number of measures to improve delivery of its programmes with full attention to quality. As a result, the overall situation improved and, at the time of the Administrator's report, 1997 core programme delivery was estimated at $643 million, 20 per cent higher than in 1996. The increased delivery was not, however, matched by the expected increase in core resources.

UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board

In 1997, the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board held three regular sessions (New York, 13-17 January, 10-14 March, 15-19 September) and an annual session (New York, 12-23 May) [E/1997/33].

At the first regular session, the Board adopted six decisions, including one that gave an overview of action taken at that session [dec. 97/6]. The other decisions dealt with audit reports for UNDP (see below) and UNFPA (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII), the first UNDP global cooperation framework (see below), the UNICEF/WHO/UNFPA Coordinating Committee on Health (see PART THREE, Chapter XIII) and the United Nations Development Fund for Women (see PART THREE, Chapter X).

At its second regular session in March, the Board adopted four decisions, one of which gave an overview of action taken at the session [dec. 97/10]. The other decisions covered guidelines for improving the implementation of regional cooperation programmes (see below), the United Nations Capital Development Fund (see below) and the revision of UNFPA financial regulations (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII).

At its annual session in May, the Board adopted 10 decisions, including an overview of action taken at the session [dec. 97/20]. Four decisions dealt with UNFPA (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII). Three others dealt with aspects of UNDP policy (see below) covering change management, communication and information, and internal audit. Another decision covered the United Nations Development Fund for Women (see PART THREE, Chapter X) and one dealt with emergency assistance to the Democratic Republic of the Congo (see PART THREE, Chapter III).

At its third regular session in September, the Board adopted nine decisions, one providing an overview of action taken at the session [dec. 97/29]. Three decisions concerned the United Nations Office for Project Services (see below) and two concerned UNFPA (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII). One decision dealt with the UNDP 1998-1999 budget (see below), one with the first country cooperation framework for Nigeria (see below) and another with the functioning of the UNICEF/WHO/UNFPA Coordinating Committee on Health (see PART THREE, Chapter XIII).

Appointment of UNDP Administrator

Having considered a 15 May note by the Secretary-General [A/51/896], the General Assembly, by decision 51/321 of 21 May, confirmed his appointment of James Gustave Speth as Administrator of UNDP for a further four-year term of office beginning on 16 July 1997. Mr. Speth was appointed for his first term in 1993 [YUN 1993, p. 1368].

Rules of procedure

In accordance with a 1996 Executive Board decision [YUN 1996, p. 769], an ad hoc open-ended working group on rules of procedure for the Board was established. The working group held 10 meetings in 1996 and 1997 and submitted its report in March 1997 [DP/1997/13] containing draft rules of procedure. The rules covered such issues as convening and place of sessions, working languages, agenda and documentation, representation, elections and functions of the Bureau, working groups, the UNDP/UNFPA secretariat, conduct of business and participation of non-members. The Office of Legal Affairs had reviewed the draft rules and had submitted comments, which were taken into consideration by the working group.

On 23 May [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/20)], the Board adopted the draft rules of procedure.

UNDP operational activities

Country programmes by region

Africa

Through its Regional Bureau for Africa, UNDP support to the region in 1997 [DP/1998/17/Add.1 (Part I)] focused on the key areas of poverty eradication, governance and support to countries in special development situations, gender equality and the advancement of women, and environmental protection.

Individual countries received UNDP support in the area of strategic thinking and planning, using the National Long-Term Perspective Studies (NLTPS) methodology. Fifteen countries (Cape Verde, Cote d'Ivoire, Gabon, Guinea-Bissau, Madagascar, Malawi, Mali, Mauritius, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Swaziland, Uganda, United Republic of Tanzania, Zambia, Zimbabwe) successfully completed their NLTPS. Those countries were well placed to integrate short- and long-term planning and to have a clearer view of where they would most like to be in 25 years. A second phase of NLTPS was launched in 1997, focusing on operationalizing long-term visions in those countries and involving additional countries in designing their long-term visions.

Poverty eradication was a major priority for UNDP support in Africa, as reflected in all CCFs. Over 30 countries prepared poverty strategies with the support of the UNDP Regional Bureau for Africa. Those strategies laid the foundation for policy dialogue and the preparation of poverty eradication programmes for resource mobilization during Consultative Group meetings and round-table conferences. Twenty-three African countries had poverty-focused national human development reports (NHDRs) in 1997, compared to 10 in 1996. Angola, Benin, the Comoros, Guinea, Madagascar, Nigeria and Uganda produced NHDRs for the first time. Those reports were used for internal policy dialogue between different segments of society and sought to highlight the differences between quantitative and qualitative approaches to poverty. The coexistence of high growth rates with poverty, as for example in Benin and Uganda, reaffirmed the importance of ensuring that growth was broad-based and accompanied by measures to improve income distribution.

UNDP, jointly with the World Bank and bilateral donors, had worked for two decades towards the elimination of onchocerciasis (river blindness) from the Niger and Volta River basins, reclaiming land for over 1 million people in 10 countries in West Africa. In 12 countries, safe drinking water had been brought to millions of people in rural African communities and the establishment of private sector maintenance companies had been promoted. An important element of UNDP anti-poverty activities was its continuing work to combat the HIV/AIDS epidemic, including its HIV/AIDS awareness programmes.

Specific UNDP activities in the area of poverty eradication included the financing of a study in Botswana on the nature and extent of poverty and a symposium on poverty, co-financed by Norway. In Mauritius, the Government was implementing its poverty eradication strategy. UNDP helped the United Republic of Tanzania to produce in a poverty assessment in Shinyanga region and, under the Africa 2000 Network programme, UNDP technical assistance enabled Tanzanian village women to regenerate their environment and establish viable industries. In South Africa, UNDP co-financed the national Poverty and Inequality Study with the World Bank and sponsored a study on poverty measurement. It also supported the Safety and Security Programme in that country, building capacity in crime prevention, and promoted employment generation through small- and medium-scale enterprises for women and rural communities, labour-intensive schemes and skills enhancement. UNDP also assisted in the provision of affordable housing and improved health facilities in South Africa.

UNDP continued to support job creation through initiatives such as the Africa Project Development Facility, the African Management Services Company and the Africa 2000 Network programme. In 1997, new activities in job creation included Enterprise Africa, with help from Ghana and Zimbabwe, and the MicroStart and Women's World Banking projects in African countries.

In the area of governance, 1997 programmes focused on supporting Africa's efforts to build committed leadership; strengthen public accountability; promote the transition to democratic processes; empower civil society organizations to participate in economic and social activities; address conflict situations; and rehabilitate and reconstruct war-torn societies. UNDP organized or co-organized a number of high-level meetings, such as the First Africa Governance Forum (Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, July) at which 14 countries presented their national governance programmes and exchanged lessons learned on governance. Dialogue on governance was promoted through the multi-donor, World Bank-chaired Special Programme of Assistance to Africa, for which UNDP helped to prepare a training package on civil service reform. UNDP also started to compile an inventory of governance projects in Africa to determine resource requirements. In the United Republic of Tanzania, for example, it mobilized resources from a number of donors, including Ireland and Norway, to support the national programme on governance, which was launched in 1997 and focused on enhancing the capacities of political parties and strengthening the Commissions of Finance, External Affairs, and Constitutional and Judiciary Affairs. In South Africa, activities in support of provincial and local administrations included training in budget management and accounting and financial management, as well as strengthening the legislature through administrative and policy enhancement.

Countries in parts of West Africa and the Great Lakes region, where there had been an explosion of conflicts, faced major constraints to economic recovery. To help address the problem, UNDP continued to support Burundi, the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), Liberia, Sierra Leone and other countries in conflict prevention, resolution and management. In the DRC, UNDP supported the rehabilitation of the National Agricultural Research Centre, and a special unit was established in the country office to monitor humanitarian assistance projects. Projects contributed towards the return of the displaced population and their reintegration into the socio-economic life of the rehabilitated areas. Support was provided to repair roads and to train road builders. In Rwanda, UNDP supported the re-establishment of the University of Rwanda and vocational training in welding, carpentry, masonry and electrical engineering. It also managed the Rwanda Trust Fund, which focused on the reintegration and demobilization of ex-combatants. In Burundi, UNDP was involved in assisting war victims through grass-roots activities in management development, revival of the agricultural sector, peace education and rehabilitation of the health sector. In the United Republic of Tanzania, UNDP participated in a programme for rehabilitation of refugee-affected areas aimed at strengthening local administrative capacity for environmental and socio-economic rehabilitation. UNDP was assisting in the demobilization and reintegration of 1,000 ex-combatants in the Central African Republic and had been asked by the Security Council to provide support to the ongoing initiatives to mediate the crisis in that country. Some substantive support for post-conflict peace-building was provided through the regional project Africa 2000 Network, which granted up to $50,000 to some disadvantaged communities in support of grass-roots rehabilitation and development efforts. In post-conflict situations, priority was given to reintegrating displaced persons, while ensuring the full involvement of women and youth. UNDP participated in a humanitarian mission to the Comoros, which identified emergency needs in food, agriculture, livestock farming, fisheries, health, nutrition, education, water supply and sanitation.

UNDP continued to support and carry on dialogues with Governments, civil society and the media about gender-mainstreaming concerns in African countries. Targeting poor women was at the centre of many programmes. The $5.35 million programme in that area promoted women's roles in political and economic decision-making, peace-building and the media. The programme was initiated with the convening of a regional gender round table, held in South Africa in December, which brought together partners to implement the programme. Together with other organizations, UNDP sponsored over 60 African women entrepreneurs to attend the Asia/Africa Forum on the Economic Empowerment of Women (Bangkok, Thailand, July) and the Conference of the International Federation of Women Entrepreneurs (Ghana, September).

The Global Environment Facility (GEF)—a joint effort by UNDP, the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) and the World Bank—had 23 projects under way in Africa. The projects were designed to help the preservation of biodiversity, the prevention of global warming and the protection of international waters. Together with the Office to Combat Desertification and Drought (see PART THREE, Chapter VII), UNDP supported the National Action Programme (NAP) processes for combating desertification and drought in 16 African countries. With UNDP funding, United Nations Volunteers were attached to the NAP national coordinating bodies in several African countries.

During 1997, the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board took action with regard to a number of country programmes for African countries and, in March [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/10)], it approved the first regional cooperation framework for Africa; it also approved first CCFs for Eritrea, Ethiopia, Mauritania, Namibia and Uganda and took note of the extension of the sixth country programme for Kenya. In May [dec. 97/20], the Board approved first CCFs for the Comoros, Lesotho, Sierra Leone, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zambia. By a September decision [dec. 97/29], the Board adopted the first CCFs for the following countries: Angola, Benin, Botswana, Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Chad, Gabon, Guinea-Bissau, Malawi, Mauritius, Sao Tome and Principe, Senegal, Seychelles, South Africa, Swaziland and Zimbabwe. It postponed consideration of the first CCF for the Congo.

In a decision of 19 September [dec. 97/25], the Board approved the first CCF for Nigeria [DP/CCF/NIR/1] with the provision that the Administrator develop programmes in the areas identified in the CCF, using the following guidelines: the programmes must benefit the poorest and deliver benefits at the grass-roots level; the components of the programmes must be prepared with the participation of the beneficiaries, from the poorest sections of the community, and implemented through organizations of civil society, including non-governmental organizations (NGOs); and the programme should be developed with monitoring components to enable the Administrator to report in 1998 on the content of the programme and to conduct evaluations on the programme's impact annually thereafter.

Arab States

Through the Regional Bureau for Arab States, UNDP oversaw programmes in 18 Arab countries in 1997 [DP/1998/17/Add.1 (Part II)]. They concentrated on poverty eradication, governance and support to countries in special development situations, and gender equality and the advancement of women. Compared with 30 years earlier, the quality of life had improved throughout the region. Life expectancy, literacy, school enrolment, access to health care and the availability of safe water and sanitation had doubled or tripled in the region as a whole. However, the averages masked the sharp variations between countries. The level of poverty in the region was estimated to be 34 per cent.

During 1997, special regional resources were allocated to enable programme countries to produce country-specific NHDRs, which had been important tools in raising awareness of the challenges facing countries, especially the potentially negative effects of the globalizing world economy. The policy dialogue on economic growth and social development that started at the 1996 regional meeting of experts on poverty alleviation and sustainable livelihoods culminated in the June 1997 launching of the document "Main elements of a strategy to eradicate poverty in the Arab States" and a June symposium, organized in cooperation with IMF, for finance and planning ministers to discuss sustainable growth in economic and human development. As a result, UNDP was able to facilitate the identification of the key poverty and social development issues in the region and how best to support programme countries in addressing them.

The first regional cooperation framework for the Arab States (1997-2001) incorporated the identified priorities and summarized the overall regional goal as enhancing the environment for SHD, especially in poverty eradication. Specific programmes included governance for social development; regional food security; building the capacity of the region's workforce for the information-based economy; social and economic reform and multilateral economic cooperation; microfinance and sustainable provision and use of energy; and the sustainable management of natural resources, with focus on water.

At the country level, elements of the regional poverty strategy were adapted to country-specific situations in almost all of the CCFs approved. Fifteen CCFs for Arab countries, approved by the Executive Board in 1997, identified poverty and sustainable livelihoods as a major thematic area. The remaining three CCFs, to be finalized and submitted to the Board in 1998, would also reflect regional priorities.

In Yemen, UNDP was working at the advocacy and policy levels, assisting the Government to formulate its NHDR, poverty alleviation action plan, labour policy and data management system. The programme also aimed to strengthen the capacity of local authorities in planning and implementation. Downstream, the programme aimed at the reintegration of the poor through a housing scheme and through the socio-economic development of the Socotra Archipelago, in collaboration with GEF. Special emphasis was placed on the integration of women through a micro-credit scheme. In Jordan, a multi-agency partnership assisted the country in initiating a major microfinance programme. With UNDP serving as the lead organizer and secretariat, a national microfinance conference was implemented that brought together over 100 policy makers and microfinance practitioners to discuss how to improve the use of microfinance for poverty alleviation and entrepreneurship both through parastatal development institutions and NGOs. As a result of the conference, a joint training programme was formulated for Jordanian microfinance institutions to be implemented in 1998-1999.

In countries that enjoyed high per capita income, UNDP brought issues of poverty and equitable distribution of income to the forefront. In Bahrain, UNDP, in cooperation with the Government, established a national SHD network, including ministries and national agencies that were involved in the analysis of the social, cultural and economic aspects of SHD. UNDP assisted the United Arab Emirates to initiate poverty eradication measures by conducting a poverty measurement and an evaluation aimed at improving its social assistance schemes. It also provided United Nations Volunteers to assist in vocational training. A mobile training centre was created for remote areas to enhance employment opportunities for the poor. In Morocco, UNDP, in collaboration with UNFPA, supported the application of the National Sustainable Development Network project, targeting priority provinces.

The first regional workshop on governance for social development (Beirut, Lebanon, December), attended by decision makers and officials, representatives of civil society organizations and academia, among others, discussed the impact of good governance and approaches in the context of social development. UNDP country-based programming in the Arab States reflected specific country needs for support in governance areas such as: elections and/or capacity-building for electoral bodies; the judiciary; the parliamentary system; social programming and management; decentralization; public service reform; and audit and accountability functions.

Countries in special development situations in the region received support from UNDP in order to enable them to respond to the needs of the situation, using special emergency resources and funding from target for resource assignment from the core (TRAC). UNDP provided Djibouti, Lebanon, Somalia, the Sudan and Yemen with resources for special programmes for specific rehabilitation or emergency situations. Emergency funds were allocated to Djibouti, Somalia and Yemen to manage the effects of floods and torrential rains. TRAC resources were allocated to support strategic planning in Somalia and Yemen; a civil protection and governance programme in Somalia; area rehabilitation, NGOs and female-headed households in Djibouti; and socio-economic rehabilitation in Lebanon.

In Algeria, UNDP focused support on four areas—employment promotion, support for socio-economic reforms, environmental protection and diversification of non-hydrocarbon exports. The year was devoted to the completion of activities begun under the sixth country programme and to the formulation of the first CCF (1998-2000). In Djibouti, UNDP support concentrated on supporting the Government's efforts to mobilize resources for its socio-economic programme through a round-table exercise (Geneva, May) with representation from major contributor countries, Arab countries and Arab funds. Lebanon, still tackling post-conflict rehabilitation and displacement issues, received UNDP support for rehabilitation and reconstruction in the south of the country. Work in 1997 included preparing a national programme for poverty alleviation, developing a poverty alleviation action plan, conducting a survey of national living standards, and carrying out a poverty mapping study using the unsatisfied basic needs approach. In Somalia, UNDP focused on governance and peace-building. Programmes included rehabilitation projects designed to bring harmony between conflicting groups. Assistance to regional seaports continued to stimulate local economies. UNDP initiated a pilot area rehabilitation scheme in the Sudan, which had been affected by several years of civil conflict. The main aim of the project was to improve and sustain self-sufficiency in food production for the population living in conflict areas.

In 1997, UNDP's Regional Bureau for Arab States and the Regional Bureau for Africa collaborated in the formulation of programmes in support of countries in special development situations in the Horn of Africa subregion, including Djibouti, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Kenya, Somalia, the Sudan and Uganda, with funding being provided either from TRAC or from regional resources for the two priority areas of rehabilitation and resettlement of displaced populations and for food security.

Gender equality and the mainstreaming of women in the development process was a theme in almost all UNDP-supported programmes in the region. That concern was reflected in the CCFs, particularly in relation to poverty alleviation and microcredit/microfinance schemes. At the regional level, the Centre for Arab Women's Training and Research, supported by UNDP and other sources, continued to be the focal point for creating gender-advocacy capacity and networking among Arab countries on gender issues. As an example at the country level, women in the Sudan benefited from programmes giving priority to female-headed households for credit from revolving funds, to training and to other enabling tools to raise their living standards in a sustainable manner.

During 1997, the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board took action with regard to a number of country programmes for Arab States and, in September [dec. 97/29], approved the first regional co-operation framework for the Arab States.

By a January decision [dec. 97/6], the Board took note of the extension of the fifth country programme for Bahrain and for the sixth country programmes for Algeria and Jordan, and in May [dec. 97/20] approved the first CCFs for Lebanon, Morocco and Tunisia. In September [dec. 97/29], the Board approved the first CCFs for Djibouti, Egypt, Jordan, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, the Sudan, the Syrian Arab Republic, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen. It took note of the extension of the fifth country programme for the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.

Asia and Pacific

Significant economic, environmental and political events and trends in 1997 affected a large number of people in Asia and the Pacific and presented challenges to promoting SHD [DP/1998/17/Add.1 (Part III)]. Rapid globalization, accompanied by weak oversight of domestic investment and financial markets, contributed to the financial crisis that began in South-East Asia in July 1997, which, in turn, set off a series of economic reverberations within the region and globally. Among the consequences were reduced purchasing power, growing unemployment and diminished prospects for sources of income in the short and medium term. Forest fires in Indonesia had a major environmental impact on South-East Asia and natural disasters had a devastating effect in many countries.

The UNDP Regional Bureau for Asia and the Pacific responded to those conditions and development demands by promoting more equitable socio-economic conditions in four areas of support—poverty alleviation, governance, the advancement of women, and environmental protection and natural resource management. Through the UN resident coordinators in the region, UNDP supported the strategic planning of UN-system development activities at the country level; aid coordination; the fostering of productive network arrangements across the region; and the facilitation of subregional and intercountry cooperation.

In the area of poverty eradication, UNDP assisted Indonesia and Thailand in carrying out national responses to ensure that the crisis did not cripple long-term economic growth and undermine national human development achievements. UNDP concentrated on policy guidance and programme support by engaging government officials and others in dialogue on the social and economic implications of the crisis and possible recovery strategies; establishing a mechanism through which relevant policy advice and recovery scenarios might be identified and incorporated into national policy agendas; and reorienting UNDP programme activities to take into account the implications of the crisis, especially with regard to the poor. In Malaysia, UNDP was supporting the Government in a study on globalization and policy implications on trade, services and financial sector liberalization.

All countries of the region, except for Afghanistan and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, had prepared or were preparing NHDRs, with the support of UNDP. The reports had helped to stimulate national debate on poverty and human development issues and had provided policy makers with up-to-date indicators to assess and formulate appropriate development policies. For example, reports released at the end of 1997 in Cambodia, Mongolia and the Philippines initiated, respectively, national discussions on poverty, the impact of economic transition on people's socio-economic well-being, and the roles and conditions of women in society. In Thailand, UNDP oversaw the reorientation of several programmes to address more directly poverty alleviation and SHD as primary goals, including a programme addressing participatory rural infrastructure and non-motorized urban transport planning, and another focusing on public participation in social and environmental impact assessments and developing community-based electricity and income-generation schemes. The UNDP country office in Fiji assisted Solomon Islands to address external and domestic debt arrears and widespread unemployment through such measures as reviewing the Government's proposed policy reform, assessing the civil service and other reform issues, and drafting a proposal for a medium-term development plan. In Viet Nam, UNDP joined other organizations in supporting a study on basic social services. Several organizations, including UNDP, were involved in publishing a report on malnutrition in Samoa. In December, a meeting of the heads of government departments and UN system agencies on nutrition issues in Samoa was convened to review the report's recommendations and discuss a national plan of action on nutrition for Samoa. A UNDP-supported project in Mongolia dealt with the development of water supply, sanitation and hygiene education, and 15 wells were drilled. UNDP and Mongolia were also collaborating on a national water and sanitation strategy.

The second Asia-Africa Cooperation Forum (Thailand, June), attended by senior officials from 55 African and Asian countries, held discussions on capacity-building, sustainable agricultural development and food security, and private sector development. In Pakistan, UNDP, in collaboration with officials in Kashmir, launched a multisectoral community-based programme focused on poverty eradication. UNDP continued to provide support to microcredit and microfinance initiatives in the region. For example, under a UNDP-supported programme in Tibet Autonomous Region of China, 163 poor families received small loans. In Yunnan Province and Yilong, China, 1,900 and 2,500 poor households, respectively, were organized into self-help groups; women comprised 94 per cent of the membership of those groups. A project in the UNDP-supported poverty alleviation programme in Myanmar facilitated access of poor communities to microcredit and provided small-business support services.

To enhance the competitiveness of small- and medium-scale industry in Sri Lanka, a UNDP/United Nations Industrial Development Organization project trained 25 executives from six national institutions in industrial project appraisal. In Bhutan, under the UNDP-supported cottage and small- and medium-scale industries development programme, 118 women were trained in tailoring, weaving and vegetable dyeing, following which many graduates started their own businesses. Following a jute diversification programme in India, UNDP extended its activities to more small entrepreneurs in the non-formal sector in 1997, providing employment to over 2,500 persons.

In the area of governance and support to countries in special development situations, UNDP assisted the Election Commission in Bangladesh to strengthen the electoral process by training 382,000 election officials and polling agents, distributing training and voter education materials, and preparing media spots. In Nepal, two UNDP-supported programmes enhanced the planning and management capacities of locally elected bodies in 40 of the 75 districts. The programmes formed 632 self-governing community organizations, covering 17,289 households. A poverty eradication programme in Afghanistan promoted a democratic decision-making system at the grass-roots level, community empowerment towards sustainable rehabilitation, and the introduction of livelihood options. A total of $1.8 million for initiatives in conflict areas in Sri Lanka was approved, including support for the resettlement of 10,000 families affected by conflict, the establishment of resettlement offices, the resuscitation of community-based micro-credit schemes to provide employment opportunities, and the rehabilitation of markets to stimulate the local economy. A project begun in April in the Philippines provided UNDP assistance to the Government, the Moro National Liberation Front and key actors in civil society in confidence-building measures to sustain peace in post-conflict areas, and included emergency and short-term assistance.

In Cambodia, UNDP provided assistance for a demining programme in which 2,043,184 square metres of land were cleared and 191 mine-awareness courses were conducted, reaching 28,000 villagers in 1997. In the Lao People's Democratic Republic, UNDP supported a survey on the effect of chemical defoliants on the people and environment as well as the destruction of over 40,000 unexploded ordnances. It also trained 466 students in explosive clearance. In response to the severe drought in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the UN system issued an appeal for aid. The Republic of Korea responded with a $10 million contribution, including heavy equipment for infrastructure repair. UNDP facilitated the direct transfer of the equipment between the two countries. In October, UNDP approved a further $2 million in emergency relief.

Indonesia suffered a severe drought, resulting in food shortages, and UNDP assisted in coordinating relief efforts and in mobilizing $1.2 million in contributions. A major typhoon struck Viet Nam in November, causing serious flooding. The Government's Disaster Management Unit supported UN and donor relief operations by providing updated information on damage, needs and donor assistance, and UNDP provided $150,000 in emergency funds and mobilized another $460,000 from other donors.

In the priority area of gender equality and the advancement of women, the Regional Network of Asia-Pacific Women Scientists for Sustainable and Equitable Development was launched in 1997, with support from UNDP. Through the Network's efforts, programmes were developed in providing access to advanced technology to poor women, promoting sustainable livelihoods, environmental regeneration and poverty eradication.

Environmental protection and management in the Himalayan eco-region was addressed by a six-nation (Bhutan, China, India, Myanmar, Nepal, Pakistan) initiative designed to respond to the threat posed to biodiversity by the region's increasing poverty, rapidly growing human population and other consequences of rapid development. With UNDP support, Maldives prepared its second national environment action plan, which provided a framework for sustainable environmental management and development, emphasizing the priority areas of biodiversity, climate change, environmental health and coastal erosion. In the Philippines, a government-owned bank and UNDP jointly financed community-based projects to promote sustainable livelihoods and environmental regeneration in the countryside. UNDP also initiated a $1.5 million programme to increase private sector participation in environmental management initiatives. Together with other donors, UNDP supported a number of refrigerator manufacturers in Iran in efforts to convert to ozone-friendly production. The first such company began production of non-chlorofluorocarbon products in October.

For the Asia and Pacific region, non-core resources approved for 1997 totalled $171.3 million, a 71 per cent increase over 1996. Approval of core resources for 1997 stood at 94.5 per cent of peak budget targets at the end of the year. Priority for resource allocations was given to least developed and low-income countries. By the end of 1997, 85 per cent of the 1997 budget line for countries in special circumstances in the region had been delivered, particularly for activities in Afghanistan, Cambodia and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

During 1997, the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board acted on a number of country programmes for Asia and the Pacific and, in March [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/10)], approved the first regional cooperation framework for the region and the first CCFs for Bhutan, India, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia and Papua New Guinea. In May [dec. 97/20], the Board approved the first CCF for Iran. In September [dec. 97/29], the Board approved the first CCFs for Cambodia, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Fiji, Kiribati, Malaysia, Maldives, the Marshall Islands, Micronesia, Nepal, Niue, Pakistan, Palau, the Philippines, Samoa, Solomon Islands, Sri Lanka, Thailand, Tonga, Tuvalu and Vanuatu.

In January [dec. 97/6], the Board took note of a report by the Administrator on assistance to Myanmar [DP/1997/4] in which he stated that the first phase of the Human Development Initiative (HDI) had been completed and preparations were complete and implementation activities initiated on the HDI extension.

In March [dec. 97/10], the Board took note of the Administrator's report on assistance to Afghanistan [DP/1997/7] in which he stated that, as agreed by the Governing Council (the forerunner of the Executive Board), UNDP had been delivering assistance on a case-by-case basis since there was no country programme due to the security situation. The Administrator again sought the Board's authorization to continue to approve projects on a project-by-project basis over the next two years.

Europe and CIS

UNDP support in Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) aimed at addressing poverty in a region suffering from severe depression, with countries experiencing the sharpest reversals in living standards in the world during the 1990s [DP/1998/17/Add.1 (Part IV)]. An overriding issue and constraint that affected the implementation of UNDP activities in many countries was political and social insecurity and instability. The Regional Bureau for Europe and CIS supported the objective of eliminating poverty as countries coped with the shock of transition. Activities in the areas of governance, gender balance, environmental protection and economic and social policy were developed within a strategic framework that reflected a recognition of the desired impact on poverty and equity.

In supporting efforts to eradicate poverty, UNDP formulated its first regional poverty project, which was proving to be an important vehicle in analysing priorities for action. The project helped to define critical policy issues at the national and subregional levels, and provided a framework for linking national and regional activities and enhancing the effectiveness of the Poverty Strategy Initiative. Each country that prepared an NHDR included analysis of poverty.

In Bulgaria, poverty had become pervasive and unemployment was expected to increase as a result of the accelerated structural reforms that were under way. The UNDP-supported Human Security Survey and the annual NHDRs sought to identify ordinary people's perceptions of their situation and promote the building of consensus about solutions to the problems. In addition, an early warning report placed the emphasis on crisis prevention and the political implications of the country's human security context. UNDP was also engaged in the policy dialogue on unemployment. It successfully advocated the establishment of a social emergency fund in Bulgaria and supported projects for temporary employment schemes. Under those projects, $4 million, including $3.4 million in cost-sharing from the European Union (EU), had been allocated for the creation of over 20,000 man-months of employment. UNDP-supported business promotion centres in four regions of Bulgaria had contributed to the creation of 250 jobs.

New projects to provide direct support to small- and medium-scale enterprises were developed in Belarus, Bulgaria and Kyrgyzstan. Twelve counsellors went to Romania for a four-week training programme, organized and run by Romanian staff, to develop projects that were sustainable and had a significant multiplier effect.

Within the priority area of governance and support to countries in special development situations, the UNDP programme in Bosnia and Herzegovina grew from $5.27 million to $16.42 million during 1997. Projects were in the areas of social rehabilitation and peace-building, which were important steps in diminishing tensions among ethnic groups and between returning persons and those who had remained during the war. Rehabilitation of housing and social infrastructure resulted in the return of many persons to their places of origin. While unemployment remained high, projects provided training and fostered income-generating activities, in order to promote economic recovery. The programme had attracted substantial non-core financing, which rose from 33 per cent in 1996 to 62 per cent in 1997. Of that outside funding, 30 million came from Japan and $12.6 million from the EU.

Through its regional programme to promote democracy, governance and participation, UNDP provided further assistance to countries in strengthening capacities of institutions addressing human rights. Several regional and country-specific projects were initiated in promoting ombudsman-type and human rights protection mechanisms, with emphasis on legislation formulation, exchange of best practices, information-sharing and training. In cooperation with human rights institutions, UNDP organized the Third International Workshop on Ombudsman and Human Rights Protection Institutions (Riga, Latvia, 9-11 June) on the theme "Building democracy: from theory to practice". Participants from European and CIS countries exchanged experience with representatives of ombudsman and human rights protection institutions from other regions on the establishment and functioning of such institutions. Related projects were developed in Kazakhstan, Moldova, the Russian Federation, Uzbekistan and other countries. In Latvia, UNDP focused on the protection of human rights, increased integration among ethnic groups, social welfare reform and development of the NGO sector.

Under a regional project on training for external resources management, government officials from various countries were able to review how other countries had maximized both the flow and impact of external resources. In partnership with the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the World Bank, the UNDP project began a series of training seminars on external debt management and promoted software to facilitate that task. Training activities were designed to assist the most developed countries of Eastern Europe to establish their own technical and financial cooperation programmes.

In 1997, a four-year regional project was launched to support gender in development in Central and Eastern Europe and in CIS by providing assistance to improve institutional capacity to address gender issues. Its focus was on strengthening the capacity of national gender-in-development units and providing assistance on specific issues to Governments; supporting national and regional NGOs and assisting in establishing their networks; and reinforcing gender analysis and training capacity in each country.

With regard to environmental protection, assistance was provided to the Murmansk (Russian Federation) Regional Administration, which enabled it to prepare a sustainable development action plan for the region and a regional investment strategy for socio-economic development. Another project assisted in the restructuring of the Georgia International Oil Company, incorporating three components—rehabilitation of Gachiani (an oil-transit area close to Tbilisi), formulation of feasibility studies and promotion of investment projects. Progress was made on the rehabilitation of Gachiani, reversing an environmental problem of oil leakage. That also solved an economic problem for the country and a financial problem for the company.

During 1997, the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board took action with regard to a number of country programmes for Europe and CIS and, in March [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/10)], approved the first regional cooperation framework for Europe and CIS and the first CCFs for Croatia, Latvia, Poland, Romania and Uzbekistan. In January [dec. 97/6], the Board approved the first CCFs for the Czech Republic, Hungary, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Republic of Moldova and Slovakia. The first CCFs for Belarus, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Estonia and Lithuania were approved by the Board in May [dec. 97/20]; those for Armenia, Azerbaijan, Bulgaria, Georgia, Malta, the Russian Federation, St. Helena, Slovenia, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Turkmenistan and Ukraine were approved in September, when the Board also agreed to postpone consideration of the first CCF for Yugoslavia and took note of the extension of the fourth country programme for Albania [dec. 97/29].

Latin America and Caribbean

Two salient development issues in Latin America and the Caribbean were the aggravation of long-standing social inequities and the continued weaknesses of democratic systems of governance, said the UNDP Administrator in his annual report covering 1997 [DP/1998/17/Add.1 (Part V)]. Countries of the region had great disparities between rich and poor, urban and rural areas, and central and peripheral geographic zones. The negative aspects of social exclusion particularly affected women and indigenous peoples. Democracies had serious institutional weaknesses, particularly in the judiciary and public security systems, and corruption continued to be prevalent. As to the sustainable use of natural resources, much work remained to be done in formulating and implementing sound environmental and natural resources management policies.

In the area of poverty eradication, UNDP carried out applied research to establish an information base to contribute to the debate on linkages between macroeconomic policies and poverty, with the aim of guiding policy- and decision-making and complementing national projects dealing with anti-poverty measures. An important development in national poverty programmes was the increasing number of partnerships with the private sector. The regional Macroeconomic Policies and Poverty Programme, completed in 1997, resulted in conclusions on the relationships between macroeconomic policies and poverty and contributed to the upstream dialogue on the impact of those policies on levels of poverty. UNDP cooperated with the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) and the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean on that programme, with the participation of 15 countries of the region. National experts carried out country case studies using a common methodology for macroeconomic analysis to examine the causal factors of poverty. Statistical work was performed on available national accounts and household surveys in each of the countries for 1980-1996. In addition to the country case analyses, the programme produced three cross-country papers on poverty, macroeconomics and gender.

Some findings from the programme were: poverty reduction was correlated with increases in gross domestic product (GDP) and GDP per capita, increases in the minimum wage, reductions in unemployment and reductions in inflation; increases in poverty were correlated with increases in Gini coefficients, used to measure the degree of inequality in income distribution; there was a positive relationship between the incidence of poverty and the balance of payments; gender was not a relevant explanatory variable of changes in relative poverty; improvements in education were a significant factor in poverty reduction; and the movement of households from the rural sector, where poverty was high, to the urban sector, where it was lower, was likely to have an impact on total poverty.

The focus for the Caribbean was on promoting advocacy on poverty issues and on the conduct of broad-based national-level consultations, aimed at identifying impoverished groups and their location and the main poverty trends in each country. Capacity-building efforts were being put into place to support poverty measurement and the determination of poverty reduction strategies.

A programme was launched in Mexico to combat poverty through the generation of employment. In partnership with state governments and the private sector, UNDP was supporting the development of small businesses, the country's main sources of employment, through their integration into productive chains and local clusters.

UNDP was also supporting employment generation through technical assistance in marketing, business administration and credit. In partnership with local NGOs, 62 productive initiatives were implemented, including organic honey and organic gum production for export, managed tropical wood exploitation, organic agriculture, embroidered handicrafts, farmed prawns and ornamental fish. Approximately 30 per cent of those initiatives were being managed by women.

In the area of governance, UNDP began a judicial reform programme in 1977, together with IDB and other donors. The programme would contribute to the modernization and legitimization of judicial systems by promoting greater access for vulnerable groups, and would establish the legal environment and security to stimulate national and international investments.

Within the framework of the 1996 Guatemalan peace accords [YUN 1996, p. 168], UNDP cooperated with other UN organizations in demobilizing nearly 4,000 ex-combatants and in the construction of eight camps for temporary settlement. It also supported the resettlement of displaced people in six departments of Guatemala. Another activity was the dissemination of the Agreement on the Identity and Rights of Indigenous Peoples and technical, human and financial support provided to Mayan organizations. Support was provided to increase the participation of indigenous peoples in debates and proposals affecting them, such as education reform, the rights of indigenous women, popular participation, the preservation of sacred places and land rights. In an attempt to address Colombia's internal conflict situation, UNDP approved $1.1 million for projects for displaced persons, promoting national reconciliation and institutional reforms.

With regard to gender equality and the advancement of women, UNDP, jointly with the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM), began to coordinate a continent-wide inter-agency media and public education campaign on violence against women and girls in the region. The campaign would draw on the network of representatives and staff members of each sponsoring agency as well as the UN information centres in the region for advocacy, capacity-building and media communication, and work in partnership with a wide range of local and regional groups.

In the area of environment, UNDP assisted 23 countries in obtaining $5.56 million from GEF to work towards their commitments under the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change [YUN 1992, p. 681] and the Convention on Biological Diversity [YUN 1992, p. 683]. Projects with a total value of $37 million were approved to: conserve biodiversity through sustainable use in the coastal zone of Patagonia and the eastern wetlands of Uruguay; establish a programme for consolidation of the Mesoamerican Biological Corridor in Central America and Mexico; and initiate rural electrification in remote areas of Bolivia, using wind and solar energy.

UNDP obtained $1.306 million from GEF to develop proposals aimed at: developing renewable energy sources in Ecuador and Panama; protecting biodiversity in the Galapagos Islands; developing a long-term strategic programme to eliminate pollution and conserve the biological resources of the Rio de la Plata; and demonstrating the feasibility of hydrogen fuel cells in the mass transit system of Sao Paulo, Brazil. A UNDP/UNEP partnership agreement was signed in October to prepare a strategy to consolidate Tierramerica, a newspaper supplement, into a comprehensive communications platform; provide support within the priority areas of Ministers of Environment in Latin America and the Caribbean; and carry out a subregional study on trade and environment. UNDP and UNEP also established a regional advisory facility in Mexico with country office support. At the request of the heads of State who met at the Hemispheric Conference on Sustainable Development (Santa Cruz, Bolivia, December 1996), UNDP was formulating a project to support the establishment of a Knowledge Network for the Americas to promote the use of the new information technologies for the benefit of the development community through capacity-building, linking existing networks and disseminating publications.

During 1997, the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board took action with regard to a number of country programmes for Latin America and the Caribbean and, in January [E/1997/33 (dec.97/6)], approved the first regional cooperation framework for the region and the first CCF for Belize. In March [dec. 97/10], the Board approved the first CCFs for Colombia and Panama and took note of the extension of the fifth country programme for Haiti. In September [dec. 97/29], the Board approved the first CCFs for Anguilla, Argentina, Barbados, the British Virgin Islands, Brazil, Chile, Cuba, Dominica, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Grenada, Guyana, Honduras, Jamaica, Mexico, Peru, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Trinidad and Tobago, Uruguay and Venezuela. It agreed to postpone consideration of the first CCF for Montserrat and took note of the extension of the third country programmes for Antigua and Barbuda, the Cayman Islands, Saint Kitts and Nevis and the Turks and Caicos Islands and of the fifth country programmes for Costa Rica and Paraguay.

Global programme framework

In accordance with a 1996 request [YUN 1996, p. 777], the UNDP Administrator submitted to the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board, at its January session, the revised text of the first global cooperation framework [DP/GCF/1].

The term "global programme" referred to all activities covered by the global, interregional and special activities of the UNDP budget, for which the Board had allocated 4.2 per cent of total UNDP resources. The report contained a framework for the global programme for a three-year period beginning in 1997 that emphasized overall objectives, strategies and main activities. The global programme was aimed at advancing a multidisciplinary approach to development, integrating social, environmental and gender concerns into the macroeconomic framework. It was intended to support country offices and regional bureaux in programme formulation and facilitate their access to knowledge and tools for SHD. It was estimated that $126 million in resources would be available for the global cooperation framework for the 1997-1999 period.

On 17 January [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/5)], the Board requested the Administrator, taking into account the Board's comments, to elaborate further the first global cooperation framework draft and to produce a revised proposal, including a strategic plan for implementation. The revised proposal should take into account, among other things: comments of delegations at the session; the need to focus on programme activities that had a global nature, could not be implemented under regional or country programmes, and could enhance national efforts to achieve SHD; the need to prioritize programme activities and focus them where UNDP could make a real difference; and the need to avoid duplication while strengthening collaboration with relevant bodies. The Board stressed that the revised proposal should contain an overview of ongoing activities to be discontinued during 1997-1999, and should specify how programme activities would be monitored and evaluated. In the meantime, activities for which commitments had already been made should continue and up to 33.3 per cent of global programme resources could be committed. The revised proposal should include a list of ongoing and planned activities.

In the revised first global country cooperation framework report for 1997-2000 [DP/GCF/1/Rev.1], UNDP stated that the process of redefining the global programme was the result of the reorientation of the UNDP focus towards the overarching theme of SHD.

The programme had four major purposes: to distil from country-level experience lessons learned, and identify new, innovative ways to promote SHD; to disseminate that knowledge globally and promote research, debate and application; to explore ways to translate global priorities into country-level follow-up action, multilateral initiatives and partnerships; and to encourage studies on concrete, practical policy measures for translating SHD from concept to action.

The goal of the first cooperation framework for the global programme was to refine the global agenda for attaining SHD into a series of interventions that could be implemented through UNDP. That goal implied three operational objectives: to develop UNDP interventions responding to global mandates, in particular those emanating from UN conferences, for adaptation by regional and country programmes and projects; to provide the technical guidance needed to respond to demands from regional and country programmes; and to identify gaps and emerging issues for attaining SHD and to work to incorporate them into the global agenda. To achieve those objectives, the global cooperation framework would concentrate on five areas: poverty elimination; gender equality; environmental sustainability; governance; and emerging and cross-cutting issues. Within each category, a few priority subprogrammes were being proposed, against which the bulk of the available resources (80 per cent) would be allocated. The programme would also support a limited number of other activities within those categories that represented long-term commitments of importance to SHD.

The report stated that UNDP shared the concern of the Executive Board in seeing concrete benchmarks and indicators against which the global programme framework could later be measured. Developing indicators in the concentration areas was one of the chief tasks of the global programme framework. For each concentration area, the report identified global needs for successful implementation of national strategies and identified subprogrammes.

Improvements in management and oversight arrangements were proposed in the report, which pointed out the need to simplify accountability linkages and decentralize authority.

For the 1997-2000 period of the cooperation framework, the global programme was allocated $126 million from UNDP core funds. From that amount $12 million was borrowed by the projects in the previous cycle to allow a smooth transition into the current cycle, another 9 per cent was allocated for the programme reserve and 7 per cent for contingencies. Some 11 per cent would be used to support additional programme activities such as costs relating to the Human Development Report and the Office of Development Studies. The remaining amount of $78.2 million would be allocated to the five concentration areas.

The Executive Board, on 19 September [dec. 97/29], approved the revised global cooperation framework.

The Administrator, in his annual report covering 1997 [DP/1998/17/Add.2], listed global and interregional programmes, which focused on the areas of poverty eradication, gender equality and the advancement of women, establishing an enabling environment for SHD, and environmental protection and regeneration. The main funding vehicle for those activities was the global cooperation framework. Under the Poverty Strategies Initiative, there were projects in 98 countries that provided upstream support in enhancing capacity for poverty analysis, policy review and the formulation of national poverty eradication strategies. The Initiative was financed by $12 million in UNDP core resources and $11 million in donor contributions. In 1997, the Gender-in-Development Programme supported country offices in the development of 35 national plans for the Fourth World Conference on Women [YUN 1995, p. 1169] follow-up and, in association with UNIFEM, engaged 20 United Nations Volunteers gender advisors to be placed in country offices and support resident coordinators. In the area of governance, UNDP initiated a global research project involving the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (Cambridge, United States) and 10 national research institutions in participating countries, including Honduras, Jordan, Pakistan and Poland, to analyse decentralization initiatives. An example of a 1997 programme in the field of environment was the UNDP Global Programme on Forests. A forest policy framework linking forest programmes with food security and sustainable livelihoods programmes was developed in cooperation with partner agencies and programme countries.

Improving implementation of regional cooperation programmes

By a 14 March decision [dec. 97/9] on guidelines for improving the implementation of regional cooperation programmes, the Executive Board requested the UNDP Administrator to present in 1998 an implementation strategy paper for each regional cooperation programme, and set forth a number of elements that each paper should incorporate. Emphasizing the need for clear, concise language in the regional implementation strategy papers, the Board also requested that each paper contain a strategy for monitoring and evaluation, including practical performance indicators and benchmarks. The Board emphasized the need for regional ownership of the regional programmes and the importance of regional execution by national, subregional and regional institutions, as well as the need to ensure sustainability in implementing thematic initiatives included in the regional cooperation programme. It requested the Administrator to present in 1998 a timetable for the mid-term review of all regional programmes and to include in the strategy paper for each region a proposal on the methodology for the review. The Administrator was further requested to elaborate strategic guidelines for the development, implementation, monitoring and evaluation of a regional programme that would apply to all regions.

Programme planning and management

Change management: UNDP 2001

In March, the Administrator reported to the Executive Board on UNDP change management [DP/1997716/Add.7], a process begun in 1994 with an array of reforms aimed at recasting the organization's mission, priorities, programming arrangements and other defining characteristics. The purpose was to reposition UNDP on three fronts: as an effective partner in the new environment for development cooperation emerging after the cold war; as a unifying force to strengthen UN support for development; and as an effective voice for a revitalized system of international development cooperation. Those changes were undertaken simultaneously with efforts to build a leaner, more efficient and more accountable organization. After the first round of changes in 1994-1995, UNDP senior managers, having encountered some constraints to realizing the organization's new objectives, identified priority objectives for the next round in 1996-1997: to build a renewed organization that could get decisions made and implemented efficiently; to align UNDP values and structure with its new primary mission to help to eradicate poverty through SHD; to improve leadership styles and establish a culture among staff of efficiency, trust, learning, results-orientation, quality assurance and accountability; and to review and restructure its corporate and operational functions in order to provide the most cost-conscious, efficient and effective service to programme countries, the United Nations and the international community. That change management process, called "UNDP 2001", was intended to accelerate the directions that UNDP had already adopted.

The report proposed a number of changes to ensure the efficiency and effectiveness of UNDP country-level operations and strengthen the resident coordinator system, to mobilize resources on behalf of programme countries, to enhance programme focus and target resources for high-priority development needs, to insist on results-based management and monitoring of impact, to achieve efficiency gains, to strengthen accountability and performance measurement, to develop human resources, to develop information systems that supported business processes and to restructure UNDP headquarters.

Following internal consultations on change management in the Executive Board, the Administrator issued a May report containing updated proposals [DP/1997/20]. He stated that the resident coordinator was accountable for the coordination of UN activities at the country level and would report to the Secretary-General through the UNDP Administrator. The UNDP regional bureaux would be responsible for the UNDP programme but not for the resident coordinator per se. The bureaux would support the operational activities of the resident coordinator as co-owners of the resident coordinator system. Such operational and system-wide activities would include: preparation and monitoring of the country strategy note (CSN); increased attention to common country assessments; and support for the round-table and Consultative Group meetings.

Under the UNDP resource mobilization strategy, the principle of the resource mobilization target (RMT), part of each CCF, acknowledged that UNDP core resources alone were insufficient to make a significant difference in the fight against poverty. Country offices would be asked to give more attention to RMT in order to attract more funds for nationally defined SHD goals. Resource mobilization would be undertaken with the support of the programme country Government. Funds raised by UNDP in support of the resident coordinator function did not need to be channelled through the organization but should serve the goals of promoting SHD, the report stated. Resident representatives would be accountable for ensuring that all resources mobilized at the country level fitted into the UNDP SHD framework, met the same criteria applied to all programmable resources and supported approved CCFs. Non-core resources would remain subject to Executive Board scrutiny through mid-term reviews and programme evaluations. Resident representatives should leverage resources within CCFs as part of their regular programme work, and performance appraisals should provide incentives to encourage them to identify legitimate opportunities for mobilizing non-core funds at the country level.

Noting that country offices needed context-sensitive technical support to help countries to achieve SHD goals, the report proposed a sub-regional resource facilities (SURF) system that would relocate the technical backstopping of country offices from headquarters to the sub-regional level. A technical group was formed to address issues arising in the SURF system, including costs, and final number of and criteria for the location of the facilities. The system was a service to country offices, placing two technical functions—expert referrals and the capture of best practices in SHD—in subregional nodes linked to a small global hub at headquarters.

It was proposed that the independence and effectiveness of the UNDP evaluation function would be ensured by: maintaining the Evaluation Office as a separate unit reporting directly to the Administrator; using professional evaluators; reporting annually on evaluation plans and compliance rates; holding regional bureaux and resident representatives accountable for compliance with evaluation schedules; and providing for sanctions in cases of non-compliance. The relationship between evaluation and learning from past experience would be promoted.

UNDP had considered the possibility of decentralizing the regional bureaux in the field because it concluded that, in theory, only headquarters units needed to be located in New York. However, the decision on their relocation was postponed until the end of the 1998-1999 biennium and would be reviewed in the light of the results of the change proposals.

The report defined the roles of two units within UNDP—the Office of United Nations System Support and Services and the Emergency Response Division (ERD). The former would develop into an inter-agency unit and would support and monitor the performance of the resident coordinator system in humanitarian situations on a UN-wide basis. ERD would deal with the specific emergency responses and functions of UNDP.

Having considered the two reports on change management, the Executive Board on 23 May [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/15)] commended the Administrator and the UNDP staff for the change management process and its overall direction, which aimed to improve services through decentralization of decision-making and responsibilities to the country level and enhanced accountability measures. The Board recognized that UNDP change management should be undertaken within the ongoing UN reform process and stressed that national plans and priorities constituted the only viable frame of reference for the national programming of operational activities within the UN system. It also stressed the need to take into account the outcomes and commitments of relevant UN conferences, and the individual mandates of UN bodies, as well as the importance of financial, individual and performance accountability in UNDP.

The Board welcomed UNDP measures to improve its capacity to support the resident coordinator system and requested UNDP to continue consultations with other funds and programmes on their roles and ownership in that regard.

Emphasizing the importance of core resources as the foundation of the UNDP resource base, the Board stressed that, in pursuing resource mobilization, UNDP country offices should not compromise their primary role of programme delivery. It welcomed the decision to establish a separate Evaluation Unit and the clearer link being made between evaluation, lessons learned and programme enhancement. The Board emphasized that the implementation of the human resource development policy of the change management process should be in accordance with the existing provisions of the UN common system.

Welcoming the Administrator's proposals to strengthen the country focus and operations of UNDP, the Board underlined the need for the change management process to take into account existing decisions and policies on capacity-building and national execution. It supported the phased introduction of a small number of subregional resource facilities and requested the Administrator to report to the Board in 2001 on an evaluation of the functions and impact of the facilities. The Administrator was requested to provide an interim report in 1998, through the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, on the budgetary and human resources implications and efficiency gains occasioned by the phased introduction of the facilities. While establishing the subregional resource facilities in phases, UNDP should take into account the diversity of circumstances; the need to involve national expertise; the need to avoid duplication; and the demand-driven nature of those facilities. The Board requested the Administrator to report on the criteria for staffing country offices and to identify any additional functions.

The Board urged the Administrator and UNDP staff to implement change management while maintaining the primary focus on programme delivery and quality at the country level. It requested the Administrator to incorporate change management into budgetary and corporate planning and to report thereon to the Board in 1997 in the context of the biennial budget. He was also asked to provide an updated implementation plan with quantifiable targets and to report on the implementation of the Board's current decision at each session. The Board noted the Administrator's proposal on focusing UNDP activities and core development services that were still subject to the Board's discussion without losing momentum in the change management process and programme delivery, and requested the Administrator to prepare a report for discussion in 1998. He was asked to include in the report requested in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 785] further analysis of implications resulting from the change management process on the future policy direction of UNDP, including the role of UNDP in implementing programmes and projects, national execution and resource mobilization at the field level.

Communication and information policy

In a March report [DP/1997/17], the Administrator outlined progress achieved in implementing the UNDP communication and advocacy strategy, as approved in 1995 by the UNDP Strategy and Management Committee, and provided information on steps taken to address various issues covered by a 1996 UNDP decision on the subject [YUN 1996, p. 769]. Progress in implementing the strategy, which aimed to raise public awareness and appreciation of UNDP activities within the larger framework of the UN role in development, had been made in the areas of building internal capacity for public information and advocacy; extending outreach to the media; and strengthening advocacy and building partnerships. Action had also been taken with regard to the production and distribution of publications.

To increase its internal capacity, UNDP had appointed a public affairs officer in nearly every country office, provided public affairs training for staff in every region, drawn up communication and advocacy strategies for more than 100 UNDP country offices, and instituted a weekly news bulletin, UNDP FLASH!, which was being distributed electronically in six languages. In countries with both a UN information centre (UNIC) and a UNDP office, public affairs activities were coordinated so that the United Nations was seen to speak with one voice.

As to extending outreach to the media, UNDP was working to build relationships with locally based media through press conferences, b r i e f tions and visits to project sites. In order to increase radio and television coverage of UNDP, the half-hour television documentary series, AZIMUTHS, was produced 10 times a year and aired in over 180 countries; 30-second public-service announcements and video press releases were widely distributed to broadcasters; and radio and television coverage of the launch of the annual Human Development Report, UNDP work in crisis areas and special UN days was mobilized. Other activities included organizing conferences on such themes as governance and gender with leading institutions of higher learning, strengthening ties with parliamentarians, building alliances in its fight against poverty with donor countries and organizations, and outreach to the private sector.

Of the numerous UNDP publications, only a few were produced on a recurring basis: UNDP FLASH!; CHOICES (a quarterly magazine); Illustrated Annual Report; and periodic newsletters issued by some units. Since 1994, UNDP publications had been coordinated by a Publications Board. By the end of February 1997, the Board had reviewed 35 publications and two series of publications. It had made various suggestions, including recommendations to revise content, adjust design to comply with UNDP format, add language versions, increase accessibility by expanding production, and improve distribution. The Board also discussed electronic publishing and approved interim guidelines for Internet publishing.

With regard to linguistic balances, the report stated that most general publications were issued in the three working languages of UNDP: English, French and Spanish. Other language versions might be produced either on demand or for specific projects involving particular target audiences. Linguistic balances were also taken into account in implementing the advocacy and media dimensions of the strategy. As to accessibility, UNDP distributed its publications through: bulk copies being sent to country offices and UNICs; copies being sent to individuals on the UNDP mailing list (consisting of some 30,000 recipients); and copies being handed out at major conferences, briefings, meetings and other venues. Most publications were free of charge. Those for sale were distributed through outside publishers or distributors. With regard to electronic dissemination of information, which was of increasing importance, UNDP had a home page on the Internet and all 134 UNDP country offices had been encouraged to establish a Web site, some 20 offices having done so. On the programme side, initiatives such as the Sustainable Development Network Programme were making development information accessible to ever-larger numbers of people in a growing range of locations.

The change management exercise had reached four major conclusions on external communication and public affairs: communication and advocacy were essential to let the public and UNDP stakeholders know about the UNDP role in helping to achieve SHD; public affairs and advocacy were inextricably linked with resource mobilization; creating an information and advocacy culture within UNDP was critical and had to be embraced by all staff; and additional resources had to be allocated for those purposes. Recommendations to overcome constraints to public affairs included: identification of UNDP promotional messages to be used in contacts with the media; strengthening of linkages among staff working on policy, operational and media matters; encouragement of staff to develop and communicate clear messages on the UNDP role; and more funding for communication and advocacy.

The UNDP Publications Board continued to work on policy guidelines for publications, looking closely at issues raised in the 1996 decision, namely, prioritizing publications, given UNDP financial and human constraints; avoiding duplication with other UN publications; and expanding accessibility to UNDP publications and their language versions through electronic dissemination and other means.

On 23 May [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/17)], the Executive Board welcomed the process initiated by UNDP leading to an improved strategy for communication and information policy and recognized the changes that had taken place since 1995 in creating better awareness for UNDP and the UN system in the media and in the area of advocacy. The Board stressed that such a strategy must be applied throughout UNDP and that its application should be monitored. It emphasized that more targeted, accurate, clear and frank public information was needed to generate support for increased resources for UNDP and stressed that strategic targeting of the communication and information activities was essential to make the most effective use of resources. It also stressed the importance of linguistic balance in electronic dissemination of information. The Board welcomed the proposals for monitoring and evaluation that were integral parts of information and communication activities and needed to be strengthened. It urged the Administrator to improve the focus and quality of public information on the impact of UNDP activities at the country level and to develop new types of statistics and publications to that end, including indicators of impact. The Administrator was asked to ensure that UNDP efforts in that regard were coordinated with those of the UN system, with a view to strengthening consistency in communication, and to report in 1998 on progress in developing and implementing the UNDP communication and information policy with particular reference to the implementation of the relevant change management recommendations (see above), including budgetary implications.

Target resource earmarkings for 1997-1999

In response to a 1995 Executive Board request [YUN 1995, p. 896], UNDP had provided in 1996 preliminary figures on the target for resource assignment from the core (TRAC) earmarkings for 1997-1999 for individual recipient countries. The revised and final figures were provided to the Board's March 1997 session [DP/1997/8].

Regarding indicative planning figures, UNDP would consider revisions to the gross national product (GNP) per capita for resource distribution purposes only within a period of one year after the establishment of the TRAC earmarkings. Thereafter, a revision would be considered only if it varied 10 per cent from the original estimate or if such a revision would lower the GNP per capita below one of the thresholds that were of special significance for calculations, or for the establishment of government obligations for local office costs. No downward revision of established figures was made where there had been increases in estimates of GNP per capita.

The 1994 per capita GNP estimates for 45 countries had been revised downward, resulting in higher TRAC earmarkings for 14 countries. For the remaining 31 countries, all middle-income except one, the change in GNP per capita did not result in higher earmarkings, since their TRACs were determined by the floor principles established in 1995 and their revised lower per capita GNP remained above the pertinent floor thresholds. The increase in TRAC resources for the 14 countries amounted to $36.97 million for the three-year period. The floor data of two countries, South Africa and Suriname, had been corrected, resulting in an additional $2.27 million in TRAC earmarkings.

In 1995, the Executive Board established an unallocated reserve of $25 million for the three-year period to finance, among other things, upward revisions of 1994 basic data. Allocations resulting from adjustments totalled $8.25 million. Consequently, the remaining $16.75 million in the reserve could not fund the additional amount of $37.98 million in TRAC earmarkings. The Administrator suggested that the unfunded portion of $21.23 million be considered in the light of UNDP's resource planning processes and be accommodated in the context of future assignments from the budget line and/or further adjustments in TRAC earmarkings.

The report listed the preliminary and final earmarkings for regions and individual countries for the TRAC budget lines for 1997-1999. By region, 47 per cent of the total TRAC of $ 1.663 billion would be used in Africa, 33 per cent in Asia and the Pacific, 8 per cent in the Arab States, 7 per cent in Latin America and the Caribbean, and 5 per cent in Europe and CIS. Sixty per cent was assigned to the least developed countries. The Administrator noted that the TRACs of net contributor countries (NCCs) would need to be reviewed after the accounts for fifth cycle (1992-1996) obligations and payments had been finalized. Thus, for NCCs that already had that status in the fifth cycle, the Administrator would reduce their reimbursable TRACs by any unfulfilled net contributor obligations in the cycle.

An important element of the successor programming arrangements was the assumption of an initial $3.3 billion financial envelope for total core resources for 1997-1999, or an average annual figure of $1.1 billion. The TRAC figures for regions and countries were based on that financial framework; however, for prudent resource planning, the TRAC earmarkings would be based on an estimated $1 billion in average annual contributions for 1997-1999.

On 14 March [dec. 97/10], the Executive Board took note of the report on TRAC earmarkings.

Internal audit and oversight

In March, the Administrator transmitted to the Executive Board the first annual report on internal audit and oversight services [DP/1997/16/Add.6] provided by the UNDP Division for Audit and Management Review (DAMR) for the year ended 31 December 1996. The sections of the report on internal audit, oversight and accountability, organization and resources, and quality service initiatives applied equally to UNDP, UNFPA and the United Nations Office for Project Services (UNOPS), as DAMR also provided internal audit and oversight services for the latter two organizations.

In 1996, DAMR issued 209 reports and had 84 works in process at the end of the year. It initiated 179 projects during the year. The Division provided internal audit services to 70 country offices and issued 91 internal audit reports, which contained 2,011 recommendations, as compared to 48 audit reports containing 1,402 recommendations in 1995. Of the 1996 recommendations, 1,663 were accepted by those audited and had been or were being implemented. The recommendations dealt with organization and financial operations, programme matters, general administration, personnel administration and office automation.

In the area of organization and financial operations, DAMR identified the following issues: the unclear relationship between resident coordinators and UNIC directors; the need for adjustments to cover emerging functions and functions that needed to be strengthened in line with the changed priorities in UNDP; structural changes coupled with the application of the Financial Information Management (FIM) system were needed to minimize duplications between the finance sections of country offices and the programme support units; the Division of Finance and DAMR were in the process of reviewing the functions of certifying and approving transactions with a view to clarifying the respective responsibilities of certifying and approving officers; certain internal financial controls needed to be improved; rules and safeguards regarding the transfer and replenishment of large amounts of cash at country offices needed to be established and strengthened; and UNDP headquarters needed to keep track of cooperatives and commissaries in the field.

Programme resources management was another area of concern because two systems were used in country offices causing much duplication of work. In addition, there was a need to improve the monitoring of programme/project expenditures. The report noted that cost-sharing contributions were frequently not received on time, due to lack of compliance with UNDP policy as well as lack of internal controls. The latter issue could be resolved through the application of FIM.

In the area of general administration, DAMR considered that more flexibility should be given to country offices in formulating specific procedures according to local situations, based on policies decided upon by the Board or headquarters. A Manual of Operations Management was being formulated for that purpose. Control of official vehicles, inventory control and management, and medical insurance were other issues that required better internal oversight. Reform of employment contracts was needed and was being addressed. Guidelines on investigations in cases where staff members were engaged in unsatisfactory conduct were already being prepared, as DAMR had recommended.

During 1996, a total of 42 Letters of Evaluation were prepared as a result of DAMR review of audit reports submitted and DAMR undertook 12 audit missions or reviews. Major issues arising from the audit missions were: capacity assessment by country offices was not undertaken consistently before engaging in the national execution modality; there was a lack of instructions on UNDP policies and procedures; failure to familiarize all parties concerned with the national execution financial accounting system; delayed delivery by UNDP of year-end financial statements; failure to transfer UNDP expertise to project management and insufficient financial and management oversight by some country offices of project operations; and implementation of projects by autonomous institutions that were not included in the chain of accountability. Those issues were being addressed during the ongoing process of revising the guidelines on national execution and DAMR would follow up on them.

The timeliness of the submission of audit reports by countries remained a major difficulty. Only 11 countries with audited expenditure of $122.7 million provided their audit reports by the deadline of 30 April 1996. In total, for the financial year ended 1995, DAMR received during 1996 audit reports from 70 countries with audited expenditure of $405 million out of a total reported expenditure of $634.8 million.

On 23 May [dec. 97/16], the Executive Board welcomed the format of the report on internal audit of UNDP. It took note of the report and of the observations made by delegations during its debate, and supported the Administrator's proposals to strengthen the internal audit function of UNDP.

Financing

In 1997, the Executive Board approved the zero-growth biennial support budget for 1998-1999, following the 19 per cent reduction in real terms implemented during 1992-1997. The budget was presented for the first time in a newly developed format that was fully harmonized with the budget presentations of UNICEF and UNFPA. The budget incorporated strategic redeployment of resources to finance major change initiatives from within the overall budget envelope.

The UNDP Administrator, in his annual review of the financial situation in 1997 [DP/1998/29 & Corr.1 & Add.1], described the state of UNDP finances at the end of the year and gave financial forecasts for 1998 and 1999. Regular resources activities were defined as those activities financed from voluntary contributions and related interest earnings and miscellaneous income. That category comprised core activities and the Special Measures Fund for Least Developed Countries (SMF/LDC). Other resources activities were those activities financed from sources other than regular resources; they were earmarked for specific programmes and included cost-sharing, government cash counterpart contributions and trust funds established by the Administrator.

In 1997, total expenditure exceeded the total income earned, leading to a drop in the available resource balance. Total income for the year was $778.1 million, as compared with $887.1 million for 1996, a decrease of 12.29 per cent. Total expenditure amounted to $960.9 million, as compared with $846.9 million in 1996, an increase of 13.46 per cent, leaving a shortfall of income over expenditure of $182.8 million. When provision was made for assets write-down, the shortfall rose to $197.2 million.

Voluntary contributions to regular resources (inclusive of SMF/LDC) fell by 10.3 per cent ($87.1 million) to $760.9 million in 1997. The decrease was due to reduced pledges for 1997 and to the strength of the United States dollar, which strengthened overall by 13 per cent in 1997. The Administrator expressed concern about the timing of payments of contributions, especially those not denominated in United States dollars, which were often remitted later in the year, thus undermining the ability of UNDP to protect the value of the contributions through hedging and other risk-management strategies. About $28 million in pledges was unpaid at the end of 1997.

Programme expenditure in 1997 increased by 21 per cent to $654 million as against $537 million in 1996. The use of the national execution modality continued to rise, in line with UNDP objectives, accounting for 55 per cent of total programme expenditure in 1997 ($363 million) compared to 51 per cent in 1996 and 41 per cent in 1995. The share of regular resources programme expenditure for UNOPS, which rose from 19 per cent in 1994 to 25 per cent in 1996, remained stable at 25 per cent ($162 million) in 1997. In contrast, the five largest UN specialized agencies continued to experience decline in delivery of programme activities. In 1997, $76 million or 12 per cent of all programme activities were undertaken by those agencies, down from 29 per cent in 1994 ($155 million in expenditure).

Programme expenditure increased in all regions except Latin America and the Caribbean. Africa accounted for the largest portion of expenditure, and that amount grew from $222 million in 1996 to $278 million in 1997. Expenditure in Asia and the Pacific increased from $173 million in 1996 to $201 million in 1997; in the Arab States, expenditure increased from $34 million to $64 million; in Europe and CIS, the figure rose from $28 million to $37 million; and in Latin America and the Caribbean, expenditure decreased from $47 million to $42 million.

Programme support paid to implementing agents dropped to $53.7 million in 1997 from $59.3 million in 1996, as a consequence of the increase in national execution and in the capacity of programme countries to implement projects/programmes, and of the new successor arrangements mandating that implementing agents earn not more than 10 per cent of project costs as programme support costs.

As at 31 December 1997, unexpended resources for regular resources activities amounted to $285 million, compared to $512.8 million a year earlier, a reduction due to both an increase in programme expenditure and the decrease in voluntary contributions. The balance of unexpended resources at the end of 1997 was the pool of resources available on that date to finance the organization's activities; however, the availability of that balance depended on the degree of liquidity of the assets held. Investments represented the largest component ($257.5 million) of the unexpended resource balance.

The other resources activities comprised mainly third-party cost-sharing, government cost-sharing, government cash counterpart contributions, trust funds, management services agreements and Junior Professional Officers. Continuing the upward trend of the previous few years, contributions for cost-sharing activities increased from $801 million in 1996 to $941 million in 1997. Of the $941 million received in 1997, $843 million was attributable to programme country Governments (an increase from $701 million in 1996) and $98 million to third-party cost-sharing (a decrease from $100 million in 1996). Programme expenditure for other resources activities rose to $850 million in 1997 from $667 million in 1996. Unexpended resources for those activities rose from $515 million in 1996 to $573 million in 1997.

Budget estimates 1998-1999

The Administrator submitted an August report [DP/1997/23] to the Executive Board on budget estimates for the biennium 1998-1999, which were presented in a new format as approved by the Board in January [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/6)] (see below). The proposed budget did not incorporate growth in real terms. Taking into account an increase in estimated income, the new budget in net terms was projected to be within less than 2 per cent of the net budget approved for 1996-1997. The budget proposals incorporated important elements, including an organizational restructuring, which supported the implementation of the UNDP 2001 change management process (see above). The relative share of the budget relating to country offices further increased with staff resources redeployed from headquarters. Thus, the budget supported the new direction of internal change in UNDP towards a country focus, increased effectiveness, and improved efficiency, accountability and management.

With regard to financing the implementation of change, the Administrator was committed to containing costs within the proposed no-real-growth budget. Therefore his proposals incorporated redeployment of existing resources. Should a need for additional resources be identified, the Administrator planned to pursue opportunities for identifying those resources primarily from donors that had expressed interest in supporting specific activities.

After six years of steady and time-consuming downsizing, the Administrator believed that further downsizing and budget cuts were not warranted. Further reductions would seriously affect the ability of UNDP to maintain its country office network, particularly at a time when the workload in country offices had increased and the new legislated responsibilities of UNDP with regard to the resident coordinator system had expanded. However, since future official development assistance (ODA) and UNDP regular resources remained uncertain and difficult to predict, the Administrator recognized that, should ODA levels continue to decline with further declines in UNDP regular resources, another round of downsizing might be inevitable.

Net budget estimates for 1998-1999 amounted to $527.3 million, an increase of less than 2 per cent of the approved estimates for the 1996-1997 biennium. Of the total budget, 77.7 per cent related to support to UNDP core programme activities while 22.3 per cent related to support to UN operational activities. The component relating to management and administration represented 21.2 per cent of the gross budget estimates. Resources allocated to country offices increased from 62.6 per cent to 64.5 per cent of the total budget.

The total number of staff was projected to increase from 4,055 to 4,064 owing to an increase in national Professional staff in the field, partially offset by a decrease in international staff. Programme support constituted 87.1 per cent of the total. Of those, 94.6 per cent were located in country offices and 5.4 per cent at headquarters. Total staff located in country offices was 82.9 per cent of the total and staff located at headquarters was 12.1 per cent of the total. The remaining 5 per cent were accounted for by the United Nations Volunteers and the Inter-Agency Procurement Services Office.

An overall resource planning framework was approved by the Board in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 896], setting a target for contributions to UNDP regular (core) resources of $3.3 billion for 1997-1999; however, the Administrator was concerned that the target for contributions to UNDP regular resources would not be reached, primarily as a result of possible overall trends in ODA. He had reviewed what the impact of different budget scenarios would be on the overall distribution of resources.

With regard to government contributions towards local office costs, the Administrator stated that he aimed to achieve an increase in the collection of those contributions from some $38 million in 1996-1997 to $60 million in 1998-1999. As a means of encouraging host Governments to fulfil their obligations, the Administrator suggested a mechanism for that purpose—an authority for him to establish a linkage with the programme resources that were allocated to a host country that did not meet its obligations in full. Any shortfall in contributions would be covered by a downward adjustment of the allocation of programme resources to the country concerned. The Administrator believed that that approach would provide an incentive for Governments to fulfil their obligations towards covering part of local office costs through direct contributions in cash since the obligations were payable in local currency. He also recommended a change in the method by which income taxes were paid for staff members to Governments in respect of income derived from the organization. Currently, the amounts reimbursed for taxes were a direct charge to the UNDP biennial budget, without any corresponding offset. Under the recommended approach, a portion of the voluntary contributions of the countries concerned and equivalent to the amount of income taxes reimbursed would be shown as income to the biennial budget.

Reporting on development support services (DSS)—a decentralized consultancy fund made available to resident representatives for programme support and development activities at the country level—the Administrator stated that the approved allocation of $6.2 million was fully utilized during the 1994-1995 biennium. Over the biennium, 1,248 consultancies had been funded covering a total of 1,316 months.

In an August report on the 1998-1999 budget estimates [DP/1997/31], the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) stated that the proposed estimates for 1998-1999 of $599.4 million gross reflected a 7.7 per cent nominal growth over the 1996-1997 revised appropriations of $556.5 million; in net terms, the increase was 1.7 per cent. Recalling that the Executive Board had set the target for contributions to UNDP at $3.3 billion for 1997-1999, or an average of $1.1 billion per year, ACABQ said that, as of 1 July 1997, taking into account adjustments to pledges and the current exchange rate, pledges received amounted to $783.7 million.

ACABQ noted that the rate of growth of total resources was larger than the rate of growth of regular resources. Total resources had increased by 8 per cent (from $5.2 billion for 1996-1997 to $5.7 billion for 1998-1999) while regular resources had decreased by 11 per cent (from $2 billion to $1.8 billion). If that trend were to continue, ACABQ believed that the Administrator would have to monitor the policy implications, and most particularly the capacity of regular resources to absorb the impact and administrative costs of that type of expenditure. ACABQ believed that particular attention should be given to ensuring that a fair share of support was charged to non-regular resources, particularly in view of the steady decrease in regular or core resources. With regard to proposals to increase projected income from $38 million to $72 million, ACABQ cautioned that no measures had been proposed in case that figure was not attained and it called for appropriate contingency measures. ACABQ recommended that the Administrator further review the methodology for compiling and analysing data in order to find a system that would improve the accuracy of estimates. In view of the unpredictable resource situation, ACABQ believed that UNDP's contracting for staff services, whether on a long- or short-term basis, should ensure the possibility of quick response to changes in programmes and resource level, thus obviating the need to pay high termination indemnities. It also stressed the need to ensure that disbursements conformed to available resources.

On 19 September [dec. 97/24], the Executive Board approved the Administrator's proposals on government contributions towards local office costs and took note of his report on DSS. It requested the Administrator, taking into account ACABQ recommendations, to ensure that all the heads of the regional bureaux were accorded the same rank and to amend the budget accordingly, and to review the number of high-level positions at headquarters.

The Board approved gross appropriations in the amount of $590.6 million for programme support, management and administration and support to UN system operational activities, indicating that income estimates of $72.1 million would be used to offset the gross appropriations. Net appropriations for the 1998-1999 biennial support budgets were thus estimated at $518.5 million. The Administrator was authorized to re-deploy resources between appropriation lines up to 5 per cent of the appropriation line to which the resources were redeployed. The Board requested the Administrator to report in 1998 on progress in implementing the 1998-1999 biennial support budget, taking into account relevant developments, including UN reform, progress on the implementation of the UNDP 2001 change process, the review of levels of core contributions, the effect of currency exchange fluctuations, the nature and type of country presence, taking into account the operational complexity of the programme, and the Board's discussions on other resources and, at that time, to make any necessary recommendations.

Regarding the funds administered by UNDP, the Board approved gross appropriations for the 1998-1999 biennium for the United Nations Capital Development Fund ($12.86 million), the United Nations Development Fund for Women ($10.69 million), the Office to Combat Desertification and Drought ($5.85 million) and the United Nations Revolving Fund for Natural Resources Exploration ($1.53 million). The Administrator was asked to report in 1998 on progress in implementing the 1998-1999 biennial support budget for each of the funds, taking into account relevant developments, and to make any necessary recommendations.

Review of 1996 financial situation

In July, the Administrator, in his review of the UNDP financial situation in 1996 [DP/1997/24], provided an overview of the situation at the end of that year as well as financial forecasts for 1997, 1998 and 1999. An addendum [DP/1997/24/Add.1] included detailed information on contributions to and expenditure from the UNDP account, on the net flow of contributions to each participating Government, on the shortfall of contributions to local office costs after application of the accounting linkage, on income and expenditure of all trust funds in operation in 1996, and on the Reserve for Field Accommodation.

The overall income structure of UNDP underwent a considerable shift in 1996, said the Administrator. The proportion of voluntary contributions fell to 49 per cent of income versus 57 per cent in 1995. The decline was offset by a relative increase in resources mobilized for specific activities, which accounted for 45 per cent of UNDP income. Those specific contributions included project and programme cost-sharing, contributions to trust funds and sub-trust funds, and management service agreements. The shift to specific contributions had created new management challenges, in particular by increasing the administrative workload of UNDP, since most of those contributions required specific financial control and reporting as well as the management of cost-apportionment mechanisms.

Total overall income for 1996 amounted to $2,340 million. Voluntary contributions to the UNDP general fund declined to $848 million from $900 million in 1995, a decrease of 6 per cent. The lower level of voluntary contributions resulted from the lower level of 1996 pledges and was aggravated by late payments by donor countries and the appreciation of the United States dollar. At the end of the year, total contributions due totalled $403 million ($288 million due in 1996 and $115 million due in prior years).

UNDP resource mobilization efforts, on the other hand, resulted in an increase in third-party cost-sharing income to the UNDP general fund, which amounted to $100 million at the end of 1996, compared to $68 million in 1995, a 47 per cent increase. Total resources mobilized as government cost-sharing to the UNDP general fund increased in 1996 to $701 million. Five countries (Argentina, Colombia, Brazil, Panama, Peru) accounted for 73 per cent of that amount. Excluding Latin American countries, government cost-sharing income amounted to $47 million in 1996, a 4 per cent increase compared to $45 million in 1995. In Africa, government cost-sharing resources decreased in 1996 from $9 million to $3 million. Except in the Latin American and Arab States regions, the level of resources mobilized under cost-sharing arrangements with Governments was generally lower than the level of resources mobilized as third-party cost-sharing. Interest income earned in 1996 for the UNDP account amounted to $51 million compared to $60 million in 1995. That did not include interest income earned on cost-sharing resources ($17 million), which was accounted for under extra-budgetary income.

With respect to other programmes, total 1996 income amounted to $589 million compared to $467 million in 1995. Income received by funds and trust funds rose to $394 million, a 26 per cent increase compared to $313 million in 1995. Interest income earned by funds and trust funds amounted to $25 million in 1996 compared to $18 million in 1995.

Total programme expenditure increased to $1,650 million in 1996 compared to $1,391 million in 1995. Programme expenditure from general resources (activities financed by voluntary contributions) increased in 1996 to $544 million from $490 million in 1995, an 11 per cent increase. The increase in cost-sharing expenditure to $667 million from $504 million confirmed that programme countries with high levels of mobilized resources also had high levels of programme delivery. A breakdown of programme expenditure by executing agent demonstrated the continued shift to national execution, accounting in 1996 for 70 per cent of the UNDP general fund programme expenditure, compared to 60 per cent and 53 per cent in 1995 and 1994, respectively. The share of other UN agencies, regional and Bretton Woods institutions further declined in 1996 to less than 17 per cent of the UNDP general fund programme expenditure. Programme expenditures of funds and trust funds increased by $20 million.

The excess of income over expenditure in the UNDP account declined from $247 million to $148 million, a 40 per cent drop compared to 1995. Since programme expenditure increased while voluntary contributions decreased, the continuing surplus of income over expenditure in the general fund was mostly due to the increase of cost-sharing contributions.

On 19 September [dec. 97/291, the Executive Board took note of the Administrator's report.

Audit reports

At its January 1997 session, the Executive Board considered the report of the UN Board of Auditors on UNDP for 1994-1995 [YUN 1996, p. 1296] and the report of the Administrator [DP/1997/3] on the follow-up to the Auditors' recommendations. The Administrator provided a tabular summary of recommendations listed by area of audit, namely, financial issues, reserve for field accommodation, national execution, budgetary performance, management of funds and trust funds, and internal audit. The table indicated the UNDP response to each recommendation, which was provided to the Auditors during the preparation of their report, as well as the status of any follow-up action and the target date for completion, as at the date of compilation of the UNDP report (October 1996).

The Executive Board, on 16 January [dec. 97/3], requested the UNDP secretariat to provide in 1998 an updated overview of the implementation of the Auditors' recommendations and an updated timetable indicating the dates when follow-up action would have been completed in areas that needed to be addressed, namely, audit of projects, reserve for field accommodation, national execution, budgetary matters, management of funds and internal audit. The secretariat was also requested to provide an annual update on the progress achieved in implementing the Auditors' recommendations.

Harmonization of budget presentations

At its January session, the Executive Board considered a report [DP/1997/2] on the harmonization of the presentation of the budgets of UNDP, UNFPA and UNICEF. The report contained the proposal of the UNDP Administrator and the UNFPA and UNICEF Executive Directors for a biennial support budget. The process of developing a common format was begun in response to a 1994 decision of the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board [YUN 1994, p. 805]. The organizations reported that they had agreed on a common format for presentation of their biennial support budgets, common terms and definitions relating thereto and a common methodology for the preparation of budget estimates. The efforts leading to the proposal had concentrated on developing comparable and transparent budget information, as well as the need to ensure that the unique nature and requirements of each organization were not jeopardized.

The report included a budget mock-up, reflecting the agreed formats proposed for use by the organizations in preparing their 1998-1999 budgets. Under the proposed financial framework, the total resources of all three organizations were divided into two major groups—regular resources and other resources. Regular resources were resources required for activities and were appropriated by the Executive Boards following their own reviews and those of ACABQ. Other resources, in the case of UNDP, were cost-sharing and trust fund contributions. In order to place resources required for support activities in the context of the overall resources available to the organization, the biennial support budget included a resource plan with three sections: one covering total resources (both regular and other) available to the organization; the second on use of resources, giving estimates relating to programme activities; and the third providing a reconciliation between estimates included under the use-of-resources section and estimates covered by the biennial support budget.

The proposed appropriation structure for the biennial support budget estimates was outlined in the report. In determining the kind of information to be provided to support the appropriation request, it was considered that the key information needed in that respect was: estimates by appropriation line; estimates by organizational unit; and estimates by expenditure category. A proposed summary table reflecting estimates by appropriation line only was included in the report, as were a proposed format for gross appropriation estimates by organizational unit and another for gross appropriation estimates by expenditure category. The methodology for budget formulation adopted by UNDP included adjustments for volume, cost, currency and inflation. A proposed table was also included in the report, covering all posts and providing information by source of funds and organizational unit. Information was also provided on the level of resources to be used for electronic data processing requirements in the biennial support budgets.

Commenting on the above report [DP/1997/10], ACABQ endorsed the procedures whereby the related accounts would be modified to reflect the proposed definitions and structure of the harmonization proposals and encouraged the organizations to continue their collaborative approach in preparing reports on common issues. It encouraged the organizations to share their experience in the harmonization exercise with other UN development organizations so that greater consistency would be promoted in the presentation of their support budgets. The preliminary views of ACABQ were that the results presented in the report would contribute to a comprehensive and transparent budget proposal. It expected to pronounce itself in detail on the matter once the 1998-1999 biennial support budgets had been prepared using the proposed format.

On 17 January [dec. 97/6], the Executive Board approved the proposed format for the biennial support budget of UNDP and UNFPA.

Management services agreements

The Administrator reported in July [DP/1997/24/Add.2] on the status of management services agreements (MSAs), by which UNDP provided management and other support services at the request of recipient Governments. The report provided information on MSAs for 1994-1996, in response to a 1992 Executive Board decision [YUN 1992, p. 567] recommending that such reports be submitted triennially for review by the Board. The previous report on the status of MSAs was reviewed by the Board in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 804].

The provision by UNDP through UNOPS of MSAs in support of projects funded by the World Bank, including the International Development Association (IDA), the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB), the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD), individual donor countries and recipient countries themselves, had become a routine mechanism for the utilization of development resources. MSAs were used, for example, for contracting for services and works for implementing structural adjustment projects, contracting expertise and training services for Governments, procuring equipment and building infrastructure.

The total cumulative value of projects implemented through the MSA modality, excluding those funded by IFAD, reached over $ 1.5 billion at the end of 1996. That figure corresponded to nearly 300 projects implemented in 62 countries in all regions, of which 101 were ongoing at 31 December 1996; the balance were in the process of becoming operational or having been completed. The total number of active projects implemented under the MSA modality had steadily increased until 1992, when the subsequent downward trend brought the number of active projects in 1996 down to 97, equivalent to the 1991 figure. While overall project expenditures increased threefold over the period 1987-1996, expenditures under projects funded by individual donor countries had steadily declined. During 1990-1996, the number of active projects funded by individual donor countries decreased by 50 per cent, while expenditures on those projects decreased by 82 per cent, indicating a tendency towards projects of lesser dollar value. Programme countries, on the other hand, were increasingly interested in using the MSA modality to implement activities funded by the national budget. Expenditures on MSA projects funded by programme countries had grown from less than $1 million in 1992 to over $35 million in 1996.

Japan remained the principal funder of MSA activities, having contributed $34.03 million in 1994 for seven new projects, $94.34 million in 1995 for eight new projects, and $85.64 million in 1996 for nine new projects and one ongoing project. Other donors (Australia, Canada, Denmark, Italy, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, United States) contributed a total of $2.88 million in 1994 to two new projects, $24.27 million in 1995 to 10 new projects and $4.09 million in 1996 to two new projects and one ongoing project.

The total cost to UNDP and UNOPS of providing management services continued to be borne by the funding source. Management fees were calculated on a project-by-project basis and subdivided between UNOPS and UNDP, including UNDP country offices, according to the cost incurred by each organization for services provided to support MSA projects. The report, which included tables indicating cost recovery and distribution for MSA projects, as well as source of funding, stated that MSAs continued to increase the ability of beneficiary countries to utilize development resources and helped to guarantee that a greater proportion of external assistance was synchronized with their development priorities. For that reason, the Administrator recommended the continued utilization of the MSA modality.

On 19 September [dec. 97/29], the Executive Board recommended that the Administrator continue the MSA modality.

Procurement

In September [DP/1997/25], the Administrator notified the Executive Board of the availability of information on major equipment ordered and subcontracts awarded in 1996. Information for 1997 was contained in the Annual Statistical Report 1997 prepared by the Inter-Agency Procurement Services Office.

In 1997, total procurement of goods and services for UNDP technical cooperation programmes reached $628.7 million, a significant increase from $457.9 million in 1996 and $303.4 million in 1995. Procurement from developing countries of those goods and services amounted to 66.5 per cent of total procurement, down in percentage terms from 73.9 per cent in 1996, but up in absolute terms ($418 million as compared with $335.7 million in 1996). Total procurement by the UN system for all operational activities (technical cooperation, humanitarian assistance and peacekeeping operations) during 1997 was $2.9 billion, and the share of procurement from developing countries was 41.4 per cent, as compared with $2.7 billion and 44.8 per cent in 1996.

By a 19 September decision [dec. 97/29], the Board took note of the report on subcontracts and equipment.

Other technical cooperation

UN activities

In March 1997, the Department for Development Support and Management Services—the technical cooperation arm of the UN Secretariat—was incorporated into the newly created Department of Economic and Social Affairs (DESA).

During 1997, DESA had 1,342 technical cooperation projects under execution in a dozen substantive sectors, with a total project expenditure of $76 million. Projects financed by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) represented $50.7 million; those by trust funds, $22.2 million; and by the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA), $3.1 million.

On a geographical basis, the DESA-executed programme included expenditures of $23.9 million in the Middle East; $23.5 million in Africa; $16 million for interregional and global programmes; $7.4 million in Asia and the Pacific; $2.9 million in Europe; and $2.3 million in the Americas. Project delivery in the Middle East, which included expenditures of $11 million for the Iraq programme, was the largest, with a 31 per cent share of total delivery.

Distribution of expenditure was as follows: economic policy, $16.4 million; energy, $15 million; the associate expert programme, $13.5 million; water, $9.4 million; public administration, $7 million; statistics, $4.3 million; social policy, $3.5 million; infrastructure, $2.2 million; minerals, $1.9 million; public finance, $1.7 million; programme support, $0.8 million; and population, $0.3 million. Of the total delivery of $76 million, economic policy comprised 22 per cent; energy (including the Iraq programme) comprised 20 per cent; and the associate expert programme, 18 per cent.

On a component basis, DESA delivery in 1997 included $46.9 million for project personnel; $18.4 million for equipment; $4.3 million for training; $4.2 million for subcontracts; and $2.2 million for miscellaneous expenses.

UN Office for Project Services

The United Nations Office for Project Services (UNOPS), which became a separate entity within the United Nations on 1 January 1995 after having operated under UNDP direction, was a fully self-financing operation, with no assessed budget funding. In 1997, it was managing more than 2,000 projects in 146 countries, with project budgets in excess of $1 billion.

1997 activities

The UNOPS Executive Director, in his annual report to the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board covering 1997 activities [DP/1998/24 & Add.1,2], stated that UNOPS had come close to or had surpassed its 1997 financial targets and had operated in accordance with the self-financing principle.

Following the all-time high of $533 million of new business acquired in 1996, the target for 1997 was set at $573 million. That target was reached in October, and by the end of the year business acquisition amounted to $705 million, exceeding the target by 23 per cent. The highest growth rate was registered for clients from the UN system other than UNDP although their share was less than 10 per cent overall. A significant increase was also reported in projects funded from UNDP core resources, which, at a total of $374 million, represented twice the amount acquired in 1996. Management Service Agreements (MSAs) carried out on behalf of UNDP, on the other hand, dropped by over $65 million, with new acquisitions amounting to $158 million. That was the first decline in the acquisition of new MSAs, which had for over 10 years been the mainstay of UNDP non-core resources channelled through UNOPS. New Global Environment Facility projects (see PART THREE, Chapter VII) had dropped sharply, while those from the 1987 Montreal Protocol [YUN 1987, p. 686] on reducing the effects of ozone depletion had dropped slightly. New trust fund projects had risen in value in 1997.

The value of the total UNOPS portfolio, including loan administration (services only), reached $3 billion. In 1997, there were 19 new loans, amounting to $261 million, added to the UNOPS portfolio, bringing total acquisition during the year to $964 million. The value of loans administered on behalf of the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD) amounted to $1.6 billion, exceeding for the first time the amounts of funds entrusted to UNOPS under the project portfolio.

With regard to delivery, the 1997 target was set in the Business Plan at $500 million against funds entrusted for 1997. Provisional data indicated a delivery of $464 million, yielding a delivery rate of 93 per cent of the target. Delivery in the UNDP core budget portfolio, which had reached a record level of $179 million in 1996, continued to grow and reached $208 million in 1997. In addition to funds handled on behalf of clients, UNOPS issued an all-time high of $147 million in disbursement authorizations under IFAD loans, bringing total delivery in 1997 to $611 million.

Income was estimated at $40.6 million in the 1997 Business Plan and provisional data indicated that income would be approximately $40.5 million. As in previous years, the largest portion of income (87.2 per cent) was generated by project execution. The services-only category accounted for 10.1 per cent and other (mainly interest on the operational reserve) for 2.7 per cent of income. Owing to the increase in demand for services from UNDP in 1997, the share of income generated from funds owned by UNDP increased from 81 per cent in 1996 to 84 per cent in 1997.

The target for administrative costs had been set at $38.5 million and preliminary data indicated that those expenditures amounted to $35.3 million. Factors contributing to the lower-than-expected amount were a reduction in UNDP central service costs for the 1996-1997 biennium obtained entirely in 1997, and a lower-than-anticipated expenditure on the development and implementation of information systems. The overall average administrative overhead rate, representing administrative costs incurred for project services rendered, was, as in the previous two years, less than 7 per cent.

The Executive Director reported that overall financial performance in 1997 had again come very close to the targets set in the Business Plan and, in some instances, had even gone slightly beyond. Important performance marks were crossed for the first time, such as the $900 million mark for total acquisition, $600 million for delivery and $40 million for income. Most significantly, in 1997 UNOPS was again able to operate in accordance with the self-financing principle.

Consistent with the principle that UNOPS should be available to the UN system as a whole, demand had evolved for new services. In 1997, UNOPS began providing services to UN entities whose responsibilities went beyond the area of development cooperation. New clients included the Department for Political Affairs, the Department of Peacekeeping Operations and the former Department of Humanitarian Affairs. Responding to the demand for demining activities in Angola, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Cambodia, Croatia, Iraq and Mozambique, UNOPS established a Mine Action Unit that combined technical, managerial and legal expertise. Programmes involved mine detection and clearance, training of demining personnel, mine awareness and rehabilitation for victims. In the area of training, UNOPS designed a number of courses in the framework of its own activities in project management, contracting and procurement.

Budget estimates

In a July report [DP/1997/29], the Executive Director presented revised 1996-1997 budget estimates and 1998-1999 budget estimates for UNOPS. The revised budget estimates for 1996-1997 proposed an increase from $65.4 million to $70.6 million. The budget estimates for 1998-1999 were for $84.7 million. The budget projections were based on the expectation that UNOPS would continue to operate in accordance with the self-financing principle.

For the 1996-1997 budget, funds committed by UNOPS clients for implementation of projects by UNOPS (known as the project portfolio) amounted to $1.4 billion at the beginning of 1997. In addition, UNOPS administered loans on behalf of IFAD valued in excess of $1.5 billion, bringing the overall value of development funds for which UNOPS assumed responsibility to nearly $3 billion.

Income came from two main sources—project implementation and "services only" activities. It had been projected at $67.2 million for the biennium, but was revised to $77.4 million. In 1996, project delivery totalled $430.8 million, which generated an income of $31.6 million; in 1997, the Business Plan target for project delivery was $500 million, with an income projection of $35.3 million. Income in 1996 from services rendered to IFAD for loan administration and supervision of its projects totalled $3.3 million, and income from that source was projected at $4 million for 1997. Other income came mainly from interest and was projected at $1.3 million in 1997.

The approved administrative budget for the 1996-1997 biennium was $65.4 million. Actual expenditure for 1996 totalled $32.2 million and projected administrative expenditure for 1997 was $38.5 million. The increase of $5.2 million would be met by UNOPS income. Differences from the approved budget were attributed to: the need to increase staff due to a greater volume of business; the establishment in 1997 of an office in Abidjan, Cote d'Ivoire; reimbursements to UNDP for providing services to projects implemented by UNOPS; and upgrading information systems.

For the 1998-1999 biennium, UNOPS anticipated that its portfolio, delivery and income levels would remain in the same order of magnitude as those expected for 1997. That forecast was supported by the 1997 Business Plan projections. Both income and administrative costs were projected at $84.7 million for the biennium owing to the budgetary impact of the impending information system project and the funding principle that all UNOPS surplus income would be applied to that long-term investment.

In an August report on UNOPS budget issues [DP/1997/28], the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) commented on the revised 1996-1997 budget and the 1998-1999 budget. It believed that the division of labour between UNOPS and UNDP merited some review in the light of the latter's newly defined emerging dual role. ACABQ stressed the need for UNOPS to diversify its portfolio. For the 1998-1999 biennium, it doubted that the increases in project delivery experienced in 1995 and 1996 could be sustained. Regarding the proposal to open a new field office, ACABQ believed UNOPS should explore the possibility of sharing common premises and services with other agencies in the field. It also trusted that UNOPS would investigate other electronic data processing systems already in use elsewhere in the UN system to determine if they could be cost effective in UNOPS operations.

The UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board, on 18 September [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/22)], approved the 1996-1997 revised budget estimates in the amount of $70,579,000 and the 1998-1999 budget estimates in the amount of $84,700,000, as well as the establishment of 37 additional posts and the relocation of one post from New York to the new Abidjan office.

Risk management, reserves and surplus income

The UNOPS Executive Director reported in July [DP/1997/26] to the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board on risk management, reserves and surplus income. The UNOPS operational reserve was initially established by the Board in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 900], following the UNDP model, at a level equal to 20 per cent of the annual administrative budget, or $6.8 million, and had since been maintained at that level.

A comprehensive risk and liability review had revealed that the reserve formula did not adequately protect UNOPS against the risks of extraordinary or unanticipated contingencies that it could face as a self-financing operational entity. Under its financial regulations, the operational reserve needed to cover shortfalls in income, uneven cash flows, professional or contractual liabilities and liabilities associated with personnel contracts. Types of risks identified included: professional mistakes or misdeeds of personnel; contracts which the organization was bound to honour; diminished demand for services and projects that could not be implemented as scheduled; and force majeure, such as natural disaster, civil instability or war.

UNOPS employed several types of financial and non-financial mechanisms to limit risk, with the operational reserve as the safety net and final recourse, applying conventions on jurisdictional immunity, assistance agreements, staff training to reduce contractual mistakes, and transfer of risks to other parties such as by buying insurance policies.

The report recommended that the funding level of the UNOPS operational reserve be set at 4 per cent of the combined expenditures on administrative and project budgets of the previous year. Based on 1996 expenditures, it was proposed that $10.8 million in available unspent income be added to $6.8 million already in the reserve, bringing the balance to $17.6 million. Drawdowns would be reported annually in the UNOPS financial report while the reserve level would be reviewed biennially in conjunction with the budget submission.

In August [DP/1997/28], ACABQ welcomed the UNOPS report and recommended that the Executive Board accept the proposal on the reserve fund. ACABQ noted that UNOPS planned to use part of the unspent income in 1998-1999 for information systems development, estimated to cost $4.3 million and, consequently, that amount would not be available from surplus income for the replenishment of the operational reserve.

On 8 September [dec. 97/21], the Executive Board decided to establish the level of the UNOPS operational reserve at 4 per cent of the combined expenditure on administrative and project budgets of the previous year, and to transfer unspent income to the reserve account. It approved the maintenance of the operational reserve at the level calculated annually according to that formula and requested the Executive Director to report on a biennial basis on the appropriateness of the level. The Board noted that the Executive Director would continue to report annually on UNOPS income and expenditure levels and on drawdowns from the reserve.

Auditors' report

In June [DP/1997/27], the UNOPS Executive Director submitted a report to the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board on follow-up to recommendations contained in the financial report and audited financial statements for UNOPS covering 1995 issued by the Board of Auditors [A/51/5/Add.10]. The Auditors had identified three areas where scope remained for improving financial control and recommended that UNOPS: report to the Executive Board on progress in finalizing its Financial Rules and indicate a timetable for their presentation to the Board for approval; issue further guidance to certifying officers to clarify that only those purchase order orders or contracts signed and issued within the financial period represented valid obligations for that period; and closely monitor actual expenditure against budget to avoid the high incidence of overexpenditure.

The Executive Director responded to each of the recommendations and described the status of the implementation of the measures taken and preliminary target dates. He stated that UNOPS was making progress in achieving the stated goals and that efforts would continue to address outstanding issues. With regard to the Financial Rules, they were scheduled for revision in 1997. In the meantime, UNDP rules would continue to be applied. UNOPS had advised certifying officers about validity requirements. It agreed to monitor expenditure to avoid overexpenditure.

In response to the Auditors' recommendation that the annual Business Plan be improved, UNOPS stated that the 1996 Plan had been revised to focus on objectives rather than tasks and to include projections of financial targets by client and by division. As suggested, all objectives would be prioritized. Measures to assess the impact of its Business Plans on quality of service and client relations would be established, and an evaluation strategy would measure performance. In the appointment and management of consultancy services, UNOPS agreed to regularly review the extent of repeat recruitment of consultancy services, and, in that regard, to maintain and update a consultants' roster. In order to determine current market rates for consultancy services, UNOPS agreed that guidelines should be issued and suggested that, in view of differing practices, the matter could be best dealt with in an inter-agency context.

With regard to the recommendation that UNOPS should develop a workload assessment and costing system, it was reported that such a system would be developed in 1997. Another recommendation was for UNOPS to revise the bases for calculating Management Service Agreement (MSA) fees to reflect current costs more accurately. UNOPS intended to introduce up-to-date service unit costs in 1997 and to revise those cost schedules as appropriate. An agreement with UNDP that country offices provide a breakdown of their estimated costs for MSA activities was being pursued, as recommended, which would provide more accurate cost breakdowns. As part of the project acceptance process, UNOPS agreed to assess whether the costs of delivering a project were likely to be met by the charges agreed with clients.

UNOPS also agreed to report on annual surpluses and accumulated unspent resources (see above) to determine levels that were reasonable and consistent with its business objectives.

The Executive Board, on 18 September [dec. 97/23], took note of the comments made by UNOPS in response to the Board of Auditors' report. It requested the Executive Director to report in 1998 with an updated overview of the implementation of the Auditors' recommendations and to provide an updated timetable indicating the dates when follow-up action would be completed in the areas needing attention.

UN Volunteers

In a report to the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board [DP/1998/20], summarizing the key features and achievements of the United Nations Volunteers (UNV) work in 1996-1997 and outlining the strategic directions adopted by the programme, the UNDP Administrator stated that the biennium marked a watershed in the life of UNV with the relocation of its headquarters to Bonn, Germany, in 1996 and the launch of Strategy 2000. In 1997, UNV had the highest number of serving UNVs (3,620 as compared to 3,242 in 1996 and 3,263 in 1995) and the most diversified programme in its 27-year history. It sought the advice of the Board as it prepared for activities in the next biennium and for the International Year of Volunteers.

While support to development cooperation and involvement with community work remained the hallmarks of the programme, there was a trend in 1996-1997 towards diversification of UNV activities into the areas of humanitarian and emergency relief, peace-building and electoral support, resettlement of demobilized soldiers and human rights education. The changing programme had been accompanied by greater flexibility in the terms and conditions of service for volunteers as well as the further broadening of volunteer profiles and their areas of work, to include, in addition to international UNV specialists and field workers, national UNVs, short duration humanitarian relief UNVs, locally contracted eco-volunteers, UN agency-supported HIV/AIDS and cultural heritage UNVs, United Nations International Short-Term Advisory Resources (UN-ISTAR) assignments involving the private sector, and the Transfer of Knowledge through Expatriate Nationals (TOKTEN) modality. The initiative to promote the involvement of people directly affected by the issues being addressed was intensified.

Strategy 2000 was launched at the beginning of 1997, providing UNV and its partners with a frame of reference for the scope and direction of the programme from 1997 to 2000. The Strategy combined pro-active programme development, in the context of follow-up to global conferences, with the need to ensure responsiveness to the demands of partners in the programme countries. The major event in the implementation of the first track of Strategy 2000 was the Fourth UNV Intergovernmental Meeting, held in Bonn in December to debate "A Globalizing World: Roles for Volunteers?". The meeting adopted a declaration in which it called on UNV to increase attention to urban development, environmental management and preventive-curative development. It encouraged UNV to continue to develop innovative partnerships with civil society, to ground its actions in community-based participatory approaches, to promote environmental activism, and to increase the utilization of qualified nationals in their home countries within mixed teams of national and international volunteers. UNV was urged to expand its role as a global advocate for volunteers and for volunteering, and to work to increase access for volunteer assistance to international development cooperation institutions, regional organizations and the private sector. UNV was called on to study the impact of volunteer experiences on the front lines of development and to apply the lessons learned. Finally, the proclamation by the General Assembly of the year 2001 as the International Year of Volunteers was welcomed for recognizing, facilitating, networking and promoting the work of volunteers.

The main event of the second track of Strategy 2000—ensuring responsiveness to the needs of partner programme countries—was the undertaking in the second quarter of 1997 of a comprehensive workflow analysis of the operational processes of fielding and supporting UNVs. Task forces addressed issues of simplifying the application of UNV conditions of service, streamlining the volunteer recruitment process, and reviewing the computerized volunteer management system. Notable progress was made in all areas.

In the area of poverty eradication, UNV was engaged in working with self-help organizations of people living in poverty. In the Central African Republic, for example, a total of 54 international and national UNVs carried out community development activities within the framework of UNDP assistance to the National Poverty Eradication Programme. Through partnership with indigenous NGOs, UNVs helped more than 130 communities to develop approximately 170 micro-enterprises in areas such as agriculture and crafts. A literacy programme was carried out and 280 villagers who had completed the 48-day programme were trained to become trainers in their own communities. A poverty alleviation programme in Mongolia involved 51 UNVs, some of whom helped to develop microcredit facilities to support local development initiatives. Others served in the areas of gender in development, skills training and income-generation activities. UNVs also supported the preparation of Mongolia's first human development report. In Cambodia, UNVs worked with local government authorities, UNDP and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to assist villagers to plant new rice varieties, improve water supply, plan new projects, use organic fertilizers and undertake their own resource mobilization.

Humanitarian relief was provided by UNVs in response to emergency situations. During the biennium, over 3,500 volunteers had short-term field-service assignments with UNV in emergency relief, support and protection of refugees and internally displaced persons, human rights promotion and monitoring, and post-conflict and peace-building activities, frequently in partnership with other UN entities. National UNVs were introduced for the first time in confidence-building and peace-building efforts in Armenia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Burundi, Georgia, the occupied Palestinian territory and Rwanda to strengthen efforts to tackle the complex issues inherent in post-conflict situations. In post-war Bosnia and Herzegovina, over 60 UNVs assisted other agencies in repatriation and rehabilitation activities. In addition, in 1996-1997, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) requested UNV to provide over 800 regional election coordinators and electoral observers. For subsequent municipal elections, OSCE again asked UNV to recruit and field 800 electoral observers. As part of UNV's collaboration with the White Helmets Initiative, 20 humanitarian relief activities were implemented in 20 countries during the biennium with financial support from Argentina, France and Germany as well as UNDP funding.

Post-conflict rehabilitation was another area of UNV concern, through such efforts as support for the promotion of human rights and ensuring sustainable livelihoods in rural areas. For example, a team of over 200 UNV human rights monitors assisted the United Nations Human Rights Verification Mission in Guatemala (MINUGUA) to reach out to remote communities to inform them of progress in peace negotiations and explain their human rights. In the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, UNVs mobilized young Palestinians to play a more active role to overcome the limited opportunities for training and employment. In Mozambique, where UNVs had been serving in peace-building efforts since the early 1990s, the emphasis was on long-term development. In 1997, 37 UNVs went to rural areas to support local efforts to improve community organizations, market rural products, access clean water and health services, ensure the sustainable use of natural resources and start small businesses. In addition, 23 UNV electoral advisers supported the National Election Commission in preparing local elections.

The TOKTEN programme played a valuable role in countries where circumstances were conducive to the contribution that expatriate citizens could make. TOKTEN was operational in 20 countries in 1996-1997 with over 700 advisory missions fielded. Examples of results of such missions included: introducing the United States Library of Congress classification system to Polish university libraries; drafting the first income-tax law in the occupied Palestine territory; transferring technology on fibre-optic communication systems in Iran; overhauling the management system in the Philippines Overseas Employment Office; developing genetically engineered plants to combat desertification in the upper Yellow River region of China; and designing curricula for mathematics education of schoolgirls in Uganda.

Short-term advisory resources (the UNISTAR programme) were made available in 20 countries in the biennium with a total of 157 assignments. Examples of such projects included the analysis of design, marketing and production issues in businesses such as jewellery, garments and auto parts manufacture in China; textiles in Morocco; shoe manufacturing in Ethiopia; and the marketing of herbs in Argentina. Other examples were the development of a Masters of Business Administration programme in Viet Nam, development of industrial safety standards in Angola, the re-design of municipal water and sewage systems in rural Albania, and the drafting of documentation for electricity regulations in Mozambique.

An innovative UNV pilot initiative was its support for community-oriented approaches to the HIV/AIDS epidemic. UNVs assisted national AIDS programmes in a number of least developed countries in Africa and Asia in the areas of information, education and communication; training and counselling; home-based care activities; and in strengthening local self-help groups. Another pilot initiative made use of "eco-volunteers", building on the capacity that already existed in many communities for solving environmental problems and seeking to extend their reach as change agents. UNV participated in establishing a network of national and local NGOs in 14 countries in Africa, Asia and Latin America. In all, 17 national UNVs and some 160 eco-volunteers worked for three years under the programme, which was completed in 1997. Examples were maintenance of solar units in villages in India; promoting environmental and human rights education in informal community-based organizations in South Africa; and supporting community organization in neighbourhoods situated on the slopes of the Pichincha volcano in Ecuador.

In his report on the review of the financial situation for 1997 [DP/1998/29], the UNDP Administrator stated that overall contributions to the UNV programme fell by 32 per cent, from $15.9 million in 1996 to $10.9 million in 1997. UNV mobilized $3.2 million in voluntary contributions, a drop of $1.5 million from $4.7 million in 1996. While UNV had received no cost-sharing contributions in the past, $0.3 million was received in 1997. Total sub-trust fund contributions totalled $7.5 million, down from $11.2 million in 1996. An increase in the volume of business with UN specialized agencies helped to boost programme delivery, resulting in a higher number of volunteer assignments.

International Year of Volunteers

Acting on a 1996 proposal of UNV [YUN 1996, p. 792] to proclaim the year 2001 as the International Year of Volunteers, the Economic and Social Council, on 22 July 1997 [meeting 3] adopted resolution 1997/44 without vote. The draft [E/1997/L.24/Rev.1] was orally revised on the basis of informal consultations [agenda item 6 (i)].

International Year of Volunteers, 2001

The Economic and Social Council

Recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of the following draft resolution:

"International Year of Volunteers, 2001

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling its resolutions 2659(XXV) of 17 December 1970, 31/131 of 16 December 1976, 31/166 of 21 December 1976, 40/212 of 17 December 1985 and 49/139 B of 20 December 1994, and bearing in mind decision 96/32 adopted on 10 May 1996 by the Executive Board of the United Nations Development Programme/United Nations Population Fund, in which the Executive Board acknowledged the importance of the contribution made by volunteers worldwide and expressed its support for the efforts of the United Nations Volunteers to promote further volunteer work,

"Taking into account its decision 35/424 of 5 December 1980 and Economic and Social Council resolution 1980/67 of 25 July 1980 concerning guidelines for international years and anniversaries,

"Noting the significant contribution that volunteers make in their own countries to improving the welfare and realizing the aspirations of their fellow citizens for improved economic and social well-being and the financing of their work largely through civil society, including the private sector, as well as the important achievements of volunteers assigned internationally to the attainment of the development goals of Member States,

"Noting also the assistance provided by the United Nations Volunteers, in particular to United Nations organizations and operations in the fields of social and economic development, humanitarian aid and the promotion of peace, democracy and respect for human rights and, above all, in helping to link these efforts closely to the populations for whom they are intended,

"Noting further the importance of new players taking the initiative at the local, national and international levels, in particular individuals and organizations of civil society, in partnership with Governments, as emphasized in the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development and the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development,

"Bearing in mind the conclusion of the Fourth World Conference on Women, that women should be enabled to benefit from lifelong learning, including volunteer activity, and noting that much volunteer activity is performed by women and that such socially useful work should be appropriately recognized and supported,

"Convinced that the need for volunteer effort is greater than ever in the light of the adverse impact of such global problems as environmental degradation, poverty, drug abuse and human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS) on the more vulnerable sectors of society and of the trend for civil society, in partnership with government and the private sector, to assume ever greater responsibilities in the development process,

"Convinced also that a year designed to enhance the recognition, facilitation, networking and promotion of volunteer service, with particular emphasis on activity at the local level, could make a significant contribution to generating increased awareness of the achievements and further potential of volunteer service, to encouraging offers of service from a greatly expanded number of individuals and to channelling resources to augment the effectiveness of such service,

"Noting with satisfaction that the proposal for the year has gained widespread support within civil society,

"1. Proclaims the year 2001 the International Year of Volunteers;

"2. Invites Governments, the United Nations system and intergovernmental, volunteer and non-governmental organizations and community-based organizations to collaborate and identify ways and means of enhancing the recognition, facilitation, networking and promotion of volunteer service in the preparations for and observance of the Year;

"3. Designates the United Nations Volunteers programme, without prejudice to existing priorities, as the focal point for the preparations, implementation and follow-up of the Year, in close collaboration with other organizations of the United Nations system, and encourages the United Nations Volunteers to continue the process of close collaboration and partnership with Governments and international and national volunteer and non-governmental organizations, in particular, with regard to the preparations for and implementation of the Year;

"4. Invites policy-making organs and the relevant organizations of the United Nations system to consider, in the context of their substantive mandates, the principles and objectives of the Year, making special efforts through new and existing programmes during the period 1998-2001 and to pursue follow-up action to the Year for the benefit of all countries and peoples;

"5. Appeals to Member States, as well as all other participants in the observance of the Year, to highlight the year 2001 as a special occasion benefiting the peoples of the world in their quest for a better life for all, based on the voluntary commitment of individuals and groups to make available their time and to share their resources and skills in the interest of those less advantaged;

"6. Calls for a concerted promotional and information campaign on behalf of the Year at the national, regional and international levels, with the strong participation of the mass media;

"7. Requests the Secretary-General to take specific measures, within existing resources and with support from voluntary resources, through all the communications media at his disposal, in particular within the mandate of the Department of Public Information of the Secretariat, to give widespread publicity to the preparations for and observance of the Year and to disseminate information on the subject."

On 20 November [meeting 50], the General Assembly endorsed the Council's action by adopting resolution 52/17 [draft: A/52/L.22 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 12].

International Year of Volunteers, 2001

The General Assembly,

Welcoming the recommendation of the Economic and Social Council contained in its resolution 1997/44 of 22 July 1997, Decides to take the action called for in that resolution, inter alia, proclaiming the year 2001 as the International Year of Volunteers.

Technical cooperation among developing countries

In his annual report for 1997 [DP/1998/17/Add.3], the UNDP Administrator stated that the Special Unit for Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries (TCDC) made efforts in the areas of trade, investment and finance to identify concrete measures to improve linkages between TCDC and economic cooperation among developing countries (ECDC) (see PART THREE, Chapter I). The Unit supported the Group of 77 and China in organizing the South-South Conference on Trade, Finance and Investment (San Jose, Costa Rica, 13-15 January), which produced a framework for cooperation in trade, finance and investment among developing countries [A/C.2/52/8]. In partnership with the Third World Network, the Special Unit provided developing countries with analyses of the effects of globalization on developing countries' economies. It supported the launching of a pilot information network connected to the Internet for small island developing countries. It brought together 23 developing countries at the Meeting of TCDC Pivotal Countries (Santiago, Chile, 17-19 November), which reaffirmed the increasing relevance of ECDC/TCDC in the context of globalization and identified areas for closer co-operation.

In the area of poverty eradication, the Unit supported the launching of the Microfin Afric Network, headquartered in Senegal, to share experiences in microfinancing and micro-enterprises, especially those related to women, in African countries. It also provided training on credit qualification and management. Other activities included the identification and dissemination of best practices on poverty reduction in Latin America, a workshop on municipalities and urban poverty in Latin American countries, and support to the health reform process in the Caribbean. In the area of production and employment, the Unit supported a network of Eastern Caribbean States in developing innovative approaches to increasing productivity, diversifying employment opportunities and improving international competitiveness. It also supported the TCDC national focal points meeting for Asia and the Pacific (Singapore, January) which discussed the expansion of TCDC.

As the substantive secretariat of the High-level Committee on the Review of TCDC, the Unit was involved preparing documentation for the tenth session of the Committee. It also prepared revised guidelines for the review of policies and procedures concerning TCDC (see below).

TCDC Committee action

The High-level Committee on the Review of Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries, at its tenth session (New York, 5-9 May) [A/52/39], reviewed progress made in implementing the 1978 Buenos Aires Plan of Action for Promoting and Implementing TCDC [YUN 1978, p. 467] and recommendations of the South Commission [TCDC/10/2]. It also considered progress made in implementing the new directions strategy for TCDC [TCDC/10/3] and reports of the UNDP Administrator [TCDC/10/4] on implementation of the guidelines for the review of policies and procedures concerning TCDC and on organizational and supportive arrangements for TCDC.

On 9 May, the Committee adopted three decisions. Regarding the review of progress made in implementing the Buenos Aires Plan of Action [A/52/39 (dec. 10/1 A)], the Committee reaffirmed the potential of TCDC and urged developing countries that had not done so to elaborate national policies for TCDC. It welcomed efforts made by developing countries and the UN development system to increase TCDC application and its role in bilateral and multilateral relations, which had culminated in a number of bilateral agreements, as well as activities related to training, transfer of technology, reconstruction and the exchange of experience. Other countries' efforts to increase involvement in TCDC were also welcomed. The Committee noted actions taken towards expanding the TCDC Information Referral System database into a multidimensional information system, including data on individual experts, institutional capacities and centres of excellence, as well as best practices in developing countries, while recognizing the constraints on using the database. In that regard, it called on the Special Unit for TCDC to take measures to enable least developed countries to access international information networks, such as the Internet, so that they could utilize the TCDC database. The developing countries were commended for allocating resources from their national budgets for TCDC. The Committee encouraged developing countries that had not done so to establish national focal points for TCDC and where focal points were already established to ensure that they were adequately staffed and equipped. Reiterating that South-South cooperation should be viewed as a complement to North-South cooperation, the Committee called for triangular approaches to facilitate South-South projects. It encouraged developed countries to increase financial support for TCDC in the context of triangular arrangements or through bilateral and multilateral channels.

The Committee reiterated the recommendations of the Buenos Aires Plan of Action that, in designing and executing TCDC projects, priority be given to using local capabilities. It requested UN organizations to improve the incorporation of TCDC into their programmes and to mainstream the modality in the system's operational activities for development. UN organizations were called upon to assist developing countries to utilize TCDC for promoting small and medium-sized enterprises. The UNDP Administrator was called on to mobilize greater donor support in order to increase resources for TCDC. The Committee recommended that a new format and working methods be applied to its future meetings in order to lead to a more interactive debate and a more concrete outcome. It welcomed the focus that would be given to ECDC and TCDC by the Economic and Social Council later in the year and suggested that its reports be made available for the Council. The Committee noted that 1998 would be the twentieth anniversary of the adoption of the Buenos Aires Plan of Action, and recommended that the General Assembly hold a commemorative meeting to mark the occasion and mobilize support for implementing the new directions strategy for TCDC. The UNDP Administrator was requested to submit to the Committee at its next (1999) session a biennial report on the progress made in implementing the Buenos Aires Plan of Action.

In the second decision [dec. 10/1 B], the Committee, having reviewed progress in implementing the new directions strategy for TCDC, recognized that further progress could be achieved through the provision of adequate resources, strengthening the participating institutions and enhancing awareness of and commitment to the TCDC modality. The Committee recommended that the intergovernmental processes of the United Nations foster closer linkages on policy and operational aspects between TCDC and ECDC, and urged the UN development system to implement other recommendations in the new directions strategy, in particular new funding arrangements, expansion of the TCDC Information Referral System database, identification of pivotal countries for TCDC, promotion of triangular cooperation arrangements and dissemination of best practices in TCDC. The Committee welcomed the completion of a comprehensive directory of experts on small island developing States and the establishment by the UNDP Administrator of the Trust Fund for South-South Cooperation, to which it urged donors to contribute. It also welcomed the UNDP decision to allocate .05 per cent of its overall programme resources to TCDC during 1997-1999. The Administrator was again requested to instruct resident representatives to increase the application of the TCDC modality in technical cooperation activities and to ensure that the separate identity of the Special Unit for TCDC within UNDP was maintained. The Committee further requested the Administrator to report to it in 1999 on progress made in implementing its decision.

The Committee, by its third decision [dec. 10/2], commended the UN agencies that had taken measures to apply the guidelines for the review of policies and procedures concerning TCDC and urged others to take similar action. It requested the Administrator to carry out consultations on the guidelines with UN organizations, and to submit recommendations on the subject to the General Assembly in 1997 through the Economic and Social Council, with a view that recommendations would be submitted to the Assembly in 1998 in the context of the triennial policy review of operational activities for development of the UN system (see below). Noting the increased resources allocated for TCDC by UNDP for 1997-1999, the Committee requested the Executive Board to review periodically the volume of resources allocated for that purpose, as well as the impact of the TCDC modality on implementation of UNDP programmes. The Administrator was requested, in relation to the increasing responsibilities of the Special Unit, to ensure it was adequately staffed, and to report to the Committee on implementation of its decision.

The Economic and Social Council, by decision 1997/216 of 8 July, took note of the Committee's report on its tenth session. On 18 December, the General Assembly took similar action by decision 52/446.

Revised guidelines for TCDC

In October [E/1997/110], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Economic and Social Council the revised guidelines for the review of policies and procedures concerning TCDC. The guidelines, which had been applied on an experimental basis since 1993, were aimed at ensuring a coordinated approach to the promotion and application of TCDC by UN organizations. They were revised after consultations in May 1997 at a meeting of focal points of UN organizations, which was convened by the UNDP Special Unit for TCDC. The proposals provided innovative TCDC approaches in the context of new challenges facing the developing countries in the wake of current trends towards globalization of markets and production structures and liberalization of trade.

The revised guidelines required UN organizations and agencies to: improve the incorporation of TCDC into their programmes and projects and to continue to mainstream the TCDC modality into their operational activities for development; review the extent to which their policies facilitated TCDC; focus on initiatives that were likely to have a major development impact on many developing countries; give priority to development issues that were of interest to many developing countries, such as trade and investment, debt, the environment, poverty alleviation, production and employment, macroeconomic management, education, health, transfer of technology and rural development; promote further integration between TCDC and ECDC by supporting long-term development objectives in priority areas such as poverty alleviation, increased production, employment creation and the environment; identify "pivotal" TCDC countries; establish links with NGOs and the private sector in an effort to promote TCDC; promote funding modalities in support of TCDC activities; support developing countries in formulating TCDC policies; and document and disseminate information on innovative projects among developing countries.

The revised guidelines emphasized that the developing countries themselves had primary responsibility for the implementation of TCDC activities. However, UN organizations should provide support to those countries through increased UNDP country allocations and programme resources and through the mobilization of additional funds from NGOs and the private sector. The report listed a number of ways that developed countries and their funding agencies could be encouraged to support TCDC through triangular arrangements. Among other proposals, it called for: developing countries to allocate funds for TCDC from their national budgets; implementation of TCDC projects using UNDP country allocations as much as possible; and each organization to provide a core budget for TCDC activities from its regular programme budget. The guidelines also included recommendations for coordinating, updating and improving data banks and information systems. Other recommendations concerned training, such as regular in-house orientation and awareness seminars on TCDC for staff of various organizations, and seminars covering approaches, methods and techniques for promoting TCDC; TCDC operational procedures; cost-effectiveness and comparative advantage of TCDC; and procedures for negotiating, concluding and implementing bilateral and multilateral TCDC agreements.

Noting that most organizations had established TCDC focal points, the report stressed the importance of assigning them clear terms of reference and, where feasible, to standardize their core functions. The report outlined the general responsibilities of the focal points of UN organizations. Under the revised guidelines, recommendations on the Special Unit's functions were listed, including: promoting coordination and consultation among TCDC focal points; organizing annual meetings of the focal points; promoting coordinated action between the UN focal points and national and sectoral focal points; and playing a proactive role within the UN system to expand TCDC application. Other recommendations called for further networking among institutions in developing countries and UN organizations and for procedures to make TCDC an integral part of relevant UN organizations by ensuring that TCDC be given first consideration. Regarding reporting procedures, the guidelines suggested that the High-level Committee should be provided with a descriptive account of the activities of UN organizations, indicating promotional and operational initiatives supported by them in respect of TCDC, and quantitative data reflecting their TCDC programmes and projects, including financial inputs, number of beneficiaries, experts/consultants and/or procurement from developing countries.

The report recommended that the revised guidelines be approved by the General Assembly after review by the Economic and Social Council.

South-South cooperation

In September, the Secretary-General, in response to General Assembly resolution 50/119 [YUN 1995, p. 848], submitted a report on the state of South-South cooperation [A/52/402], presenting an overview and analysis of South-South economic and technical cooperation worldwide and international support in that regard (see also PART THREE, Chapter I). The Secretary-General noted that there had been a marked upsurge in cooperation among developing countries. In the previous four years, more than 100 activities could be recorded involving actions to establish, revise, reinvigorate and launch initiatives in ECDC and TCDC, as well as in other modes of developing country cooperation. That was occurring at the same time as globalization of economies and progressive liberalization.

The approaches employed in achieving the common objective of consolidated economic spaces for trade, investment and financial growth varied among the different regions, and the report discussed the various means, whether through new treaties, organizations, free trade agreements, a policy of open regionalism, financial integration or conferences. The emerging trends of cooperation emphasized multisectoral cooperation with deeper cooperation content than mere free trade areas or customs unions. Recently, a trend could be seen towards developing regional/subregional production systems, for investment-technology cooperation and for regional financial cooperation, as well as for furthering the interconnections among those sectors. Examples were to be found in harmonization of regulations, mutual recognition of standards and, as in the Southern Cone Common Market (MERCOSUR) and the European Union, policy coordination. The deeper content and multisectoral cooperation enhanced the participatory capacities of developing countries in the global markets.

As to the operational state of South-South cooperation, the report noted that foreign trade, over the period 1990-1995, had expanded in developing countries at an annual average rate of 11.6 per cent, as compared with 7.4 per cent in world trade as a whole. That growth rate varied considerably, with most of the dynamism of mutual trade among developing countries to be found within the major geographical regions. Intra-regional trade accounted for 30 per cent of developing countries' trade and 8.6 per cent of total world trade. Trade had been promoted by a number of instruments, notably the Global System of Trade Preferences among Developing Countries, the first round of which was concluded in 1988 [YUN 1988, p. 407].

Further cooperation was evident in monetary and financial areas, including trade finance and the development of capital markets. Intra-South investment had emerged in recent years as a significant tool for industrial cooperation among developing countries, particularly among Asian countries but also in Latin America and Africa. At the enterprise level, a number of South-based corporations had increased their assets, sales and employment during the preceding decade, and some had become transnational corporations. That was an area offering scope for further cooperation among such enterprises. A number of measures to promote investment cooperation, as proposed by the San Jose Plan of Action [A/C.2/52/8], were reiterated in the Secretary-General's report. The Plan called on the Group of 77 developing countries and China to: adopt measures to encourage investment among developing countries in manufacturing and service sectors, such as pooling of resources among enterprises; encourage direct investments through bilateral or multilateral agreements in order to improve financial and technical capabilities; and introduce new markets among developing countries, including free economic trade zones. Furthermore, developing countries' investment banks were urged to: develop cross-border operating capacities and skills; promote investments from other Southern countries through appropriate instruments; and expand their knowledge about investment opportunities in other Southern environs.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee [A/52/630], adopted resolution 52/205 without vote [agenda item 99].

Economic and technical cooperation among developing countries

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolutions 33/134 of 19 December 1978, in which it endorsed the Buenos Aires Plan of Action for Promoting and Implementing Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries, 46/159 of 19 December 1991 on technical cooperation among developing countries, 49/96 of 19 December 1994 on a United Nations conference on South-South cooperation and 50/119 of 20 December 1995 on economic and technical cooperation among developing countries and a United Nations conference on South-South cooperation, as well as other relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council on economic and technical cooperation among developing countries,

Reaffirming also that South-South cooperation constitutes an important element of international cooperation for development and is an essential basis for national and collective self-reliance as well as a means of ensuring the effective integration and participation of developing countries in the world economy and that it is not a substitute for, but rather complementary to, North-South cooperation,

Recognizing the fact that developing countries have the primary responsibility for promoting and implementing economic and technical cooperation among themselves, and reiterating the need for the international community to support the efforts of the developing countries to expand South-South cooperation through the modality of economic and technical cooperation among developing countries,

Taking note of the decisions and recommendations contained in the Final Document of the Eleventh Conference of Heads of State or Government of the Non-Aligned Countries, held at Cartagena de Indias, Colombia, from 18 to 20 October 1995, and in this context welcoming the operationalization of the Non-Aligned Movement Centre for South-South Technical Cooperation, in Jakarta in 1998, and inviting all development partners to make use of and give support, as appropriate, to the Centre,

Taking note also of the Declaration adopted by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Group of 77 at their twenty-first annual meeting, held in New York on 26 September 1997, in which the Ministers emphasized the increasing importance and complementarity of economic and technical cooperation among developing countries as a means of supporting and broadening the global partnership in international development cooperation,

Welcoming the San Jose Declaration and Plan of Action adopted by the Group of 77 at the South-South Conference on Trade, Investment and Finance, held at San Jose, Costa Rica, from 13 to 15 January 1997, which outlined concrete modalities on sectoral issues relating to trade, finance, investment and enterprise cooperation,

Also welcoming the outcome of the Second Asia-Africa Forum, held at Bangkok from 11 to 13 June 1997, as a mechanism to strengthen South-South cooperation, as well as the convening of the Second Tokyo International Conference on African Development in Japan in October 1998, and calling upon the international community to reaffirm its commitment in supporting Africa's development efforts,

1. Endorses the report of the High-level Committee on the Review of Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries on its tenth session and the decisions adopted by the High-level Committee at that session;

2. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the state of South-South cooperation, which provides a comprehensive and systematic overview and analysis of economic cooperation among developing countries in the context of South-South cooperation worldwide and of United Nations system support for such cooperation;

3. Also takes note of the draft revised Guidelines for the Review of Policies and Procedures concerning

Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries, submitted by the Administrative Committee on Coordination, and recommends that the draft revised Guidelines be submitted through the Economic and Social Council to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session in the context of the triennial policy review of operational activities for development of the United Nations system;

4. Invites the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the Special Unit for Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries of the United Nations Development Programme, as well as other relevant organizations, taking into account their agreed mandates, work programmes and priorities, to undertake jointly further work on formulating concrete recommendations on the implementation of and follow-up to the San Jose Declaration and Plan of Action adopted by the Group of 77 at the South-South Conference on Trade, Investment and Finance;

5. Stresses the need to intensify the process of strengthening the various interregional dialogues and the exchange of experiences among subregional and regional economic groupings for the purposes of expanding South-South cooperation through integrating the modalities of economic and technical cooperation among developing countries;

6. Calls upon all Governments and relevant United Nations organizations, including the multilateral financial institutions, to consider increasing allocations for economic and technical cooperation among developing countries and to identify new funding modalities to promote South-South cooperation, such as triangular cooperation and private sector funding;

7. Welcomes the contribution made by some countries to the Voluntary Trust Fund for the Promotion of South-South Cooperation, and invites all countries, including developed countries, to contribute to the Trust Fund;

8. Urges the organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, and invites other relevant intergovernmental organizations involved in international development cooperation, to make concerted and vigorous efforts to mainstream the implementation of modalities of economic and technical cooperation among developing countries by giving them full consideration in the design, formulation, implementation and evaluation of programmes and projects in their operational activities;

9. Decides to hold a one-day commemorative meeting at the beginning of the fifty-third session of the General Assembly, in accordance with the relevant paragraphs of the first report of the General Committee, to mark the occasion of the twentieth anniversary of the adoption of the Buenos Aires Plan of Action for Promoting and Implementing Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries, and to that effect requests the Special Unit for Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries, in its capacity as substantive secretariat of the High-level Committee on the Review of Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries and system-wide coordinator on technical cooperation among developing countries, to be responsible for the preparation and organization of the commemorative meeting, including the provision of adequate documentation, in consultation with Member States and relevant organizations and agencies of the United Nations system;

10. Also decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session an item entitled "Commemorative meeting of the twentieth anniversary of the adoption of the Buenos Aires Plan of Action for Promoting and Implementing Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries";

11. Requests the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the Special Unit for Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries and in consultation with Member States and relevant organizations and agencies of the United Nations system, to incorporate into his report for the triennial policy review of operational activities for development, for consideration at the fifty-third session of the General Assembly, an assessment and recommendations aimed at further strengthening the integration of the modalities of economic and technical cooperation among developing countries into the operational activities of the United Nations system, with a view to enhancing the global partnership in international development cooperation;

12. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-fourth session the sub-item entitled "Economic and technical cooperation among developing countries", and in that context requests the Secretary-General to report to it at that session on the implementation of the present resolution.

UN Capital Development Fund

During 1997 [DP/1998/17/Add.3], the United Nations Capital Development Fund (UNCDF) focused on quality and policy development by continuing to follow strategies outlined in its 1995 policy document [YUN 1995, p. 903] and to follow the strategies endorsed by the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board in March (see below).

At the end of 1997, UNCDF carried out an in-depth review of its products, including local development funds, eco-development, microfinancing and blueprint infrastructure projects. It improved the dialogue between the programme countries and headquarters. It emphasized the improvement of synergy with UNDP, particularly in country offices, through Memoranda of Understanding and joint programming. UNCDF began a process by which it would merge local development fund and eco-type approaches into a single programme, thus combining some of the more innovative aspects of the eco-approach with the institutional strategy of local development funds (anchoring activities with local state institutions) in future programming.

Core contributions to the Fund remained at $33 million in 1997. The majority of funding—59 per cent—went towards local development fund, eco-development and microfinancing projects. Grant increases and new project approvals (15) increased by 15 per cent to over $63 million, but UNCDF was not as successful in reaching its target for delivery of ongoing projects, which dropped by 9 per cent to $38.2 million. As it had stated in the 1995 policy paper, UNCDF focused increasingly on Africa in its programming, raising project approvals for Africa by almost 7 per cent, to 64 per cent of all project approvals.

Activities in 1997 included: refinement of the eco-development concept through a discussion paper, seminars and an internal thematic review of several projects; validation of the local development fund concept at workshops and through an internal review; integration of feedback from papers on those subjects and into UNCDF operations; development of a paper on participatory approaches to guide staff and consultants; a review of the UNCDF microfinance portfolio; and establishment of staff task forces for both the eco-development and local development fund projects, which acted as a forum for the exchange and sharing of information.

Fifteen evaluations, two internal thematic reviews on eco-development and local development fund projects, and preparations for the thematic reviews of microfinance and roads projects were also undertaken in 1997. Evaluation findings of 1996 and lessons were reviewed with staff and results from those meetings were incorporated into new approaches for programming and project design. UNCDF reinforced the project monitoring and evaluation system by making Key and Diverse Resources and Expertise stakeholder workshops a standard part of the formulation process.

UNCDF continuously updated its Web site with case studies. A communications strategy was being formulated to ensure better dissemination of ongoing project experience. With regard to external relations and resource mobilization, UNCDF made a concerted effort to inform UNDP, donors, beneficiary Governments and other key partners of its policy and products.

During 1997, a methodology was developed that was used as a management tool in selecting 15 countries for greater concentration by UNCDF: Bangladesh, Benin, Bhutan, Burkina Faso, Cambodia, Ethiopia, Guinea, Haiti, Malawi, Mali, Mozambique, Nepal, Senegal, Uganda and the United Republic of Tanzania.

In an effort to improve collaboration between UNDP and UNCDF, the two organizations held joint programme exercises in Haiti and Malawi and Memoranda of Understanding were signed with UNDP resident coordinators in Bangladesh, Benin, Burkina Faso and Senegal. UNCDF recruited a specialist technical adviser in local institutions to cover Malawi, Uganda, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zambia, with the responsibility of providing backstopping to UNCDF projects in the region and supporting UNDP activities in the field of local governance. The Joint UNDP/UNCDF Special Unit on Microfinance was established in 1997, bringing together the new MicroStart Programme with the UNCDF credit and microfinance portfolio.

UNCDF developed a partnership with the World Bank in countries where local development fund projects might be used as pilots to test policy and design strategies for the decentralization of capital budgets and provide lessons to government partners and the World Bank. It was expected that the UNCDF $ 12 million project would precede a loan from the International Development Association of approximately $380 million. UNCDF formed field partnerships with IFAD in three countries—Bhutan, Haiti and Malawi. It established trust fund agreements with Australia and UNDP in Viet Nam, and with the Netherlands and UNDP in Mozambique. It also collaborated with the World Bank on a major research/advocacy programme on decentralization and rural development.

Action taken with regard to decentralizing financial and programme functions included a paper on decentralization of programme functions from headquarters; the outposting of two programme managers to East and West Africa and one technical adviser to East Africa; and Memoranda of Understanding drawn up by UNDP and UNCDF on focus countries. UNCDF chose the Lao People's Democratic Republic as a test case, prepared a paper on decentralizing programme functions to the country office and signed a Memorandum of Understanding.

The Fund took a number of steps to strengthen its in-house capacities. It held two field-based programme officer workshops (in the Lao People's Democratic Republic in May, and in Zambia in November). French-speaking, field-based programme officers participated in an eco-workshop in Senegal in June and staff participated in stakeholder workshops in Burkina Faso and Senegal. A workshop on local development funds was held in Uganda to provide a learning opportunity for staff. An agreement was made with the Asian Institute of Technology in Bangkok, Thailand, whereby the Institute would provide technical support for UNCDF programme development in Asia. UNCDF also recruited a monitoring and evaluation specialist and a regional technical adviser on local development funds.

On 14 March [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/8)], the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board endorsed the implementation of the new UNCDF policy focus by which activities were concentrated on local governance, decentralization, participation and microfinancing. The Board also endorsed reorganization efforts and recommended that in monitoring and evaluation attention should be given to the Fund's modus operandi and the relationship between headquarters and the field. The Fund and UNDP were encouraged to intensify their collaboration, including in the design and implementation of country cooperation frameworks, taking into account the comparative advantages of UNCDF, such as in local governance and microfinancing. The Board requested the Fund to improve the dissemination of successful project experience, welcomed the commitment of a number of donor countries to support the Fund in a more predictable manner and invited others to contribute.

On 19 September [dec. 97/24], the Board approved gross appropriations for UNCDF for the 1998-1999 biennium of $12.9 million.

Chapter III

Humanitarian and special economic assistance

In 1997, the United Nations, through the Department of Humanitarian Affairs (DHA), continued to engage in a broad spectrum of relief operations to provide humanitarian and special economic assistance to States and population groups stricken by war, internal strife and environmental disasters. Consolidated inter-agency appeals in 1997 were ongoing in or launched for Afghanistan, Albania, Angola, Chechnya in the Russian Federation, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, countries of the Great Lakes region of Africa, Liberia, Sierra Leone, Somalia, the Sudan, Tajikistan and the territories of the former Yugoslavia.

During the year, DHA helped 46 Member States in coping with 66 natural disasters and environmental emergencies.

Humanitarian assistance

Strengthening coordination

Reports of Secretary-General. In response to Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/56 [YUN 1995, p. 927], the Secretary-General submitted, in July, an interim report [E/1997/98] containing a review of the capacity of the UN humanitarian system to respond to complex crises and disasters.

With regard to the framework through which the United Nations responded to humanitarian crises, the Secretary-General stated that the governing bodies of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), the World Food Programme (WFP), the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), the World Health Organization (WHO) and the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) had adopted recommendations to strengthen their organizational capacity, as well as to encourage cooperation with the United Nations Department of Humanitarian Affairs (DHA) and other organizations to ensure a coherent system-wide approach to humanitarian assistance. DHA supported the Emergency Relief Coordinator (ERC) in discharging coordination responsibilities for complex emergencies and natural disasters. The Inter-Agency Standing Committee (IASC), whose members were the heads or designated representatives of the UN humanitarian organizations—FAO, UNDP, UNHCR, UNICEF, WFP, WHO—had reviewed systemic issues in order to develop a more strategic system-wide approach to humanitarian assistance that would enable IASC members to respond better to crises but would also focus on capacity-building and enhance support with recovery and rehabilitation activities. The volatile nature of current conflicts and resulting threats to regional peace and security had brought about an increased role for the Security Council. Non-governmental organizations (NGOs), whose fieldworkers were implementing partners with UN organizations, were an integral part of humanitarian assistance activities.

Regarding the capacity of the United Nations to respond to complex crises, the DHA Humanitarian Early Warning System (HEWS) had improved the information processes serving the system but the early warning capacity could be strengthened further. The Secretary-General proposed that inter-agency consultations on early warning be resumed and the conclusions fed into the IASC process to facilitate contingency planning and preparedness. There was also a critical need to develop a common inter-agency method for contingency planning to provide a basis of common planning parameters. UN agencies in the field had generally developed adequate capacity to rapidly deploy staff and relief and logistical support materials. However, within the UN Secretariat, most rules and procedures were not conducive to rapid response. Thus, more flexible procedures should be pursued. Inadequate funding remained an important constraint to the development of contingency planning and implementation of situation-specific preparedness measures.

With regard to information collection, analysis and dissemination, DHA had formed the Integrated Regional Information Network (IRIN) to manage an up-to-date flow of information to and from humanitarian participants engaged in the Great Lakes region of Africa. An IRIN/West Africa was in the process of being established. DHA also had developed Reliefweb, which consolidated and organized information on current humanitarian emergencies and natural disasters and made it immediately available on the Internet. A review of the UN role in post-conflict situations by the Consultative Committee on Programme and Operational Questions of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) had identified the need to develop a comprehensive approach covering action during crisis and post-crisis conditions; linking relief and development; and involving extended partnerships with other external participants and with national local authorities. ACC endorsed the need for broad elements of a strategic framework, emphasizing analysis of in-country environment; setting of policy parameters; and establishment of priorities for the response programme.

The Secretary-General noted that the monitoring of humanitarian activities should stress the interrelationships of projects and components and the effectiveness of management and coordination arrangements. IASC had agreed that simple field-based monitoring systems should be established in all complex emergency situations to facilitate accountability, optimize resource use, avoid duplication of effort and adapt to changing circumstances.

As to human resources and management, the Secretary-General stated that it was essential to recruit, train, support and retain the best staff available to work in crisis situations. On a system-wide basis, the Complex Emergencies Training Initiative was the main inter-agency forum in which training on issues of humanitarian assistance was discussed. The Office of the UN Security Coordinator and concerned UN agencies had strengthened the security system in the field in the wake of mounting casualties among UN personnel working under extremely hazardous conditions.

The Secretary-General observed that the capacity to monitor the overall direction and effectiveness of humanitarian operations needed to be strengthened, including the way in which funding and resource allocation decisions affected the materialization of a coherent response.

The Economic and Social Council, by decision 1997/218 of 17 July, took note of the Secretary-General's report and requested that a more comprehensive report on humanitarian assistance be submitted at a subsequent session.

The Secretary-General, in an 8 October note to the General Assembly [A/52/443], stated that the review of the UN system's capacity to respond to humanitarian crises and disasters was still underway.

He referred to his July report on reform measures [A/51/950] (see below), a number of which pertained to the humanitarian sector. Since that report was due to be considered by the Assembly in 1997, the Secretary-General would report in 1998 on the implementation of the reform of the humanitarian sector as well as on further progress by IASC to strengthen the capacity of UN humanitarian assistance.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December [meeting 73], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/168 [draft: A/52/L.48/Rev.1] without vote [agenda item 20].

Strengthening of the coordination of emergency humanitarian assistance of the United Nations

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 46/182 of 19 December 1991 and 51/194 of 17 December 1996 and Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/56 of 28 July 1995,

Taking note of the note by the Secretary-General,

Requests the Secretary-General to report, through the Economic and Social Council, to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session in 1998 on the further progress by the Inter-Agency Standing Committee in the strengthening of the capacity of the United Nations in humanitarian assistance.

JIU report. By a 12 September note [A/52/270], the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly a report of the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) on the execution of humanitarian assistance programmes through implementing partners.

JIU recommended classifying the various types of implementing partners according to their activity and performance, improving procedures for selecting such partners and establishing a roster of reliable partners. Regarding agreements with partners, JIU proposed that they include a provision of fund accountability and adequate audit, monitoring and evaluation coverage of their activities, and a clause defining their responsibilities and the consequences in case of default. Two types of administrative and financial procedures were suggested: one for short-term emergency responses, such as floods, earthquakes and limited refugee flows, and another for long-term assistance in situations such as internal and external conflicts that went beyond a specific time period. JIU further proposed an effective system for managing financial and human resources; the strengthening of monitoring and controlling mechanisms by humanitarian agencies and the establishment of an evaluation strategy by them; and the production of an organizational handbook to guide implementing partners.

Evaluation and reform

OIOS evaluation. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 48/218 B [YUN 1994, p. 1362], the Secretary-General, in April [E/AC.51/1997/3], transmitted a report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services (OIOS) on the in-depth evaluation of DHA. The general thrust of the report was that, for emergencies requiring a coordinated response, DHA should focus on support of IASC and on coordination of emergency assistance without becoming operational itself, and that more attention should be given to natural disaster reduction programmes. Specific recommendations were made on support to field coordination through a DHA cadre of field support staff; early agreement on allocation of responsibilities in emergencies; operational predictability and addressing gaps in the response to emergencies; inter-agency consolidated appeals; relief practices in major emergencies; and dissemination of lessons learned and best practices. The Secretary-General stated that he concurred with the OIOS recommendations.

Reform measures. In his July report on renewing the United Nations: a programme for reform (see PART FIVE, Chapter I) [A/51/950], the Secretary-General presented his plans to enhance the UN response to humanitarian needs, which included a major restructuring of the Secretariat component responsible for coordinating humanitarian assistance. An office of the Emergency Relief Coordinator (ERC) would replace DHA, the responsibilities of which would be transferred to other entities that provided assistance on the ground. Its coordination and advocacy role would be bolstered and performed by the ERC, who would focus on the core functions identified by the Assembly in resolution 46/182 [YUN 1991, p. 421]. IASC would be further strengthened and continue to be the main consultative body for humanitarian agencies, chaired by the ERC. A six-member IASC Steering Committee would be established to enhance a rapid response capacity. IASC would be asked to identify measures to harmonize processes and further enhance the Consolidated Appeals process to ensure that appeals were needs-based and prioritized, taking into account the comparative advantages of each agency. In the field, a lead agency might be designated by the ERC to coordinate complex emergencies. The Secretary-General recommended that the General Assembly designate the ERC as the United Nations Humanitarian Assistance Coordinator and transfer the ERC's responsibilities for coordinating natural disaster mitigation to UNDP. He also recommended that a humanitarian affairs segment of the Economic and Social Council be established as soon as possible.

Resource mobilization

Central Emergency Revolving Fund

According to the Secretary-General's July interim report [E/1997/98] (see above), the Central Emergency Revolving Fund remained one of the primary mechanisms designed to ensure the rapid response of UN organizations to emergencies. The Fund, which was managed by the ERC, since its establishment in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 584] had been used 48 times to meet urgent relief requirements; $124 million had been disbursed, of which $111 million was reimbursed.

In 1995 and 1996, requests for utilization of the Fund declined dramatically. The absence of a waiver for high-risk loans (where there was no assurance of reimbursement from a donor) had made agencies reluctant to borrow from the Fund for fear of being unable to repay the balance. Also, individual organizations had made efforts both to increase their own interim emergency resources and to minimize administrative procedures that in the past had precluded action in advance of the actual receipt of funds. In addition, fewer large-scale emergencies had occurred during that period than in the first three years of the Fund's existence.

Consolidated Appeals

The Consolidated Appeals process remained the single most important mechanism for coordinating and facilitating the capacity of the UN system to meet its emergency resource requirements, according to the Secretary-General's interim report to the Economic and Social Council [E/1997/98].

In the last quarter of 1997, DHA began initiatives to substantially improve and strengthen the process. A user guide was being drafted and procedures for developing improved strategy, monitoring and review mechanisms were being developed.

During 1997, DHA prepared and issued inter-agency Consolidated Appeals for the following countries or regions: Afghanistan, Albania, Angola, Chechnya (Russian Federation), the Congo, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the territory of the former Yugoslavia, the Great Lakes region of Africa, Liberia, Sierra Leone and the Sudan.

White Helmets

In response to General Assembly resolution 50/19 [YUN 1995, p. 929], the Secretary-General, in a 10 November report [A/52/586], described developments in the White Helmets initiative, originated by Argentina. The White Helmets provided expertise on a standby team basis from various national volunteer corps to support activities in humanitarian emergency assistance and in the transition from relief to rehabilitation, reconstruction and longer-term development. The Secretary-General stated that 40 countries had established national focal points on White Helmets. He summarized activities carried out by the White Helmets, some of which were jointly executed with United Nations Volunteers (see PART THREE, Chapter II). The Secretary-General concluded that the potential contribution of the White Helmets to preventive action deserved further exploration. However, the programme would need additional funding to continue its efforts and reinforce its achievements. It was hoped that Governments and private sources would contribute to the separate account within the Special Voluntary Fund, established by Assembly resolution 49/139 B [YUN 1994, p. 827].

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December [meeting 73], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/171 [draft: A/52/L.32/Rev.1 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 20 (e)].

Participation of volunteers, "White Helmets", in activities of the United Nations in the field of humanitarian relief, rehabilitation and technical cooperation for development

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolutions 49/139 B of 20 December 1994 and 50/19 of 28 November 1995,

Reaffirming also its resolutions 46/182 of 19 December 1991, 47/168 of 22 December 1992, 48/57 of 14 December 1993, 49/139 A and B of 20 December 1994, 50/57 of 12 December 1995 and 51/194 of 17 December 1996 and Economic and Social Council resolutions 1995/56 of 28 July 1995 and 1996/33 of 25 July 1996,

Recognizing that the success of the international community in addressing the growing magnitude and complexity of natural disasters and other humanitarian emergencies depends not only on the formulation of a well-coordinated global response but also in the promotion of a smooth transition from relief to rehabilitation, reconstruction and development,

Bearing in mind that prevention, preparedness and contingency planning for emergencies at a global level depend, for the most part, on the strengthened local and national response capacities as well as on the availability of financial resources, both domestic and international,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General, prepared in pursuance of its resolution 50/19, on the participation of volunteers, "White Helmets", in activities of the United Nations in the field of humanitarian relief, rehabilitation and technical cooperation for development;

2. Encourages voluntary national and regional actions aimed at making available to the United Nations system, through the United Nations Volunteers, national volunteer corps such as the White Helmets on a standby basis, in accordance with accepted United Nations procedures and practices, in order to provide specialized human and technical resources for emergency relief and rehabilitation;

3. Expresses its appreciation for the commendable progress of the White Helmets initiative as another voluntary international effort to provide the United Nations system with volunteer expertise to respond, in a quick and coordinated manner, to humanitarian relief, rehabilitation, reconstruction and development, while preserving the non-political, neutral and impartial character of humanitarian action;

4. Recognizes that the White Helmets, as an operational partner of the United Nations Volunteers, are an efficient and viable mechanism for making pre-identified and trained homogenous teams available to the United Nations system, in support of immediate relief, rehabilitation, reconstruction and development activities, in the light of the increasing number and growing magnitude and complexity of natural disasters and other emergencies;

5. Calls upon States to promote the facilitation of co-operative actions between the United Nations system and the civil society, through national volunteer corps, in order to strengthen the United Nations capacities for early and effective response to humanitarian emergencies;

6. Encourages States to identify and support their respective national focal points for the White Helmets in order to continue to provide the United Nations system with an accessible global network of rapid response facilities in case of humanitarian emergencies;

7. Invites States and the United Nations system to consider ways and means to ensure the integration of the White Helmets initiative into their programme activities, particularly those related to humanitarian and disaster relief assistance;

8. Invites the Secretary-General to consider the potential use of White Helmets as a resource for preventing and mitigating the effects of emergencies and post-conflict humanitarian emergencies and, in this context, to maintain an adequate structure for the White Helmets liaison functions, taking into account the ongoing reforms process;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-fourth session, under the item entitled "Strengthening of the coordination of humanitarian and disaster relief assistance of the United Nations, including special economic assistance", on the actions taken in line with the present resolution.

Mine clearance

In 1997, the number of mine-action programmes increased further, according to a December report of the Secretary-General [A/52/679], submitted in response to General Assembly resolution 51/149 [YUN 1996, p. 800]. The report provided information on the activities of United Nations organizations, as well as those of other international bodies and NGOs involved in mine-action activities. It also presented details on ongoing mine-action programmes in Afghanistan, Angola, Cambodia, the former Yugoslavia (particularly Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia, including Eastern Slavonia), the Lao People's Democratic Republic and Mozambique and described assessment missions that had been carried out in Georgia, Guatemala, Iraq, Somalia, the Sudan and Tajikistan. With regard to resources for mine-clearance activities, the report noted that contributions and pledges to the Voluntary Trust Fund for Assistance in Mine Clearance, established by Assembly resolution 49/215 [YUN 1994, p. 173], totalled $41.6 million as at 1 November.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 76], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/173 [draft: A/52/L.69 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 41].

Assistance in mine clearance

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 48/7 of 19 October 1993, 49/215 of 23 December 1994, 50/82 of 14 December 1995 and 51/149 of 13 December 1996 on assistance in mine clearance, all adopted without a vote,

Considering demining to be an important component of United Nations humanitarian and development activities,

Reaffirming its deep concern at the tremendous humanitarian problem caused by the presence of mines and other unexploded devices that have serious and lasting social and economic consequences for the populations of mine-infested countries and constitute an obstacle to the return of refugees and other displaced persons, to humanitarian aid operations and to reconstruction and economic development, as well as to the restoration of normal social conditions,

Reiterating its dismay at the high number of victims of mines, especially among civilian populations, particularly children, and recalling in this context Commission on Human Rights resolutions 1995/79 of 8 March 1995, 1996/85 of 24 April 1996 and 1997/78 of 18 April 1997 on the rights of the child and resolution 1996/27 of 19 April 1996 and decision 1997/107 of 11 April 1997 on the human rights of persons with disability,

Deeply alarmed that the number of mines being laid each year, as well as the presence of a large number of mines and other unexploded devices as a result of armed conflicts, exponentially outweighs the number of such mines that can be cleared during that time, and thus convinced of the necessity and urgency of a significant increase in mine-clearance efforts by the international community,

Noting the decisions taken at the Review Conference of the States Parties to the Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons Which May Be Deemed to Be Excessively Injurious or to Have Indiscriminate Effects, particularly with respect to Protocol II of the Convention and the inclusion in the Amended Protocol of a number of provisions of importance for mine-clearance operations, notably the requirement of detectability,

Recalling that the States Parties to the Review Conference declared their commitment to keep the provisions of Protocol II under review in order to ensure that the concerns regarding the weapons it covers are addressed, and that they would encourage efforts of the United Nations and other organizations to address all the problems of landmines,

Recalling also the adoption at the Ottawa International Strategy Conference, "Towards a Global Ban on Anti-Personnel Mines", on 5 October 1996, of the Ottawa Declaration whereby participants undertook a commitment towards the earliest possible conclusion of a legally binding international agreement to ban anti-personnel mines and which, among other things, recognizes that the international community must provide significantly greater resources to mine-awareness programmes, mine-clearance operations and victim assistance, as well as the Brussels Declaration of 27 June 1997,

Noting the adoption on 18 September 1997 at the Oslo Conference of the Convention on the Prohibition of the Use, Stockpiling, Production and Transfer of Anti-personnel Mines and on Their Destruction, which, among other things, recognizes that States parties in a position to do so should provide assistance for mine-clearance and related activities, for the care and rehabilitation, and social and economic reintegration, of mine victims and for mine-awareness programmes, and noting that the Convention was opened for signature at Ottawa on 3 December 1997 and that it has been signed by one hundred and twenty-two States,

Encouraged by the recent initiatives taken at conferences in Elsinore, Denmark, Bonn, Germany, and Tokyo, notably in relation to international standards and procedures for humanitarian mine-clearance operations, as well as the development of new technology for landmine detection and removal and the rehabilitation of landmine victims, which can serve as a basis on which to advance the safety, effectiveness and professionalism of these operations throughout the world,

Taking note of the Plan of Action on Landmines adopted at the First Continental Conference of African Experts on Landmines, held at Kempton Park, South Africa, and the adoption at Harare by the heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity of a resolution on the report of the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity on the issue of anti-personnel mines and international efforts to reach a total ban,

Emphasizing the importance of recording the location of mines, of retaining all such records and making them available to concerned parties upon cessation of hostilities, and welcoming the strengthening of the relevant provisions in international law,

Stressing the need to convince mine-affected States to halt new deployments of anti-personnel mines to ensure the effectiveness and efficiency of mine-clearance operations,

Recognizing the important role that the international community, particularly States involved in the deployment of mines, can play in assisting mine clearance in affected countries through the provision of necessary maps and information and appropriate technical and material assistance to remove or otherwise render ineffective existing minefields, mines and booby traps,

Bearing in mind the serious threat that mines and other unexploded devices pose to the safety, health and lives of personnel participating in humanitarian, peacekeeping and rehabilitation programmes and operations,

Aware that the rate of mine clearance needs to accelerate substantially if the global landmine problem is to be tackled effectively,

Concerned about the limited availability of safe and cost-effective mine-detection and mine-clearance equipment as well as the lack of global coordination in research and development to improve the relevant technology, and conscious of the need to promote progress in this field and to foster international technical cooperation to this end,

Recognizing that, in addition to the primary role of States, the United Nations has an important role in the field of assistance in mine clearance,

Noting with satisfaction the inclusion in the mandates of several peacekeeping operations of provisions relating to mine-clearance work carried out under the direction of the Department of Peacekeeping Operations of the Secretariat, in the context of such operations,

Commending the activities already undertaken by the United Nations system, donor and recipient Governments, the International Committee of the Red Cross and non-governmental organizations to coordinate their efforts and seek solutions to the problems related to the presence of mines and other unexploded devices, as well as their assistance to victims of landmines,

Also commending the role of the Secretary-General in increasing public awareness of the problem of landmines, and in the establishment of the central landmine database and inventories of mine-awareness materials and mine-clearance techniques,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the activities of the United Nations in assistance in mine clearance;

2. Welcomes, in particular, the efforts made by the United Nations to foster the establishment of mine-clearance capacities in countries where mines constitute a serious threat to the safety, health and lives of the local population, and emphasizing the importance of developing national mine-clearance capacities, urges all Member States, particularly those that have a capacity to do so, to assist afflicted countries in the establishment and development of their national mine-clearance capacities;

3. Invites Member States to develop national programmes, in cooperation with the relevant bodies of the United Nations system where appropriate, to promote awareness of landmines, especially among children;

4. Expresses its appreciation to Governments and regional organizations for their financial contributions to the Voluntary Trust Fund for Assistance in Mine Clearance and other demining programmes, and appeals to them to continue this support through further contributions;

5. Encourages all relevant multilateral and national programmes and bodies to include, in coordination with the United Nations, activities related to mine clearance in their humanitarian, social and economic assistance activities;

6. Stresses the importance of international assistance for the care and rehabilitation, and social and economic reintegration of mine victims;

7. Emphasizes again, in this connection, the important role of the United Nations in the effective coordination of activities related to mine clearance, awareness and assistance, including those by regional organizations, in particular activities related to standards, technological development, information and training, and, in this regard, encourages the Secretary-General to develop further a comprehensive mine-clearance strategy, taking into consideration the impact of the landmine problem on the process of rehabilitation, reconstruction and development, with a view to ensuring the effectiveness of assistance in mine clearance by the United Nations;

8. Urges Member States, regional organizations, governmental and non-governmental organizations and foundations to continue to extend full assistance and cooperation to the Secretary-General and, in particular, to provide him with information and data as well as other appropriate resources that could be useful in strengthening the coordination role of the United Nations in the field of mine awareness, training, surveying, mine detection and clearance, scientific research on mine-detection and clearance technology and information on and distribution of medical equipment and supplies;

9. Takes note of the convening of the Mine Action Forum at Ottawa from 2 to 4 December 1997, and of the development there of An Agenda for Mine Action, and welcomes the proposals related to enhancing and coordinating action by international organizations, governmental and non-governmental organizations and foundations on mine-awareness, mine clearance and assistance to victims of anti-personnel mines, among other issues;

10. Calls upon Member States, especially those that have a capacity to do so, to provide the necessary information and technical and material assistance, as appropriate, and to locate, remove, destroy or otherwise render ineffective minefields, mines, booby traps and other devices in accordance with international law, as soon as possible;

11. Urges Member States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and foundations that have the ability to do so, to provide, as appropriate, technological assistance to mine-infested countries and to promote scientific research and development on humanitarian mine-clearance techniques and technology so that mine-clearance activities may be carried out more effectively at lower costs and through safer means and to promote international collaboration in this regard;

12. Encourages Member States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and foundations to continue to support ongoing activities to promote appropriate technology, as well as international operational and safety standards for humanitarian mine-clearance activities, including the early follow-up of the International Conference on Mine Clearance Technology;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session a report on the progress achieved on all relevant issues outlined both in his previous reports to the Assembly on assistance in mine clearance and in the present resolution, and on the operation of the Voluntary Trust Fund for Assistance in Mine Clearance and other demining programmes;

14. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session the item entitled "Assistance in mine clearance".

Africa

Angola

In March, DHA launched a UN Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Angola, which sought $228,447,999 for programmes for the period

January to December 1997. Of that amount, $71 million was for the demobilization of former combatants and their reintegration into civilian life; $49 million for food aid; $38 million for assistance for refugees; and $24 million for mine clearance and a related accident prevention programme. The balance was earmarked for internally displaced persons and refugees; transport and logistics; health; food production and basic rural capacity; education and assistance to children; nutrition; and agency operational support.

By December, some $82 million, or 41.2 per cent of the funds appealed for, was received.

In response to General Assembly resolution 50/58 D [YUN 1995, p. 905], the Secretary-General submitted a November report [A/52/563] in which he described international assistance for the economic rehabilitation of Angola, including the current situation in the country (see PART ONE, Chapter II), and humanitarian assistance as at 30 September.

WFP delivered 83,391 metric tons of food aid between January and June. An FAO/WFP assessment mission forecast an estimated cereal production of 431,000 tons, which was 14 per cent lower than 1996, due mainly to insufficient rain.

Between September 1995 and September 1997, UNICEF provided assistance in polio immunization; measles reduction; salt iodization; demobilization of under-age soldiers and reintegration with their families; and support for internally displaced persons and the families of soldiers in and around quartering areas. UNICEF was also active in mine-awareness activities, the provision of emergency education and water and environmental sanitation. WHO assisted in investigating and managing epidemics, developing policies on important health issues and strengthening the health surveillance and reporting system. An International Monetary Fund (IMF) mission verified encouraging progress in macroeconomic management. In addition, progress was made towards developing a medium-term plan intended to address issues of liberalization, privatization and other structural reforms.

UNDP approved a project on support to the development of mine clearance and awareness capacity with a budget of $25,400,000. The United Nations provided $1.9 million and UNDP $1 million towards the project; additional contributions to the Trust Fund were needed to implement activities over the next two years.

Congo (Republic of the) Fighting that erupted in Brazzaville (Republic of the Congo) in June 1997 caused thousands of fatalities and left the country's infrastructure in ruins and at least 650,000 people internally displaced, according to DHA (see PART ONE, Chapter ID).

To respond to the immediate needs of the displaced, the United Nations in November launched an initial Consolidated Inter-Agency Flash Appeal covering the period from November 1997 to January 1998. The Flash Appeal sought $17,730,595, for food and food production; health and nutrition; shelter; water and sanitation; coordination and security; and logistics.

In October [S/1997/814], the Secretary-General stated that owing to the security situation, access to most parts of the country was very difficult. All UN agencies had been evacuated from the capital and there was no permanent international presence in the country, except in Point Noire. On 1 October, WFP began a large-scale food distribution exercise in that city and UNICEF, together with the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and Médecins sans frontières, an NGO, were providing emergency health assistance to the displaced population there. Limited emergency assistance programmes in the south were halted following the intensification of the fighting. Access to the northern parts of the country, where many refugees from Rwanda and the former Zaire were located, had been extremely limited for security reasons. Médecins sans frontières and ICRC had provided basic health services in some areas, but since 1 October, ICRC had not had access to the north. On 15 October, Médecins sans frontières was informed by the authorities in Kinshasa that it could no longer transport supplies from Kinshasa to Brazzaville. UNHCR continued to provide assistance to some 8,000 Rwandan refugees in the area of Loukolela on the Congo River. Besides the enormous security risks under which those organizations operated, the main problem was the procurement and transportation of supplies.

Great Lakes region

In March, DHA issued a United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for the Great Lakes Emergency in Eastern Zaire, Burundi, Tanzania and Uganda, seeking $324.5 million. The Appeal focused on the plight of nearly 1.3 million refugees and the displacement of hundreds of thousands of people escaping ethnic tensions, as well as war-related insecurity and sanctions (see PART ONE, Chapter II). Following a July mid-term review to take stock of the changes during the preceding few months, the total amount of the appeal was reduced to $313 million. The mid-term review also considered the situation in the Central African Republic and the Republic of the Congo, countries not included in the initial Appeal.

Burundi

An overriding factor affecting humanitarian operations in Burundi was the extreme volatility and unpredictability of the conflict (see PART ONE, Chapter II). Negotiations with the Government to improve access, security and impartiality in the delivery of assistance and monitoring continued during the year. The affected population included some 592,000 displaced or regrouped persons, 177,000 returnees and 600 refugees.

The lack of a comprehensive policy on economic sanctions against Burundi had affected a number of major programmes. Agencies encountered delays in receiving food, seeds, fertilizer and exempted non-food relief items, such as shelter materials and blankets.

Despite the dangerous and difficult conditions prevailing in Burundi in 1997, major accomplishments were achieved in nearly every category of assistance. At the same time, certain parts of the country and population groups received inadequate assistance, or none at all, because of serious restrictions on funding and on access to populations in need.

One dilemma faced by the humanitarian community was how to assist the regrouped population. In March, the aid community called for the disbanding of the camps and limiting the provision of assistance to temporary, life-sustaining measures. Aid that would assist the creation or the permanent maintenance of the camps was banned and careful, case-by-case needs assessments were taken prior to any distributions.

In a positive development, over 50 per cent of the estimated 300,000 regrouped persons had returned to their homes by the end of November. The humanitarian community had encouraged the process by providing return packages comprising a 90-day food ration, seeds, tools and non-food items.

Living conditions among the displaced and regrouped were extremely cramped and unsanitary. Their plight was further exacerbated by outbreaks of epidemics such as typhus and cholera. Many camp inhabitants suffered from malaria, respiratory infections, diarrhoeal diseases, scabies and bacillary dysentery.

The western part of the country remained in a state of general insecurity for most of the year, and landmines left many of the displaced inaccessible and rendered the provision of assistance impossible. The security situation in the eastern and central parts of the country was generally good.

Rwanda

In response to General Assembly resolution 51/30 H [YUN 1996, p. 804], the Secretary-General

submitted a November report describing international assistance to Rwanda for the reintegration of returning refugees, the restoration of peace, reconstruction and socio-economic development between August 1996 and September 1997 [A/52/568]. Significant progress was made in providing humanitarian assistance despite the enormous humanitarian needs confronting the Government and the humanitarian community. The delivery of humanitarian assistance was constrained by insecurity, particularly in the northern and western regions of the country.

Significant developments were recorded in the areas of repatriation and refugees. In one of the largest single voluntary repatriation movements in African history, over 1.3 million Rwandan refugees returned to their home country during the period under review, largely owing to the turmoil in the eastern region of the former Zaire (see PART ONE, Chapter II). Over 850,000 refugees returned from the former Zaire and some 500,000 from the United Republic of Tanzania.

With regard to rehabilitation, reconstruction and socio-economic development, by the end of July WFP had dispatched six months of food assistance to 1.3 million returnees settled in 153 communities, thus ending its overall commitment to free food distributions. Existing water supply systems were being rehabilitated and pipelines extended. Shelter construction at the 96 officially designated government settlement sites and dispersed locations had intensified since the beginning of 1997, the Secretary-General reported. In 1996 and 1997, UN agencies supported the construction of almost 50,000 new houses. An estimated 30 per cent of the known new shelter requirements had been met. There were particular weaknesses in the education system and in providing health services and maintaining adequate standards of nutrition.

The Secretary-General observed that Rwanda's greatest challenge was coping with the legacy of the 1994 genocide. A promising start had been made on reintegration programmes, but substantial additional resources and, more importantly, a cessation of violence and sustained reconciliation initiatives were required for reintegration to succeed. While the emphasis was clearly on rehabilitation and reconstruction programmes, significant humanitarian assistance needs remained to be met. Continued support by the international community was necessary to ensure at least minimal assistance to the populations most in need.

Uganda

Throughout 1997, donor response to the humanitarian needs of refugees, internally displaced persons and the most vulnerable groups in Uganda was made available through assistance programmes, ICRC and the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies (IFRC), NGOs and bilateral programmes.

UNHCR provided multi-sectoral emergency assistance, as well as care and maintenance. In the area of food security and agriculture, WFP provided general food rations to refugees, internally displaced persons and other vulnerable groups. FAO provided some 52,000 agricultural tool kits to internally displaced persons in the north and 30,000 to drought-affected farmers in eastern and north-eastern Uganda. Concurrently, NGOs were involved in food aid distribution, the provision of seeds and tools, the establishment of feeding centres, food-for-work initiatives and other activities aimed at improving food security levels.

Regarding health and nutrition, WMO provided technical backstopping for epidemiological and water quality surveillance, and was involved in drug supplies to populations in affected areas. UNICEF trained district health teams in disease and nutritional surveillance and emergency preparedness. It also provided therapeutic milk and non-food items and supported district-wide measles immunization and vitamin A distribution campaigns. The United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) supported reproductive health projects for internally displaced persons.

With the impact of the conflict on the psychosocial development of children and adolescents receiving increased attention, UNICEF supported two main NGOs helping with the psychosocial recovery of abducted children. UNICEF also supported the establishment of four temporary schools for displaced children. It also provided water facilities to six camps for internally displaced persons and gave financial assistance towards improving the sanitation system in camps.

United Republic of Tanzania

The situation in the Great Lakes region continued to have significant negative repercussions for the United Republic of Tanzania in terms of its capacity to cater for both incoming refugee populations and its own residents in refugee-affected areas. The Government was attempting to find an appropriate balance between short-term emergency responses and continuing with the implementation of medium-term development plans designed to strengthen the development of support services in the affected regions.

The UN response to the refugee crises in 1997 was led by UNHCR, assisted by UNICEF, WFP, WHO and UNFPA. For the most part, the food requirements of the population in the refugee-affected areas were met. However, some shortages occurred at the beginning of the year, mainly due to a sudden refugee influx and transport constraints due to road conditions. Although the bulk of the food provided came as in-kind contributions through WFP, a substantial amount of local food was purchased through local traders. UNHCR ensured the adequate provision or replacement of basic non-food items to refugees, such as shelter material, blankets, jerrycans, soap, clothes and sanitary material. The general health and nutritional status of the refugees was sound during the year, although the relatively high incidence of malaria and anaemia was a major concern. UNICEF launched a major anaemia study, which assisted in determining innovative methods of prevention and treatment. At the initiative of the refugee community, UNHCR, in consultation with UNICEF, launched a programme to provide education, mainly primary education to children. Assistance to unaccompanied minors in the camps was provided by UNICEF, UNHCR and ICRC.

Following the announcement in September of a national food deficit, the Government officially requested the WFP Executive Director to assist in the mobilization and delivery of 76,000 metric tons of food, 10 per cent of the total deficit. The WFP emergency operation was approved in November.

Liberia

In response to General Assembly resolution 51/30 B [YUN 1996, p. 810], the Secretary-General, in November [A/52/678], described emergency assistance to Liberia. He stated that the humanitarian situation had improved substantially. The peace process was on course, the fighting had ceased, and on 19 July Liberians had voted for their presidential and legislative representatives in internationally supervised and generally free and fair elections (see PART ONE, Chapter II).

In support of the peace process, the United Nations and its partners designed a reintegration programme for demobilized former combatants, which entailed the launching of quick-impact projects to bridge the gap between demobilization and the implementation of long-term reintegration programmes. The bridging projects were labour-intensive and community-based and involved such activities as repair of roads and bridges, fishing, cottage industries and skills training, as well as health-care services, counselling and civic education. War-affected civilians also took part in and benefited from the bridging programme. By 30 June, when the programme officially ended, it had provided short-term employment or training opportunities for more than 30,000 war-affected persons, of whom approximately half were former combatants.

A special technical committee, led by UNICEF, was established to address the problem of demobilizing and reintegrating child soldiers. About 85 per cent of the children were reunited with their families, while 15 per cent were placed in transit homes.

Humanitarian assistance provided by the UN system included distribution of assorted food commodities by WFP; FAO monitoring of crop conditions and food supply and coordinated planning and implementation of the distribution of agricultural input, mainly seeds and tools; support by WHO and UNICEF to the Ministry of Health and Social Welfare for the provision of health and related services; health manpower resources development, and implementation of a project for strengthening primary health-care services by WHO; response by UNICEF to massive water and sanitation hazards; and UNICEF support to the Ministry of Education in revitalizing the education system. National NGOs grew in number, as did their contribution to the humanitarian effort.

The United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for $31.2 million, covering the period 1 January-30 June 1997, which was launched in December 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 809], drew such a paucity of contributions that it was extended to run through 31 December 1997. The Secretary-General reported that, as at July 1997, only $7,588,561 had been received in pledges and contributions. The need to await clarification of the situation in Liberia was also a factor in extending the appeal.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December [meeting 73], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/169 E [draft: A/52/L.40/Rev.1] without vote [agenda item 20 (b)].

Assistance for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Liberia

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 45/232 of 21 December 1990, 46/147 of 17 December 1991, 47/154 of 18 December 1992, 48/197 of 21 December 1993, 49/21 E of 20 December 1994, 50/58 A of 12 December 1995 and 51/30 B of 5 December 1996,

Taking note of the statement by the President of the Security Council of 30 July 1997 in which the Council, inter alia, welcomed the successful holding of presidential and legislative elections in Liberia on 19 July 1997, and noted with satisfaction the declaration in the joint certification statement by the Secretary-General and the Chairman of the Economic Community of West African States that the electoral process had been free, fair and credible and that the outcome of the elections reflected the will of the Liberian people,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General,

Commending the Liberian people on their courage, determination and resolve in proceeding with the elections under difficult circumstances,

Commending also the concerted and determined efforts of the Economic Community of West African States, the Organization of African Unity and the United Nations in restoring peace, security and stability in Liberia,

1. Expresses its gratitude to all States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations for their assistance and support for the Liberian peace process, and urges that such assistance be continued;

2. Calls upon all States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to focus attention on the need to provide continued support to Liberia following the successful completion of the peace process so as to promote a culture of sustained peace in Liberia;

3. Also calls upon all States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to provide assistance to Liberia in keeping with the "Agenda for Rebuilding Liberia" as submitted by the Government of Liberia during the fourth Ministerial Meeting of the ad hoc Special Conference on Liberia, held at United Nations Headquarters on 3 October 1997 under the chairmanship of the Secretary-General;

4. Urges the Government of Liberia to establish conditions essential to the democratic socio-economic development of Liberia, including the return and reintegration of refugees, displaced persons and demobilized soldiers, by honouring its pronouncement to uphold the rule of law, national reconciliation and the promotion of human rights as a national policy;

5. Commends the Secretary-General for his continuing efforts to mobilize relief and rehabilitation assistance for Liberia, and requests him:

(a) To continue his efforts to mobilize all possible assistance within the United Nations system to help the Government of Liberia in its efforts towards reconstruction and development of Liberia, including the return and reintegration of refugees, displaced persons and demobilized soldiers;

(b) To undertake, as soon as possible, in close collaboration with the Government of Liberia, an overall assessment of needs, with the objective of holding a round-table conference of donors for the reconstruction and development of Liberia;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session on the progress made in the implementation of the present resolution;

7. Decides to consider at its fifty-third session the question of international assistance for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Liberia.

Sierra Leone

In March, DHA reported that Sierra Leone was in a delicate transition; it had clearly emerged from its five-year civil war but had not yet secured lasting peace. Although hostilities had ceased for nearly a year, sporadic eruptions of violence threatened the countryside.

As of late February, some 517,000 of the estimated 1.6 million persons displaced at the height of the war had returned to their villages and had started to rebuild their former lives. Moreover, the encamped population, which numbered 210,000 people at the height of the war, was estimated at 50,000 in March.

In March, DHA launched the United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Sierra Leone, requesting $68.2 million for the period ending February 1998. The Appeal was for food aid ($37.4 million); assistance to returning refugees ($17.8 million); health needs ($4.1 million); food production ($4 million); children in especially difficult circumstances ($1.5 million); water and sanitation ($1.5 million); and education ($740,000).

Following the May coup d'etat (see PART ONE, Chapter II), humanitarian operations continued in the country despite the constraints posed by insecurity, lack of access and the imposition of regional and international sanctions.

Somalia

In response to General Assembly resolution 51/30 G [YUN 1996, p. 814], the Secretary-General submitted an October report on assistance for humanitarian relief and the economic and social rehabilitation of Somalia [A/52/532].

Despite the absence of major humanitarian crises in Somalia in 1997, hundreds of thousands of people remained in need of such assistance, including over a quarter of a million internally displaced persons.

The Secretary-General described relief and rehabilitation programmes provided by the UN system, the absence of civil institutions and the effect of the security situation on the delivery of humanitarian aid (see PART ONE, Chapter II).

DHA reported that contributions towards the United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Somalia, which was launched in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 813], had been slow and inadequate. As at 25 September 1997, only $31.2 million (31 per cent) of the $ 100.6 million required had been received.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December [meeting 73], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/169 L [draft: A/52/L.60 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item (b)].

Assistance for humanitarian relief and the economic and social rehabilitation of Somalia

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 43/206 of 20 December 1988, 44/178 of 19 December 1989, 45/229 of 21 December 1990, 46/176 of 19 December 1991, 47/160 of 18 December 1992, 48/201 of 21 December 1993, 49/21 L of 20 December 1994, 50/58 G of 20 December 1995 and 51/30 G of 13 December 1996 and the resolutions and decisions of the Economic and Social Council on emergency assistance to Somalia,

Recalling also Security Council resolution 733(1992) of 23 January 1992 and all subsequent relevant resolutions, in which the Council, inter alia, urged all parties, movements and factions in Somalia to facilitate the efforts of the United Nations, its specialized agencies and humanitarian organizations to provide urgent humanitarian assistance to the affected population in Somalia and reiterated the call for the full respect of the security and safety of the personnel of those organizations and the guarantee of their complete freedom of movement in and around Mogadishu and other parts of Somalia,

Noting the cooperation between the United Nations, the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States, the European Union, the Organization of the Islamic Conference, the countries of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries and others in their efforts to resolve the humanitarian, security and political crisis in Somalia,

Noting with appreciation the continued efforts made by the Secretary-General to assist the Somali people in their efforts to promote peace, stability and national reconciliation,

Noting with concern that the absence of central authority and effective civil institutions that characterizes Somalia continues to impede sustained comprehensive development and that, while the environment has become conducive to some reconstruction and development-oriented work in certain parts of the country, the humanitarian and security situation has remained fragile in other parts,

Deeply concerned that intermittent drought and heavy rains which caused river flooding and consequent severe devastation, coupled with the dire economic situation and persistent civil conflict, have seriously impaired the traditional coping mechanisms of the people in some parts of Somalia and have aggravated the increasingly fragile food security situation in the country, worsening the overall humanitarian situation,

Welcoming the joint strategy for efficient and targeted assistance and the framework for collaboration developed and adopted by the United Nations and non-governmental organizations, and reaffirming the importance it attaches to the need for effective coordination and cooperation among the United Nations agencies and their partners,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on assistance for humanitarian relief and the economic and social rehabilitation of Somalia,

Deeply appreciative of the humanitarian assistance and rehabilitation support rendered by a number of States to alleviate the hardship and suffering of the affected Somali population,

Recognizing that, while the humanitarian situation remains fragile in some parts, there is a need to continue the ongoing rehabilitation and reconstruction process alongside the national reconciliation process, without prejudice to the provision of emergency relief assistance wherever and whenever required, as security allows,

Noting with appreciation the efforts of the United Nations system aimed at working directly with Somali communities, whenever possible, in the absence of a recognized national government, and welcoming the continuing focus of the United Nations, in partnership with Somali elders, other local leaders and skilled local counterparts at the grass-roots level, as well as non-governmental organizations, on a programme of assistance combining humanitarian and developmental approaches, given the varying conditions in different areas,

Re-emphasizing the importance of the further implementation of its resolution 47/160 to rehabilitate basic social and economic services at local and regional levels throughout the country,

1. Expresses its gratitude to all States and the intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations that have responded to the appeals of the Secretary-General and others by extending assistance to Somalia;

2. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his continuing and tireless efforts to mobilize assistance to the Somali people;

3. Welcomes the ongoing efforts of the United Nations, the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States, the European Union, the Organization of the Islamic Conference, the countries of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries and others to resolve the situation in Somalia;

4. Also welcomes the strategy of the United Nations focusing on the implementation of community-based interventions aimed at rebuilding local infrastructures and increasing the self-reliance of the local population, and the ongoing efforts by the United Nations agencies, their Somali counterparts and their partner organizations to establish and maintain close coordination and cooperation mechanisms available for the implementation of relief, rehabilitation and reconstruction programmes;

5. Emphasizes the principle that the Somali people, in particular at the local level, have the primary responsibility for their own development and for the sustainability of rehabilitation and reconstruction assistance programmes, and reaffirms the importance it attaches to the creation of workable arrangements for collaboration between the United Nations system and its partner organizations and their Somali counterparts for the effective execution of rehabilitation and development activities in those parts of the country where peace and security prevail;

6. Urges all States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations concerned to continue the further implementation of its resolution 47/160 so as to assist the Somali people to embark on the rehabilitation of basic social and economic services, as well as institution-building aimed at the restoration of civil administration at the local level in all those parts of the country where peace and security prevail;

7. Appeals to all States and relevant intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to provide emergency disaster relief assistance, including food, medical and shelter supplies, as well as logistical support facilities to reach the segment of the population affected by the recent severe floods, to rescue those stranded by water and to curb the impact of potential health and economic consequences;

8. Also appeals to all the Somali parties concerned to seek peaceful means for resolving differences and to redouble their efforts to achieve national reconciliation that allows for transition from relief to reconstruction and development;

9. Calls upon all parties, movements and factions in Somalia to respect fully the security and safety of personnel of the United Nations and its specialized agencies and of non-governmental organizations, and to guarantee their complete freedom of movement throughout the country;

10. Calls upon the Secretary-General to continue to mobilize international humanitarian, rehabilitation and reconstruction assistance for Somalia;

11. Calls upon the international community to provide continuing and increased assistance in response to the United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for relief, rehabilitation and reconstruction assistance for Somalia covering the period from October 1997 to December 1998;

12. Requests the Secretary-General, in view of the critical situation in Somalia, to take all necessary measures for the implementation of the present resolution, and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session.

Sudan

Fighting in the Sudan intensified in 1997, bringing the country into its fourteenth year of continuous civil war. The combination of increased military activity and the onset of drought devastated large parts of the country, further destabilized and degraded the lives of millions of Sudanese civilians and put intense pressure on people already living below subsistence levels. Widespread malnutrition and a spread in infectious diseases disproportionately affected the war-displaced in the hard-hit regions of Bahr el-Ghazal, Upper Nile, Jonglei and Equatoria.

In February, the United Nations launched a Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for the Sudan, covering the entire year, requesting $121 million for 33 projects in six priority areas: emergency food aid ($43 million); health, nutrition and water/sanitation activities ($22 million); agriculture, livestock and fishing activities ($10 million); other emergency basic services ($6 million); a refugees and returnees project ($14 million); and inter-agency coordination and emergency programme support ($24 million). Contributions and pledges received in response to the appeal totalled $48,939,731.

Funding shortfalls and access restrictions limited relief efforts under Operation Lifeline Sudan (OLS). During 1997, the United Nations received approximately 40 per cent of the funds requested from donors. The impact of that funding shortfall was grave, and forced a severe cut-back in emergency services and food assistance. Malnutrition rates in hard-hit locations rose to over 50 per cent, and interventions in all programme areas, including nutrition, primary health care and water, were reduced.

The Secretary-General submitted an October report on emergency assistance to the Sudan

[A/52/525], covering the period October 1996 to July 1997, prepared in response to General Assembly resolution 51/30 I [YUN 1996, p. 817]. He stated that general insecurity seriously affected areas with large concentrations of at-risk populations and the spread of the conflict put new populations at risk at the same time that security-related incidents caused major setbacks for ongoing relief projects. Virtually all relief activities in the non-government areas of northern Bahr el-Ghazal were disrupted by militia, who launched attacks on surrounding villages, looting relief supplies and burning grain stocks, homes and non-movable supplies. Between August 1996 and July 1997, 56 evacuations of relief personnel occurred from 30 locations served by OLS southern sector due to militia activities.

During that same period, flight denials by the Government increased to an average of 17 locations per month and the Sudanese People's Liberation Movement refused flight clearances on 14 occasions. Barge operations were similarly restricted. In addition, landmines and ambush attacks were a constant threat to relief convoys travelling by road. Personnel of the United Nations and NGOs were routinely denied travel permits by the Government.

International NGOs continued to provide essential humanitarian services, including supplementary feeding, nutrition, disease prevention and treatment, sanitation, water, food-for-work, education and household food security. NGOs served as the main OLS implementing partners.

The UN system provided relief food assistance and assistance for health-related needs, emergency education, children in especially difficult circumstances, water and sanitation, and nutrition.

By the end of June 1997, a total of 386,847 refugees, mainly from Eritrea and Ethiopia with a small number from Chad, the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Uganda, were under the protection of UNHCR. Of those, 152,874 were living in 26 camps in eastern Sudan, receiving assistance for such needs as water, health, food and education.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December [meeting 73], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/169 F [draft: A/52/L.42/Rev.1] by recorded vote (95-38-13) [agenda item 20 (b)].

Emergency assistance to the Sudan

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 43/8 of 18 October 1988 and 43/52 of 6 December 1988, 44/12 of 24 October 1989, 45/226 of 21 December 1990, 46/178 of 19 December 1991, 47/162 of 18 December 1992, 48/200 of 21 December 1993, 49/21 K of 20 December 1994, 50/58 J of 22 December 1995 and 51/30 I of 17 December 1996 on assistance to the Sudan,

Noting the declining contributions to the 1997 consolidated inter-agency appeal for Operation Lifeline Sudan despite the progress made in the Operation, and noting also that considerable relief needs still remain to be addressed, in particular in the areas of non-food assistance, including assistance to combat malaria, and for logistics, emergency recovery, rehabilitation and development,

Recognizing the need in emergency situations to address the continuum of relief, rehabilitation and development so as to reduce dependence on external food aid and other relief services,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General,

1. Acknowledges with appreciation the cooperation by the Government of the Sudan with the United Nations, including the agreements and arrangements achieved to facilitate relief operations towards improvement of United Nations assistance to affected areas, and encourages the continuation of that cooperation;

2. Stresses the need for Operation Lifeline Sudan to be operated with a view to ensuring its efficiency, transparency and effectiveness, with the full participation of the Government of the Sudan in its management and operation, including the conduct of assessment, allocation, distribution and evaluation processes, as well as consultations in the preparation of the consolidated annual inter-agency appeal for the Operation;

3. Stresses also that Operation Lifeline Sudan should operate within the principle of national sovereignty and the framework of international cooperation in accordance with relevant national and international law;

4. Calls upon the international community to continue to contribute generously to the emergency needs, recovery and development of the country;

5. Urges the international community to give priority to assistance for the rehabilitation of roads, railways and airports and to the provision of means of road transport in order to facilitate relief supplies to the affected areas;

6. Calls upon the donor community and the organizations of the United Nations system to provide financial, technical and medical assistance, guided by the actions called for by the General Assembly in its relevant resolutions to combat malaria and other epidemics in the Sudan;

7. Takes note of and is encouraged by the signing in April 1997 of the Peace Agreement between the Government of the Sudan and many factions of the rebel movement for the achievement of peace in the Sudan, and is also encouraged by the joint announcement by the Government and the remaining faction of the rebel movement that they are engaged in peace talks, scheduled to resume in early 1998 under the auspices of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development of the countries of the Horn of Africa, and the acceptance by the parties of the Declaration of Principles as the basis for consultation and negotiation so as to establish durable peace and stability in the country and to facilitate relief supplies;

8. Urges the international community to support the programmes of rehabilitation, settlement and integration of returnees, refugees and internally displaced persons;

9. Stresses the importance of assuring safe access for personnel providing relief assistance to all in need and the importance of strict observance of the principles and guidelines of Operation Lifeline Sudan;

10. Urges all parties involved to continue to offer all feasible assistance, including facilitating the movement of relief supplies and personnel, so as to guarantee maximum success of Operation Lifeline Sudan in all affected parts of the country, with special emphasis on national capacity-building in the humanitarian field for governmental and non-governmental organizations;

11. Also urges all the parties to the conflict to desist from using anti-personnel mines, and calls upon the international community to refrain from supplying mines to the parties to the conflict and to provide the Government of the Sudan with financial and technical assistance in mine clearance;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to mobilize and coordinate resources and support for Operation Lifeline Sudan and to report on the emergency situation in the affected areas and the recovery, rehabilitation and development of the country to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session.

Afghanistan

The more than 17 years of fighting, displacement and destruction in Afghanistan continued to have grave implications for the Afghan population and for stability in the region.

The protracted conflict had produced a refugee population that stood at least at 2.6 million in 1997, of whom 1.4 million were in Iran and 1.2 million in Pakistan. In addition, there were from 500,000 to 1,200,000 internally displaced persons within Afghanistan.

Humanitarian conditions varied considerably, with some parts of the country experiencing severe emergency needs, while others enjoyed relative stability and economic recovery.

In accordance with General Assembly resolution 51/195 A [YUN 1996 p. 819], the Secretary-General submitted an October report on emergency assistance to Afghanistan [A/52/536] covering the period from December 1996 to September 1997.

As at early August, $38 million had been pledged and/or contributed to UN specialized agencies and NGOs in response to a 1996 appeal for $133 million for the period from 1 January to 31 December 1997 [YUN 1996, p. 818].

Humanitarian programmes continued to operate throughout Afghanistan, despite ongoing fighting and tension, which presented many difficulties. In addition, the condition of women and girls in areas of the country under Taliban control prompted the Executive Committee on Humanitarian Affairs to outline a set of recommended policies and practical measures to promote the adherence by the authorities concerned to the 1979 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women [YUN 1979, p. 895, GA res. 34/180, annex] and the 1966 International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights [YUN 1966, p. 419, res. 2200 A (XXI), annex] and to reverse policies that were in contravention of the relevant conventions.

Humanitarian programmes focused on internally displaced persons, mine clearance, the voluntary repatriation and subsequent reintegration of Afghan refugees, and the provision of food aid, health services and education, safe drinking water and improved sanitation systems. A number of projects were implemented to support an increase in overall food production among settled farming communities, nomadic and semi-nomadic pastoralists, returnees and vulnerable groups. In addition, special attention was paid to children affected by the conflict.

Regarding rehabilitation and development activities, a UNDP programme aimed to rebuild indigenous capacities for recovery through the strengthening of grass-roots community and self-help resources. In Kabul, the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (UNCHS) carried out a broad range of projects in the areas of community support and development, water supply, sanitation and drainage improvements, access improvements, energy, environment and culture. It also supported local government where that would underpin community-led regeneration.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 19 December [meeting 78], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/211 A [draft: A/52/L.68 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 20 (c)].

Emergency international assistance for peace, normalcy and reconstruction of war-stricken Afghanistan

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 47/119 of 18 December 1992, 48/208 of 21 December 1993, 49/140 of 20 December 1994, 50/88 A of 19 December 1995 and 51/195 A of 17 December 1996 concerning emergency international assistance for peace, normalcy and reconstruction of war-stricken Afghanistan,

Concerned about the continuation of the military confrontation in Afghanistan, threatening regional peace and stability, and the significant increase of internally displaced persons and interruptions in the process of repatriating refugees,

Deeply concerned about the massive loss of human life, the aggravated suffering of the most vulnerable groups, the destruction of property and the serious damage to the economic and social infrastructure of Afghanistan caused by eighteen years of war, and underlining the close interrelationship between ensuring peace and normalcy in Afghanistan and the ability of the country to take effective steps towards sustainable economic and social development, bearing in mind that the country continues to suffer from an extremely critical economic situation as a landlocked, least developed and war-stricken country,

Concerned for the well-being of the unarmed civilian population of Afghanistan, who face a long winter possibly deprived of basic foods, owing, inter alia, to the looting of United Nations premises and food supplies and to deliberate restrictions placed on the access of humanitarian organizations to some parts of the country and on other humanitarian operations,

Deeply concerned about the problem of millions of anti-personnel landmines and unexploded ordnance in Afghanistan, which continue to prevent many Afghan refugees and internally displaced persons from returning to their villages and working in their fields, and disturbed by reports of new mines being laid,

Deeply concerned also about the continuing discrimination against girls and women and other recurring abuses of human rights in Afghanistan and the inadequacy of measures taken to reverse the situation,

Commending the efforts of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan headed by Mr. Norbert Holl to bring about the restoration of peace, normalcy and national reconciliation and the reconstruction and rehabilitation of war-stricken Afghanistan,

Affirming the urgent need to continue international action to assist Afghanistan in restoring basic services and the infrastructure of the country, and welcoming the efforts of United Nations agencies, programmes and associated bodies and other humanitarian organizations and agencies, including relevant non-governmental organizations, in this respect,

Expressing its appreciation for the assistance of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in its continuing support for the repatriation of Afghan refugees from neighbouring countries, and reaffirming the principle of non-refoulement as contained in article 33 of the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, Expressing its gratitude to all Governments that have rendered assistance to Afghan refugees, in particular the Governments of Pakistan and the Islamic Republic of Iran, and recognizing the need for continuing international assistance for the maintenance abroad and the voluntary repatriation and resettlement of refugees and internally displaced persons,

Expressing its appreciation to the States, intergovernmental organizations and associated bodies of the United Nations, as well as to other humanitarian organizations and agencies, including relevant non-governmental organizations, that have responded positively and continue to respond to the humanitarian needs of Afghanistan, as well as to the Secretary-General for his efforts to draw the attention of the international community to the acute problems of reconstruction in Afghanistan and for mobilizing and coordinating the delivery of appropriate humanitarian assistance,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General, and endorses the observations contained therein;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to continue efforts to develop plans for national reconstruction and rehabilitation, beginning in areas of peace and security;

3. Calls upon the relevant organizations of the United Nations to coordinate closely their humanitarian assistance to Afghanistan, in particular to ensure a consistent approach to human rights;

4. Calls upon the leaders of all Afghan parties to place the highest priority on national reconciliation, acknowledging the war-weariness of the Afghan people and their desire for rehabilitation, reconstruction and economic and social development;

5. Demands that all Afghan parties fulfil their obligations and honour their commitments regarding the safety and full freedom of movement of United Nations personnel and other humanitarian personnel, as well as the security of their premises in Afghanistan, and cooperate fully with the United Nations and associated bodies as well as with other humanitarian organizations and agencies in their efforts to respond to the humanitarian needs of the people of Afghanistan;

6. Urges all parties to prevent the looting of United Nations premises and food supplies, not to hamper the delivery of humanitarian assistance and to facilitate the work of organizations in implementing humanitarian assistance, in particular the supply of food, medicines, shelter and health care, for which access to those in need is essential;

7. Expresses grave concern at the indiscriminate use of landmines in Afghanistan, which seriously impedes the delivery of humanitarian assistance;

8. Urgently appeals to all States, organizations and programmes of the United Nations system, specialized agencies and other intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to continue to provide, on a priority basis and as far as conditions on the ground permit, all possible financial, technical and material assistance for the restoration of basic services and the reconstruction of Afghanistan and the voluntary, safe and secure return of refugees and internally displaced persons with dignity and honour, and appeals to the international financial and development institutions to assist in the planning of the reconstruction of Afghanistan;

9. Calls upon the international community to respond to the inter-agency consolidated appeal for emergency humanitarian and rehabilitation assistance for Afghanistan to be launched by the Secretary-

General for the period from 1 January to 31 December 1998, bearing in mind the availability also of the Afghanistan Emergency Trust Fund;

10. Denounces the continuing discrimination against girls and women and other violations of human rights and international humanitarian law in Afghanistan, notes with deep concern their adverse effects on international relief and reconstruction programmes in Afghanistan, and calls upon all Afghan parties to respect fully the human rights and fundamental freedoms of all, in particular of women and girls, in accordance with all human rights instruments and standards, including the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women;

11. Calls upon the organizations of the United Nations system to cooperate fully in the implementation of policies and measures recommended by the Executive Committee on Humanitarian Affairs, as mentioned in paragraph 7 of the report of the Secretary-General;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session a report on the actions taken pursuant to the present resolution;

13. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session, under the cluster of items on co-ordination of humanitarian assistance, the item entitled "Emergency international assistance for peace, normalcy and reconstruction of war-stricken Afghanistan".

Iraq

Since 1991 [YUN 1991, pp. 207-211], the Security Council had attempted to alleviate the impact of UN sanctions on Iraq's civilian population and to meet their essential humanitarian needs by a variety of measures that would have allowed Iraq to sell a limited quantity of oil, under UN supervision, in order to fund the import of humanitarian goods. The most extensive of those measures was Security Council resolution 986(1995) [YUN 1995, p. 475], which authorized the sale of $2 billion worth of oil over a period of 180 days to meet Iraq's essential humanitarian needs, as well as other defined purposes such as compensating the victims of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in 1990 [YUN 1990, p. 149]. The 180-day period commenced on 10 December 1996.

(For details on humanitarian assistance to Iraq under the oil-for-food programme, see PART ONE, Chapter IV.)

Kazakhstan

The former Soviet Union initiated the Semipalatinsk (Kazakhstan) nuclear testing range on 29 August 1949 by exploding a plutonium bomb. Tests continued at the Semipalatinsk test site, which came to be called the Polygon, for more than 40 years until the President of Kazakhstan closed it in 1991. The explosion of over 500 devices within the Polygon profoundly damaged the communities in the Semipalatinsk region, which continued to face a complicated web of hardship, linked to the testing of nuclear weapons, that destabilized most aspects of their lives.

The General Assembly, recognizing the seriousness of the situation in the Semipalatinsk region, adopted resolution 52/169 M (see below), in which it decided to consider the question in 1998.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December [meeting 73], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/169 M [draft: A/52/L.61/Rev.1 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 20 (b)].

International cooperation and coordination for the human and ecological rehabilitation and economic development of the Semipalatinsk region of Kazakhstan

The General Assembly,

Recognizing that the Semipalatinsk nuclear testing ground, inherited by Kazakhstan and closed in 1991, has become a matter of serious concern for the people and Government of Kazakhstan with regard to its consequences for the lives and health of the people, especially children, as well as for the environment of the region,

Conscious that the international community should pay due attention to the issue of the human, ecological and socio-economic dimensions of the situation in the Semipalatinsk region,

Recognizing the need to coordinate national and international efforts aimed at the rehabilitation of the health of the affected population and the environment in this region,

Bearing in mind the need for know-how in minimizing and mitigating radiological, health, socio-economic, psychological and environmental problems in the Semipalatinsk region,

Recalling the Almaty Declaration of the heads of the Central Asian States of 28 February 1997, proclaiming 1998 as the Year of Environmental Protection in the region of Central Asia,

1. Stresses the need for greater attention and extra efforts with regard to the Semipalatinsk region and its population;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, in cooperation with interested Governments and relevant organizations and agencies, to compile a report on the humanitarian situation in the Semipalatinsk region in order to assist the Government of Kazakhstan in the formulation of a recommended overall action plan to address the humanitarian, ecological and economic problems and needs of the region;

3. Urges the international community to provide assistance in the formulation and implementation of special programmes and projects of treatment and care for the affected population in the Semipalatinsk region;

4. Invites all States, relevant multilateral financial organizations and other entities of the international community, including non-governmental organizations, to share their knowledge and experience in order to contribute to the human and ecological rehabilitation and economic development of the Semipalatinsk region;

5. Invites all Member States, relevant organs and organizations of the United Nations system, including the funds and programmes, to participate in the rehabilitation of the health of the affected population and the ecosystem of the Semipalatinsk region;

6. Decides to consider at its fifty-third session the humanitarian situation in the Semipalatinsk region under the item entitled "Strengthening of the coordination of humanitarian and disaster relief assistance of the United Nations, including special economic assistance".

Tajikistan

Despite agreements reached in June 1997 between the Government of Tajikistan and the United Tajik Opposition (see PART ONE, Chapter IV), and government efforts to allocate limited resources to returning refugees and displaced persons, the economic situation in Tajikistan remained bleak and essential social services were largely dysfunctional, leaving a large percentage of the population extremely vulnerable.

The capacity of international organizations to deliver assistance to Tajikistan in 1997 was seriously curtailed as a result of concerns for the security of international staff. Three major security incidents occurred during the year that seriously disrupted all international assistance activities: a UN hostage crisis in Obigarm and Dushanbe, resulting in a three-month relocation to Uzbekistan of all UN agency staff between February and April; an outbreak of heavy fighting between government forces and opposition groups in Dushanbe and Khatlon in August; and another international hostage crisis in Dushanbe in November, which resulted in the death of one French aid worker and a significant reduction in the presence of international aid workers (non-UN) throughout much of the country.

A United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Donor Alert on Urgent Humanitarian Needs in Tajikistan, requesting $22 million and initially covering the period December 1996 to May 1997, issued in November 1996 [YUN 1996, p.828], was extended for three months, until the end of August, and subsequently updated and extended until the end of the year. The updated requirement was $33 million.

The International Donor Conference in Support of Peace and Reconciliation in Tajikistan (Vienna, 24-25 November) pledged $95 million in assistance. A UN Open Trust Fund was to serve as a funding mechanism.

The World Bank, in April, approved a $ 12 million credit for Tajikistan to help finance a Pilot Poverty Alleviation Project to support the Government's efforts to restore economic and social stability by helping to improve the quality of life of the poorest segments of Tajikistan's population.

In December, IMF approved a $10 million loan to Tajikistan under its emergency post-conflict assistance, to support the Government's economic programme for 1997-1998. The programme placed significant emphasis on structural reform, most importantly on privatization, land reform, bank restructuring and enterprise reform.

The Security Council President, in a 7 February statement [S/PRST/1997/6], had expressed deep concern over the deteriorating humanitarian situation in Tajikistan and called for emergency relief, including assistance for the return of refugees.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 25 April [meeting 97], the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/30 J [draft: A/51/L.71] without vote [agenda item 21 (b)].

Emergency international assistance for peace, normalcy and rehabilitation in Tajikistan

The General Assembly,

Recalling Security Council resolutions 1089(1996) of 13 December 1996 and 1099(1997) of 14 March 1997, and the statement by the President of the Security Council of 7 February 1997, in which the Council expressed its deep concern over the worsening of the humanitarian situation in Tajikistan,

Recalling also the statement by the President of the Security Council of 12 March 1997 concerning the security and safety of United Nations and other international personnel associated with United Nations operations, as well as personnel of international humanitarian organizations,

Taking note of the reports of the Secretary-General of 5 December 1996 and of 5 March 1997 on the situation in Tajikistan,

Supporting the efforts of the United Nations, in particular those of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, aimed at achieving a comprehensive political settlement in the inter-Tajik talks, and those of the personnel of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan,

Welcoming the recent agreements reached between the Government of Tajikistan and the United Tajik Opposition, in particular those signed in Mashhad, Islamic Republic of Iran, and Moscow, aimed at achieving national reconciliation, and urging the parties to continue their efforts to solve the conflict peacefully,

Deeply concerned at the impact of the conflict on the humanitarian situation and on the social and economic infrastructure of Tajikistan, and aware that the sharp decline in the provision of social, health and education services, lack of heating fuel for hospitals, schools and homes and the sharp drop in the real income of most families have made it increasingly difficult for large sections of the population in Tajikistan to meet their basic needs,

Deploring the deterioration in the security situation, which necessitated the suspension of United Nations humanitarian activities in Tajikistan and has prevented the Organization from implementing fully the measures it had undertaken to ensure the coherent delivery of humanitarian assistance, in particular through the strengthening of coordination structures in Tajikistan,

Stressing the importance of ensuring the voluntary return, in safety and dignity, of all refugees and internally displaced persons to their places of permanent residence and of reintegrating them into the social and economic life of the country,

Deeply concerned about the danger posed by landmines in Tajikistan,

Bearing in mind the close interrelationship between ensuring peace and achieving national reconciliation in Tajikistan and the ability of the country to meet the humanitarian needs of its people and to take effective steps towards the rapid revitalization of the economy,

Affirming the urgent need to assist Tajikistan in its efforts to restore basic services and the infrastructure of the country,

Expressing its appreciation to the States, United Nations and other intergovernmental organizations and all relevant humanitarian organizations, agencies and non-governmental organizations, including the International Committee of the Red Cross, that have responded and continue to respond positively to the humanitarian needs of Tajikistan,

1. Encourages the efforts aimed at achieving national reconciliation in Tajikistan, and calls upon the parties to comply fully with all obligations they have assumed towards this goal, in particular to respect the ceasefire agreement;

2. Welcomes with appreciation the efforts undertaken by the Secretary-General in drawing the attention of the international community to the acute problems of Tajikistan and in mobilizing assistance for rehabilitation and reconstruction of the country;

3. Encourages Member States and others concerned to respond further both promptly and generously to the consolidated inter-agency donor alert on urgent humanitarian needs of Tajikistan for the period from 1 December 1996 to 31 May 1997 launched by the Secretary-General;

4. Encourages States to contribute to the voluntary fund established by the Secretary-General in accordance with Security Council resolution 968(1994) of 16 December 1994 in support of the implementation of the Agreement on a Temporary Ceasefire and the Cessation of Other Hostile Acts on the Tajik-Afghan Border and within the Country for the Duration of the Talks, signed at Tehran on 17 September 1994;

5. Condemns terrorist acts and other acts of violence in Tajikistan, and calls upon the parties to ensure the safety, security and freedom of movement of United Nations and other international humanitarian personnel;

6. Encourages the parties to cooperate in order to reduce the threat from the indiscriminate use of landmines to the civil population of Tajikistan and to the provision of humanitarian assistance, and welcomes in this regard the proposal to create a mine action centre in Tajikistan;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to monitor the humanitarian situation in Tajikistan and to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session on the progress made in the implementation of the present resolution;

8. Decides to consider at its fifty-second session the question of the situation of Tajikistan under the item entitled "Strengthening of the coordination of humanitarian and disaster relief assistance of the United Nations, including special economic assistance".

In accordance with the Assembly's April request, the Secretary-General, in October [A/52/500], discussed emergency assistance for peace, normalcy and rehabilitation in Tajikistan. His report covered the period from the adoption of the resolution to mid-August 1997.

UNHCR resumed its voluntary negotiation operation on 17 July following a five-month suspension. As at 10 August, over 2,000 Tajik refugees from northern Afghanistan had been repatriated. The return of some 3,900 internally displaced persons was facilitated by the Government and the International Organization for Migration.

The overall health situation was discouraging. In June, WHO was able to begin a one-year emergency programme to control malaria and typhoid. The Ministry of Health, together with UNICEF, was implementing a national programme to combat acute respiratory disease and diarrhoeal infections. UNICEF was also developing a national nutrition programme.

FAO was striving to resume and expand its programme. Under the FAO Technical Cooperation Programme, a one-year project for the coordination of emergency agricultural relief recovery intervention was launched in June. UNDP continued to be active in rehabilitation and development projects and had initiated efforts to guide the programming of international assistance to support the immediate medium- and long-term requirements of the country.

During the reporting period, due to changes in regulations, international organizations experienced many difficulties with the registration, importation and clearance of humanitarian medical supplies.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December [meeting 73], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/169 I [draft: A/52/L.46/Rev.1 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 20 (b)].

Emergency international assistance for peace, normalcy and rehabilitation in Tajikistan

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 51/30 J of 25 April 1997,

Recalling also Security Council resolutions 1113(1997) of 12 June 1997, 1128(1997) of 12 September 1997 and 1138(1997) of 14 November 1997,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General,

Welcoming the successful conclusion of the inter-Tajik talks, conducted under United Nations auspices since 1994, with the signing in Moscow on 27 June 1997 by the President of the Republic of Tajikistan and the leader of the United Tajik Opposition of the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan, and welcoming also the progress made by the parties in the implementation of the General Agreement and the effective maintenance of the ceasefire between them since December 1996,

Commending the efforts of the United Nations, in particular those of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Tajikistan and of the personnel of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan, in assisting the parties in the implementation of the General Agreement,

Noting that, despite the successful conclusion of the inter-Tajik talks and the efforts of the Government of Tajikistan to allocate limited resources to returning refugees and displaced persons, the economic situation in Tajikistan remains bleak and essential social services are largely dysfunctional, making a large percentage of the population extremely vulnerable,

Bearing in mind the close interrelationship between ensuring peace and achieving national reconciliation in Tajikistan and the ability of the country to meet the humanitarian needs of its people and to take effective steps towards the rapid revitalization of the economy, and reaffirming the urgent need to assist Tajikistan in its efforts to restore basic services and the infrastructure of the country,

Expressing concern that the security situation in parts of Tajikistan remains volatile,

Deeply concerned at the recent attack on the United Nations and other humanitarian personnel in Tajikistan,

Deeply concerned also about the danger posed by landmines in Tajikistan,

Welcoming the completion of the voluntary repatriation of Tajik refugees from northern Afghanistan, and stressing the importance of ensuring the voluntary return, in safety and dignity, of all refugees and internally displaced persons to their places of permanent residence,

Expressing its appreciation to the States, United Nations and other intergovernmental organizations and all relevant humanitarian organizations, agencies and non-governmental organizations, including the International Committee of the Red Cross, that have responded and continue to respond positively to the humanitarian needs of Tajikistan,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General, and endorses the observations and recommendations set out therein;

2. Welcomes the efforts aimed at achieving peace and national reconciliation in Tajikistan, and encourages the parties to implement fully the General Agreement on the Establishment of Peace and National Accord in Tajikistan, and also encourages the Commission on National Reconciliation to continue its efforts aimed at the institution of a broad dialogue among the various political forces in the country in the interests of restoration and strengthening of civil accord in Tajikistan;

3. Welcomes with appreciation the efforts undertaken by the Secretary-General in drawing the attention of the international community to the acute humanitarian problems of Tajikistan and in mobilizing assistance for the implementation of the General Agreement and the rehabilitation and reconstruction of the country;

4. Notes that the mandate of the United Nations Mission of Observers in Tajikistan adopted by the Security Council in its resolution 1138(1997) authorizes the Mission to coordinate United Nations assistance to Tajikistan during the transition period, and welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to appoint the United Nations Resident Coordinator as Deputy Special Representative of the Secretary-General;

5. Welcomes the results of the donor conference convened by the Secretary-General at Vienna on 24 and 25 November 1997 to obtain international support dedicated to the implementation of the General Agreement, in particular in the areas of political reconciliation and democratization, the demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants and the reform of power structures, and the repatriation and reintegration of refugees and internally displaced persons;

6. Encourages Member States and others concerned to continue assistance to alleviate the urgent humanitarian needs of Tajikistan and to offer support for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of its economy;

7. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to prepare a full-scale consolidated inter-agency appeal for humanitarian assistance to Tajikistan for a period of 12 months beginning in January 1998;

8. Strongly condemns the recent act of kidnapping of the United Nations and other humanitarian personnel, and urges the parties to ensure the safety, security and freedom of movement of United Nations and other international humanitarian personnel as well as the safety and security of their premises;

9. Encourages the parties to cooperate in order to reduce the threat from the indiscriminate use of landmines to the civil population of Tajikistan and to the provision of humanitarian assistance;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to monitor the humanitarian situation in Tajikistan and to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session on the progress made in the implementation of the present resolution;

11. Decides to consider at its fifty-third session the question of the situation in Tajikistan under the item entitled "Strengthening of the coordination of humanitarian and disaster relief assistance of the United Nations, including special economic assistance".

Europe

Albania

The collapse of fraudulent investment schemes plunged Albania into a crisis of civil unrest and rebellion against the Government in early 1997 and brought near-total chaos to the country's infrastructure and institutional apparatus (see PART ONE, Chapter V). As a result, humanitarian needs were apparent throughout the country, requiring emergency food assistance, intervention in the health sector and assistance for the return of some 13,000 refugees from Italy and another 20,000 from Greece.

A United Nations Inter-Agency Mission visited Albania from 26 March to 1 April to assess humanitarian needs resulting from the economic and political crisis and civil disorder. The mission concluded that humanitarian assistance was not required on a large scale. The projects and funding needs for WFP, UNICEF, WHO and DHA amounted to $3,821,530. That figure was subsequently revised to $10,332,522 due to an increase in WFP food requirements.

Chechnya, Russian Federation

The United Nations in 1997 continued to assist persons displaced as a result of the emergency situation in Chechnya, Russian Federation, where armed conflict had erupted in December 1994 between Russian Federation forces and Chechen separatists. That conflict had set in motion a rapid outflow of displaced persons—mostly women and children—and led to UN humanitarian action in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 925] and 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 827].

In February 1997, DHA launched a United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for the Return and Reintegration of Displaced Persons from Chechnya, Russian Federation, for the period from January to December 1997, which sought $11,853,100. The Appeal covered UNHCR, UNICEF, WHO and DHA activities targeting some 75,000 persons for return or integration assistance.

The former Yugoslavia

In 1997, the countries of the former Yugoslavia—Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (FYROM)—were in a transition phase, still recovering from the effects of war (see PART ONE, Chapter V).

Bosnia and Herzegovina had witnessed substantial but uneven progress in the political, economic, social rehabilitation, and reconstruction spheres. In Croatia, the economy and social infrastructure of significant parts of the country had yet to recover fully from the effects of the war. In areas that had been exposed to military action, special efforts had to be made to advance the reconciliation and rehabilitation process. The economy in FRY continued to encounter difficulties, with limited economic output, a high unemployment rate and a weak social support system. In FYROM, the economy also remained weak.

A United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, FRY and FYROM, covering the period from January to December 1997, sought a humanitarian assistance programme valued at $554.6 million, which was subsequently revised to $443.8 million.

In November, DHA launched a United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, FRY and FYROM, for the period January to December 1998, for a total of $406.1 million, which was later revised to $459.3 million.

Special economic assistance

African economic recovery and development

In 1997, the Committee for Programme and Coordination (CPC) discussed the harmonization of the United Nations System-wide Special Initiative on Africa, launched in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 832], with the System-wide Plan of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development, adopted by CPC in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 577] and endorsed by the Assembly later that year in resolution 47/214 [YUN 1992, p. 1046]. CPC observed that an Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole of the Assembly, which, in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 829], had carried out a mid-term review of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, adopted by the Assembly in resolution 46/151 [YUN 1991, p. 397], had noted that the System-wide Special Initiative was complementary to and might become an impetus for implementing all the elements of the New Agenda. The Steering Committee on Africa of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) had concluded that amalgamating the System-wide Plan and Special Initiative would be the optimal approach for successfully achieving the objectives of the New Agenda. CPC therefore recommended that the Special Initiative be renamed the United Nations System-wide Special Initiative for the Implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s.

New Agenda for the Development of Africa

The New Agenda for the Development of Africa, adopted by General Assembly resolution 46/151 [YUN 1991, p. 397], continued in 1997 to be implemented by the United Nations Conference in Trade and Development (UNCTAD), among other UN bodies.

UNCTAD action. The fifteenth executive session of the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board (TDB) (Geneva, 27 June) [A/52/15] considered an April report [TD/B/EX(15)/2] by the UNCTAD Secretary-General, which described UNCTAD's contribution towards implementing the New Agenda. The report covered UNCTAD activities in developing trade efficiency; improving trade-supporting services to facilitate trade and exports; supporting the formulation of national policies promoting private sector development, including small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) and privatization issues; aiding African countries to join the global trading system; contributing to diversification in commodity-dependent countries; and providing continued support for debt management. UNCTAD's technical assistance efforts focused on risk management and foreign direct investment issues.

At its forty-fourth session (Geneva, 13-23 October) [A/52/15], TDB considered an August report [TD/B/44/12] by the UNCTAD secretariat, which reviewed Africa's recent economic performance, analysed the factors affecting its recent growth performance, and explored the medium-term prospects for maintaining that momentum and achieving sustainable growth. Recent trends in trade, external debt and agricultural policies were among the issues covered in the report.

The report observed that increasing investment in tradeable goods sectors and physical and human infrastructure was a prerequisite for sustained growth and required a considerable expansion of imports. However, such expansion was constrained by balance-of-payments considerations, which had been negatively affected by the external debt burden. Debt relief was therefore indispensable for a transition to a self-sustained growth process in sub-Saharan Africa. It further noted that export promotion in non-traditional sectors was an aim to be vigorously pursued; increased competitiveness could best be achieved through improvements in productivity brought about by higher investment in physical and human infrastructure; exchange rate stability was essential for the success of an export-oriented development strategy, although such a strategy might also call for the adoption of selective and temporary incentives for exports in non-traditional sectors; a balance was needed between food self-sufficiency, surplus extraction and price incentives and income security for producers; care was needed to avoid systematic biases against food crops; policy instruments and institutions that could be used to pursue those objectives should not be dismantled; and African agriculture required substantial investments in and maintenance of infrastructure, which could not always be undertaken by the private sector.

In its agreed conclusions of 4 November [A/52/15 (agreed conclusions 443(XLIV))], TDB observed that the recent performance in African economies gave rise to optimism. However, a speedy and substantial reduction of the debt overhang problem was critical if the current upturn was to be followed by sustained economic growth and if Africa was to be successfully integrated into the world economy. The specificity of African economies was that the continent suffered from acute problems related to infrastructure and had supply-side constraints that inhibited the capacity for growth and export. Thus, TDB emphasized the need for major investment in human and physical infrastructure and for African countries to mobilize sufficient savings and funding in order to invest. As Africa had the highest debt-to-exports ratio of any continent, the Board welcomed the various debt-relief initiatives, particularly the IMF/World Bank initiative for the heavily indebted poor countries, which sought to bring the debt burden of countries to sustainable levels. TDB expressed the wish that agreement be reached to allow the greatest number of African countries to benefit from that initiative. UNCTAD should closely monitor the relationship between debt and the capacity of African countries to generate savings to support investment, and its technical support and advisory services for capacity-building in debt management for African countries should continue. UNCTAD should also continue to provide assistance to African countries in their preparations for negotiations in the context of the Paris Club of creditor countries. TDB noted with concern that the levels of official development assistance (ODA) had fallen in real terms to their lowest level. All donors were therefore invited to increase the level of ODA in accordance with internationally agreed targets. UNCTAD should continue to explore ways to increase resources for development for Africa, in particular analysing how ODA could be used as a catalyst to attract other types of flows. While Africa needed to attract foreign direct investment (FDI) and many countries had begun to improve laws and regulations governing FDI, a very small percentage of the total FDI flow went to Africa, mainly in the minerals and energy sector. It was recognized that macroeconomic stability was one of the prerequisites for building investor confidence and attracting FDI. Ways of attracting investment should be considered. UNCTAD should continue to explore such ways, including issues related to intra- and inter-regional investment cooperation and exchange of investment experiences.

United Nations System-wide Special Initiative on Africa

ACC consideration. ACC, at its first regular session of 1997 [ACC/1997/4] (Geneva, 10-11 April), discussed the implementation of the United Nations System-wide Special Initiative on Africa. The UNDP Administrator called attention to the substantial, measurable progress being made in relation to African ownership and country-level implementation of the Initiative. He referred specifically to sector investment programmes at various stages of planning in Guinea, Mali, Malawi, Mauritius and Senegal in the area of education, and Ghana, Mali, Mauritius, Mozambique, the Niger, Senegal, Sierra Leone and Zambia in the area of health.

ACC members emphasized that listening to Africans with respect to their priorities was the only way to ensure sustained African ownership and leadership and lasting progress at the country level. They called for maximum use of expertise available in Africa and for diversified implementation strategies to ensure that each country's specific situation and priorities were addressed. Emphasis was also placed on the need for adequate investments in higher education and science and technology.

At its second regular session (New York, 31 October) [ACC/1997/20], ACC noted that although there had been some progress in a number of substantive areas of the Special Initiative, there appeared to be some loss in momentum in attention being given by the various agencies to coordinating activities in their respective sectors. Progress in linking the Special Initiative and the New Agenda had been achieved, with the Initiative being recognized as the implementation arm of the New Agenda (see above).

CPC action. At its thirty-seventh session (New York, 9 June–3 July), CPC had before it a May report [E/AC.51/1997/7] containing the proposed revision to the Special Initiative, in line with its 1996 decision on the subject [YUN 1996, p. 833]. The report described activities in the priority areas of water, food security, governance, and social and human development and summarized the decisions of the ACC Steering Committee of the Special Initiative.

Also before CPC was a May report [E/AC.51/1997/6] containing the proposed revision to the System-wide Plan of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development, adopted by it in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 577] and endorsed by the Assembly in resolution 47/214 later that year [YUN 1992, p. 1046]. The revision was aimed at harmonizing the System-wide Plan of Action with the Special Initiative. It noted that the five major priority areas of the Special Initiative (see above) were fully contained in the System-wide Plan of Action. However, two significant priority areas in the Plan of Action—diversification of African economies and regional and subregional cooperation and integration—were not included in the Special Initiative. Therefore, the proposed revision included all seven areas.

CPC reiterated its concern about the proliferation of initiatives on Africa and the need to avoid duplication. It recommended that, in order to establish a functional linkage between the New Agenda and the Special Initiative, the latter would be referred to as the United Nations System-wide Special Initiative for the Implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s. CPC requested that a progress report on the renamed Special Initiative be submitted in 1998.

UNDP action. In a report [DP/1998/17/Add.5] to the Executive Board of UNDP and UNFPA, the UNDP Administrator described progress made regarding the United Nations System-wide Special Initiative on Africa 1997.

Progress was evident in countries where government policies and strategies were clear and in those sectors where coordinating agencies had provided leadership. Some examples were: the World Bank's overall commitment to the Special Initiative and collaborative leadership with UNESCO, UNFPA, UNICEF and WHO of cluster coordination in education and health, which had resulted in greater programme coordination; UNDP and Economic Commission for Africa (ECA) leadership in governance, which was aimed at improving coordination arrangements and reinforcing resource mobilization strategies for the countries participating in the annual Africa Governance Forum; ECA leadership in the priority area of Harnessing Information Technology for Development (HITD), which had resulted in agreement that the African Information Society Initiative (AISII) would become the implementation framework for HITD; the association of the IMF/World Bank HIPC initiative with the Special Initiative, which had created an added forum for discussing issues surrounding Africa's debt problem; and UNIDO support for the Alliance for Africa's Industrialization, whose Plan of Action was adopted by the Conference of African Ministers of Industry in Ghana in May, which had further strengthened the integration of that priority sector within the Initiative.

With the clarification that all African countries were entitled to participate in the Special Initiative, regardless of their stage of development, resources for upstream capacity-building activities were becoming available. Cluster consultations and two technical working group meetings in Addis Ababa (December 1996) and in New York (September 1997) had made more explicit the extent to which policy and programme impediments needed to be overcome before countries could begin to access resource flows from sector investment programmes.

UN system delivery on its commitment to support the Special Initiative had been somewhat uneven. Information from various lead and cooperating agencies on the progress of implementation of some priority areas was neither readily nor regularly available. Cluster consultations, joint work programmes, information exchanges and reporting were therefore of limited value.

UN country team retreats in Ethiopia, Ghana, Mozambique and Togo, led by resident coordinators, had helped to define the best ways to harmonize programming instruments and reporting requirements.

Democratic Republic of the Congo (former Zaire)

During the first months of 1997, the international community had to adjust its humanitarian activities in the former Zaire (renamed the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC)) (see PART ONE, Chapter II) to the reality of a country divided into two zones: the eastern provinces under the control of the Alliance des Forces démocratiques pour la Libération (AFDL) and the rest of the country. While humanitarian interventions by the United Nations focused on the complex emergency within the geographic areas under AFDL control, projects were also implemented in central provinces of the country and in the capital city (Kinshasa).

Report of Secretary-General. The Secretary-General, in a report on special assistance for the economic recovery and reconstruction of DRC [A/53/538], stated that in 1997 UN financing was evaluated at $731.9 million, mostly from UNHCR (25 per cent) and WFP (43 per cent), and covered a wide range of sectors. The amount represented 74 per cent of external assistance to the country. Funds and human resources were mainly allocated to emergency operations in the light of the political turmoil that affected the country during the first part of the year.

The Government formulated a triennial programme, which it submitted to a meeting of the "Friends of the Congo", chaired by the World Bank in Brussels (Belgium) on 3 and 4 December. The programme reflected the Government's determination to boost the country's development and promote indigenous capability. UN entities in the DRC (ECA, FAO, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, the International Labour Organization, UNDP, UNFPA, UNHCR, UNICEF, WFP and WHO) adapted their programmes in order to address the Government's new priorities.

UNDP action. On 23 May [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/19)], the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board encouraged UNDP and UNFPA to continue monitoring the implications for special assistance to the Democratic Republic of Congo and to be alert to the need for inter-agency assistance activities there. It asked the UNDP Administrator and the UNFPA Executive Director to report on activities undertaken.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December [meeting 73], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/169 A [draft: A/52/L.14/Rev.2] without vote [agenda item 20].

Special assistance for the economic recovery and reconstruction of the Democratic Republic of the Congo

The General Assembly,

Noting that the Democratic Republic of the Congo is a least developed country with severe economic and social problems arising from its weak economic infrastructure as a result of years of mismanagement,

Noting also that the Democratic Republic of the Congo encounters serious difficulties in sustaining reconstruction and development programmes in spite of efforts that are being made by the Government and people of the Democratic Republic of the Congo,

Deeply concerned about the extensive destruction of life and property, as well as the severe damage to infrastructure and the environment, suffered by the Democratic Republic of the Congo as the result of recent events,

Bearing in mind that the Democratic Republic of the Congo also suffers from problems encountered by a country that has received thousands of refugees from neighbouring countries,

Recognizing the need for the Democratic Republic of the Congo to take all possible measures to ensure the safety and security of refugees and displaced persons and safe and unrestricted access for humanitarian assistance, in accordance with the principles and norms of humanitarian law and in conformity with national law,

Gravely concerned about the continuation of armed confrontation in the Great Lakes region, threatening regional peace and stability, and the attendant displacement of families and interruptions in the process of repatriating refugees,

Taking note of the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, adopted by the Second United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries on 14 September 1990, and the mutual commitment entered into on that occasion,

Convinced that the Democratic Republic of the Congo needs urgent international assistance to support the rehabilitation and reconstruction of its damaged economy,

Welcoming the "Friends of the Congo" meeting chaired by the World Bank at Brussels on 4 December 1997 as an important step in the establishment of a dialogue between the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the donor community on the future development of the Democratic Republic of the Congo,

1. Recognizes the ongoing efforts undertaken by the Government and people of the Democratic Republic of the Congo for national rehabilitation and reconstruction, and encourages the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo to pursue sound macro-economic policies and to promote good governance and the rule of the law;

2. Invites the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo to cooperate with the United Nations, its specialized agencies and other organizations in addressing the need for rehabilitation and reconstruction and reaffirming the need for respect for the provisions of humanitarian law;

3. Invites all Member States, the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations system, as well as international development and financial institutions, to assist in the rehabilitation and reconstruction of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and to contribute appropriately, through bilateral or multilateral channels, towards the implementation of that rehabilitation and reconstruction in accordance with national priorities;

4. Calls upon regional and interregional organizations, as well as international development and financial institutions, to continue to give consideration to the establishment of a programme of assistance for the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in accordance with its national priorities;

5. Requests the appropriate organizations and programmes of the United Nations system to review regularly their current and future programmes of assistance to the Democratic Republic of the Congo and to cooperate closely in organizing an effective international programme of assistance;

6. Invites the executive boards of the United Nations funds and programmes to consider the special needs of the Democratic Republic of the Congo;

7. Welcomes the efforts of the United Nations Development Programme and other United Nations agencies, associated bodies and other humanitarian organizations and agencies, including relevant non-governmental organizations, in assisting the Democratic Republic of the Congo to restore basic services and the infrastructure of the country;

8. Calls upon the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo to facilitate, in accordance with its national priorities, the work of national and international governmental and non-governmental organizations;

9. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) To promote participation in and support for a programme of financial and material assistance to the Democratic Republic of the Congo to enable it to meet its urgent needs for economic recovery and reconstruction;

(b) To submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session a report on the actions taken pursuant to the present resolution;

10. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session, under the item entitled "Strengthening of the coordination of humanitarian and disaster relief assistance of the United Nations, including special economic assistance", a sub-item entitled "Special assistance for the economic recovery and reconstruction of the Democratic Republic of the Congo".

Djibouti

In response to General Assembly resolution 51/30 E [YUN 1996, p. 835], the Secretary-General, in October [A/52/434], described progress in providing assistance for the reconstruction and development of Djibouti. The situation in the country had been adversely affected by the evolving critical situation in the Horn of Africa, the presence of tens of thousands of refugees and persons displaced from their countries, the extremes of local climate, including cyclical droughts, torrential rains and flooding, and the extremely limited financial capacity to implement reconstruction and development programmes.

In addition, fighting between the Government and armed opposition groups in the north of the country resulted in a large displacement of the civilian population, and in the recruitment of over 12,000 soldiers who subsequently had to be demobilized and reintegrated into civilian life.

Djibouti had become a refugee-hosting country. The increasing number of displaced persons and refugees, combined with the continuous flow of illegal immigrants seeking jobs and assistance, was a matter of great concern to the Government. The refugee situation had affected not only general security but also the health sector and sanitation.

UN organizations were developing activities related to repatriation, food distribution and education, as part of the regrouping efforts to resettle refugees in camps. UNDP was preparing a $500,000 project to address pressing rehabilitation needs through pilot activities in the three most affected areas of the country and UNHCR was providing assistance to refugees. UNICEF, WFP, UNESCO and WHO were also active in the country. A round table of donors took place in Geneva in May.

The Secretary-General concluded that there was immediate need for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of damaged or destroyed social infrastructures such as schools, dispensaries and water facilities in all regions that had been affected by civil strife. Budgetary support was also required for the Government's demobilization programme. The most feasible long-term solution to the presence of refugees would require regional political agreements to enable them to return to their countries and keep potential newcomers in their places of origin. The Secretary-General proposed reforming the education system in order to make it less costly, more accessible and more relevant to the needs of the country. He called on the international community to provide financial assistance to technical assistance projects.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December [meeting 73], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/169 K [draft: A/52/L.58/Rev.1 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 20 (b)].

Assistance for the reconstruction and development of Djibouti

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 51/30 E of 5 December 1996 and its previous resolutions on economic assistance to Djibouti,

Recalling also the Paris Declaration and the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, adopted by the Second United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries on 14 September 1990, as well as the mutual commitments undertaken on that occasion and the importance attached to the follow-up to that Conference,

Noting that the economic and social development efforts of Djibouti are constrained by the extremes of the local climate, in particular cyclical droughts and torrential rains and floods such as those that occurred in 1989, 1994 and, more recently, in October and November 1997, and that the implementation of reconstruction and development programmes, as well as of the demobilization programme, requires the deployment of substantial resources which exceed the real capacity of the country,

Conscious that Djibouti is included in the list of least developed countries and that it is ranked 162nd out of the 175 countries studied in the Human Development Report 1997,

Noting that the situation in Djibouti has been made worse by the deteriorating situation in the Horn of Africa and in particular in Somalia, and noting also the presence of tens of thousands of refugees and persons displaced from their countries, which has placed serious strains on the fragile economic, social and administrative infrastructure of Djibouti and caused security problems in the country, in particular in the city of Djibouti,

Noting with concern that a number of priority projects have been suspended because of the decline in financial resources and because of the devastating effects of the incessant conflicts in the region,

Emphasizing that there is an urgent need to provide financial support in the areas of demobilization, reconstruction and rehabilitation of the regions affected by civil strife, with a view to strengthening peace and stability in the country,

Noting with satisfaction that the Government of Djibouti has begun to implement a structural adjustment programme, and convinced of the necessity to support that financial recovery programme and to take effective measures to alleviate the consequences, in particular the social consequences, of the adjustment policy being implemented, so that the country may achieve lasting economic results,

Noting with gratitude the support provided to relief and rehabilitation operations by various countries and by intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General,

1. Declares its solidarity with the Government and people of Djibouti, who continue to face critical challenges owing, in particular, to the scarcity of natural resources and the continuing critical situation in the Horn of Africa, especially in Somalia;

2. Welcomes the implementation by the Government of Djibouti of the structural adjustment programme and, in that context, appeals to all Governments, international financial institutions, the specialized agencies of the United Nations system and non-governmental organizations to respond in an appropriate manner, as a matter of urgency, to the financial and material needs of the country;

3. Expresses its gratitude to the States and intergovernmental and international organizations which pledged to provide financial and material assistance at the round table on Djibouti which was held at Geneva on 29 and 30 May 1997;

4. Considers that implementation of the demobilization programme and of the national rehabilitation plan and reinforcement of democratic institutions require appropriate assistance in the form of financial and material support;

5. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his efforts to make the international community aware of the difficulties faced by Djibouti;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to continue, in close cooperation with the Government of Djibouti, his efforts to mobilize the resources necessary for an effective programme of financial, technical and material assistance to Djibouti;

7. Also requests the Secretary-General to prepare a study of the progress made with regard to economic assistance to Djibouti, in time for the question to be considered by the General Assembly at its fifty-third session.

Other economic assistance

Central America

Pursuant to General Assembly resolutions 49/21 I [YUN 1994, p. 846] and 50/58 B [YUN 1995, p. 918], the Secretary-General, in an August 1997 report [A/52/297], presented an overview of UNDP international cooperation activities, carried out between July 1995 and July 1997, in support of the efforts of the Central American countries to implement a new sustainable development programme in the region.

While the report focused on the Central American isthmus, consisting of Belize, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and Panama, it also covered some activities in support of refugees in parts of southern Mexico.

According to the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean, Central America registered a sharp downturn in economic growth in 1996. Overall, the slump in economic activity triggered a rise in urban unemployment in most of the Central American countries, which was compounded by problems facing the agricultural sector following a poor yield in basic grains. Policy measures were introduced to reduce the fiscal deficit and tighten the money supply in order to correct macroeconomic imbalances. One positive sign of those measures, in addition to the total fiscal deficit gradually being brought under control, was the downward trend in inflation in the region. Progress was also made in other areas, particularly regarding external debt negotiations.

Assistance to the subregion included the launching by UNDP of a programme that focused on peace and democratic governance; economic and social development; and sustainable development of the environment. The resources available for the first triennium totalled $22 million, including UNDP core resources and additional resources mobilized from third-party sources. In addition to activities at the subregional level, UNDP continued to support peace and consensus-building processes in each country. It also contributed to the promotion of human rights and the rule of law.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December [meeting 73], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/169 G [draft: A/52/L.43/Rev.1 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 20 (b)].

International assistance to and cooperation with the Alliance for the Sustainable Development of Central America

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the resolutions in which it emphasizes and acknowledges the importance of international, bilateral and multilateral economic, financial and technical support, cooperation and assistance for peacekeeping and post-conflict peace-building in Central America, in particular its resolutions 50/58 B of 12 December 1995 and 50/132 of 20 December 1995, which provide a frame of reference for international assistance to and cooperation with the Alliance for the Sustainable Development of Central America, in support of national efforts to make the region a zone of peace, freedom, democracy and development,

Considering the relevant resolutions on assistance for mine clearance and the need to eliminate all mines and other unexploded devices in Central America with a view to restoring normal conditions for comprehensive development throughout the region,

Reaffirming that advances in consolidating democracy, sustainable development, justice and social equity, taking into account the gender perspective and regional integration, are mutually reinforcing dynamic objectives which are indispensable to a firm and lasting peace in Central America,

Stressing the importance of the new programme for the sustainable development of Central America and the setting of national and regional priorities in the political, economic, social, cultural and environmental spheres and in the areas of public security and regional integration,

Stressing also the importance and effectiveness of the commitments undertaken by the Central American Presidents at various regional summit meetings, in particular those which constitute the global framework for promoting and consolidating peace, democracy and sustainable development in Central America,

Reaffirming the need to continue focusing attention on the situation in Central America in support of regional efforts to overcome the underlying causes of the conflicts and to continue strengthening the process aimed at consolidating a firm and lasting peace in the region,

Recognizing the valuable and effective contribution made by the organs, organizations and programmes of the United Nations system and by the various governmental and non-governmental mechanisms, the donor community and the Regional Consultative Group for Central America of the Inter-American Development Bank and the importance of the political dialogue and cooperation taking place between the European Union and Central America and the joint initiative of the industrialized countries of the Group of Twenty-four and the Group of Three (Colombia, Mexico and Venezuela) in the progress made towards consolidating peace, democracy and sustainable development in Central America and in the implementation of the new regional development programme,

1. Takes note with satisfaction of the report of the Secretary-General on international assistance to and cooperation with the Alliance for the Sustainable Development of Central America;

2. Emphasizes the importance of supporting and strengthening the new programme for international economic, financial and technical cooperation and assistance for Central America geared to the new circumstances in the region and based on the priorities laid down in the new sustainable development programme for the region;

3. Notes with satisfaction the efforts and achievements relating to mine clearance in Central America, and appeals to the organs of the United Nations system and to the international community, and in particular to the Secretary-General, to continue providing the material, technical and financial support needed by the Central American Governments to complete mine-clearance activities in the region, including those activities among the priorities of the new programme of international assistance to and cooperation with Central America;

4. Stresses the importance of international economic, financial and technical cooperation and assistance, both bilateral and multilateral, in supporting the efforts of the Central American Governments to implement the new programme for the sustainable development of the region;

5. Welcomes the establishment in 1996 of the new subregional cooperation programme in Central America of the United Nations Development Programme focusing on peace and democratic governance, strengthening of the rule of law, economic and social development and the environment and sustainable development, and recognizes the importance of the support provided by the Global Environment Facility for the implementation of the commitments undertaken by the Central American countries in international conventions on the environment;

6. Notes with satisfaction the signing by the Central American Governments of regional conventions on biodiversity, climate change and natural and man-made forests and on the prohibition of imports of toxic substances and waste, and calls upon the international community to continue supporting the Central American Governments in their efforts to continue complying with the commitments they have undertaken in those conventions;

7. Again stresses the need for the international community to maintain its cooperation with the Central American countries and to provide them with the necessary financial resources, in a sustained manner and on soft terms, with a view to promoting effectively the economic growth and development of the region;

8. Supports the decision of the Central American Governments to concentrate their efforts on the implementation of updated programmes with strategies for sustainable human development in previously determined priority areas, which help to consolidate peace and resolve social inequalities, extreme poverty and the social explosion;

9. Requests the Secretary-General, the organs, organizations and programmes of the United Nations system and all States, international financial institutions and regional and subregional organizations to continue providing the support needed to attain the objectives of the new programme for the sustainable development of Central America;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-fourth session on the implementation of the present resolution;

11. Decides to consider at its fifty-fourth session the question of international assistance to and cooperation with the Alliance for the Sustainable Development of Central America.

E/ Salvador

In accordance with General Assembly resolution 50/28 C [YUN 1995, p. 920], the Secretary-General, in October [A/52/433], outlined progress made in the reconstruction and development of El Salvador, including the strengthening of democratic institutions. He noted that between 1995 and 1997, the course of several projects was impeded because of limited resources; delays in the disbursement of internal and external funding; lack of continuity; lags in the progress of other initiatives on which a number of projects depended; and the specific nature of the process, for which there were no antecedents that might have facilitated rapid decisions.

The economic and social reintegration of former combatants of the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional (FMLN) and of demobilized members of the armed forces of El Salvador (see PART ONE, Chapter III) was one of the most complex aspects of the 1992 Peace Agreement between the Government and FMLN [YUN 1992, p. 222]. The sustainability of the programme was closely linked to broader questions such as alleviating poverty, job creation and social integration. Land use and tenure, access to credit and technical assistance had to be linked to the development of productive and social infrastructure.

Social and production programmes designed to assist poor communities affected by the conflict were carried out. Those communities benefited from initiatives for agricultural development, social infrastructure, training and technical assistance, credit, the establishment of micro-enterprises, social development and environmental management. The Secretariat for National Reconstruction focused on demobilization and promoted production infrastructure and capital investment projects in education, health, environmental protection and municipal development. The Social Investment Fund was concerned with reconstruction and improving living conditions, with assistance directed towards poor communities, including those affected by the conflict. UN agencies, including UNHCR, FAO and UNICEF, continued to provide assistance. An agricultural development project for small farmers in the Paracentral region was financed by the International Fund for Agricultural Development, UNDP and the Central American Bank for Economic Integration. WFP was supporting the project through food aid to promote soil conservation, environmental protection, crop diversification and the upgrading of housing and roads.

Between July 1995 and June 1997, external co-operation sources approved $269 million, of which the Inter-American Development Bank provided some 61 per cent, the Central American Bank for Economic Integration about 25 per cent and the World Bank some 9.4 per cent. Those bodies participated in projects on widening, repair and upgrading of highways and roads, reconstruction of the transport sector, road signs, road crossings and bridge construction. The United States Agency for International Development continued to finance the rehabilitation of small-scale local infrastructure through the Secretariat for National Reconstruction.

In the area of strengthening democracy, reforms were made in the administration of justice, the electoral process, public security and human rights (for further details, see PART ONE, Chapter III).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December [meeting 73] the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/169 C [draft: A/52/L.34/Rev.1 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 20 (b)].

Assistance for the reconstruction and development of El Salvador

The General Assembly,

Considering the resolutions recognizing the importance of international cooperation for El Salvador and urging Member States and international institutions to continue to provide assistance to the Government of El Salvador in consolidating peace, democracy and development in the country, particularly resolutions 50/58 C of 12 December 1995 and 51/199 of 17 December 1996,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on assistance for the reconstruction and development of El Salvador, which describes activities undertaken with a view to achieving those goals, and the report of the Secretary-General on the assessment of the peace process in El Salvador, which stresses the implementation of the commitments laid down in the Peace Agreements and the progress and profound transformation that have taken place in the country since 1992,

Noting with satisfaction the renewed expression by the Government of El Salvador and all political forces of their political will to consolidate peace and development in a complex context and the efforts to develop programmes and projects of economic and social benefit aimed at the maintenance and consolidation of peace, the strengthening of democracy and sustainable development,

Recognizing that the reintegration of former combatants and demobilized members of the armed forces continues to be one of the most complex aspects of the social and economic commitments and that the sustainability of any such programme is linked to broader challenges, such as poverty relief, employment generation, social integration, public security and efficient, transparent and speedy administration of justice,

Recognizing also that, in spite of national efforts and the support given by the international community, the implementation of priority political, economic, social and environmental programmes and projects in the process of consolidating peace continues to be affected by, inter alia, the limited availability of financial resources, delays in the disbursement of internal and external funds, lack of continuity, deficiencies in the implementation of other initiatives having an impact on the implementation of a number of projects and by the special characteristics of a complex process,

1. Takes note with approval of the reports of the Secretary-General;

2. Again expresses its gratitude to the organs, organizations, funds and programmes of the United Nations system, to the donor community and to international development and financing institutions, both governmental and non-governmental, for the technical and financial assistance they have provided to El Salvador to execute programmes and projects for the implementation of the social and economic commitments and the strengthening of democracy, in support of and as a complement to efforts to consolidate peace;

3. Reaffirms that the continuation of programmes for the strengthening of democratic institutions and the promotion of sustainable development constitute the collective goals, aspirations and needs of the country in maintaining and advancing the consolidation of peace, democracy and sustainable development in El Salvador;

4. Urges the Government of El Salvador and all political forces to make every effort to support the development of medium-term and long-term national programmes and strategies, particularly social welfare projects, designed to improve the lives of the most vulnerable segments of the population;

5. Recognizes the need to continue to respond to the situation in El Salvador and the need for international support and cooperation as a complement to national efforts to promote the consolidation of a fully democratic State;

6. Reaffirms that external cooperation plays an important role in the consolidation of the peace process, the strengthening of democracy and sustainable development in El Salvador, and consequently appeals to the international community, particularly to the relevant organs of the United Nations system, international financial organizations and donor countries, which have contributed so much to the profound changes achieved in El Salvador, to continue to provide political, technical and financial support for achieving the goals, aspirations and needs of the Salvadoran nation;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-fourth session on the implementation of the present resolution, and decides to consider at that session the question of assistance and cooperation for the sustainable development of El Salvador.

Lebanon

In response to Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/32 [YUN 1996, p. 823], the Secretary-General, in July [E/1997/96], described assistance for the reconstruction and development of Lebanon between July 1996 and June 1997. During the reporting period, the operating environment for national recovery and development activities became more difficult due to the impact of events in southern Lebanon compounded by the effects of the deadlocked regional peace process (see PART ONE, Chapter VI). The unsolved regional dimension affected perceptions about long-term stability, which was necessary for private investment to thrive.

On 1 January, UNICEF, UNFPA and UNDP started a new cycle of five-year country programmes. On 14 January, the Government and UNICEF signed an agreement concerning the UNICEF programme of assistance for 1997-2001, amounting to $17.5 million, focusing on primary health care, basic education and basic social services, particularly for underserved groups and regions. The UNFPA country programme, amounting to $7.5 million, was approved by the Executive Board of UNDP/UNFPA in March [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/10)], emphasizing reproductive health, including family planning, and basic data development and advocacy. The UNDP country programme of $25 million was approved by the Executive Board in May [dec. 97/20], with governance and institution-building, social development and poverty alleviation, and environmental management and sustainable development being the main areas of focus.

WHO approved a new biennial programme (1997-1998) of support for Lebanon, amounting to $2.5 million. In April, the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) released its country support strategy for Lebanon, which included 12 specific areas for cooperation in terms of capacity-building at the policy, institutional and enterprise levels.

In a later report [A/53/123], the Secretary-General stated that the Lebanese Government had decided in May to execute a support programme for industrial, agricultural and tourism industries. It had also announced a wide-ranging agricultural development programme in July. The Government took a number of initiatives to deal with the plight of peripheral rural areas. In late 1997, Parliament approved the implementation of a priority programme for the Baalbeck-Hermel area, comprising agricultural credit, road-building and specific projects. In addition, the pace of ongoing and planned reconstruction activities in those areas was stepped up. Reconstruction development activities during the period from October 1996 to December 1997 included the completion of 150 contracts valued at $369 million for electricity, telecommunications and roads and highways. At the end of 1997, 386 contracts valued at $3.3 billion were in progress with a completion rate of 48 per cent.

By decision 1997/218 of 17 July, the Council took note of the Secretary-General's report.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December [meeting 73], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/169 D [draft: A/52/L.36/Rev.1 & Corr.1 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 20 (b)].

Assistance for the reconstruction and development of Lebanon

The General Assembly,

Recalling its decision 48/450 of 21 December 1993,

Also recalling Economic and Social Council resolutions in which the Council called upon the specialized agencies and other organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to expand and intensify their programmes of assistance in response to the urgent needs of Lebanon,

Reaffirming Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/32 of 25 July 1996 and General Assembly resolution 51/30 C of 5 December 1996,

Aware of the magnitude of the requirements of Lebanon resulting from the extensive destruction of its infrastructure, which is impeding national rehabilitation and reconstruction efforts and adversely affecting economic and social conditions,

Reaffirming the pressing need to continue to assist the Government of Lebanon in the reconstruction of the country and the recovery of its human and economic potential,

1. Appeals to all Member States and all organizations of the United Nations system to intensify their efforts with a view to considering an increase of all forms of support, including financial grants and soft loans given for the reconstruction and development of Lebanon, in particular, donor countries are requested to consider playing a full part in the consultative group to be established on the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Lebanon;

2. Calls upon all organizations and programmes of the United Nations system to support governmental requirements for national capacity-building and institutional renewal in the areas of social reconstruction and development, environmental management, public services provision and support for private-sector development, and for implementing priority field-based programmes in the rehabilitation and reintegration of displaced persons and in the reconstruction and development of Baalbeck-Hermel and the south Lebanon region;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session on the implementation of the present resolution.

States affected by sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)

In response to General Assembly resolution 51/30 A [YUN 1996, p. 837], the Secretary-General, in October [A/52/535], presented information on special economic problems confronting States in the period following the Security Council's termination, by resolution 1074(1996) [YUN 1996, p. 316], of the sanctions it had imposed by resolution 757(1992) [YUN 1992, p. 352] against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) (Serbia and Montenegro).

The report described action taken by the Council and its subsidiary bodies during October and November 1996 and summarized replies received from seven States in response to the Secretary-General's request for information on the matter. Two of those replies were from the affected States of Bulgaria and Ukraine. The report gave updated information on assistance provided by UN specialized agencies and organizations to the affected States. It also covered participation by the affected States in the reconstruction and rehabilitation of the crisis-stricken areas in the former Yugoslavia.

The Secretary-General noted that the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 724(1991) [YUN 1991, p. 219] concerning Yugoslavia was dissolved in November 1996. The Committee, in its final report, recognized that mitigating the adverse effects of sanctions on third countries was a serious issue that needed to be carefully considered in implementing economic sanctions.

In their communications to the Secretary-General, Bulgaria and Ukraine asserted that they had incurred significant economic losses as a result of the severance of economic relations with FRY and particularly the disruption of traditional transport links in the region during the period in which the sanctions were in force, and that they had not received adequate assistance as compensation for their losses.

The relevant components of the UN system, including the international financial institutions, continued to implement substantial financial and technical assistance programmes in the affected countries.

Specific concerns of the affected countries in the areas of transport and infrastructure development, as well as trade and investment promotion, had been pursued through special regional initiatives and assistance arrangements under the auspices of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, the European Union and the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development and in cooperation with other regional organizations. However, substantial additional resources were needed to carry out long-term transport and infrastructure projects, which were particularly important for the functioning of the priority transport and customs corridors in the region.

As the focus of the UN humanitarian assistance programme in the former Yugoslavia had shifted from an emergency relief operation to providing for the return of refugees and displaced persons and supporting capacity-building, those longer-term support projects opened new possibilities for suppliers from neighbouring and other affected countries.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December [meeting 73], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/169 H [draft: A/52/L.44/Rev.1 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 20 (b)].

Economic assistance to States affected by the implementation of the Security Council resolutions imposing sanctions on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 48/210 of 21 December 1993, 49/21 A of 2 December 1994, 50/58 E of 12 December 1995 and 51/30 A of 5 December 1996 on economic assistance to States affected by the implementation of the Security Council resolutions imposing sanctions on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of resolution 51/30 A and of the conclusions and recommendations contained therein,

1. Expresses concern at the persistence of special economic problems confronting neighbouring and other States affected by the consequences of the severance of their economic relations with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia during the period when the sanctions were in force and during the period following the lifting of the sanctions, in view of their magnitude and adverse impact on the economies of those States;

2. Welcomes the support already given by the international community to deal with the special economic problems of the affected States in view of the problems which the imposition of sanctions has posed;

3. Renews its invitation to all States and the relevant international organizations, both within and outside the United Nations system, in particular the international financial institutions, to continue to take into account the special needs of the affected States in providing assistance to them during the transition period following the lifting of the sanctions;

4. Encourages the affected States of the region to continue the process of multilateral regional cooperation in such fields as cross-border infrastructure projects and the promotion of trade and investment, thus alleviating the adverse impact of the sanctions;

5. Urges the relevant international organizations to take appropriate steps in order to broaden access for suppliers from the affected countries and to ensure their active participation in the process of post-conflict reconstruction and rehabilitation of the former Yugoslavia;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-fourth session on the implementation of the present resolution, in order to assess the situation and to present an analysis of the implementation of the present resolution, with a view to concluding consideration of the question.

Disaster relief

In 1997, DHA provided assistance to 46 countries in their efforts to cope with the impact of 66 natural disasters and environmental emergencies. In 34 cases, disaster-affected countries requested DHA to launch appeals for international assistance on their behalf. In response, the international community reported over $274 million worth of contributions in cash, kind, and services for emergency relief assistance, of which $8 million was channelled through DHA. Fourteen DHA/United Nations Disaster Assessment and Coordination (UNDAC) missions were dispatched to disaster sites to assist with needs assessment and relief coordination. The DHA Warehouse, based in Pisa, Italy, organized 41 air and road shipments of relief goods to 21 countries affected by natural disasters, complex emergencies, or both.

Whole regions fell victim to large-scale disasters in 1997. In November, countries of the Horn of Africa, notably Somalia and parts of Kenya, were seriously affected by floods. Areas in Central and Eastern Europe were beset by torrential rains during the first half of July, resulting in unprecedented flooding over large areas of Poland, the Czech Republic, Germany, Romania and Slovakia. The Latin American and the Caribbean region suffered the consequences of the unusually strong impact of the "El Niño" phenomenon, causing the Governments of Ecuador and Peru to declare states of emergency. The Asia and Pacific region saw the largest number of events requiring DHA involvement. Southern Viet Nam was struck by the most devastating typhoon in over 100 years. Iran suffered a series of earthquakes. Many South-East Asian and Pacific island countries were exposed to the effects of the strong "El Niño" phenomenon, leading to severe drought conditions. From September to November 1997, parts of Brunei Darussalam, Indonesia (see below), Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore and Thailand were seriously affected by dense haze stemming primarily from large-scale forest fires in Indonesia.

International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction

In response to General Assembly resolution 51/185 [YUN 1996, p. 840], the Secretary-General submitted a November report [A/52/560] on the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction (IDNDR) (1990-2000), proclaimed by the Assembly in resolution 44/236 [YUN 1989, p. 355].

The report gave an overview of the status of implementation of IDNDR activities, an elaboration of the action plan for the final phase of the Decade (1998-1999) and options for disaster reduction in the twenty-first century. It addressed the issue of the preparatory phase for the closing event of the Decade and also sought to provide a forward-looking overview on the status of the synergies with other major strategic concerns of the UN system. A review of regional and global activities of IDNDR and a summary of activities of UN organizations were also provided.

The Scientific and Technical Committee for IDNDR held two sessions in 1997 (Paris, 20-23 January; Geneva, 13-17 October). At both sessions, the Committee focused on the 1998-1999 action plan, on the closing event for the Decade and on the future of disaster reduction activities in the twenty-first century.

The first objective of the IDNDR 1998-1999 action plan was the consolidation of the Decade's achievements. According to the original programming targets, by the year 2000 all countries should have had in place, as part of their national plans to achieve sustainable development, comprehensive national assessments of risks from natural hazards integrated into development plans; mitigation plans of practical measures for application at national and local levels to address long-term disaster prevention, preparedness and community awareness; and ready access to global, regional, national and local warning systems. The second objective was to provide a platform for the future and permit a wide-ranging discussion on options for functional responsibilities and institutional mechanisms for continued disaster reduction activities in the twenty-first century. The plan was organized along the following primary themes of action: hazard, vulnerability and risk assessment; disaster prevention and sustainable development; early-warning issues; political and public policy commitment; and shared knowledge and technology transfer. The action plan would be implemented at the national, regional and international levels.

The Scientific and Technical Committee recommended that the closing event of the Decade should include an important political component, which would be best addressed by devoting the high-level segment of the substantive session of the 1999 Economic and Social Council to disaster reduction and risk management. Alternatively, the Assembly might hold a special meeting. Political consideration of the Decade by the Council could be complemented by a programme forum that would involve all the IDNDR Framework of Action partners.

The report presented institutional options for disaster arrangements in the twenty-first century, including advocacy and promotion of disaster reduction within the international community's coordinated efforts towards achieving sustainable development; integration of disaster reduction into national development planning and programming as part of the UN coordinated approach towards technical cooperation and development at the country level; application of disaster reduction within the context of international scientific cooperation and transfer of technology; definition of disaster reduction as a component of public/private sector partnerships at the local, national, subregional and international levels; continuation and strengthening of disaster reduction as an element of disaster management under the coordinating responsibility of the United Nations and its focal authority for disasters (Office of the Emergency Relief Coordinator), with application responsibilities allocated to other parts of the UN system, as well as the NGO community active in that field; and emphasis on the multi-sectoral dimension of disaster reduction and the need for coordination of UN system initiatives under an ACC subcommittee type of arrangement.

Noting that the impact of natural disasters was on the rise, the Secretary-General concluded that disaster reduction had to become an essential element of sustainable development policies and economic planning. The only affordable solution to the escalating cost of responding to disasters and compensating victims for losses incurred was to invest in prevention and mitigation activities.

In a November report [A/52/561], the Secretary-General discussed the improved effectiveness of early-warning systems with regard to natural and similar disasters, as requested in Assembly resolution 50/117 B [YUN 1995, p. 940]. He evaluated the applicability of early-warning concepts for improving preparedness and minimizing risks that adversely affected the environment and elaborated on issues first identified in his 1995 report on the subject [ibid., p. 942].

The report considered early-warning measures as they applied to various types of hazards (hydro-meteorological, geological, technological); the use of technology; and the importance of local community involvement in determining the efficacy of early warnings, particularly in developing countries and those with special circumstances that increased their vulnerability to disasters. The report identified established and developing capabilities for early warning and recommended increased local use of warnings and related aspects of disaster management in order to minimize the risks of disasters.

The Secretary-General presented the following recommendations that had been developed to advance an effective international mechanism for early warning under UN auspices: concentrating resources on developing operational early-warning capabilities within disaster-prone developing countries; establishing a long-term commitment to public awareness, information programmes and other educational activities to broaden public understanding of locally experienced hazards, potential risks and the feasibility of disaster reduction measures; integrating early-warning systems within comprehensive disaster management programmes focused at local community levels; developing operational early-warning capabilities at the national level based on the needs of local communities most exposed to natural hazard risks; the assessment by individual countries of the effectiveness of their national early-warning and related response practices; agreement by the international community on guiding principles to assist national Governments to develop comprehensive and effective early-warning systems; the convening by IDNDR of a consultative forum comprising relevant UN agencies and departments to consider future operational early-warning responsibilities for all geophysical hazards within the context of coordinated UN programmes for social and economic development; undertaking an assessment of existing international arrangements and designated organizational responsibilities in early warning for technological hazards and effects associated with environmental conditions; conducting additional research to improve understanding of the nature and effects of hazards; and encouragement by development banks and other investors in national economic development programmes of effective early-warning practices as a means of protecting assets.

On 18 December, the Assembly, by decision 52/443, took note of the Secretary-General's reports.

El Niño

In 1997, the General Assembly asked the Secretary-General to facilitate, under IDNDR, a strategy towards the integration, mitigation and rehabilitation of the damage caused by the weather phenomenon known as El Niño—a disruption of the ocean-atmosphere system in the tropical Pacific that had important consequences for weather and climate worldwide.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee [A/52/629/Add.4], adopted resolution 52/200 without vote [agenda item 98 (d)].

International cooperation to reduce the impact of the El Niño phenomenon

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 44/236 of 22 December 1989, 48/188 of 21 December 1993, 49/22 A of 2 December 1994, 49/22 B of 20 December 1994, 50/117 A and B of 20 December 1995 and 51/185 of 16 December 1996 and Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/45 of 26 July 1996,

Taking into account that the El Niño Southern Oscillation Phenomenon, commonly known as "El Niño", has had an acute impact in several regions of the world, with particular severity and frequency in the coastal countries of the Pacific Ocean,

Noting that El Niño has a recurring character and has produced disastrous effects, resulting in large material, economic, human and environmental losses, with particular impact in the coastal countries of the Pacific Ocean, especially in developing countries,

Acknowledging with concern the possible effects that El Niño may have on global weather patterns, such as abnormal droughts and precipitation around the world, leading to food shortages and famine in several regions which could extend over a number of years and which may have potential impacts on world food supplies,

Taking into account that the major El Niño events of this century have occurred fairly regularly and are often preceded by a number of distinct warning signs, which, with an appropriate increase in and exchange of data and information, could assist in the modelling and prediction of its recurrence and enhance the capabilities of affected countries to mitigate the negative social, economic and environmental impacts that the phenomenon causes,

Acknowledging the need to enhance international and national efforts for a better scientific understanding of the origins of the El Niño phenomenon,

Considering that the national efforts of the countries affected have been insufficient owing to the magnitude of the natural disaster and that international cooperation and solidarity therefore become indispensable, in particular in the area of capacity-building,

Reaffirming that disaster reduction forms an integral part of the sustainable development strategies and national development plans of vulnerable countries and communities,

1. Invites States to incorporate in sustainable development programmes, at the national, regional and international levels, strategies to prevent, mitigate and rehabilitate the damage caused by natural disasters;

2. Calls upon States, relevant intergovernmental bodies and all others involved in the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction to participate actively in the financial and technical support for Decade activities, including those related to international cooperation to reduce the impact of the El Niño phenomenon, in order to ensure the implementation of the International Framework of Action for the Decade, in particular with a view to translating the Yokohama Strategy for a Safer World: Guidelines for Natural Disaster Prevention, Preparedness and Mitigation and its Plan of Action into concrete disaster reduction programmes and activities;

3. Commends the national, regional and subregional efforts of affected countries, particularly those of developing countries, to reduce the impact of El Niño;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to facilitate, within the framework of the Decade, an internationally concerted and comprehensive strategy towards the integration of the prevention, mitigation and rehabilitation of the damage caused by the El Niño phenomenon, including the development of long-term strategies which take into due consideration the need for technical cooperation, financial assistance, the transfer of appropriate technology and the dissemination of existing scientific knowledge, as part of the Decade's activities, the International Framework of Action for the Decade and the Yokohama Strategy for a Safer World: Guidelines for Natural Disaster Prevention, Preparedness and Mitigation and its Plan of Action, and taking into account the relevant parts of the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States;

5. Calls upon the secretariat of the Decade to continue to facilitate a concerted international approach to improvements in early-warning capacities for natural disasters and similar disasters with adverse impact on the environment, with particular reference to El Niño;

6. Welcomes the establishment of the Inter-agency Task Force on El Niño for cooperative work on the prevention and mitigation of and preparedness for natural disasters related to the El Niño phenomenon;

7. Calls upon the organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, especially the Intergovernmental Oceanographic Commission of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the World Meteorological Organization, the World Health Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the United Nations Environment Programme and the United Nations Development Programme, as well as the International Council of Scientific Unions and the World

Climate Research Programme, within the framework of the Decade, to contribute further to a comprehensive approach and study of El Niño and to intensify their cooperation with the regions affected by the phenomenon, especially developing countries, small island developing States and landlocked countries;

8. Invites States to support the oceanographic and terrestrial observation networks to observe, describe and predict climate anomalies related to El Niño;

9. Invites States, intergovernmental organizations and all those participating in the Decade to provide technical and financial assistance, including national capacity-building, to developing countries to support global and regional observation systems and research, including the dissemination of data on El Niño, to prevent, mitigate and redress the negative effects of the phenomenon;

10. Requests the Secretary-General, within the context of paragraph 4 of the present resolution and within available resources of the secretariat of the Decade, to promote an intergovernmental meeting of experts, including representatives of academic and scientific institutions devoted to the study and analysis of El Niño, in order to facilitate the exchange of information and national experiences related to the monitoring of the phenomenon as well as of strategies for the reduction of its impact and to provide to the meeting the reports of regional meetings and symposia specializing in the phenomenon;

11. Urges the Secretary-General to include the El Niño phenomenon and its consequences in the ongoing activities of the Decade to improve the effectiveness and increase international coordination of early-warning systems with regard to natural and similar disasters with an adverse impact on the environment;

12. Recommends that long-term public awareness and information programmes related to natural disasters, including those induced by El Niño and similar disasters with an adverse impact on the environment, be integrated into comprehensive national disaster management programmes that focus on preventive strategies for risk reduction and that those programmes be included as integral elements of United Nations support for social and economic development programmes;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session a report on the implementation of the present resolution, within the discussion on the implementation of the Decade, under the agenda item entitled "Environment and sustainable development", including proposals on how to integrate the prevention, mitigation and rehabilitation of the impacts of the El Niño phenomenon into the development of the disaster reduction strategy for the twenty-first century.

Disaster assistance

Cook Islands

On 1 and 2 November, tropical cyclone Martin battered the islands of Manihiki, Rakahanga and Pukapuka in the Northern Group of the Cook Islands. Manihiki island suffered the worst and most extensive damage when a sea surge swept across the island, causing loss of life and destruction of most of the infrastructure and buildings. Government sources confirmed that the situation in Pukapuka and Rakahanga was stable and not critical.

The Government requested assistance from the international community, in particular the mobilization and deployment of an UNDAC team. DHA immediately dispatched a three-member team to the Cook Islands, two of whom assessed damage in Manihiki. The remaining team member stayed in Rarotonga for general liaison and coordination with local authorities and to monitor national and international response to the disaster.

The UNDAC team identified the immediate needs for international assistance, and the sum of $20,000 was transferred to the Government to cover the costs of a one-week supply of emergency food for the Manihikians in Rarotonga, and emergency medical supplies and equipment. A proposal for a UNDP crisis fund of up to $200,000 to meet some of the relief coordination costs identified by the Government was in the pipeline. An offer of assistance from the United States Official Fund for Disaster Assistance amounting to $250,000, should it be needed, was made known to the Government.

Further requests for assistance from the United Nations and the international community would be known after a total assessment had been carried out. The UNDAC team expected that aid would be required for such priority areas as shelter, emergency food, water supplies, medical supplies and transportation costs of the immediate relief supplies, personnel and equipment.

Democratic People's Republic of Korea

The Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK) was confronted with economic difficulties in 1997 due to a decline in agricultural and industrial output over several preceding years. Natural disasters, starting with floods in 1995 and 1996 and the drought and typhoon in 1997, exacerbated severe food shortage and further complicated economic problems.

The first United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Flood-related Emergency Humanitarian Assistance, launched in June 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 821] for the period July 1996 to March 1997, received contributions amounting to $34 million of the total requirement of $43.6 million.

On 7 April 1997, DHA launched another Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for the country, calling for more than $126 million for the period April 1997 to March 1998 for food aid, health services and food security. As a result of the expansion of WFP and UNICEF components of the Appeal in July, the total was revised to $184 million for the period. In 1997, WFP food aid helped some 2.6 million children aged six and under and 1 million hospital patients through nutritional feeding programmes. A further 1.1 million persons were helped through food-for-work activities to improve food security by recovering land, rehabilitating rural infrastructure and suggesting watershed management schemes. FAO assistance contributed greatly to the maintenance of the minimum food security level. UNICEF, WHO and NGOs contributed towards meeting immediate health needs and rehabilitating basic health services.

Indonesia

Exceptionally large-scale forest fires, which began in May/June, possibly due to land-clearing operations, persisted in Indonesia throughout 1997, and were a chief cause of heavy air pollution that also affected parts of several countries in South-East Asia from September to November, including Brunei Darussalam, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore and Thailand. The fires were aggravated by El Niño-induced drought conditions. The disaster caused significant damage to the environment and it was felt that it would have substantial long-term effects on the social, economic, health and ecological sectors.

The Government of Indonesia declared a national emergency and, while not formally appealing for international assistance, confirmed that it would welcome such assistance, especially to fight the fires.

On 27 September, an UNDAC team was urgently dispatched to Indonesia, at the request of the United Nations Resident Coordinator. Its task was to ensure close links between national and international relief coordination efforts and assess needs for international assistance in connection with the disaster.

As a result of joint efforts to mobilize international assistance, many countries, UN agencies, international organizations and NGOs provided various forms of aid, both in cash and in kind.

Apart from fires, a drought hit Indonesia's Irian Jaya province, resulting in a severe famine. The drought also led to a significant decrease in water supplies. Two UNDAC missions were sent to Irian Jaya to investigate the impact of the drought and the forest fires, as well as problems related to food security, water and health.

Madagascar

In response to Economic and Social Council resolution 1994/36 [YUN 1994, p. 855], the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly a November report [A/52/562] summarizing action taken with regard to the cyclones, floods and locust infestations that had affected Madagascar since 1994.

The Secretary-General described support provided to Madagascar following cyclones Daisy and Geraldine 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 854], cyclone Bonitain 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 842] and cyclone Grette in January 1997. He also noted that technical assistance and equipment had been provided to contain a locust emergency in May.

The Secretary-General stated that while the response of the international community to relief needs in the aftermath of disaster events had been consistently good, assistance with vital rehabilitation and durable reconstruction efforts had not been of the desired level.

Concerned entities of the UN system would, therefore, continue to mobilize the international community to address substantively the outstanding issues that would enhance Madagascar's capacity to manage the effects of recurrent natural disasters. The appraisal and planning mission, scheduled to take place at the end of 1997, would lay the foundations of comprehensive, multi-sectoral disaster reduction management, drawing on international and local expertise.

Montserrat

On 25 June, Montserrat was devastated when volcanic eruptions sent pyroclastic flows from the Soufriere Hills volcano sweeping over an area of approximately 4 square kilometres on its eastern and northern flanks, killing 19 people and destroying 10 villages, with infrastructural damage estimated at $1.5 million.

In addition to meeting the cost for the construction of housing units, UNDP provided technical support to the Government in the area of civil engineering. In collaboration with the United Nations Volunteers (UNV) programme, a civil engineer was recruited and assumed responsibilities in Montserrat in September to work on physical planning.

In line with the importance attached by the UN system to the documenting and dissemination of lessons learned in dealing with disasters, UNDP would provide a consultant to assist in such a task for the future benefit of Montserrat and other small island developing States. The consultant would also prepare an advocacy strategy for the Government in its attempt to secure further financial and technical support from all possible sources.

The difficulties faced by UNDP in dealing with the emergency and rehabilitation support needs of Montserrat stemmed to a great extent from the current net contributor country (NCC) status conferred on it at the start of the new programme cycle, which began in January 1997. With that status, Montserrat was a recipient of UNDP target for resource assignment against the core (TRAC) 1.1.1 and 1.1.2 resources only on a reimbursable basis. Access to other forms of emergency assistance, such as TRAC 1.1.3, was further constrained by the NCC status, and by the priority accorded to responding to the emergency needs of least developed and low-income countries globally, as well as by resource constraints affecting those sources. The Government of Montserrat requested a review of the country's funding status with UNDP.

UNDP action. On 19 September [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/29)], the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board agreed to postpone the first country cooperation framework for Montserrat. The Board also endorsed a UNDP request for the provision of additional emergency assistance and rehabilitation support to Montserrat under TRAC line 1.1.3.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December [meeting 73], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/169 J [draft: A/52/L.56 & Add.I] without vote [agenda item 20 (b)].

Emergency assistance to Montserrat

The General Assembly,
Recalling its resolutions 46/182 of 19 December 1991 and 48/188 of 21 December 1993,

Deeply distressed by the grave situation in Montserrat caused by the eruptions of the Montsoufriere volcano,

Welcoming the efforts of the Governments of Montserrat and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the States members of the Caribbean Community to assist the people of Montserrat and to alleviate their suffering,

Noting the response by Governments, the bodies and agencies of the United Nations system, international and regional agencies, non-governmental organizations and private individuals to provide relief,

Welcoming decision 1997/29 of 19 September 1997 of the Executive Board of the United Nations Development Programme and of the United Nations Population Fund to endorse a package of emergency relief measures to be made available to Montserrat,

Recognizing that the magnitude of the disaster and its long-term effects will require, as a complement to the efforts being made by the Governments of Montserrat and the United Kingdom, a further demonstration of international solidarity and humanitarian concerns to ensure broad multilateral cooperation in order to meet the emergency situation in Montserrat,

1. Expresses its solidarity and support to the Government and people of Montserrat;
2. Expresses its appreciation to those States, international agencies and non-governmental organizations that have provided emergency relief to Montserrat;
3. Calls upon all States to contribute generously to the relief, rehabilitation and reconstruction efforts;
4. Calls upon the United Nations Development Programme to finalize its proposals for a package of emergency assistance to Montserrat at the earliest possible time;

5. Calls upon the Secretary-General to monitor the situation in Montserrat with a view to assessing the ecological and development impacts of the continuing volcanic eruptions as well as to assisting in the long-term needs of Montserratians, including the needs of evacuees and their rehabilitation;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session a report on the situation referred to in paragraph 5 above and on the progress made with the relief and rehabilitation efforts.

Papua New Guinea

A severe El Nino-induced drought affected much of Papua New Guinea throughout 1997. Associated fires devastated extensive areas of dry grassland, forest, tree plantations and gardens. At times, the haze restricted aviation. The problem was compounded by a prolonged series of nightly frosts that destroyed cash crops and staple root vegetables at points above 2,200 metres.

At the request of the Government of Papua New Guinea, an UNDAC mission was dispatched in November, with the aim of developing an appeal for international assistance. On 11 December, a United Nations Appeal for International Assistance on behalf of the Government of Papua New Guinea was launched, which sought $4.2 million for food relief, water, agriculture, health and nutrition and emergency management.

Chernobyl aftermath

In an October report [A/52/537], submitted in response to General Assembly resolution 50/134 [YUN 1995, p. 146], the Secretary-General described action taken during the period 1996-1997 by the United Nations and other entities to address the consequences of the 1986 accident [YUN 1986, p. 584] at the Chernobyl (Ukraine) nuclear plant.

In May, a UN inter-agency assessment mission, composed of FAO, UNICEF, UNIDO, IAEA, WHO, UNEP, DHA and the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies, visited parts of Belarus, the Russian Federation and Ukraine to examine problems resulting directly from the accident. It focused on balancing real radiological risks against economic, social and psychological problems and on generating, together with the authorities of the concerned countries, realistic projects, that would lead to improved living conditions. The team's appraisal underscored the need for further substantial assistance in the areas of health, socio-psychological rehabilitation, environment, socio-economic questions and information policies. The members of the mission evaluated project proposals and selected several to be presented for consideration at an international conference on Chernobyl in November 1997.

In May, DHA organized, in cooperation with the Government of the Russian Federation, an international seminar on the theme "Chernobyl and beyond: humanitarian assistance to victims of technological disasters". The seminar resulted in recommendations relevant to the overall strategy of assistance on Chernobyl. It also outlined a methodology for addressing the life cycle of technological disasters, ranging from risk reduction and prevention measures and assessing the specific needs of those affected when a disaster struck, to the response itself and its effective coordination.

Regarding Chernobyl, the seminar recommended a shift in perspective towards strengthening primary health care in the affected regions and improving the prevention, detection and treatment of illnesses, regardless of whether they were directly attributable to radiation. As to economic problems, recommendations emphasized the need for self-sustaining mechanisms and outlined ways to involve the private sector in economic rehabilitation. It was also recommended that the socio-psychological rehabilitation centres should create business incubators to cultivate self-reliance and entrepreneurial skills.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December [meeting 73], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/172 [draft: A/52/L.33/Rev. 1 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 20 (f)].

Strengthening of international cooperation and coordination of efforts to study, mitigate and minimize the consequences of the Chernobyl disaster

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolutions 45/190 of 21 December 1990, 46/150 of 18 December 1991, 47/165 of 18 December 1992, 48/206 of 21 December 1993 and 50/134 of 20 December 1995, and taking note of the decisions adopted by the organs, organizations and programmes of the United Nations system in the implementation of those resolutions,

Recalling Economic and Social Council resolutions 1990/50 of 13 July 1990, 1991/51 of 26 July 1991 and 1992/38 of 30 July 1992 and Council decision 1993/232 of 22 July 1993,

Noting with appreciation the contribution made by States and by organizations of the United Nations system to the development of cooperation to mitigate and minimize the consequences of the Chernobyl disaster, and the activities of regional and other organizations, in particular the Commission of the European Communities, as well as bilateral activities and those of non-governmental organizations,

Welcoming the commitments made by Member States in the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21, to intensify cooperation, inter alia, in the prevention and reduction of major technological and other disasters with an adverse impact on the environment and in disaster relief and post-disaster rehabilitation in order to enhance the capabilities of affected countries to cope with such situations, and welcoming also commitments made in response to the appeal of the Secretary-General on the occasion of the tenth anniversary of the Chernobyl nuclear power plant accident,

Conscious of the long-term nature of the consequences of the disaster at the Chernobyl nuclear power plant, which was a major technological catastrophe in terms of its scope and created humanitarian, environmental, social, economic and health consequences and problems of common concern, requiring for their solution wide and active international cooperation and coordination of efforts in this field at the international and national levels,

Expressing profound concern about the ongoing effects on the lives and health of people, in particular children, in the affected areas of Belarus, the Russian Federation and Ukraine, as well as in other countries affected by the Chernobyl disaster,

Taking into consideration the findings and outcome of the United Nations needs-assessment mission to the affected areas of Belarus, the Russian Federation and Ukraine in May 1997, as well as the conclusions and recommendations of the United Nations-sponsored international seminar on the theme "Chernobyl and beyond: humanitarian assistance to victims of technological disasters", held in Moscow in May 1997,

Noting the readiness of Ukraine in principle to close the Chernobyl nuclear power plant by 2000, bearing in mind the need for adequate support from relevant countries and international organizations for that purpose,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General concerning the implementation of resolution 50/134,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his efforts in the implementation of the relevant General Assembly resolutions and, through existing coordination mechanisms, in particular the United Nations Coordinator of International Cooperation on Chernobyl, to continue to maintain close cooperation with the agencies of the United Nations system, as well as with regional and other relevant organizations, with a view to encouraging the regular exchange of information, co-operation and coordination of multilateral and bilateral efforts in those areas, while implementing programmes and specific projects, inter alia, in the framework of relevant agreements and arrangements;

2. Invites States, in particular donor States, relevant multilateral financial institutions and other concerned parties of the international community, including non-governmental organizations, to continue to provide support to the ongoing efforts made by Belarus, the Russian Federation and Ukraine to mitigate the consequences of the Chernobyl disaster;

3. Welcomes the decision of the heads of State and Government of the seven major industrial States and the European Union, adopted at Denver, United States of America, in June 1997, regarding assistance in securing the environmental safety of the sarcophagus covering the remains of the destroyed Chernobyl reactor and the allocation of 300 million United States dollars for a shelter implementation plan;

4. Expresses its appreciation for the contributions made to the shelter implementation plan at the International Chernobyl Shelter Pledging Conference for Governments, held in New York on 20 November 1997, and urges further contributions to the plan;

5. Welcomes the preparation by the United Nations, in cooperation with the Governments of Belarus, the Russian Federation and Ukraine, of the inter-agency programme of international assistance to areas affected by the Chernobyl disaster;

6. Welcomes also the convening by the United Nations of a special international meeting on Chernobyl, held on 25 November 1997, to generate further support for the populations of Belarus, the Russian Federation and Ukraine affected by the Chernobyl nuclear power plant disaster, and urges further contributions towards the implementation of the projects specified in the inter-agency programme;

7. Takes note with satisfaction of the establishment in Ukraine of the International Chernobyl Centre, with the active participation of Belarus and the Russian Federation, as an important step towards enhancement of the capabilities of the international community to study, mitigate and minimize the consequences of such accidents, and invites all interested parties to take part in the activities of the Centre;

8. Urges the United Nations Coordinator of International Cooperation on Chernobyl to continue his efforts aimed at strengthening international cooperation to overcome the health, social, economic and ecological consequences of the Chernobyl disaster in the most affected areas of Belarus, the Russian Federation and Ukraine, based on the inter-agency programme;

9. Calls upon the Secretary-General to continue the regular exchange of information with the countries concerned, relevant organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, with a view to enhancing world public awareness of the consequences of such disasters;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-fourth session, under a separate sub-item, a report on the implementation of the present resolution.

Chapter IV

International trade, finance and transport

International trade followed a generally upward path in 1997 after a significant slowdown in 1996, when the growth of world trade slipped abruptly, with all the regions of the world sharing in the deceleration, albeit to different degrees. The slowdown was associated with a diminishing of the initial effects of widespread trade liberalization, particularly in developing countries, as well as with a sharp deceleration of import growth in developed economies and with a weakening of commodity prices. After two years of sustained increases, many non-oil commodity prices began to decline in 1996, especially those of interest to developing countries.

The Trade and Development Report, 1997—produced by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD), the focal point within the Organization for the treatment of the interrelated issues of trade, finance, technology, investment and sustainable development—focused on the growing income gaps among and within countries. Having considered the Report, the Trade and Development Board (TDB), UNCTAD's governing body, stated that those widening income gaps, to which elements of globalization might have contributed, were a challenge for policy makers everywhere.

The Economic and Social Council devoted its high-level segment in July to fostering an enabling environment for development: financial flows, including capital flows, investment and trade. In agreed conclusions, the Council stated that the opportunities created by globalization should benefit all countries, and the risks associated with it should be managed and minimized. Having considered the Council's conclusions, the General Assembly, in December, requested UNCTAD to continue to examine the implications of investment issues for development.

In other action on financial issues, the Assembly recognized that durable solutions to the external debt and debt-servicing problems of developing countries could contribute to strengthening the global economy and to the efforts of developing countries to achieve sustained economic growth and sustainable development, and stressed the need for strengthened international cooperation to prevent currency crises, which negatively affected not only developing countries but also the international financial and monetary system. The Assembly decided to consider in 1999 the question of convening, not later than 2001, a high-level international forum on financing for development to further the global partnership for development.

The International Trade Centre (ITC) continued to assist developing countries to increase exports. During 1997, ITC had national projects in 40 countries with project delivery of $13.2 million.

In the area of consumer protection, the Assembly requested the Secretary-General to convene an interregional expert group to elaborate consumer protection guidelines that would cover sustainable consumption patterns.

In December, the Assembly approved TDB's recommendation that a diplomatic conference be convened to consider and adopt a convention on arrest of ships.

International trade

The Trade and Development Report, 1997 [Sales No. E.97.II.D.8] noted that there had been a significant slowdown in world trade in 1996. The growth in the volume of world merchandise exports reached only 4.6 per cent, against 10 per cent in the preceding two years, and there was also a weakening of commodity prices after two years of sustained increases. As output continued to grow at a more or less constant pace, the divergence between trade and output growth, which had been increasing since 1990, was greatly reduced and only a modest acceleration of growth in world trade was expected in 1997.

An important factor in the trade slowdown was a sharp deceleration of import growth in developed economies, from 11 per cent in 1994 to only 5.2 per cent in 1996. Particularly drastic was the drop in both the United States and Japan; in Western Europe, imports remained sluggish because of slower gross domestic product (GDP) growth, whereas other factors were at play in the United States and Japan. In those two countries, the income elasticity of imports (the ratio of the percentage change in import volume to that of GDP from 1995 to 1996) dropped respectively from 4 to 2.6 and from 15.6 to 1, while it increased from 2.8 to 3.1 in Western Europe. In Japan, slower import growth coincided with a depreciation of the yen, after a surge during 1991-1995. In the United States, the rise in imports of capital goods, especially computers and related equipment, slowed dramatically.

In East Asia, export growth declined significantly, falling below the growth of output for the first time in many years. A major factor was a drastic fall in the prices of certain electronic and information equipment, largely on account of market saturation. In China, a reduction in export tax rebates in late 1995 had prompted enterprises to rush their exports, including those planned for 1996. By contrast, in Latin America, especially among the members of MERCOSUR (Southern Cone Common Market), the rate of acceleration of exports achieved in 1995 was maintained or even slightly exceeded in 1996.

In value terms, the slowdown in world exports was even sharper than in volume, growing by only 4.1 per cent as compared to 19.6 per cent in 1995. The average dollar prices of globally traded goods stabilized in 1996 after having increased by 10 per cent in 1995, due partly to the appreciation of the dollar vis-a-vis the currencies of several major trading countries, particularly France, Germany, Japan and the Republic of Korea.

The picture was similar for the value of world exports of commercial services, with growth decelerating to 5 per cent in 1996 from 14 per cent in the preceding year. That deceleration (for both exports and imports) was pronounced in Western Europe and Asia, whereas North America maintained the pace of expansion of 1995. Financial and insurance services, royalties and licence fees, construction services and other business services continued to be more dynamic than transportation or travel. The slowdown in growth in the value of world trade in commercial services could be attributed to the appreciation of the dollar against a number of major currencies and to the stagnation of trade in continental Western Europe.

The World Economic and Social Survey, 1997 [Sales No. E.97.II.C.1] observed that recent and prospective international flows of trade, direct investment and finance suggested that a global dynamism was continuing to build, although 1996 trade developments were a reminder that the international environment was subject to slowdowns as well as accelerations.

The dip in world trade expansion in 1996 hit Asia and the Pacific especially hard. Japan among developed market economies and China among developing countries experienced the sharpest slowdowns in the growth rates of export volume. In Eastern and Southern Asia, where international trade had been credited as the main engine of the region's phenomenal economic expansion, the growth of exports fell below the growth of output. Latin America and the Caribbean and Africa saw their export volume slow only slightly. The transition economies of Central and Eastern Europe, however, saw the growth of their exports all but disappear.

One unusual factor in the slowdown in world trade growth in 1996—and an indication of how much the world economy had changed—was that developments in a single industry helped to explain changes in the aggregate flow of trade at the global level. The industry development in question was a temporary sharp drop in world demand for semiconductors and information-technology products. Furthermore, the rise in demand for office and telecommunications equipment slowed in 1996, after a sharp rise in 1995. Those phenomena very much affected the exports of several countries in Eastern and Southern Asia, which had become major suppliers to the world market.

While the dynamic Asian economies saw their export growth cut sharply, the slowdown in their import growth was more moderate. Liberalization measures served to stimulate import inflows, as was also the case in Latin America and the Caribbean. Other factors operated as well in the latter region, including recovery from recession in Argentina and Mexico and the regional cooperation policy embedded in MERCOSUR and other regional trading arrangements.

Western Asia's import volume bounced back after two years of decline resulting from drastic fiscal adjustment in the wake of lower oil revenues; regional import volume was estimated to have increased by almost 8 per cent, and similar growth was expected in 1997. In Africa, import volume in 1996 continued its substantial growth of the previous years, reflecting the acceleration of regional economic growth that began in 1994 and the robust growth in investment in such countries as Cote d'Ivoire, Egypt, Kenya, South Africa and Zambia. Although Africa's exports continued to be overwhelmingly shipped to developed-economy markets, exports to Eastern and Southern Asia increased strongly (from 1.5 per cent of total exports in 1990 to almost 6 per cent in 1996). That increase was largely attributable to the rapid growth of trade between South Africa and several countries in that region.

Economic and Social Council consideration. During its high-level segment (2-4 July), the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session carried out, in accordance with decision 1996/310 [YUN 1996, p. 862], a comprehensive view of the theme "Fostering an enabling environment for development: financial flows, including capital flows, investment and trade" (see also below).

In its agreed conclusions [A/52/3/Rev.1 (agreed conclusions 1997/1)], the Council stated that an open, rule-based, equitable, secure, non-discriminatory, transparent and predictable multilateral trading system was a key element in fostering an enabling environment for development and was also essential for deepening the flow of technology and information around the world. The need to promote the universality of the World Trade Organization (WTO) and to facilitate the admission of developing countries and countries with economies in transition to market economies that applied for membership was stressed. The Council noted that trade liberalization should eliminate discriminatory and protectionist practices in international trade relations in order to improve access for the exports of developing countries. With the growing internationalization of the services sector, further action should be taken to facilitate the participation of developing countries in international service liberalization. Commodity exports continued to play a key role in the economies of many developing countries and the diversification of their economies was essential for their development. All countries should commit themselves to the liberalization of trade and investment policies and should foster international cooperation towards that goal. All members of WTO should implement their commitments fully and all provisions of the Final Act of the Uruguay Round [YUN 1994, p. 1474] should be effectively applied to maximize economic growth and development benefits for all, taking into account the specific interests of developing countries. The strengthening of the supply capacity of exportable goods and services in the least developed countries (LDCs), as well as market access, was called for. The Council encouraged the UN system, including the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, WTO and the United Nations Development Programme, to provide co-ordinated support for action in that area.

In addition to the World Economic and Social Survey, 1997 (see above), the Council had before it the report of the Secretary-General on the high-level segment theme [E/1997/67] (see below).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee [A/52/626/Add.2], adopted resolution 52/182 without vote [agenda item 95 (b)].

International trade and development

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 50/95 and 50/98 of 20 December 1995 and 51/167 of 16 December 1996, as well as relevant international agreements concerning trade, economic growth, development and interrelated issues,

Emphasizing the importance of an open, rule-based, equitable, secure, non-discriminatory, transparent and predictable multilateral trading system,

Emphasizing also that a favourable and conducive international economic and financial environment and a positive investment climate are necessary for the economic growth of the world economy, including the creation of employment, in particular for the growth and development of the developing countries, and emphasizing further that each country is responsible for its own economic policies for sustainable development,

Taking note of agreed conclusions 1997/1 of the Economic and Social Council on the theme "Fostering an enabling environment for development: financial flows, including capital flows, investment and trade",

Noting that the mid-term review of the outcome of the ninth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development will be held in 1998,

Noting also that the second Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization will be held at Geneva from 18 to 20 May 1998,

I

1. Reaffirms the role of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development as the focal point within the United Nations for the integrated treatment of development and interrelated issues in the areas of trade, finance, technology, investment and sustainable development;

2. Also reaffirms its political will and responsibility with respect to implementing the agreed commitments reached at the ninth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, held at Midrand, South Africa, in particular the document entitled "A Partnership for Growth and Development", and, in this regard, welcomes the convening of a special high-level mid-term review meeting in 1998, which will contribute to the preparations for the tenth session of the Conference, to be held in Thailand in 2000;

3. Welcomes the efforts by the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to build a lasting partnership for development with non-governmental actors, including through the "Partners for Development" initiative, to be held at Lyon, France, in 1998;

4. Takes note of the reports and the agreed conclusions of the fifteenth executive session and the forty-fourth session of the Trade and Development Board, and notes the important contribution that the Trade and Development Report, 1997, the World Investment Report and the Least Developed Countries, 1997 Report make to the work of the Board;

5. Notes that the Trade and Development Board recommended that the General Assembly change the name of the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Restrictive Business Practices to the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Competition Law and Policy and convene a fourth United Nations conference on the Set of Multilaterally Agreed Equitable Principles and

Rules for the Control of Restrictive Business Practices, as well as a diplomatic conference to consider and adopt a convention on arrest of ships, endorses the aforementioned change of name of the Intergovernmental Group, and stresses that the two conferences, as agreed by the Board, should be absorbed within the budget level proposed by the Secretary-General for the biennium 1998-1999;

6. Expresses its support for the efforts of the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to implement fully the far-reaching reforms embodied in the outcome of the ninth session of the Conference;

7. Notes that the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development is making increasing use of information technology to enhance further its effectiveness, and urges the Conference to assist developing countries in fully benefiting from these new technologies;

8. Also notes the increasing importance and application of electronic commerce on international trade, and urges the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, in cooperation with other relevant bodies of the United Nations system, to assist developing countries, in particular the least developed countries, and in this regard further notes the needs of the countries with economies in transition;

9. Recognizes that the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, having a comparative advantage in tackling trade-related development issues, should continue to facilitate the integration of developing countries and countries with economies in transition into the international trading system, in a complementary manner with the World Trade Organization, and to promote development through trade and investment in cooperation and coordination with the International Trade Centre, relevant institutions of the United Nations system and other international organizations;

10. Requests the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to continue, on the basis of the outcome of its ninth session, to identify and analyse the implications for development of issues relevant to investment, taking into account the interests of developing countries and bearing in mind the work undertaken by other organizations;

11. Invites the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to continue, inter alia, to follow developments in the international trading system, in particular their implications for developing countries, to identify new opportunities arising from the implementation of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations agreements, and to assist developing countries to participate effectively in multilateral trade negotiations;

II

12. Welcomes the outcome of the first Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization, held at Singapore from 9 to 13 December 1996, and its adoption of the Plan of Action for the Least Developed Countries;

13. Also welcomes the announcements by some developed and developing countries, at the High-level Meeting on Integrated Initiatives for Least Developed Countries' Trade Development, of new or additional measures on market access for the least developed countries, and recommends that a full report on the outcome of and follow-up to the Meeting be submitted to the Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization in May 1998;

14. Recognizes the importance of open regional economic integration in the creation of new opportunities for expanding trade and investment, and stresses the importance of those initiatives being in conformity with World Trade Organization rules, where applicable;

15. Stresses that, in the context of globalization and liberalization, there is need for the full integration of developing countries, in particular the least developed countries, and of countries with economies in transition, into the world economy, through, inter alia, improved market access for their exports, in accordance with the multilateral trade agreements;

16. Also stresses in this context the need for various measures to be taken by the international community, including increased trade-related technical assistance and human and institutional capacity-building for strengthening the supply capacity of exportable goods and services of developing countries, in particular the least developed countries, with a view to their full integration into the world economy;

17. Welcomes, in this regard, the recognition that the movement in the direction of greater openness for developing economies should be an orderly process backed by effective policies at the international and national levels and that those policies should entail a phased approach to integration, taking into account the circumstances of individual countries;

18. Reiterates the importance of trade liberalization in developed and developing countries and the need to continue liberalization, particularly in areas of interest to developing countries, through, inter alia, a substantial reduction of tariff and other barriers, and also reiterates the need for the elimination of discriminatory and protectionist practices in international trade relations, which will have the effect of improving access for the exports of developing countries, enhancing the competitiveness of their domestic industries and facilitating structural adjustment among developed economies;

19. Stresses that all members of the World Trade Organization should implement their commitments in respect of the Uruguay Round agreements in a full, timely, faithful and continuous manner and that all provisions of the Final Act Embodying the Results of the Uruguay Round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations should be applied effectively, taking into account the specific interests of developing countries, so as to maximize economic growth and the developmental benefits for all and, in this respect, reiterates the need for the full implementation of special and preferential treatment for developing countries in accordance with the Uruguay Round agreements;

20. Emphasizes the importance of the strengthening of, and the attainment of greater universality by, the international trading system and of accelerating the process directed towards accession to the World Trade Organization of developing countries and countries with economies in transition, and emphasizes the necessity for Governments members of the World Trade Organization and relevant international organizations to assist non-members of the World Trade Organization so as to facilitate their efforts, with respect to accession, in an expeditious and transparent manner on the basis of World Trade Organization rights and obligations, and for the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to provide technical assistance, within its mandate, thereby contributing to their rapid and full integration into the multilateral trading system;

21. Also emphasizes that the dispute settlement mechanism of the World Trade Organization is a key element with regard to the integrity and credibility of the multilateral trading system and the full realization of the benefits anticipated from the conclusion of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations;

22. Deplores any attempt to bypass or undermine multilaterally agreed procedures on the conduct of international trade by resorting to unilateral actions over and above those agreed in the Uruguay Round, and affirms that environmental and social concerns should not be used for protectionist purposes;

III

23. Emphasizes the need for a balanced and integrated approach to issues of environment, trade and development, and recognizes that the objective of Governments should be to ensure that trade and environmental policies are mutually supportive so as to achieve sustainable development and that, in doing so, their environmental policies and measures with a potential trade impact are not used for protectionist purposes;

24. Encourages the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to continue its work on trade, environment and development, in particular its special role in promoting the integration of trade, environment and development, by examining trade and environmental issues from a development perspective in co-operation with relevant bodies and international organizations, including the Commission on Sustainable Development, the United Nations Environment Programme and the World Trade Organization, as task manager for the Commission on Sustainable Development;

IV

25. Reaffirms the need to give priority to the problems facing the least developed countries, and reaffirms in particular that actions should be taken, as appropriate, to assist the least developed countries to maximize the potential opportunities and minimize the possible difficulties arising from the Uruguay Round agreements;

26. Urges Governments and concerned international organizations to implement fully and expeditiously the Ministerial Decision on Measures in Favour of the Least Developed Countries and to apply effectively the Ministerial Decision on Measures Concerning the Possible Negative Effects of the Reform Programme on Least Developed and Net Food-importing Developing Countries, as well as the recommendations adopted at the High-level Intergovernmental Meeting on the Mid-term Global Review of the Implementation of the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s and at the ninth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, as they relate to trade and trade-related issues of concern to the least developed countries;

27. Requests Governments, organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to take concrete measures to implement fully and as a matter of urgency the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, including the measures and recommendations agreed upon at its mid-term review, especially those related to trade and development;

28. Welcomes the adoption of an integrated framework for trade-related technical assistance at the High-level Meeting on Integrated Initiatives for Least Developed Countries' Trade Development, convened by the World Trade Organization at Geneva on 27 and 28 October 1997, and invites the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to enhance further the effectiveness and efficiency of its trade-related technical assistance activities for the least developed countries in collaboration with the World Trade Organization, the International Trade Centre, the United Nations Development Programme, the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund;

29. Invites the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the World Bank and the United Nations Development Programme to improve collaboration between the country-level programmes of the Conference for the least developed countries and the overall macroeconomic and sectoral policy dialogue in respect of those countries at the World Bank Consultative Group and United Nations Development Programme round-table meetings, bearing in mind General Assembly resolution 50/120 of 20 December 1995;

30. Stresses the need to give special attention, within the context of international cooperation on trade and development issues, to the implementation of the many international development commitments geared to meeting the special development needs and problems of small island developing States and of landlocked developing States, and to recognize that developing countries that provide transit services need adequate support in maintaining and improving their transit infrastructure;

31. Invites preference-giving countries to continue to improve and renew their Generalized System of Preferences schemes in keeping with the post-Uruguay Round trading system and with the objective of integrating developing countries, especially the least developed countries, into the international trading system, and stresses that ways and means should be found to ensure more effective utilization of those schemes, particularly by the least developed countries;

32. Notes the concern among the beneficiaries that the enlargement of the scope of the Generalized System of Preferences, by linking eligibility to non-trade considerations, may detract value from its original principles, namely, non-discrimination, universality, burden sharing and non-reciprocity;

33. Stresses the need for increased and more effective participation by developing countries in rule-making and standard-setting activities in the context of the international trading system;

34. Welcomes the successful outcome of the South-South Conference on Trade, Investment and Finance, held at San Jose, Costa Rica, from 13 to 15 January 1997, and stresses the need by all concerned to ensure, with the support of the international community, effective follow-up to its Declaration and Plan of Action which recognized, inter alia, the importance of international trade as an unprecedented engine of growth for developing countries, the opportunities and challenges of globalization and liberalization, the need for the complete integration of the developing countries into the world economy and the international trading system, and the need to address the continued marginalization of the least developed countries in the world economy;

35. Requests the Secretary-General, in collaboration with the secretariat of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session on recommendations for effective follow-up to the relevant sections of agreed conclusions 1997/1 of the Economic and Social Council;

36. Also requests the Secretary-General, in collaboration with the secretariat of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, to report orally to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session on the implementation of the present resolution, including developments in the multilateral trading system.

Trade policy

Trade in goods and services, and commodities

The Commission on Trade in Goods and Services, and Commodities held the second part of its first session in Geneva from 19 to 21 February [TD/B/44/5], the first part of the session having been held in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 853]. The Commission had before it a report [TD/B/COM.1/3 & Corr.1] by the UNCTAD secretariat on integrating trade, environment and development: recent progress and outstanding issues. The report outlined the debate on competitiveness, market access, trade liberalization and the environment, eco-labelling and multilateral environmental agreements. It highlighted progress made as well as some unresolved issues and discussed trade liberalization and market access; process and production methods in the trade and environment interface; environment for development; positive measures and multilateral agreements; trade, investment and environment; and small and medium-sized enterprises.

In agreed conclusions, the Commission reaffirmed the importance of pursuing the work that the Commission on Sustainable Development in 1996 had proposed for UNCTAD [YUN 1996, p. 855] and encouraged UNCTAD to continue its technical assistance programme to promote a better understanding of the linkages between trade, environment and development. It decided to convene two expert meetings, one to examine positive measures in the context of promoting sustainable development and the other to examine the operation, and the possible trade and investment impacts, of environmental management standards on developing countries. The Commission noted that the UNCTAD and WTO secretariats were jointly conducting a study on "Tariff peaks and escalation in the post-Uruguay Round context" and decided that the study should be made available to its second session in November. It also noted the interest expressed for future expert work in the following areas: examination of the relationships and interlinkages between the tourism sector, the environment and development in developing countries; analysis of the role of foreign direct investment in promoting access to and transfer of environmentally sound technologies to developing countries; and innovative instruments to improve the export possibilities for commodities produced in a sustainable way.

The Commission held its second session in Geneva from 17 to 21 November [TD/B/45/2]. For its consideration of diversification in commodity-dependent countries, it had before it a report by the UNCTAD secretariat on the role of Governments, enterprises and institutions [TD/B/COM.1/12.1] that analysed global trends and the relevant agents and actors in the diversification process, highlighting the role of government and enterprise sector strategies in diversification. The Commission also considered the report of the Expert Meeting on Vertical Diversification in the Food Processing Sector in Developing Countries (Geneva, 1-3 September) [TD/B/COM.1/8].

In agreed conclusions addressed to the international community, the Commission stated that further trade liberalization, improved market access and the avoidance of unilateral action would provide important support for the diversification efforts of commodity-dependent developing countries. Reductions of tariff peaks and tariff escalation facing those countries' exports would be important in that regard. International financial and technical support to commodity-dependent countries in their diversification efforts needed to be reinforced, and the Common Fund for Commodities should expedite its exploration of ways to utilize the resources of its First Account.

In conclusions addressed to Governments, the Commission stated that commodity-dependent developing countries should consider the advantages of regional arrangements and regional and South-South trade as a means of diversification and as a stepping stone to global trade. Improvement of supply capacities was crucial to effective diversification, as was the development of processing, marketing and distribution. The clustering of enterprises and free trade zones could help in promoting diversification by increasing forward and backward linkages and lowering transaction costs; Governments should identify ways to promote the participation of small and medium-sized enterprises and small farms therein, such as export credits and trade finance.

The Commission addressed the following conclusions to UNCTAD: since joint ventures could provide a positive impetus to diversification, the UNCTAD secretariat should analyse the effects on diversification of joint ventures, mergers, franchises and similar arrangements in sectors where developing countries might have comparative advantage; it should study the extent of the relevance of Uruguay Round provisions in ensuring that developing countries could take advantage of opportunities created in regional trading arrangements; it should promote a better understanding of the implications of the Agreement on Subsidies and Countervailing Measures; in collaboration with the International Trade Centre (ITC), it should undertake studies on the positioning of enterprises of commodity-dependent countries in sourcing networks and the identification of market opportunities; it should provide technical assistance, including training, institutional capacity-building and access to information in the context of regional and global trade; and, in the area of technical cooperation, it should provide support for commodity diversification efforts in developing countries.

For its consideration of ways to improve opportunities to expand exports of goods and services from developing countries, the Commission had before it a report by the UNCTAD secretariat [TD/B/COM.1/13], which analysed dynamic markets and export sectors and trade in goods and services, and suggested possible future initiatives. It also considered the report of the Expert Meeting on Strengthening the Capacity and Expanding Exports of Developing Countries in the Services Sector: Health Services (Geneva, 16-18 June) [TD/B/COM.1/7].

In agreed conclusions, the Commission stressed that developing countries, particularly LDCs, required assistance in developing efficient supply and export capabilities and that special treatment for them could facilitate their integration into the multilateral trading system. Non-tariff measures not covered by multilateral trade agreements should continue to be identified and future negotiations in agriculture should take into account the interest of developing countries, particularly LDCs and net food-importing developing countries. Attention should be paid to completing the negotiations on emergency safeguards in services; electronic commerce should provide important opportunities to developing countries in expanding their exports of both goods and services; and the effective participation of developing countries in international standard-setting bodies should be encouraged. The Commission stated that Governments should strive to ensure sustainable development through a stable macroeconomic and institutional environment; they should foster access to information infrastructure and avoid barriers to electronic commerce. Preference-receiving countries should make efforts to increase the use of generalized system of preferences schemes, and the most economically advanced developing countries should consider providing trade preferences to LDCs. Developing countries should make efforts to develop exports in services sectors where they had competitive advantages. UNCTAD should organize training seminars to assist developing countries and countries in transition to build their capacity to assess their national interests in preparation for trade negotiations, the Commission said. It should study issues arising from electronic commerce and help developing countries to take full advantage of its benefits and assist them in promoting economic cooperation and integration among themselves. It should also study the effects on the trade and development efforts of developing countries of the tourism sector and undertake a study of the export potential of developing countries in the business services sector.

Interdependence and global economic issues

The Trade and Development Board (TDB), at its forty-fourth session (Geneva, 13-22 October) [A/52/15], considered interdependence and global economic issues from a trade and development perspective and adopted agreed conclusions on income distribution and growth in a global context [agreed conclusions 440(XLIV)] (see below, under "Income distribution and growth").

On 18 December (decision 1997/319), the Economic and Social Council decided that the high-level segment of its 1998 substantive session would be devoted to the theme "Market access: developments since the Uruguay Round, implications, opportunities and challenges, in particular for the developing countries and the least developed among them, in the context of globalization and liberalization".

Trade and environment

In response to General Assembly resolution 50/95 [YUN 1995, p. 950], the Secretary-General, in February [A/S-19/4-E/1997/13] transmitted to the Assembly's nineteenth special session and to the Economic and Social Council an UNCTAD secretariat report on trade and environment: concrete progress achieved and some outstanding issues. The report examined progress on the issue of trade and environment since the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) [YUN 1992, p. 670], noting that the post-UNCED debate had had a number of positive results, but that there was a perception that mutual understanding between the trade, environment and development communities was still evolving and that a larger consensus needed to be built. The debate also suggested that consumer preferences for "environment-friendly" products could provide trading opportunities for developing countries and facilitate the internalization of environmental costs and benefits by producers. The report described progress made in meeting the objectives of the programme areas of UNCED's Agenda 21 [YUN 1992, p. 672], which dealt with promoting sustainable development through trade and making trade and environment mutually supportive. It considered the results of WTO deliberations on trade and environment, as well as decisions on trade, environment and sustainable development adopted by the Commission on Sustainable Development at its second [YUN 1994, p. 765], third [YUN 1995, p. 837] and fourth [YUN 1996, p. 735] sessions. Outstanding and emerging issues addressed in the report were: access to and diffusion of environmentally sound technologies and products; trade, investment and environment; small and medium-sized enterprises; reflection of environmental costs and resource scarcities in commodity prices; and internalization of positive externalities.

The UNCTAD secretariat concluded that intensive intergovernmental deliberations had promoted increased awareness and understanding of trade and environment linkages, as well as greater confidence and mutual respect between trade, environment and developmental communities, and had reiterated a commitment to address trade and environment on the basis of multilateralism and cooperative approaches. Governments had taken steps to include Agenda 21 follow-up activities, particularly in the area of trade and environment, in the work programmes of WTO, UNCTAD and other relevant international organizations. Trade and environment linkages, however, had proved to be far more complex than originally envisaged and the debate had revealed the absence of a unique trade, environment and development agenda; it might therefore be necessary to examine the direction of that agenda and possible approaches to issues. The report presented recommendations on promoting sustainable development through trade, on making trade and environment mutually supportive and on outstanding and emerging issues.

By decision 1997/308 of 25 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of the report.

Special session of General Assembly. In June, the General Assembly held its nineteenth special session at which it adopted the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21 (resolution S/19-2) (see PART THREE, Chapter I). In a section on making trade and environment mutually supportive, the Programme stated that there should be a balanced and integrated approach to trade and sustainable development, based on a combination of trade liberalization, economic development and environmental protection. Trade obstacles should be removed with a view to contributing to the more efficient use of the Earth's natural resources in both economic and environmental terms.

Trade promotion and facilitation

In 1997, United Nations bodies continued to assist developing countries to promote their exports and to facilitate the movement of their goods in international commerce. The International Trade Centre was the main originator of technical cooperation projects in that area.

The TDB Commission on Enterprise, Business Facilitation and Development held two sessions during the year.

International Trade Centre

During 1997, the International Trade Centre (ITC), under the joint sponsorship of UNCTAD and WTO, undertook a major effort to increase its effectiveness and to get more mileage out of existing resources by sharpening its strategies, developing cost-effective tools and methodologies for customization on a country basis by national experts, and improving its management systems.

Major substantive accomplishments in 1997 [ITC/AG(XXXI)/167] included forward-looking new strategies for product and market development (PMD) and the promotion of trade in services; substantial progress in the development and testing of diagnostic tools and learning systems for small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs); and new partnerships with national business organizations and international groups such as the World Economic Forum and the International Organization of Employers. ITC had national projects in 40 countries during the year, in addition to regional and subregional projects that reached a much larger number of countries. Its project delivery amounted to $13.2 million, 4.4 per cent more than in 1996, of which some 37 per cent went to LDCs.

A major ITC activity in the PMD subprogramme was the formulation of a new strategy. ITC reassessed its PMD work, undertook research in new areas and examined ways in which other technical assistance providers worked in PMD. The annual review of export performance and international demand for all developing countries and economies in transition was refined and studies were carried out on the identification of untapped potential for trade expansion and diversification in the post-Uruguay Round context. ITC also carried out multifaceted work for the promotion of commodity exports from developing countries; Contributed to the follow-up to the Uruguay Round; continued its programmes on the enhancement of market transparency and product networking and applied market research and development of tools in new areas; and implemented technical cooperation projects in PMD at the country and regional levels.

In trade support services, ITC concentrated on developing a strategic approach to trade promotion; providing information and advice to SMEs; export quality management; export packaging; legal aspects of foreign trade; trade information; and improving market transparency.

With regard to the human resource development (HRD) subprogramme, 1997 marked the first full year of implementation of ITC's new strategy for its HRD core service. The strategy called for ITC to focus its HRD resources on the development and introduction into field activities of four innovative technical assistance products: the Global Competitiveness Curriculum; the Trade Tutor Team-Building Programme; the Training Materials Development and Exchange Centre; and the Executive Forum on National Export Expansion Strategies.

With regard to international purchasing and supply management (IPSM), ITC's long-term objective was to help its partner countries manage their purchasing and supply operations for imported goods and services as cost effectively as possible. To that end, ITC concentrated on developing generic tools and related services to build national capacities for training, consultancy support and information to the IPSM community in the private and public sectors. ITC relaunched its public-sector procurement programme on the basis of a new strategic approach and with strengthened working relationships with WTO, the World Bank and other key institutions.

There were three salient developments in ITC's assistance at the regional and country levels in 1997: increased focus on the trade-related needs of LDCs and substantial work to address them; the application and adaptation at the country level of ITC's technical assistance tools and methodologies; and the search for effective approaches to reach rural populations and integrate them into the global economy. The expansion of ITC activities in European economies in transition was notable, as was the development of major multi-country programmes to be implemented in Africa in 1998. ITC received 31 requests for comprehensive needs assessment in 1997 and completed 25 project formulation missions.

JAG action. The ITC Joint Advisory Group (JAG) held its thirtieth session in Geneva from 21 to 25 April [ITC/AG(XXX)/164]. JAG had before it reports on: ITC activities in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 857]; an evaluation of the HRD subprogramme [ITC/AG(XXX)/158]; the ITC technical meeting 1996 [ITC/AG(XXX)/159]; ITC's HRD core service [ITC/AG(XXX)/161]; and the ITC Global Trust Fund's Consultative Committee [ITC/AG(XXX)/162].

JAG reaffirmed the importance of ITC's mandate and expressed appreciation for its valuable, practical, down-to-earth and highly operational work. It noted that it was important for ITC to continue prioritizing its activities in relation to available resources and to concentrate on activities aimed at creating business opportunities for developing countries and economies in transition, staying away from the policy debate. Capacity-building and human resource development for trade promotion were to remain ITC's primary concerns, with particular reference to LDCs. The Group expressed deep concern over the continuing decline of extrabudgetary resources for programmes and projects, and stressed the importance of increasing the share of national and regional projects in ITC's technical cooperation programme.

Pledges of Trust Fund contributions to ITC were announced by Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, Norway, Spain, Sweden and Switzerland.

ITC administrative arrangements

In the context of a 1995 agreement between the UN Secretary-General and the WTO Director-General [YUN 1995, p. 959] with regard to the status of ITC as a joint body, the Secretary-General presented a December 1997 report [A/C.5/52/25] on administrative arrangements for ITC.

The report provided a historical overview of the Centre and proposed the following arrangements governing the preparation, review and approval of the ITC budget: the ITC budget format and the process of its review and approval by the General Assembly should be adapted within the framework of the Financial Regulations and Rules of the United Nations, the Regulations and Rules Governing Programme Planning, the Programme Aspects of the Budget, the Monitoring of Implementation and the Methods of Evaluation, and relevant Assembly resolutions on the budgetary process; the ITC programme of work would continue to be based on the UN medium-term plan for the period 1998-2001 and on the WTO programme of technical cooperation (included in the plan for 1997-1999); the UN Secretariat would continue to provide technical and administrative support to ITC in implementing its budget, on a reimbursable basis; and the accounts would be audited by the UN External Auditors and their findings would be reported to the Assembly and the WTO General Council.

In resolution 52/221 A of 22 December, the Assembly approved an appropriation of $19.8 million for ITC for the 1998-1999 biennium.

Enterprise, business facilitation and development

The Commission on Enterprise, Business Facilitation and Development, established by TDB in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 852] on the recommendation of UNCTAD IX, held its first session in Geneva from 20 to 24 January [TD/B/44/2]. It had before it an UNCTAD secretariat report on the changing nature of enterprises and competition and the implications for the formulation of an enterprise development strategy [TD/B/COM.3/2]. The report discussed major developments and policy issues concerning the changing nature of enterprises and of international competition; national determinants of enterprise development and competitiveness in developing countries, with particular reference to LDCs, as well as in economies in transition; and key issues relating to an enterprise development strategy, including an identification of areas for further work in respect of each issue, as well as the policy implications. It analysed the new dynamics of enterprise development and competition, stressing the importance of technological capability-building and innovation in sustaining competitiveness, and emphasizing the diversity among firms and national systems.

In agreed conclusions, the Commission recognized the importance for developing countries, in particular LDCs, and economies in transition, to develop enterprise development strategies; it also recognized that further analytical work and policy research within UNCTAD would be necessary in particular areas, and took note of the proposals made in that regard. The Commission decided to convene an expert meeting on the respective roles of government and the private sector, including non-governmental organizations (NGOs), and the interactions between them in creating a coherent policy framework and setting up effective support measures and structures for the development of SMEs and micro-enterprises, in particular those in LDCs. It asked the secretariat to begin analytical work and policy research on ways to promote and facilitate effective inter-firm cooperation; the secretariat was also asked to develop its technical cooperation activities in the area of enterprise development and to provide a background note on information available on research bodies and other support institutions working in that area that might be constituted into a database.

Also before the Commission was an UNCTAD secretariat report on services infrastructure for development and trade efficiency assessment [TD/B/COM.3/3 & Add.1], which attempted to provide the proper conceptual, policy and practical bases for UNCTAD work on the subject.

In agreed conclusions, the Commission noted that, in a globalizing and liberalizing economy, the competitiveness of traders, particularly of SMEs, increasingly relied on access to information and information technologies and on the availability of simplified, compatible procedures and practices. In that regard, the Commission recognized the importance of continuing the work called for by "A Partnership for Growth and Development" [YUN 1996, p. 845] in the area of services infrastructure for development and trade efficiency. It took note of the expansion of the Trade Point programme and the interest of member countries in participating and requested the secretariat to solicit contributions for that purpose, evaluate the programme, and produce an information note on the basis of a cost-benefit analysis of practical ways to ensure the legal protection of the Trade Point and Global Trade Point Network names and logos.

The second session of the Commission was held in Geneva from 1 to 5 December [TD/B/45/3]. It had before it an UNCTAD secretariat report [TD/B/COM.3/9] on progress towards strategies for enterprise development. The first part of the four-part report described the outcome of the Expert Meeting on Government and Private Sector Roles and Interactions in SME Development (Geneva, 23-25 July) [TD/B/COM.3/6]; the Commission was asked to react to its findings and recommendations. The second part presented a progress report of activities in inter-firm cooperation, so that the Commission could decide on future work. The third part dealt with information on research bodies and other support agencies working in the area of enterprise development, which might be constituted into a database to facilitate both better research and project design. The last part contained information on cooperation between UNCTAD and other UN agencies and international organizations in the area of enterprise development.

In agreed conclusions, the Commission reaffirmed the importance of promoting and strengthening the enterprise sector, in particular micro, small and medium-sized enterprises (MSMEs), and agreed on a number of recommendations addressed to the international community, to Governments and to UNCTAD. It stated that, in order to ensure policy coherence at the international level and to promote trade and technology transfer, the international community should encourage cooperation between firms in developed countries and those in developing countries and economies in transition. International financial institutions should develop and support specific programmes and initiatives to build and maintain private sector lending capacity to MSMEs, and the international community should work to support national regulatory environments that fostered and encouraged MSME growth. Governments should consider measures to strengthen MSME participation in the public-private sector dialogue; they should cooperate closely with the private sector, including representative bodies, and consider ways to improve policy coherence between macro, micro and trade policies. The Commission recognized the importance of close cooperation between UNCTAD and other UN bodies and international organizations in the implementation of its work on enterprise development.

The Commission also had before it an UNCTAD secretariat report [TD/B/COM.3/10] on the activities it had initiated to contribute to the development of infrastructure services specifically designed to assist the informal sector and to promote the development of micro-enterprises. The report also addressed trade efficiency issues, such as the trade efficiency strategy, legal dimensions of the Trade Point programme and inter-institutional cooperation in trade efficiency. An addendum [TD/B/COM.3/10/Add.1] contained a proposal for a trade efficiency assessment methodology. The Commission also considered the reports of two expert meetings, one on the use of information technologies to make transit arrangements more effective (Geneva 5-7 May) [TD/B/COM.3/5] and the other on telecommunications, business facilitation and trade efficiency (Geneva, 8-10 September) [TD/B/COM.3/7].

In agreed conclusions, the Commission acknowledged the important impact of microfinance in poverty alleviation and stated that Governments and other organizations should work with UNCTAD to create an enabling environment for microfinance institutions (MFIs). It noted the important facilitating role played by UNCTAD in bringing together international assets managers, banks, MFIs and Governments and encouraged it to continue to promote private sector involvement and facilitate exchanges of experience between practitioners and between Governments, including among developing countries. In its conclusions on trade efficiency, the Commission encouraged the international community to provide financial support for effective transit arrangements, in particular the technical cooperation aspects. It noted that UNCTAD should consider the importance of using information technologies to enhance the efficiency and effectiveness of transit arrangements. The Commission stressed the specific needs of developing countries, especially LDCs, regarding access to international networks in general and to electronic commerce in particular and requested UNCTAD to undertake analytical work on trade efficiency and prepare reports on several topics. With regard to the trade efficiency strategy, the Commission stated that Governments should take measures to protect the names and logos used by the Trade Point programme at the national level. It decided to convene an expert meeting on capacity-building in electronic commerce: human resource development.

Commodities

The Trade and Development Report, 1997 [Sales No. E.97.II.D.8] stated that, after two consecutive years of substantial increases, non-oil primary commodity prices started to decline in 1996 and for the year as a whole were over 4 per cent lower than in 1995. That decline affected all major commodity groups except temperate foodstuffs. Slow growth in industrial countries, as well as oversupply and turmoil in metals markets, contributed to the downward pressure on prices during the year. After a more or less stable first quarter of 1996, prices started to weaken steadily for major non-oil commodity groups of export interest to developing countries. On an annual basis, prices of tropical beverages fell by over 15 per cent and those of minerals and agricultural raw materials by more than 12 per cent.

Expectations of a large coffee crop in Brazil weakened prices in spite of a tight supply situation; coffee prices declined on average by some 26 per cent in 1996, but on the whole prices proved less volatile than expected thanks to low stocks, especially in consuming countries, and also to the export ceiling adopted by the Association of Coffee Producing Countries. There was a sharp recovery in the early months of 1997 because first estimates of the Brazilian crop were well below the previous year's output and also because of labour unrest in Colombia. Prices of other tropical beverages held up much better in 1996. Cocoa prices remained firm and tea prices recovered from the declines recorded in 1995.

Banana prices were on average 7.5 per cent higher than in 1995, while sugar prices fell by 10 per cent. Despite a drop in the latter part of 1996, wheat averaged a 13.7 per cent increase and maize rose by 25 per cent. The rice market seemed to be more or less well balanced, with price fluctuations much weaker than for other commodities.

Among agricultural raw materials, rubber and cotton prices weakened considerably in 1996, as did those of minerals. Copper prices were particularly volatile, on average almost 22 per cent lower, and aluminium prices also fared badly and lost much of the gains recorded in 1995.

The major exception to that bleak picture was petroleum, the prices of which rose steadily throughout the year; by December, they were almost $6 per barrel higher than 12 months earlier. While low stocks and a long cold winter contributed to the buoyancy of oil markets, the steady rise in oil prices also reflected continued production restraint by members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries and shortfalls in supply from other exporters due to technical problems. The much-delayed resumption of oil exports from Iraq (under Security Council resolution 986(1995) [YUN 1995, p. 475]) also led to speculative purchases and higher prices.

Common Fund for Commodities

The 1980 Agreement Establishing the Common Fund for Commodities [YUN 1980, p. 621], a mechanism intended to stabilize the commodities market by helping to finance buffer stocks of specific commodities, as well as commodity development activities such as research and marketing, entered into force in 1989 and the Fund became operational later that year.

As at 31 December 1997, the number of parties to it remained at 105 States and the European Community (EC) (European Union).

Individual commodities

Natural rubber. In accordance with the terms of the International Natural Rubber Agreement, 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 964], a meeting was held (Geneva, 6 February) [TD/RUBBER.3/19] of the Governments and the organization that were parties to the Agreement or had given notification of provisional application to decide whether to put the Agreement into force provisionally or definitively among themselves in whole or in part.

The Governments and the intergovernmental organization represented at the meeting decided to put the Agreement into force provisionally among themselves in whole as of 6 February 1997 up to a period of 12 months [TD/RUBBER.3/18].

As at 31 December 1997, 14 States had become parties to the Agreement and 10 States and EC had undertaken provisional application.

Consumer protection

In accordance with Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/53 [YUN 1995, p. 966], the Secretary-General submitted a May 1997 report on consumer protection [E/1997/61]. The report reviewed the progress achieved between 1995 and 1996, at the national, regional and international levels, in implementing the guidelines for consumer protection, adopted by the General Assembly in resolution 39/248 [YUN 1985, p. 571]. It described steps taken by Governments, the UN system and other intergovernmental organizations to implement the guidelines and reviewed the activities undertaken by civil society, particularly NGOs, concerned with consumer protection.

The report concluded that considerable progress had been made in implementing the guidelines. There had been a surge in consumer awareness, especially in terms of the sustainability of consumption patterns and the need to protect the interests of consumers in a globalized world economy. However, much remained to be done and there was a need to strengthen collaboration between the UN system, civil society, donors and Governments for the cost-effective use of limited resources in further work. The report contained a number of recommendations for the Council's consideration. It also suggested that an interregional expert group be convened to elaborate guidelines on sustainable consumption patterns, for submission to the Council in 1998, through the Commission for Sustainable Development.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 July [meeting 39], the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1997/53 [draft: E/1997/L.39, orally revised] without vote [agenda item 7 (a) & (b)].

Consumer protection

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 39/248 of 9 April 1985, by which the Assembly adopted guidelines for consumer protection,

Recalling also its resolutions 1988/61 of 27 July 1988 and 1990/85 of 27 July 1990, as well as resolution 48/7 of 23 April 1992 of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, in which Governments were urged to implement the guidelines for consumer protection and the Secretary-General was requested to provide assistance to Governments to that end,

Recalling in particular its resolution 1995/53 of 28 July 1995, in which it requested the Secretary-General, inter alia, to elaborate guidelines in the area of sustainable consumption patterns and to examine the possible extension of those guidelines into other areas,

Noting that the Commission on Sustainable Development, at its third session, recommended that the guidelines for consumer protection be expanded to include guidelines for sustainable consumption patterns,

Taking note of Commission on Sustainable Development decision 4/13 of 3 May 1996, in which it requested Consumers International to assist the United Nations and its Member Governments in the early revision of the guidelines for consumer protection to include aspects of more sustainable consumption and production patterns,

Aware that the need for assistance in the area of consumer protection, in particular in developing countries and countries with economies in transition, remains great,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the report of the Secretary-General on consumer protection, prepared pursuant to Council resolution 1995/53, containing information on the progress achieved within the United Nations system in promoting the implementation of the guidelines for consumer protection, as well as on regional and international cooperation in promoting consumer protection;

2. Recognizes the impact the guidelines have had in many countries in promoting just, equitable and sustainable economic and social development through their implementation by Governments;

3. Also recognizes the important role of civil society, in particular non-governmental organizations, in promoting the implementation of the guidelines;

4. Welcomes the recent initiatives of the United Nations in partnership with international consumer organizations, such as Consumers International, donors and host Governments, in convening regional conferences on consumer protection, such as those held in Africa and in the Asia and Pacific region, for fostering the implementation of the guidelines and initiating the process of revising the guidelines and extending them into the area of sustainable consumption patterns and other possible areas;

5. Urges Member States, other entities of the United Nations system and relevant intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to continue their efforts to implement effectively the guidelines for consumer protection and to continue work on the elaboration of guidelines to cover sustainable consumption patterns and other areas;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to undertake this work through the convening of an interregional expert group meeting, to be financed from extrabudgetary resources and in collaboration with interested Governments, Consumers International and other concerned entities active in this field, taking into account the recommendations emanating from the recently held regional conferences on consumer protection to include aspects of more sustainable consumption patterns;

7. Recommends that the interregional expert group meeting elaborate specific recommendations for guidelines for sustainable consumption patterns for submission to the Council at its substantive session of 1998 through the Commission on Sustainable Development at its sixth session;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to examine the extension of the guidelines into other areas;

9. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council at its substantive session of 1998 on the implementation of the present resolution.

Finance

Financial policy

During 1996, there was a continuation of the previous year's expansion of most major categories of external financing from international financial markets, the Trade and Development Report, 1997 [Sales No. E.97.II.D.8] stated. A similar expansion also characterized cross-border transactions in domestically issued securities of several countries. An especially large increase was recorded by issues of external bonds, but that could have been linked to some extent to the reduced recourse by borrowers to syndicated credits. The shares of developing countries and transition economies in most categories of financing remained fairly small, although they had risen substantially since the early 1990s for issues of both external bonds and international equities. Moreover, the economies of several such countries increasingly experienced effects of global financial integration.

During the first three quarters of 1996, there was continued growth, for the third consecutive year, in the total external claims on developing countries other than offshore centres of banks in the reporting area of the Bank for International Settlements (BIS). In the case of export credits, overall increases in net flows to developing countries and transition economies in 1995 and the first half of 1996 were accompanied by contractions for Africa and Latin America, and in 1995 for Eastern Europe. As in other recent years, financing from the international capital markets was heavily concentrated on a limited number of developing countries, although 1996 and early 1997 were also notable for first-time or renewed access to the market for internationally issued debt instruments for several countries. For example, eight developing countries or territories of East and South-East Asia accounted for almost two thirds of the exchange-rate-adjusted increase during 1996 in external claims on developing countries (other than offshore centres) of banks in the BIS-reporting area. The same eight countries, except Taiwan Province of China, accounted for 40 per cent of net international debt issues by developing countries and economies in transition, while five Latin American countries were recipients of more than 50 per cent of net flows in that form.

In 1996 and early 1997, significant shifts in capital flows to emerging financial markets and in recipient countries' policies towards such flows were witnessed. With the exception of the period following the crisis of Mexico's external payments in 1995, policies in the recipient countries during the 1990s were directed more to overcoming problems caused by large capital inflows than to the traditional preoccupation of earlier years, namely the attraction of inflows adequate to cover deficits on current account, while ensuring that investment in certain activities or sectors was reserved partly or wholly for residents. The inflows were largely the effect of changes in the portfolios of institutional investors associated with the process of integrating selected developing countries and transition economies into the global network of financial markets. Once that integration became well established, all the financial markets involved could expect to experience the effects of changing perceptions among international investors in both favourable and unfavourable directions.

The World Economic and Social Survey, 1997 [Sales No. E.97.II.C.1] stated that one economic objective of Governments worldwide during the 1990s was to reduce fiscal deficits. That was motivated in part by the recognition that deficits in many cases already were, or were becoming, unsustainably large, with deleterious effects on economic performance. However, the period was also typified by a more general desire to reduce the economic and social role of government. Anti-inflationary policies were often a central part of the policy package. They had succeeded in reducing the rate of price increases to historic lows in many cases. Triple-digit rates of annual inflation in developing countries became an exception, with several developing countries having attained annual inflation rates comparable with those that used to characterize the developed countries. Although the rate of inflation in many of the economies in transition remained higher than elsewhere, those countries, with a few notable exceptions, made steady progress in reducing the rapid price increases that accompanied the decontrol of their economies.

Financial flows

The World Economic and Social Survey, 1997 stated that the net transfer of financial resources and the net capital flows among groups of countries continued in 1996 to follow the broad pattern that began to be established in 1992. The developed economies as a group sent very considerable financial flows to the developing countries, more indeed than was needed to finance imports, with the remainder going into substantial official reserve accumulation. The main development in 1996 was that the total dollar value of the net transfer to developing countries was about $11 billion smaller than in 1995. However, that arose because the net-creditor developing countries virtually doubled the surplus that they transferred abroad, while the transfer to the net-debtor countries was virtually unchanged. The net transfer out of the developed countries was also somewhat smaller in 1996. The anomalous situation in 1995, when the economies in transition became a net supplier of financial resources to the rest of the world, appeared to have been reversed in 1996, owing to sharply increased imports in Central and Eastern Europe.

By all indications, the global pool of international finance continued to grow very rapidly. The total value of international arrangements of medium-term bank loans and bond issues passed the $1 trillion mark for the first time. It took less than four years for that figure to be reached from half that amount. Almost all of those funds were absorbed by developed-country borrowers; however, after developing countries took about $75 billion in new credits each year from 1993 to 1995, their borrowing leaped to almost $120 billion in 1996. By the same token, global flows of direct investment had also burgeoned and, while those funds continued to be placed mainly in developed host countries, many developing countries and some transition economies attracted large investment inflows.

Economic and Social Council consideration.

At its high-level segment (2-4 July 1997), the Economic and Social Council carried out, in accordance with decision 1996/310 [YUN 1996, p. 862], a comprehensive review of the theme "Fostering an enabling environment for development: financial flows, including capital flows, investment and trade" [A/52/3/Rev.1].

Among other documents, and in addition to the World Economic and Social Survey, 1997 (see above), the Council had before it a report of the Secretary-General on the subject [E/1997/67] prepared by the UN Secretariat in collaboration with the Bretton Woods institutions (the World Bank Group and the International Monetary Fund (IMF)), WTO and UNCTAD. Defining an enabling environment, the report stated that it encompassed the whole panoply of national and international policies, measures and institutions in the economic, social, legal and political domains that influenced or affected the growth and development prospects of a country. The key characteristics of an enabling environment were well understood and generally accepted: stability, predictability, adaptability, growth orientation, transparent legal and regulatory frameworks, and a strong base of social and physical infrastructures; it implied that countries followed sound and growth-oriented policies. However, efforts at the national level to improve the environment for development could not proceed in isolation from international policies and institutions and the global trends that framed the national environment for growth and development. Developing countries were particularly vulnerable to rapid changes in the international economic environment, determined primarily by the monetary, fiscal, trade and other policies of major industrialized countries, by market and technological forces and trends and by the policies pursued by multilateral financial institutions and WTO, as well as by the state of development cooperation in general.

The Secretary-General stated that the process of globalization was transforming the world economy and changing the nature of international economic relations. As part of that process, the developing world had also changed dramatically. Although new and dynamic centres of growth, trade and investment had emerged in Asia and parts of Latin America, and growth prospects were also improving in other parts of the developing world, for Africa and the least developed countries (LDCs) the risk of further marginalization remained real. The prospects of those countries were clouded by shrinking official development assistance (ODA), low levels of foreign direct investment (FDI), the burden of external debt and worsening terms of trade.

Addressing the subject of a framework of international cooperation and national policies, the Secretary-General stated that international cooperation and partnership had a vital role in creating a favourable climate for capital flows, investment and trade to flourish. A general consensus on the policies required to foster an enabling environment for development at the national level had emerged and experience showed clearly that those policies were also the most conducive to investment (domestic and foreign), capital inflows and successful integration into the world economy through trade. The Secretary-General put forward a number of recommendations for the Council's consideration, in which he emphasized: the need for strengthened international cooperation to enhance the benefits and mitigate the risks associated with globalization and to better integrate developing countries into the world economy; the need for sound and stable macroeconomic policies for accelerated growth through better integration in the world economy; and the importance of the availability and proper maintenance of adequate economic infrastructure. He also recommended that structural reforms aimed at establishing a competitive domestic financial system, privatization and/or restructuring of public enterprises should continue to be implemented. The Secretary-General presented recommendations covering policy coherence, marginalization, ODA, external debt, volatility and vulnerability, capital flows, investment and trade.

In agreed conclusions [A/52/3/Rev.1 (agreed conclusions 1997/1)], the Council stated that it had considered the theme in the context of the global economic environment. It noted that, although the world economic outlook was favourable, growth was not spread widely enough and the gap between developed and developing countries remained unacceptably wide. Globalization was a fact and a dynamic force, but the risks associated with it needed to be managed and minimized through strengthened international cooperation and sound policies. ODA remained an essential source of external funding and, since its overall decline was a cause for serious concern, it was important to reverse it and to achieve internationally agreed ODA targets, focusing on developing countries, with particular priority being given to Africa and LDCs.

The Council welcomed the decision of the IMF Interim Committee to make the Enhanced Structural Adjustment Facility a permanent facility. Sound economic policies and the full application of the debt-rescheduling arrangements contributed to the improvement in the debt situation of a number of developing countries, and debt-relief measures had been undertaken by creditor countries both within the framework of the Paris Club (a group of creditor countries) and through the cancellation of debts. However, the heavy burden of external debt was a main obstacle to development efforts. The Council invited the international community to continue to explore ways to implement innovative measures to alleviate the debt burdens of developing countries, in order to help them to achieve sustained economic growth. In that context, the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Debt Initiative was welcomed; the Council stressed the urgent need for developed countries to support it.

The increased integration of the world economy had the potential for increased volatility, particularly in international financial markets; the volatility in prices of primary commodities, interest rates and exchange rates had a disproportionate impact on developing countries. The increase in capital flows to emerging markets had contributed to sustained economic growth, but had complicated macroeconomic management; sound macroeconomic policies remained an essential ingredient to prevent volatility and IMF was encouraged to fully exercise its role of overseeing the international monetary system to ensure its effective operation. Most developing countries had liberalized their FDI alongside their trade regimes and an increasing proportion of FDI and portfolio capital was going to developing countries. However, FDI and portfolio flows were concentrated mostly in parts of Asia and Latin America, while Africa had received a very small part of total net private flows. A challenge to the international community in contributing to an enabling environment for development lay in encouraging capital and investment flows across a broader range of developing countries. FDI played an increasingly important role in countries with economies in transition; those countries would benefit more if the structure of FDI better reflected the need for investment in the productive and export sectors of their economies.

Global financial integration

In response to General Assembly resolution 51/166 [YUN 1996, p. 865], the Secretary-General submitted a September 1997 report [A/52/406], in which he provided an update of his 1996 review of global financial integration [YUN 1996, p. 864]. The report, prepared in consultation with IMF, the World Bank and UNCTAD, described steps taken to improve the macroeconomic environment for financial integration. It also discussed international cooperation to strengthen financial integration and addressed the issue of enhancing prudential oversight of financial markets.

The Secretary-General stated that 1997 had seen notable developments in many of the areas addressed in resolution 51/166. An important step in the process of liberalization and deregulation of financial markets was taken in April, when the IMF Interim Committee approved a plan to include the promotion of capital account liberalization among the purposes specified in the IMF Articles of Agreement. In the meantime, however, the financial turmoil in Thailand and other South-East Asian nations had raised further questions about the adequacy of the international framework for the highly integrated global financial markets.

There was broad international agreement on the desirability of capital account liberalization, but views differed on many of the issues that had to be addressed in implementing it. At the same time, there was universal concern that national economies, firms and individuals were vulnerable to the volatility currently inherent in global financial markets. To ensure the success of the liberalization of financial markets, complementary actions had to be taken to reduce their volatility, including creating, at both the international and national levels, a sustainable macroeconomic environment, a sound financial system and appropriate prudential arrangements. There was also a need for mechanisms to address a financial crisis if preventive measures failed.

Drawing attention to the Economic and Social Council's agreed conclusions 1997/1 (see above), the Secretary-General noted that there was a degree of commonality in the WTO objective of achieving a level playing field in the financial sector and the efforts being made in various other international forums, mainly within BIS, to develop an adequate regulatory framework. At the same time, it was necessary to ensure that the development concerns of the developing countries and economies in transition were taken into account in both sets of discussions. Such issues of policy coherence could be among those discussed by the Council in its dialogue with the Bretton Woods institutions and WTO, or could be pursued by the Assembly in its discussion of global financial issues.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee [A/52/626/Add.1], adopted resolution 52/180 without vote [agenda item 95 (a)].

Global financial flows and their impact on the developing countries

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolutions 51/166 of 16 December 1996, entitled "Global financial integration and strengthening collaboration between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions", and 50/91 of 20 December 1995, entitled "Global financial integration: challenges and opportunities", as well as Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/43 of 26 July 1996 on strengthening collaboration between the United Nations development system and the Bretton Woods institutions,

Stressing that, in the context of global financial integration, global financial flows present new challenges and opportunities for the international community and should constitute a very important element of the dialogue between the United Nations system and the Bretton Woods institutions,

Expressing its concern that a number of developing countries, in the course of liberalizing their external economic and financial regimes, have become more vulnerable to the volatile fluctuations of private capital flows in international financial markets, and stressing the importance at the national level in the countries concerned of a favourable climate of private financial flows, sound macroeconomic policies and appropriate functioning of markets,

Noting that the globalization of financial markets can generate new risks of instability, including interest rate and exchange rate fluctuations, which have the potential to aggravate the volatility of short-term capital flows and to affect adversely the international financial system, requiring all countries to pursue sound economic policies and to recognize the external economic impact of their domestic policies,

Mindful that all countries should continue their efforts to promote sustained economic growth and sustainable development, in accordance with relevant General Assembly resolutions and recent United Nations conferences, and that the major industrialized countries, which have significant weight in influencing world economic growth and the international economic environment, have important responsibilities to cooperate with developing countries so as to enhance the efforts of the developing countries to address and alleviate their major problems in the areas of finance, trade and external indebtedness,

Recognizing the potential benefits for the world economy of greater freedom of capital movements, but at the same time noting that the capital account liberalization process could put additional stress on the economies that are already straining to adjust to globalization and in that regard necessitates, inter alia, effective management by those economies,

Welcoming the initiatives that the Bretton Woods institutions, especially the International Monetary Fund, have taken to address the question of the volatility of capital flows so as to contribute to minimizing its potential negative impacts on all countries, in particular developing countries,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General entitled "Global financial integration: an update";

2. Reiterates the need for broadening and strengthening the participation of developing countries in the international economic decision-making process;

3. Stresses that sound domestic macroeconomic policies of each country in regard to promoting macroeconomic stability and growth are primary elements for determining private capital flows and that the coordination of macroeconomic policies, where appropriate, and a favourable international economic environment play an important role in reinforcing their effectiveness;

4. Recognizes that a number of developing countries have been able to take advantage of the globalization of finance, and notes the need for the expansion of private capital flows and for broader access by developing countries to those flows, and therefore the need for the international community to assist low-income countries, especially those in Africa, in their efforts to create the enabling environment necessary to attract such flows;

5. Notes that a number of developing countries, among them most of the least developed countries, especially those of Africa, have not benefited from the globalization of finance and continue to be in great need of official development assistance;

6. Recognizes the need to explore ways to broaden appropriate enhanced cooperation and, where appropriate, coordination of macroeconomic policy among interested countries and monetary and financial authorities and institutions so as to enhance preventive consultation arrangements between such institutions as a means of promoting a stable international financial environment conducive to economic growth, particularly of developing countries, taking into account the needs of developing countries as well as situations that may have a significant impact upon the international financial system;

7. Also recognizes the importance of ensuring transparency and accountability at the national level to achieve policy credibility and confidence-building as well as sound regulatory and supervisory arrangements so as to strengthen the domestic financial system, and further recognizes the importance of a stable international economic environment and stability in the international monetary system;

8. Stresses the need for strengthened international cooperation through strengthened regional and multilateral cooperation to prevent future currency crises, which negatively affect not only developing countries but also the international financial and monetary system;

9. Recognizes the benefit of exchange rate stability and a stable financial environment and the potential impact on all countries of lack of stability in the foreign exchange markets, and in that regard invites the International Monetary Fund to exercise fully its mandate to sustain effective surveillance over the underlying macroeconomic policies of its member countries, in particular those countries whose economies are particularly relevant for the stability of the international monetary and financial system;

10. Also recognizes that an effective International Monetary Fund surveillance mechanism requires, among other elements, the regular and timely provision of reliable economic and financial data from all Fund members, and in that regard invites the Fund, within its mandate, to explore how data can be gathered from other relevant sources in order to contribute to the effectiveness of its surveillance mechanism;

11. Takes note of the work of the Basel Committee on Banking Supervision, notes that some developing countries participated in the work of drafting banking standards, and recognizes the need for enhanced participation of developing countries in such work;

12. Invites the International Monetary Fund to ensure that, in exercising its role in promoting capital account liberalization, it does so in an orderly and flexible manner so as to enable member countries to tailor capital account liberalization to the circumstances of each individual country;

13. Requests the Secretary-General, in close cooperation with the Bretton Woods institutions and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, to analyse the current trends in global financial flows, make recommendations in the World Economic and Social Survey, 1998 and the Trade and Development Report, 1998 on ways and means to address the volatility of those flows, including measures to help economies to become more resilient with regard to currency fluctuations, and report on the effect of those fluctuations on growth and development, in particular in developing countries;

14. Also requests the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the Bretton Woods institutions and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Debt problems of developing countries

In response to General Assembly resolution 51/164 [YUN 1996, p. 867], the Secretary-General submitted a report [A/52/290] on the debt situation of the developing countries as at mid-1997. The report, prepared in consultation with IMF, the World Bank and UNCTAD, stated that in the past few years a debt relief initiative was prepared by the World Bank and IMF for a group of heavily indebted poor countries, mainly in Africa. That initiative, endorsed by the IMF Interim Committee and the Bank's Development Committee [YUN 1996, p. 867], as well as by the Assembly in resolution 51/164, represented a potentially important advance in the debt strategy: it embodied the principle of a durable solution to the debt crisis based on equitable burden-sharing among all creditors, including multilateral institutions. Putting the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Debt Initiative into practice, however, would require a high degree of international commitment to implementing debt-relief policies. It deserved full implementation in a timely and flexible manner in all the countries that warranted the high degree of relief that it entailed.

Discussing recent trends in external debt, the Secretary-General stated that the external debt of net-debtor developing countries exceeded $ 1.8 trillion at the end of 1996, having risen by an estimated $ 110 billion during the year, or 6.4 per cent; about 45 per cent of that was owed by countries deemed to be severely indebted. In 1996, both the debt-to-exports ratio and the debt-to-GNP (gross national product) ratio of net-debtor developing countries declined to their lowest levels since the onset of the debt crisis; that was mainly due to the faster growth of output and export earnings, although some debt forgiveness in Africa also served to hold down the ratios in the region. The regional debt-servicing ratios showed a more divergent pattern, which explained why the overall debt-service ratio did not fall in 1996. In 1997, the World Bank listed 51 developing countries as severely indebted, that is, as having either a ratio of the present value of debt service to GNP of over 80 per cent, or a ratio of the present value of debt service to exports of over 220 per cent, each ratio averaged over the three years from 1993 to 1995. The World Bank's 1997 list was as long as its 1996 list. Of the 51 countries, 13 were middle-income countries, a reminder that debt vulnerability was not an exclusive feature of the poorest ones; moreover, although Africa remained by far the most heavily represented region, 19 countries were from other regions.

Updating the international debt strategy, the Secretary-General stated that assistance for countries faced with severe debt burdens had included two main elements: the adoption by debtor countries of macroeconomic stabilization and economic reform programmes supported by multilateral financial institutions, usually with new financing; and debt restructuring involving some combination of rescheduling, partial cancellation of debt-service obligations and reduction of the stock of debt. Debt relief, particularly that accorded by official creditors, was normally extended pari passu with evidence of strengthened macroeconomic policies. Over the preceding decade, the debt strategy evolved towards increasing the degree of concessionality of external assistance to low-income countries, as the severity of the debt overhang of such countries was increasingly recognized. Between January 1996 and June 1997, 19 debtor countries signed agreements with the Paris Club. With regard to private creditors, the Secretary-General noted that, with the implementation in 1996 of agreements for Panama and Peru (restructuring $3.9 billion and $8 billion, respectively), most middle-income debtors in crisis had taken advantage of the main mechanism for reducing their debt to commercial banks, the 1989 "Brady Plan".

The Secretary-General noted that the IMF/World Bank Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Debt Initiative was due to be implemented in 1997. The programme of action for implementation had two stages: the first stage was the Naples terms process, which entailed a rescheduling of debt-servicing obligations to Paris Club countries (and others) on Naples terms (adopted by the Paris Club in 1994). At the end of that period, the debtor could be accorded a stock-of-debt operation by the Paris Club (up to two-thirds reduction of debt), and at that point a decision could be made on whether the second stage was needed. The Boards of IMF and the Bank would decide whether Naples stock terms, together with comparable relief by other creditors, were sufficient to bring the country to a sustainable debt-service position: the "decision point". In April, Uganda became the first heavily indebted poor country to reach the "decision point". Six others were expected to reach it by the end of the year, among them Bolivia, Burkina Faso and Cote d'Ivoire.

The report concluded that while the overall debt situation of developing countries had continued to improve over the preceding year, a large number of developing countries remained in difficult debt situations. It welcomed the IMF/World Bank Initiative as having promising potential for reaching a durable solution to the debt problem of the poorest and most heavily indebted developing countries. The report warned, however, that the success of that complex undertaking would depend on unprecedented coordination of a large number of creditors, the settlement of many substantive and technical details, enhanced flexibility, timely action and sufficient funding for its implementation.

The Interregional Debt Management Conference, jointly sponsored by UNCTAD and UNDP, was held in Geneva from 10 to 12 December [UNCTAD/GDS/DMFAS/Misc.12]. The Conference dealt with the institutional environment for effective debt management, integrated financial management systems, best practices in debt management, capacity-building and regional cooperation.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee [A/52/626/Add.4], adopted resolution 52/185 without vote [agenda item 95 (d)].

Enhancing international cooperation towards a durable solution to the external debt problem of developing countries

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 48/165 of 21 December 1993 and 50/92 of 20 December 1995, the relevant provisions of the report of the Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole of the General Assembly for the Mid-term Review of the Implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, and the Agenda for Development, as well as the results, as agreed, of all major United Nations conferences and summit meetings held since the beginning of the 1990s,

Recalling also its resolution 51/164 of 16 December 1996 on enhancing international cooperation towards a durable solution to the external debt problem of developing countries,

Reaffirming the urgent need for effective, equitable, development-oriented and durable solutions to the external debt and debt-servicing problems of developing countries and to help them to exit from the rescheduling process,

Noting that developing countries have undertaken stabilization and structural adjustment programmes that benefit those countries but also involve social costs,

Emphasizing the importance for debtor countries of continuing to pursue and intensify their efforts with respect to economic reform and stabilization and structural adjustment programmes to raise domestic savings and investments, take full advantage of market access opportunities where available, reduce inflation and improve economic efficiency, taking into account the need to address the social aspects of development, including the eradication of poverty as well as the vulnerability of the poorer strata of their populations,

Noting the improvement in the debt situation of a number of developing countries since the second half of the 1980s and the contribution that the evolving debt strategy has made to this improvement, noting with appreciation the debt-relief measures taken by creditor countries both within the framework of the Paris Club and through their cancellation and equivalent relief of bilateral official debt, and welcoming the even more favourable debt-relief measures taken by the Paris Club on the basis of the Naples terms of December 1994,

Welcoming the admission of the Russian Federation to the Paris Club,

Stressing the need for a full, swift implementation of those initiatives, which will further assist developing countries, in particular the poorest and heavily indebted countries, especially in Africa, in their efforts to improve their debt situation in view of their continued very high level of total debt stock and servicing burdens,

Noting with concern the continuing debt and debt-servicing problems of indebted developing countries as constituting an element adversely affecting their development efforts and economic growth, and stressing the importance of alleviating the onerous debt and debt-service burdens connected with the various types of debt of many developing countries, on the basis of an effective, equitable, development-oriented and durable approach and, where appropriate, addressing the full stock of debt of the poorest and most indebted developing countries as a matter of priority,

Noting that the developing countries that have continued, at great cost to themselves, to meet their international debt and debt-service obligations in a timely fashion have done so despite serious external and domestic financial constraints,

Expressing concern that despite the debt-relief measures taken so far, those measures have not yet fully provided effective, equitable, development-oriented and durable solutions to the outstanding debt and debt-servicing problems of a large number of developing countries, in particular the poorest and heavily indebted countries, which continue to face serious debt problems,

Noting the situation in some creditor countries with economies in transition in addressing the external debt and debt-servicing problems of developing countries,

Stressing the need for continuing global economic growth and the necessity for a continuing supportive international economic environment with regard to, inter alia, terms of trade, commodity prices, improved market access, trade practices, access to technology, exchange rates and international interest rates, and noting the continued need for resources for the sustained economic growth and sustainable development of the developing countries, in accordance with the relevant General Assembly resolutions and recent United Nations conferences,

Stressing also the importance of finding durable solutions to the non-Paris Club bilateral debt, which has become a serious challenge to many developing countries,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the debt situation of the developing countries as at mid-1997;

2. Recognizes that effective, equitable, development-oriented and durable solutions to the external debt and debt-servicing problems of developing countries can contribute substantially to the strengthening of the global economy and to the efforts of developing countries to achieve sustained economic growth and sustainable development, in accordance with the relevant General Assembly resolutions and recent United Nations conferences;

3. Notes that further progress, including swift implementation of innovative approaches and concrete measures, is essential for contributing to effective, equitable, development-oriented and durable solutions to the external debt and debt-servicing problems of developing countries, particularly the poorest and heavily indebted countries;

4. Also notes, while recognizing the benefits of liberalization of international capital flows, the potential adverse impact of the volatility of short-term capital flows and exchange rates on interest rates and the debt situation of developing countries, and stresses the need for coherence in implementing policies in order to mitigate the impact of such volatility;

5. Stresses the importance for developing countries of continuing their efforts to promote a favourable environment for attracting foreign investment, thereby promoting economic growth and sustainable development so as to favour their exit from debt and debt-servicing problems, and also stresses the need for the international community to promote a conducive external economic environment through, inter alia, improved market access, stabilization of exchange rates, effective stewardship of international interest rates, increased resource flows, access to international financial markets, the flow of financial resources and improved access to technology for the developing countries;

6. Also stresses that the evolving debt strategy must be accompanied by a favourable and supportive international economic environment, including the full implementation of the results of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations, and the Marrakesh ministerial decisions in favour of the least developed countries and the net food-importing developing countries;

7. Further stresses the need for existing facilities to provide debt-relief measures through various debt conversion programmes, where possible, such as debt-equity swaps, debt-for-nature swaps, debt-for-child-development swaps and other debt-for-development swaps, to be widely implemented so that the countries concerned may be assisted in their development efforts, as well as to support measures in favour of the most vulnerable segments of the societies of those countries and to develop techniques of debt conversion applied to social development programmes and projects, in conformity with the priorities of the World Summit for Social Development, held at Copenhagen in March 1995;

8. Welcomes the steps already taken to implement the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Debt Initiative and in this regard calls for its timely finalization and implementation so as to enable eligible countries to benefit from the Initiative;

9. Recognizes that the implementation of the Initiative requires additional financial resources from both bilateral and multilateral creditors without affecting the support required for development activities of developing countries and in this regard expresses its appreciation for contributions made by some bilateral donors to the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Trust Fund of the World Bank and the Enhanced Structural Adjustment Facility/Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Trust Fund of the International Monetary Fund, and urges other bilateral donors and invites other international financial institutions that have not yet finalized mechanisms for participation in the Initiative to do so as soon as possible;

10. Stresses the importance of implementing the Initiative's eligibility criteria flexibly, in a transparent manner, and with the full involvement of the debtor country, and also stresses the importance of continuously evaluating and actively monitoring the implications of the existing terms of the eligibility criteria in the implementation of the Initiative, so as to ensure sufficient coverage of heavily indebted poor countries;

11. Underlines the importance of the transparency and involvement of debtor countries in any review and analysis that is conducted during the adjustment period;

12. Welcomes the implementation since 1994 by the Paris Club of the Naples terms as well as the decision to go beyond the Naples terms to provide debt reduction for eligible countries, in particular the poorest and most heavily indebted countries, and invites all other bilateral, multilateral and commercial creditors to make an appropriate and consistent contribution to the common objective of debt sustainability;

13. Invites creditor countries, private banks and multilateral financial institutions, within their prerogatives, to continue the initiatives and efforts to address the commercial debt problems of the least developed countries and the requests for continued mobilization of resources through the Debt-reduction Facility of the International Development Association in order to help eligible least developed countries reduce their commercial debt;

14. Recognizes the efforts of indebted developing countries in regard to fulfilling their commitments on debt servicing despite the high social cost incurred and, in this regard, encourages private creditors and, in particular, commercial banks to continue their initiatives and efforts to address the commercial debt problems of middle-income developing countries;

15. Stresses the urgent need to continue to provide social safety nets to vulnerable groups most adversely affected by the implementation of economic reform programmes in debtor countries, in particular low-income groups;

16. Notes with concern the continuing burden of debt and debt-service obligations of middle-income developing countries, including in particular those in Africa, and encourages creditors, including multilateral financial institutions and commercial banks, to continue to support those countries in addressing these obligations effectively;

17. Expresses strong support for the continuation of Enhanced Structural Adjustment Facility operations, and stresses the need to find consensus regarding its funding modalities in the interim period 2001-2004, and in this regard invites the Executive Board of the International Monetary Fund to consider concrete measures in order to generate funds that can be used for this purpose;

18. Stresses the need for further efforts of all donors to secure adequate funding for the eleventh replenishment of the International Development Association in accordance with the agreed timetable and the need to start negotiations, at an appropriate time, for an adequate twelfth replenishment of the Association to a level commensurate with the needs of the poorest countries;

19. Reaffirms the Mid-term Global Review of Progress towards the Implementation of the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, in particular the appropriate actions in favour of those countries concerning their official bilateral commercial and multilateral debt;

20. Stresses the need for new financial flows to debtor developing countries from all sources, in addition to debt-relief measures that include debt and debt-service reduction, and urges creditor countries and multilateral financial institutions to continue to extend concessional financial assistance, particularly to the least developed countries, in order to support the implementation of economic reforms and stabilization and structural adjustment programmes by the developing countries that will enable them to extricate themselves from the debt overhang and attract new investment and to assist them in achieving sustained economic growth and sustainable development, in accordance with the relevant General Assembly resolutions and recent United Nations conferences, and the eradication of poverty;

21. Calls upon the international community, including the United Nations system, and invites the Bretton Woods institutions, as well as the private sector, to take appropriate measures and action for the implementation of the commitments, agreements and decisions of the major United Nations conferences and summits organized since the beginning of the 1990s on development related to the question of external debt;

22. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Income distribution and growth

On 22 October, the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board (TDB) adopted agreed conclusions [A/52/15 (agreed conclusions 440(XLIV))] on income distribution and growth in a global context. The Board expressed its appreciation for the section of the Trade and Development Report, 1997 [Sales No. E.97.11.D.8] on globalization, distribution and growth and urged the UNCTAD secretariat to continue to study aspects of globalization. It stated that, despite growing prosperity, world income gaps across and within countries over the past two decades had generally widened; that was a challenge for policy makers everywhere. An effective response would have many dimensions: a development strategy incorporating a faster pace of investment and growth held the key to adequate job creation and rising living standards for all; measures to achieve higher employment rates, fiscal stability and social objectives, including appropriate social safety nets, should complement policies fostering economic growth. Markets by themselves did not create the full range of factors needed to accelerate growth and meet the challenges of competitiveness associated with globalization. Government policy had a crucial role to play in promoting economic growth and competitiveness and reconciling them with social objectives. Success in curbing inflation helped to create conditions for sustainable growth; if that was to be achieved, policy needed to be oriented towards avoiding deflation as well as a resurgence of inflation. Achieving higher and sustainable growth was a necessary condition for dealing with poverty in developing countries and labour-market problems in industrial countries, and was also essential to the avoidance of threats to international trade and payments.

Financing of development

In response to General Assembly resolution 50/93 [YUN1995, p.973], the Secretary-General submitted a report [A/52/399] on the financing of development, focusing on the sources of such finance and the private and official mechanisms that transformed finance into investment. The report noted that the developing economies, like all economies, had mainly relied on their domestically generated savings to finance their investment. In the 1990s, they were able to invest more than their own saving permitted, owing to positive net transfers of resources from abroad; the high saving rates in some developing economies suggested that savings could be increased in the countries with lower savings.

The developed economies as a whole usually saved more than they invested domestically and transferred the surplus abroad in the form of public and private investments, loans and grants. The degree to which the supply of savings from the developed world would continue to be available to supplement the domestic savings of the developing countries depended primarily on future growth in savings and investment in the developed countries. An urgent consideration was to make as many developing countries as possible into attractive placements for the world's international savings flows in order to spread economic growth, thereby bolstering the global supply of savings later.

In 1996, there was a net transfer of official resources out of the developing countries, as the new inflows of official loans and grants were less than the outflows of interest and principal. The trend in the net transfer through all sources of official flows taken together and measured in current dollars remained one of slow decline. Since 1990, with the end of the cold war and the higher priority in donor countries for fiscal consolidation, there had been a reassessment of ODA commitments in certain donor countries; in addition, financing needed for emergencies and humanitarian assistance had diverted considerable funding from regular development programmes. The consequences were acute for LDCs, which remained heavily dependent on ODA for external financing. Moreover, the contraction of aid budgets created special difficulties for multilateral institutions; to overcome the adverse consequences for the replenishment of some funds, new approaches to financing were being sought.

With regard to mobilizing financial resources, the Secretary-General stated that the most effective way for developing economies to capture international savings was to adopt policies that enhanced their own domestic capital formation and thus their own savings also. Many of the steps necessary for creating such an enabling environment were beyond the control of individual developing countries and required international policy efforts. The domestic policies required for that purpose should aim to establish and maintain a stable macroeconomy, including sustainable levels of domestic and external indebtedness, said the report. In addition, adequate physical and social infrastructure were prerequisites for an environment conducive to long-term investment commitments and those too often warranted international assistance to finance and sometimes also to help design. A sound financial system, moreover, was crucial to the funding of productive investments.

The Secretary-General stated that there had been profound changes in the volume and nature of world financial flows, one of them being the explosion of international movements of private capital, in particular the increased participation of a number of developing countries in those flows. In addition there had been a shift in the composition of flows of finance for development from the public to the private sector. Recent years had also seen an increasing proportion of official flows being allocated to immediate humanitarian needs, to the detriment of allocations for longer-term development purposes. Although the total net transfer of resources to the developing world had increased dramatically over the past decade, the nature, distribution, composition, terms and conditions of those flows had also changed, raising the question of whether the new pattern was consistent with the international community's new consensus on development and appropriate to the needs of the developing countries. The Secretary-General suggested that the Assembly might wish to consider addressing those and other dichotomies between the international community's views regarding development needs and priorities and the current pattern of global resource flows.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second

Committee [A/52/626/Add.1], adopted resolution 52/179 without vote [agenda item 95 (a)].

Global partnership for development: high-level international intergovernmental consideration of financing for development

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 46/205 of 20 December 1991, 48/187 of 21 December 1993 and 50/93 of 20 December 1995, and relevant resolutions, in which it decided, inter alia, to consider at its fifty-second session the convening of an international conference on the financing of development,

Recalling also the Agenda for Development, in which it is stated, inter alia, that due consideration should be given to modalities for conducting an intergovernmental dialogue on the financing of development,

Reaffirming that development is a complex multidimensional process and is one of the main priorities of the international community, for which Governments have individual and shared responsibilities,

Noting with concern the continuous decline of the official development assistance flows to developing countries, and that official development assistance remains a main source of external funding for developing countries, particularly those in Africa and the least developed countries,

Recognizing the need to further explore ways of generating new public and private financial resources to complement development efforts,

Reaffirming its resolutions 50/91 of 20 December 1995, 50/227 of 24 May 1996 and 51/166 of 16 December 1996, as well as Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/43 of 26 July 1996 on strengthening collaboration between the United Nations development system and the Bretton Woods institutions,

1. Notes the need for systematic, comprehensive and integrated high-level international intergovernmental consideration of financing for development, with a view to creating a broader-based partnership for development;

2. Also notes that various efforts have been undertaken both within and outside the United Nations system to address financing for development, and in that regard considers it important that efforts already undertaken and under way should contribute to the broader-based partnership for development;

3. Stresses the need for a process that will take stock of various efforts undertaken both within and outside the United Nations system on financing for development in preparing for high-level international intergovernmental consideration;

4. Decides to convene a resumed session of the Second Committee of the fifty-second session of the General Assembly for two days in order to solicit the views of Governments on the inputs required from a broad range of stakeholders, including actors both within and outside the United Nations system, as well as views on key elements that might be included in the consideration of the topic of financing for development, and to identify potential sources of such inputs;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the reports requested at the resumed session of the fifty-second session of the General Assembly are compiled and forwarded to Governments at the fifty-third session of the General Assembly, with an index report indicating recurring themes and key elements found therein, and also requests the Secretary-General to prepare a report to be submitted at the same time on the work of the United Nations to address financing for development;

6. Also decides to create an ad hoc open-ended working group to work during the fifty-third session of the General Assembly in order to undertake an in-depth examination of all the inputs requested, with a view to formulating a report containing recommendations on the form, scope and agenda of the high-level international intergovernmental consideration of the topic of financing for development, which will be submitted to the General Assembly at its fifty-fourth session;

7. Further decides to consider at the fifty-fourth session of the General Assembly the convening, inter alia, of a summit, international conference, special session of the General Assembly or other appropriate high-level international intergovernmental forum on financing for development to further the global partnership for development, not later than the year 2001.

Investment, technology and related financial issues

The UNCTAD Commission on Investment, Technology and Related Financial Issues held the second part of its first session in Geneva on 7 February [TD/B/44/4], the first part having been held in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 869].

In agreed conclusions, the Commission encouraged UNCTAD to continue to promote dialogue among development partners and invited extrabudgetary contributions to support UNCTAD's programme. It recognized the need expressed by many developing countries for empirical studies to shed further light on the impact on development of liberalizing domestic investment regimes. The Commission welcomed the work of the World Association of Investment Promotion Agencies, endorsed the recommendations of the 1996 Expert Meeting on Competition Law and Policy [YUN 1996, p. 870], and took note of the report of the 1996 meeting of the Intergovernmental Working Group of Experts on International Standards of Accounting and Reporting [Ibid.] and of the Chairman's stated intention to request the TDB President to undertake consultations in order to resolve the deadlock over the issue of expert-level activity. The Commission agreed to convene a further meeting on competition law and policy (see below) and meetings to examine and review existing agreements on investment and on investment promotion.

The Commission held its second session in Geneva from 29 September to 3 October [TD/B/44/14]. It had before it an overview of the World Investment Report 1997: Transnational Corporations, Market Structure and Competition Policy [Sales No. E.97.II.D.10], which noted that FDI continued to be a driving force of the globalization process characterizing the modern world economy. The boom in FDI flows, accompanied by increasing flows of foreign portfolio equity investments, underscored the increasingly important role played by transnational corporations in both developed and developing countries. Their role was facilitated by the liberalization of FDI policies that had taken place in many countries as part of an overall movement towards more open and market-friendly policies. However, reaping the benefits of such liberalization required not only that barriers to FDI were reduced and standards of treatment established, but also that competition in markets was maintained. That third component of FDI liberalization was the special topic of the report, which examined the interaction between FDI, market structure and competition, and looked at policy implications.

The Commission also had before it the reports of subsidiary bodies. The Expert Meeting on Existing Agreements on Investment and Their Development Dimensions (Geneva, 28-30 May) [TD/B/COM.2/5] had reviewed bilateral investment treaties in pursuance of the mandate given in "A Partnership for Growth and Development" [YUN 1996, p. 845].

The Expert Meeting on Investment Promotion and Development Objectives (Geneva, 24-26 September) [TD/B/COM.2/8] reviewed country and regional experiences in investment promotion.

In agreed conclusions on existing agreements on investment, the Commission noted UNCTAD's work programme on a possible multilateral framework on investment, aimed at building capacity in developing countries and economies in transition, through training and advice, and with a view to helping those countries to participate as effectively as possible in discussions on international investment arrangements. It also noted with appreciation the contribution made by UNCTAD to the WTO Working Group on the Relationship between Trade and Investment and encouraged further cooperation in that field. UNCTAD should continue its work on analytical research and policy analysis to determine and assess the developmental implications of issues related to a possible multilateral framework on investment.

In agreed recommendations on recent developments in FDI trends and policies, the Commission recognized that many countries had undertaken a range of measures to attract FDI through liberalization and promotion of investment and encouraged them to pursue coherent and coordinated policies. Recognizing the specific needs of LDCs, as well as Africa, it stated that the UNCTAD secretariat should analyse the experiences of selected LDCs and developing countries in Africa that had begun to attract increased flows of FDI and recommended that the World Investment Report 1998 reflect that analysis; it also recommended that the secretariat explore ways to disseminate that information on the Internet. The Commission recommended further technical assistance activities, including an evaluation of Africa Connect with recommendations for future action and appropriate follow-up, Investment Policy Reviews, and Science and Technology and Innovation Policy Reviews. The Commission called for work to elucidate the elements of appropriate competition policy and the benefits that could be gained from it, and on how to achieve coherence between FDI liberalization, trade policy and competition policy. It also called for reports on experiences gained with international cooperation on competition policy issues and the mechanisms used; and the impact of competition policy on inflows of FDI and on the overall growth of the domestic economy.

On 25 July (decision 1997/307), the Economic and Social Council decided that the Intergovernmental Working Group of Experts on International Standards of Accounting and Reporting and the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Restrictive Business Practices should continue to meet in accordance with their agreed mandates and composition but within the overall limit of 10 expert meetings per annum; they should retain their existing intergovernmental character and status. The two bodies should operate within the framework of the Commission on Investment, Technology and Related Financial Issues, to which they should report. The Council further decided that each body should meet once a year unless otherwise decided and that a review of their functioning should be part of the special high-level review meeting envisaged in the 1996 Midrand Declaration [YUN 1996, p. 851].

Competition law and policy

The Expert Meeting on Competition Law and Policy met in Geneva from 24 to 26 November [TD/B/COM.2/9]. It had before it reports by the UNCTAD secretariat on empirical evidence of the benefits from applying competition law and policy principles to economic development in order to attain greater efficiency in international trade and development [TD/B/COM.2/EM/10] and on the review of technical assistance, advisory and training programmes on competition law and policy [TD/B/COM.2/EM/9].

In agreed conclusions, the Expert Meeting urged continued cooperation between UNCTAD and WTO in the area of competition law and policy, invited States members to assist UNCTAD in its technical cooperation activities, and recognized the importance of strengthened international cooperation on the subject. It recommended that the consultations of the forthcoming meetings of the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Competition Law and Policy (as the Expert Meeting was to be renamed) should focus on the principle of positive comity, on remedies and sanctions for antitrust violations, and on the treatment of abuse of dominance/monopolization analysis. The UNCTAD secretariat was asked to pursue its technical cooperation activities within available resources and to prepare for consideration by the forthcoming meeting of the Intergovernmental Group of Experts an updated review of technical assistance, a revised version of the study on the empirical evidence of the benefits of competition policy, and a preliminary report of a study on experiences gained with international cooperation on competition policy issues and the mechanisms used.

In a 24 October letter [A/C.2/52/7], the TDB President informed the Chairman of the General Assembly's Second Committee of TDB's action in respect of the resolution adopted by the Third United Nations Conference to Review All Aspects of the Set of Multilaterally Agreed Equitable Principles and Rules for the Control of Restrictive Business Practices, held in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 961], and drew attention to TDB's 22 October consensus on changing the name of the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Restrictive Business Practices to the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Competition Law and Policy. The Board had also agreed to convene a fourth review conference in the year 2000.

By resolution 52/182 (see above), the Assembly endorsed the change of name of the Intergovernmental Group and stressed that the fourth review conference should be absorbed within the proposed budget for the 1998-1999 biennium.

Transport

Maritime transport

The Review of Maritime Transport 1997 [Sales No. E.97.II.D.9] stated that world seaborne trade registered its eleventh consecutive annual increase in 1996, reaching a record high of 4.76 billion tons. However, annual growth had slowed to 2.3 per cent, which was the lowest since 1987 and below the average annual rate of growth of 3.3 per cent over the period 1987-1995. Overall seaborne trade in 1997 was estimated to expand at 3.8 per cent over 1996, reaching 4.9 billion tons.

Total maritime activities in ton-miles in global trade increased in 1996 by only 1 per cent to 20,545 billion ton-miles, compared with 20,338 billion ton-miles in the previous year. The world merchant fleet expanded to 758.2 million dead-weight tons (dwt) at the end of 1996, representing a 3.2 per cent increase over 1995. The higher rate of fleet expansion reflected the balance between newbuilding deliveries (39 million dwt) and tonnage broken up and lost (20.3 million dwt), leaving a net gain of 18.7 million dwt.

The combined tonnage of developed market-economy countries and the major open-registry countries increased in 1996 by 3.3 per cent over 1995 to 542.5 million dwt. The developing countries' fleet continued to increase slightly, reaching 147.4 million dwt in 1996.

Arrest of ships

At its fifteenth executive session (Geneva, 27 June) [A/52/15], TDB endorsed the 1996 recommendation of the Joint UNCTAD/International Maritime Organization (IMO) Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Maritime Liens and Mortgages and Related Subjects [YUN 1996, p. 871] that it propose to the General Assembly the convening of a diplomatic conference to consider and adopt a convention on arrest of ships. As a basis for the work of a possible conference, the UNCTAD and IMO secretariats prepared a revised set of draft articles and clauses for a convention [TD/B/IGE.1/5 & Corr.1] based on the work of the Joint Group.

In resolution 52/182 (see above), the Assembly noted the Board's recommendation and stressed that the conference should be absorbed within the budget for the 1998-1999 biennium.

Transport of dangerous goods

The Secretary-General submitted to the Economic and Social Council a report [E/1997/16] on the work during 1995-1996 of the Committee of Experts on the Transport of Dangerous Goods. The Committee adopted new and amended recommendations on the transport of dangerous goods and reviewed its recommendations on their transport in multimodal portable tanks. It also reformatted the ninth revised edition of Recommendations on the Transport of Dangerous Goods into a model regulation, annexed to a basic recommendation. It decided to publish the tenth revised edition of the Recommendations in all the official languages of the United Nations by the end of 1997, but agreed not to recommend any date for the implementation of the recommendations.

In order to give effective follow-up to Agenda 21, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 672], particularly chapter 19 dealing with environmentally sound management of toxic chemicals, the Committee formed joint working groups with the International Labour Organization to develop harmonized criteria for the classification of chemicals presenting physical hazards. It also cooperated with other organizations on the development of harmonized classification criteria for chemicals presenting health hazards or hazards to the environment.

In 1997, the Committee's Subcommittee of Experts on the Transport of Dangerous Goods held its thirteenth (Geneva, 7-17 July) [ST/SG/AC.10/C.3/26 & Add.1-3] and fourteenth (Geneva, 8-18 December) [ST/SG/AC.10/C.3/28 & Add.1-3] sessions, while the Committee itself was scheduled to meet again in 1998.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 18 July [meeting 34], the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1997/3 without vote. The draft was recommended by the Committee of Experts on the Transport of Dangerous Goods [E/1997/16] [agenda item 7 (a) and (b)].

Work of the Committee of Experts on the Transport of Dangerous Goods

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1995/5 and 1995/6 of 19 July 1995,

Recalling also its decision 1996/301 of 26 July 1996, in which it invited the Committee of Experts on the Transport of Dangerous Goods, when examining the question of the periodicity of amendments to the Recommendations on the Transport of Dangerous Goods, to take fully into account the views expressed by delegations during the substantive session of 1996 of the Council,

Bearing in mind the increasing volume of dangerous goods in worldwide commerce and the rapid expansion of technology and innovation,

Bearing in mind also the continuing need to meet the growing concern for the protection of life, property and the environment through the safe transport of dangerous goods, while facilitating trade,

Aware that, in order to achieve internationally harmonized laws, the Economic Commission for Europe, the International Maritime Organization, the International Civil Aviation Organization and other specialized agencies and international organizations involved in activities related to the transport of dangerous goods and interested Member States have responded positively to the various resolutions of the Council adopted since 15 April 1953 and that, being committed to taking the recommendations of the Committee as a basis for the formulation of their requirements and regulations, including those concerning labelling and classification, those organizations therefore rely on the work of the Committee,

Aware also of the advice of the Committee to the effect that reformatting the provisions applicable to all modes of transport contained in the Recommendations on the Transport of Dangerous Goods into a model regulation, an-nexed to a basic recommendation, that could be directly integrated into all modal national and international regulations would enhance harmonization, facilitate regular updating of all relevant instruments by the organizations or regulatory authorities concerned and result in considerable overall savings for the Governments of the Member States, the United Nations, the specialized agencies and other international organizations.

Reconfirming the need for the Committee to participate actively in relevant activities associated with the implementation of Agenda 21, as expressed in Council resolution 1995/6,

A. Work of the Committee of Experts during the biennium 1995-1996

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the work of the Committee of Experts on the Transport of Dangerous Goods during the biennium 1995-1996 and in particular of:

(a) The adoption of new and amended provisions for inclusion in the Recommendations on the Transport of Dangerous Goods;

(b) The completion of the first step in the reformatting of the existing Recommendations on the Transport of Dangerous Goods into a model regulation annexed to a basic recommendation;

(c) The elaboration, pursuant to Council resolution 1995/6, of proposals for criteria for the classification of flammable, explosive and reactive materials, globally harmonized for various regulatory purposes, in cooperation with the International Labour Organization in the context of the implementation of chapter 19 of Agenda 21 and the concurrence of the Committee with the request from the International Labour Organization that it pursue the work in the biennium 1997-1998 on unresolved issues, on the same basis as in the biennium 1995-1996;

2. Commends the Secretary-General for the timely publication of the ninth revised edition of the Recommendations on the Transport of Dangerous Goods in all the official languages of the United Nations and for the publication of the second revised edition of the Manual of Tests and Criteria in English, French, Russian and Spanish;

3. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) To circulate the new and amended recommendations to the Governments of Member States, the specialized agencies, the International Atomic Energy Agency and other international organizations concerned;

(b) To publish a consolidated version of the Recommendations on the Transport of Dangerous Goods, as amended, in the reformatted form of a model regulation, annexed to a basic recommendation, including the new and amended recommended provisions, in all the official languages of the United Nations, in the most cost-effective manner, no later than the end of 1997;

(c) To expedite the publication, in the most cost-effective manner, of the second revised edition of the Manual of Tests and Criteria in Arabic and Chinese;

4. Invites all Governments, the specialized agencies, the International Atomic Energy Agency and the other international organizations concerned to transmit to the Secretary-General their views on the work of the Committee, together with any comments that they may wish to make on the amended recommendations;

5. Invites all interested Governments, regional commissions and specialized agencies and the other international organizations concerned, when developing or updating appropriate codes and regulations, to take full account of the recommendations, including the structure and format of such codes and regulations;

B. Programme of work for the biennium 1997-1998

6. Approves the programme of work of the Committee and its Subcommittee of Experts on the Transport of Dangerous Goods for the biennium 1997-1998 and the working arrangements and the priorities of work for that biennium, as follows:

(a) Global harmonization of systems of classification and labelling of chemicals (implementation of chapter 19 of Agenda 21), in accordance with Council resolution 1995/6;

(b) Second step in the reformatting of the Recommendations on the Transport of Dangerous Goods into a model regulation;

(c) New or revised recommendations on the transport of dangerous goods;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary steps for ensuring representation of the secretariat of the Committee at appropriate meetings of international organizations committed to implementing the recommendations of the Committee or involved in the process of global harmonization of classification and labelling systems for chemicals;

C. Periodicity of amendments to the Recommendations on the Transport of Dangerous Goods

8. Takes note of the advice of the Committee that:

(a) A new and revised version of the Recommendations on the Transport of Dangerous Goods should be published after completion of the second step of reformatting, that is, in 1999, after the 1998 session of the Committee;

(b) The new and revised version should be implemented by the various international organizations concerned with the transport of dangerous goods through their respective modal instruments by 1 January 2001;

(c) No firm decision as regards a possible future four-year periodicity of amendments should be taken as long as the processes of reformatting the Recommendations on the Transport of Dangerous Goods into a model regulation, annexed to a basic recommendation, and of global harmonization of systems of classification and labelling of chemicals for the implementation of Agenda 21 have not been completed;

9. Invites the Committee to reconsider the issue at its 1998 session;

D. Report to the Council

10. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report to the Council in 1999 on the implementation of the present resolution.

UNCTAD institutional and organizational questions

UNCTAD programme

In 1997, the Trade and Development Board (TDB)—the executive body of UNCTAD—held three sessions, all in Geneva: the fourteenth (24

March) and fifteenth (27 June) executive sessions; and the regular forty-fourth session (13-22 October) [A/52/15]. In March, the Board discussed the following items: issues arising from the 1996 Ministerial Conference of WTO [YUN 1996, p. 1441] that had implications for UNCTAD's future work; coordination and cooperation between UNCTAD and other international organizations; technical cooperation; UNCTAD's publications policy; preparations for the Board's forty-fourth session; and reorganization of the UNCTAD secretariat. In June, TDB considered matters requiring action in follow-up to UNCTAD IX [YUN 1996, p. 844]; issues arising from reports and activities of its subsidiary bodies; and institutional, administrative and related matters. It also adopted the text of the UNCTAD technical cooperation strategy.

At its October session, TDB engaged in a high-level discussion of the question of globalization, competition, competitiveness and development. The high-level segment comprised two panel discussions, one on "The perspective" and the other on "The future of competition: a prospective look at electronic commerce". During the segment, the "Partners for Development" initiative, envisaged in the UNCTAD IX Midrand Declaration [YUN 1996, p. 845], was launched. The UNCTAD Secretary-General accepted the offer of Lyon, France, to host the first meeting of "Partners for Development" in November 1998. TDB adopted agreed conclusions on: income distribution and growth in a global context [agreed conclusions 440 (XLIV)] (see above); review of progress in the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries (LDCs) for the 1990s: policy reforms in agriculture and their implications for development [agreed conclusions 441 (XLIV)] (see PART THREE, Chapter I); and UNCTAD's contribution to the implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s [agreed conclusions 443 (XLIV)] (see PART THREE, Chapter III). It also adopted a recommendation on the Third United Nations Conference on LDCs [rec. 442 (XLIV)] (see PART THREE, Chapter I), and a decision on the review of UNCTAD's technical cooperation activities [dec. 444 (XLIV)] (see below).

Technical cooperation activities

In an August report [TD/B/44/11 & Corr.1 & Add.1,2 & Add.1/Corr.1] to TDB's forty-fourth session, the UNCTAD Secretary-General gave an overview of technical cooperation activities in 1996, when UNCTAD's expenditures amounted to $22.4 million, an increase over the $22 million spent in 1995. Of that amount, $6.1 million was financed by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), $15.8 million was from trust fund contributions and $0.5 million was from the regular programme of technical cooperation. The continuing decline in the share of expenditures originating from UNDP, which was matched by an increase in trust fund contributions, arose in part from a UNDP decision to decrease the relative shares of funding for UNDP regional and interregional programmes and in part from changing UNDP priorities. However, the downward shift in UNDP funding was likely to be reversed as, earlier in 1997, UNDP and UNCTAD had agreed on a new programme to promote the effective integration of low-income developing countries into the international economy through increased investment and expanded trade.

By region, approximately $5.7 million went to Africa, $2.8 million to Asia and the Pacific, $2 million to Latin America and the Caribbean, and $3.4 million to Europe. Some $8.5 million went to the interregional programme. The LDCs' share of technical cooperation expenditures in 1996 amounted to 31 per cent, up from the 1995 low of only 27 per cent. The Trust Fund for LDCs became operational in February 1997.

By programme, the Division on Services Infrastructure for Development and Trade Efficiency accounted for 56 per cent of total technical cooperation expenditures in 1996; the three other divisions, namely International Trade in Goods and Services and Commodities, Globalization and Development Strategies and Investment, Technology and Enterprise Development, each accounted for about 13 per cent. The balance (5 per cent) was represented by the Office of the Special Coordinator for LDCs and by activities reported for the secretariat as a whole.

In June [A/52/15], TDB adopted the text of the technical cooperation strategy [TD/B/EX(14)/3], which stated that the purpose of UNCTAD's technical cooperation was to promote the integration of developing countries and countries with economies in transition into the world economy and to assist Governments in creating and strengthening the policy and institutional environment for development.

In October, TDB adopted a decision [dec. 444 (XLIV)], as recommended by the Working Party on the Medium-term Plan and the Programme Budget, on the review of UNCTAD's technical cooperation activities. It requested the secretariat to explore ways to increase the predictability of funding for technical cooperation; to prepare, in consultation with member States, a handbook to assist possible beneficiaries of UNCTAD's technical cooperation; and to explore new modalities to ensure a better relative balance in the share of technical cooperation expenditure of the various regions. It decided that the Working Party should carry out an in-depth evaluation of the Global Trade Point Network in 1998; and requested the secretariat to prepare the rolling three-year technical cooperation plan for 1998-2000 for consideration by the Working Party in 1997. The UNCTAD Secretary-General was asked to include in his next report on technical cooperation information on: the implementation of the UNCTAD technical cooperation strategy; the implementation of technical cooperation programmes in line with the areas established in "A Partnership for Growth and Development" [YUN 1996, p. 845]; the cost-effectiveness of the technical cooperation programme; and the establishment of quality control and standards.

Publications policy

As decided in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 850], TDB, in March 1997 [A/52/15], received an oral progress report on the work of the secretariat Task Force on Publications Policy and requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General to complete his own report on the policy. In June, the Board decided to examine the policy in 1998.

Medium-term plan and programme budget

The UNCTAD Working Party on the Medium-term Plan and the Programme Budget held two sessions in 1997, both in Geneva.

At the first part of its twenty-ninth session (16-17 January) [TD/B/EX(15)/6], the Working Party reviewed an informal draft of the UNCTAD section of the proposed UN programme budget for the biennium 1998-1999 and endorsed the proposed revisions to UNCTAD's programme of work for 1996-1997. At the second part of that session (13-16 June), the Working Party had before it the proposed programme budget covering UNCTAD (section 11A) for the 1998-1999 biennium [A/52/6 (Sect. 11A)]. In agreed conclusions, the Working Party stated that section 11A provided an adequate basis for UNCTAD to carry out its mandate. It reconfirmed that the question of LDCs was an important issue to be worked on actively by all parts of the UNCTAD secretariat and agreed that the coordinating role of the Office of the Special Coordinator for LDCs should be emphasized in the proposed programme budget. It also agreed that the important role and related activities of Intergovernmental Support Services should be fully reflected. Taking note of the importance placed by member States on cooperation between UNCTAD, WTO and ITC, the Working Party agreed that reference to WTO and ITC should be included in the programme budget.

At the first part of its thirtieth session (6-8 October) [TD/B/45/4], the Working Party reviewed the 1996 technical cooperation activities of UNCTAD and their financing (see above). In agreed conclusions, the Working Party noted that in Africa the value of regional projects exceeded that of national projects and expressed the hope that activities in that region should increasingly be undertaken at the country level; it also noted that the relative share of technical cooperation expenditures in the Asian and Latin American and Caribbean regions had diminished significantly over the past three years. The Working Party stated that some priorities should be set among UNCTAD's numerous technical cooperation programmes and projects; it recommended that progress in that area could be made in the context of preparing the three-year rolling technical cooperation plan for 1998-2000. It recommended a draft decision on the subject to TDB. TDB adopted that decision in October (see above).

At the second part of its thirtieth session (8 December), the Working Party continued to review UNCTAD's technical cooperation activities and their financing. It had before it a note by the UNCTAD secretariat on the 1998-2000 plan for technical cooperation [TD/B/WP/104] and an evaluation report on the TRAINFORTRADE programme [TD/B/WP/103]. In agreed conclusions, the Working Party invited the UNCTAD Secretary-General to consider the conclusions and recommendations contained in the evaluation report of the TRAINFORTRADE programme and to submit a progress report in 1998. It invited donor Governments and institutions to increase their contribution to the programme and encouraged the UNCTAD secretariat to increase its cooperation with other organizations, particularly ITC and WTO, in implementing TRAINFORTRADE.

Chapter V

Regional economic and social activities

In 1997, the five United Nations regional commissions continued to promote economic and social development throughout the countries in their areas. Four met for regular sessions during the year at their headquarters: the Economic Commission for Africa (ECA) (Addis Ababa, Ethiopia); the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific (ESCAP) (Bangkok, Thailand); the Economic Commission for Europe (ECE) (Geneva); and the Economic Commission for Western Asia (ESCWA) (Beirut, Lebanon). The Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC), located in Santiago, Chile, did not meet in 1997, having held a biennial session the previous year [YUN 1996, p. 919].

All five commissions continued to implement reform measures in the context of the overall UN reform process. Those reforms aimed at rationalizing the work of those bodies, allowing them to be more responsive to global challenges, taking into account the specific interests and needs of each region. In 1997, ECA, ESCAP and ESCWA adopted resolutions to restructure their programmes and organization. ECE adopted the Declaration on the Strengthening of Economic Cooperation in Europe and Plan of Action. Those measures were endorsed by the Economic and Social Council, which also adopted a resolution on ECLAC in the context of UN reform.

During the year, ECE and ESCAP celebrated their fiftieth anniversaries, while ESCWA began preparations for the celebration of its twenty-fifth anniversary in 1999.

Regional cooperation

On 7 February, the Economic and Social Council, by decision 1997/203, decided to consider at its substantive session, under the item entitled "Regional cooperation", the review and reform of the regional commissions.

In a May report [E/1997/40], the Secretary-General reviewed reform efforts by the commissions, as well as other activities, including follow-up to recent global conferences, and regional economic trends. An addendum [E/1997/40/Add.1] contained resolutions and decisions adopted at recent sessions of the commissions, calling for action by the Council or to be brought to its attention.

On 25 July, by decision 1997/314, the Council noted the Secretary-General's report on regional cooperation, as well as other documents considered in connection with that subject, including summaries of surveys of economic and social conditions in: Africa [E/1997/41]; Europe [E/1997/42]; Latin America and the Caribbean [E/1997/43]; Asia and the Pacific [E/1997/44]; and Western Asia [E/1997/45]. The Council took note of the Secretary-General's note [E/1997/5] on UN reform and its impact on ECLAC, as well as his note [E/1997/51] on the project for a Europe-Africa permanent link through the Strait of Gibraltar.

Review of regional commissions

The Secretary-General, in his UN reform programme [A/51/950], stated that regional commission reforms had not involved an overall review of their role within a reformed United Nations. Consequently, there were a number of general issues spanning the work of the commissions, which the Economic and Social Council had to address. He recommended that the Council initiate a general review to consider the commissions' core competencies vis-a-vis global bodies and other regional and subregional intergovernmental bodies, and to evaluate the most appropriate division of labour with regard to standard-setting and technical cooperation, as well as prospects for further rationalization.

The General Assembly, in resolution 52/12 B of 19 December, invited the Council, in consultation with Member States and appropriate regional bodies, to conduct a general review of the regional commissions in 1998, and to submit a report thereon to the Assembly before the end of its fifty-second session.

Africa

In 1997, the Economic Commission for Africa (ECA) held its thirty-second session/twenty-third meeting of the Conference of Ministers (Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, 5-8 May), with the theme "Accelerating trade and investment in Africa". Following a high-level panel discussion, a Declaration on Accelerating Trade and Investment in Africa was adopted. The Conference considered the report and recommendations of the eighteenth meeting of its Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole, and heard special presentations on meeting the challenges of national communications infrastructure planning with public and private sector cooperation.

In a message to the Conference, the Secretary-General observed that the African continent was at a crossroads, with better prospects for development, as evidenced in economic reform and growth; a growing dynamism in the private sector and civil society; and the consolidation of democratic rule in many countries. However, there were still many conflicts and much strife throughout the continent. The United Nations would remain a steadfast partner through its programmes of peace-building and humanitarian assistance, and through technical assistance and regional cooperation. ECA would continue to be an important agent in African development.

The ECA Executive Secretary outlined the organizational restructuring of the ECA secretariat, with the senior management team revamped and high-caliber individuals recruited. He sought endorsement of three new institutional reform issues: streamlining of the Commission's inter-governmental machinery; rationalization of ECA-sponsored institutions; and continued strengthening and rationalization of the Multinational Programming and Operational Centres (MUL-POCs). That institutional reform would enable ECA to address adequately the issues of promoting trade and investment, boost development and alleviate poverty. It would also assist African countries to develop and use their institutions to expand and diversify exports and facilitate enterprise development; identify opportunities arising from the Final Act of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations; and help promote an information and communications infrastructure by coordinating the African Information Society Initiative (AISII) (see below, under "Information technology").

The Conference was preceded by the eighteenth meeting of the Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole (Addis Ababa, 29 April-2 May), which discussed the Conference theme, the ECA Report on the Economic and Social Situation in Africa, 1997, strengthening ECA's institutional framework for effectiveness and impact, and AISII.

The Conference of Ministers examined, amended and adopted the Technical Preparatory Committee's report [E/ECA/CM.23/11], including the resolutions contained therein.

The Conference of Ministers also held a high-level symposium on strengthening private and public sector partnership in building national information infrastructure and enhancing the role of information and communications technology to facilitate trade and investment in Africa. The Ministers committed themselves to building an information society in their countries by putting in place national information and communications infrastructures.

Economic and social trends

Economic trends

According to the summary of the ECA survey of economic and social conditions in Africa in 1997 [E/1998/12], the rate of growth in Africa in 1997 was estimated at 2.9 per cent, as against 4 per cent in 1996, demonstrating the fragility of the economic recovery and emphasizing the predominance of exogenous factors in the determination of the out-turn. However, there was a large variation in growth across the continent, with countries' gross domestic product (GDP) ranging from a low of -8.7 to a high of 12.7 per cent. The lower performance was due to lower oil prices and weather conditions that affected agricultural output in the southern and northern subregions. The decline in the growth rate was reflected in all subregions, with the lowest rate in southern Africa, at 2.4 per cent, followed by North Africa, at 2.8 per cent. The highest rate was recorded in Central Africa, at 3.8 per cent, followed by West Africa, 3.7 per cent, and East Africa, 3.5 per cent. However, the overall regional per capita income posted a positive growth rate of 0.1 per cent.

Output in the industrial sector increased by 3.3 per cent in 1997, well below the 1996 rate of 5.4 per cent. While manufacturing industries maintained their 2.5 per cent growth, with expansion in construction (5.4 per cent) and energy and water (3.1 per cent), there was a slowdown in the mining subsector (3.3 per cent in 1997, as against 6.5 per cent in 1996). Production of 15 main minerals, representing 90 per cent of the sector's total output, with few exceptions, declined or stagnated in 1997. The overall mining production index (excluding oil) remained virtually unchanged, increasing marginally by 0.6 per cent. Gold production remained unchanged in Ghana, while in South Africa it declined by 2.2 per cent. The increase in copper production in Zambia was overshadowed by a steep decline in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC). In the oil sector, crude oil production increased from 368.4 million tons in 1996 to 378.4 million tons in 1997. New investment in the sector was expected to boost output in the future.

Inflation crept up from 25.1 per cent in 1996 to 28.3 per cent in 1997, due mainly to food price increases and/or political instability in some countries. Double-digit inflation was recorded in Kenya and Uganda for the first time and remained high in Angola, Burundi, the Congo, the DRC and the Sudan.

External debt

The debt overhang continued to pose a major obstacle to recovery and sustainable economic growth, particularly of the highly indebted poor countries. The overall external debt of African countries increased by nearly 3 per cent in 1997 to $349 billion, from $340 billion in 1996. Difficulties in meeting debt service obligations were reflected by the accumulation of arrears and the strong demand for rescheduling. Among efforts for alleviating the debt burden, the debt initiative for the heavily indebted poor countries of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund was welcomed, with the expectation it could reduce the burden of the 32 poor and highly indebted African countries. Uganda and Burkina Faso were beneficiaries of the initiative in 1997, reducing their debt stock by 15 to 20 per cent.

Agriculture

The survey stated that agriculture production decelerated to 1.7 per cent in 1997, compared to a record rate of 5.2 per cent in 1996, due particularly to weather conditions in major producer nations and the dearth of modern technology, which continued to constrain productivity. The production of major export commodities, such as cocoa and coffee, fell well below their 1996 levels. Poor harvests were recorded, particularly in North, East and southern Africa, and had adverse consequences on the income and performance of processing industries. Modest growth was, nevertheless, recorded in West and Central Africa, although severe food shortages were reported in Burundi, the Congo and the DRC. Civil strife played a significant negative role, accentuating the region's food supply difficulties. According to the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), cereal production fell by about 10.5 per cent, from 126 million tons to 113 million tons. Fruits, jute and vegetables production were slightly lower than in 1996, while the production of pulses increased.

Trade

The ECA survey reported that trade had maintained a positive growth rate, with the value of exports increasing by 5.9 per cent, spurred by an 8 per cent growth in volume. Imports continued an upward trend at a rate of 7.6 per cent, 6.3 per cent of which was due to increased volume and 1.3 per cent to an increase in prices. Terms of trade marginally declined, by about 1 per cent.

The trade balance maintained a positive value at $8.3 billion in 1997, made up of a surplus of $32.9 billion for the oil exporters and a deficit of $24.6 billion for non-oil countries. Despite the positive trade balance, the current account deficit increased from $8.6 billion in 1996 to $9.5 billion in 1997. The persistent deficit was attributed to the balance on services made up of interest payments on external debt, trade-related financial services and transport services. The volume of oil exports increased as a result of growth in production, particularly by countries not members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC). Other exports of minerals maintained their previous year's level. Despite unfavourable weather conditions and a decline in agricultural exports, export volume increased due to a depletion of stock held over from previous years.

Policy developments

In 1997, the ECA survey said that the main policies pursued by African countries to achieve the macroeconomic goals of stability, growth and employment creation included financial policies (fiscal and monetary), structural reforms and social policies. Most countries also provided policy support for economic diversification and financial resource mobilization. To achieve those objectives, Governments set their own financial policies, including tight monetary policies, and adopted cautious expenditure policies. Structural reforms were mainly focused on measures to promote privatization, encourage private sector development, reform the agricultural sector, encourage sustainable agricultural development and export diversification, and improve and strengthen the civil service. Almost all countries with social needs programmes focused on combating poverty by increasing social sector spending on health services and primary education. However, the reduction and eventual eradication of poverty were expected to be the overarching policy challenges facing African Governments in the foreseeable future. To that end, they would need to develop ways to maintain high and durable growth, expand employment, and attain equitable income distribution in an environment of stable prices and a sustainable balance-of-payments position. Despite a weak performance by economic groupings in Africa, there was an emerging consensus to promote economic integration to resuscitate and reinforce the process of economic recovery and socio-economic development, including through fiscal and customs reforms of the Central African Customs Union, and the integration programme of the West African Monetary and Economic Union. That was expected to result in the implementation of a common external tariff, thus achieving a customs union. The slow growth of the business sector in Africa was due to the lack of openness to trade, the high-risk environment, the low level of social capital, and poor infrastructure. Those factors were attributable to some extent to corruption, tax regulation and/or high taxes. High priority should be given to eliminating corruption and regulating taxes in all African countries to help business to flourish.

Social trends

The ECA survey reported that in 1997 there was a further exacerbation of some of Africa's perennial problems—destruction, death and displacement—although the ingredients for those deteriorating human conditions differed from country to country. In addition, in many African countries a crisis of governance remained pervasive, encompassing such shortcomings as popular participation, political accountability and transparency, and policy and institutional weaknesses. With a population growth rate of 2.8 per cent, the fastest in the world, almost 50 per cent of Africa's population, which had grown from 738 million to 795 million between 1996 and 1997, was under 14 years of age. As a result, the dependency ratio in Africa was the highest in the world. One consequence of the heavily youthful, non-productive population in Africa was the pressure exerted on already overstretched social infrastructure and facilities, especially in the health, education and housing sectors.

Access to health care continued to be generally poor as the gap between supply and demand for health services widened. It was estimated that Africa accounted for 90 per cent of traceable malaria deaths worldwide and two thirds—some 14 million—of the world's 23 million people with the human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS). In addition, the dearth in health and nutritional standards had brought Africa, with the exception of Algeria, Botswana, Cape Verde and Mauritius, back to 1960s levels of life expectancy.

Education suffered from low rates of school enrolment, wide gender and regional disparities, doubts about the relevance of the curriculum, poor school infrastructure, and a lack of resources, despite the relatively high education budgets provided by States.

Evidence also suggested that the employment situation in Africa had not improved for most countries in 1997. The development of productive employment had not kept pace with the increased labour supply, which had grown at about 3 per cent per annum. Levels of wage employment declined or stagnated, real wages decreased, and working and living conditions continued to deteriorate. Unless determined and improved employment and development policies were implemented, the employment crisis was likely to continue into the new century.

African nations continued to seek good governance practice in the form of democratization. Elections were held in a number of African countries in 1997, including Algeria, Liberia, Kenya, Mauritania and Morocco, but obstacles to appropriate mechanisms for transition to democratic governance included the internal strife and widespread political instability currently engulfing a number of African countries.

Activities in 1997

In 1997, ECA made the transition to a new programme structure. New subprogrammes dealt with facilitating economic and social policy analysis; enhancing food security and sustainable development; strengthening development management; harnessing information for development; and promoting regional cooperation and integration. The cross-cutting issues of women in development and capacity-building underpinned those subprogrammes.

Development policy and regional economic cooperation

African recovery and development

In 1997, ECA continued to implement the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s (UN-NADAF) and the United Nations System-wide Special Initiative on Africa (see PART THREE, Chapter III). As secretariat of the UN Inter-Agency Task Force for African Economic Recovery and Development, ECA contributed to the mid-term review of UN-NADAF. As part of the joint ECA/United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) secretariat for the System-wide Special Initiative on Africa, ECA formulated a communications strategy designed to keep key partner agencies and stakeholders informed of activities under the Special Initiative, ensure inter-agency coordination, stimulate African ownership of the Special Initiative, and sus-tain the political commitment of all actors to it. ECA and UNDP co-sponsored the Non-Governmental Organization (NGO)/Civil Society Organization Consultation on Governance in Africa, held in Addis Ababa in May, which was followed by an NGO forum in July to review governance programmes in Africa and mobilize resources for their implementation.

In the area of strengthening civil society participation, ECA reported on the establishment of an NGO resource centre to support and expand the capacity of NGOs in development and peace-building. An agreement was reached to use the framework of the African Information Society Initiative (see below, under "Information technology") as the means to implement the objectives of the Special Initiative. ECA, in collaboration with Special Initiative partners, co-sponsored a Special Initiative programme cluster on "Partnership with Africa through South-South cooperation". Building on its coordination responsibilities in Africa, ECA produced a work programme on South-South cooperation with a focus on fostering interregional linkages, facilitating linkages at the national level, exploring approaches to fostering linkages within Africa, and promoting the use of electronic linkages for South-South cooperation.

Trade promotion and development finance

The eighteenth meeting of the ECA Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole (29 April-2 May) considered a paper [E/ECA/CM.23/8] entitled "After the Uruguay Round: global challenges and Africa's responses in selected areas", which aimed to help African policy makers assess trade policy options using the most accurate data possible and a state-of-the-art analytical framework. The Committee also considered a paper [E/ECA/CM.23/2] entitled "Promoting trade and investment to accelerate Africa's development".

The Committee noted the findings of the Global Trade Analysis Project at Purdue University (United States), that by the year 2000, Africa's overwhelming reliance on the European market would be eroded, as economic growth increased the demand for exports to Asia, and as the benefits of preferences for African exports to the European market were lessened due to trade liberalization. The Committee also noted that Africa was the only region expected to incur significant real income losses as a result of the Uruguay Round agreements. It observed that those losses could be eliminated through institutional and policy reforms. The Committee recommended that ECA should assist in mobilizing resources for commodity seminars at the national and subregional levels to help disseminate the results of the study and to introduce the proposed framework to policy analysts interested in regional and global trade issues. Investigations within that framework should be undertaken on: future prospects for African agricultural exports to Asia and their implications for food security and sustainable development; potential benefits from institutional and policy reforms aimed at the manufacturing sectors; further assessment of the impact of abolition of textile and apparel quotas in the year 2005 (since several African countries' exports to North America had been restricted); and analysis of the impact of regional trade agreements on intra-African trade.

The ECA Conference of Ministers issued a Declaration on Accelerating Trade and Investment in Africa, in which they affirmed that African countries should assume the primary responsibility for restructuring their economies to meet the challenges and opportunities of a globalizing and liberalizing world economy. Trade and investment were essential components in any credible strategies to accelerate country development and sustain high rates of economic growth. An increased rate of domestic savings was needed, supplemented by official development assistance (ODA) and foreign investment. The Ministers were concerned about the long-term declining trend of ODA, in spite of Africa's economic restructuring efforts and continuing need for development resources. They renewed their commitment to regional cooperation and integration, in line with the exigencies of expanding Africa's markets, as a prerequisite to attracting investment and engendering economic growth.

The Ministers were aware that to achieve their goals of accelerating economic growth and development, boosting domestic savings and investment, attracting private foreign capital transfers and expanding trade, they would have to promote a positive image of Africa as a safe place for business and investment; maintain peace, security, political stability and good governance; establish an adequate legal and regulatory framework; strengthen the institutional capacities of African countries; improve information flow on economic developments in Africa; modernize, expand and diversify production; reduce the cost of establishing and doing business; strengthen international competitiveness to better participate in the international trading system; and strive for genuine regional economic cooperation. The Ministers invited domestic and foreign investors to take advantage of the opportunities created by the improved policy and economic environment in their countries. They urged Africa's bilateral partners to continue to provide increased direct financial support on concessional terms, and to extend indirect financial support through tax incentives to their national investors participating in infrastructure development projects in Africa. Multilateral development financial institutions would continue to play an important role in providing financial resources and technical assistance.

The Ministers requested ECA, in collaboration with the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and the African Development Bank (AfDB), to assist member States in identifying issues critical to accelerating trade and investment and to propose appropriate strategies, in collaboration with African Governments and leading African and global multilateral institutions. They recommended that emphasis be placed especially on practical strategies and economic and social innovations, with particular emphasis on regional cooperation, public-private partnership and international competitiveness, thereby pointing to new approaches to accelerate Africa's development process. ECA should also function as the clearing house for gathering and disseminating experiences and best practices from within Africa as well as from other regions.

The sixth session (Addis Ababa, 25 March-2 April) of the Conference of African Ministers of Finance met under the theme "Financial sector reforms and debt management". Among issues considered by the Conference were: the role of multilateral financial institutions; financial reform in Africa; the African debt problem; and the challenges and opportunities of capital markets in Africa.

The Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole noted the deliberations of the Conference of the African Ministers of Finance on those issues and called for special attention to be given to the particular needs of the countries in conflict or post-conflict situations. It noted that the System-wide Special Initiative on Africa provided a framework for focusing assistance to those countries and that ECA had established an in-house task force to assist the Commission to address their special needs.

Information technology

The eighteenth meeting of the Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole (29 April-2 May) considered a report [E/ECA/CM.23/7] on the African Information Society Initiative (AISII), adopted by ECA in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 880]. The Committee noted the progress made in implementing the Initiative, including the creation of an African Technical Advisory Committee to oversee the implementation of AISII and its incorporation into the ECA work programme.

The Committee stressed the importance of AISII, especially in accessing information for development by African countries and linking Africa to the rest of the world. It recommended that ECA should set up a clear strategy and implementation plan with deadlines; that activities to be implemented should be related to the needs of ECA member States at the national level; and that a study be undertaken to determine those activities to be implemented on a priority basis. Implementation activities should not be overambitious but fit the human and financial resources available. There should be an implementation timetable and enhanced consultations and coordination of AISII activities with other agencies and African member States to avoid conflict of interest.

The Committee underscored the importance of geographical information systems and recommended that they be given due attention as were other information systems being developed under AISII. Emphasis should be placed on strengthening data communications systems in Africa and policy meetings organized in the context of the implementation of AISII should cover all African countries. The Committee urged member States of the West African subregion to support the strengthening of the West African Development Information System so that it could promote the activities being implemented under AISII within the subregion.

ECA, under its programme of harnessing information for development, produced two monographs: "Reader on information management strategies for Africa's development"; and "Strategies for human resources development for information management in Africa". Four case studies were undertaken illustrating the impact of information technology on Ethiopia, Mozambique, Nigeria and Senegal. Other publications and technical material prepared by the secretariat included issues of the Statistical Newsletter and the African Statistical Yearbook for 1996 and 1997; the Compendium of Intra-African and Related Foreign Trade Statistics; Africa in Figures; and the Directory of Statistical Data Processing Capacities and Databases in Africa.

The ECA secretariat offered technical assistance in the form of advisory services to public and private sector institutions in Ethiopia, Mozambique, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zambia as well as to the Association of African Universities. Advisory services in statistics, database management and census cartography were provided to Algeria, Botswana, Burkina Faso, Chad, Guinea, Mali, Mozambique, the Niger, Nigeria, Togo, Uganda and Zambia. Implementing AISII was a major priority of the ECA secretariat, which co-sponsored with UNDP two subregional seminars on the national potential of the Internet: in Libreville, Gabon (18-20 March), and in Abuja, Nigeria (21-23 April).

Industrial development

The thirteenth meeting of the Conference of African Ministers of Industry was held in Accra, Ghana, in May, in cooperation with the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) and OAU. In preparation for the Conference, joint missions were undertaken to evaluate the implementation of the Second Industrial Development Decade for Africa (see below) with a view to identifying any shortcomings and the need to redirect programme objectives to respond to the emerging broader private sector development needs of the region. The Conference adopted the Plan of Action for implementation of the Alliance for Africa's Industrialization (see below). ECA strengthened its collaboration with UNIDO in industrial development activities through active involvement in the Alliance, which was launched in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 734].

Second Industrial Development Decade

ECA continued its cooperation with UNIDO in implementing the programme for the Second Industrial Development Decade for Africa (1993-2002), endorsed by Economic and Social Council resolution 1992/44 [YUN 1992, p. 468].

A mid-term evaluation of the programme for the Second Decade was completed in 1997, noting that efforts should be redoubled to translate the Decade's objectives into concrete and practical programmes. Special implementation mechanisms, at the country level, needed to be established and/or strengthened and the existing national machinery (ministries of trade or planning) should be encouraged to assume that responsibility. It was noted that implementation strategies had not been adopted at the country level, that the African private sector was not fully prepared to assume the new responsibilities in the industrial investment process, and that financial support, including term lending from domestic and foreign sources, was not readily available for industrial projects.

It was recommended that the programme's scope and coverage should be narrowed to make it compatible with a country's capacity to mobilize its human, natural and financial resources for implementation; Governments should concentrate on those segments of the programme considered prerequisites for industrial development, while leaving the production and manufacturing aspects to the private sector; they should intensify efforts to promote the economic environment and political stability that would make private sector initiatives possible and productive; the private sector and the industrial community should be supported to build their capacity and enhance competitiveness; the donor community should be invited to look seriously at the revised priorities, including the Alliance for Africa's Industrialization programme for private sector enhancement through partnerships; and the opinions, endorsement and participation of the private sector and chambers of commerce and other business associations should be solicited.

The Conference of African Ministers of Industry adopted the Plan of Action for implementation of the Alliance, which spelled out specific objectives to be achieved to fulfil Alliance goals; specific roles and actions to be undertaken at national, subregional and regional levels; and areas where donors assistance would be most needed. The Ministers also established an Alliance Steering Committee, consisting of selected ministers of industry and representatives of the private sector. At the country level, the key formulation and implementation mechanism would be the Industrial Partnership Council, consisting of representatives of the private sector and Government. To maintain global attention to the Special Initiative and African industrialization efforts, a special Group of Patrons, composed of selected heads of State, was being established under OAU auspices to serve as advocates for African industrialization. The Ministers also approved the establishment of a special fund for the Alliance, to be financed by contributions from UNIDO and by pledges. Other financing options included development of high-impact integrated programmes in collaboration with other UN agencies under the auspices of the Special Initiative and sectoral investment promotion forums at the national and subregional levels to attract private investment and foreign direct investment.

Report of Secretary-General. On 20 October, the Secretary-General reported to the General Assembly [A/52/480] on implementation of the programme for the Second Industrial Development Decade for Africa (1993-2002), providing an overview of economic reform, globalization and industry in Africa, describing support programmes of UNIDO and ECA, and outlining steps to reorient the Second Decade.

UNIDO allocated from its regular budget $10.6 million to implement Decade projects and programmes during the 1996-1997 biennium. As at 31 August 1997, 96 projects had been implemented, 40 per cent of which were at the national level and 60 per cent at the regional level. Technical cooperation projects included support to industries establishing links between industry and agriculture, with special emphasis on food processing, and between industry and transportation and communications. Multi-country and large-scale national projects promoted economic integration at subregional and regional levels directed towards the establishment of the African Economic Community. Special attention was accorded to the development and promotion of small- and medium-scale industries and cross-sectoral priorities such as human resources and technology development, acquisition and transfer, formulation of industrial strategies and policies, integration of women in industrial development, and energy and the environment.

Some Decade projects included: supporting a partnership between entrepreneurs from the Jua Kali in Kenya and rural women in Burkina Faso to boost entrepreneurship, create new manufacturing capabilities and promote quality and new product lines; increasing the "value-added" element to the processing of local raw materials; processing hides and skins into exportable leather products in eight eastern and southern African countries; manufacturing wood products to provide opportunities for the environmentally sustainable development of forest resources in seven western and central African countries; processing spices and aromatic products in Zanzibar; and introducing new salt production techniques in Nigeria. UNIDO also worked with African countries in the Mozambique Channel and Gulf of Guinea to create new enterprises and establish a private-sector-led industrial base. It also promoted better food quality and food security and introduced cleaner industrial production techniques in several African countries.

Decade activities were also supported by publications, research studies and ad hoc expert group meetings. Studies in 1997 related to the production of basic chemicals from natural gas; technology transfer, acquisition and negotiation; African metal industries in the South-South context; integrated development of natural resources and phosphate production; irrigation equipment in Sahel countries; leather and leather products; and small and cottage industries in Africa.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee [A/52/627], adopted resolution 52/208 without vote [agenda item 96 (a)].

Industrial development cooperation: Second Industrial Development Decade for Africa

The General Assembly,

Recalling the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade and the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, Taking note of the declaration adopted by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of countries members of the Group of 77 at their twenty-first annual meeting, held in New York on 26 September 1997, the communique adopted in New York on 25 September 1997 at the Meeting of Ministers for Foreign Affairs and Heads of Delegation of Non-Aligned Countries to the fifty-second session of the General Assembly and the Declaration on Africa's Industrialization, adopted by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity at its thirty-third ordinary session, held at Harare from 2 to 4 June 1997, concerning the importance of industrial development for developing countries, especially those in Africa, and the essential role of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization in this regard,

Reaffirming its resolution 50/94 of 20 December 1995 on the Second Industrial Development Decade for Africa, in which it requested the Secretary-General to report to it at its fifty-second session on the implementation of the resolution, and its resolution 51/170 of 16 December 1996,

Recognizing the importance of industrialization as a key element in promoting sustained economic growth and sustainable development in Africa, in accordance with relevant General Assembly resolutions and recent United Nations conferences, as well as its role in facilitating efforts for the eradication of poverty, the integration of women in the development process and the creation of productive employment,

Recognizing also the increasing role of the business community, including the private sector, in particular small and medium-sized enterprises, in enhancing the dynamic process of the development of the industrial sector,

Taking note of the Plan of Action for the Alliance for Africa's Industrialization, adopted by the Conference of African Ministers of Industry at its thirteenth meeting, held at Accra in May 1997,

Emphasizing the continuing need for the mobilization of adequate resources through domestic and international initiatives for the implementation of the programme for the Second Decade, including a favourable climate for foreign direct investment, private sector development, small and medium-sized enterprises and enhanced market access, and recognizing the need for African countries to use both human and financial resources more effectively in the process of industrialization,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the programme for the Second Industrial Development Decade for Africa (1993-2002);

2. Calls upon all Member States to support the implementation of the programme for the Second Decade and the Plan of Action for the Alliance for Africa's Industrialization, taking into account the results of the mid-term review of the Second Decade;

3. Invites donor countries, United Nations funds and programmes, all relevant United Nations organizations and the private sector to participate in a meeting of donors to be organized by the United Nations Industrial Development Organization in collaboration with the Economic Commission for Africa, the United Nations Development Programme and the Organization of African Unity, under the leadership of the African Development Bank and in cooperation with the World Bank;

4. Appeals to the international community and the relevant organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, in particular the United Nations Industrial Development Organization and the Economic Commission for Africa, in accordance with their agreed mandates, work programmes and priorities, to support the programmes of the African countries to intensify and expand industrial cooperation among themselves;

5. Urges African Member States to integrate the objectives of the Alliance for Africa's Industrialization into their national plans and in the establishment of institutional capacity for the formulation of mechanisms to follow up and monitor programmes and projects, including, where appropriate, the involvement of the private sector;

6. Requests the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, the Economic Commission for Africa and other relevant United Nations organizations, in accordance with their agreed mandates, work programmes and priorities, to work closely with Governments and the private sector in Africa at the national, regional and international levels to foster industrial production and development;

7. Calls upon the United Nations Industrial Development Organization and the Economic Commission for Africa, in accordance with their agreed mandates, work programmes and priorities, to strengthen their coordination with the United Nations Development Programme and other United Nations agencies and donors, with a view to accelerating the implementation of the programme and goals of the Second Decade;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-fourth session a report on the implementation of the present resolution.

Transport and communications

ECA continued in 1997 to assist African countries with the development of their transport and communications infrastructure. It published monographs on: private sector participation in that sector; environmental issues in the transport and tourism sectors; road safety; and international transit facilitation along selected continental transport corridors.

The Conference of African Ministers of Transport and Communications, at its eleventh session (Cairo, Egypt, 22-27 November), examined the second mid-term evaluation of the Second United Nations Transport and Communications Decade in Africa, 1991-2000 (UNTACDA II) (see below). Resolutions were adopted on UNTACDA II and on the restructuring and development of railways in Africa. In conjunction with the Conference, the first African Transport Forum was organized, focusing on such topics as infrastructure financing; capacity-building for developing transport and communications; transport safety; and transport-related environmental issues. The Ministers reaffirmed their firm commitment to regional cooperation and the fulfilment of the Decade's programme.

As recommended by the Commission, the Economic and Social Council, in resolution 1997/5 (see below, under "ECA reform"), decided to abolish the Conference in 1999, at the end of UNTACDA II. Thereafter, the African Economic Community's Committee on Transportation, Communications and Tourism would become the regional forum to discuss the relevant issues.

Transport and Communications Decade

ECA undertook a number of joint activities in 1997 in support of UNTACDA II [YUN 1991, p. 301, ESC res. 1991/83]. Those activities included meetings on: urban and road transport; financing policies and practices for transport and communications in Africa; UNTACDA II programmes; and road safety. Advisory services were provided to Nigeria on harmonizing data in transport activities, and to member States of the Central African Customs and Economic Union on preparing harmonized navigation regulations for inland waterway transport.

To prepare for the eleventh Conference of African Ministers of Transport and Communications, ECA carried out a second mid-term evaluation of UNTACDA II, assessing progress in programme implementation, and the impact of programmes on the development of transport and communications in Africa. An overview was provided of country, subregional, subsectoral, regional and international activities. Remedial action in support of the programme was requested.

The Conference of African Ministers of Transport and Communications adopted a framework for action to accelerate implementation of the Decade programme between 1998 and 2000, and to build strong and efficient transport and communications systems in Africa in the twenty-first century.

Europe-Africa permanent link

The Secretary-General, in April, submitted a report [E/1997/51] from the Executive Secretaries of ECA and ECE on a Europe-Africa permanent link through the Strait of Gibraltar, which included a review of studies and activities carried out during 1995-1996 by Morocco and Spain. Technical aspects, project costs, traffic projections and the economic and financial viability of constructing a tunnel were examined. It was reported that the studies had entered the feasibility phase, and two fundamental tasks needed to be carried out: a deep drilling survey, to gain more information about the subsoil and the deep areas of the Strait; and additional studies of the reconnaissance gallery envisaged in the basic option.

Two workshops considered different aspects of the project in 1997: on characterization of tunnel-boring machines for tunnelling flyschs (Tarifa, Spain, 20-21 February), under the auspices of ECA, ECE and the International Tunnelling Association; and on the methodology for establishing construction costs (Vienna, 11 April).

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 25 July, by decision 1997/314, the Economic and Social Council took note of the Secretary-General's report.

On 22 July [meeting 37], the Council adopted resolution 1997/48 without vote [draft: E/1997/L.33] [agenda item 10].

Europe-Africa permanent link through the Strait of Gibraltar

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolutions 1982/57 of 30 July 1982, 1983/62 of 29 July 1983, 1984/75 of 27 July 1984, 1985/70 of 26 July 1985, 1987/69 of 8 July 1987, 1989/119 of 28 July 1989, 1991/74 of 26 July 1991, 1993/60 of 30 July 1993 and 1995/48 of 27 July 1995,

Recalling also General Assembly resolution 43/179 of 20 December 1988, by which the Assembly declared the period 1991-2000 the Second Transport and Communications Decade in Africa,

Referring to resolution 912 (1989) adopted on 1 February 1989 by the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe regarding measures to encourage the construction of a major traffic artery in south-western Europe and to study thoroughly the possibility of a permanent link through the Strait of Gibraltar,

Referring also to the Barcelona Declaration adopted at the Euro-Mediterranean Conference, held at Barcelona, Spain, in November 1995, and to the work programme annexed thereto, which aims towards connecting the Mediterranean networks in the field of transport to the trans-European network so as to ensure their interoperability,

Referring further to the Lisbon Declaration adopted at the Conference on Transport in the Mediterranean, held at Lisbon in January 1997, and to the conclusions of the Pan-European Conference, held at Helsinki in June 1997, on corridors in the Mediterranean incorporating the permanent link,

Taking note of the follow-up report prepared jointly by the Economic Commission for Europe and the Economic Commission for Africa in accordance with Council resolution 1995/48,

Taking note also of the conclusions of the second and third meetings of the Western Mediterranean Transport Group, held at Rabat in September 1995 and at Madrid in January 1997, respectively, which included the permanent link among the priority corridors in the extension of the trans-European network,

1. Welcomes the cooperation on the project for the link through the Strait of Gibraltar established between the Economic Commission for Africa, the Economic Commission for Europe, the Governments of Morocco and Spain and specialized international organizations;

2. Also welcomes the organization, under the auspices of the United Nations and the International Tunnelling Association, of two seminars, one held at Tarifa, Spain, in February 1997 on the suitability of tunnel-boring machines for the project and the other held at Vienna in April 1997 on the methodology for estimating the cost of tunnels;

3. Commends the Economic Commission for Africa and the Economic Commission for Europe on the work done in preparing the project follow-up report requested by the Council in its resolution 1995/48, even though the necessary resources were not forthcoming from the General Assembly;

4. Renews its invitation to the competent organizations of the United Nations system and to non-governmental organizations, including in particular the International Tunnelling Association and the International Union of Railways, to participate in the studies and work on the permanent link through the Strait of Gibraltar;

5. Also renews its invitation to the European Commission to consider the possibility of participating in the consolidation of the studies and the development of the project both institutionally and financially;

6. Requests the Executive Secretaries of the Economic Commission for Africa and the Economic Commission for Europe to continue to take an active part in the follow-up to the project and to report to the Council at its substantive session of 1999;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to provide formal support and, to the extent that priorities permit, the necessary resources, within the regular budget, to the Economic Commission for Africa and the Economic Commission for Europe to enable them to carry out the activities mentioned above.

Natural resources, energy and cartography

ECA, in 1997, undertook various activities to promote sustained development of mineral and energy resources in Africa, through cooperation and integration, facilitating policy decisions and dissemination of "best practices", and supporting capacity-building.

Engineers, surveyors, planners and policy makers formulated guidelines for natural resources and energy development in Africa with emphasis on privatization and deregulation, with a view to avoiding some of the pitfalls encountered in the ownership and regulatory reform process and to explore Africa's natural resources and energy effectively.

Major monographs in 1997 dealt with: privatization and the African minerals and energy industries; promoting a sustainable energy economy in southern Africa; and the role of renewable energy technologies in energy efficiency and conservation programmes in selected African countries. Technical assistance included advisory missions on: formulating a strategic vision for the Eastern and Southern African Mineral Development Centre; the national survey of Equatorial Guinea; a small-scale mining operations forum for countries of the Liptako-Gourma Authority (Burkina Faso, Mali and the Niger); solar energy use for rural electrification in Benin; and the energy programme of the West African Economic and Monetary Union.

Partnerships in the minerals and energy sectors took the form of enhanced cooperation with other UN agencies and departments, as well as the World Bank, OAU, AfDB, intergovernmental organizations and NGOs. ECA participated in a Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency symposium on investments in the African mining sector (Denver, United States, June), and the UNIDO Expert Group meeting on "Introducing new technologies for abatement of global mercury pollution from artisanal gold mining in Africa: socio-economic aspects and gender issues related to artisanal gold mining in Africa" (Vienna, June).

A regional Conference of African Ministers, responsible for the development and utilization of mineral resources and energy (Durban, South Africa, November) discussed the theme of "Strengthening cooperation among development actors in the sustainable development and utilization of mineral and energy resources in Africa". The Conference objectives sought practical modalities for effective cooperation among African countries in mineral and energy resource development and utilization, and a constructive dialogue between government policy makers and the private sector.

The Conference adopted the Durban Declaration, which embodied the commitment of member States to integrate energy and mineral development strategies through enhanced cooperation. It contained separate sets of recommendations on the mineral and energy sectors. The Conference reinforced partnerships between UNIDO, ECA, the International Labour Organization, the United Nations Environment Programme and the World Bank in search of solutions to the constraints faced by artisanal gold miners in general and women in particular.

The Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole supported the recommendations of the ninth United Nations Regional Cartographic Conference for Africa, held in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 884], and expressed the hope that other sectors of the regional economy could take full advantage of global technological innovations. It noted that the ECA Cartographic Unit had been integrated into the Development Information Services Division, which would enable easy exchange, sharing and integration of information between geo-spatial and other socio-economic sectors.

Food security and sustainable development

In 1997, ECA accorded high priority to ensuring food security and sustainable development, with activities to raise African policy makers' awareness of the interrelationships between food, population, environment and human settlements concerns in development planning. Some projects aimed to improve water resources management; strengthen cooperation among agencies concerned with sustainable development issues; and further the application of science and technology to agriculture and sustainable development concerns. ECA policy reports covered such issues as: harmonization of population and economic growth rates in ECA member States; "best practices" in the area of food security and human settlements; human resource development and capacity-building to implement the Habitat II Agenda [YUN 1996, p. 994]; and linkages between agriculture, population and environment. Other specific issues concerned the impact of environmental hazards on health and urban development, and policy responses to foster sustainable cities in Africa. An overview was presented of progress made in implementing Agenda 21, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development [YUN 1992, p. 672]. Studies were made on: combating desertification in North Africa; the potential contribution of non-conventional food resources to food security in East and southern Africa; and post-Uruguay Round issues, with emphasis on enhancing Africa's capacity in analysing trade arrangements at regional and global levels as they related to agricultural production and food security.

Group training, workshops and seminars were organized for policy makers and experts in such areas as population, sustainable development of transboundary water resources, management and utilization. Technical assistance was given to follow up on the decisions of the first meeting of the African Regional Conference on Science and Technology [YUN 1995, p. 998]. Workshops were organized on capacity-building in developing and implementing indicators of sustainable development (Accra, Ghana, June), and on national fertilizer programmes (Addis Ababa, October).

Regional pilot projects involving five countries dealt with participatory management of farming systems and soil conservation at the village level. The Common Market for Eastern and Southern African States received assistance regarding food security and sustainable development projects. Malawi, Mozambique, Zambia and Zimbabwe were helped in organizing a researchers network to study the effects of informal trade in food and agricultural products across national borders on national, subregional and regional food-security situations. A network of transporters and transport administrators from Djibouti, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Somalia and the Sudan was assisted in seeking lower road and rail transport costs to facilitate subregional trade in food and agricultural products.

Development management

ECA support of development management stressed public-private partnership in support of development; public sector reforms; and enhancing the interface between government and civil society organizations. Publications and reports were issued on the role of local government in enhancing popular participation; politics and administrative efficiency in Africa; accountability in managing public enterprises; public sector expenditure targeting and allocation to foster rural development and employment generation; and government institutional mechanisms to manage privatization programmes in Africa effectively.

Studies were conducted on topics related to: small- and medium-scale enterprises in Africa; guidelines for entrepreneurship; and investment in African multinational industrial projects.

Under the regular programme of technical co-operation, advisory services were provided for capacity-building for the Centre for Public Service Training at the University of Namibia, the African Training and Research Centre in Administration for Development in Morocco, and the African Association for Public Administration and Management in Kenya. Workshops were held on: management skills for public enterprises; commercialization and productivity improvement; motivation and productivity; performance improvement; and capacity-building and skills enhancement. ECA co-sponsored, with the UN Department for Development Support and Management Services, UNDP, the Swedish Government and Swedish International Services, a global forum on local governance. The African Centre for Civil Society was established in October as a resource centre for the institutional development and capacity-building of African civil society organizations.

Integration of women in development

Promoting the advancement of women in Africa continued to be a major priority for ECA in 1997. Publications included: "Women and peace process: perspective from Africa" and "Traditional and cultural practices harmful to the girl child: a cross-sectional review". Meetings, conferences and seminars relating to women in development and peace were organized, including the Pan-African Conference on Peace, Gender, Equality and Development (Kigali, Rwanda, March). Projects to strengthen the leadership, networking and entrepreneurial skills of women in Africa were implemented under the Africa Leadership Fund for Women, established at ECA's African Centre for Women. A West African subregional follow-up meeting on implementing regional and global platforms for action was held in Dakar, Senegal, in November.

The ECA Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole endorsed the recommendations of the eighteenth meeting of the Africa Regional Coordinating Committee for the Integration of Women in Development (ARCC) (Addis Ababa, 24-26 April). They related to its enhanced role in advocacy and policy guidance; implementation strategies; priorities; coordination of sub-regional programmes; exchange of information; and active participation in international forums. The Committee endorsed the request that ECA and ARCC support the full implementation of the Kigali Plan of Action on Peace, Gender and Development. It also endorsed the establishment of an African women's committee on peace, as a complementary organ to ARCC.

The ECA Council of Ministers [E/1997/37 des.829(XXXII)] noted the recommendations of the Women Leadership Forum on Peace, and endorsed the creation of the African Women Committee on Peace. The Ministers called on ECA to collaborate with OAU in providing a joint secretariat for the Committee and to assist it in establishing its own secretariat. The Executive Secretary was requested to submit the resolution to the OAU summit meeting of heads of State and Government for endorsement.

Social development

In 1997, ECA continued to monitor developments in the African social sector. It produced a major report on "HIV/AIDS and its implications for human development in Africa", examining the impact of the HIV/AIDS pandemic on the African social situation and its implications for Africa's long-term socio-economic transformation. Another major study on "Social security systems in Africa: trends and prospects" concluded that after examining all facets of modern social security provision, coverage was seriously limited, as the labour force was mostly in the informal and agricultural sectors.

In collaboration with the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) and the World Bank, ECA organized a forum on cost sharing in the social sectors in Africa (Addis Ababa, 10-20 June), which adopted the Addis Ababa Consensus on Basic Education and Basic Health.

In an effort to promote good governance in the region, ECA established in 1997 the African Centre for Civil Society (ACCS) to enhance cooperation between Governments and civil society organizations. Governments were encouraged to institute a regulatory environment conducive to the growth of indigenous NGOs and broaden their economic, political and social activity through the work of ACCS; strengthen the organizational, managerial and programmatic capacity of civil society organizations; and build civil society's capacity to develop innovative techniques to prevent conflict, strengthen peaceful, pluralistic democracy and peacefully resolve disputes.

Programme, administrative and organizational questions

The ECA Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole reviewed the revised programme of work for 1997 [E/ECA/CM.23/CRP1] and the proposed programme of work and priorities for the 1998-1999 biennium [E/ECA/CM.23/10].

The Committee noted that the proposed 1998-1999 programme of work was significantly different from previous programmes in that it sought more effective control, monitoring and evaluation of programmes. There was a significant reduction in the number of meetings, reports, seminars and workshops, permitting more concentrated resources to support in-depth treatment of issues and more meaningful outputs.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 18 July [meeting 34], the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of ECA [E/1997/40/Add.1], adopted resolution 1997/6 without vote [agenda item 10].

Programme of work and priorities of the Economic Commission for Africa for the biennium 1998-1999

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 41/203 of 11 December 1986 and subsequent relevant resolutions on programme planning,

Recalling also resolution 809(XXXI) of 8 May 1996 of the Conference of Ministers of the Economic Commission for Africa on new strategic directions for the Commission, and endorsing in particular the new orientations of the Commission as outlined in the document entitled "Serving Africa better: strategic directions for the Economic Commission for Africa", as well as in the medium-term plan for the period 1998-2001,

Taking note of the programme of work of the Commission for 1997 as revised in compliance with paragraph 5 of resolution 809(XXXI), in which the Executive Secretary of the Economic Commission for Africa was requested to revise, in close collaboration with the Bureau of the Commission, the programme of work for the biennium 1996-1997,

Having examined the proposed programme of work and priorities for the biennium 1998-1999,

Taking note of the new programme structure, which is characterized by congruence between organizational and programme structures, a reduction in the number of subprogrammes and the clustering of closely related activities under a single subprogramme to foster synergy and achieve greater efficiency and impact in the delivery of services,

Convinced that the proposals contained in the proposed programme of work and priorities for the biennium 1998-1999 will make a significant contribution to the economic and social development of Africa,

1. Endorses the programme of work and priorities of the Economic Commission for Africa for the biennium 1998-1999 as amended;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, in making his proposals for the programme budget for the biennium 1998-1999, to give special consideration to the development needs of the African region by providing the Commission with adequate resources to enable it to carry out fully the reforms already embarked upon;

3. Calls upon the General Assembly and its Second and Fifth Committees to ensure that adequate resources are made available to the Commission for the implementation of its programme of work;

4. Requests the Executive Secretary of the Economic Commission for Africa to ensure that the implementation of the programme of work is guided by the same principles that have underpinned reform and renewal at the Commission: professional excellence, cost-effectiveness in product management and programme delivery and effective partnerships with African regional organizations, the organizations of the United Nations system and other multilateral and bilateral donors in support of the development of Africa;

5. Commends the secretariat of the Commission for the innovative approach it adopted in designing its work programme and the activities therein.

ECA reform

The ECA Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole examined a secretariat note [E/ECA/CM.23/4] containing proposals to reform the Commission's intergovernmental machinery. The abolition of a number of conferences and subsidiary bodies was proposed, along with the creation of new ones.

The Committee noted that those reforms built on previous ones initiated as of mid-1995. The new intergovernmental machinery would continue to enable the Commission to provide a broad view of the African economy. The option of convening special ministerial conferences on any issue as and when circumstances warranted was welcomed. It was felt that duplication of meetings between ECA and the OAU Economic and Social Commission would be reduced. Closer cooperation between the two organizations to defend African interests in international economic negotiations was requested.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 18 July [meeting 34], the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of ECA [E/1997/40/Add.1], adopted resolution 1997/5 without vote [agenda item 10].

Reform of the intergovernmental machinery of the Economic Commission for Africa

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling the various resolutions that have implications for the mandate and operations of the Economic Commission for Africa, in particular General Assembly resolutions 32/197 of 20 December 1977 and 33/202 of 29 January 1979 on the restructuring of the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system and resolution 44/211 of 22 December 1989,

Recalling also resolution 618(XXII) of 24 April 1987 of the Conference of Ministers of the Economic Commission for Africa on the in-depth study of the United Nations intergovernmental structure and functions in the economic and social fields,

Recalling further General Assembly resolutions 45/177 of 19 December 1990, 45/264 of 13 May 1991, 46/235 of 13 April 1992 and 50/227 of 24 May 1996 on the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields, on the basis of which the regional commissions should be enabled fully to play their role under the authority of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council,

Bearing in mind resolution 809(XXXI) of 8 May 1996 of the Conference of Ministers of the Economic Commission for Africa on the new strategic directions for the Commission,

Having taken note of the new policy and programme orientation of the Commission as well as the steps being taken to restructure the secretariat, and conscious of the need to align the intergovernmental machinery to this new orientation in order to enable the Commission to address the emerging challenges and priorities of the region effectively,

Having reviewed the existing intergovernmental machinery of the Commission,

Decides that the structure and functioning of the intergovernmental machinery of the Economic Commission for Africa shall be as follows:

A. Organs dealing with overall development issues

1. Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Economic and Social Development and Planning and the Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole

The Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Economic and Social Development and Planning shall provide legislative mandates and policy guidance for the work of the Commission, consider and endorse the programmes of work of the Commission, serve as a forum for articulating Africa's position on development issues on the agenda of the United Nations and decide upon the recommendations of its subsidiary bodies and of the Executive Secretary.

Since the mandate of the Conference encompasses the full spectrum of economic and social development issues, it shall assume the legislative responsibilities previously assigned to the Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Human Development, which shall be abolished.

The Conference shall meet biennially. Its next session shall be held in 1999. The Bureau of the Commission shall be expanded so as to include a representative from each of the five subregions of the continent—North, East, Southern, West and Central Africa. It shall consist of a chairman, three vice-chairmen and one rapporteur.

A Follow-up Committee is hereby established. It shall be composed of the members of the incoming and outgoing bureaux of the Commission. It shall meet as often as necessary, but at least once in inter-sessional years to review Commission affairs and progress in the implementation of decisions.

The meetings of the Follow-up Committee shall be convened by the Executive Secretary in consultation with the Chairman of the Commission as and when necessary.

The Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole shall continue to provide technical support to the Conference and shall meet before each session of the Conference.

2. Intergovernmental Committees of Experts of the Subregional Development Centres

The five Intergovernmental Committees of Experts of the Subregional Development Centres shall meet annually and report to the Commission through the Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole. In the years when the Commission does not meet, the reports of the Committees shall be presented to the Follow-up Committee of the Bureau of the Commission. The Committees shall oversee the overall formulation and implementation of the programme of work and priorities of the Subregional Development Centres and make recommendations on important issues concerning economic and social development in their respective subregions, as well as on the promotion and strengthening of subregional economic cooperation and integration.

3. Conference of African Ministers of Finance

The Conference of African Ministers of Finance shall be retained. It shall be convened biennially in alternate years with the Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Economic and Social Development and Planning. The Conference of African Ministers of Finance shall have a committee of experts to prepare for its meetings. This committee shall be convened before each session of the Conference.

B. Subsidiary bodies to be created or retained

1. Committee on Women and Development

The Africa Regional Coordinating Committee for the Integration of Women in Development, which shall be renamed "Committee on Women and Development", shall be retained and shall continue to play its role as an advisory forum of experts and policy makers, providing guidance to the Economic Commission for Africa in its work on the advancement of women. It shall also provide a platform for advocacy and assessing follow-up and implementation by African Governments of the regional and global platforms for action for the advancement of women. In particular, the Committee shall address issues relating to the economic empowerment of women, the protection of their legal and human rights and improved access to education and health. It shall meet biennially.

2. Committee on Development Information

As the Commission strengthens its role in assisting member States in developing their national information and communication infrastructure, it needs a body that brings together experts and policy makers to advise it in this area. The beginnings of such a body exist in the high-level working group that helped to articulate "Africa's Information Society Initiative: Action framework to build Africa's information and communication infrastructure" and in the African Technical Advisory Committee of Experts on Information Infrastructure, which was established to provide advice on the implementation of the Initiative. The Committee on Development Information shall build on the work of these bodies as well as that of the Joint Conference of African Planners, Statisticians, Population and Information Specialists.

The Committee shall include experts from such fields as planning, statistics and geographical information systems, as well as information specialists. It shall meet biennially.

3. Committee on Sustainable Development

The Committee on Sustainable Development shall serve as a forum of experts that will provide advice to the Commission in the interlinked areas of food security, population, environment and human settlements. It shall provide a platform for advocacy and the assessment of follow-up activities by African Governments to regional and global plans of actions, namely the African Common Position on Environment and Development, the African Common Position on the second United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II), the Dakar/Ngor Declaration on Population, Family and Sustainable Development, adopted by the Third African Conference on Population, held at Dakar on 11 and 12 December 1992, Agenda 21, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, the Habitat Agenda, adopted by the second United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II), held at Istanbul, Turkey, from 3 to 14 June 1996, the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development and the World Food Summit Plan of Action, and their implementation of those plans.

The Committee shall address specific measures to promote the protection and regeneration of the environment, enhance food security in Africa, promote sustainable human settlements and deal with issues arising from increased population growth. It shall meet biennially.

4. Committee on Human Development and Civil Society

The mission of the Committee on Human Development and Civil Society shall be to help strengthen civil society and human development. It shall enable the Commission to draw on the opinions of experts in the public and private sectors and civil society. The Committee shall conduct development and follow-up activities pertaining to global and regional action programmes such as the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development and the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development and the African Charter for Popular Participation in Development and Transformation. It shall review major trends and issues of regional interest in the areas of human development and civil society and shall assume the functions of the Ministerial Follow-up Committee of Fifteen of the Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Human Development. The Committee shall meet biennially.

5. Committee on Industry and Private Sector Development

The Committee on Industry and Private Sector Development shall serve as a forum for addressing measures to strengthen the private sector. It shall focus on such issues as improving partnerships between the public and private sectors, stimulating private investment and creating a sound legal and regulatory framework for business. The Committee shall monitor and review progress in the industrialization of Africa and shall identify and recommend measures for accelerating the process of industrialization in the region.

The Committee shall assume some of the functions of the Conference of African Ministers of Industry. It shall provide policy and strategy guidance for enhancing programme formulation in pursuit of various aspects of subregional and regional industrial development. It shall also advise on strategies to facilitate Africa's industrial competitiveness through the promotion of complementarity and integration, taking into account global scientific and technological developments. It shall be composed of experts representing each private sector group, such as chambers of commerce, manufacturers' associations, capital market forums, labour and policy makers from relevant government departments. The Committee shall meet biennially.

6. Committee on Natural Resources and Science and Technology

The Committee on Natural Resources and Science and Technology shall assume the functions performed by the African Regional Conference on Science and Technology and the Conference of African Ministers Responsible for the Development and Utilization of Mineral Resources and Energy. It shall be composed of experts in these fields.

The Committee shall serve as a forum for the promotion of cooperation among African countries in the areas of science and technology and development and natural resources and for the provision of advice on science and technology issues relevant to the development of member States. It shall meet biennially.

7. Committee on Regional Cooperation and Integration

The Committee on Regional Cooperation and Integration shall assume some of the functions of the Conference of African Ministers of Trade and Regional Cooperation and Integration. In view of the important role trade plays in regional cooperation and integration, the main focus of this work shall be trade—intra-African and international trade. The Committee shall be composed of experts in the field of international trade and integration drawn from government as well as the private sector.

In addition, the Committee shall promote the implementation of measures designed to strengthen eco-conomic cooperation and integration among African countries, assist African countries and their intergovernmental organizations in making the policy instruments for economic cooperation and integration of the African region more effective and identify measures to coordinate and harmonize microeconomic and macroeconomic policies among African countries as a prerequisite for accelerating regional economic integration. It shall meet biennially.

C. Conferences proposed for abolition

1. Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Human Development

The Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Human Development is abolished. Its legislative functions shall be assumed by the Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Economic and Social Development and Planning. The functions of its Ministerial Follow-up Committee of Fifteen shall be assumed by the Committee on Human Development and Civil Society.

2. Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Sustainable Development and Environment

The Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Sustainable Development and Environment was created in 1993, when the intergovernmental machinery of the Commission was restructured, with a view to providing legislative guidance for the work of the Commission in the area of Sustainable development and environment. Subsequently, it was found that its mandate duplicated that of the African Ministerial Conference on the Environment, which has a joint secretariat composed of the Economic Commission for Africa, the Organization of African Unity and the United Nations Environment Programme. Consequently, the Executive Secretary of the Commission was requested to undertake consultations on finding ways to resolve the problem of duplication.

The results of those consultations were presented to the Conference of Ministers of the Commission in May 1996. The abolition of the Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Sustainable Development and Environment resolves the problem of duplication with the African Ministerial Conference on the Environment.

3. Conference of African Ministers of Trade and Regional Cooperation and Integration

This Conference of African Ministers of Trade and Regional Cooperation and Integration is abolished to eliminate overlap with both the Economic and Social Commission of the African Economic Community and its Committee on Trade, Customs and Immigration. Some of the functions of the Conference shall be assumed by the newly established Committee on Regional Cooperation and Integration.

4. Conference of African Ministers of Transport and Communications

The last session of the Conference of African Ministers of Transport and Communications shall be in 1999, prior to the end of the Second Transport and Communications Decade in Africa. Thereafter, the Committee on Transport, Communications and Tourism of the African Economic Community shall become the regional forum for discussions on the relevant issues.

5. Conference of African Ministers of Industry

The last session of the Conference of African Ministers of Industry shall be in 2001, prior to the end of the Second Industrial Development Decade for Africa. Thereafter, the Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, Energy, Natural Resources and Environment of the African Economic Community shall become the regional forum for discussions. The newly established Committee on Industry and Private Sector Development shall also focus on industry in the broader context of private sector development.

D. Subsidiary bodies proposed for abolition

1. United Nations Regional Cartographic Conference for Africa

The functions of the United Nations Regional Cartographic Conference for Africa shall be assumed by the Committee on Development Information.

2. African Regional Conference on Science and Technology

The functions of the African Regional Conference on Science and Technology shall be assumed by the Committee on Natural Resources and Science and Technology.

3. Joint Conference of African Planners, Statisticians, Population and Information Specialists

The functions of the Joint Conference of African Planners, Statisticians, Population and Information Specialists shall be assumed by the Committee on Sustainable Development and the Committee on Development Information.

E. Sectoral ministerial meetings

Although several sectoral ministerial meetings are proposed for abolition, the Commission shall convene ministerial meetings on any issue as necessary.

ANNEX I

Terms of reference of the organs of the Economic Commission for Africa dealing with overall development issues

1. Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Economic and Social Development and Planning

The Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Economic and Social Development and Planning shall have the following functions:

(a) To provide legislative mandates and policy guidance for the work of the Economic Commission for Africa;

(b) To consider the programme of work and priorities of the Commission;

(c) To review and analyse the economic and social situation in the region;

(d) To identify and highlight the major economic and social development issues and concerns with a view to promoting policies and strategies for Africa's accelerated development;

(e) To suggest policy measures and actions for implementing various strategies and initiatives, including eliciting the support of the international community in support of that effort;

(f) To undertake periodic reviews of the follow-up to global conferences preparatory to the review and appraisal of the implementation of the relevant programmes of action of these conferences by the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly;

(g) To conduct periodic reviews of the situation of the least developed countries and submit to the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly, or any special conference, a report on the situation of the least developed countries in Africa;

(h) To encourage the establishment of appropriate mechanisms at the national, subregional and regional levels to promote the advancement of women;

(i) In close collaboration with the Organization of African Unity and the African Development Bank, to assist member States in promoting regional cooperation and integration, in particular in the implementation of the Treaty Establishing the African Economic Community, signed at Abuja on 3 June 1991;

(j) To foster policy coordination with the Organization of African Unity/African Economic Community on all international economic negotiations;

(k) To undertake a review of the work and the functioning of the subsidiary organs of the Commission;

(l) To review and assess the programme orientation of the secretariat and any recommendations submitted by the Executive Secretary.

2. Intergovernmental Committees of Experts of the Subregional Development Centres

The Intergovernmental Committee of Experts of the Subregional Development Centres shall have the following functions:

(a) To recommend strategies, policies, programmes and projects aimed at enhancing economic cooperation and integration within their respective subregions and with other African subregions, in conformity with the objectives of the African Economic Community;

(b) To submit to the Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Economic and Social Development and Planning the biennial draft programmes of work of the Subregional Development Centres and suggest measures for the successful implementation of those programmes of work. The latter should take into account the activities of the intergovernmental organizations with a view to supporting, not duplicating, those activities;

(c) To monitor through a continuous process and an appropriate mechanism the implementation of the approved programmes of work of the Subregional Development Centres and report thereon to the Conference; in this regard, the Committees shall consider the reports of the Follow-up Committees of the Subregional Development Centres;

(d) To review and analyse the economic and social conditions prevailing in their respective subregions with a view to making appropriate recommendations for measures likely to foster economic cooperation and integration among the countries concerned;

(e) To review and make recommendations on reports of sectoral meetings organized by or with the assistance of the Subregional Development Centres;

(f) To suggest measures aimed at mobilizing resources for the effective implementation of the programmes of the Subregional Development Centres;

(g) To carry out any duties assigned to them by the Conference in connection with their mandate;

(h) To establish liaison with other agencies, organizations and non-governmental organizations at the subregional, regional and global levels and take into account their relevant recommendations;

(i) To make recommendations to the Conference.

3. Conference of African Ministers of Finance

The Conference of African Ministers of Finance shall have the following functions:

(a) To monitor and evaluate the impact of the international monetary and financial situation on the African economies and propose appropriate remedial action;

(b) To assess regularly the structure and magnitude of Africa's external debts, including the debt-servicing obligations of African countries, with a view to proposing effective measures to alleviate such debts;

(c) To review intra-African monetary and financial cooperation and suggest ways by which resource flows to Africa can be enhanced;

(d) To promote the exchange of information and the sharing of national experiences in dealing with monetary and financial matters;

(e) To devise strategies for strengthening Africa's position in international negotiations on monetary and financial issues.

ANNEX II

Terms of reference of the subsidiary bodies of the Economic Commission for Africa

1. Committee on Women and Development

The Committee on Women and Development shall have the following functions:

(a) To review periodically progress in the implementation of the regional and global platforms for action;

(b) To review and evaluate the activities carried out in the region within the framework of the relevant programmes for the advancement of women;

(c) To harmonize and coordinate the subregional programmes on women in development approved within the subregions;

(d) To report to the Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Economic and Social Development and Planning on the activities and programmes on women in development covered at the subregional and regional levels;

(e) To mobilize resources for the implementation of the programmes of action agreed at the subregional and regional levels;

(f) To participate in the activities and meetings of the United Nations and other relevant bodies;

(g) To organize the exchange of information and experiences on policies regarding the advancement of women in member States.

2. Committee on Development Information

The Committee on Development Information shall have the following functions:

(a) To review and advise on the implementation of "Africa's Information Society Initiative: An action framework to build Africa's information and communication infrastructure", with a view to suggesting measures to accelerate its implementation;

(b) To mobilize funding and technical assistance for the implementation of the Initiative;

(c) To identify and suggest techniques for the application of geographical information for natural resource exploitation and management;

(d) To examine and advise on progress by member States in all aspects of statistical development;

(e) To advise on the establishment of arrangements for the improvement of all aspects of methodology and practice in the areas of statistics, information science and geographical information systems (remote sensing and cartography);

(f) To coordinate training for African personnel in the areas of statistics, information science and geographical information systems.

3. Committee on Sustainable Development

The Committee on Sustainable Development shall have the following functions:

(a) To undertake periodic reviews of the implementation of regional and global programmes of action such as Agenda 21, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development, the Habitat Agenda, adopted by the second United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II), held at Istanbul, Turkey, from 3 to 14 June 1996, and the World Food Summit Plan of Action;

(b) To consider and make recommendations on a multidisciplinary approach to the implementation of the relevant programmes of action;

(c) To promote the formulation of policies and measures for environment protection, food security, improved human settlements and the integration of population variables into development planning;

(d) To provide advice to the Economic Commission for Africa in the formulation of activities for supporting member States in the interrelated areas of food security, population, environment and human settlements.

4. Committee on Human Development and Civil Society

The Committee on Human Development and Civil Society shall have the following functions:

(a) To assist member States in promoting measures to follow up the implementation of the regional and global programmes of action in social and human development and popular participation;

(b) To provide advice to the Economic Commission for Africa in formulating its programmes of work in the area of human development and popular participation;

(c) To encourage the integration of social and human dimensions into development policies, plans and programmes at both the macroeconomic and sectoral levels;

(d) To identify and highlight the major economic and social development issues and concerns with a view to promoting policies and strategies for human development and popular participation in development.

5. Committee on Industry and Private Sector Development

The Committee on Industry and Private Sector Development shall have the following functions:

(a) To assist the Economic Commission for Africa in the articulation of strategies and programmes for private sector development;

(b) To undertake periodic reviews and assessment of progress in implementing strategies for private sector development;

(c) To provide advice to the Commission on orienting its programme of work to give support to member States in fostering private sector development;

(d) To provide a forum where representatives of government and the private sector can share experiences and exchange information on best practices relating to support policy measures for private sector development;

(e) To review and monitor progress in industrialization in Africa;

(f) To identify and recommend measures for accelerating the process of industrialization in the region:

(i) To provide advice and information that will enable the Commission to formulate strategies for subregional and/or regional industrial integration;

(ii) To provide the Commission with advice on the best ways to assist member States in facilitating industrial development, including their promotion of industrial restructuring programmes;

(g) To assess periodically progress made in the industrialization process and in the implementation of integration strategies.

6. Committee on Natural Resources, Science and Technology

The Committee on Natural Resources, Science and Technology shall have the following functions:

(a) To promote measures to facilitate cooperation among African countries in the areas of natural resources, science and technology;

(b) To provide a forum for exchanging information and sharing experiences in these areas;

(c) To assist the Economic Commission for Africa in the formulation of programmes for the development and application of science and technology;

(d) To advise the Commission on ways to strengthen its support to member States in the area of natural resources management.

7. Committee on Regional Cooperation and Integration

The Committee on Regional Cooperation and Integration shall have the following functions:

(a) To undertake periodic review and assessment of Africa's trading position in the world economy;

(b) To identify and highlight major opportunities and constraints in trade and investment for African countries;

(c) To enhance the African trade sector through the adoption of appropriate measures, policies and strategies for the expansion of regional and external trade;

(d) In close collaboration with the Organization of African Unity/African Economic Community, to promote the implementation of measures designed to strengthen economic cooperation and integration among African countries;

(e) To assist African countries and their intergovernmental organizations in making more effective the policy instruments for economic cooperation and integration in Africa;

(f) In close collaboration with the Intergovernmental Committees of Experts of the Subregional Development Centres, to assist the States members of the Subregional Development Centres and their intergovernmental organizations in strengthening the existing institutional machinery for subregional economic cooperation and integration, as well as strengthening existing institutions for subregional trade cooperation, within the framework of the Abuja Treaty;

(g) To identify measures to coordinate and harmonize microeconomic and macroeconomic policy among African countries as a prerequisite for accelerating regional economic integration.

Rationalization of ECA-sponsored institutions

The ECA Technical Preparatory Committee considered the findings and recommendations [E/ECA/CM.23/5] of the consultative missions mounted by the ECA secretariat as a follow-up to previous studies on the rationalization and harmonization of the ECA-sponsored institutions as well as proposals for a new framework for ECA's relationship with those institutions in the light of the ongoing reforms of the Commission. The recommendations were related to institutions in the cartographic, mapping and remote sensing group; the engineering and industrial technology group; the economic and social development group; the finance and trade group; and the minerals and transport group. In general, the findings of the consultative missions confirmed the recommendations of previous reviews. The Committee endorsed the recommendations submitted.

The ECA Council of Ministers endorsed the recommendations on the rationalization and harmonization of ECA-sponsored institutions [E/1997/37 (res. 827(XXXII))]. It called on governing bodies of institutions whose survival was doubtful due to lack of support to initiate, in consultation with the relevant host Governments, immediate measures towards their closure. It requested the Executive Secretary to identify those institutions with which the Commission would develop close partnership programmes for enhanced synergy and to seek alliances with cooperating partners to support efforts by member States to transform those institutions identified by the Commission into regional centres of excellence.

Multinational Programming and Operational Centres

The ECA Conference of Ministers considered a report [E/ECA/CM.23/6 & Corr.1] entitled "The MULPOCs: strengthening ECA's subregional presence", which contained proposals and recommendations covering all aspects of the MULPOCs' operations, including their mandate, geographical coverage, membership, location of headquarters and policy-making institutional framework.

The Ministers decided [E/1997/37 (res. 828(XXXII))] to rename the MULPOCs "Subregional Development Centres" (SRDCs). Their functions would be to: act as operational arms of ECA at the country and subregional level and as catalysts to leverage ECA resources; be instruments for ensuring harmony between subregional and regional programme orientations and those defined by the strategic directions of the Commission; provide advisory services to member States, regional economic communities and subregional development operators, with back-stopping from the secretariat and other centres of excellence in the subregions; act as a mechanism to link ECA, member States, regional economic communities, ECA-sponsored institutions and other centres of excellence in the subregion; facilitate subregional economic cooperation, integration and development; promote gender issues; act as centres for policy dialogue; collect and disseminate information; and be coordinators of UN system activities for integration.

The Conference of Ministers also decided that the distribution and membership of SRDCs should be as follows: (a) North African Subregional Development Centre—headquarters: Tangier, Morocco; membership: Algeria, Egypt, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mauritania, Morocco, the Sudan and Tunisia; (b) West African Subregional Development Centre—headquarters: Niamey, the Niger; membership: Benin, Burkina Faso, Cape Verde, Cote d'Ivoire, the Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Liberia, Mali, the Niger, Nigeria, Senegal, Sierra Leone and Togo; (c) Central African Subregional Development Centre—headquarters: Yaounde, Cameroon; membership: Cameroon, the Central African Republic, Chad, the Congo, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon and Sao Tome and Principe; (d) Southern Africa Subregional Development Centre—headquarters: Lusaka, Zambia; membership: Angola, Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Mauritius, Mozambique, Namibia, South Africa, Swaziland, Zambia and Zimbabwe; and (e) Eastern African Subregional Development Centre—headquarters: Kigali, Rwanda; membership: Burundi, Comoros, the DRC, Djibouti, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Kenya, Madagascar, Rwanda, Seychelles, Somalia, Uganda and Tanzania.

The Ministers appealed to the host countries of the SRDCs to provide the necessary facilities and support, including office accommodation, to reflect the enhanced presence of ECA in the subregions.

Cooperation between SADC and the United Nations

In response to General Assembly resolution 50/118 [YUN 1995, p. 1004], the Secretary-General reported in September [A/52/400] on cooperation between the United Nations and the Southern African Development Community (SADC), describing assistance to southern African countries by Austria, Ecuador, Germany, Norway, Spain, Sweden and Thailand and by UN organizations.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee [A/52/630], adopted resolution 52/204 without vote [agenda item 99].

Cooperation between the United Nations and the Southern African Development Community

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolution 37/248 of 21 December 1982, and all other relevant General Assembly resolutions on the promotion of cooperation between the United Nations and the Southern African Development Community,

Welcoming the strengthening of the Community through the admission of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Seychelles as member States,

Welcoming also the creation of the Organ on Politics, Defence and Security, as part of the Community, and its role in conflict prevention and the maintenance of peace, which are essential for development within the region,

Recognizing the strengthening of democratic governance and other positive developments, including the consolidation of the peace process and the enhancement of democracy and the respect for the rule of law in the region,

Commending States members of the Community for demonstrating continued commitment to deeper and more formal arrangements for cooperation among themselves,

Reaffirming that the successful implementation of the development programmes of the Community can be achieved only if the Community has adequate resources at its disposal,

Noting that the effects of war, loss of life and destruction of economic and social infrastructures in southern Africa demand the continuation and strengthening of rehabilitation programmes to regenerate the economies of the countries of the region,

Noting with grave concern the recurrence of drought in the areas, the re-emergence of the El Niño phenomenon, with its probable effect of drought, and the risk of increased poverty, in particular in rural areas,

Welcoming with satisfaction the regional Food Security Strategy which regards poverty eradication as a prime concern, and in particular addresses the issues of improving access to food and nutrition,

Recognizing the valuable and effective economic and financial contribution that some organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system have made to complement national and subregional efforts to advance the process of democratization, rehabilitation and development in southern Africa,

Noting that the situation in Angola has recently become a source of great concern and that, despite earlier successes in the implementation of certain aspects of the Angolan peace process, that situation is still deteriorating,

Expressing its grave concern at the serious difficulties in the peace process in Angola, caused primarily by the slowness of the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola in implementing the Lusaka Protocol, which are hampering efforts towards economic rehabilitation and national reconstruction as well as regional development projects,

Recognizing the risks, new challenges and opportunities posed by the process of globalization and liberalization on the economies of the region,

Noting the measures being taken by the Community in addressing the human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS) pandemic,

Welcoming the recognition at the regional level of the important role that women play in the development of the region, and taking note of the Declaration on Gender and Development adopted by the Community at its seventeenth Summit Meeting of Heads of State or Government at Blantyre, Malawi, on 8 September 1997,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Commends the States Members of the United Nations and organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system that have maintained, enhanced and initiated development cooperation with the Southern African Development Community;

3. Calls upon the States Members of the United Nations and organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system that have not yet established contact and relationships with the Community to explore the possibility of doing so;

4. Expresses its appreciation to the international community for the financial, technical and material support given to the Community;

5. Renews its appeal to the international community to maintain current levels of, and increase where appropriate, its financial, technical and material support to the Community in order to enable it to implement fully its programme of action and to meet the reconstruction and rehabilitation needs of the region;

6. Appeals to the international community and to relevant organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to extend appropriate assistance to the Community in order to enable it to advance further the process of regional economic integration;

7. Welcomes the economic and political achievements and reforms undertaken within the Community, including the implementation of its programme of action, which are intended to address better the challenges of regional cooperation and integration now and into the next millennium;

8. Also welcomes the Community's efforts to make southern Africa a landmine-free zone, which resulted from a decision of the Community to de-mine the region and reclaim the land for productive purposes, and in this context takes note of the Declaration on Anti-personnel Landmines issued by the Community at its seventeenth Summit Meeting of Heads of State or Government at Blantyre, Malawi, on 8 September 1997, and appeals to the United Nations, its related bodies and the international community to assist and support the Community in its efforts;

9. Appeals to the United Nations, its related organs and the international community to assist the Community, with the appropriate resources, in implementing the programmes and decisions adopted by various United Nations world conferences, with specific emphasis on the enhancement of the role of women in the development process;

10. Appeals to the international community as well as to the United Nations system to continue to extend much-needed assistance to those countries of the Community that are engaged in the process of national reconstruction so as to enable them to consolidate their efforts to establish a democracy and enhance the implementation of their national development programmes;

11. Expresses its appreciation for the substantial contributions of Member States, United Nations organizations and non-governmental organizations towards meeting the needs of the Angolan people, and encourages additional substantial contributions;

12. Appeals to the international community to comply with all relevant Security Council resolutions on Angola pertaining to the peace process, which, together with other efforts, would facilitate the process of rehabilitation and reconstruction of the Angolan economy;

13. Expresses its conviction of the importance of sound, inclusive development strategies to avoid conflict and dislocation, recognizes the value of international cooperation, peacemaking and peacekeeping efforts, and stresses the need for the international community to continue to assist those countries receiving refugees in coping with the resulting economic, social, humanitarian and environmental challenges;

14. Appeals to the United Nations and the international community to assist in the strengthening of the region's capacity for sustainable water resource management and to respond generously with respect to the drought situation in southern Africa, so that famine may be averted in the region, by supporting the region in its drought preparedness and management strategies, especially through the strengthening of its capacity in drought mitigation, drought-monitoring, early warning and preparedness;

15. Appeals to the United Nations, its related organs and the international community to extend appropriate assistance to the Community Water Sector and to States members of the Community in order that they may advance further in the implementation of the Protocol on Shared Watercourse Systems of 1995 and in their preparations for the Community Water Sector Round-table Conference scheduled for October 1998;

16. Calls upon the international community to consider supporting the creation of special economic zones and development corridors in the Community, especially the Maputo Development Corridor, which is already under implementation with the active participation of the private sector;

17. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Executive Secretary of the Southern African Development Community, to continue to intensify contacts aimed at promoting and harmonizing cooperation between the United Nations and the Community;

18. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-fourth session on the implementation of the present resolution.

session (Bangkok, Thailand, 23-30 April) [E/1997/38], considered policy issues related to the region, specifically opportunities and challenges into the twenty-first century. Issues considered were: regional economic cooperation; environment and sustainable development; poverty alleviation; transport and communications; statistics; and least developed, landlocked and island developing countries. Also considered were programme planning; strengthening inter-organizational cooperation to promote economic and social development; and technical cooperation activities. Activities of the Advisory Committee of Permanent Representatives and Other Representatives Designated by Members of the Commission were reviewed, as was the conference structure of the Commission.

The Commission decided to hold its fifty-fourth session in Bangkok in March or April 1998. The theme for that session would be "Asia and the Pacific into the twenty-first century: status of and prospects for social development".

In a message to the 1997 session, the Secretary-General noted that it coincided with the fiftieth anniversary of ESCAP's establishment. Over the past half-century, he said, the region had witnessed a range of dramatic economic, social and political changes and had made remarkable gains in human development. It had emerged as the most rapidly growing region in the world, with a constantly rising per capita income. The result had been impressive technological progress, continued economic advances and increasing integration into the global economy. At the same time, the region was home to the largest number of poor people, and conditions conducive to sustained economic growth were not in place in many countries. The greatest challenge ahead was to ensure that the economic and social dynamism that characterized some areas would spread throughout the region.

In a policy statement, the ESCAP Executive Secretary stated that the Commission's fiftieth anniversary was an occasion to reflect on the future course of ESCAP and on ways to make it more responsive to the needs of the vast region. Continuing efforts were needed to strengthen existing arrangements for regional and subregional economic cooperation, to which ESCAP should contribute by bringing countries together to share experiences and know-how. ESCAP's role in operational activities should meet the needs of the region's disadvantaged economies, and programmes should address more directly the different needs of countries at various stages of development, possibly on a tripartite basis. Citing a new conference structure, the Executive Secretary stated that reforms could enhance the rele-

Asia and the Pacific

The Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific (ESCAP), at its fifty-third vance of ESCAP to its membership and streamline its work. A partnership with civil society was needed, including the private sector and non-governmental organizations (NGOs).

Economic trends

According to a summary of the economic and social survey of Asia and the Pacific [E/1998/13], the slowdown of world trade in 1997, particularly in sectors of major export interest to the developing countries of the region, was a factor in sharply widening the current account balance-of-payments deficits of a number of countries. That and the decline in 1996-1997 in the inflow of capital to developing ESCAP countries were two major elements in the international economic situation that had adversely affected the economies of the region and led some of them into serious crisis. Although the trade slowdown affected most economies, the reduced private sector financial flows affected the East and South-East Asian economies the most, while reduced aid flows impinged most on the least developed and the Pacific island economies. The economic performance of the least developed countries (LDCs) of the region (other than the five in the Pacific) remained relatively strong in 1997. Although growth prospects remained uncertain for some, most had striven to stabilize their economies and to improve medium-to-longer-term growth prospects by implementing stabilization and structural reform measures. In that regard, measures were under way to reduce budget and balance-of-payments deficits, reduce price inflation and improve saving-investment performance through greater mobilization of domestic resources. Trade, investment and financial sector reforms were being carried out to improve overall performance, and the private sector was being encouraged to play a larger and more active role in the saving-investment and production processes.

As for policies for growth and stability, the need for greater regional cooperation had been more urgently felt in the wake of the recent financial crises. So far, there had not been much progress on the proposed Asian fund, which merited serious consideration. Greater regional cooperation was also needed to address financial sector regulation, the setting of common prudential standards for that sector, and an early warning system for the appearance of significant non-performing banking assets or of other financial sector risks. Governments in the region might also explore the feasibility of establishing a private international credit insurance scheme dealing with cross-border financial claims.

Subregional economic performance

In 1997, the economic performance of the Pacific island nations continued to reflect the diversity of their economic structures, resource endowments, level of development and ability to respond to the external and internal shocks to which they were frequently subjected. The 3 per cent growth rate achieved in recent years did not match population growth rates and permitted almost no improvement in living standards. Although some countries had achieved somewhat higher growth rates in 1996 due to improved international prices for several commodities, prospects in 1997 were uncertain because prices for agricultural commodities and primary raw materials on which they substantially depended showed divergent trends.

Most economies of North and Central Asia had reversed the economic decline that had prevailed since the beginning of the 1990s, and they were on the path to positive growth. The Russian Federation recorded positive gross domestic product (GDP) growth in 1997, but Turkmenistan's economy further contracted owing to huge shortfalls in cotton and natural gas production, with spillover effects on the rest of the economy. The recent positive achievements of the region's economies reflected progress towards organizational, institutional and policy reforms started some years earlier to turn those formerly planned economies into modern market economies. The success of economic reform was most visibly reflected in the reduction of inflation rates and the stabilization of interest and exchange rates. With the restoration of stability, those economies were expected to receive further boosts in investment and growth through the year 2000.

In South and South-West Asia, GDP growth was relatively strong and steady, at 6 to 7 per cent in 1996-1997 in India, Iran and Turkey. In Pakistan and Sri Lanka, growth decelerated considerably in 1996, though Sri Lanka was expected to recover in 1997. The overall performance of countries in the subregion was considerably influenced by weather conditions affecting agricultural production, given the still large share of that sector in the economy. Industrial production responded well to recent policy reform and restructuring measures. However, industrial output expansion in many countries was severely constrained by power shortages and other infrastructure weaknesses. Service sectors were more resilient and contributed significantly to overall growth. Increased private sector participation in investment tended to strengthen that area, though investment rates continued to be generally low. Stagnant domestic savings rates and failure to attract foreign capital to any significant extent restrained investment growth. Relatively high rates of inflation prevailed in Iran, Turkey, Pakistan and Sri Lanka. India, on the other hand, succeeded in lowering its inflation rate significantly.

In 1997, the economies of South-East Asia continued to perform strongly, with GDP growth rates only slightly lower than the 1991-1995 average, although Brunei Darussalam, the Philippines and Viet Nam achieved higher growth rates. However, those economies were adversely affected by the significant deceleration in world trade growth in 1996, particularly those sectors of importance to South-East Asian exports. Thailand was among the economies most affected, with its growth rate declining by nearly 2 percentage points, though the economy still registered a GDP growth of 6.7 per cent in 1996. Singapore's growth rate declined from an 8.5 per cent average in the first half of the 1990s to 7 per cent in 1996. The slowdown in GDP growth also highlighted certain weaknesses in the economies, mainly the widening current account deficits during 1994-1996. Since many currencies of the region were linked to the United States dollar, which had appreciated significantly against other major currencies, exports were affected adversely while imports were encouraged. A loss of creditor confidence in the financial system and in the ability of countries to repay debt caused a crisis, which affected a number of countries. Currencies came under serious pressure and were allowed to float during the second half of 1997, starting with the Thai baht in July. After that, currencies floated down precipitously, requiring some countries to negotiate financial assistance packages with the International Monetary Fund (IMF). The economies of China, Hong Kong and Taiwan Province of China were least affected by the financial turmoil in the region, although the latter two suffered bouts of instability. The Chinese yuan renminbi and the Hong Kong dollar remained stable throughout the crisis. The Republic of Korea was by far the worst-affected economy in the East Asian region, and was compelled in November to apply for IMF assistance. In response, IMF organized one of the largest financial rescue packages ever, amounting to $57 billion. For China, prior to the financial turmoil, the principal concern was the need to moderate inflation without overly restraining the momentum of growth.

Of the three developed countries in the region—Australia, Japan and New Zealand—Australia's economic performance remained strong, with GDP growth rates expected to exceed 3 per cent in 1997. Budget and balance-of-payments deficits were reduced, inflation was low and government policies were adjusted to correct some weaknesses in the economy. Japan's economy almost stagnated in 1997 after recovery from a prolonged recession, and New Zealand's slowed to a growth rate of 1.5 per cent in 1997, from a level of above 2 per cent in the previous two years. A demand slump in both countries was a common cause for the slowdown, but the Japanese economy had deeper structural problems and persistent difficulties in the financial sector.

Activities in 1997

ESCAP activities in 1997 were carried out under the six thematic subprogrammes approved by the Commission in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 720]: regional economic cooperation; environment and sustainable development; poverty alleviation through economic growth and social development; transport and communications; statistics; and least developed, landlocked and island developing countries.

Development policy and regional economic cooperation

At its 1997 session, ESCAP considered a secretariat note [E/ESCAP/1045] entitled: "Asia and the Pacific into the twenty-first century: opportunities and challenges for the ESCAP region", which reviewed the ESCAP agenda as it approached the twenty-first century in the light of the emerging globalization and regionalization processes.

The Commission agreed that countries of the region would need to continue to liberalize policies and adapt and adjust to emerging conditions, including through prudent fiscal policies to avoid chronic fiscal deficits; a sound macroeconomic framework; steady investment in infrastructure; a flexible labour market; transparent and consistent legal and regulatory frameworks; and education and training to build up human resources capabilities. ESCAP should continue to provide policy recommendations to developing members and associate members, as well as advisory and technical services, particularly for LDCs, Pacific island States and economies in transition. ESCAP should facilitate the process of strengthening regional cooperation and develop closer relations with multi-channelled and multi-tiered intraregional and interregional cooperation mechanisms in the region. Developing countries should be assisted in developing "soft" infrastructure for trade and investment, including administrative and legal regimes. The Commission supported the ESCAP/Economic Commission for Europe (ECE) initiative to assist Central Asian economies and a joint ESCAP/ECE special programme for those economies.

The Commission recommended that ESCAP continue to accord high priority to the integration of LDCs, Pacific island economies and transition economies into the regional flows of trade and investment. Developed and more dynamic countries of the region should promote private capital flows to disadvantaged groups of countries within the context of industrial restructuring and relocation. Regional cooperation would help to reduce the gap in socio-economic development within and among countries and areas. Resources should be channelled to social investments to ensure sustained development and more equitable distribution of development benefits among all population groups, especially the poor, women and other disadvantaged and vulnerable groups. An efficient intra-Asian land-based transport system was needed to facilitate trade, investment and tourism flows. Priority should be given to the Asian land transport infrastructure development project in the New Delhi Action Plan on Infrastructure Development (see below), as well as to environment and natural resources development and management. Agenda 21, adopted by the 1992 Conference on Environment and Development [YUN 1992, p. 672], should be implemented with renewed vigour, with assistance directed to members and associate members through studies, advisory services, training, exchange of experience, institutional networking and twinning of institutions in developed and developing countries. ESCAP should develop a framework to chart the direction of its future work on development cooperation in the region in the twenty-first century.

The Commission had before it reports on the third session of the Committee on Poverty Alleviation through Economic Growth and Social Development [E/ESCAP/1055]; the implementation of resolutions and decisions relating to poverty alleviation through economic growth and social development [E/ESCAP/1056]; and the Regional Coordination Centre for Research and Development of Coarse Grains, Pulses, Roots and Tuber Crops in the Humid Tropics of Asia and the Pacific [E/ESCAP/1057].

The Commission recommended that ESCAP continue to assist Governments in implementing the Agenda for Action on Social Development in the ESCAP Region [YUN 1994, p. 714] so as to enhance social development policies and programmes. Support to Governments should be strengthened in the targeting of programmes for social protection for the poor and in the decentralization of the social sector through partnerships with local-level organizations, and in devising an integrated and holistic approach to poverty alleviation, especially through studies on the social impact of development projects. A regional strategy or programme of action on poverty alleviation should be adopted. Women's issues should be integrated into each subprogramme and the ESCAP secretariat should mainstream gender perspectives in all its policies and programmes without marginalizing the women's sector in the process of UN reform. Education, training and employment for the rural and urban poor, women, youth and other marginalized social groups should be promoted, particularly in the least developed and landlocked countries. National youth policies and programmes should focus on skills development and productive employment. Ways should be sought to promote the Agenda for Action for the Asian and Pacific Decade of Disabled Persons, 1993-2002. Implementation of regional guidelines was needed to promote non-handicapping environments for disabled and elderly persons. Research should be conducted on the root causes of poverty, including an inter-country policy analysis of various poverty alleviation strategies.

The Committee for Regional Economic Cooperation, at its sixth session (Bangkok, 12-14 March) [E/ESCAP/1049], recommended: the development of discussion papers on various aspects of trade efficiency; assistance in evolving national strategies for human resources development in information technology, in providing computer education and training for youth in the least developed and island economies, and in promoting the use of information technology by small and medium-sized industries; and in-depth studies of cross-border trade.

Senior policy makers and managers from the public and private sectors should be made more aware of regional linkages in trade and finance through studies and advisory and training services, including technical cooperation among developing countries (TCDC) arrangements. Priority should be given to promoting technology flows to developing countries, developing country access to new and advanced technologies, technological partnering, and using technology as a vehicle for poverty alleviation. In cooperation with the Asian and Pacific Centre for Transfer of Technology, ESCAP should prepare an inventory of environmentally sound technologies and implement the recommendations of the 1996 Seminar on Poverty Alleviation through Technological Capacity-building. Developing countries should be assisted to accede to the World Trade Organization (WTO) and to evolve a shared proactive agenda for further trade liberalization.

The Commission, in endorsing the report of the Committee, supported ESCAP initiatives in trade efficiency in air cargo movement, information technology and cross-border trade and transactions. Regional economic cooperation was needed in response to globalization and liberalization, and in trade investment; science and technology, including information technology; and human resources development. Recognizing the importance of subregional cooperation in spreading the growth momentum and accelerating socio-economic development, the Commission requested continued efforts to promote inter-subregional linkages, particularly between North-East and South-East Asia. Discussion papers should be developed on various aspects of trade efficiency, and expert meetings organized on electronic commerce, including electronic data exchange; adoption of standards; laws and regulations on electronic commerce; and trade process re-engineering to simplify trade procedures in the region. In promoting regional cooperation in information technology, ESCAP should concentrate on human resources development, use of information technology by small and medium-sized industries, technology-blending and computer education and training for youth in least developed and island developing economies. Technical assistance to developing countries should support trade liberalization, particularly in the context of multilateralism and WTO, and studies should be undertaken on the relationship between multilateral environmental agreements, particularly those requiring the transfer of environmentally sound technologies to developing countries, and WTO agreements, such as the Agreement on Trade-related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights.

Least developed, landlocked and island developing countries

The Commission endorsed the report of the Special Body on Least Developed and Landlocked Developing Countries on its third session (Bangkok, 21-22 April) [E/ESCAP/1064]. It noted the structural adjustment programmes and steps towards economic reform undertaken by LDCs. Domestic resources had been mobilized, the effectiveness of the public sector had been enhanced, and greater opportunities for the private sector had been provided. Sustainable economic growth required coordinated design and implementation of macroeconomic policies by key government institutions. There was a need to strengthen the capability of the central bank, the ministry of finance and the planning body, and human resources development programmes were required for that purpose. Further attention should be devoted to those LDCs facing additional constraints in trade and investment and industrial and infrastructure development because they were landlocked, which placed additional burdens on them in terms of transport costs and hazards. ESCAP should intensify efforts to implement and monitor programmes to address the specific problems of the least developed and landlocked developing countries, including the economic policy framework, external trade and investment, foreign direct investment, external finance and management of external debt.

Special problems of Pacific island countries

The Special Body on Pacific Island Developing Countries, at its fourth session (Bangkok, 18-19 April) [E/ESCAP/1063], adopted a set of conclusions and recommendations on the implications of recent developments for the trade and investment of Pacific islands and the coordination of development policy management. Particular attention was paid to problems facing small island States considering WTO membership, principally concerning the burden of payment of dues in relation to the size of the domestic economy, the limited human resources available to analyse the agreements and ensuing obligations, and the substantial changes in domestic laws required to execute those obligations. The economies of the Pacific island States had to become more competitive as their protection through preferential agreements eroded and as they undertook efforts to expand and diversify export products and markets. There was a call for greater exchange of experience between the Pacific and Asia, including through economic cooperation among developing countries (ECDC)/TCDC programmes and projects. The Special Body recommended wider discussion of issues raised in the area of coordination of development policy management and endorsed the programme of work for 1998-1999.

In endorsing the Special Body's report, the Commission recognized that Pacific island countries would continue to rely on international assistance as they made adjustments to their economies, and urged international agencies and donors to continue their aid. It also recognized that Pacific island countries would continue to require assistance on WTO issues and underlined the need for coordination among concerned agencies in that regard. ESCAP played a vital role as a bridge between Pacific island countries and Asian economies, especially in facilitating the sharing of development experience, such as in management development policy, trade and investment. TCDC and other tripartite arrangements were a useful means of achieving that objective. Pacific island countries should make more use of the training facilities and other programmes available to them.

Economic and technical cooperation

In 1997, ESCAP received $22.18 million in contributions for technical cooperation activities—$7.9 million from within the UN system, $13.01 million from bilateral donors and developing members and associate members, and $1.27 million from other organizations. The total was a decrease of some $ 1.08 million from the previous year. Australia, Finland, France, Germany, Japan, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United States were the largest contributors among developed nations, while China and the Republic of Korea were the largest contributors among developing member countries. In addition to cash contributions, donors and developing members provided 336 work-months of services. During the year, 92 technical assistance projects were initiated, with a value of $8.2 million.

Technical cooperation among developing countries

The Commission considered a secretariat document [E/ESCAP/1069] on progress in the implementation of TCDC/ECDC activities and the obstacles encountered, as well as extrabudgetary-funded technical cooperation activities and the resource constraints experienced by ESCAP in promoting those activities. A number of TCDC focal points were not very active in some countries and did not exist in some Pacific island countries, contributing to the lack of awareness of TCDC opportunities and of those implemented for their benefit. In other cases, a lack of commitment to TCDC by the least developed, landlocked and island developing countries resulted in the inadequate provision of human and financial resources for TCDC activities. ESCAP held workshops for TCDC national focal points from selected Pacific island developing countries and for selected LDCs and disadvantaged economies in transition to sensitize them to TCDC and its benefits. In 1997, ESCAP signed a memorandum of understanding with Singapore for a third-country training programme. Negotiations were taking place for a similar arrangement with Malaysia.

The Commission urged the strengthening of ESCAP's TCDC programme to realize the potential of TCDC/ECDC in the promotion of the socioeconomic development. Priority requirements of the Pacific island countries should be taken into account when organizing future training programmes for those countries.

Transport and communications

Transport and Communications Decade for Asia and the Pacific

The Commission had before it a secretariat note [E/ESCAP/1059] containing an evaluation of phase II (1992-1996) of the Transport and Communications Decade for Asia and the Pacific, proclaimed by the General Assembly in resolution 39/227 [YUN 1984, p. 624] and extended in 1991 [YUN 1991, p. 312].

The evaluation revealed that the Decade's programme of action was beyond the practical capabilities of ESCAP, and the decision to limit the second phase of the Decade to a regional action programme was a step in the right direction. There was a lack of coordination between ESCAP and UN agencies in developing a common approach, with the result that each agency identified and selected projects without reference to Decade objectives. In addition, coordination meetings and meetings of ministers responsible for transport and communications were not held. ESCAP's programme did not fully reflect the objectives of the Decade; however, implementation of its regional action programme during phase I (1985-1989) had been fairly successful. Substantive activities had been successfully implemented and, in some sectors, quality of outputs was high. Considerable progress was also achieved during phase II, but the scope and pace of implementation had been seriously affected during the last two years by a shortfall and uncertainty of resources from the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). A number of proposals were made to implement effectively the regional action programme of the New Delhi Action Plan on Infrastructure Development in Asia and the Pacific.

The Commission, in endorsing those recommendations, strongly urged that "lessons learned" be kept in mind. To ensure greater involvement, ownership and commitment by member Governments, projects should involve selected countries that had a matching national project or activity fitting the objectives of regional projects. Implementing agencies should be responsible for regional aspects, and member countries for country-level activities. The Commission expressed concern over the reduced level of financial support for the regional action programme and urged UNDP, other international organizations and agencies and all countries to give high priority to the Action Plan in their assistance programmes.

Infrastructure and communications

The Commission endorsed the recommendations of the 1996 Ministerial Conference on Infrastructure [YUN 1996, p. 894], including the New Delhi Declaration on Infrastructure Development in Asia and the Pacific, and the activities planned for phase I (1997-2001) of the regional action programme approved by the Conference.

It reiterated its support for the Asia land transport infrastructure development (ALTID) project as a priority item in the New Delhi Action Plan and its commitment to intra-Asia and Asia-Europe land bridges. Other projects that should be carried out as soon as possible included: the development of a container transport demonstration project in the northern corridor of the Trans-Asian Railway routes; a study on Trans-Asian Railway development in the southern corridor of Asia-Europe routes; and studies on the road network linking China, Kazakhstan, Mongolia, the Russian Federation and the Korean peninsula, and on Trans-Asian Railway development in north-south corridors. The importance of developing national programmes in support of the ALTID project was also stressed. Transit facilities to least developed and landlocked countries should be accorded high priority. ESCAP should assist member States in developing a comprehensive, integrated and interactive approach to policy development in traffic, transport and infrastructure aimed at sustainable transport, enhancing economic growth, controlling mobility and preserving nature and the environment. To make the Asia Infrastructure Development Alliance more effective, ESCAP should play an active role in its functioning and encourage more countries to join it. The Commission noted the increasing commitment of member Governments towards creating a more commercial environment in the transport sector through enhancing productivity and increasing the participation of the private sector. High priority should be accorded to inland water transport and coastal shipping.

Tourism

The Commission reaffirmed the important role of tourism in the socio-economic development of the Asian and Pacific region, and endorsed the recommendations and decisions of the 1996 Intergovernmental Meeting on Tourism Development [YUN 1996, p. 899]. It noted the suggestion that those recommendations and decisions should be translated into a plan of action as a framework for member countries to cooperate and promote tourism. The Commission supported the Meeting's view that tourism should be given high priority in the ESCAP programme and included in the title of the subprogramme on transport and communications. It also supported activities to promote sustainable tourism development and requested ESCAP to place special emphasis on activities related to the economic impact of tourism, environmental management of tourism development, infrastructure development and investment, human resources development in the tourism sector, facilitation of travel to expand intraregional tourism, and regional and subregional promotion of tourism, with specific emphasis on areas not dealt with adequately by other organizations.

Noting that Malaysia had completed a long-term plan on ecotourism development, the Commission recommended that ESCAP should, in collaboration with the World Tourism Organization, encourage national plans to protect and preserve the environment while promoting tourism. It stressed the importance of promoting ecotourism and tourism linked to historical and cultural heritage. Particular attention should be given to the specific needs of countries in an early stage of tourism development, as well as to Pacific island countries. The Commission requested that the secretariat strengthen its catalytic role in promoting TCDC in tourism, as well as its working relationships with the World Tourism Organization and other organizations involved in tourism, to avoid duplication of effort. Donors should support the implementation of the New Delhi Action Plan on Infrastructure Development in Asia and the Pacific, particularly activities prioritized by member countries. The Commission agreed that the Committee on Transport and Communications should be renamed the Committee on Transport, Communications, Tourism and Infrastructure Development.

Industrial and technological development

The Commission considered a report [E/ESCAP/1078] on institutional framework and policy dialogue to promote industrial restructuring in the Asian and Pacific region. It described developments relating to implementing the recommendation of the 1992 Seoul Plan of Action for Promoting Industrial Restructuring in Asia and the Pacific [YUN 1992, p. 486] for the creation of a facility to conduct a dialogue to promote industrial restructuring in the region. The consensus seemed to suggest that there was no need for a new institutional mechanism or body to perform the function of a regional forum, and that an informal forum could be set up and serviced by the ESCAP secretariat within existing resources.

The Committee for Regional Economic Cooperation, at its sixth session (Bangkok, 12-14 March) [E/ESCAP/1049], discussed the establishment of an informal forum and concluded that its terms of reference were too broad and needed revision.

The Commission emphasized the importance of industrial restructuring in promoting international competitiveness and regional integration, and stressed that an informal regional forum to promote industrial restructuring could play a useful role in promoting dialogue among policy makers, private sector representatives and professional experts and could serve to supplement national efforts in implementing structural changes in the industrial sector. Non-polluting and environmentally sound industrial relocation should be promoted. Governments should switch from a reactive to a proactive approach, creating regulatory and incentive regimes to induce industrial enterprises to evaluate alternative production techniques while undertaking restructuring. The Commission supported a proposed pilot project in three countries to demonstrate how industrial restructuring could be effected in small and medium-sized enterprises and agro-based industries through integrated environmentally sound technology transfer services.

The Commission also considered a report [E/ESCAP/1071] on the 1996 activities of the Asian and Pacific Development Centre (Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia).

Natural resources

Mineral resources

The Commission considered the report of the Coordinating Committee for Coastal and Off-shore Geoscience Programmes in East and Southeast Asia (CCOP) [E/ESCAP/1072].

CCOP had made significant progress in developing the human resources and technology of its member countries for geoscientific advancement, particularly in the areas of energy, minerals, coastal zones and geohazards. In the energy sector, projects related to resource evaluation and planning, reservoir management and pre-Tertiary geology had been initiated. In the mineral sector, efforts continued towards training in the application of computer technology to regional map compilation and interpretation of geoscientific data. The Programme on Geoscience for Integrated Coastal Zone Management and Development of Southeast and East Asian Coastal Zones, launched in 1995, continued to make significant progress, with the holding of roving seminars and task force meetings. In the geohazard sector, attention was focused on natural hazard mitigation and prevention.

The Commission noted the strong commitment of CCOP member countries and the support of cooperating countries and organizations. It also noted that the financial position of CCOP had improved considerably. Cooperating countries should continue to provide technical expertise to enhance human resources development related to geosciences in the region.

Mekong River Basin

The Commission had before it a secretariat note [E/ESCAP/1073] transmitting the report of the Mekong River Commission (MRC), established in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1017]. The Commission noted that MRC was continuing to shift from national to Basin-wide or regional priorities, and to carry out its work following a programmatic and strategic approach, with the future formulation of the Mekong Basin development plan as a planning tool. The plan was to be a comprehensive one, with a broad vision on many aspects to guide water management activities. UNDP and other international agencies and donor countries should provide increasing financial and technical support to MRC, so that the development of the water and related resources of the Mekong River Basin could continue well into the future.

Agriculture and rural development

The Commission considered a report on the Regional Coordination Centre for Research and Development of Coarse Grains, Pulses, Roots and Tuber Crops in the Humid Tropics of Asia and the Pacific [E/ESCAP/1057]. Major developments in 1996 were summarized, as were issues calling for action by the Commission. Implementation of programmes in 1996, planned activities for 1997 and the financial status of the Centre were discussed.

The Commission recommended strengthening Centre activities to achieve poverty alleviation through the establishment of a network with national, regional and international agricultural research and development institutes and organizations. Research and development should take place on agricultural diversification, sustainability of upland agriculture, market development of upland crops, and effects of trade liberalization on agriculture. The Centre should conduct workshops and training courses to advance socio-economic studies and policy formulation in agriculture.

The Commission expressed concern over the continuing fragile condition of the institutional support resources; a substantial increase in the contributions of members and associate members was needed, as well as timely payment of such contributions. Expert services should be provided by Governments, donor agencies and partner institutes, preferably in the form of non-reimbursable loans.

The Commission also considered a report on the Regional Network for Agricultural Machinery (RNAM) for the period April 1996 to April 1997 [E/ESCAP/1077]. The Commission noted RNAM activities on testing of post-harvest and food-processing technologies for rural women; training of trainers for entrepreneurship so that rural women could operate small agribusinesses; operation, repair and maintenance of agricultural machinery; a regional workshop on databases for agricultural machinery; and blacksmithing courses in selected LDCs.

RNAM should assist participating countries in developing appropriate machines for rice transplanting, as well as for soil and water conservation, and in holding regional agricultural machinery exhibitions and symposia.

Science and technology

The Commission considered a report on the Asian and Pacific Centre for Transfer of Technology [E/ESCAP/1051], expressing appreciation for its activities in support of technology-related institutions, intermediaries and enterprises in upgrading their indigenous capabilities, especially for the transfer of environmentally sound technologies to small and medium-sized enterprises. It recognized that the Centre had been working in partnership with the private sector and urged it to continue that effort on a fee-charging basis. It noted the Centre's activities in environmental management and urged it to further assist small and medium-sized enterprises in adopting International Organization for Standardization 9000 and 14000 concepts, including life-cycle assessment and eco-labelling. It proposed that the Mechanism for Exchange of Technology Information (METI) network should cover aspects of clean technologies and that national data banks and networks should be connected to the Centre's METI database. The Centre should strengthen activities to promote technology management, evaluation, assessment and the licensing of technology, as well as promote research and development, and cooperation among enterprises to blend indigenous and imported technologies. Participating countries should consider the secondment of professional staff to the Centre, increase efforts to meet its institutional costs and establish an endowment fund.

Social development

The Commission noted progress made by ESCAP in implementing its resolution 51/4 [YUN 1995, p. 1020] in the context of the Programme of Action of the 1995 World Summit for Social Development [YUN 1995, p. 1115].

The Commission stressed the need for cross-border collaboration to prevent HIV/AIDS and other communicable diseases, including the development of an area-specific information system and effective community-based prevention strategies.

ESCAP was working to strengthen organizations of disabled people and to promote their participation in the development process. It was including gender dimensions in implementing the Agenda for Action for the Asian and Pacific Decade of Disabled Persons, 1993-2002 [YUN 1993, p. 621]. The ESCAP Guidelines for the Promotion of Non-handicapping Environments for Disabled Persons were being promoted, and a regional publication was being prepared on indigenous production and distribution of devices to assist people with disabilities. ESCAP was also facilitating the Decade-focused work of the Regional Inter-agency Committee for Asia and the Pacific Subcommittee on Disability-related Concerns. A meeting of senior officials to mark the mid-point of the Decade was held in Seoul, Republic of Korea, from 26 to 29 September.

A regional network of national centres of excellence for human resources development research and training had been launched, and national and local organizations were providing literacy training for women. An expert group meeting to review phase III of the Jakarta Plan of Action on Human Resources Development in the ESCAP Region [YUN 1988, p. 282] was held in Bangkok in March.

The Fifth Asian and Pacific Ministerial Conference on Social Development (Manila, Philippines, 5-11 November) [E/ESCAP/1096] reviewed progress achieved towards attaining the goals and targets of the Agenda for Action on Social Development in the ESCAP Region, in the context of the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development. While acknowledging the progress and continuous efforts made by many countries in poverty alleviation, employment generation and social integration, it noted with concern the social challenges that remained. It noted the "Message to Manila", issued at the NGO Forum on Social Development in Asia and the Pacific (Kuala Lumpur, September). The Conference recognized the social development repercussions of international economic volatility and agreed that the impact of the financial crisis in some parts of the region on the population at large should be monitored. Also, steps should be taken to ensure that social development targets and goals were not adversely affected by corrective economic measures being undertaken or planned. Proposals were made for national action and regional cooperation to accelerate implementation of the Agenda for Action in the light of current and emerging social development challenges in the region.

The Conference adopted the Manila Declaration on Accelerated Implementation of the Agenda for Action on Social Development in the ESCAP Region. Annexed to the Declaration were recommendations for national action on planning and target-setting, mobilizing enablers and institutional support, mobilizing resources, capacity-building through human resources development, and monitoring and evaluation, as well as for regional and international action in support of national action and for follow-up action.

Children and youth

The Commission adopted a resolution [E/1997/38 (res. 53/4)], in which it encouraged member and associate member Governments to mobilize their agencies and civil society in combating sexual exploitation and sexual abuse of children and youth in their respective countries and in tourist destinations. They were also encouraged to suggest areas for technical cooperation programme development and implementation, including enforcement practices in combating prostitution and trafficking in children and youth; to encourage the tourism industry in their respective countries to adopt mechanisms to prevent sex tourism involving children and youth; and to pay attention to the deterrence and punishment of sexual exploiters of children and youth. Under the principle that a crime against a child anywhere should be a crime everywhere, as recommended by the Amsterdam Child Labour Conference (February 1997), all member States should ensure that sexual abuse and exploitation of children and youth were never tolerated and should take action to prosecute sexual exploiters of children and youth. Programmes and projects should be implemented to take into account the best interests of children and youth and to promote the protection of their rights, in accordance with international standards and agreements. Donor Governments and agencies should be encouraged to prevent the sexual exploitation and sexual abuse of children and youth, and to assist victims of such exploitation and abuse in reintegrating into communities and families, obtaining access to education, health and social services, and developing skills for alternative means of livelihood.

The Commission requested an inventory of data on the commercial sexual exploitation and sexual abuse of children and youth in the region, the extent and measures taken to stop the practice, and the range of health and social services available to them. The Commission requested the Executive Secretary to enhance the capabilities of social service and health personnel, through relevant gender-sensitive training, in assisting young victims of sexual exploitation and abuse in being reintegrated into society.

Women in development

On 30 April, the Commission adopted a resolution [E/1997/38 (res. 53/2)] on the implementation of the 1995 Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action for the advancement of women [YUN 1995, p. 1170]. Members and associate members were asked to accelerate implementation of the Declaration and Platform for Action in coordination with the Jakarta Declaration and Plan of Action for the Advancement of Women in Asia and the Pacific [YUN 1994, p. 716] by: strengthening national machineries for the advancement of women to enhance their role in mainstreaming a gender perspective into national plans and policies, policy formulation and planning, monitoring and evaluation, and in information and communications; and preparing and implementing national strategies and plans of action for the Platform for Action. They should enhance cooperation, collaboration and partnership among all levels of government and civil society, including NGOs and community-based organizations. The Commission urged donor countries, the private sector, funding agencies and regional and international financial institutions to assist developing countries, particularly the least developed, landlocked and island developing economies and the disadvantaged economies in transition, to implement both declarations and action plans.

The Commission requested the Executive Secretary to implement the recommendations on strengthening regional mechanisms adopted at the 1996 Regional Meeting on Strengthening National Machineries for the Advancement of Women and to convene a regional meeting of national machineries for the advancement of women every two years. Viet Nam would be asked to host the 1998 meeting. The Executive Secretary should continue to: promote measures to alleviate and eradicate the feminization of poverty, particularly by increasing access to productive resources, capacity-building, empowerment and social mobilization; convene, in cooperation with relevant UN agencies, a regional conference on trafficking in women and children; and promote TCDC by urging developing countries in Asia and the Pacific to contribute resources to accelerate the implementation of the Platform for Action.

Environment and sustainable development

The Commission, in 1997, endorsed the report of the Committee on Environment and Sustainable Development on its third session (Bangkok, 7-11 October 1996) [E/ESCAP/1052], which focused on a review of implementation in the ESCAP region of the outcome of the UN Conference on Environment and Development [YUN 1992, p. 670]. The Commission noted that considerable progress had been achieved in the Asian and Pacific region, at national and regional levels, in the implementation of Agenda 21. However, it noted that the lack of adequate financial resource allocation and of significant progress in the transfer of environmentally sound technologies and capacity-building were the main constraints to the implementation of Agenda 21 and the achievement of sustainable development.

While technology transfer had been implemented by the public and private sectors, Governments of developed and developing countries could assist in that process through workshops, demonstration projects, training, and developing strategies for ongoing commercial activities, as well as by specific incentives and policies, fiscal or otherwise, to transfer environmentally sound technologies to developing countries. In relation to building local capacity, more attention should be given to technology cooperation and partnerships between developed and developing countries and to promoting and using environmentally sound indigenous technologies and related knowledge that existed in developing countries of the region. The Commission concluded that further efforts should be made to increase levels of official development assistance. New and additional financial resources should be provided, and full implementation of Agenda 21's recommendations on technology transfer was urged. The Commission encouraged private sector participation for investment in infrastructure development and community participation to ensure that the poor had access to and could afford safe drinking water. The Commission called for more effective integrated water resources development and management practices and economic measures for more efficient use of water resources, including appropriate water-pricing policies and reuse of waste water. It expressed concern over the trend of increasing pollution of freshwater resources from various uses, especially in rapidly expanding urban areas and by industries.

The Commission observed that, owing to resource constraints, fossil fuels, particularly coal, would be used increasingly in many countries, resulting in environmental problems such as air and water pollution and waste disposal. An environmental plan, including the application of clean-coal technology, should be implemented. ESCAP should strengthen its activities, including TCDC, in new and renewable sources of energy.

The Commission recommended strengthening the framework of policies related to mineral resources development and management, including the promotion of private sector participation, and urged assistance to member countries in formulating and implementing effective policies and programmes to ensure a sustainable mineral supply. The Commission expressed support of ESCAP initiatives in promoting sub-regional cooperation in mineral resource assessment and development in North-East Asia, and urged the secretariat to continue those activities. It also supported training and guidance in the formulation of environmental impact assessment guidelines and policies.

Recognizing natural disaster reduction as an integral part of sustainable development, the Commission recommended that further national and regional efforts should be directed to enhancing preparedness and natural disaster reduction activities.

The Commission also considered a report [E/ESCAP/1053] on environment and sustainable development. It reviewed progress achieved in implementing the recommendations of the Beijing Ministerial Conference on Space Applications for Development in Asia and the Pacific [YUN1994,p.713] and the 1996 Commission resolution [YUN1996,p.907] on the third Ministerial Conference on Environment and Development in Asia and the Pacific [YUN 1995, p. 1023].

The Commission expressed satisfaction that the results of the Space Applications Conference were being translated into concrete actions at the national and regional levels and had had a tangible impact on national capacity-building in that area, and urged support for implementation of the Regional Space Applications Programme for Sustainable Development. UNDP was asked to support regional cooperative projects on integrated applications of space technologies. Early preparations should be made for the second Ministerial Conference on Space Applications for Sustainable Development in Asia and the Pacific, to be convened in 1999.

To promote implementation of the Regional Action Programme for Environmentally Sound and Sustainable Development, 1996-2000, action projects should be launched in conformity with the diverse natural, social and economic conditions of the region, enabling countries to participate and benefit in the process. Governments were urged to support regional and subregional projects to strengthen national capacity-building. ESCAP should integrate environmental considerations into its overall programme of work and develop ways to assess the environmental impact of development projects.

In a 30 April resolution [E/1997/38 des. 53/3], the Commission welcomed the Framework for the North-East Asian Subregional Programme of Environmental Cooperation, adopted in 1996 at the third Meeting of Senior Officials on Environmental Cooperation in North-East Asia [YUN 1996, p. 908]. ESCAP, in collaboration with UNDP, the United Nations Environment Programme, the World Bank and the Asian Development Bank, should promote subregional environmental cooperation in North-East Asia, inter alia, by supporting implementation of the Framework and approved priority projects.

Natural disasters

Having reviewed the annual report of the Typhoon Committee [E/ESCAP/1074], the Commission noted its progress in the meteorological and hydrological areas, disaster prevention and preparedness, and training and research. It expressed support for a regional seminar on flood risk analysis and mapping. UNDP, the World Meteorological Organization and ESCAP should continue to support the Typhoon Committee, as should other donors, agencies and countries. Members of the Typhoon Committee were invited to make more extensive use of the TCDC programme for the exchange of expertise on various aspects of natural disaster reduction.

The thirteenth session of the Typhoon Committee was held in Hong Kong, China, from 25 November to 1 December.

Statistics

ESCAP, in 1997, endorsed the report of the Committee on Statistics on its tenth session [YUN 1996, p. 909], including strengthening the Committee's institutional structure, new terms of reference for its bureau and its endeavours to intensify interaction with the UN Statistical Commission (see PART THREE, Chapter XV).

The Commission noted that its operational activities in statistics had played an important role in enhancing the national statistical capacity of developing countries. It was suggested that the design of specific technical cooperation activities should take into account the shifting priorities and requirements in the countries of the region. The Commission endorsed the recommendations of the Working Group of Statistical Experts at its ninth session [YUN 1996, p. 908], including that the scope and pace of implementation of the 1993 System of National Accounts should depend on national needs and capabilities. It noted the shortage of personnel trained in national accounts in some countries, and welcomed efforts to develop subregional training workshops on the concepts of the application of the System. The Commission concurred with the Committee's observation that the definition and measurement of poverty were country-specific. Efforts should therefore be focused on providing national policy makers with relevant, high-quality information rather than on formulating internationally comparable definitions.

The Commission reaffirmed its support for the ESCAP Statistical Information System and urged the secretariat to allocate resources for making the System operational and accessible to member countries as soon as possible. The Commission urged the use of the ESCAP World Wide Web site to disseminate statistical information. Noting that the adoption of the latest technology was severely hampered in many countries by the unavailability of skilled personnel, the Commission urged the secretariat and the Statistical Institute for Asia and the Pacific to provide more training and advice on information technology applications in statistics.

In 1997, the Working Group of Statistical Experts held its tenth session (Bangkok, 11-14 November); the ESCAP Working Party on the Application of New Technology to Population Data met for the first time (Bangkok, 24-26 September); a Seminar on the Use of International Comparison Programme Data was held (Beijing, 16-20 June); and a UN Statistics Division/ESCAP/ILO Workshop on Statistics on the Informal Sector (Bangkok, 12-16 May) took place.

The Commission also considered a report [E/ESCAP/1062] on the Statistical Institute for Asia and the Pacific, which covered activities and issues of concern, and its financial status, as well as a summary of the second session of its Governing Board (Bangkok, 20-21 November 1996). The Board had endorsed the recommendations of a task force, established by it to chart the future direction of the Institute.

The Commission asked the Institute to expand its training programme and to train trainers in statistics and data processing. In particular, it noted the importance of assisting the least developed, landlocked and island developing countries and economies in transition. The importance of training in such areas as social statistics and poverty estimation to improve the quality of human development indicators was stressed. The Institute should also play a central role in training statisticians in the region in the use of information technology and the development of databases, the Commission stated.

Programme and organizational questions

The Commission reviewed the implementation of the 1996-1997 programme of work [E/ESCAP/1065 & Corr.1] and endorsed changes to that programme for 1997 [E/ESCAP/1066]. It proposed that future programme planning provide for an assessment of implemented activities, objective markers be established to facilitate their evaluation, and future reports include data on regular budget and extrabudgetary resources and outputs delivered from previous years for comparative analysis.

Noting that in 1996 more than 30 per cent of regular budget work-months had been used to produce technical publications, the Commission suggested that those resources might be put to better use if redeployed to technical assistance activities such as training and advisory services. Further examination of the quality and relevance of publications was encouraged.

The Commission endorsed the draft programme of work for 1998-1999 [E/ESCAP/1067 & Corr.1]. It said the secretariat should analyse the challenges faced by the poorer countries of the region, particularly the least developed, landlocked and island developing countries, in gaining access to external private capital flows. A workshop on future regional trading arrangements within the overall framework of WTO should be arranged.

Conference structure

The Commission considered the recommendations of the independent review [E/ESCAP/1047] of ESCAP's conference structure, conducted by the Advisory Committee of Permanent Representatives and Other Representatives Designated by Members of the Commission (ACPR), pursuant to the Commission's 1996 request [YUN 1996, p. 910], as well as the report [E/ESCAP/1048 & Corr.1] of the Regional Preparatory Meeting on the Review of the Conference Structure of the Commission (Bangkok, 24-28 February 1997). Proposed changes were considered by the Commission in April, with a view to improving its functioning, including thematic priorities and subsidiary structure. General and specific recommendations were made regarding Commission sessions; subsidiary committees, together with proposed guidelines for their terms of reference; ministerial and other intergovernmental meetings; resource allocation and prioritization of activities; regional institutions subsidiary to the Commission; and the role of ACPR.

The Commission endorsed the recommendations of the Meeting. The terms of reference of the committees should be flexible to enable ESCAP to respond to new demands and adjust its priorities in the light of the region's rapidly changing economic and social circumstances. The reform should be ongoing within the framework of UN reform. Regular reviews would contribute to ascertaining the relevance of the work of the Commission to the requirements of members and associate members, and provide opportunities for further adjustments in the functions of the Commission and its committees.

On 30 April, the Commission adopted a resolution on the restructuring of its conference Structure [E/1997/38 (res. 53/1)].

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 18 July [meeting 34], the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of ESCAP [E/1997/40/Add.1], adopted resolution 1997/4 without vote [agenda item 10].

Restructuring the conference structure of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling resolutions 143(XXX) of 5 April 1974, 210(XXXVI) of 29 March 1980, 262(XLIII) of 30 April 1987, 47/3 of 10 April 1991 and 51/3 of 1 May 1995 of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific on the conference structure of the Commission,

Recalling also General Assembly resolution 50/11 of 2 November 1995 on multilingualism, in particular paragraphs 1, 5 and 6 thereof,

Recalling further Commission resolution 48/2 of 23 April 1992 on restructuring the conference structure of the Commission, in particular the decision of the Commission to review its conference structure, including its thematic priorities and its subsidiary structure, no later than at the fifty-third session of the Commission,

Cognizant of General Assembly resolution 50/227 of 24 May 1996 on further measures for the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields,

Reaffirming that the complexity of the development problems faced by the countries in the Asia and Pacific region, in particular the developing countries, increasingly demands that these problems be tackled in a comprehensive manner through interdisciplinary and intersectoral action,

Recognizing the increased responsibilities of the Commission, which comprises a geographical area containing 62 per cent of the population of the world and includes many developing country members and associate members, among which are least developed, landlocked and island developing countries and countries with economies in transition, which have special needs,

Recognizing also that the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the Commission provides a historic opportunity for the Commission to bring about the wide participation of its members and associate members and to sharpen the focus of its work to enable it to respond more effectively to the evolving economic and social needs of the members and associate members within a rapidly changing global paradigm, including the changing scope of regional cooperation, by utilizing fully the multidisciplinary advantage of the Commission and its increased capability in technical assistance activities,

Noting the comparative advantage of the Commission as the most representative body for the Asia and Pacific region in carrying out its role as the main general economic and social development centre of the United Nations system for the Asia and Pacific region,

Having considered the recommendations of the Regional Preparatory Meeting on the Review of the Conference Structure of the Commission, held at Bangkok from 24 to 28 February 1997,

1. Decides to revise the conference structure of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, including its thematic and subsidiary structure, to conform to the following pattern:

1. The Commission

The Commission shall meet annually, each session comprising a senior officials' segment followed by a ministerial segment, for up to a maximum of seven working days to discuss and decide upon important issues concerning economic and social development in the region, to decide upon the recommendations of its subsidiary bodies and of the Executive Secretary, to examine and approve the programme of work and priorities and to take any other decisions required, in conformity with its terms of reference.

2. Subsidiary structure

The conference structure of the Commission should consist of the following five committees, which should meet at the intervals and for the maximum duration indicated below:

Committees	Periodicity	Maximum duration
Regional Economic Cooperation	Biennial	Three days
Socio-economic Measures to Alleviate Poverty in Rural and Urban Areas	Annual	Three days
Environment and Natural Resources Development	Annual	Three days
Transport, Communications, Tourism and Infrastructure Development	Annual	Three days
Statistics	Biennial	Three days

The Special Body on Least Developed and Landlocked Developing Countries and the Special Body on Pacific Island Developing Countries should be retained and reinvigorated. The sessions of the Special Bodies should be held for a maximum of two days biennially, one each in alternate years, back-to-back with the annual sessions of the Commission.

In order to facilitate its work, the Committee on Regional Economic Cooperation shall have a high-level Steering Group, which shall meet annually for a maximum of three days. The Steering Group shall set its own agenda and organize its own work procedures under the overall direction of the Committee.

3. Ad hoc ministerial conferences

(a) Subject to the approval of the Commission, ad hoc ministerial conferences on specific issues may be organized, but starting in 1998 no more than one such conference should be held per year;

(b) In those years when a ministerial conference is held to cover issues normally discussed in a corresponding committee or special body, that committee or special body shall not be convened.

4. Ad hoc intergovernmental meetings

(a) Ad hoc intergovernmental meetings may be convened, with the prior approval of the Commission, to carry out a detailed examination of substantive and priority issues, including relevant cross-sectoral issues;

(b) No more than five such intergovernmental meetings may be held during a calendar year and the total number of days should not exceed twenty-five.

5. Advisory Committee of Permanent Representatives and Other Representatives Designated by Members of the Commission

The functions of the Advisory Committee of Permanent Representatives and Other Representatives Designated by Members of the Commission shall be in accordance with the terms of reference contained in annex I to the present resolution. The Advisory Committee shall examine ways to enhance and improve its ability to advise and assist the Executive Secretary in drawing up proposals for the medium-term plan, the programme budget and the work programme priorities and resource allocation, consistent with the guidelines provided by the Commission, and to monitor and evaluate the implementation, outcome and effectiveness of the programme of work of the Commission, in accordance with paragraphs 2 and 3 of the terms of reference of the Advisory Committee, and shall report to the Commission on this issue at its fifty-fourth session.

6. Existing bodies under the auspices of the Commission

The following bodies under the auspices of the Commission shall continue to function as prescribed in their respective statutes and terms of reference:

(a) Asian and Pacific Centre for Transfer of Technology;

(b) Regional Coordination Centre for Research and Development of Coarse Grains, Pulses, Roots and Tuber Crops in the Humid Tropics of Asia and the Pacific;

(c) Statistical Institute for Asia and the Pacific.

7. General provisions

(a) Functions. The functions of the committees and special bodies are specified in their respective terms of reference in annexes II to VIII to the present resolution. Committees should select priority issues and focus on well-defined problems in order to show tangible results within specified time-frames;

(b) Rules of procedure. Unless otherwise specified by the Commission, the rules of procedure of the Commission, including those pertaining to the decision-making process, shall apply mutatis mutandis to the committees and special bodies;

(c) Informal session. An informal session among the heads of delegations during the ministerial segment of each session of the Commission should be organized on a year-by-year basis and should not be institutionalized. The agenda for the informal session should be decided by consensus and the annotated agenda should reach members at least thirty days before the opening of the session to ensure the efficiency and effectiveness of the session. Simultaneous interpretation should also be provided;

2. Invites the Executive Secretary, under the direction of the Secretary-General and in conformity with the goal of maximizing the impact of the United Nations in the field of economic and social development, to reorganize the secretariat so as to enhance its ability to service the subsidiary structure of the Commission and implement its revised programme of work under the framework of the medium-term plan for the period 1998-2001;

3. Requests the Executive Secretary to inform the Governments of members and associate members about the preliminary assessment of the organizational, staffing and financial implications of the revision of the intergovernmental structure subsidiary to the Commission within the next six months;

4. Also requests the Executive Secretary to report to the Commission at subsequent sessions on the implementation of the present resolution and on the impact and effectiveness of the revised conference structure, including its thematic priorities and its subsidiary structure;

5. Further requests the Executive Secretary to inform members and associate members, through the Advisory Committee of Permanent Representatives and Other Representatives Designated by Members of the Commission, of the progress made by the Commission towards the implementation of General Assembly resolution 50/227;

6. Commends the secretariat on the implementation of General Assembly resolutions establishing language arrangements for the official working languages of the Commission, and urges the Executive Secretary to continue his efforts to monitor closely the strict implementation of General Assembly resolution 50/11;

7. Decides to review the conference structure of the Commission, including its thematic priorities and its subsidiary structure, no later than at its substantive session of 2002.

ANNEX I

Terms of reference of the Advisory Committee of Permanent Representatives and Other Representatives Designated by Members of the Commission

The Advisory Committee of Permanent Representatives and Other Representatives Designated by Members of the Commission shall have the following functions:

1. To maintain close cooperation and consultation between the members and the secretariat of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific.

2. To advise and assist the Executive Secretary in drawing up proposals for the medium-term plan, programme budget and priorities, consistent with the guidelines provided by the Commission.

3. To receive on a regular basis information on the administrative and financial functioning of the Commission and to assist and advise the Executive Secretary in monitoring and evaluating the implementation of the programme of work of the Commission.

4. To review the draft calendar of meetings prior to its submission to the Commission.

5. To exchange views with the Executive Secretary on the provisional agenda for each session of the Commission, bearing in mind chapter II of its rules of procedure.

6. To assist the secretariat in the formulation of the annotated provisional agenda for each session of the Commission before it is finalized.

7. To monitor the functioning of the thematic approach and the implementation of activities under it in order to provide an assessment of this approach and to suggest to the Commission, at the appropriate time, potential modifications or changes in the themes.

8. To carry out any other tasks to be entrusted to it by the Commission.

ANNEX II

Terms of reference of the Committee on Regional Economic Cooperation

The economic growth process in the Asia and Pacific region is characterized by increasing interdependence of its economies leading to a growing trend towards regional economic cooperation. The potential for enhanced cooperation will be realized more fully through the promotion and expansion of intraregional and inter-subregional trade and investment flows, technology development and transfer and industrial production linkages, all of which are strongly encouraged by the diversity and increasing complementarity of the economies of the region. In addition, such enhanced regional economic cooperation is imperative for spreading the growth impulse more widely across the region and mainstreaming the least developed, landlocked and Pacific island developing countries as well as countries with economies in transition.

Under the overall supervision of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, the Committee on Regional Economic Cooperation would:

1. Review and analyse global and regional trends and developments that have an impact on areas such as intraregional trade, investment, technology and financial flows, enterprise development, trade efficiency, information technology, industrial restructuring and relocation and technological development and transfer.

2. Serve as a mobilizer of ideas and a catalyst for action to promote regional economic cooperation by identifying and addressing major development issues and regional concerns and priorities in trade, investment, financial, information technology, industrial and technological areas and recommend policy options and measures to achieve tangible results and enhance national capacities to meet new challenges.

3. Review the implementation and effectiveness of the programme of work of the secretariat and make recommendations to the Commission about future programmes of work and, in this process, ensure that cross-sectoral issues such as special concerns of the least developed, landlocked and Pacific island developing countries and countries with economies in transition, the environment, human resources development and women in development are adequately addressed.

4. Strengthen the cooperative relationship with relevant subregional organizations to promote intra-subregional and inter-subregional cooperation and linkages through the interchange of information and experiences and, in response to articulated needs, through the promotion of growth triangles and quadrangles or other special mechanisms and arrangements.

5. Accelerate follow-up to the decisions and recommendations of global conferences relevant to the work of the Committee at the national, subregional and regional levels and evaluate progress and provide guidance on the implementation of regional action programmes.

6. Promote liaison with development agencies and financial institutions, private sector organizations, non-governmental organizations and donor countries, within and outside the region, in its initiatives and activities to promote regional economic cooperation.

7. Promote liaison with relevant agencies of the United Nations system with a view to minimizing overlapping and duplication and strengthening cooperation with other organizations and other bodies at the subregional, regional and global levels to maximize the effectiveness and impact of the activities of the Commission.

8. Work closely with other subsidiary organs of the Commission and coordinate its activities with them.

9. Carry out such other activities as the Commission may direct from time to time in matters relating to regional economic cooperation.

Within the context of its terms of reference, the Committee should identify the tasks to be undertaken during a specified period. The Committee should indicate the outcomes expected from each task, set a time-frame for the achievement of each task and monitor its implementation and effectiveness.

The Committee shall be composed of all members and associate members of the Commission.

The Committee shall meet biennially and its report shall be submitted as a background document to facilitate discussion on regional economic cooperation at the Commission sessions.

The Committee shall have a high-level Steering Group to develop innovative approaches and facilitate the exchange of views on pre-selected issues of current interest among a cross-section of representatives of government, academia and the private sector, in order to have in-depth discussion on a range of options in the area of regional economic cooperation and make specific recommendations. Its membership shall be drawn from members and associate members on a voluntary basis. Subject to the approval of members and associate members by consensus, representatives of development agencies, financial institutions, private sector organizations and non-governmental organizations may be invited to meetings of the Steering Group so that it may fulfil its role as a "think tank".

The Steering Group shall meet annually and its report shall be submitted to the Committee. In the years the Committee does not meet, issues discussed and recommendations made by the Steering Group could also be submitted directly to the Commission for its consideration.

ANNEX III

Terms of reference of the Committee on Socio-economic Measures to Alleviate Poverty in Rural and Urban Areas

Poverty remains a most important issue in developing countries of the Asia and Pacific region which must be addressed in a holistic and integrated manner. Hence, poverty alleviation is a major focus of assistance to countries in their attempts to achieve economic growth and improve the quality of life in the context of sustainable development and the emerging global economy. The Committee on Socio-economic Measures to Alleviate Poverty in Rural and Urban Areas would therefore serve as a regional forum for the identification of social and economic development issues directly related to the alleviation of poverty and the development of appropriate strategies and policies to improve the quality of life of the poor.

Under the overall supervision of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, the Committee would:

1. Review and analyse the global and regional trends and developments that have an impact on the poverty situation in the region, with a focus on their correlates in both the rural and urban contexts, and recommend development policy options and programme strategies.

2. Serve as a mobilizer of ideas and a catalyst for action in undertaking measures aimed at alleviating poverty in both rural and urban areas through the promotion of people's participation, including that of women and socially and economically disadvantaged groups, and capacity-building of national and local institutions and communities as well as human resources development and other means. Specifically, the Committee would recommend policy options and identify programmes that would address population issues and concerns, social development issues and concerns, human resources development, women in development, increased access to employment, education, health, shelter and credit, agricultural growth, especially through environmentally friendly inputs, the use of appropriate technologies, devolution of authority and participatory urban management and governance.

3. Accelerate follow-up to the decisions and recommendations of global conferences at the national, subregional and regional levels, monitor and evaluate progress in their implementation and provide guidance on the implementation of the regional action programmes relevant to the work of the Committee, inter alia, on population, social development, human resources development, rural development, women and urbanization.

4. Review the implementation and effectiveness of the programme of work of the secretariat and make recommendations to the Commission about future programmes of work and, in this process, ensure that cross-sectoral issues such as special concerns of the least developed, landlocked and Pacific island developing countries and countries with economies in transition, the environment, human resources development and women in development are adequately addressed.

5. Promote liaison with development agencies and financial institutions, private sector organizations, non-governmental organizations and donor countries, within and outside the region, in its efforts and initiatives to deal with the issues of poverty alleviation in both rural and urban areas.

6. Work closely with other subsidiary organs of the Commission and coordinate its activities with them.

7. Carry out such other activities as the Commission may direct from time to time in matters relating to poverty alleviation.

8. Promote liaison with relevant agencies of the United Nations system with a view to minimizing overlapping and duplication and strengthening cooperation with other organizations and other bodies at the subregional, regional and global levels to maximize the effectiveness and impact of the activities of the Commission.

Within the context of its terms of reference, the Committee should identify the tasks to be undertaken during a specified period. The Committee should indicate the outcomes expected from each task, set a time-frame for the achievement of each task and monitor its implementation and effectiveness.

The Committee shall meet annually, focusing on a limited number of pre-selected issues, and shall report to the Commission.

ANNEX IV

Terms of reference of the Committee on Environment and Natural Resources Development

The main objectives of the Committee on Environment and Natural Resources Development shall be to promote regional and subregional cooperation for sustainable development and to strengthen national capacities in the area of the environment, including the integration of environmental concerns into development strategies, in line with the provisions of Agenda 21 and other subsequent decisions, the development and management of natural resources, including water, mineral and energy resources (excluding infrastructural aspects of electric power), the diffusion and management of environmentally sound technologies, space technology applications and natural disaster reduction.

Under the overall supervision of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, the Committee shall perform the following specific functions:

1. Review and assess the state of the environment in the region and, where a regional perspective on the issues provides a clear advantage, highlight the major environmental concerns with a view to encouraging the integration of environmental concerns into development policies, strategies, plans and programmes of members and associate members, at both the macro-economic and sectoral levels.

2. Review and identify priority issues, assess progress and promote regional and subregional cooperation in the development and management of water, mineral and energy resources and in the application of space technologies, keeping in view the need to ensure sustainable development, and make recommendations on policies, strategies, methods and techniques for the proper investigation, development, utilization and management of those resources.

3. Promote regional and subregional cooperation in environmental protection and natural disaster reduction and encourage members and associate members to undertake their assessment of risks from natural hazards and to integrate the outcomes of such assessments into their development plans.

4. Promote opportunities for and provide guidance on the transfer and adoption of environmentally sound technologies and their diffusion, as well as on management and operational practices to contribute to the strengthening of national capacities for achieving sustainable development.

5. Encourage the setting of standards and the strengthening of legal frameworks for the development and management of natural resources and promote the application of environmental safeguards in manufacturing and product development.

6. Review the salient issues in the regional strategies and action programmes emerging from recent global conferences, international conventions and agreements, monitor the implementation of Agenda 21 at the regional level and articulate the region's response to relevant global initiatives, ensuring that such initiatives support the development of the region.

7. Review the implementation and effectiveness of the programme of work of the secretariat and make recommendations to the Commission about future programmes of work and, in this process, ensure that cross-sectoral issues such as special concerns of the least developed, landlocked and Pacific island developing countries and countries with economies in transition, human resources development and women in development are adequately addressed.

8. Promote liaison with relevant agencies of the United Nations system with a view to minimizing overlapping and duplication and strengthening cooperation with other organizations and other bodies at the subregional, regional and global levels to maximize the effectiveness and impact of the activities of the Commission.

9. Work closely with other subsidiary organs of the Commission and coordinate its activities with them.

10. Carry out such other activities as the Commission may direct from time to time in matters relating to the environment and natural resources development.

Within the context of its terms of reference, the Committee should identify the tasks to be undertaken during a specified period. The Committee should indicate the outcomes expected from each task, set a time-frame for the achievement of each task and monitor its implementation and effectiveness.

The Committee shall meet annually, focusing on a limited number of pre-selected areas on a rotating basis, and shall report to the Commission.

ANNEX V

Terms of reference of the Committee on Transport, Communications, Tourism and Infrastructure Development

The rapid growth in regional economies, trade and tourism is placing considerable strain on infrastructure facilities and services. It is also highlighting the importance of intraregional and interregional transport linkages as well as appropriate facilitation measures to ensure efficient utilization of regional linkages.

In the context of these developments, the Committee on Transport, Communications, Tourism and Infrastructure Development will address the following areas: roads, railways, urban transport, ports, shipping, inland waterways, dredging, multimodal transport (including freight forwarding), tourism and the infrastructural aspects of electric power.

Under the overall supervision of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, the Committee would:

1. Review and analyse global and regional trends and developments that have an impact on transport, communications, tourism and infrastructure development in the Asia and Pacific region.

2. Serve as a mobilizer of ideas and a catalyst for action in the transport, communications, tourism and infrastructure development sectors, recommend policy options to achieve tangible results in improving the efficient provision, management, operation, maintenance and pricing of transport, tourism facilities, infrastructure and services, taking into account equity, safety and environmental considerations, promote intraregional and interregional transport linkages, in particular the Asian Highway and Trans-Asian Railway, services, facilitation measures and tourism, and enhance national capacities.

3. Accelerate follow-up to the decisions and recommendations of global conferences at the national, subregional and regional levels, evaluate progress and provide guidance on the implementation of the New Delhi Action Plan on Infrastructure Development in Asia and the Pacific being coordinated by the Commission. In this connection, aspects of work on civil aviation, telecommunications and postal services carried out by the specialized agencies in relation to the implementation of the Action Plan would also be addressed by the Committee.

4. Promote liaison with international financing institutions, relevant private sector organizations and non-governmental organizations to assist in the development of transport, communications, tourism, and electric power infrastructure and services.

5. Review the implementation and effectiveness of the programme of work of the secretariat and make recommendations to the Commission about future programmes of work and, in this process, ensure that cross-sectoral issues such as the special concerns of the least developed, landlocked and Pacific island developing countries and countries with economies in transition, the environment, human resources development, socially and economically disadvantaged groups and women in development are adequately addressed.

6. Work closely with other subsidiary organs of the Commission and coordinate its activities with them.

7. Promote liaison with relevant agencies of the United Nations system with a view to minimizing overlapping and duplication and strengthening cooperation with other organizations and other bodies at the subregional, regional and global levels to maximize the effectiveness and impact of the activities of the Commission.

8. Carry out such other activities as the Commission may direct from time to time in matters relating to transport, communications, tourism and infrastructure development.

Within the context of its terms of reference, the Committee should identify the tasks to be undertaken during a specified period. The Committee should indicate the outcomes expected from each task, set a time-frame for the achievement of each task and monitor its implementation and effectiveness.

The Committee shall meet annually, focusing on specific pre-selected sectors, and present its report to the Commission as a background document to facilitate discussion.

ANNEX VI

Terms of reference of the Committee on Statistics

The Committee on Statistics, in acting as the focus of regional statistical development, shall perform the following functions:

1. Review and analyse progress in the development of statistics in the region.

2. Assist in the strengthening of the statistical infrastructure in the countries of the region, promote the improvement of the quality of statistics, the international comparability of data and the appropriate application of new techniques, provide guidance in meeting emerging data requirements and arrange for the exchange of information on and experiences in statistical work and methods among the countries.

3. Promote observance of the fundamental principles of official statistics adopted by the United Nations Statistical Commission at its special session in 1994.

4. Participate actively in the initiation, development, revision, testing and implementation of international statistical standards, promote and monitor their application and promote their adaptation, as appropriate, to the conditions and needs of the countries of the region.

5. Play the focal role in promoting close coordination of all aspects of the statistical activities of specialized agencies, relevant United Nations bodies and other international organizations in regard to their work in the Asia and Pacific region, inter alia, so as to achieve greater uniformity in concepts and definitions, reduce to a minimum the response burden on national statistical offices and maximize the effectiveness of technical cooperation activities.

6. Promote the generation and analysis of statistical data and encourage, with due regard to relevant international work, efforts to develop a set of standardized statistical indicators for the region relevant to the programme of work of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific.

7. Recommend programmes of technical assistance, training, education and research in the various fields of statistics and their application.

8. Review and analyse progress in the development of information technology applications and information resource management in the region, especially in the public sector, and make recommendations on issues concerning policies and strategies, as well as on programmes of technical assistance, training and research in this field.

9. Review and evaluate the activities of the secretariat and the implementation and effectiveness of the programme of work in the areas of statistics and computerized information processing, provide guidance on the work of the secretariat and make recommendations to the Commission about the future programmes of work, paying due regard to the recommendations of the United Nations Statistical Commission and other relevant bodies.

10. Make recommendations to the Governing Board of the Statistical Institute for Asia and the Pacific on the nature of and priorities in statistical training for the countries of the region.

11. Inform the United Nations Statistical Commission and, where appropriate, the statistical authorities of the specialized agencies and other relevant bodies, of its work, so that due attention may be given to the wider aspects of the issues considered by the Committee.

12. Work closely with other subsidiary organs of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, coordinate activities with them and ensure that cross-sectoral issues such as the special concerns of the least developed, landlocked, Pacific island developing countries and countries with economies in transition, the environment, human resources development and women in development are adequately addressed.

13. Carry out such other activities as the Commission may direct from time to time in matters relating to statistics.

Within the context of the above terms of reference, the Committee should identify the tasks to be undertaken during a specified period. The Committee should indicate the outcomes expected from each task, set a time-frame for the achievement of each task and monitor its implementation and effectiveness.

The Committee shall meet once every two years and shall report to the Commission.

ANNEX VII

Terms of reference of the Special Body on Least Developed and Landlocked Developing Countries

The special problems and constraints on the economic and social development of the least developed and landlocked developing countries have been recognized by the international community, as well as within the context of the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s adopted by the Second United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries held at Paris from 3 to 14 September 1990, the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade and other international declarations. These constraints require focused priority attention in the Asia and Pacific region in order to mainstream them into the ongoing regional integration process and to associate them with the economic and social dynamism of the region. The Special Body on Least Developed and Landlocked Developing Countries provides a focused forum for addressing the special issues and problems facing these groups of countries, in the spirit of regional cooperation.

Under the overall supervision of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, the Special Body would:

1. Review and analyse the economic and social progress in the least developed and landlocked developing countries and undertake in-depth reviews of economic, social and environmental constraints on their development.

2. Serve as a mobilizer of ideas and a catalyst for action to identify and promote new policy options at the national, subregional and regional levels for the removal of constraints on the economic and social development efforts of the least developed and landlocked developing countries, with emphasis on the adoption of measures for increased mobilization of domestic and foreign resources, trade and private sector development, public sector reform and the provision of economic advice, on request, to Governments with limited internal capacity.

3. Assist in enhancing national capacities in the least developed and landlocked developing countries, inter alia, in relation to the formulation of development strategies at the national and sectoral levels.

4. Foster and strengthen intercountry cooperation arrangements for exchanges of experience and technical cooperation between and among the least developed and landlocked developing countries and with other developing and developed countries in the region.

5. Without duplicating work done elsewhere, review and analyse the special transit trade and transport problems of Asian landlocked developing countries, recommend suitable measures for solving these problems in accordance with international legal instruments, in particular article 125 of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, and encourage these countries and their transit neighbours to deal with problems within the context of bilateral cooperation.

6. Promote liaison with development agencies and financial institutions, private sector organizations, non-governmental organizations and donor countries, within and outside the region, in its initiatives and activities for the benefit of the least developed and landlocked developing countries.

7. Review the implementation and effectiveness of the programme of work of the secretariat and make recommendations to the Commission about future programmes of work and, in this process, ensure that cross-sectoral issues such as the environment, human resources development and women in development are adequately addressed.

8. Accelerate follow-up to the decisions and recommendations of global conferences on the least developed countries at the national, subregional and regional levels, in particular the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s and any successor programme.

9. Promote liaison with relevant agencies of the United Nations system with a view to minimizing overlapping and duplication and strengthening cooperation with other organizations and other bodies at the subregional, regional and global levels to maximize the effectiveness and impact of the activities of the Commission.

10. Work closely with other subsidiary organs of the Commission and coordinate its activities with them.

11. Carry out such other functions as the Commission may direct from time to time in matters relating to the least developed and landlocked developing countries.

Within the context of its terms of reference, the Special Body should identify the tasks to be undertaken during a specified period. The Special Body should indicate the outcomes expected from each task, set a time-frame for the achievement of each task and monitor its implementation and effectiveness.

The Special Body shall meet biennially for two days, back-to-back with the Commission sessions and alternately with the Special Body on Pacific Island Developing Countries.

ANNEX VIII

Terms of Reference of the Special Body on Pacific Island Developing Countries

The special problems and constraints on the economic and social development of the Pacific island developing countries related to their isolation, small size and vulnerability to environmental hazards have been recognized by the international community and also within the context of the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States and other international declarations. These constraints require focused priority attention in order to mainstream these countries into the ongoing regional integration process and to associate them with the economic and social dynamism of the region. The Special Body on Pacific Island Developing Countries provides a focused forum for addressing the special issues and problems facing this group of countries, in the spirit of regional cooperation.

Under the overall supervision of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, the Special Body would:

1. Review and analyse the economic and social progress in the Pacific island developing countries and undertake in-depth reviews of economic, social and environmental constraints on their development.

2. Serve as a mobilizer of ideas and a catalyst for action to identify and promote new policy options at the national, subregional and regional levels for the removal of constraints on the economic and social development efforts of the Pacific island developing countries.

3. Assist in enhancing national capacities in the Pacific island developing countries, inter alia, in relation to the formulation of development strategies at the national and sectoral levels.

4. Foster and strengthen intercountry and inter-subregional cooperation arrangements for exchanges of experience and technical cooperation between and among the Pacific island developing countries and with other developing and developed countries in the region.

5. Promote liaison, in particular through the Pacific Operations Centre of the Commission, with development agencies and financial institutions, private sector organizations, non-governmental organizations and donor countries, within and outside the region, in the initiatives and activities of the Special Body for the benefit of the Pacific island developing countries.

6. Review the implementation and effectiveness of the programme of work of the secretariat and make recommendations to the Commission about future programmes of work and, in this process, ensure that cross-sectoral issues such as the environment, human resources development and women in development are adequately addressed.

7. Accelerate follow-up to the decisions and recommendations of global conferences on small island developing countries at the national, subregional and regional levels, in particular the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States.

8. Promote liaison with relevant agencies of the United Nations system with a view to minimizing overlapping and duplication and strengthening cooperation with other organizations and bodies at the subregional, regional and global levels to maximize the effectiveness and impact of the activities of the Commission.

9. Work closely with other subsidiary organs of the Commission and coordinate its activities with them.

10. Carry out such other functions as the Commission may direct from time to time in matters relating to the Pacific island developing countries.

Within the context of its terms of reference, the Special Body should identify the tasks to be undertaken during a specified period. The Special Body should indicate the outcomes expected from each task, set a time-frame for the achievement of each task and monitor its implementation and effectiveness.

The Special Body shall meet for two days biennially, back-to-back with the annual sessions of the Commission and alternately with the Special Body on Least Developed and Landlocked Developing Countries.

Subregional matters

In 1997, the Commission recognized the importance of subregional cooperation as an effective way to accelerate socio-economic development in the region. It noted initiatives taken, including the establishment of growth triangles and quadrangles in South-East and South Asia. ESCAP should continue to promote inter-subregional linkages, particularly between North-East and South-East Asia. A North-East Asia business forum should be established. The Commission supported technical assistance activities to follow up its 1996 resolution [YUN 1996, p. 911] on strengthening subregional economic cooperation among south-western member countries of ESCAP, including members of the Economic Cooperation Organization (see below).

The Commission also considered a note on strengthening inter-organizational cooperation in the promotion of economic and social development in the region [E/ESCAP/1070], which described collaborative activities undertaken through the Regional Inter-agency Committee for Asia and the Pacific (RICAP). It also highlighted technical cooperation activities carried out by ESCAP in cooperation with UN bodies and specialized agencies, financial institutions and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, as well as the role played by the ESCAP Pacific Operations Centre in effecting inter-organizational cooperation in the Pacific.

Cooperation between the United Nations and the Economic Cooperation Organization

In response to General Assembly resolution 51/21 [YUN 1996, p. 911], the Secretary-General reported in August [A/52/313] on cooperation between the United Nations and the Economic Cooperation Organization (ECO). The report reviewed cooperation between ECO and UNDP, ESCAP, the United Nations Children's Fund, the United Nations Population Fund, the United Nations International Drug Control Programme and other agencies.

UNDP was conducting a study on the reorganizational aspects of the ECO secretariat and, with the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD), was undertaking efforts to enable ECO to benefit from the Advanced Cargo Information System and the Automated System for Customs Data and Management, within the framework of the ESCAP project on international transport development in the ECO region. ESCAP, under the terms of the 1993 memorandum of understanding [YUN 1993, p. 613] between the two organizations, was working with UNCTAD on a transit treaty framework for ECO. It coordinated the third consultative meeting of the heads of subregional organizations (Tehran, 18-19 May), jointly hosted by ECO and Iran. ECO attached high priority to transport and communications, and ESCAP, UNCTAD and the Islamic Development Bank were finalizing a comprehensive joint project on international transport development in the ECO region. In that regard, an Extraordinary Summit Meeting of the Heads of State and Government of ECO members (Ashgabat, Turkmenistan, 13-14 May) adopted the Ash-gabat Declaration, reiterating the importance of transport, communications and gas and the oil pipeline network for the region and determining priority projects, plans and programmes.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 21 November [meeting 51], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/19 [draft: A/52/L.20/Rev.1] without vote [agenda item 34].

Cooperation between the United Nations and the Economic Cooperation Organization

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 48/2 of 13 October 1993, by which it granted observer status to the Economic Cooperation Organization,

Recalling also that the Charter of the United Nations provides for the existence of regional arrangements or agencies for dealing with such matters as maintenance of international peace and security as are appropriate for regional action, provided that their activities are consistent with the purposes and principles of the United Nations,

Recalling further its resolution 51/21 of 27 November 1996, in which it urged the specialized agencies and other organizations and programmes of the United Nations system to initiate, maintain and increase consultation and programmes with the Economic Cooperation Organization and its associated institutions in the attainment of their objectives,

Bearing in mind that the Treaty of Izmir, signed at Izmir, Turkey, on 12 March 1977, later revised at Ashgabat on 11 May 1996 and signed at Izmir on 14 September 1996, created a permanent body for intraregional cooperation, consultation and coordination in order to enhance economic, social and cultural development, and bearing in mind also the measures being taken by the Economic Cooperation Organization aimed at the reorganization and restructuring of the organization,

Convinced that the maintenance and further strengthening of the cooperation between the United Nations system and the Economic Cooperation Organization promote the implementation of the goals and principles of those organizations,

1. Takes note of the decision of the heads of State and Government of the States members of the Economic Cooperation Organization welcoming the adoption of General Assembly resolution 51/21 on cooperation between the two organizations and endorsing the cooperative arrangements entered into by the Economic Cooperation Organization with various entities of the United Nations system for joint efforts towards the implementation of the economic projects and programmes of the Economic Cooperation Organization;

2. Notes with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of resolution 51/21, and invites the Secretary-General of the United Nations to continue his efforts, in consultation with the Secretary-General of the Economic Cooperation Organization, to promote and expand cooperation and coordination between the two secretariats in order to increase the capacity of the two organizations to attain their common objectives;

3. Notes with satisfaction the emphasis placed in the Ashgabat Declaration, issued by the Extraordinary

Summit Meeting of the Heads of State and Government of the States members of the Economic Cooperation Organization, held at Ashgabat on 13 and 14 May 1997, on the meaningful development of economic cooperation in priority areas of transport and communications and energy with a view to facilitating the access of the landlocked States members of the Economic Cooperation Organization to world markets;

4. Welcomes the continuation of efforts towards further consolidation of interregional consultations and exchange of views on issues of common concern through such useful forums as the annual meeting of the executive heads of Asia's subregional organizations and the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, which held its third meeting at Tehran in May 1997;

5. Urges the specialized agencies and other organizations and programmes of the United Nations system to continue and increase consultation and cooperation with the Economic Cooperation Organization and its associated institutions in the attainment of their objectives;

6. Invites the relevant international financial institutions to give appropriate consideration to regional development plans, including projects and programmes of the Economic Cooperation Organization, in order to extend their assistance in the implementation of these programmes and, in particular, to the establishment of a comprehensive transport and communications infrastructure in the region of the Economic Cooperation Organization that would provide the landlocked countries with greater mobility to promote interregional trade and to establish mutually beneficial economic and commercial interaction with other regions;

7. Invites the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, as the regional arm of the United Nations, to assume a more active role in promoting cooperation with the Economic Cooperation Organization, and reiterates in this regard its request made in paragraph 5 of resolution 51/21 in the context of the report to be submitted by the Executive Secretary of the Commission to the Commission at its fifty-fourth session, in 1998;

8. Takes note with satisfaction of the fact that it is proposed to introduce the Advance Cargo Information System and the Automated System for Customs Data of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, which are compatible with other systems, in the States members of the Economic Cooperation Organization, with the technical assistance of, inter alia, the Conference;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session a report on the implementation of the present resolution;

10. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session the item entitled "Cooperation between the United Nations and the Economic Cooperation Organization".

Europe

The Economic Commission for Europe (ECE), at its fifty-second session (Geneva, 21-24 April 1997) [E/1997/36], observed the fiftieth anniversary of ECE, and focused on the strengthening of economic cooperation in Europe, adopting a Declaration on the subject [E/ECE/1346], the related Plan of Action [E/ECE/1347 & Corr.1] and a note on its implementation [E/ECE/1354].

In the Declaration, ECE Governments, in celebrating the fiftieth anniversary, affirmed the Commission's relevance and their commitment to provide it with fresh impetus so that, in concert with other regional organizations, it would be able to take up the challenges that the region faced at the dawn of the twenty-first century. Commission reform, which was outlined in the Plan of Action, met the threefold aims of focus, flexibility and efficiency. Activities were streamlined, strengthened or discontinued. The number of programme elements were reduced by 60 per cent, and the intergovernmental structure from 14 principal subsidiary bodies (PSBs) to 7. That resulted in the work of the Commission focusing on the following areas: environment; transport; statistics; trade, industry and enterprise development; economic analysis; energy; timber; and human settlements. ECE members decided to set up a consultative mechanism so that some activities could be discontinued and others launched in response to changes in the needs of member countries and the realities of the region. They also agreed on a structure for organizing activities to meet specific requests from sub-groups of member countries, in particular the countries in transition and the Mediterranean countries. The intergovernmental structure of ECE was made more homogeneous and transparent, thereby simplifying decision-making and increasing cost-effectiveness. Cooperation was to be enhanced with other regional and subregional organizations, such as the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), the Council of Europe and the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), as well as with institutions and the European Commission, and a dialogue with the business community and civil society was to be intensified.

The Plan of Action provided a comprehensive framework for translating into action the strategic directions set out in the Declaration. It presented general orientations and main changes in the work programme as a whole and in each particular area. It also dealt with cross-sectoral issues, working methods and efficiency, and relations with other bodies and with each other.

On 24 April, the Commission recommended fE/1997/36 (dec. A(52))] that the Economic and Social Council endorse the Declaration on the Strengthening of Economic Cooperation in Europe and the Plan of Action, which the Council did on 18 July by decision 1997/224.

The Commission held an exchange of views with the chairmen of the PSBs on reform implementation and the future, including cross-sectoral activities and new ways of developing relations between and among PSBs. It agreed that all PSBs should be provided with resources as specified in the Plan of Action.

The Commission also considered the diversification of its activities designed to assist the integration of the countries in transition into the European and global economies [E/ECE/1348]. It requested the Executive Secretary to respond to requests for assistance to the countries in transition from individual countries, groups of countries and subregional groupings/initiatives, it being understood that member countries would be kept informed. It also requested further strengthening of cooperation and networking on those activities within the UN system, the European Commission in the framework of the EU PHARE and TACIS programmes, and other organizations, financial institutions, subregional groupings and interested donors, including the business community.

The Commission confirmed the importance of the ECE Regional Advisory Services Programme, focused on the implementation of policies, conventions, norms, standards and guidelines developed in ECE, and that a particular effort be made to design supporting projects. The Executive Secretary was asked to continue efforts to increase extrabudgetary funds for the Programme, inter alia, by exploring various forms of co-financing, and to organize a brainstorming meeting for that purpose with development assistance agencies of ECE member States.

In other decisions, the Commission agreed that the Executive Secretary should continue efforts to strengthen and promote cooperation and partnership with other UN bodies and other institutions active in the region, in particular OSCE, the European Commission, OECD and the Council of Europe, as well as subregional groupings and initiatives. The Commission agreed to formalize the relationship between ECE and OSCE. It emphasized its support for activities undertaken to address Mediterranean questions and requested that efforts to identify ways to enhance economic cooperation in the Mediterranean be continued.

Activities related to strengthening cooperation within the ECE region included the establishment of a Coordinating Unit for Operational Activities to deal with issues and activities that responded to the needs of specific groups of countries: countries in transition, sets of countries belonging to the same subregion, or groups of countries spread throughout the region but having a common interest in a specific issue where ECE had recognized expertise. The Unit would support and coordinate operational activities undertaken by ECE, including by the Regional Advisers.

In the course of 1997, operational activities undertaken in cooperation with, or in the framework of, subregional organizations or initiatives increased significantly. Cooperation with the Black Sea Economic Cooperation Pact (BSEC), the Central European Initiative (CEI) and the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) included exchanges of information, provision of expertise, and the joint organization and support of mutually agreed activities. ECE supported CEI activities on small and medium-sized enterprises and prepared a project on sustainable energy development. In November, it decided to cooperate on concrete projects in the environment sector. Cooperation with the Interstate Economic Committee of the CIS Economic Union was formalized in a Memorandum on Interaction; a Protocol for the exchange of information was signed in April.

Economic trends

According to the summary of the economic survey of Europe, 1997 [E/1998/11], the economic situation in much of the ECE region improved significantly, with Western economies recording the best gross domestic product (GDP) growth since 1989, an average of 3.3 per cent, and transition economies of Eastern Europe, the Baltic States and CIS registering a 1.7 per cent GDP growth, the first positive average growth rate since 1989. That reflected the continued steady growth in Eastern Europe and an apparent end to seven consecutive years of falling GDP in the Russian Federation.

On 25 July 1997, the Economic and Social Council, by decision 1997/314, took note of the summary of the economic survey of Europe, 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 912].

Eastern Europe, Baltic States and CIS

In Eastern Europe and the Baltic States, 1997 was generally a year of relatively high growth rates. However, large drops in GDP in Albania, Bulgaria and Romania and a sharp deceleration of growth in the Czech Republic resulted in a 2.8 per cent average rate of growth for Central and Eastern Europe, much lower than in 1996 (4.1 per cent). Apart from the Czech economy, growth rates were generally higher in 1997 than expected at the start of the year, and in Croatia, Poland and Slovakia GDP increased by 6 per cent or more. A strong recovery appeared to be well established in the Baltic States, where growth in 1997 ranged between 5 per cent, in Lithuania, and 9 per cent, in Estonia. In Albania, Bulgaria, the Czech Republic and Romania, policy makers had been grappling with the consequences of severe financial crises in 1996 and 1997, the result of poor macroeconomic fundamentals and weak reform programmes, especially as regards the banking and enterprise sectors, and a lack of a political and social consensus on a radical reform programme. Bulgaria made considerable progress towards establishing macroeconomic stability, especially since the creation of a currency board in July 1997, but a long process of structural adjustment still lay ahead. The increasing divergence in terms of economic reform and development between south-east European countries, together with Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), and those of Central Europe and the Baltic States was a matter of growing concern.

A major feature of recovery in Central Europe was the rapid growth of the industrial sector, with industrial output growing more than 11 per cent in Hungary and Poland, by some 7 per cent in Croatia, and by more than 6 and 13 per cent in Latvia and Estonia, respectively. Industry also attracted a large share of the expansion in fixed investment, especially in Croatia, the Czech Republic, Poland, Romania, Slovakia and Slovenia, resulting in a changing structure and improved competitiveness of exports of manufactured goods. The sector appeared also to be the main generator of private sector employment. Only in the Czech Republic was the services sector the major source of jobs.

In Eastern Europe, despite high rates of economic growth, there was only a marginal rise in the level of employment in 1997, largely due to Poland's performance, where output had been growing strongly for five years. Unemployment rates remained high (an average of 11.6 per cent in Eastern Europe and 6.3 per cent in the Baltic States).

In spite of serious setbacks in some south-east European economies, inflation rates had fallen markedly in most transition economies over the last few years, although progress was less marked in Eastern Europe in 1997. Apart from Albania, Bulgaria and Romania, the average increase in consumer prices in Eastern Europe and the Baltic States in 1997 ranged from 4 per cent in Croatia to more than 18 per cent in Hungary. The rate of increase in wages continued to fall, and widespread improvements in productivity, largely associated with increased output, had considerably lowered the growth in unit labour costs. An important feature of measured inflation rates in Eastern Europe and the Baltic States was their significant component of relative price adjustments. Despite the rapid liberalization of goods prices, the prices of many services, as well as for energy, were being only gradually increased to market levels so as to avert social unrest.

As regards CIS countries, the major macro-economic development in 1997 was the apparent end of seven years of falling output in the Russian Federation. The increase in GDP was marginal and prospects for continued recovery were uncertain. Nevertheless, there were signs of improvement in various parts of the economy. The manufacturing industry cited recovery in a number of sectors, consumer demand was revived for the first time since 1990, and Russian manufacturers appeared to be regaining shares in their domestic market. A major achievement in the Russian economy was a reduction in the inflation rate, from an annualized quarterly rate of 400 per cent in early 1995 to 2.8 per cent in the last quarter of 1997. Output also improved in all other CIS countries in 1997, except for Turkmenistan and Ukraine. There was also a significant fall in inflation rates in most countries, due to tight monetary policies and stable exchange rates, although higher productivity and increased price stability in the Russian Federation, the principal trading partner of the other CIS countries, also had an influence.

Western Europe and North America

The relatively high growth rate of the Western economies was heavily influenced by the unexpected strength of the United States economy, where buoyant domestic demand was responsible for an increase in GDP of 3.8 per cent, the largest since 1988. Despite perennial fears that the introduction of new technology was eliminating jobs, total employment since 1991 had risen 13 per cent. In 1997, the average unemployment rate was 4.9 per cent, the lowest since 1973. Fixed investment in the United States in 1997 raised the productive capacity of the manufacturing industry by more than 5 per cent, and, despite the rapid growth of the past six years, capacity utilization rates were still several points below their 1989 peak. Productivity in manufacturing rose by nearly 4.5 per cent in 1997 and easily absorbed the rise in wages, with unit labour costs actually falling. The greatest number of new jobs in the United States were created in the services sector, in particular in business services which had high rates of investment in new technology.

In Western Europe, GDP growth averaged 2.7 per cent in 1997, an improvement over the 2 per cent increase in 1996. There was a steady improvement in domestic demand, which tended to have a multiplier effect through the European economies because of close trading links. Nevertheless, Western European growth was still largely driven by exports and especially by the import demands of North America, the transition economies of Eastern Europe and CIS, and developing countries outside East Asia. Fixed investment picked up somewhat in 1997, but was still weak in France, Germany and Italy. Even in the United Kingdom, where growth had been relatively strong for the past four years and profits relatively high, increases were not very large. Investments tended to be in machinery and equipment and focused on rationalization of production rather than on expanding new capacities.

Western market economies saw the persistence of very low rates of inflation in 1997 and the absence of any serious incipient labour or other pressures. The increase in consumer prices averaged less than 2 per cent, the same as in the United States. Among factors cited to explain that trend were: labour-market deregulation, the declining influence of trade unions, increased competition in more open and interdependent economies, and widespread fear of unemployment, especially in Europe, where in the 1990s priority had been given to fiscal consolidation over growth and employment. Nevertheless, the experience of the United States and many smaller economies of Western Europe also suggested that growth, investment and rising productivity were playing an important role in sustaining low inflation and increased employment.

Activities in 1997

Trade, industry and enterprise development

The Committee for Trade, Industry and Enterprise Development, at its first session (Geneva, 9-11 December 1997) [ECE/TRADE/214], adopted its new structure. It welcomed the establishment of the Centre for the Facilitation of Procedures and Practices for Administration, Commerce and Transport (CEFACT), and noted the contribution of regional Electronic Data Interchange for Administration, Commerce and Trade (EDIFACT) boards to the promotion of UN/EDIFACT. The Committee encouraged active ECE participation in discussions on trade facilitation in the World Trade Organization (WTO). It confirmed the continuation of the Working Party on International Contract Practices in Industry, and agreed to: organize, in collaboration with the World Intellectual Property Organization and in consultation with WTO, a forum on the protection of intellectual property in transition economies; prepare briefing papers on the legal aspects of financing trade and private enterprise; extend the build-operate-transfer (BOT) Group for a further two years; consider at its next session the experience of the Real Estate Advisory Group in advising Governments on developing viable real estate markets; and organize, in Prague, Czech Republic, in 1998, a conference on the revision of the European Conference on International Commercial Arbitration. The Committee confirmed the standing nature of the Working Party on Standardization of Perishable Produce and Quality Development and its five meetings of experts, and agreed to continue the Working Party on Technical Harmonization and Standardization Policies, requesting it to prepare a paper on different modalities of fostering cooperation on technical harmonization issues among ECE member States. The Committee approved the establishment of ad hoc groups of experts on the chemical industry and on steel, and adopted programmes of work for each. It also adopted its own programme of work for 1998-1999.

On 24 April [E/1997/36 (dec. B(52))], the Commission endorsed the 1996 decisions of the Working Party on Facilitation of International Trade Procedures and of the Committee on the Development of Trade endorsing an ECE recommendation on use of the UN/EDIFACT Standard and recommending that the Economic and Social Council adopt it as an international UN recommendation. The Council, by decision 1997/225 of 18 July, endorsed the Commission's decision.

The Working Party on International Contract Practices in Industry, at its forty-sixth session (Geneva, 29 September-1 October) [TRADE/WP.5/62], held a forum on the prospects for promoting foreign direct investment in the transition economies. ECE was asked to prepare a comprehensive report on and to publish an extended version of the proceedings. The Working Party agreed to establish an ad hoc drafting group to complete the Guide on Real Estate Transactions in the Countries of Central and Eastern Europe.

A workshop, "Trade Finance in Transition Economies: Practical Ways to Support Exports and Imports", was held (Geneva, 27-28 November) [TRADE/1997/7/Add.1].

The Working Party on Technical Harmonization and Standardization Policies, at its seventh session (Geneva, 5-7 May) [ECE/STAND/46], adopted a draft intergovernmental agreement on technical harmonization to strengthen the role of international standards and reduce technical obstacles to international trade. The Working Party took measures to improve cooperation in the ECE region on standardization-related issues in the areas of coordination, harmonization, conformity assessment, metrology, quality policy and competitiveness. The Working Party streamlined its activities and adopted a revised work programme for 1997-2001.

Transport

The Inland Transport Committee, at its fifty-ninth session (Geneva, 13-17 January) [ECE/TRANS/119 & Add.1], discussed, among other things, assistance to countries in transition, transport trends and policy and transport economics, road transport, regulations for the construction of vehicles, rail transport, inland water transport, combined transport, customs questions, transport of dangerous and perishable goods and transport statistics.

The Committee adopted a draft Protocol on Combined Transport on Inland Waterways to the 1991 European Agreement on Important International Combined Transport Lines and Related Installations (AGTC Agreement), opening it for signature from 1 November 1997 to 31 October 1998. It also approved guidelines for the safe packing of cargo in freight containers and vehicles and encouraged their early publication.

The Regional Conference on Transport and the Environment (Vienna, 12-14 November) [ECE/RCTE/CONF./8/FINAL] discussed major issues concerning transport and the environment in the ECE region, including a strategic approach towards sustainable transport: reconciling economic, environmental and social objectives; establishing environmental targets for the transport sector and ways to reach them; achieving sustainable transport in countries in transition; and how to best promote less polluting modes of transport.

The Conference adopted the Vienna Declaration [ECE/RCTE/CONF./2/FINAL] and the Programme of Joint Action [ECE/RCTE/CONF./3/Rev.1] on Transport and the Environment and invited ECE to promote their objectives and implementation. It noted that the Protocol on Combined Transport on Inland Waterways to the AGTC Agreement, opened for signature at the Conference, had been signed by 12 States. ECE members were encouraged to become contracting parties to the Protocol, and the Working Party WP.24 of the ECE Inland Transport Committee was asked to promote effective implementation of the standards and parameters contained therein. The Conference also encouraged members to become contracting parties to the Agreement concerning the Adoption of Uniform Conditions for Periodical Technical Inspections of Wheeled Vehicles and the Reciprocal Recognition of Such Inspections, which had been signed by 22 States. It invited the Inland Transport Committee's Working Party WP.29 to ensure the further development of the Agreement, including the preparation of proposals for rules to be annexed to it. The Conference endorsed draft amendments to the 1971 European Agreement supplementing the 1968 Convention on Road Traffic, aimed at promoting the use of vehicles in international transport that complied with international environmental standards in force; ECE members were encouraged to implement them.

In the Vienna Declaration, ECE member States undertook to work towards sustainable transport, reducing the negative impact of transport and traffic on the environment and human health by promoting measures to reach volumes and patterns of transport compatible with sustainable development. Taking into account the costs and benefits of transport and the specific characteristics of the situation of individual countries, they decided, among other things, to work towards a close integration of environment, health and transport policies at the local, national and international levels; integrate the principles of sustainable development, in particular the protection, precautionary, prevention and polluter pays principle, in their transport policies; and promote those means of transport that best contributed to the attainment of those goals and principles of sustainable transport. The Conference also identified action to promote energy-efficient and less-polluting vehicles and fuels and efficient and sustainable transport systems, to protect sensitive areas, and to promote sustainable urban transport, safe transport of dangerous goods and the prevention of water pollution.

The Programme of Joint Action contained a detailed description of possible measures and solutions to be taken at the international and national levels.

Energy

On 24 April (E/1997/36 (dec. C(52))), the Commission endorsed the decision of the Working Party on Coal and that of the Committee on Energy at their 1996 sessions to approve the new United Nations Framework Classification for Reserves/Resources: Solid Fuels and Mineral Commodities. It requested the ECE secretariat to publish by November 1997 the Framework Classification to facilitate its use by major coal and mineral industries worldwide, and it recommended that the Committee on Sustainable Energy monitor its application commencing in 1997 and that the Economic and Social Council consider measures for its worldwide application.

The Council, by decision 1997/226 of 18 July, noted the Commission's decision and invited UN Member States, international organizations and the regional commissions to take appropriate measures to ensure worldwide application of the Framework Classification.

The Committee on Sustainable Energy (formerly the Committee on Energy), at its seventh session (Geneva, 5-7 November) [ECE/ENERGY/32], suggested ways to introduce the Framework Classification, including the preparation, by ECE and by a UN task force, of an action plan for regional and subregional application of the Framework Classification in western Europe (European Union member States), central/eastern economies in transition, CIS member States, Asia, Latin America and Africa; the holding of training seminars in each region and subregion; and consideration by the ECE Working Party on Gas in 1998 of the suitability of incorporating the existing national Gas and Petroleum Classifications into that umbrella Classification.

In other decisions, the Committee set up an Ad Hoc Group of Experts on the Extension of European Electricity Interconnection to coordinate the activities of a project on the subject and adopted its terms of reference. The Committee also adopted its own terms of reference and those of the Working Party on Gas and the Steering Committee of the Energy Efficiency 2000 Project; and approved tasks for the Ad Hoc Group of Experts on Coal and Thermal Power.

Agriculture

The Meeting of Experts on Coordination of Standardization of Fresh Fruit and Vegetables, at its forty-third session (Geneva, 12-16 May) [AGRI/WP.1/GE.1/50], discussed a revision of standards for apples, pears, citrus fruit, broccoli, tomatoes, table grapes and asparagus, and postponed to its next session discussion on peas, onions, beans, garlic, plums, peaches, nectarines and cultivated mushrooms, as well as on a proposal to include provisions for miniature fruit and vegetables in UN/ECE standards, the usefulness of sizing, and the establishment of a list of countries using code-marks.

The Timber Committee, at its fifty-fifth session (Geneva, 6-9 October) [ECE/TIM/89], reviewed its activities in support of sustainable forest management, to which it had attached the highest priority. Following discussion of the special topic "Markets for certified forest products", the Committee agreed to address certification-linked issues in its programme of work. The Committee reviewed preparations for the Temperate and Boreal Forest Resources Assessment 2000, and urged countries to provide the information requested and sufficient political and financial support to their national correspondents to enable them to accomplish their task. It also noted preparations for the Lisbon Ministerial Conference and the results of the first meeting of the Intergovernmental Forum on Forests. It approved its programme of work for 1998-2002.

Environment

In 1997, the Committee on Environmental Policy held a special session (Geneva, 21-22 January) [ECE/CEP/33] to consider implementation and fine-tuning of the environmental performance review (EPR) process and selection of the next countries to be reviewed; possible initiation of work on European energy conservation; inputs for the 1997 special session of the General Assembly and the Commission on Sustainable Development (see PART THREE, Chapter I); activities under the "Environment for Europe" process; and work under the European Environment and Health Committee.

The Committee requested its Bureau to summarize major experiences and problems in the EPR process, and to present proposals for its further improvement to the Committee's fourth session (see below). It decided to conduct a review of Slovenia in May 1997; the next EPRs were to be conducted in Kazakstan, Lithuania and Ukraine. It asked a group of experts with environmental and energy expertise to submit in 1998 a "white paper" and draft guidelines on energy conservation in Europe for consideration and transmission to the fourth Ministerial Conference "Environment for Europe" (Århus, Denmark, June 1998). The Committee discussed the development of an international instrument on the eradication of water-borne diseases and invited delegations to arrange for the participation of experts in an informal consultation, to be convened by the Regional Office for Europe of the World Health Organization and ECE, to elaborate further details of the initiative.

The Committee on Environmental Policy, at its fourth session (Geneva, 26-28 May) [ECE/CEP/35], reviewed the environmental performance of Slovenia and adopted recommendations for strengthening Slovenia's environmental policy and management. It considered ongoing activities under the "Environment for Europe" process, including work on energy conservation, and was informed of preparations for the fourth Ministerial Conference. Progress under regional environmental conventions and the negotiation of a draft convention on access to environmental information and public participation in environmental decision-making were also reviewed.

Human settlements

The Committee on Human Settlements, at its fifty-eighth session (Geneva, 15-17 September) [ECE/HBP/104], agreed on the terms of reference of an advisory board to be called the Housing and Urban Management Advisory Network. It recommended that resources be mobilized to ensure that the Network was fully established before the end of January 1998 and agreed to evaluate the Network's activities and decide on its future in 1999. Concerning housing privatization, the Committee decided that training facilities on privatization in countries in transition should be set up; ECE was asked to organize a training workshop on financing and privatization in one of those countries. The Committee reviewed its current programme of work and agreed to seek better cooperation and synergies with organizations within the ECE region and with the United Nations Development Programme and the World Bank.

Statistics

The Conference of European Statisticians, at its forty-fifth session (Geneva, 10-12 June) [ECE/CES/52], reviewed the integrated presentation and coordination of international statistical work in the ECE region, through the examination of the European Comparisons Programme, price statistics, minimum standards for metadata on the Internet, environmental accounting, household incomes and expenditures, international trade in financial services and other programme elements. It examined ECE-Eurostat-OECD joint data collection, best practices for official statistics and the impact of information technology development on statistical operations, including managerial considerations.

Latin America and the Caribbean

The Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC) did not meet in 1997. The Commission's twenty-seventh session was to be held in Oranjestad, Aruba, from 11 to 16 May 1998.

Economic trends

According to the 1997 summary of the economic survey of Latin America and the Caribbean [E/1998/14], the region's economies in 1997 secured one of their best performances in a quarter of a century, combining an average growth rate of 5.3 per cent, compared to 3.2 per cent during 1991-1996, with an average rate of inflation of under 11 per cent. Per capita gross domestic product (GDP) increased by 3.6 per cent, an increase of 14 per cent since the start of the decade. That was due especially to significant improvements in Argentina, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Mexico, Peru, Uruguay and Venezuela and continued strong growth in Chile and the Dominican Republic. Brazil, on the other hand, experienced only modest growth. Growth was widespread, with no country experiencing negative growth and six countries (Argentina, Chile, the Dominican Republic, Mexico, Peru and Uruguay) expanding activity by 6 to 8 per cent. In seven economies, the pace of growth was in the 4 to 6 per cent range, while in nine others it was around 3 per cent. Only Haiti, Jamaica and Saint Lucia experienced little or no growth. The region's overall success in 1996-1997 was stimulated by growth in investment, which far exceeded growth in GDP. The ratio of investment to GDP was expected to reach 24 per cent for the year, the highest in the 1990s. Investment growth, which was especially marked in Argentina, Bolivia, Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Mexico, Nicaragua and Venezuela, was financed by external capital, since domestic savings increased more slowly than GDP. Another contributing factor to the acceleration of economic capacity was export growth, which was strong in a number of countries.

Regional economic activity in 1997 was affected by the "El Niño" phenomenon, which caused serious drought in most of Central America and in some Caribbean countries and heavy rainfall in South America, hurting agricultural output, causing some damage to infrastructure and reducing catches of cold-water fish species.

Inflation rates continued to decline, from 882 per cent in 1993 to 11 per cent in 1997, the lowest level in 50 years. Single-digit inflation was achieved in 13 of 22 countries. In most countries, the rate of price increase slowed or remained low; only Barbados, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador and Haiti experienced increased inflation rates. Venezuela continued to have the highest inflation in the region, despite having succeeded in reducing it from 103 per cent to 38 per cent.

Urban unemployment declined slightly, from 7.7 to 7.4 per cent, due not to job creation but to reduced labour force participation, except in Argentina and Mexico, where a resumption of faster growth helped generate jobs and reduce unemployment. In Brazil, Colombia and Uruguay, on the other hand, the employment rate declined.

In the external sector, the region's current account deficit increased from $36 billion in 1996 to $60 billion in 1997, or 3.2 per cent of GDP, largely influenced by large deficits in Argentina, Brazil and Mexico and a smaller-than-usual surplus in Venezuela. In nine countries, the ratio of the deficit to GDP was over 4 per cent, and in six of those countries, it exceeded 5 per cent. The pattern of foreign trade returned to that of the earlier part of the decade, when imports had grown faster than exports. As a result, the foreign deficit widened from around $8 billion in the two previous years to $28 billion in 1997, mainly attributable to the shift in the merchandise trade balance to a deficit of some $11.6 billion, after two years of surpluses. The 18 per cent growth in the value of imports was due largely to a strong volume increase, since import prices were lower for almost all countries. The upswing in the volume of merchandise imports was due to the accelerated growth of domestic demand in most countries. That trend was most striking in Argentina, Bolivia, Ecuador, Mexico, Nicaragua and Venezuela, which all had large increases in import volumes. Other factors included real appreciation of the currency in practically all countries, especially Mexico and Venezuela, tariff reductions, and loosening of import restrictions in Central American countries and on some products in Brazil. Export volume increased by more than 11 per cent, twice the rate of increase in output, and exceeded the predicted increase of 7 per cent in world trade volume for 1997. Average export prices increased for most countries, with the exception of Argentina, Bolivia, Mexico, Uruguay and Venezuela. For those countries, the lower average export price was due to falling international prices of petroleum, grains and beef hides. Other products of great importance to the region, however, underwent price increases, most notably coffee and bananas, which were chiefly responsible for better export prices in Central America, where the trend was most pronounced; prices of beef, shrimp, aluminium, zinc and, to a lesser extent, copper also went up.

External debt

In 1997, the region's total external debt expanded to $645 billion, an increase of 2.5 per cent, less than that of the previous year. Only Brazil, Chile and Colombia recorded significant increases in external liabilities, due largely to increased private sector borrowing, while Argentina's increase reflected expansion of public external debt. A number of countries improved the structure of the maturities of their public external debt, while continuing efforts to reduce the cost of financing. External debt burden indicators for 1997 generally improved, although for a few countries, particularly in Central America, indicators still revealed cause for concern. Bolivia and Peru made progress in external debt negotiations. In March, Peru signed an agreement restructuring some $8 billion in external commercial debt, including late instalments and interest. In August, the World Bank approved a debt relief programme for Bolivia under the terms of the heavily indebted poor countries initiative.

Activities in 1997

Development policy and regional economic cooperation

The report on Commission activities between 1996 and 1998 [E/1998/41] stated that the ECLAC Economic Development Division continued in 1997 to analyse the economies of Latin America and the Caribbean and disseminate the results through its annual publications—Economic Survey of Latin America and the Caribbean and Preliminary Overview of the Economy of Latin America and the Caribbean—as well as electronically via the ECLAC Web page. The Division continued to study employment problems, especially the impact of structural reforms on employment, and government policies aimed at changing production patterns and promoting sustainable development and social equity, with an emphasis on assessing their effectiveness. It also carried out operational activities in fiscal policy and decentralization and implemented a project on privatization processes in Bolivia and Nicaragua. Two regional seminars were held on fiscal policy, stabilization and adjustment.

The Latin American Centre for Economic and Social Development (CLADES), which focused on information management for economic and social development, placed special emphasis on substantive analysis of information management, in the context of new productive linkages in the information industry and competition and cooperation among the public and private entities involved. Its operations during 1996-1997 were aimed particularly at strengthening information management in public and private institutions in the region. Seminars (in Chile, Cuba, Guatemala, Nicaragua and Venezuela) and training seminars (in Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Cuba, El Salvador, Guatemala, Nicaragua and Venezuela) were conducted to examine new aspects of information management for development, share experiences, and increase the awareness of information system directors and decision makers of the role of information in the socio-economic context.

During the 1996-1997 biennium, the Latin American and Caribbean Institute for Economic and Social Planning (ILPES) sought to meet the concerns and priorities of member Governments with respect to strategic State management. In 1997, it organized the nineteenth meeting of the Presiding Officers of the Regional Council for Planning (Madrid, Spain, 20-21 November), which discussed the Institute's functioning and examined strategic design and basic infrastructure. It held a seminar on political parties and strategic State management (Brasilia, Brazil, 28-29 November) and a technical seminar on strategy design and infrastructure (Santiago, Chile, 29-30 September). ILPES conducted nine international courses and a national course for over 300 participants from 14 countries. Some 14 regional courses on project preparation and evaluation were held for public-sector professionals, in the framework of the technical cooperation agreement with the Ministry of Planning and Cooperation of Chile. The Institute undertook 20 advisory missions to 20 central Governments and decentralized bodies and academic institutions in various countries of the region, including extensive assistance to El Salvador in institution strengthening and to Honduras for the submission of a project proposal for restructuring in the context of State reform. It issued studies on political parties and strategic management and on confronting poverty at the municipal level.

In the area of regional integration and cooperation, ECLAC monitored and evaluated activities and provided technical support to Governments in economic integration and cooperation among themselves. It prepared documents that addressed: diversification of markets and merchandise exports within the framework of the Latin American Integration Association, the Southern Cone Common Market (MERCOSUR) and the Andean Community; MERCOSUR, especially its future prospects; the intensification of economic links between the various subregional agreements in Latin America and the Caribbean; some specific features of integration; a summary of the debate and conclusions of the meeting on the promotion of intraregional trade and investment in Latin America and the Caribbean; and the North American Free Trade Agreement.

Industrial, scientific and technological development

The Joint ECLAC/United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) Industrial and Technological Development Unit continued to analyse the industrial restructuring process and to design policies to enhance the competitiveness of the countries of the region during the 1996-1997 biennium. The Unit's activities included studies carried out as part of various projects, resulting in the issuance of seven books, 17 articles and 26 official ECLAC documents. The Unit also organized nine conferences and seminars and conducted a number of training courses, most of which were at the postgraduate level. In addition, it held 23 computer application training workshops and developed seven versions of the relevant programmes for that purpose. The Unit also carried out 42 technical assistance missions to countries of the region.

Under the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP)/ECLAC regional project to promote innovation and competitiveness in the Latin American and Caribbean business sector, activities relating to various countries were carried out and technical assistance was provided in connection with policies on export promotion, human resource development, and technological innovation and diffusion. Government agencies were given support in the design of industrial policies and the modernization of business associations.

The first phase of the ECLAC/International Development Research Centre project on productive restructuring, industrial organization and international competitiveness in Latin America and the Caribbean was completed, and the second phase launched in 1997 with the start-up of research activities concerning the forestry cluster in Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia and Mexico. Work began on the project "A natural resource-cluster development strategy: its growth, distributive and environmental implications", and a cooperative agreement was signed with Colombia to prepare reports on forestry, dairy-product and petroleum-industry clusters. Work on the development of a methodology to evaluate the export competitiveness of countries or groups of countries in markets of great importance to Latin America and the Caribbean culminated in the design of a range of computer programs that together comprised the Competitive Analysis of Nations software system. Work also began on the project for small and medium-sized industrial enterprises in Latin America and the Caribbean and international competitiveness, the aim of which was to assess such firms' competitiveness and development and to propose ways to strengthen their ability to compete. Under an agreement with Chile, activities were conducted to coordinate and supplement efforts to optimize the use of available resources to promote and develop micro-enterprises and small and medium-sized businesses. A joint meeting was held in July to publicize Chile's programme in that area and to encourage the exchange of experiences relating to the development of the production sector in Latin America.

International trade and development finance

During the biennium, ECLAC activities focused on the design of policies and mechanisms to foster the gradual expansion and improvement of the trade linkages of Latin America and the Caribbean with the global economy, and their continued adaptation to changes associated with current trends towards globalization and increasing trade and financial liberalization. The International Trade, Finance and Transportation Division produced publications relating to Latin American and Caribbean trade policies. Further studies were produced on access to service markets and the promotion of economic ties between Japan and Latin America and the Caribbean. The 1997 edition of the Panorama de la inserción internacional de América Latina y el Caribe updated information published in 1996.

Development finance activities covered a joint ECLAC/UNDP regional project on financial policies for changing production patterns with social equity; issues related to savings, financial institutions and capital formation; pension systems reform; a joint ECLAC/Netherlands project on income distribution and poverty in recent stabilization and adjustment policies in Latin American and Caribbean countries; and a joint ECLAC/German Agency for Technical Cooperation project on reforms of the financing of health systems in Latin America and the Caribbean.

Natural resources and energy

In 1997, ECLAC's activities in natural resources and energy were directed at improving institutional management; defining the functions of the State, especially with respect to privatization and regulation; contributing to the design and application of public policies for integrated natural resource management; and supporting the regional implementation of international agreements relating to natural resource and energy management. Efforts were directed at strengthening regional technical mechanisms of analysis and consultation charged with ensuring implementation of international legal and political instruments relating to sustainable development. The subprogramme had developed a substantial technical assistance capability in integrated coastal zone management, employing an approach that incorporated the concept into a country's general sustainable development strategy.

In the area of water resource management, advisory assistance was provided on privatization of public utilities, especially with respect to regulation of monopolies. The subprogramme supported the formation of watershed authorities to promote multiple use of water resources, and followed up on implementation of the recommendations of Agenda 21 [YUN 1992, p. 672]. It continued to contribute to the Inter-American Dialogue on Water Management. Support was provided to municipalities in the management of watersheds, coastal areas and other natural zones. ECLAC, along with the Latin American Energy Organization, continued to support the project on energy and sustainable development covering energy and equity, energy and economic growth, energy and the environment, and reform, privatization and regulation of the energy sector.

Transport

The ECLAC Transport Unit carried out research into transport services in the context of integration, modernization and privatization of port operations, and the relationship between road infrastructure and urban transport. It also prepared a statistical newsletter and a shipping yearbook. Advisory services were provided to various countries with regard to urban transport, passenger transit, rail transport, multimodal transport, port privatization and labour reform. The Unit collaborated with the World Bank, the Inter-American Development Bank and the Institute for Latin American Integration on issues relating to the development of land-bridges and rail networks in the Southern Cone. Technical assistance and training on port modernization were provided within the framework of a joint programme with ESCAP.

Social development

In 1997, the ECLAC programme of work in social development was implemented against a background of economic recovery and adaptation to changes in the global economy, which created favourable conditions for achieving progress in overcoming poverty. The 1997 edition of the Social Panorama of Latin America was published. Work was concluded on the joint project with the Statistics and Economic Projections Division concerning analysis and assessment of recent socioeconomic progress in Latin American countries and the impact of social policies.

Technical assistance was provided, with UNDP assistance, to the Dominican Republic to assess the availability and quantity of basic information for developing a strategy for targeting social programmes. Technical cooperation activities were initiated with Honduras to formulate anti-poverty policies and to design and evaluate social policies and programmes. ECLAC activities also included analysis of social policies, with a view to the elaboration of methods to improve their design and implementation. A project on social programme management was launched and two expert meetings were organized to examine progress made in selected social programmes in Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Mexico and Paraguay. A meeting was held jointly with the Organization of American States (OAS) and Chile on the social institutional framework for overcoming poverty and for achieving equity, as was an expert meeting to analyse State reforms. Execution of the OAS/ECLAC Joint Programme on Social Policies for Latin America continued, supporting Argentina in its evaluation of programmes for older persons; Paraguay, to assess the effects of its school nutrition programme; and Chile, to assess the results of its micro-enterprise support programme. In addition, a regional course on the formulation and assessment of social projects was held. In the area of drug abuse, a regional meeting of experts was organized on illicit drug economics and consumption in Latin America and the Caribbean (Santiago, Chile, 13-15 January). Technical assistance was provided to the National Council for Narcotics Control of Chile for the analysis, evaluation and planning of the implementation of the national policy and plan for drug abuse prevention and control.

Regional follow-up to World Summit for Social Development

In follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development [YUN 1995, p. 1113], ECLAC organized the first regional conference (Sao Paulo, Brazil, 6-9 April), at which it presented a document entitled "The Equity Gap: Latin America, the Caribbean and the Social Summit". It contained an analysis of the social situation in the countries of the region; a summary of the economic and social reforms under way; and policy proposals for the attainment of Summit objectives.

The conference adopted the Sao Paulo Consensus [LC/G.1972 (CONF. 86/4)], by which ECLAC member countries renewed their commitment to actions to achieve objectives agreed upon at the World Summit. Among them were: prioritization of issues on the social agenda, and ensuring an appropriate allocation of resources to incorporate social equity into growth; guaranteeing that social development was a State priority; intensifying the complementarity between high, stable growth rates and human development; strengthening the role of social policies as State policies in the quest for higher levels of social equity and social integration; ensuring integrated approaches to the economic, social and environmental dimensions of development; and establishing a regional information database of successful experiences in social policy. The Commission secretariat was asked to convene a meeting within two years to analyse progress made and obstacles that remained.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 July [meeting 39], the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1997/56 [draft: E/1997/L.41] without vote [agenda item 7 (c)].

First regional meeting convened by the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean to evaluate the World Summit for Social Development

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling paragraph 95 (h) of the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development, in which the Summit recommended that regional commissions, in cooperation with the regional intergovernmental organizations and banks, convene, on a biennial basis, a meeting at a high political level to review progress made towards implementing the outcome of the Summit, exchange views on their respective experiences and adopt the appropriate measures,

1. Welcomes the convening by the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean of the first regional meeting to evaluate the World Summit for Social Development, which was held at Sao Paulo, Brazil, from 6 to 9 April 1997, with the participation of high-level representatives of Latin American and Caribbean countries;

2. Expresses its appreciation for the final document of the meeting, known as the Sao Paulo Consensus, in which the signatories undertook, inter alia, commitments related to the implementation of the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development;

3. Invites other regions to convene their respective evaluation meetings on the Summit.

Integration of women in development

ECLAC activities in the area of the integration of women in development centred on follow-up to the Regional Programme of Action for the Women of Latin America and the Caribbean, 1995-2001 [YUN 1994, p. 739], the Platform for Action of the Fourth World Conference on Women [YUN 1995, p. 1170], and preparations for the seventh session of the Regional Conference on the Integration of Women into the Economic and Social Development of Latin America and the Caribbean (Santiago, Chile, 19-21 November). That Conference evaluated progress made in implementing the Regional Programme of Action. It was preceded by two meetings of the Presiding Officers of the Regional Conference (Mexico City, 27-28 May; Santiago, 17 November) and a meeting of specialized agencies and other organizations of the UN system (Santiago, 18-21 November), which analysed constraints affecting the continuity of programmes and projects as well as opportunities for exchange and coordination within the framework of follow-up to the Platform for Action and the Regional Programme of Action. An expert meeting (Santiago, 28-30 April) was held on the relationship between non-governmental women's organizations and the State and its impact on the modalities of organizations and movements.

During the biennium, increased efforts were made to ensure that women's issues were taken into account in all ECLAC programmes. Activities carried out in that context included an examination of projects executed by substantive divisions and units of the ECLAC secretariat with a view to the inclusion of elements of gender analysis in their terms of reference and interdivisional meetings to carry out joint analyses of studies on the status of women. During the second half of 1997, training workshops were held within ECLAC to facilitate the institutionalization and mainstreaming of the gender perspective in the activities of the work programme and in technical co-operation for development. The Women and Development Unit prepared various studies, including "Sustainable development, poverty and gender in Latin America and the Caribbean: working towards the year 2000", "Access to power and participation in decision-making in Latin America and the Caribbean: policies for gender equity looking to the year 2000", and "Female human resources development: growth and equity as priorities".

Environment and human settlements

ECLAC's work in the area of environment and human settlements continued within the framework of the region's effort to implement Agenda 21, to follow up the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) [YUN 1996, p. 992], and to fulfil the Latin American and Caribbean Regional Plan of Action on Human Settlements [YUN 1995, p. 1044]. Activities were carried out in coordination with the subprogramme on natural resources and energy, particularly in areas relating to the implementation of multilateral agreements, with special emphasis on those concerning the transboundary movement of hazardous wastes and the conservation of biodiversity. Many activities of the ECLAC/German Agency for Technical Cooperation project on the environmentally sound management of urban and industrial waste tied in with analytical and other work to strengthen regional cooperation in connection with the Basel Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes and their Disposal [YUN 1989, p. 420], in collaboration with the Convention secretariat. Work on the question of environmental policy repercussions on international trade concerned the analysis of environmental aspects of subregional economic integration agreements (particularly MERCOSUR) and the interaction between international trade and the environment in Latin America and the Caribbean. Issues relating to the types of environmental information needed for urban management were examined under a project on urban management in selected medium-sized cities. In 1997, the second phase of the project was conducted and a second regional technical seminar (Santiago, 4-5 December), in collaboration with Italy, was held.

In the field of human settlements, the document entitled "Human settlements: the shelter of development" was updated and revised for submission to the sixth Regional Meeting of Ministers and High-level Authorities of the Housing and Urban Development Sector in Latin America and the Caribbean (San Jose, Costa Rica, 26-28 November).

Population

In 1997, the activities of the Latin American Demographic Centre (CELADE) focused on applied research, technical cooperation and training in demography. Its main research activities centred on the monitoring and analysis of demographic trends in the countries of the region; the formulation of methods for the use of demographic inputs in the design, implementation and evaluation of policies, programmes and projects at national, regional and local levels; and the design and upgrading of computer programs for conducting population analyses. Studies undertaken included "Impacto de las tendencias demográficas sobre los sectores sociales en América Latina: contribución al diseño de políticas y programas", "Metodología para determinar el ingreso y la proporción de hogares pobres", and "Información sobre población y pobreza para programas sociales". A number of studies were prepared and published concerning population estimates and projections, as well as specific topics relating to vulnerable groups, primarily in Bolivia, Chile, Guatemala, Paraguay and Peru. In addition, CELADE produced the final Windows version of the retrieval of data for small areas by microcomputer (REDATAM-Plus) computer program and three related tools: Access Plan, EduPlan and ZonPlan.

Technical assistance was provided to Mexico and Paraguay on population policies. Under an agreement with the Inter-American Development Bank, CELADE continued to provide support for the execution of social investment projects in Guatemala, Nicaragua, Paraguay and Peru. It also cooperated with national institutions in Guatemala, Nicaragua and seven Caribbean countries to promote intensive use of REDATAM-Plus and REDATAM/Geographic Information Systems (GIS). The twentieth intensive regional course on demographic analysis for development was held in 1997; substantive assistance was given to the University of Chile for conducting the seventh international postgraduate course on population and development, sponsored by the United Nations Population Fund. Support also continued for universities, government agencies and non-governmental organizations in population studies, teacher exchanges and in-service training.

Food and agriculture

The work of ECLAC's Agricultural Development Unit focused on coordination between agro-industries and agricultural producers; the agricultural land market; technological innovation and national agricultural research systems; the long-term outlook for the farm sector; the rural labour market; and an analysis of forestry/agricultural resource-based clusters. A planning workshop was held in April for a project on policy options to promote the development of agricultural land markets; case studies began for Bolivia, Guatemala and Peru. Studies funded by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) began on the land market in various areas in Mexico and in north-eastern Brazil. Technical assistance was provided to Paraguay as part of a joint UNDP/World Bank project on rural development strategies. At FAO's request, a study was carried out on the role and activities of international agricultural and forestry research centres in the region and how they interfaced with national research systems. Technical assistance in that area was also provided to Paraguay. At the request of Colombia, a study was prepared on subsidies and other forms of assistance for the food industry and agricultural sector; another dealt with the agricultural sector in Chile as viewed from the standpoint of the integration process in Latin America and the Caribbean. Other studies focused on the potato market in Chile and dairy-industry clusters.

Statistics and economic projections

The ECLAC Statistics and Economic Projections Division conducted activities to enlarge the regional framework of statistics information; develop and disseminate statistical information; promote regional cooperation on statistics; and prepare studies on development in Latin America and the Caribbean and the region's position in the global economy.

Regional cooperation projects on statistics were under way on the development of statistical databases, household surveys, improvement of national accounts, production of basic statistics and social policies and programmes. Major efforts were made to adapt and produce: basic statistics in the framework of a regional strategy for the implementation of the 1993 System of National Accounts [YUN 1993, p. 1112]; environmental statistics and indicators; poverty statistics and indicators; and service statistics. Studies on development and the region's position in the world economy examined outside factors that influenced trends in the economies of Latin America and the Caribbean and their prospects over the medium term. Country-by-country macro-economic projections were updated, and the region's economy was monitored as part of Project Link, which coordinated world economic projections.

Transnational corporations

During 1997, the activities of the Joint ECLAC/United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) Unit on Transnational Corporations were directed towards information, research and technical cooperation. The Unit, in collaboration with national bodies and its network of correspondents, continued to update the electronic database Directorio sobre inversión extranjera en América Latina y el Caribe 1993: marco legal e información estadística, expand its range of legal and statistical information, and standardize and improve the comparability of the corresponding statistical series of the region. The Unit explored the role of transnationals in industrial restructuring and international competitiveness, and participated in an interregional UNCTAD project on the impact of transnational corporations in relation to that topic. Case studies examined large-scale investments in manufacturing, mainly in the trade sector and in physical infrastructure in Latin America in the 1990s in the context of recent economic and institutional reforms. The Unit also compiled and processed data on sectoral investment to identify a group of investors in relevant sectors to analyse the level of systematic competitiveness. A comparative study was also carried out on the legal framework and hiring practices in the petroleum sector.

Technical cooperation and assistance

During the year, ECLAC's Programme Planning and Operations Division completed 55 regional, subregional and national projects financed from extrabudgetary funds. It launched 18 new projects, 8 of which were completed in 1997.

ECLAC continued to support and promote technical cooperation among developing countries (TCDC) in the region, including the exchange of experience and of practical results obtained. A project to upgrade the capabilities of TCDC focal points, carried out with UNDP resources, helped countries gain access to the Internet, prepare home pages and provide up-to-date information on technical cooperation. Project results were submitted to the thirteenth annual meeting of Directors of International Technical Cooperation of Latin America and Caribbean Countries (Antigua, Guatemala, May). ECLAC also reported on the TCDC potential of its technical cooperation activities in decentralization.

Subregional activities

Caribbean

The ECLAC subregional headquarters for the Caribbean—the secretariat of the Caribbean Development and Cooperation Committee (CDCC) (Port of Spain, Trinidad and Tobago)—focused on the analysis of issues relevant to the economic and social development of the subregion.

Activities were developed to foster cooperation in operational and sectoral areas among CDCC countries and between them and the countries of Latin America. Issues affecting the smaller economies of the Caribbean subregion continued to be studied jointly with the special subcommittee on the Free Trade Area of the Americas and the secretariat of the Association of Caribbean States. In addition, working relations continued to be consolidated with the Caribbean Community (CARICOM), the Latin American Economic System (SELA), the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States (OECS), and other subregional and regional institutions. Efforts were made to ensure that the special circumstances and needs of the non-independent Caribbean countries were given due attention.

Priority was given to the social aspects of development. Mechanisms were put in place to provide advisory services and technical assistance to Governments and institutions in the subregion, so that they could undertake follow-up activities to world conferences organized in 1994 and 1995. In that regard, the subregional headquarters, CARICOM and the United Nations Development Fund for Women jointly convened a Caribbean subregional ministerial conference (Guyana, 6-8 August) to examine progress made by Governments of the subregion since the sixth session of the Regional Conference on the Integration of Women into the Economic and Social Development of Latin America and the Caribbean [YUN 1994, p. 739], and to review the implementation of recommendations adopted at the Fourth World Conference on Women [YUN 1995, p. 1170]. Prior to that meeting, an expert group meeting on gender planning (Trinidad and Tobago, 16-17 July) agreed on core gender planning issues to be addressed in the Caribbean, and adopted a methodology to integrate the gender dimension into the planning process, for consideration by the ministerial conference. The subregional headquarters also organized a meeting (Barbados, 10-14 November) of ministers of Caribbean countries, at which Governments identified priority activities and policies in respect of implementation of the Programme of Action of the Global Conference on the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States [YUN 1994, p. 783]. Taking into account the changing economic scenario facing many Caribbean countries and the impact of structural adjustment programmes, the subregional headquarters convened a meeting to formulate a strategic plan of action to ensure that the components of economic development strategies could be integrated into an ongoing platform for change, and to establish a framework for sustainable structural development and institutional changes in the Caribbean, in the context of the global economy.

A seminar on the promotion of trade and investment in Latin America and the Caribbean (Trinidad and Tobago, 23-24 September) analysed intraregional relations in Latin America and the Caribbean, as well as those between the region and other regions, and proposed policy options for fostering greater development of economic links and trade and investment ties among the various subregional integration schemes. The Caribbean Council for Science and Technology continued to receive assistance. The Council decided to forge closer ties with CARICOM, thereby paving the way to becoming recognized as an organization with responsibility for implementing regional science and technology projects in the Caribbean.

Reports were produced reviewing the economic, trade and financial performance of the CDCC member countries. Newsletters provided up-to-date information on trade, development, sustainable development, public-sector reform, structural adjustment and privatization policies in the subregion. Technical cooperation services were provided to member Governments and regional and subregional institutions on issues relating to environmentally sustainable development programmes.

Mexico and Central America

The subregional headquarters in Mexico expanded its study and analysis of high-priority topics, including regional and hemispheric-wide integration. It gave special attention to institutional restructuring in Central America; reforming models of social security and social development; promoting non-traditional exports and export competitiveness; food security and deregulation of the agricultural sector; and changes in industrial production patterns.

A meeting of experts was held (Mexico City, 26-27 May) on promoting savings in a situation of openness and financial liberalization. Technical cooperation activities on the economic situation in Mexico took place. In the area of social development, studies were carried out on the contribution of civil society in Central American countries and on gender, poverty and social security. Concerning international trade, a number of studies were under way on subregional integration processes, hemispheric-wide integration, and the competitiveness of Central American economies. A meeting of experts was held (Mexico City, 5-7 August) on subregional free trade agreements and the Central American integration process, and support was provided for a third course on Central American integration, organized jointly with SELA. The effects of the liberalization of trade and agriculture in Central America were analysed. Research took place on the manufacturing sector, particularly in the Dominican Republic and Guatemala; on technological innovation and the development of competitiveness in the region; and on the impact of integration on production. Studies in energy were undertaken on the supply of oil and gas, as part of a collaborative effort between ECLAC and the German Agency for Technical Cooperation, and on the integration of electrical energy in Central America.

Cooperation between the United Nations and the Latin American Economic System

In response to General Assembly resolution 50/14 [YUN 1995, p. 1047], the Secretary-General reported [A/52/376] in September on cooperation between the United Nations and the Latin American Economic System (SELA), which had intensified and become more diversified. Such cooperation included meetings of ECLAC and SELA representatives, preparation of specialized documents, and inter-agency activities relating to integrated social policies in Latin America and the Caribbean. Joint activities were also carried out in the areas of economic and social policies in Latin America and the Caribbean, social aspects of integration and the follow-up conference to the World Summit for Social Development. ILPES also coordinated its programme of activities with SELA. FAO and SELA maintained frequent contacts, and established a framework for cooperation under the regional programme on vegetal germ plasm and biotechnology and food security projects. Future cooperation in food security, trade policy in connection with the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations and competitiveness was identified.

Cooperation between the World Trade Organization and SELA continued through regional and national seminars, technical missions, workshops and meetings on the Uruguay Round agreements. Cooperation with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) took place with regard to world change, technological prospects, intellectual property and development of craft micro-enterprises. "Project Demos" dealt with economic and social policies and higher education.

The World Bank participated in elaborating priorities for accelerating growth and reducing poverty in the countries of the region at the Third Annual Bank Conference on Development in Latin America and the Caribbean (Montevideo, Uruguay, 29 June-1 July), and enhanced consultations on a regional developmental agenda were expected. The World Intellectual Property Organization conducted the Latin American and Caribbean Symposium on the Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights in cooperation with Venezuela and SELA (13-15 May). UNDP funded technical assistance in selected areas, primarily trade.

Cooperation activities also continued with the International Labour Organization, the International Monetary Fund, the World Meteorological Organization, UNIDO, UNCTAD and the United Nations University.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 22 October [meeting 35], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/3 [draft: A/52/L.6] without vote [agenda item 25].

Cooperation between the United Nations and the Latin American Economic System

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 50/14 of 15 November 1995 on cooperation between the United Nations and the Latin American Economic System,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on cooperation between the United Nations and the Latin American Economic System,

Bearing in mind the Agreement between the United Nations and the Latin American Economic System, in which the parties agree to strengthen and expand their cooperation in matters which are of common concern in the field of their respective competence pursuant to their constitutional instruments,

Considering that the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean has developed ties of cooperation with the Latin American Economic System which have grown stronger in recent years,

Bearing in mind that the Permanent Secretariat of the Latin American Economic System has carried out several programmes with the support of the United Nations Development Programme in areas that are considered of priority for the economic and social development of the region,

Considering that the Latin American Economic System is developing joint activities with the specialized agencies and other organizations and programmes of the United Nations system, such as the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, the World Health Organization and the World Intellectual Property Organization,

Welcoming the continued monitoring of changes in the treatment of topics relating to the United Nations system, in close contact with the delegations of the Member States participating in such deliberations,

1. Takes note with satisfaction of the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Urges the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean to continue broadening and deepening its coordination and mutual support activities with the Latin American Economic System;

3. Urges the United Nations Development Programme, within its new overall framework and high-priority development objectives in support of sustainable human development, to renew and expand its financial and technical cooperation with the programmes that the Permanent Secretariat of the Latin American Economic System is carrying out in areas of mutual interest and concern, aimed at complementing the technical assistance activities conducted by the Latin American Economic System;

4. Urges the specialized agencies and other organizations, funds and programmes of the United Nations system to continue and intensify their support for, and cooperation in the activities of, the Latin American Economic System;

5. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Permanent Secretary of the Latin American Economic System to assess, at the appropriate time, the implementation of the Agreement between the United Nations and the Latin American Economic System and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session a report on the implementation of the present resolution.

Programme and organizational questions

Impact of UN reform

By a 6 January note [E/1997/5], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Economic and Social Council reports of 1996 ECLAC meetings [YUN 1996, p. 930] on the impact of UN reform on ECLAC, a 1996 Commission resolution on the subject and a proposed order of priorities for execution of the 1998-1999 work programme.

By decision 1997/211 of 7 February, the Council took note of the document and transmitted it to the Committee for Programme and Coordination (CPC) for consideration.

The second meeting of the ad hoc working group (New York, 5 June) reviewed recent reform measures adopted by ECLAC. In that connection, it considered a note entitled "Review of recent reforms adopted by the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean" [LC/G.1962] and a document on a management pilot scheme [LC/G.1964]. Participants agreed on the importance of the scheme and endorsed the general thrust of the proposals made for decentralization. The Committee of the Whole of the Commission was to consider the matter further.

CPC, at its thirty-seventh session (New York, 9 June–3 July) [A/52/16], noted that ECLAC had begun to implement reform and institutional development measures well in advance of the recent reform drive in the UN system. ECLAC's modernization efforts included rationalization of the functioning of intergovernmental forums, strategic planning and training for medium- and senior-level managers.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 July [meeting 39], the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of ECLAC [E/1997/40/Add.1], adopted resolution 1997/54 without vote [agenda item 10].

Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean in the context of reform of the United Nations

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean resolution 553(XXVI) on reform of the United Nations and its impact on the Commission and, in particular, its decision to establish an ad hoc working group open to all its member countries, which group was empowered, inter alia, to recommend to the Commission strategic directions for its future activities in the context of the ongoing process of reform of the United Nations,

Taking note of the discussions at the second meeting of the ad hoc working group established pursuant to Commission resolution 553(XXVI), held in New York on 5 June 1997,

Bearing in mind its resolution 1996/41 of 26 July 1996 and General Assembly resolution 50/227 of 24 May 1996, which refer to the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields and call for a review of the regional commissions with a view to strengthening and enhancing their effectiveness as action- and policy-oriented bodies,

Bearing in mind also its request that the regional commissions should continue to undertake their own assessments, as called for in General Assembly resolution 50/227, and should report to the Council at its substantive session of 1997,

Taking note of the notes of 15 and 21 April 1997 by the secretariat of the Commission entitled "Review of recent reforms adopted by the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean" and "Management pilot scheme",

Reaffirming that the initiative on the pilot management scheme presented by the Commission secretariat is aimed at strengthening the role of the organization as a centre of excellence charged with collaborating with member States in a comprehensive analysis of development processes geared to the design, monitoring and evaluation of public policies and the resulting provision of operational services in the fields of specialized information, advisory services and training and support for regional and international cooperation and coordination,

Convinced that it is essential for the United Nations, in carrying out activities in the economic, social and related fields, to take account of the regional dimension and the decentralization of tasks in accordance with the comparative advantages of its subsidiary bodies located in the developing regions,

1. Notes with satisfaction the progress made by the secretariat of the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean in fulfilling the instructions of the Commission, as expressed in its resolution 553(XXVI), in particular with regard to institutional matters and management improvement and the coordination of activities with other organizations, in order to maintain its validity and relevance in the face of evolving circumstances that affect not only Latin American and Caribbean development, but also the United Nations;

2. Also notes with satisfaction the work carried out by the ad hoc working group established pursuant to Commission resolution 553(XXVI) in defining priorities for all elements of the programme of work of the Commission for the biennium 1998-1999 and the progress achieved in formulating additional strategic directions;

3. Urges the ad hoc working group, in consultation with the Executive Secretary of the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean, to ensure that, notwithstanding the changing internal and external circumstances affecting the implementation of the programme of work, the activities carried out by the secretariat of the Commission are based on the priorities established and the guidelines contained in the progress report of the ad hoc working group;

4. Supports the general thrust of the management pilot scheme, which will be developed and described in detail and submitted for consideration and approval by States members of the Commission before its implementation, taking into account the statements made by the members of the ad hoc working group during its second meeting, held in New York on 5 June 1997;

5. Requests the Executive Secretary to keep members informed during the implementation phase of the management pilot scheme, through the ad hoc working group, with the aim of monitoring its effectiveness and impact on the work of the Commission;

6. Concurs with the general thrust of the strategic proposal by the secretariat of the Commission on deployment of human resources contained in the document on reform measures, with a view to generating, while ensuring the optimum utilization of expertise available within the Commission and the United Nations system, more effective results, in accordance with the needs and requirements of the countries of the region, for a given amount of resources by adequately altering the mix of in-house staff and outsourced expertise and services, and welcomes further consultation between the secretariat and member States on the details of such a plan prior to implementation;

7. Recommends that, as reform of the United Nations proceeds in the economic, social and related areas, a clear division of responsibilities should be established with regard to regional activities in Latin America and the Caribbean between the Commission, on the one hand, and the programmes, agencies and funds of the United Nations system and regional intergovernmental organizations, on the other, with a view to achieving appropriate coordination and mutual reinforcement in their respective activities;

8. Requests the Executive Secretary to continue to intensify, in the general context of the reform process of the United Nations in the economic, social and related areas, the reform measures referred to in the present resolution and in Commission resolution 553(XXVI) and to report thereon to the Commission at its next session, to be held at Aruba in April 1998.

Western Asia

The Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia (ESCWA) held its nineteenth session in Beirut, Lebanon, on 7 and 8 May [E/1997/39]. The session was preceded by the tenth session of its Technical Committee (Beirut, 5-6 May). ESCWA and the Technical Committee assessed progress in the implementation of the 1996-1997 work programme, reviewed follow-up action to Commission resolutions adopted in 1995 and to those of the its Statistical and Social Development Committees, and examined regional preparations and follow-up to UN world conferences and ESCWA regional meetings, the proposed medium-term plan for 1998-2001, the draft programme of work for 1998-1999, the financial status of Commission programmes, ESCWA's regional role in the coordination of UN agency activities, and the report of the Advisory Committee on strengthening the role and performance of ESCWA. The Commission adopted the report of the Technical Committee [E/ESCWA/19/4], including its draft resolutions.

Economic and social trends

Economic trends

Overall economic performance in the ESCWA region improved in 1997, according to the summary of the survey of economic and social developments in the region for that year [E/1998/15]. The regional gross domestic product (GDP), excluding Iraq, although registering only a 3.4 per cent growth, compared to 5.5 per cent the previous year, marked the second consecutive year of positive growth. That growth rate was attributable to a significant increase in oil production in several countries, which had kept oil revenues at 1996 levels despite falling prices, and the initiation and acceleration of economic reforms in many countries of the region. Higher growth was stymied by an estimated 7.9 per cent decline in international oil prices, periodic closures of the borders of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, political instability caused by the stalled Middle East peace process, terrorist attacks on tourists, and continued UN economic sanctions on Iraq.

There was, however, a marked difference between the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) countries (Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates), the combined GDP growth rate of which declined from 5.9 per cent in 1996 to 3 per cent in 1997, and countries or areas with more diversified economies (Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, the Syrian Arab Republic, Yemen and the West Bank and Gaza Strip), the growth rate of which remained steady at an estimated 4.4 per cent.

Among GCC countries, Bahrain, Kuwait and Oman recorded respective reduced growth rates in 1997 of 2.8, 2.3 and 5 per cent compared to 3.1, 2.8 and 6.7 per cent in 1996. Saudi Arabia registered a reduced growth rate of 2.8 per cent compared to 5 per cent the previous year; the largest reduction was that of the United Arab Emirates, which recorded an estimated GDP growth rate of 0.8 per cent, well below the 7.1 and 9.9 per cent registered in 1995 and 1996, respectively. On the other hand, Qatar registered the highest real GDP growth in 1997—15.5 per cent compared to 10 per cent in 1996, mainly due to the tremendous growth in the oil sector and to natural gas projects.

As for the countries with more diversified economies, Egypt's growth rate remained the same at 5.1 per cent. Economic conditions in Iraq remained poor in 1997, attributed largely to UN-imposed economic sanctions. Jordan was estimated to have registered a growth rate of 5 per cent in 1997, compared to 5.2 per cent in 1996, and Lebanon's continued to decline, to an estimated 3.5 per cent in 1997. That decline may have been due to the reduction in capital expenditures, coupled with a reduction in private-sector investment, owing mainly to high interest rates and poor export performance. The Syrian Arab Republic once again registered the lowest GDP growth rate of the region's more diversified economies apart from Iraq and the West Bank and Gaza Strip, 2 per cent. A 24 per cent decline in cereal output, together with a 3.4 per cent decline in oil production in 1997, as well as a reduction in tourism revenues, prevented the country from achieving a higher growth rate. The West Bank and Gaza Strip realized a modest turnaround, with a growth rate of 1.2 per cent in 1997; a major factor was losses caused by border closures. Yemen, the region's least developed country, saw its GDP grow by an estimated 5.4 per cent in 1997 against 4.4 per cent in 1996.

Inflation rates, generally low in most ESCWA countries in 1996, fell even further in 1997. The highest inflation rate in 1997 in GCC countries was an estimated 2.8 per cent in the United Arab Emirates, while the lowest among the more diversified economies was 4.7 per cent in Jordan. Inflation rates in GCC countries in 1997 were the lowest among developing countries worldwide—less than 1 per cent in Oman and Saudi Arabia and less than 3 per cent in other GCC countries. Those nations continued to pursue prudent monetary policies in 1997. With the exception of the Kuwaiti dinar, currencies were pegged to the United States dollar, with which they appreciated against most Western European and all Far Eastern currencies, resulting in lower prices for imported goods, which kept inflation rates down.

The unemployment problem remained a formidable challenge for many countries of the region in 1997, particularly for those with more diversified economies. The problem had been compounded over the years by the region's relatively higher population growth and low economic growth rates, as well as by overstaffing in the public sector. However, many Governments were discontinuing the policy of being an employer of last resort and job-seekers were facing greater difficulties. The West Bank and Gaza Strip witnessed a decline in their unemployment rate from 24 per cent in 1996 to 21 per cent in 1997, while that of Yemen remained at its 1996 level of 25 per cent, a situation not expected to improve much unless the private sector increased investment and employment significantly in the future. Egypt's rate of unemployment was estimated at less than 9 per cent in 1997, and that of the Syrian Arab Republic was estimated in the single digits. GCC countries were also concerned about unemployment; in most countries, the indigenous labour force was growing at an annual rate of 5 per cent. Those nations aimed to replace foreign workers with their own nationals.

Economic reform and structural adjustment programmes continued to be implemented in most diversified ESCWA member countries in 1997. The tendency was to move away from inward-looking economic development strategies; the economic dominance of the region's Governments appeared to be declining steadily. There was more emphasis on the private sector as the engine of growth and development and the major source of employment opportunities. The pace of economic reform varied widely among member countries and was most intense in the more diversified economies, notably Egypt and Yemen. The momentum gained in 1995 was lost in GCC countries with the exception of Oman. The policy to broaden and diversify the tax base and further reduce government subsidies was generally suspended in 1997.

In GCC countries, the rise in oil revenues further reduced budget deficits, which in 1997 were financed mainly by domestic borrowing rather than by drawing on foreign reserves or resorting to external borrowing, as had been the case over the past few years. The 1997 budgets of the more diversified ESCWA economies continued to be deflationary. Those countries sought alternative means to reduce deficits, by increasing domestic revenues or reducing expenditures through cutting subsidies or debt service payments. Most also resorted to domestic borrowing, while a number of them, such as Jordan and Lebanon, turned to external borrowing.

In the face of sound economic growth and financial sector reform and more developed financial markets, the easing of relatively restrictive banking conditions in the region continued in 1997, resulting in strong banking performance.

Oil

The region's oil production reached an average of 17.35 million barrels per day in 1997, compared to 16.27 barrels in 1996, with considerable increases in Iraq and Qatar and more modest increases in other ESCWA countries. Production in those two countries in 1997 increased 95.7 per cent and 27.2 per cent, respectively, over 1996 production levels. Oil revenues in the region totalled an estimated $99.05 billion in 1997, $1.03 billion lower than in 1996. The 6.6 per cent increase in oil production by ESCWA countries, and smaller declines in oil prices in individual ESCWA countries, permitted the region to maintain a high overall oil revenue. In addition, the purchasing power of the ESCWA region's oil revenues was strengthened in 1997 by the 12 per cent appreciation of the United States dollar against other major currencies and the even larger appreciation against other currencies, including some Far Eastern countries.

Trade

The region's trade was estimated to have decreased by 1.5 per cent in 1997, with total exports decreasing by 4.5 per cent and imports increasing by 2.3 per cent.

In GCC countries, exports decreased by 4.8 per cent as a result of an 8 per cent drop in oil prices, with Kuwait and Qatar recording decreases of 6.6 and 6.3 per cent, respectively. Total imports increased by 3.5 per cent; the largest increases, 10 per cent, were recorded by Bahrain, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates. In the more diversified economies, total exports declined by 1.4 per cent. They decreased sharply in Lebanon (12.5 per cent) and Yemen (7.2 per cent). Egypt, which achieved the largest increase in exports (10.9 per cent) in 1997, recorded a 21 per cent increase in its non-oil exports, particularly manufactured goods. Total imports decreased slightly in 1997, by 0.3 per cent. Egypt was the major importing country in the group, with imports representing 40 per cent of the group's combined imports and 12.4 per cent of the ESCWA region's total imports.

The region's import/export ratio was estimated at 1.19 in 1997, with that of GCC countries estimated at 1.55 and that of the more diversified economies at 0.38. The region's international reserves (minus gold) rose significantly to $52.3 billion, compared to $48.6 billion in 1996, with that of GCC countries amounting to $23.36 billion—46.3 per cent of the region's total reserves. Egypt had the largest international reserves among ESCWA countries, reaching $19.08 billion in September 1997.

Most countries made tangible progress in trade liberalization. Trade policy reforms were a major feature of economic reforms carried out in 1997. The unification of tariff rates was the cornerstone of trade negotiations among GCC countries. In the more diversified economies, Egypt had made considerable progress, completing its commitments to the World Trade Organization (WTO) and abolishing the prohibition of imports of poultry and textiles in 1997, which had been exempted to protect local production. Yemen had taken steps towards trade liberalization in the light of the application of economic reform policies with the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF).

Social trends

Urban population growth in the ESCWA region was still faster than total population growth; the urban population grew from 37 million to 83 million in the period 1975-1995, an increase of 124 per cent, compared to total population growth for the same period of 81 per cent. That growth was mainly due to relatively high rates of rural-to-urban migration, a phenomenon of the more diversified economies in the region. In GCC countries, high rates of urbanization were stimulated by international and regional migration, in addition to natural increases. Urbanization policies in the region had so far had limited success in curbing spatial imbalance associated with the urbanization process.

Measures had been adopted by most ESCWA member countries to promote rural development, including agricultural development projects, expansion and upgrading of the physical infrastructure in the rural hinterland, and new town development strategies to spatially diffuse urban growth. However, such measures were often offset by the limited financial and administrative capacity of public-sector agencies to implement such strategies. Examples of urban growth in the ESCWA region included the Amman-Zarqa urban corridor, the largest urban concentration in Jordan, where most industrial activities and social and educational facilities were located. Damascus, Cairo and Alexandria displayed similar patterns, where large investments in infrastructure development and the establishment of satellite towns reinforced rural-to-urban migration. In addition to administrative decentralization, some important policy measures had been initiated by national Governments, private institutions and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) to address human settlement challenges into the twenty-first century through an integrated and multidisciplinary approach. The work of national committees on human settlements in several ESCWA member countries was also favourably received, particularly in developing forums for negotiations between State and public-sector agencies and private organizations.

In some ESCWA countries, adverse social effects might have resulted from structural adjustment programmes and economic reforms, especially in the short term. The pressures of demographic factors and insufficient levels of agricultural production, coupled with a gradual cut in subsidies for basic goods, were leading to poverty and unemployment among the urban poor population. To reschedule the country's international debt, Jordan followed an IMF programme that reduced subsidies and froze public-sector salaries; it had begun to cut a government payroll that accounted for nearly 50 per cent of the workforce. Some countries, such as Egypt and Lebanon, as well as the West Bank and Gaza Strip, had a higher rate of poverty in rural areas than in urban areas. The rural poor's reliance on food subsidies was considered alarming. In Egypt, subsidized food contributed 17.9 per cent of food expenditure of the poorest quartile of rural households and 50 per cent of their per capita calorie intake in 1992.

Wide disparities in standards of living throughout the region, as well as within countries, had led to increasing social tension and crime rates, particularly among youth in low-income neighbourhoods.

In the ESCWA region, young people between the ages of 15 and 24 would account for nearly 20 per cent of total population by the year 2000; children under age 15 would account for more than 40 per cent. The number of disabled persons in the ESCWA region was projected to reach 11.2 million in the year 2000; there was a significant underestimation of the disabled population as a result of cultural and social pressure.

Activities in 1997

During 1997, ESCWA activities under the 1996-1997 work programme focused on the management of natural resources and the environment; improvement of the quality of life; economic development and cooperation; regional development and global changes; and special programmes and issues.

Economic development and cooperation

At its 1997 session, the Technical Committee considered a note [E/ESCWA/19/6] by the Executive Secretary on concerns of ESCWA member States regarding WTO, related agreements and future trade negotiations. Annexed to the note were summaries of four studies by ESCWA on the challenges and opportunities of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) and WTO agreements and their implications for ESCWA members.

The Technical Committee emphasized the importance of conducting practical studies on possible areas of coordination and cooperation among ESCWA members so that countries in the region could take advantage of international changes and developments, in particular within the framework of the Euro-Mediterranean Partnership. In view of the importance of international trade for the economies of member States, it was proposed that a committee on foreign trade be created. The Committee highlighted the need to approach the issue of privatization from a more comprehensive social and economic perspective, to carry out a study on the philosophy of the private sector and its role, and to recognize the importance of money markets, small and medium-sized enterprises and business incubators in development.

On 7 May, the Commission decided [E/1997/39 (res. 214(XIX))] to establish a technical committee on liberalization of foreign trade and economic globalization in the countries of the ESCWA region, and submitted a resolution to the Economic and Social Council for adoption.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 18 July [meeting 34], the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of ESCWA [E/1997/40/Add.1], adopted resolution 1997/12 without vote [agenda item 10].

Establishment of the Technical Committee on Liberalization of Foreign Trade and Economic Globalization in the Countries of the region of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia

The Economic and Social Council,

Aware that the steadily growing trend towards the liberalization of foreign trade and economic globalization, the conclusion of a series of multilateral trade agreements within the framework of the World Trade Organization and the emergence of a large number of economic blocs will transform the international trading system in the future,

Conscious of the growing interest of the States members of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia in the World Trade Organization and the desire of many of them to join it and of the importance of defining the positions of the countries of the region and coordinating those positions with respect to the issues involved,

Taking into consideration the appreciation shown by member States for the efforts made by the secretariat of the Commission in this area, both alone and in cooperation with specialized international organizations,

Aware of the importance of defining the issues of concern to member States within the new areas that will be discussed in future trade negotiations, such as trade and environment, trade and investment and trade and competition, and the impact that those areas will have on the economic development of the countries of the region,

Welcoming the efforts made by numerous regional groups in conducting research and studies in those areas and coordinating their positions at the regional level,

1. Establishes the Technical Committee on Liberalization of Foreign Trade and Economic Globalization in the countries of the region of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia, which shall be made up of representatives of the States members of the Commission who specialize in this field and shall undertake the following tasks:

(a) Participation in the identification of the priorities and concerns of the States members of the Commission in the field of multilateral trade agreements and negotiations;

(b) Monitoring of international developments in world trade negotiations and the creation and development of economic and trade blocs and coordination of the positions of the States members of the Commission with respect thereto;

(c) Cooperation with the secretariat of the Commission in establishing programmes to assist the countries of the region in outlining appropriate national and regional economic development policies to enable those countries to take greater advantage of the trends towards liberalization of foreign trade and economic globalization;

(d) Establishment of joint programmes with the countries of the region and in cooperation with other regional and international organizations for training, exchange of information and studies;

2. Decides that the Committee will hold its sessions annually, beginning in 1998;

3. Requests the Executive Secretary of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia to follow up the implementation of the present resolution and report thereon to the Commission at its twentieth session.

Transportation

Activities in Western Asia during the second phase (1992-1996) of the Transport and Communications Decade for Asia and the Pacific were the subject of an April 1997 secretariat report [E/ESCWA/C.1/19/4(Part I)/Add.5]. ESCWA Stated that it was unable to participate in the Decade, as it failed to obtain any support from the bodies and agencies it contacted for that purpose, and also because of reduced funds.

The Technical Committee also considered a report [E/ESCWA/C.1/19/4(Part I)/Add.7] on facilitation of border-crossing formalities and agreements for the transport of goods and persons, which discussed the conventions on facilitation of trans-border traffic, measures taken by ESCWA to facilitate transit procedures, the development of information technology and communications networks, and proposed steps to improve cross-border procedures, including an implementation mechanism.

The Technical Committee recommended according top priority to activities connected with the transport sector, and mobilizing extrabudgetary resources to finance programmes in the area of transport and a committee on transport in ESCWA.

On 7 May, the Commission decided [E/1997/39 des. 213(XIX)] to establish a committee on transport in ESCWA, and submitted a resolution to the Economic and Social Council for adoption.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 18 July [meeting 34], the Economic And Social Council, on the recommendation of ESCWA [E/1997/40/Add.1], adopted resolution 1997/11 without vote [agenda item 10].

Establishment of the Committee on Transport of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia

The Economic and Social Council,
Aware of the vital role of transport infrastructures in national socio-economic development,

Aware also of the importance of integrating transport networks with a view to contributing to the acceleration of regional cooperation processes,

Conscious of the important role of the transport sector in facilitating the flow of goods and passengers among countries and regions, thus contributing to the liberalization of international trade, the promotion of tourism and the growth of exports, in particular within the context of the growing trend towards globalization,

Welcoming the steps taken by United Nations regional commissions for the establishment of specialized committees in various transport fields to ensure the coordination of work at the regional level,

1. Establishes the Committee on Transport of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia, which shall be made up of representatives of the States members of the Commission who specialize in the field of transport and which shall undertake the following tasks:

(a) Participation in the establishment and formulation of priorities for programmes of work and medium-term plans in the field of transport;

(b) Monitoring of developments in the field of transport in the States members of the Commission;

(c) Monitoring of the progress achieved in the activities of the secretariat of the Commission in the field of transport;

(d) Ensuring follow-up to international and regional conferences, and the participation of member States in such conferences and coordinating the efforts of member States to implement resolutions and recommendations;

2. Decides that, starting in 1999, the Committee on Transport shall meet every two years;

3. Requests the Executive Secretary of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia to follow up the implementation of the present resolution and report thereon to the Commission at its twentieth session.

Statistics

The Statistical Committee, at its second session (Amman, Jordan, 24-26 February) [E/ESCWA/C.1/19/4(Part I)/Add.6], considered follow-up to the recommendations adopted at its first session; a summary of the report of the United Nations Statistical Commission on its twenty-ninth session; work accomplished between the first and second sessions of the Committee; the work programme of the ESCWA Statistics Division for 1998-1999; reports on several statistical programmes; statistical implications of UN international conferences; measurement of poverty and the statistical data required; technical cooperation; and a report on the Regional Household Survey Project.

The Committee stressed the importance of intensified cooperation between ESCWA and the Arab Industrial Development and Mining Organization in preparing the biennial Bulletin of Industrial Statistics for the Arab Countries and in organizing a training workshop on industrial statistics. It called on ESCWA to note the observations of the UN Statistics Division regarding technical cooperation in the ESCWA region, and recommended that the heads of central statistical organizations in ESCWA member States, particularly those who had chaired statistical sessions, participate in sessions of the UN Statistical Commission.

The Committee approved the ESCWA project for the development of national gender statistics in Arab countries; called on ESCWA members to make maximum use of the Internet; invited the countries of the region to implement the 1993 System of National Accounts, in cooperation with ESCWA; and called on ESCWA to hold workshops on national accounts, focusing on actual experiences. The ESCWA programme of action for the development of social statistics was approved. All future studies on poverty should take into account social services expenditure.

The Committee requested ESCWA to continue to provide the services of a regional adviser to enable the countries of the region to meet their needs in national accounts, economics statistics, household surveys and electronic data processing. It called on ESCWA to continue to improve data collection by using computer notebooks; emphasized the importance of conducting environmental household surveys; and invited the United Nations Environment Programme, the World Health Organization and other bodies concerned with the environment to cooperate in training cadres to apply statistical methods in the area of environment. ESCWA was asked to continue to conduct workshops on the Geographical Information System (GIS) and to prepare a regional project on GIS for member States.

Social development

The ESCWA Committee on Social Development, established in 1994 [ESCres. 1994/27], held its first session in Amman, Jordan, from 25 to 26 March 1997 [E/ESCWA/C.1/19/6]. It recommended that ESCWA develop its information system so that it could receive and distribute information related to social policies, programmes and measures. Member States, Arab funding organizations and regional and international donors should provide financial and human resources to enable ESCWA to carry out its work, and to monitor and follow up the recommendations of global conferences and Arab plans of action, taking into consideration the reservations expressed, on the basis of Islamic Shariah law and Arab traditions and values, by Arab and Islamic countries with regard to some recommendations of those conferences. ESCWA should include in the medium-term plan issues related to democracy, human rights and poverty; the scope of human settlement activities should be widened to include support for local councils. Family-related concepts should be clarified in line with the framework established by Arab countries that participated in the Fourth World Conference on Women [YUN 1995, p. 1169], with the Arab Plan of Action for the Advancement of Women to the Year 2005, and with recommendations of the Arab Conference on the Formulation of a Unified Arab Programme and a Follow-up Mechanism for the Action Plan of the Fourth World Conference on Women: the Conference of Arab Ministers of Social Affairs. Work on the social development database should be completed and training provided to State institutions on how to create national databases. ESCWA should support regional coordination in the exchange of information and expertise as part of the follow-up action on the recommendations of regional and global conferences. Technical assistance should support the formulation of social development projects; the establishment of policies and the follow-up of their implementation; development of institutional infrastructure; and development of human resources of social development institutions. Member States should support the work of national committees on population, human settlements and women and development as well as human development networks. Committees should be established to follow up the recommendations of global conferences and Arab plans of action and to implement them nationally, in such areas as human development, women and development, human settlements and population. ESCWA should finalize the regional programme of action for following up global conferences, and coordinate its efforts with the secretariat of the League of Arab States and its specialized organizations and with the United Nations and its specialized agencies in implementing those activities.

Environment, energy and natural resources

In 1997, the Technical Committee [E/ESCWA/C.1/19/4(Part I)/Add.3] reported on a review and assessment of progress achieved in the implementation of Agenda 21 [YUN 1992, p. 672], and activities undertaken by the ESCWA secretariat and member States, with special focus on emerging priorities and unfulfilled expectations. Technical assistance supported ESCWA activities in attaining sustainable development. Member countries' performance in meeting their environmental policy objectives was reviewed and their natural resources management and planning capabilities were strengthened. Advisory services were provided by regional advisers in the areas of energy, environment, trade, statistics, industry and water management. The establishment of committees on energy and water resources in 1995 had underscored the urgent need for further integration of environmental considerations into all sectoral programmes of ESCWA, in line with the national and regional priorities of sustainable development. Research studies and reports were disseminated through seminars, workshops and intergovernmental meetings related to aspects of Agenda 21, in particular, water management, co-operation and capacity-building in energy, water, agriculture, rural development and the phase-out of ozone-depleting substances.

ESCWA provided policy guidance on the follow-up of Agenda 21 on a regional level and undertook specific activities for the Arab Programme for Sustainable Development.

The ESCWA secretariat gave priority to structural changes in the energy sector due to issues of privatization, regional cooperation and the promotion of clean energy, including new and renewable energy, and was pursuing increased regional collaboration in energy networks, especially energy conservation and efficiency, new and renewable sources of energy and electrical power system interconnections.

Priorities were set for integrated water resources development and management, water resources assessment and regional cooperation for the protection of water resources. A field project was launched to investigate the shared basalt aquifer system in the Syrian Arab Republic and Jordan and mathematical modelling of the Wadi Ham aquifer in the Fujairah coastal plain of the United Arab Emirates. Training courses were scheduled on the use of remote sensing and GIS techniques in hydrology and hydrogeology and water legislation in the ESCWA region to disseminate information related to water resources and strengthen national capacities.

To combat poverty, ESCWA initiated a series of studies to investigate the roots of poverty in the region in its larger economic and social context. It was concluded that environmental deterioration, population, health conditions and development were inextricably entwined.

The Commission also considered a report [E/ESCWA/C.1/19/4(Part I)/Add.1] on the establishment of a committee on energy in ESCWA, which stated that it had not been possible to convene the first meeting of the committee in 1996 due to the lack of expertise as a result of the high vacancy rate in the Energy Issues Section. It was therefore decided, provisionally, to convene the first meeting in September 1997.

The first session of the Committee on Water Resources (Amman, 30 March) [E/ESCWA/C.1/19/4(Part I)/Add.2], established by the Economic and Social Council in 1995 [ESC res. 1995/26], recommended that ESCWA concentrate on regulating water demand, applying water conservation techniques in irrigation and encouraging training programmes and workshops that increased awareness of the importance of water and rationalized its use. A study on the integrated management of available surface or groundwater resources was urged, as was a study on the laws, customs and conventions regulating the use of shared international waters.

On 7 May [E/1997/39 (res. 212(XIX))], the Commission decided to change the periodicity of the meetings of the Committee on Water Resources from biennially to annually and recommended a resolution for adoption by the Economic and Social Council.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 18 July [meeting 34], the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of ESCWA [E/1997/40/Add.1], adopted resolution 1997/10 with change in the frequency of the sessions of the Committee on Water Resources of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia

The Economic and Social Council, Stressing the importance of resolution 205(XVIII) of 25 May 1995 of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia, by which the Commission established the Committee on Water Resources,

Conscious of the growing need for the development and conservation of water resources in the region of the Commission,

Recalling the recommendations made by the Committee on Water Resources at its first meeting, on 30 March 1997, at which it requested that its sessions be held on an annual rather than a biennial basis, in view of the rapid developments taking place in the field of water resources,

Authorizes the Committee on Water Resources of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia to hold its sessions annually rather than biennially.

Programme and organizational questions

UN reform

In April [E/ESCWA/19/5], the Executive Secretary reported on programme and organizational changes made by ESCWA since 1994. He said that reform at ESCWA was an integral part of the overall UN reform process, while taking into consideration the needs and aspirations of ESCWA member States, and recognizing the need to revitalize the Commission to meet the challenges of a rapidly changing international and regional environment. The reform process entailed moving the focus of ESCWA's programme of work from 15 sectoral subprogrammes to 5 thematic subprogrammes, with the adoption of multidisciplinary activities as an implementation modality. The number of activities was reduced from 256 in the 1994-1995 programme of work to 158 in 1998-

1999, or 40 per cent. The scope of activities in water, energy, transport, human development, gender and statistics was expanded, especially within the context of an integrated approach to follow up world conferences. At the same time, activities in agriculture and industry were reduced. Seven substantive divisions were cut to five, with consolidation of the agriculture, industry and transport divisions into the Sectoral Issues and Policies Division. ESCWA's efficiency review concentrated on areas of administration, with recommendations to increase the efficiency of the administrative process, secure cost savings, enhance office technology, achieve a better balance between substantive and administrative support staff, and establish common services with UN agencies at ESCWA headquarters. The reform process also had had an impact on the relationship of ESCWA with the public at large, with more efforts directed to the media, the private sector, NGOs, universities and research institutions.

On 7 May, the Commission adopted a resolution [E/1997/39(res.216(XIX))] on organizational and programme changes, for submission to the Economic and Social Council for action.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 18 July [meeting 34], the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of ESCWA [E/1997/40/Add.1], adopted resolution 1997/14 without vote [agenda item 10].

Organizational and programme changes and modifications introduced by the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia since 1994

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 45/264 of 13 May 1991, 46/235 of 13 April 1992, 48/162 of 20 December 1993 and 50/227 of 24 May 1996 on the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields,

Noting the new trends towards the reform and adaptation of the United Nations in accordance with current world developments,

Recalling resolution 191 (XVI) of 2 September 1992 of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia on the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields,

Taking note of the organizational and programme changes and modifications introduced by the Commission since 1994,

Confirming that the priorities established in the light of recent developments correspond to the needs of States members of the Commission,

1. Expresses its appreciation for the organizational and programme changes made and the methods adopted by the secretariat of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia in carrying out its activities, which have made it possible to address development issues within an integrated perspective, enabled the entities concerned in the member States to make a greater contribution to the formulation of the programmes of work of the Commission and to the follow-up of their implementation and promoted greater coordination and integration with United Nations agencies and organizations as well as national and regional institutions concerned with regional development, cooperation and integration;

2. Calls for the enhancement of the function of the Commission as a basic forum for coordinating the economic and social policies of its member States and for the development of its role in supporting regional and subregional projects aimed at expanding economic and social cooperation among member States at both the regional and subregional levels;

3. Also calls for the reinforcement of the role of the United Nations at the regional level, which entails the promotion of the role of the regional commissions in representing the regional dimension of global issues and in integrating United Nations activities at the national, regional and international levels;

4. Further calls for the granting to the Commission, within the framework of the reform of the United Nations system, of a broader mandate for carrying out its activities, including those related to regional technical cooperation projects, and for the strengthening of its role in coordinating, in the region in which it operates, the activities of the agencies and organizations of the United Nations system and those of the regional and national organizations concerned, so as to ensure that the United Nations objectives of development, freedom and peace are achieved.

Work programmes and medium-term plan

On 7 May, the Commission, having considered the report on progress made in 1996 in implementing ESCWA's 1996-1997 programme of work [E/ESCWA/C.1/19/4/(Part D)Rev.1], approved [E/1997/39 des. 209(XIX))] changes to that programme and recommended a resolution for adoption by the Economic and Social Council.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 18 July [meeting 34], the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of ESCWA [E/1997/40/Add.1], adopted resolution 1997/7 without vote [agenda item 10].

Programme of work and priorities of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia for the biennium 1996-1997

The Economic and Social Council,

Noting the progress made during the period from 1 January 1996 to 31 March 1997 in the implementation of the programme of work and priorities of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia for the biennium 1996-1997,

Noting also the changes made by the secretariat in the programme activities of the Commission and the reasons for those changes,

1. Approves the changes made by the secretariat in the programme activities of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia;

2. Requests the Executive Secretary of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia to present in 1998, in his comprehensive report to the member States on the progress made in the implementation of the programme of work and priorities of the Commission for the biennium 1996-1997, any other changes effected in the programme of work and priorities.

On 7 May, the Commission considered the draft programme of work for 1998-1999 [E/ESCWA/C.1/19/9], in accordance with the guidelines contained in the report of the Technical Committee, which had recommended that the programme of work should take into account the need to include information on the background, objectives, the means of and timetables for execution, and the cost of the subprogrammes and their activities; take the population factor into account when dealing with sustainable development issues, including those related to natural resources; and accord priority to the provision of scientific and practical advice to member States to help them take full advantage of regional and international developments, in particular the WTO agreements.

The objectives of the programme of work were to monitor and survey economic and social trends; enhance economic cooperation among member States; enhance the harmonization of norms, standards and legislative instruments among member States in social development by following up implementation of the recommendations of global conferences; enhance cooperation in the management of natural resources and environment; and assist member States in human and institutional capacity-building.

The Commission adopted a resolution [E/1997/39 des. 211 (XIX)] on the draft programme of work for 1998-1999 for recommendation to the Economic and Social Council.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 18 July [meeting 34], the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of ESCWA [E/1997/40/Add.1], adopted resolution 1997/9 without vote [agenda item 10].

Programme of work and priorities of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia for the biennium 1998-1999

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 51/219 of 18 December 1996 on programme planning, by which the Assembly adopted the medium-term plan for the period 1998-2001, and noting that the plan is a translation of legislative mandates into programmes and the embodiment of the general policy guidelines and objectives set out by the intergovernmental bodies and that it constitutes the principal policy directive of the United Nations,

Taking note with appreciation of the draft programme of work and priorities of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia for the biennium 1998-1999,

Noting that the draft programme of work and priorities of the Commission reflects the strategies and objectives of the medium-term plan,

1. Approves the draft programme of work and priorities of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia for the biennium 1998-1999, in accordance with the guidelines contained in the report of the Technical Committee of the Commission on the work of its tenth session, held at Beirut on 5 and 6 May 1997;

2. Requests the Executive Secretary of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia to report to the Commission at its twentieth session any changes effected in the programme of work and priorities.

Also on 7 May, the Commission took note of the medium-term plan for ESCWA for 1998-2001 and recommended a resolution [E/1997/39 (res. 210(XIX))] for adoption by the Economic and Social Council.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 18 July [meeting 34], the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of ESCWA [E/1997/40/Add.1], adopted resolution 1997/8 without vote [agenda item 10].

Medium-term plan of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia for the period 1998-2001

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 51/219 of 18 December 1996 on programme planning, by which the Assembly adopted the medium-term plan for the period 1998-2001,

Recalling also that the Assembly, in resolution 51/219, also reaffirmed that the medium-term plan, as adopted, was the principal policy directive of the United Nations and should serve as a framework for the formulation of the biennial programme budgets,

Taking note of the medium-term plan of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia for the period 1998-2001,

1. Requests the Executive Secretary of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia to take into account the guidelines contained in the report of the Technical Committee of the Commission on the work of its tenth session, held at Beirut on 5 and 6 May 1997, and to include them in the revised medium-term plan in accordance with the applicable United Nations rules;

2. Also requests the Executive Secretary of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia to report to the Commission at its twentieth session on any changes effected in the medium-term plan.

Permanent headquarters

The Commission had before it a note [E/ESCWA/19/7] of the Executive Secretary on progress made in facilitating ESCWA's move to its new permanent headquarters in Beirut, Lebanon, in accordance with Economic and Social Council resolution 1994/43 [YUN 1994, p. 753]. The plans of the headquarters building had been drawn up, and a steering committee and a technical committee had been entrusted with technical and administrative responsibilities related to the permanent headquarters. The Government of Lebanon was making great efforts to complete the building by 1 September 1997.

Consultations between ESCWA and Lebanon had reached an advanced stage, and discussions were to be held on the signing of a headquarters agreement and an agreement on the operation of the headquarters building. ESCWA had rescheduled the activities of its 1996-1997 work programme for completion by August 1997, before the beginning of transfer operations. Consultations were under way between Lebanon and the Secretary-General to explore the best ways to provide funds for the transfer of ESCWA to its permanent headquarters. ESCWA and Iraq had also signed an agreement concerning the handover of the premises occupied by ESCWA in Baghdad.

On 7 May, the Commission adopted a resolution [E/1997/39 des. 215(XIX)] on the subject, for submission to the Economic and Social Council for action.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 18 July [meeting 34], the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of ESCWA [E/1997/40/Add.1], adopted resolution 1997/13 without vote [agenda item 10].

Progress made in facilitating the relocation of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia to its permanent headquarters at Beirut

The Economic and Social Council,

Taking note of the note by the Executive Secretary of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia on the progress made in facilitating the relocation of the Commission to its permanent headquarters at Beirut,

Taking into consideration the presentation made by the Executive Secretary in that regard,

Noting the current preparations for the relocation of the Commission to its permanent headquarters at Beirut and the resulting termination of the services of the local staff employed by the Commission at Amman,

Commending the local staff of the Commission at Amman for their excellent service,

1. Expresses its appreciation for the plans prepared and the measures adopted by the secretariat of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia, including the plan for the relocation of the Commission to its permanent headquarters at Beirut, in accordance with a timetable that will not interfere with the implementation of the programmes of the Commission and will take into consideration the needs of its staff;

2. Reiterates its gratitude to the Government of Lebanon for the efforts and the arrangements it has made to provide a headquarters that satisfies the needs and requirements of the United Nations;

3. Reiterates its thanks to the Government of Iraq for the facilities provided throughout the presence of the Commission at Baghdad and its gratitude to the Government of Jordan for the facilities provided to the Commission during its stay at Amman;

4. Requests the authorities concerned within the Secretariat to examine the possibility of utilizing the skills of the local staff of the Commission at Amman in other areas within the United Nations or of finding ways to compensate them.

Twenty-fifth anniversary of ESCWA

The Commission considered a note [E/ESCWA/19/8] of the Executive Secretary entitled "Call for the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Commission, to be held in conjunction with the twentieth session of ESCWA in 1999, and discussion of the role of the Commission in the coming century in view of international and regional developments".

The Executive Secretary said that member States might find it fitting in 1999, during the twentieth ESCWA session, to mark the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Commission, and to seize that opportunity for a reformulation of ESCWA's role, in harmony with world and regional changes. That might be done within the framework of a new vision, perhaps to be included in a declaration to be adopted at the twentieth session, identifying priorities believed by States to be the right basis for the activities of ESCWA in the future. Member States might find it fitting to invite heads of State to attend the opening ceremony of the twentieth session, which should adopt a declaration embodying their vision and commitment to inviting ESCWA to translate the vision into programmes and activities. That should be preceded by an in-depth study on "ESCWA in the twenty-first century", which might then be considered by eminent intellectuals and in the light of which the role and tasks of ESCWA in the next century would be defined. The commemoration of ESCWA's silver jubilee would also create an opportunity to evaluate regional economic cooperation and to consider the role played by regional and international intergovernmental organizations in that connection.

On 7 May, the Commission decided to celebrate its twenty-fifth anniversary during the twentieth session of the Commission, to be held in 1999, and recommended a resolution [E/1997/39 (res. 217(XIX))] for adoption by the Economic and Social Council.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 18 July [meeting 34], the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of ESCWA [E/1997/40/Add.1], adopted resolution 1997/15 without vote [agenda item 10].

Celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia in 1999 and role of the Commission in the coming century

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolution 1818(LV) of 9 August 1973, by which it established the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia for the purpose of consolidating development efforts in the region and promoting economic cooperation among the countries of the region,

Commending the Commission for the activities it has undertaken since its establishment in the various fields of economic and social development, thus supporting the development efforts of the States members of the Commission and promoting cooperation among them,

1. Decides that the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia shall be celebrated during its twentieth session, to be held in 1999;

2. Requests the Executive Secretary of the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia to take all measures that he deems necessary in this regard, including the preparation of the necessary studies for the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Commission;

3. Invites the Governments of the States members of the Commission to take this opportunity to formulate a new vision and define the role and tasks of the Commission in line with regional and world developments in the coming century;

4. Also invites the Governments of the member States to participate in this celebration at the highest level;

5. Invites the Secretary-General to take part in this event.

Chapter VI

Natural resources, energy and cartography

Ensuring the optimal use and protection of freshwater resources and establishing sustainable patterns of the production, distribution and consumption of energy were two primary areas of concern in 1997 of both the Commission on Sustainable Development and the nineteenth special session of the General Assembly.

The Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21, adopted in June by the Assembly, called for a dialogue on building a strategic approach for the sustainable use of fresh water, stating that it was a matter of urgent concern that more than one fifth of all people did not have access to safe drinking water, and that more than one half of humanity lacked adequate sanitation.

The new Programme also called for international cooperation for promoting energy conservation and improved energy efficiency, the use of renewable energy and research, and the development and dissemination of innovative energy-related technology.

Having considered the report of the International Atomic Energy Agency in November, the General Assembly urged States to strive for international cooperation in carrying out the Agency's work in promoting the use of nuclear energy and applying measures to strengthen the safety of nuclear installations.

Two major cartographic conferences were held during the year—the Fourteenth United Nations Regional Cartographic Conference for Asia and the Pacific in February and the Sixth United Nations Regional Cartographic Conference for the Americas in June.

Natural resources

Exploration

The mandate of the United Nations Revolving Fund for Natural Resources Exploration (UNRFNRE), which was established in 1973 [YUN 1973, p. 399] as a trust fund administered by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), was to extend and intensify the activities of the UN system in the field of natural resources exploration for socioeconomic development.

In his annual report for 1997 [DP/1998/17/Add.2], the UNDP Administrator stated that the Fund had adopted a new focus for the sustainability of non-renewable resources from the viewpoint of the changing world of the mining industry and the role of the United Nations. It had shifted its activities from costly mineral exploration to less expensive multidisciplinary exploration, environmentally sound technology transfer and information services through workshops, round tables and publications. In countries where mineral discoveries had been made, the Fund also continued to provide assistance in the form of legal advice and help in preparing international bidding documents aimed at stimulating the interest of private international mining companies.

In his budget estimates for the 1998-1999 biennium [DP/1997/23], the Administrator presented a resource plan for UNRFNRE that reflected the expectations that the Fund's activities would increase during the biennium and that additional resources could be generated through active resource mobilization efforts.

By a 19 September decision [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/24)], the UNDP Executive Board approved a gross appropriation for the Fund's 1998-1999 biennial support budget of $1.5 million.

Water resources

Freshwater resources

Commission on Sustainable Development. The Commission on Sustainable Development held its fifth session in New York from 7 to 25 April [E/1997/29] (see PART THREE, Chapter I). Among the documents considered by it in preparation for the General Assembly's nineteenth special session to review and appraise the implementation of Agenda 21, adopted by the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) [YUN 1992, p. 672], was the Secretary-General's comprehensive assessment of the freshwater resources of the world [E/CN.17/1997/9]. The report discussed the supply, availability and use of the world's freshwater resources and presented a series of conclusions and policy options for consideration by Governments.

The assessment showed that in many countries, both developing and developed, pathways for water use were often not sustainable. There was evidence that the world faced a worsening series of local and regional water quantity and quality problems, largely as a result of poor water allocation, wasteful use of the resource and lack of adequate management action. Water use had been growing at more than twice the rate of the population increase during the twentieth century and a number of regions were already chronically water-short. By the year 2025, as much as two thirds of the world population could be under stress conditions. Water shortages and pollution were causing widespread public health problems, limiting economic and agricultural development, and harming a wide range of ecosystems. They could put global food supplies in jeopardy and lead to economic stagnation in many areas. The report found that in some cases people had taken action to reduce demand and pollution, thus relieving water stress. However, far more widespread and sustained action was essential to reverse many of the unsustainable trends.

Policy recommendations included in the report were: water quality and quantity should be managed in an integrated and comprehensive manner, taking into account regional and sectoral relations and social equity; equitable access to clean water should be provided, including human health and environmental conditions as water management indicators; sustainable water strategies should be developed that addressed basic human needs, as well as the preservation of ecosystems, in ways consistent with socio-economic objectives of different societies; water management plans should include land-use planning, forest resource utilization and protection of coastal zones, since land and water use were closely intertwined; water should be integrated in economic planning analysis, accounting for its value in each nation's system of national accounts, and the private sector should be integrated into the water development process as it could play a helpful role in establishing prices for water for industrial and agricultural use that reflected its value to society; expertise on water issues should be built up among users and decision makers at all levels; attention should be paid to the role of gender in water resources management; and actions should be accelerated or initiated within existing frameworks of programmes, conventions and agreements to combat desertification and drought, protect sustainable use of biodiversity related to fresh water, and protect coastal areas and oceans from land-based activities. The recommendations further called for the development of models of cooperation to maximize the benefits from the development of trans-boundary river basins or aquifers; establishment, within existing institutions and especially the UN system, of a global water information network to compile information on water quality, quantity and use; the conduct of regular regional and global water assessments; strengthened collaboration with non-governmental organizations (NGOs); and the development of North-South academic partnerships and partnerships with the private sector and industries to take advantage of their expertise.

Also before the Commission was an 11 February note verbale [E/CN.17/1997/15] from the Netherlands transmitting the Forward Looking Assessment on the Implementation of the Action Programme on Drinking Water and Environmental Sanitation, a contribution to the Commission's work by France, Morocco, the Netherlands and Tunisia. Those four countries had offered to monitor the implementation of the Action Programme, which had been adopted at the 1994 International Ministerial Drinking Water Conference [YUN 1994, p. 920].

The Assessment, which was based on questionnaires returned by 25 developing countries, supported by technical visits and interviews in 11 countries, concluded that UNCED and the Ministerial Conference had had a clear influence on the policies and strategies of Governments. There was widespread acceptance of the principles of an integrated approach to the management of freshwater resources as a prime element of sustainable development, which, in the field of drinking water supply and sanitation, was accompanied by an intent to introduce policies for devolving powers to manage water supply and sanitation services to the lowest appropriate level and adopt the hydrographic basin (river catchment or aquifer) as the most appropriate unit for integrated management. Despite those positive developments, however, the overall status of water supply and sanitation in developing countries remained critical.

The Assessment's analysis suggested that Governments and external support agencies needed to adopt strategies that addressed five critical aspects of sustainability: social, environmental, institutional, financial and technical. It was recommended that the Commission should urge all Governments to review their policy and strategies for water supply and sanitation development, giving special priority to programmes to meet the household sanitation needs of the urban and rural poor. Specific recommendations were made with regard to water and people; water and institutions; water and mobilizing financial resources; and water and the world. General recommendations were: that the Commission should mobilize support from Governments and external support agencies for the compilation of an inventory of representative case studies of successful water and sanitation initiatives consistent with chapter 18 of Agenda 21 (protection of the quality and supply of freshwater resources: application of integrated approaches to the development, management and use of water resources); that support also be sought for the implementation of pilot projects to demonstrate the five sustainability elements above; and that the Commission should continue the evaluation process of follow-up to the Action Programme so that it could obtain regular global reports on progress towards the chapter 18 goals.

Special session of the General Assembly. The urgent need for action in the field of fresh water was raised in the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21, adopted by the General Assembly at its nineteenth special session on 28 June (resolution S/19-2) (see PART THREE, Chapter I).

Noting that water resources were essential for satisfying basic human needs, health and food production, and the preservation of ecosystems, as well as for economic and social development in general, the Assembly stated that it was a matter of urgent concern that more than one fifth of all people still did not have access to safe drinking water and more than one half of humanity lacked adequate sanitation.

The Assembly said that there was an urgent need: to assign high priority to formulating and implementing policies and programmes for integrated watershed management; to strengthen regional and international cooperation for technological transfer and financing of integrated water resources programmes and projects; to ensure the continued participation of local communities, and women in particular, in the management of water resources development and use; to provide an enabling national and international environment that encouraged investments from public and private sources to improve water supply and sanitation services; to recognize water as a social and economic good with a vital role in the satisfaction of basic human needs, food security, poverty alleviation and the protection of ecosystems; to strengthen the capability of Governments and international institutions to collect and manage information in order to facilitate the integrated assessment and management of water resources and foster regional and international cooperation for information dissemination and exchange; for the international community to give support to the efforts of developing countries to shift to higher-value, less water-intensive modes of agricultural and industrial production; and to encourage watercourse States to develop international watercourses with a view to attaining their sustainable utilization and appropriate protection and benefits, taking into account the interests of the watercourse States concerned.

Considering the urgent need for action in the field of fresh water, and building on existing principles and instruments, arrangements, programmes of action and customary uses of water, Governments called for a dialogue under the aegis of the Commission on Sustainable Development, beginning at its sixth (1998) session, aimed at building a consensus on the necessary actions, and in particular on the means of implementation and on tangible results, in order to consider initiating a strategic approach for implementing all aspects of the sustainable use of fresh water.

Economic and Social Council consideration.

During its 1997 substantive session (Geneva, 30 June-25 July), the Economic and Social Council, as decided in 1996 [ESC dec. 1996/301], devoted part of its coordination segment to the question of fresh water, including clean and safe water supply and sanitation.

The coordination segment had before it a report of the Secretary-General on the subject [E/1997/70], in which he described emerging issues in water resources development and management and reviewed recent activities of the UN system.

Among recommendations and proposals to strengthen coordination were: the Subcommittee on Water Resources of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) should redouble its efforts to streamline programmes and activities of the different organizations and bodies of the UN system, and organizations active at the national level should improve coordination of their field activities and support efforts by the offices of the UN resident coordinators to that end; the UN system should continue to provide technical and financial support to national efforts to develop sustainable water strategies and national water policies and plans that would promote cost-efficient water technologies, economic pricing and efficient water use, and should intensify assistance to national efforts to build up expertise on water issues among water users and decision makers; the ACC Subcommittee should take the lead in strengthening the capability of the international community in assisting developing countries to enhance their information capabilities and take measures to create a global information network encompassing organizations within and outside the UN system; close links should be established between the ACC Subcommittee and the secretariats of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change, the UN Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa, and the Convention on Biological Diversity; greater efforts were needed to increase the flow of financing for water resources development and more attention needed to be given to ways of enhancing the role of the private sector as a partner in the provision of services, particularly with regard to water supply and sanitation; the pace of UN system efforts with regard to the transfer and adaptation of technologies needed to be strengthened; coordination efforts throughout the UN system, particularly through the ACC Subcommittee, needed to benefit from the regular participation of the regional commissions; and NGOs such as the Global Water Partnership, the Water Supply and Sanitation Collaborative Council and the World Water Council, as well as representatives of the private sector, should work with the organizations and bodies of the UN system in order to provide the Commission on Sustainable Development with the best possible framework for its discussions.

In agreed conclusions 1997/3, adopted on 21 July [A/52/3/Rev.1], the Economic and Social Council noted with great concern that more than one fifth of the world's population did not have access to safe drinking water and that more than half of humanity lacked adequate sanitation. It reiterated its recommendation contained in resolution 1995/46 [YUN 1995, p. 1058] that the UN system should assign high priority to strengthening activities and cooperation in those areas of endeavour. The Council urged the ACC Subcommittee to analyse the activities being carried out by the organizations of the UN system and to prepare a report on the subject by the end of 1997. That report would be a useful input into the preparatory process leading up to the 1998 session of the Commission on Sustainable Development. The seriousness of the capacity-building problem in developing countries was stressed by the Council, which urged the organizations of the UN system to assign high priority to programmes and activities geared to the provision of support in that respect. The Council considered that, owing to the lack of data in both developed and developing countries, there was a need for an update and reassessment of the water resources of the world. Given the seriousness of the situation concerning the effect of the disposal of toxic substances and of persistent organic pollutants on water resources, the Council recommended that close attention be given to those issues.

By decision 1997/308 of 25 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of the report of the Commission on Sustainable Development on its fifth session.

ACC consideration. The ACC Subcommittee on Water Resources held its eighteenth session in Vienna from 1 to 3 October [ACC/1997/18]. It was preceded by the seventh meeting of the Inter-Agency Steering Committee for Water Supply and Sanitation on 30 September. The Subcommittee discussed follow-up to the decisions of the 1997 session of the Commission on Sustainable Development, the nineteenth special session of the General Assembly and the coordination segment of the Economic and Social Council (see above), coordination of activities, initiatives for joint action and freshwater issues related to the implementation of the Global Programme of Action for the Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities.

The Subcommittee welcomed a draft proposed strategy for human resources development in the water sector, presented by UNDP, and agreed that UNDP would develop the proposal further and include specific recommendations and strategies. With regard to initiatives for joint action, the Subcommittee decided that the Department of Economic and Social Affairs, assisted by the United Nations University, should establish a Web page to provide information on water-related databases within the UN system. It also agreed that close ties should be maintained with the Global Water Partnership and other important NGOs and welcomed the establishment of the World Commission on Dams, which, over a two-year period, would assess the experience with large dams and evaluate their development effectiveness. The Subcommittee recognized the important role of NGOs in implementing chapter 18 of Agenda 21 and stressed that awareness-raising was a key issue in which NGOs could play a crucial role.

Energy

Energy and sustainable development

In a January report [E/CN.17/1997/7], the Secretary-General submitted to the Commission on Sustainable Development (New York, 7-25 April) an inventory of ongoing energy-related programmes and activities of entities within the UN system. The report also discussed the role of energy in meeting the challenges of sustainable development, assessed the linkages between current energy activities and sustainable development, and reviewed cooperation and coordination with regard to energy activities. As requested by the Economic and Social Council in resolution 1996/44 [YUN 1996, p. 947], the Secretary-General took into account the views of the Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and on Energy for Development when preparing the report.

In its recommendations and proposals for future action, the report stated that major changes were needed in the world's energy systems in order for them to contribute to sustainable development. That could be achieved only if all actors involved—Governments, international capital markets, energy investors, industry, international organizations, scientific and research institutes, and NGOs—contributed to a common goal.

Although the United Nations was a modest financial partner, it had an important role to play in developing an energy strategy that would provide a reference framework for the energy-related activities of the UN system, including the Bretton Woods institutions (the World Bank Group and the International Monetary Fund). Such a strategy would promote a balanced and mutually reinforcing approach to economic, social and environmental aspects of sustainable energy development and would foster partnership with actors outside the UN system, particularly with non-UN intergovernmental organizations dealing with energy and the private sector.

As to the role of the Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and on Energy for Development, that body would continue to further UN policy discussions on energy. However, the modalities of the Committee's functioning could be adjusted in order to enhance its effectiveness, including: better representation of Governments as not all regions had designated representatives; better dissemination of reports; better participation of the organizations of the UN system, including the regional commissions, in the Committee's work; establishment of links between the Committee and non-UN organizations dealing with energy, such as the International Energy Agency and the World Energy Council; and changing the Committee's pattern of reporting so that it would report to the Economic and Social Council through the Commission on Sustainable Development with a view to ensuring greater integration of the results of its work in the sustainable development discussion.

Also before the Commission was the report of the Expert Workshop on Fostering the Linkage between Energy and Sustainable Development within the International Institutions (Vienna, 22-24 January), which Austria transmitted to the Secretary-General on 29 January [E/CN.17/1997/16]. The report stated that it was essential to promote more effective arrangements for inter-agency coordination and cooperation in energy at the global and field levels, through: making energy a recurring item on the agenda of the Inter-Agency Committee on Sustainable Development (IACSD) and ensuring linkages with the energy-related aspects of the work of other ACC bodies, including the task forces established to follow up on recent global conferences; convening ad hoc meetings of relevant organizations in order to elaborate a common approach, discuss arrangements related to providing system-wide support to policy-making processes, promote greater policy coherence, exchange information and discuss lessons learned, and promote data comparability; and discussing arrangements aimed at enhancing the UN system's capacity for information exchange in the field of energy.

Nineteenth special session. In the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21, annexed to resolution S/19-2, which was adopted by the General Assembly at its nineteenth special session (see PART THREE, Chapter I), the Assembly stated that sustainable patterns of production, distribution and use of energy were crucial. Since fossil fuels (coal, oil and natural gas) would continue to dominate the energy supply situation for many years in most developed and developing countries, it was necessary to reduce the environmental impact of their continued development and to reduce local health hazards and environmental pollution through enhanced international cooperation, notably in the provision of concessional finance for capacity development and transfer of the relevant technology and through appropriate national action.

There was a need for: a movement towards sustainable patterns of production, distribution and use of energy, which would be discussed at the intergovernmental level in the Commission on Sustainable Development; evolving concrete measures to strengthen international cooperation to assist developing countries in their efforts to provide adequate modern energy services to all sections of their population; countries to promote policies and plans that took into account the economic, social and environmental aspects of energy production, distribution and use; evolving commitments for the transfer of relevant technology; promoting efforts in research on and development and use of renewable energy technologies; in the context of fossil fuels, encouraging further research, development and the application and transfer of technology of a cleaner and more efficient nature; encouraging Governments and the private sector to consider appropriate ways to promote gradually environmental cost internalization so as to achieve more sustainable use of energy; and encouraging better coordination on energy within the UN system.

Coordination

In response to Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/44 [YUN 1996, p. 947], the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly, through the Council, a June report [A/52/175-E/1997/75] on the possibilities of strengthening the coordination of the organizations and bodies of the UN system in the field of energy within the framework of ACC.

The report's recommendations and proposals drew heavily on the recommendations contained in the Secretary-General's report to the Commission on Sustainable Development (see above). Noting that inter-agency cooperation in energy had been rather ad hoc in previous years, the report stated that the Secretary-General's report to the Commission marked the beginning of enhanced coordination that would be pursued along the following lines: convening ad hoc meetings of entities within the UN system dealing with energy; devoting part of the sessions of IACSD to energy and ensuring linkages with energy-related aspects of the work of other ACC bodies; cooperating with organizations outside the UN system; and encouraging joint programming and implementation of energy activities of common interest to the entities within the system.

Since options for a high-level discussion on energy were being considered in several bodies, no proposals on the subject were presented.

By decision 1997/304 of 25 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of the Secretary-General's report.

By decision 52/451 of 18 December, the General Assembly took note of the Secretary-General's report.

Nuclear energy

By a 14 August note [A/52/285], the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly the 1996 report of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA). Presenting and updating the report in the Assembly on 12 November, the IAEA Director General stated that the preceding year had seen a significant strengthening of the international legal infrastructure for the peaceful use of nuclear energy through the approval by the IAEA Board of Governors of a Model Protocol additional to safeguards agreements that would give added teeth to the Agency's nuclear inspection system and the adoption of a new convention on the safe management of radioactive wastes and spent nuclear fuel (see also PART ONE, Chapter VII, and PART SIX, Chapter I).

The Director General noted that over the last two decades several factors had led to a stagnation in nuclear-power construction in most industrialized countries: overcapacity in electricity generation in some countries, concern about nuclear accidents, concern about the management of nuclear waste, and the use of gas in combined cycle, which had emerged as an economically attractive option for the generation of heat and electricity. Although IAEA was not urging any country to turn to nuclear power, it performed work in several sectors that could make such power more attractive and economical for those which opted for it: exchange of experience in the construction and operation of nuclear plants and in the development of new technologies for power generation; comparisons between the nuclear-power option and other methods of generating electricity; and the promotion of nuclear safety in the operation of nuclear plants and in waste management.

It was well understood by many Governments, said the Director General, that an expanded use of nuclear power in technologically advanced countries could offer considerable alleviation in carbon dioxide emissions. However, Governments had not generally been ready to act on that knowledge. In his view, it was IAEA's duty to seek to compile and analyse all relevant data on different energy sources on a comparative basis to enable Member States to make their assessment and shape their policies in as well informed a manner as possible.

The Director General also described difficulties with regard to IAEA's nuclear inspection activities in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and in Iraq (see PART ONE, Chapter IV).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 12 November [meeting 49], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/11 by recorded vote (151-1-5) [draft: A/52/L.13&Add.1] [agenda item 14].

Report of the International Atomic Energy Agency

The General Assembly,

Having received the report of the International Atomic Energy Agency to the General Assembly for the year 1996,

Noting the statement of the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency of 12 November 1997, in which he provided additional information on the main developments in the activities of the Agency during 1997,

Recognizing the importance of the work of the Agency in promoting the further application of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes as envisaged in the statute of the Agency and in accordance with the inalienable right of States parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and other relevant internationally legally binding agreements that have concluded relevant safeguards agreements with the Agency to develop research, production and use of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes without discrimination and in conformity with articles I and II of the Treaty, with other relevant articles and with the objectives and purposes of the Treaty,

Conscious of the importance of the work of the Agency in the implementation of the safeguards provisions of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and other international treaties, conventions and agreements designed to achieve similar objectives, as well as in ensuring, as far as it is able, that the assistance provided by the Agency or at its request or under its supervision or control is not used in such a way as to further any military purpose, as stated in article II of its statute,

Reaffirming that the Agency is the competent authority responsible for verifying and assuring, in accordance with the statute and the safeguards system of the Agency, compliance with its safeguards agreements with States parties undertaken in fulfilment of their obligations under article III, paragraph 1, of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, with a view to preventing diversion of nuclear energy from peaceful uses to nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices, and also reaffirming that nothing should be done to undermine the authority of the Agency in this regard and that States parties that have concerns regarding non-compliance with the safeguards agreement of the Treaty by the States parties should direct such concerns, along with supporting evidence and information, to the Agency to consider, investigate, draw conclusions and decide on necessary actions in accordance with its mandate,

Stressing the need for the highest standards of safety in the design and operation of nuclear installations and in peaceful nuclear activities so as to minimize risks to life, health and the environment,

Considering that an expansion of technical cooperation activities relating to the peaceful uses of nuclear energy will contribute to the well-being of the peoples of the world, recognizing the special needs of the developing countries for technical assistance from the Agency and the importance of funding in order to benefit effectively from the transfer and application of nuclear technology for peaceful purposes as well as from the contribution of nuclear energy to their economic development, and desiring that the resources of the Agency for technical cooperation activities be assured, predictable and sufficient to meet the objectives mandated in article II of its statute,

Recognizing the importance of the work of the Agency on nuclear energy, applications of nuclear methods and techniques, nuclear safety, radiological protection and radioactive waste management, including its work directed towards assisting developing countries in all these fields,

Taking note of the report of the Director General to the General Conference of the International Atomic Energy Agency on the implementation of Security Council resolutions relating to Iraq, of his reports to the Security Council of 8 April and 6 October 1997 and of resolution GC(41)/RES/23 of 3 October 1997 of the General Conference,

Taking note also of resolutions GOV/2711 of 21 March 1994 and GOV/2742 of 10 June 1994 of the Board of Governors and GC(41)/RES/22 of 3 October 1997 of the General Conference of the International Atomic Energy Agency in connection with the implementation of the Agreement between the Government of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and the International Atomic Energy Agency for the application of safeguards in connection with the Treaty on the Non-

Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, the statements by the President of the Security Council of 31 March, 30 May and 4 November 1994 and the authorization of the Board of Governors, on 11 November 1994, to the Director General, to carry out all the tasks requested of the Agency in the statement by the President of the Security Council of 4 November 1994,

Bearing in mind resolutions GC(41)/RES/10 on the Convention on Nuclear Safety, GC(41)/RES/11 on the Joint Convention on the Safety of Spent Fuel Management and on the Safety of Radioactive Waste Management, GC(41)/RES/12 on safety of transport of radioactive materials, GC(41)/RES/13 on the strengthening of the Agency's technical cooperation activities, GC(41)/RES/14 on the plan for producing potable water economically, GC(41)/RES/15 on the extensive use of isotope hydrology for water resources management, GC(41)/RES/16 on strengthening the effectiveness and improving the efficiency of the safeguards system and application of the Model Protocol, GC(41)/RES/18 on the staffing of the Agency's secretariat, GC(41)/RES/20 on the amendment of article VI of the statute concerning, inter alia, the size and composition of the membership of the Board of Governors, GC(41)/RES/21 on the international initiative for the Chernobyl sarcophagus and GC(41)/RES/25 on the application of Agency safeguards in the Middle East, adopted on 3 October 1997 by the General Conference of the Agency at its forty-first regular session,

Encouraging the efforts to be made by the forthcoming International Pledging Conference on the Chernobyl Sarcophagus to be held in New York, and noting with interest the forthcoming Special International Meeting on Chernobyl to be held in New York,

Noting the statement by the President of the forty-first regular session of the General Conference of the Agency, issued under item 26 concerning the application of International Atomic Energy Agency Safeguards in the Middle East, that:

"In the context of the agenda item on the application of International Atomic Energy Agency Safeguards in the Middle East, the General Conference requests the Director General to invite experts from the Middle East and other areas to a technical workshop on safeguards, verification technologies and other related experience, including experience in various regional contexts. It calls on the Director General to commence with the preparation, in consultation and coordination with the parties concerned, with a view to developing an agenda and modalities that would help ensure a successful workshop. Future proposals on workshops in the framework of the above-mentioned agenda item shall be submitted by mutual consent",

Noting also the statement by the President of the forty-first regular session of the General Conference of the Agency, issued under item 20 concerning the composition of regional groups, that:

"The General Conference at its fortieth session took note of the report of the Director General on the composition of regional groups under the agenda item 'Amendment of article VI of the statute', as contained in the attachment to document GC(40)/11. It reiterated the principle of the sovereign equality of all member States of the Agency, as provided for in article IV.C of the statute. It affirmed that this principle requires that each member State of the Agency be within one of the areas listed in article VI.A.1 of the statute. Recalling the draft resolution contained in document GC(39)/COM.5/10 of 19 September 1995 and resolution GC(39)/RES/22 of 22 September 1995, the Conference requests that the Chairman of the Board of Governors continue to consult with member States not yet listed in a regional area, as well as with other member States, including representatives of the regional areas, and that he report for consideration of the forty-second General Conference specific proposals to include each member State within the appropriate area at the time of the Conference in September 1998",

Bearing in mind resolution GC(41)/RES/17 of 3 October 1997 on measures against illicit trafficking in nuclear materials and other radioactive sources, recognizing the importance of measures against illicit trafficking of nuclear material, and, in this regard, further recognizing the importance of the programme for preventing and combating illicit trafficking in nuclear material, agreed upon by the participants in the Moscow Nuclear Safety and Security Summit of April 1996 and confirmed by the participants in the Denver Summit of June 1997,

Also bearing in mind resolution GC(41)/RES/19 on women in the secretariat, adopted on 3 October 1997, calling on the Director General to further integrate the Platform for Action adopted at the Fourth World Conference on Women into the relevant policies and programmes of the Agency,

Noting that the present Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Mr. Hans Blix, will retire on 30 November 1997 with the title of "Director General Emeritus of the International Atomic Energy Agency" conferred on him by the General Conference of the Agency and that the General Conference, in resolution GC(41)/RES/3, approved the appointment of Mr. Mohamed ElBaradei as Director General from 1 December 1997,

1. Takes note of the report of the International Atomic Energy Agency;

2. Affirms its confidence in the role of the Agency in the application of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes;

3. Welcomes the measures and decisions taken by the Agency to maintain and strengthen the effectiveness and cost efficiency of the safeguards system in conformity with the statute of the Agency, in particular, stressing the importance of the Model Additional Protocol approved on 15 May 1997, affirms that strengthening the effectiveness and improving the efficiency of the safeguards system with a view to detecting undeclared nuclear activities must be implemented rapidly and universally by all concerned States and other parties in compliance with their respective international commitments, and requests all concerned States and other parties to safeguards agreements to conclude the additional protocols without delay;

4. Urges all States to strive for effective and harmonious international cooperation in carrying out the work of the Agency, pursuant to its statute, in promoting the use of nuclear energy and the application of the necessary measures to strengthen further the safety of nuclear installations and to minimize risks to life, health and the environment, in strengthening technical assistance and cooperation for developing countries and in ensuring the effectiveness and efficiency of the safeguards systems of the Agency;

5. Welcomes the measures and decisions taken by the Agency to strengthen and fund its technical cooperation activities, which should contribute to achieving sustainable development in developing countries, and calls upon States to cooperate in implementing the measures and decisions pursuant thereto;

6. Commends the Director General and the secretariat of the Agency for their continuing, impartial efforts to implement the safeguards agreement still in force between the Agency and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, including their efforts to monitor the freeze of specified facilities in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea as requested by the Security Council, expresses concern about the continuing non-compliance of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea with the safeguards agreement, and urges the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to cooperate fully with the Agency in the implementation of the safeguards agreement and to take all steps the Agency may deem necessary to preserve all information relevant to verifying the accuracy and completeness of the initial report of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea on the inventory of nuclear material subject to safeguards until the Democratic People's Republic of Korea comes into full compliance with its safeguards agreement;

7. Also commends the Director General of the Agency and his staff for their strenuous efforts to implement Security Council resolutions 687(1991) of 3 April 1991, 707(1991) of 15 August 1991, 715(1991) of 11 October 1991 and 1051(1996) of 27 March 1996, notes that progress continues to be made in the review of Iraq's full, final and complete declaration and that further progress has been made regarding the content and accuracy of Iraq's six-monthly declarations under the ongoing monitoring and verification plan, notes with concern, however, that Iraq has still not provided the Agency's Action Team with all the information that it has requested, deplores Iraq's obstruction of aircraft used by the Agency in February 1997, calls upon Iraq to cooperate fully with the Action Team in meeting its requests for information and in achieving the complete implementation of the relevant Security Council resolutions and the ongoing monitoring and verification plan, stresses again Iraq's obligation to hand over immediately to the Action Team any nuclear-weapon-related equipment, material and information it may still possess and to allow the Action Team immediate, unconditional and unrestricted rights of access in accordance with Security Council resolution 707(1991), and stresses that the Action Team will continue to exercise its right under all relevant Security Council resolutions and as regards any further relevant information that may come to light;

8. Welcomes the entry into force on 24 October 1996 of the Convention on Nuclear Safety, appeals to all States to become parties to it so that it obtains the widest possible adherence, and expresses its satisfaction that an organizational meeting of the contracting parties will be held from 29 September to 2 October 1998 and that a first review meeting will begin on 12 April 1999;

9. Also welcomes the measures taken by the Agency in support of efforts to prevent illicit trafficking in nuclear materials and other radioactive sources and, in this context, calls upon other States to join the programme for preventing and combating illicit trafficking in nuclear materials agreed upon by the participants at the Moscow Nuclear Safety and Security Summit of April 1996 and confirmed at the Denver Summit in June 1997;

10. Welcomes the adoption of the Joint Convention on the Safety of Spent Fuel Management and on the Safety of Radioactive Waste Management in Vienna on 5 September 1997, and appeals to all States to become parties to the Convention so that it may enter into force as soon as possible;

11. Also welcomes the adoption on 12 September 1997 of the Protocol to Amend the Vienna Convention on Civil Liability for Nuclear Damage and the Convention on Supplementary Compensation for Nuclear Damage, and appeals to all States in a position to do so to become parties to the Protocol and to the Convention so that those instruments may enter into force as soon as possible;

12. Expresses its appreciation for the sixteen years of distinguished service by Mr. Hans Blix as Director General of the Agency, and extends its best wishes to Mr. Mohamed ElBaradei, the incoming Director General of the Agency;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit to the Director General of the Agency the records of the fifty-second session of the General Assembly relating to the activities of the Agency.

RECORDED VOTE ON RESOLUTION 52/11:

In favour Algeria, Andorra, Angola, Argentina, Armenia, Australia, Austria, Azerbaijan, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Belarus, Belgium, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Chad, Chile, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Cote d'Ivoire, Croatia, Cuba, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Eritrea, Estonia, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Georgia, Germany, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kazakhstan, Kenya, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lesotho, Liberia, Libya, Liechtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Marshall Islands, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Micronesia, Monaco, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Myanmar, Namibia, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Niger,* Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Republic of Korea, Republic of Moldova, Romania, Russian Federation, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Samoa, San Marino, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Slovakia, Slovenia, Solomon Islands, South Africa, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Thailand, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Turkmenistan, Ukraine, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, United Republic of Tanzania, United States, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Yemen, Zambia.

Against: Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

Abstain: China, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Syria, Viet Nam.

*Later advised the Secretariat it had intended to abstain.

Before the text was adopted, separate recorded votes were requested on two paragraphs. The third preambular paragraph was retained by 137 votes to 4, with 1 abstention, and operative paragraph 7 was retained by 114 votes to 2, with 18 abstentions.

Cartography

UN Regional Cartographic Conference for Asia and the Pacific

The Fourteenth United Nations Regional Cartographic Conference for Asia and the Pacific

was held in Bangkok, Thailand, from 3 to 7 February [E/1997/52]. As recommended by the Thirteenth Conference in 1994, and endorsed by the Economic and Social Council in decision 1994/228 [YUN 1994, p. 928], the Fourteenth Conference gave special emphasis to the contribution of surveying, mapping and charting to the implementation of Agenda 21, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 672], and the monitoring of the regional implementation of multinational environmental agreements. The Conference addressed three major substantive topics: land resources and environmental management; enabling technologies; and policies and management.

The Conference noted the important contributions made by cartographic technologies and applications in the information stream to policy and decision makers, development planners and the public and by the United Nations Regional Cartographic Conferences for Asia and the Pacific in strengthening technical cooperation, facilitating the transfer of technology and enhancing programme coordination within the countries of the region.

The Conference adopted a series of resolutions dealing with general policies, the transfer of technology and institutional issues, the texts of which were included in its report [E/CONF.89/5].

By decision 1997/221 of 18 July, the Economic and Social Council endorsed the following recommendations of the Fourteenth Conference: that the Fifteenth Conference should be held in mid-2000, with a primary focus on the continued and strengthened contribution of surveying, mapping and charting to the implementation of Agenda 21; and to request the Secretary-General to take measures to implement its other recommendations. In particular, the United Nations should continue to support surveying, mapping and charting activities in the Asia and Pacific region and continue to facilitate the participation of the least developed countries and small island developing States of the region.

UN Regional Cartographic Conference for the Americas

The Sixth United Nations Regional Cartographic Conference for the Americas was held in New York from 2 to 6 June [E/1997/82], in accordance with Economic and Social Council decision 1993/225 [YUN 1993, p. 791].

The Sixth Conference, while fully reflecting the role of earlier conferences as forums for technical cooperation, technology transfer and programme coordination for countries of the region in the field of surveying and mapping, cartography, hydrography, remote sensing and land and geographical information systems, also acknowledged how the significant progress made in cartography and related fields had contributed to the reappraisal of goals in the area to meet the challenge of sustainable development of the twenty-first century. Special emphasis was given to the contribution of surveying, mapping and charting to supporting the implementation of Agenda 21. The Conference addressed three major substantive topics: land resources and environmental management; enabling technologies; and data storage, standardization and presentation.

The Conference recommended that the Economic and Social Council: endorse the Conference's recommendation that the Seventh Conference should be convened no later than early 2001, with a primary focus on the continued and strengthened contribution of surveying, mapping and charting in support of the implementation of Agenda 21, accompanied by provision of policy support to Governments in the region, international organizations and the United Nations to assist in the implementation and assessment of sustainable development and environmental management programmes; and request the Secretary-General to promote an ongoing dialogue between member States and other stakeholders to ensure the implementation of the resolutions of the Sixth Conference. In particular, a special working group of delegates and experts from all UN regional cartographic conferences should convene within 12 months to: re-engineer the work and operation of the Conference to ensure its relevance to regional and global needs while addressing issues of importance to local, national and international users of spatial data and land-related information; investigate the timing of the UN regional cartographic conferences and their being structured to ensure that conferences for Africa, Asia and the Pacific, and the Americas were repeated over intervals of approximately 12 months, followed by inter-regional cartographic conferences for sharing global experiences; and report to the Council within 18 months on the preferred structure.

By decision 1997/292 of 23 July, the Economic and Social Council endorsed the Conference's recommendations.

Standardization of geographical names

On 1 May, the Economic and Social Council decided that the Seventh United Nations Conference on the Standardization of Geographical Names would be held in New York in January 1998 (decision 1997/213).

Chapter VII

Environment

In 1997, efforts continued towards improving the state of the environment, particularly through legally binding instruments and the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP), which pursued the implementation of the environmental dimension of Agenda 21, a comprehensive plan of action adopted in 1992 for the sustainable development of the Earth into the twenty-first century.

During the year, UNEP presented the first report in the Global Environment Outlook series, which stated that, despite progress on several fronts, the environment had continued to degrade during the previous decade and environmental problems remained deeply embedded in the socio-economic fabric of nations in all regions.

The Conference of the Parties to the 1992 United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (Kyoto, Japan, December) adopted the Kyoto Protocol, which aimed to reduce industrialized countries' collective emissions of carbon dioxide and five other greenhouse gases.

Parties to the 1987 Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer agreed, in September, on a phase-out schedule for methyl bromide, a fumigant and an ozone-depleting substance.

The UNEP Governing Council asked the Executive Director to convene a diplomatic conference to adopt and sign an international legally binding instrument for international action to reduce/eliminate the release of persistent organic pollutants, to be concluded preferably by 2000.

Progress was made at the third session of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee (Geneva, May) towards the adoption of an International Legally Binding Instrument for the Application of the Prior Informed Consent Procedure for Certain Hazardous Chemicals in International Trade.

The Economic and Social Council, in July, established the Intergovernmental Forum on Forests under the aegis of the Commission on Sustainable Development to work towards a legally binding instrument on the management, conservation and sustainable development of all types of forests. The Forum held its first meeting in October. The Council also took action towards the eventual proclamation of an international year of mountains.

The first meeting of the Conference of the Parties to the 1994 United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in Those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa, decided to accept the offer of Germany to host the permanent secretariat in Bonn and selected the International Fund for Agricultural Development to house the global mechanism.

The UNEP Governing Council held its nineteenth session (January/February and April) at which it adopted decisions relating to, among other matters, the Nairobi Declaration on the Role and Mandate of UNEP; UNEP's contribution to the General Assembly's 1997 special session; biosafety; the report on the Global Environment Outlook; chemicals management; water management; UNEP efforts to implement the 1994 United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in Those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa; and the UNEP governing structures.

The General Assembly elected Klaus Töpfer (Germany) as the new UNEP Executive Director for a four-year term effective 1 February 1998.

UN Environment Programme

The Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) held its nineteenth session in Nairobi, Kenya, from 27 January to 7 February and on 3 and 4 April [A/52/25]. The resumed session was held to complete consideration of the item on UNEP governing structures. Also at the resumed session, the Council decided that its twentieth session would take place from 24 to 28 May 1999. The Council established the composition of the High-level Committee of Ministers and Officials and decided that the dates of its special session to review the results of the General Assembly's special session on implementation of Agenda 21, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) in 1992 [YUN1992, p. 672], would be held between late 1997 and the end of January 1998. The Assembly took note of the Governing Council's report by decision 52/441 of 18 December.

The Economic and Social Council, by decision 1997/308 of 25 July, took note of an extract [E/1997/L.25] from the Governing Council's report, which dealt with the date and venue of the Council's twentieth session; the Council's special session on Agenda 21; the Nairobi Declaration on the Role and Mandate of UNEP; UNEP's contribution to the Assembly's 1997 special session; the report on the Global Environment Outlook; environmental housekeeping practices and guidelines in UNEP and the UN system; chemicals management; water management; UNEP efforts to implement the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in Those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa [YUN 1994, p. 944]; and the UNEP governing structures. These and other matters are discussed below.

Nairobi Declaration on UNEP role

The ministers and heads of delegation attending the Council's session, on 7 February, adopted the Nairobi Declaration on the Role and Mandate of the United Nations Environment Programme [A/52/25 (dec. 19/1)], which declared UNEP the principal UN body concerned with the environment and the leading global environmental authority. The Declaration stated that the core elements of the mandate of the revitalized UNEP should be: to analyse the state of the global environment and assess global and regional environmental trends, provide policy advice and early warning information on environmental threats, and catalyse and promote international cooperation and action; to further the development of its international environmental law aiming at sustainable development; to advance the implementation of agreed international norms and policies, monitor and foster compliance with environmental principles and international agreements and stimulate cooperative action to respond to emerging environmental challenges; to strengthen its role in coordinating environmental activities in the UN system, as well as its role as an implementing agency of the Global Environment Facility; to promote greater awareness and facilitate cooperation, and to serve as a link between the scientific community and policy makers; and to provide policy and advisory services in key areas of institution-building to Governments and other relevant institutions. By the Declaration, the ministers and heads of delegation decided to improve the UNEP governing structure and proposed that UNEP should serve as the world forum for the ministers and highest-level government officials in charge of environmental matters. The Declaration reaffirmed the importance of the Environment Fund as the principal source of financing for implementing the UNEP programme. The President of the Governing Council was asked to present the Declaration to the high-level segment of the April session of the Commission on Sustainable Development and to the special session of the General Assembly convened to review and appraise the implementation of Agenda 21 (see PART THREE, Chapter I).

Governing structure

At its resumed session on 4 April, the Governing Council decided [A/52/25 (dec. 19/32)] to establish a High-level Committee of Ministers and Officials as a subsidiary organ to consider the international environmental agenda and to make reform and policy recommendations to the Council; to provide guidance to the Executive Director on emerging environmental issues between Council sessions; to enhance the collaboration and cooperation of UNEP with other multilateral bodies as well as with the environmental conventions and their secretariats; and to support the Executive Director in mobilizing financial resources. The 36 members of the High-level Committee were to be elected by the Council for a two-year period. The Committee was to meet at least once a year. The Council President and the Chairman of the Committee of Permanent Representatives would be invited to meetings, which were open to the European Community (EC) and other intergovernmental economic organizations.

With a view to strengthening the Committee of Permanent Representatives as a subsidiary organ of the Governing Council, the Council decided that the Committee's mandate would be to review, monitor and assess the implementation of the Council's decisions on administrative, budgetary and programme matters; review the draft programme of work and budget; review reports requested of the secretariat by the Council on the effectiveness, efficiency and transparency of the functions and work of the secretariat and make recommendations thereon; and prepare draft decisions for consideration by the Council based on inputs from the secretariat and on the results of the functions specified above. The Committee would comprise representatives of UN Member States and members of its specialized agencies, and EC. It would hold four regular meetings a year, and extraordinary meetings might also be convened. The Committee could establish subcommittees, working groups and task forces in order to carry out its mandate.

The High-level Committee of Ministers and Officials and the Committee of Permanent Representatives were accountable to the Governing Council and would submit reports on their work at each Council session. The budget for the two Committees would be allocated by the Governing Council. UN Members and members of its specialized agencies were invited to provide financial assistance to facilitate the participation of developing countries, particularly the least developed, and countries with economies in transition, and to establish a trust fund to that end. The Governing Council would review the effectiveness of the governance structure at its twenty-first (2001) session.

General Assembly issues

The Executive Director provided information on issues arising from resolutions adopted by the General Assembly in 1995 and 1996, which called for action by UNEP [UNEP/GC.19/2 & Add.1 & Corr.1].

On 7 February [A/52/25 (dec. 19/11)], the Governing Council took note of the Executive Director's report.

Special session

The General Assembly, at its nineteenth special session (New York, 23-28 June), reviewed and appraised the implementation of Agenda 21—a plan of action for the sustainable development of the Earth into the twenty-first century—adopted at UNCED in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 672]. The Assembly adopted the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21 and made a commitment to ensure that its next review in 2002 would demonstrate greater progress in achieving sustainable development (see PART THREE, Chapter I).

Prior to the special session, the UNEP Governing Council, on 7 February [A/52/25 (dec. 19/2)], asked the Executive Director, in accordance with Assembly resolution 51/181 [YUN 1996, p. 740] and on behalf of the Council, to submit to the Commission on Sustainable Development in April, the meeting of its Ad Hoc Open-ended Inter-Sessional Working Group in February/March and the Assembly's special session documents on the implementation by UNEP of Agenda 21, the Council's contribution to the special session [UNEP/GC.19/30 & UNEP/GC.19/INF.13], the report on the Global Environment Outlook, the observations and recommendations regarding the Programme for the Development and Periodic Review of Environmental Law for the 1990s [UNEP/GC.19/32] and the Council's decision on the environmental law programme [dec. 19/20]. It also asked her to present the Nairobi Declaration on the Role and Mandate of UNEP [dec. 19/1] to the high-level segment of the Commission on Sustainable Development and to the special session.

On the same date [dec. 19/5], the Council, taking note of the Executive Director's report on the estimated costs for UNEP to implement those parts of Agenda 21 [UNEP/GC.19/22] specifically recommended for its attention [UNEP/GC.19/20], took into account the gap between the current level of resources being provided to UNEP and the levels that the report had calculated.

Cooperation and coordination

UN system

The Governing Council, on 7 February [A/52/25 (dec. 19/9 A)], taking note of a report of the Executive Director on the Inter-Agency Environment Coordination Group (IAEG) [UNEP/GC.19/17], a consultative and advisory body set up to assist the Executive Director in coordinating the activities of the UN system in addressing the major challenges in the UNEP 1996-1997 work programme, asked the Executive Director to report in 1999 on progress made in IAEG's work.

On the same date [dec. 19/9 B], the Council, welcoming a note by the Executive Director on the UN system-wide strategy in the field of the environment [UNEP/GC.19/19], endorsed the Executive Director's view that the strategy should have a flexible structure over the medium term and should be regularly updated given the developments taking place in intergovernmental forums. The Council asked the Executive Director, in consultation with relevant UN organizations, to develop further the strategy through IAEG, following the Assembly's special session, and to provide in 1999 the final strategy document.

Following consideration of the Executive Director's report on cooperation between UNEP and the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (UNCHS) [UNEP/GC.19/8], the Council, on 7 February [dec. 19/9 D], asked her to continue cooperation between the two bodies, particularly through the inter-agency Sustainable Cities Programme. It encouraged UNEP to collaborate in facilitating the implementation of the environmental components of the UNCHS agenda (see also PART THREE, Chapter VIII).

Regarding improving the international response to environmental emergencies, the Council, on 7 February [dec. 19/9 E], having taken note of the Executive Director's report on the subject [UNEP/GC.19/14], expressed satisfaction with the continued collaboration between UNEP and the UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs (DHA) in enhancing the ability of the United Nations to respond to environmental emergencies. It invited Governments and relevant UN organizations and specialized agencies to continue to cooperate with the Joint UNEP/DHA Environment Unit in its efforts to assist countries, particularly developing countries, facing environmental emergencies. The Joint Unit was asked to develop its activities further in accordance with the recommendations of the Advisory Group on Environmental Emergencies, which was established to bring together national experts and focal points. Governments and international organizations were urged to contribute to the Trust Fund for Environmental Emergencies.

In March, UNEP and the United Nations Children's Fund signed a Memorandum of Understanding aimed at strengthening cooperation between the two programmes in areas fundamental to attaining sustainable development. The agreement was designed to address issues connecting the human and physical environment and the health and well-being of the world's children.

On 7 February [dec. 19/6], the Council, having considered the Executive Director's report on emerging issues on the environment and trade agenda [UNEP/GC.19/27], called on her to promote efforts to clarify and assess the environmental effects of trade and trade policies, as well as the effects of environmental policies on trade; to contribute to efforts towards a synergy between environment and trade objectives in policy development and implementation; to cooperate with other international organizations dealing with the relationship between the environment and trade, particularly the World Trade Organization and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD); and to contribute to efforts to promote and facilitate environmentally responsible investments. Governments were called on to develop mutually supportive trade and environment policies.

In July, UNCTAD and UNEP signed a Memorandum of Understanding on a technical assistance programme for promoting the complementarity of trade, environment and development objectives in developing countries. Under the programme, UNCTAD and UNEP would develop policy options for Governments of developing countries to consider when seeking to integrate environmental considerations in their macroeconomic policies, including trade policies. They would also propose policy instruments and mechanisms, including technology transfer, market access, finance and capacity-building, to facilitate the internalization of environmental costs.

The Council, on 7 February [dec. 19/18], urged the Executive Director to take measures to implement the 1994 Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States [YUN 1994, p. 783] and asked her to report in 1999 on steps taken.

The Global Environment Facility (GEF) was established in 1991 as a joint programme of the United Nations Development Programme, UNEP and the World Bank [YUN 1991, p. 505] to help solve global environment problems. As to UNEP participation in the work of GEF, the Council, on 7 February [dec. 19/12], having considered the Executive Director's report on the subject [UNEP/GC.19/16], urged her to continue to strengthen the links between UNEP and GEF.

Taking note of the Executive Director's progress report on good environmental housekeeping practices and guidelines in UNEP and the UN system [UNEP/GC.19/28], the Council, on 7 February [dec. 19/10], encouraged her to continue her initiatives in that area and asked her to communicate with the UN Under-Secretary-General for Administration and Management to urge the adoption of good environmental housekeeping practices throughout the UN system.

Convention secretariats

Following consideration of the Executive Director's report on the coordination of convention secretariats [UNEP/GC.19/11] and the report of the Sixth Meeting on Coordination of Secretariats of Environmental Conventions [UNEP/GC.19/INF.27], the Council, on 7 February [dec. 19/9 C], asked the conferences of parties to the relevant conventions to encourage their secretariats to continue to participate in the coordination process. The Executive Director was urged to continue to promote synergy among the work and activities of environmental agreements and their secretariats and with the UNEP work programme. The Council encouraged her and the secretariat of each convention for which UNEP was responsible to enter into an arrangement that clarified their respective roles and responsibilities. The Executive Director was asked to report in 1999 on steps taken to implement the Council's decision.

Regional and subregional support

In a 7 February decision [dec. 19/31], the Governing Council asked the Executive Director to strengthen UNEP regional offices by providing them with functional and administrative capabilities to enable decentralized implementation of regional environmental programmes and priorities, as developed by regional and subregional ministerial meetings. Governments were invited to increase their participation in their respective regional cooperation programmes on the environment and were urged to participate more actively in the programmes.

On the same date [dec. 19/19], the Council asked the Executive Director to support the Framework for the North-East Asian Subregional Programme of Environmental Cooperation by providing technical support to the Fourth Meeting of Senior Officials on Environmental Cooperation in North-East Asia (Moscow, August/September) and technical and financial support to the priority project proposals under the Framework. It also asked her to assist the countries of the subregion in mobilizing GEF resources for the priority project proposals under the Framework.

Environmental assessment

In 1997, UNEP presented the first report in the Global Environment Outlook series (GEO-1), which provided information on the state of the global environment. GEO-1 stated that, despite progress on several fronts, the global environment had continued to degrade during the previous decade and significant environmental problems remained deeply embedded in the socio-economic fabric of nations in all regions.

The Governing Council considered a report of the Executive Director [UNEP/GC.19/26] on GEO-1. She stated that UNEP had identified 20 internationally renowned environmental institutions as GEO collaborating centres, and instituted a mechanism for regional consultations, four scientific working groups and UN agency participation through the UN system-wide Earthwatch.

On 7 February [dec. 19/3], the Council approved the continuation of the GEO process and the production of the biennial GEO reports. It asked the Executive Director to submit the next report in the series in 1999; to consult with interested Governments on the framework for future GEO reports; to improve the consultative process for preparing the reports; and to include in the next report data gaps that could not be filled from existing sources, including collaborating centres of environmental assessment excellence.

On the same date [dec. 19/4], the Council asked the Executive Director to improve the use of the Global Environment Monitoring System (GEMS)/Air and GEMS/Water programmes and the Global Resource Information Database in the preparation of the GEO assessments. It urged her to try to secure adequate funds for the 1997 and 1998-1999 budgets of the GEMS programme and the Database.

Telecommunications

The Governing Council considered a report of the Executive Director on the status of implementation of the Mercure satellite communications system [UNEP/GC.19/21]. She stated that the final step towards full operation had been stalled by a delay in receiving the requisite authorization from the International Telecommunications Satellite Organization (INTELSAT) for UNEP central earth stations to start using satellite capacity. In the meantime, planning by UNEP was well advanced for the enhanced utilization of Internet mechanisms for environmental information access and exchange, which were broadly grouped under the "UNEPnet" system.

The Council, on 7 February [dec. 19/30], taking note of the Executive Director's report and of the Supplemental Agreement between Kenya and UNEP regarding the installation and operation of the Mercure satellite telecommunication system ground station within UNEP headquarters, concluded on 31 January, encouraged UNEP to explore the use of the UNEPnet/Mercure system by the United Nations at other sites outside Kenya where technically and economically feasible. It authorized the Executive Director to engage in collaborative programmes with other donors for the continuing development of the UNEPnet/Mercure infrastructure through a collaboration co-funded by UNEP and other donors. The Council asked her to ensure that a full review and cost-benefit analysis of the system and the experience gained in its initial operation were carried out and to submit a report thereon in 1999. The Executive Director was authorized to finance from the budget the continued testing and operation of Mercure.

Women in environment and development

The Council considered a report of the Executive Director [UNEP/GC.19/9] describing action taken by UNEP in support of the Fourth (1995) World Conference on Women [YUN 1995, p. 1169]. She described a number of actions taken to meet the global priorities for the advancement of women by the year 2000 in support of the following objectives contained in the Conference's Platform for Action: involving women actively in environmental decision-making; integrating gender concerns and perspectives in policies and programmes for sustainable development; and strengthening or establishing mechanisms to assess the impact of development and environmental policies on women. The specific commitments by UNEP were to: endeavour to incorporate women's* concerns into UNEP policies, programmes and projects; adjust recruitment policies and create a favourable environment to recruit women; judge managers according to the extent to which they incorporated gender criteria in performance appraisals; ensure that women participated and that gender concerns were reflected in policy development work; give priority to environmental education and training programmes tailored to women's needs; design programmes to cater to the needs of women who were often the victims of armed conflicts that took place over land and resources; emphasize in law programmes the need to accord women the legal rights to enable them to manage and own land and make decisions on land use; advocate and support respect for the fundamental rights of women to ensure that women contributed their knowledge to the solution of environmental problems; and accord women their rightful role in decision-making at all levels. UNEP produced publications to advance those commitments, contributed to inter-agency discussions and issued 12 awareness-building posters on the major themes of the Conference as they related to the environment. Substantial progress had been made in integrating a gender perspective into the work and activities of UNEP.

Taking note of the Executive Director's report, the Council, on 7 February [dec. 19/7], endorsed the policy framework document Gender and the Environment: A UNEP Perspective and other UNEP activities in support of the Conference. It asked UNEP to improve its collection, dissemination and use of gender-disaggregated data related to women and the environment. The Executive Director was urged to continue to implement the specific commitments to meet the global priorities for the advancement of women by the year 2000, given by her at the Conference. She was asked to report to the Commission on the Status of Women (see PART THREE, Chapter X) and the Commission on Sustainable Development (see PART THREE, Chapter I) in 1997 and the Council in 1999.

Administrative matters

Conference servicing

Following consideration of a report of the Executive Director on developments in conference servicing [UNEP/GC.19/5], the Council, on 7 February [dec. 19/27], encouraged her to work closely with the United Nations, the United Nations Office at Nairobi (UNON) and UNCHS to ensure that there was a smooth transition to the new arrangement incorporating UNEP conference services into UNON.

Human resources

The Executive Director submitted to the Council a report summarizing efforts made by UNEP to enhance the utilization of human resources while ensuring the complementary and appropriate use of consultancies [UNEP/GC.19/15], which the Council took note of on 7 February [dec. 19/28]. The Council asked her to implement a 1995 decision [YUN 1995, p. 1069] taking into account subsequent reports by UN bodies on the use of consultants by UNEP. It also asked her to continue to report on the issue quarterly to the Committee of Permanent Representatives.

Management issues

In 1997, the Governing Council considered a report of the Board of Auditors [UNEP/GC.19/INF.1] on UNEP accounts for the biennium ended 31 December 1995. The Board recommended corrective actions relating to programme management, financial management, procurement, publications programmes, the appointment of consultants and conference facilities. The Council also examined a report of the Executive Director describing action taken by UNEP to combat waste, fraud and mismanagement [UNEP/GC.19/6 & Add.1], as called for by the Council in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1069].

On 7 February [dec. 19/29 A], the Council expressed concern at the extent and nature of the Board's recommendations and, in view of the current financial and management crisis, as reflected in a drop-off in contributions to the Environment Fund, asked the Executive Director to identify and implement improvements in UNEP policies and practices designed to counter waste, fraud and mismanagement, including the appropriate delegation of programme-planning authority to line management, strengthening oversight mechanisms, clarifying financial procedures and incorporating into UNEP reports accurate financial information on income and expenditures. It also asked her to implement further measures that incorporated the recommendations of the Board of Auditors, of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) and the forthcoming reports of the Office of Internal Oversight Services (OIOS) (see below), and to submit an interim report to Member States within six months and a final report to the Council in 1999. Governments were encouraged to submit comments to the Executive Director prior to the 1999 session.

In other action on management issues, the Secretary-General, in response to General Assembly resolution 48/218 B [YUN 1994, p. 1362], transmitted a February report [A/51/810] by the Under-Secretary-General for Internal Oversight Services concerning a review of UNEP and the administrative practices of its secretariat, including UNON. The report stated that in general the UNEP secretariat was not functioning in an environment that facilitated efficiency and effectiveness. The functional responsibilities of departments were not clear, and there seemed to be no clear delegation of authority. There was an excessive use of consultants and advisers, with little indication of the value of their services, and the establishment of higher-grade posts, resulting in a top-heavy secretariat. The problems had been aggravated by the limited ability of the newly established UNON to provide common services in support of UNEP.

Recommendations by OIOS included defining the role and function of senior management; translating UNEP's role as a catalyst, coordinator and stimulator of environmental action into a single programme budget document; strengthening the Environmental Economics Unit; re-evaluating the relationship between the secretariats of the environmental conventions and UNEP; managerial assessment of the organizational structure to reduce its top-heaviness, delineate the functions of each unit, avoid a too-thin distribution of resources and reflect clear lines of authority; streamlining programme and administrative committees; appointing a second-in-command to the Executive Director; creating an independent evaluation office; resolving issues of compatibility between the UN and UNEP systems, in particular the issue of the Mercure telecommunications facility; reviewing the dispersal of financial authorization to ensure financial coherence; re-evaluating the appointment and promotion machinery; and putting UNON on the right track through the appropriate delegation of authority, staff enhancement through training and a stable resource base.

By decision 51/468 F of 13 June, the General Assembly took note of the OIOS report and noted that it would be considered by the Committee for Programme and Coordination (CPC) in 1997.

CPC consideration. At its thirty-seventh session (9 June–3 July) [A/52/16], CPC took note of the OIOS report and looked forward to the full implementation of its recommendations in accordance with UNEP Governing Council decisions.

UNEP Fund

Following consideration of the Executive Director's report on the status of the Environment Fund covering the use of resources in the 1994-1995 biennium, the revised use of resources in the 1996-1997 biennium and the proposed use of projected resources in the 1998-1999 biennium [UNEP/GC.19/22 & Corr.1], the Governing Council, on 7 February [A/52/25 (dec. 19/22)], approved the revised appropriation of Fund resources in 1996-1997 of $33,861,400 for the management and administrative support costs budget and $63.5 million for Fund programme activities. It also approved an appropriation of Fund resources in 1998-1999 of $27.5 million for the management and administrative support costs budget, $75 million for Fund programme activities and $5 million for the Fund programme reserve. An extraordinary additional amount of Fund resources in 1998-1999 of up to $1 million for the management and administrative support costs budget was approved as follows: $500,000 for an evaluation of UNEP management and administrative support and other activities related to improved management practices by UNEP; and $500,000 for the costs of the anticipated special session of the Council if those costs were not covered by the UN regular budget. The Council noted with concern that the overall low level of contributions to the Fund for 1996-1997 had fallen short of estimates by a significant margin and would not enable the 1996-1997 programme of activities to be fully implemented. The Executive Director was asked to provide up-to-date statements on all other sources of funding available to UNEP.

Regarding the management and administrative support costs budget, the Council approved changes in the provision of the costs to UNON Conference Services in 1997, as proposed in the Executive Director's report on developments in conference servicing [UNEP/GC.19/5]. It also approved a revised appropriation of $33,861,400 for the management and administrative support costs budget for 1996-1997. The Executive Director was asked to investigate steps for further savings in the 1997 support costs budget and to take steps for further reductions in 1998-1999. The Council confirmed personnel changes. It approved the revised format and structure of the management and administrative support costs budget as set out in the proposed 1998-1999 budget; an appropriation of $27.5 million for the 1998-1999 management and administrative support costs budget; and the annual payment of the UNEP contribution to UNON as a lump sum.

As to Fund programme activities, the Council, noting with concern the need to reduce the programme of activities it had adopted in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1064] owing to the shortfall in contributions to the Fund, approved the revised appropriation for 1996-1997 Fund programme activities of $63.5 million. It further approved an appropriation of $75 million for 1998-1999 activities. The Executive Director was asked to maintain the multilateral functions of the Regional Office for North America and the Regional Office for Europe and, in consultation with OIOS, to evaluate the role, functions and management of all UNEP regional offices. She was also asked to ensure that projects and activities deferred or deleted from the 1996-1997 work programme were covered in 1998-1999.

In another decision of 7 February [dec. 19/23], the Council, expressing concern at the serious erosion of UNEP's resource base of voluntary contributions to the Fund and its predictability, asked the Executive Director to explore, in consultation with Governments, ways to secure a stable, adequate and predictable funding for UNEP in the future, and to report thereon in 1999.

By another decision [dec. 19/26], the Council took note of ACABQ's observations on the report of the Board of Auditors on the Fund's 1994-1995 financial report and audited financial statements [A/51/533] and of the Executive Director's comments thereon [UNEP/GC.19/33]. It asked the Executive Director to implement the functions within UNEP's purview recommended for corrective action, before the end of the 1996-1997 biennium, and to report on the results in 1999.

Trust funds

On 7 February [dec. 19/24 A], the Council approved the establishment of 10 trust funds for specific activities and extended six others. It approved the extension of a further 22 trust funds subject to UNEP receiving requests to do so from the relevant Governments or contracting parties.

Taking note of the Executive Director's report on the cost of administering trust funds [UNEP/GC.19/18], the Council, on 7 February [dec. 19/24 B], asked her to identify the full administrative and management costs incurred by the individual trust funds and UNEP. She was also asked: to issue a summary report including a description of the major activities carried out by the programmatic trust funds, indicating also the infrastructure required by UNEP to manage and administer the funds; to provide the Governing Council biannually with a list of each fund's donors and the amounts that they contributed; to provide information on UNEP and UNON activities related to the programming, administration and management of funds; and to ensure the expeditious servicing of all programmatic units covered by trust funds. The Council decided to hold a full discussion in 1999 on the roles of the Executive Director and the Council.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 17 June [meeting 102], the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/238 without vote [agenda item 97 (a)].

Use of the Special Voluntary Fund and the Trust Fund established pursuant to General Assembly resolution 47/188

The General Assembly,

Recalling paragraph 15 of its resolution 47/188 of 22 December 1992 relating to a special voluntary fund to assist developing countries affected by desertification and drought, in particular the least developed countries, to participate fully and effectively in the negotiation process of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee for the Elaboration of an International Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa,

Recalling also paragraph 13 of its resolution 47/188 and paragraph 8 of resolution 50/112 of 20 December 1995 relating to the possibility of using the Trust Fund to support the participation of representatives of non-governmental organizations in the work of the Committee,

Recalling further paragraph 13 (b) of its resolution 51/180 of 16 December 1996 concerning the maintenance of arrangements relating to extrabudgetary funds,

Noting with pleasure the entry into force on 26 December 1996 of the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa,

1. Decides that the head of the interim secretariat, under the authority of the Secretary-General, shall have the possibility of using the Special Voluntary Fund, as appropriate, to assist developing countries affected by desertification and drought, in particular the least developed countries, to participate fully and effectively in the first session of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention;

2. Decides also that the head of the interim secretariat, under the authority of the Secretary-General, shall have the possibility of using the Trust Fund, as appropriate, to support the participation of representatives of non-governmental organizations in the work of the first session of the Conference of the Parties.

Financial rules

In a 7 February decision [dec. 19/25], the Governing Council, taking note of the Executive Director's report containing proposals for a revision of the Financial Rules of the UNEP Fund and of the General Procedures Governing the Operations of the Fund [UNEP/GC.19/3], approved a series of revisions to the Rules and to the General Procedures. It asked the Executive Director to consult UN financial authorities and other related UN programmes and agencies on the comprehensive review of the financial rules of UNEP and to report thereon in 1999.

General aspects

UNCED follow-up

During the year, follow-up action to the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) [YUN 1992, p. 670] was taken by the General Assembly, which held a special session to review and appraise the implementadon of Agenda 21—a plan of action for the sustainable development of the Earth into the twenty-first century—adopted by UNCED (see PART THREE, Chapter I), and by the Commission on Sustainable Development (see reports of the Secretary-General below in this section and under "Environmental activities").

The special session of the Assembly adopted the Programme for the Further Implementation of Agenda 21 (resolution S-19/2), which included a statement of commitment to Agenda 21 and to the goals of sustainable development at all levels. In other action, the Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee discussed matters relating to the implementation of UNCED decisions and recommendations. On 18 December, the Assembly, by decision 52/442, took note of part two of the Committee's report on those matters [A/52/629/Add.1].

Rio Declaration

The Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, adopted in 1992 at UNCED, held in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil [YUN 1992, p. 670], aimed to establish a new and equitable global partnership on environment and development through cooperation among States, key sectors of society and individuals.

In response to General Assembly resolution 51/181 [YUN 1996, p. 740], the Secretary-General submitted a February report, indicating the status of incorporation of the Declaration's 27 principles into national and international law [E/CN.17/1997/8] during the period 1992-1996. He stated that some of the principles appeared in global or regionally binding instruments, while others could be identified only in soft-law instruments. The report mainly focused on the international instruments adopted at UNCED and on major conventions adopted or having entered into force since then. Besides binding instruments, many of the principles of the Rio Declaration were included in instruments adopted at major intergovernmental conferences. The Secretary-General noted that considerable progress in implementing certain principles had been achieved.

Environment and sustainable development

The Commission on Sustainable Development (fifth session, New York, 7-25 April) considered a January report of the Secretary-General on integrating socio-economic and environmental concerns in decision-making [E/CN.17/1997/2/Add.7]. He addressed three areas: the development of integrated and participatory strategies for sustainable development at the national level, where progress had been mixed since UNCED, with further steps needed to realize their full potential; development and use of specific policy-making tools and instruments that helped to integrate environment and development in decision-making, including environmental impact assessment and indicators; and development and application of integrated environmental and economic accounting, where some progress had been made at the international level but much work remained to be done at the national level.

The most significant area of success with strategies and plans was at the city and municipal level, where local Agenda 21 initiatives had flourished. A substantial number of countries had established national-level commissions or coordinating mechanisms designed to develop an integrated approach to sustainable development and to include a wide range of civil society sectors in the process of agenda-setting and strategy-building. In addition, there had been an increase in initiatives to formulate regional strategies of sustainable development and action plans to establish mechanisms for regional cooperation in implementing the initiatives. An area of promising change related to the increased use by Governments, the private sector and other major groups of integrative decision-making tools expressed as economic and policy instruments that aided the process of integrating environment and development in decision-making.

In spite of positive developments, there had been slow progress in developing a system for environmental and economic accounting at the national level. There was also a need to clarify the definition, purposes and methods for national sustainable development strategies and to bring some consistency of practice to the different requirements that countries were to satisfy with respect to environmental action plans, national development plans and country strategy papers. Clarification was needed on how the outcomes of different international conferences and their calls for action could be integrated into national planning and overall action for sustainable development.

On 18 December, by decision 52/440, the General Assembly took note of part one of the Second Committee's report relating to environment and sustainable development [A/52/629].

On the same date, the Assembly, by decision 52/445, decided to continue to review the progress made in implementing the conventions signed at UNCED, as well as other conventions related to sustainable development, and asked the Secretary-General to submit a report in 1998 on ways of carrying out the review. It invited, beginning in the year 2000, the conferences of the parties to the conventions signed at UNCED or established as a result of the Conference, as well as other conventions relating to sustainable development, to take measures to avoid convening their sessions during Assembly sessions.

International conventions and mechanisms

On 7 February [A/52/25 (dec. 19/21)], the UNEP Governing Council, taking note of the report of the Executive Director on international conventions and protocols relating to the environment [UNEP/GC.19/31], called on States that had not signed, ratified or acceded to the conventions and protocols to which they were eligible to become parties to do so. It called on States and organizations to provide UNEP with information on new conventions and protocols as well as information on any changes to the status of existing ones. The Executive Director was asked to present updated information in 1999.

Climate change convention

In 1997, seven States (Burundi, Cyprus, Singapore, South Africa, Suriname, Ukraine, Yugoslavia) ratified the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, which was opened for signature in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 681] and entered into force in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 938], bringing the total number of parties to 171 as at 31 December. The Convention committed the industrialized countries to take the lead in limiting and reducing emissions of the greenhouse gases that were causing global warming.

Conference of Parties

The third session of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention (Kyoto, Japan, 1-11 December) adopted the Kyoto Protocol to the Convention [FCCC/CP/1997/7 & Add.1]. The Protocol, which would be open for signature for one year from 16 March 1998, aimed to reduce industrialized countries' collective emissions of carbon dioxide and five other greenhouse gases by 5.2 per cent below their 1990 levels during the period from 2008 to 2012. That figure translated into a real reduction of some 20 per cent below the point that emissions would otherwise have reached by 2010, according to projections. Individual national targets were differentiated to reflect national circumstances. Under the Protocol, an international emissions trading regime would be established to allow industrialized countries to buy and sell emissions credits among themselves. A joint implementation programme would provide credits for financing emissions-avoiding projects in developing and transition countries.

In addition to the environmental benefits, the Protocol would have long-reaching economic impacts. The main means for achieving the Kyoto targets would be domestic action in industrialized countries to improve efficiency in the use of energy, introduce new technologies and influence consumption patterns.

The Conference adopted decisions to promote the implementation of the Convention dealing with, among other things, development of observational networks of the climate system; funding of development and transfer of environmentally sound technologies; and cooperation with the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (see below, under "Environmental activities"). It decided to hold its fourth session in Buenos Aires, Argentina, from 2 to 13 November 1998.

Subsidiary bodies. The Conference's subsidiary bodies met during the year in Bonn, Germany. The Ad Hoc Group on the Berlin Mandate drew up the draft text for the Kyoto Protocol during its sixth (3-7 March) [FCCC/AGBM/1997/3 & Add.1], seventh (31 July-7 August) [FCCC/AGBM/1997/5] and eighth (22-31 October and 30 November) [FCCC/AGBM/1997/8 & Add.1] sessions.

The Subsidiary Body for Scientific and Technological Advice held its fifth (25-28 February) [FCCC/SBSTA/1997/4], sixth (28 July-5 August) [FCCC/SBSTA/1997/6] and seventh (20-28 October) [FCCC/SBSTA/1997/14] sessions, which dealt with cooperation with international organizations, methodological issues, mechanisms for consultations with non-governmental organizations (NGOs), the development and transfer of technologies and activities implemented jointly.

The Subsidiary Body for Implementation held its fifth (25 February-7 March) [FCCC/SBI/1997/6], sixth (28 July-5 August) [FCCC/SBI/1997/16] and seventh (20-29 October) [FCCC/SBI/1997/21] sessions to discuss national communications, financial and technical cooperation, the development and transfer of technologies, administrative and financial matters, and legal issues.

The Ad Hoc Group on Article 13, at its fourth (25-28 February) [FCCC/AG13/1997/2] and fifth (28-30 July) [FCCC/AG13/1997/4] sessions, considered the establishment of a multilateral consultative process for the resolution of questions regarding implementation (article 13).

Note of Secretary-General. As requested by the General Assembly in resolution 50/115 [YUN 1995, p. 1071], the Secretary-General, in a November note [A/52/667], reported on the result of the review of the arrangements established in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 953] for providing the Conference of the Parties to the Convention with conference services and the Convention secretariat with administrative services. He stated that the review of administrative arrangements was expected to be finalized in 1998. Regarding conference services, the UN Secretariat intended to continue providing them to the Conference and its subsidiary bodies during the 1998-1999 biennium.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee [A/52/629/Add.3], adopted resolution 52/199 without vote [agenda item 98 (c)].

Protection of global climate for present and future generations of mankind

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 50/115 of 20 December 1995 and 51/184 of 16 December 1996 and other relevant resolutions relating to the protection of the global climate for present and future generations of mankind,

Noting with satisfaction that most States and one regional economic integration organization have ratified or acceded to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change,

Expressing its deep appreciation to the Government of Japan for hosting the third session of the Conference of the Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change,

Looking forward to the continued efforts of the Conference of the Parties and its subsidiary bodies in addressing climate change,

Taking note of the statement of the Executive Secretary of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change on the results of the meeting of the Conference of the Parties prepared in response to the invitation of the General Assembly as contained in paragraph 6 of resolution 51/184,

Noting with regret that the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of resolutions 50/115 and 51/184 was not submitted on time,

1. Welcomes the convening of the third session of the Conference of the Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, in Kyoto, Japan, from 1 to 10 December 1997;

2. Calls upon all States to strive for a successful outcome of the Berlin Mandate process;

3. Notes the ongoing process of the review of the administrative arrangements regarding personnel and financial matters established in the context of the transitional arrangement for administrative support to the secretariat of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change for the biennium 1996-1997, and the arrangements made for the provision of conference services to the Conference of the Parties to the Convention and its subsidiary bodies for the biennium

1996-1997, as requested in paragraph 10 of its resolution 50/115 and paragraph 3 of its resolution 51/184;

4. Decides to maintain the arrangements regarding personnel and financial matters established in regard to the provisions of administrative support to the secretariat of the Convention, for the biennium 1998-1999, taking into account the review of the functioning of the institutional linkage called for in its resolution 50/115, and as reiterated in its resolution 51/184;

5. Also decides to include in the calendar of conferences and meetings for the biennium 1998-1999 the sessions of the Conference of the Parties and its subsidiary bodies, entailing eight weeks of conference-servicing facilities envisaged for that biennium;

6. Invites the Executive Secretary of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session and following the outcome of the third session of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention;

7. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session the sub-item entitled "Protection of global climate for present and future generations of mankind".

Montreal protocol

At 31 December, 162 States and the European Community (EC) were parties to the 1987 Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer [YUN 1987, p. 686], 116 States and EC were parties to the 1990 Amendment [YUN 1990, p. 522] to the Protocol, and 75 States and EC were parties to the 1992 Amendment [YUN 1992, p. 684].

The Ninth Meeting (Montreal, Canada, 15-17 September) of the Parties to the Montreal Protocol [UNEP/OzL.Pro.9/12] agreed on a phase-out schedule for methyl bromide, a fumigant and an ozone-depleting substance (ODS). The phase-out of methyl bromide by developed countries, previously set at 2010, had been moved up to 2005 with exemptions for critical uses and interim reductions of 25 per cent by 1999, 50 per cent by 2001 and 70 per cent by 2003. Developing countries agreed to a phase-out by 2015. In addition to $10 million agreed in 1996 for funding demonstration projects testing the feasibility of methyl bromide alternatives, the Multilateral Fund would make $25 million available annually in 1998 and 1999 for activities to phase out methyl bromide in developing countries. A new licensing system was adopted to prevent the illegal traffic of controlled substances, based on licences issued by parties for each import and export and on regular information exchange between parties. In other action, the Meeting asked parties to discourage the development and promotion of new substances with a significant potential to deplete the ozone layer, technologies to use such substances and use of those substances in various applications.

The Meeting amended the Protocol in areas dealing with banning the export and import of methyl bromide, the control of trade with parties and licensing. The Amendment would enter into force on 1 January 1999, provided that at least 20 instruments of ratification, acceptance or approval had been deposited by parties to the Protocol. The Tenth Meeting of the Parties would be held in November 1998 in Cairo, Egypt.

The Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) reported that, as at December, UNDP was assisting 60 countries to eliminate ODS [DP/1998/17/Add.2]. In 1997, total approvals were $45.4 million, with 99 per cent funded by the Executive Committee of the Protocol Multilateral Fund and 1 per cent funded through the Global Environment Facility for work in the countries of the Commonwealth of Independent States. Thus, the UNDP 1991-1997 cumulative project portfolio increased to $190 million. The portfolio comprised 730 projects, including 444 technology-transfer conversion projects, which would eliminate 24,226 tonnes per year of ODS. In 1997, UNDP completed 79 projects, thus raising the total number of projects completed during 1991-1997 to 252, including 49 technology-conversion projects that eliminated 3,065 tonnes of ODS yearly and 30 non-investment projects comprising training, technical cooperation, project preparation and demonstration projects. Under the programme, a total of $35 million was disbursed in 1997. UNDP also had programmes in 27 low-ODS-consuming countries and developed seven innovative approaches to eliminate ODS consumption in small and medium-sized enterprises.

Convention on Biological Diversity

In 1997, seven States became parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity, which opened for signature in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 683] and entered into force in 1993 [YUN 1993, p. 810], bringing the total number of parties to 172.

The objectives of the Convention were the conservation, sustainable use and equitable sharing of the benefits of the use of biological diversity.

The fourth meeting of the Conference of the Parties was scheduled to take place in May 1998 in Bratislava, Slovakia.

Commission action. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 51/182 [YUN 1996, p. 957], the Secretary-General, in February [E/CN.17/1997/11], transmitted to the Commission on Sustainable Development the report of the Executive Secretary of the Convention on experience gained under the Convention and on arrangements to coordinate activities related to the Convention's objectives.

The Convention had become a vehicle to implement the concept of sustainable development and the policies of Agenda 21 in the area of biological diversity. Under Agenda 21's social and economic dimensions, the Convention addressed international cooperation to accelerate sustainable development, combating poverty, changing consumption patterns, protecting and promoting health and integrating environment and development in decision-making. In the area of conservation and management of resources for development, it covered the protection of the atmosphere, an integrated approach to the planning and management of land resources, combating deforestation, managing fragile ecosystems, promoting sustainable agriculture and rural development, the environmentally sound management of biotechnology and the protection of the oceans, all kinds of seas, including enclosed and semi-enclosed seas, and coastal areas and the protection, rational use and development of their living resources. As to strengthening the role of major groups, the Convention corresponded to the chapters of Agenda 21 dealing with global action for women towards sustainable and equitable development, strengthening the role of indigenous people and their communities, strengthening the role of farmers and strengthening the role of business and industry.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee [A/52/629/Add.5], adopted resolution 52/201 without vote [agenda item 98 (e)].

Convention on Biological Diversity

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 51/182 of 16 December 1996 on the Convention on Biological Diversity and other relevant resolutions relating to the Convention,

Recalling also the provisions of the Convention on Biological Diversity,

Recalling further Agenda 21, particularly its chapter 15 on the conservation of biological diversity and related chapters,

Recalling the recommendations made at the third session of the Commission on Sustainable Development on the review of chapter 15 of Agenda 21 on the conservation of biological diversity,

Deeply concerned by the continued loss of the world's biological diversity, and, on the basis of the provisions of the Convention, reaffirming the commitment to the conservation of biological diversity, the sustainable use of its components, and the fair and equitable sharing of benefits arising out of the utilization of genetic resources,

Emphasizing that the Convention is an important instrument for achieving sustainable development, taking into account its three objectives, and for promoting the ecosystem approach embodied in the Convention and the decisions of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention,

Encouraged by the work carried out to date under the Convention,

Noting with satisfaction that most States and one regional economic integration organization have ratified or acceded to the Convention,

Taking note with appreciation of the generous offer of the Government of Slovakia to host the fourth meeting of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention at Bratislava from 4 to 15 May 1998,

Recalling its invitation to the Executive Secretary of the Convention on Biological Diversity to report to the General Assembly on the results of future meetings of the Conference of the Parties,

1. Welcomes the results of the third meeting of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity, held at Buenos Aires from 4 to 15 November 1996, as reflected in the report of the meeting, submitted in accordance with resolution 51/182, and in that context reaffirms the need to take concrete action to fulfil the three objectives of the Convention;

2. Takes note of the decision of the Conference of the Parties on the conservation and sustainable use of agricultural biological diversity and the programme of work contained therein, and the development of a focused work programme for forest biological diversity;

3. Also takes note of the ongoing work and the international cooperation to date towards fulfilling the objectives of the Convention, the decision of the Conference of the Parties and, inter alia, the initiative taken on holding workshops, including the workshop on traditional knowledge and biological diversity, and the important work being carried out by the subsidiary bodies of the Convention;

4. Further takes note of the work carried out at the third meeting of the Open-ended Ad Hoc Working Group on Biosafety, held at the seat of the secretariat of the Convention at Montreal, Canada, from 13 to 17 October 1997, and reaffirms the importance of those negotiations for the development of a protocol on biosafety;

5. Encourages those States that have not yet ratified the Convention to do so as soon as possible;

6. Recognizes that States parties to the Convention have agreed to provide additional financial resources for the implementation of the Convention in accordance with article 20 of the Convention, and urges all funding institutions, including bilateral and multilateral donors as well as regional funding institutions and non-governmental organizations, to cooperate with the secretariat of the Convention in implementing the decision of the Conference of the Parties;

7. Renews its appreciation for the important work being carried out under the Convention towards enhancing cooperation with the Commission on Sustainable Development and biodiversity-related conventions;

8. Recognizes the importance of the implementation of the Convention at all levels, including through the preparation and the implementation of national strategies, plans and programmes;

9. Notes that the first national reports by States parties to the Convention, as required under article 26 of the Convention, are due to be submitted to the secretariat of the Convention no later than 1 January 1998 in accordance with the decision taken at the second meeting of the Conference of the Parties, calls upon Member States that are parties to the Convention to meet that requirement as soon as possible, and in that context invites the international community to assist developing countries in fulfilling that commitment;

10. Also notes the clarification of the administrative arrangements regarding the respective roles of the United Nations Environment Programme and the secretariat of the Convention in respect of personnel and financial matters, as detailed in the Administrative Arrangements between the United Nations Environment Programme and the secretariat of the Convention on Biological Diversity signed on 30 June 1997;

11. Calls upon States parties to the Convention to settle urgently any arrears and to pay their contributions in full and in a timely manner, in accordance with the decision of the Conference of the Parties regarding the contributions required for the Trust Fund for the Convention on Biological Diversity, so as to ensure continuity in the cash flow required to finance the ongoing work of the Conference of the Parties, the subsidiary bodies and the Convention secretariat;

12. Invites the Executive Secretary of the Convention on Biological Diversity to report to the General Assembly on the results of future meetings of the Conference of the Parties;

13. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session the sub-item entitled "Convention on Biological Diversity".

Convention to combat desertification

As at 31 December, 116 States were parties to the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in Those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa, which was adopted in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 944] and entered into force in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 958]. During the year, 59 States ratified or acceded to the Convention.

Implementation

UNEP action. The Executive Director submitted a report to the Governing Council summarizing progress achieved during 1995 and 1996 towards implementing the Convention, including through the partnership agreement with the UNDP Office to Combat Desertification (UNSO) [UNEP/GC.19/7]. She described UNEP action in desertification control areas, including the assessment of land degradation; improving global awareness of dryland and desertification issues; promoting action in support of the Convention; and improving understanding of the social dimensions of land degradation and promoting sustainable practices of land management. The Executive Director observed that progress had been achieved in 1996, despite being constrained by the lack of resources.

The Governing Council, on 7 February [A/52/25 (dec. 19/17)], taking note of the Executive Director's report, urged States that had not ratified the Convention to do so. It encouraged the Executive Director to: continue to contribute to the implementation of the Convention; invite other UN organizations and agencies, financial institutions, funds and other interested parties to participate in partnership agreements for implementing the Convention in affected developing countries, particularly in Africa; continue to support activities related to capacity-building and coordinating mechanisms; and intensify support for activities in Africa, Asia and Latin America and the Caribbean. Governments were urged to provide the Conference of the Parties with relevant research and up-to-date data on the status of desertification and land degradation for consideration of the Committee on Science and Technology of the Convention. Governments, regional economic integration organizations and other organizations, as well as NGOs, were called on to contribute further to the implementation of the Convention in affected developing countries.

Note by Secretary-General. In October [A/52/526], the Secretary-General reported on the implementation of General Assembly resolution 50/114 [YUN 1995, p. 1079] on desertification and drought.

Under their 1995 partnership agreement [YUN 1995, p. 1078], UNDP and UNEP were committed to working on sustainable dryland management through the Convention. On the basis of that partnership, UNDP/UNSO and UNEP had collaborated on two joint initiatives, on assessment, monitoring and information systems and on a framework for advocacy. On assessing and monitoring desertification, UNEP and UNSO had collaborated on the development of desertification indicators. A joint initiative on desertification assessment and monitoring was under way. In collaboration with other core partners, UNEP and UNDP/UNSO were designing a plan for advocacy and outreach to facilitate cost-effective and coordinated efforts to increase knowledge and awareness on dryland issues, building partnerships and drawing on the strengths and interests of the partners involved. Financial support to UNDP/UNSO from 1995 to date amounted to $13.7 million.

The Economic and Social Council, on 7 February, authorized the Secretary-General to submit his report on desertification and drought directly to the General Assembly (decision 1997/205).

UNDP action. On 19 September [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/24)], the UNDP Executive Board approved a gross appropriation of $5.85 million for the 1998-1999 biennial support budget for UNDP/UNSO. It asked the UNDP Administrator to report in 1998 on progress in implementing that budget.

Conference of Parties

The Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee for the Elaboration of an International Convention to Combat Desertification in Those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa (INCD), held its tenth session (New York, 6-17 January) [A/52/82] and a resumed tenth session (Geneva, 18-22 August) [A/52/82/Add.1] to prepare for the first Conference of the Parties. INCD adopted decisions related to functions of a global mechanism, the accreditation of NGOs, the designation of a permanent secretariat, administrative and support arrangements and the identification of an organization to house the global mechanism, which was to promote actions to mobilize and channel financial resources.

The Conference of the Parties, at its first session (Rome, Italy, 29 September-10 October) [ICCD/COP(1)/11 & Add.1], accepted an offer by the UN Secretary-General to provide administrative and support arrangements for the Convention secretariat and asked him, in consultation with the Conference, to appoint the first head of the secretariat. The Conference decided to accept the offer of Germany to host the permanent secretariat in Bonn and selected the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD) to house the global mechanism. The 1999 budget and programme was adopted, and parties, as well as Governments of States not parties, intergovernmental organizations and NGOs were invited to make contributions to the Supplementary Fund and the Special Fund of the Convention. The Conference decided to review the implementation of the Convention at its second session, to be held in Dakar, Senegal, from 24 August to 4 September 1998. It adopted procedures for the communication of information and review of implementation. Other decisions dealt with the terms of reference of the Committee on Science and Technology (CST) and its work programme; other bodies performing work similar to that of CST, and procedures for establishing ad hoc panels.

Report of Secretary-General. As requested by the General Assembly in resolution 51/180 [YUN 1996, p. 958], the Secretary-General, in a November report [A/52/549], discussed action to implement the Convention by States, INCD and the interim secretariat and reviewed the substantive decisions adopted at the Conference of the Parties at its first session. He also reviewed the institutional, administrative and financial implications of the Conference decisions.

The Secretary-General summarized requests made by the Conference to the General Assembly, which included: endorsing the institutional linkage between the permanent secretariat and the United Nations and providing for its review; requesting the Secretary-General to authorize the head of the interim secretariat to use in 1998 the Special Voluntary Fund and the Trust Fund, established by the Assembly in resolution 47/188 [YUN 1992, p. 686]; approving conference-servicing costs for the duration of the institutional linkage of the permanent secretariat to the United Nations; and requesting the transfer of any amounts remaining in the Trust Fund and the Special Voluntary Fund as at 31 December 1998 to the Supplementary Fund and to the Special Fund to be established. The Secretary-General was asked to appoint the head of the Convention secretariat for a three-year period starting on 1 January 1999; authorize the use of the Special Voluntary Fund to assist developing countries to participate in the second session of the Conference; and similarly authorize the use of the Trust Fund to support the participation of NGOs in the session.

Committee on Science and Technology

The Committee on Science and Technology, a subsidiary body of the Conference, held its first session (Rome, 29 September-10 October). It considered proposals by seven organizations to undertake a survey and evaluation of existing networks, institutions, agencies and bodies willing to become units of a network to support implementation of the Convention [ICCD/COP(1)/CST/2 & Add.1]. It also reviewed comments and suggestions from INCD members and international organizations concerning indicators relating to Convention implementation, benchmarks and environmental impact indicators [ICCD/COP(1)/CST/3 & Add.1]. CST examined suggestions on its methods of work [ICCD/COP(1)/CST/5] and the activities of other bodies performing similar work [ICCD/COP(1)/CST/4].

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee [A/52/629/Add.2], adopted resolution 52/198 without vote [agenda item 98 (b)].

Implementation of the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought, and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 47/188 of 22 December 1992, 48/191 of 21 December 1993, 49/234 of 23 December 1994, 50/112 of 20 December 1995, 51/180 of 16 December 1996 and 51/238 of 17 June 1997,

Noting with satisfaction that a large number of States have ratified the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa, and calling upon other States to take appropriate action to that end,

Noting that, in accordance with paragraphs 4 and 5 of its resolution 51/180, the first session of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention was held at Rome from 29 September to 10 October 1997 and that it was attended by one hundred and two parties and by a large number of observers from Governments and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations,

Expressing its deep appreciation to the Government of Italy for the generous manner in which it hosted the first session of the Conference of the Parties and to the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations for the facilities it provided,

Recognizing the contribution to the convention process of the interim secretariat of the Convention, within the framework of the former Department for Policy Coordination and Sustainable Development of the Secretariat, as well as the support provided to the interim secretariat by all bilateral and multilateral contributors, including regional and non-governmental organizations,

Recognizing also the support provided during the interim phase of the Convention to the launching of national, subregional and regional action programme processes in response to the resolution on urgent action for Africa, and the support provided to the interim activities in other regions carried out by Governments, regional economic integration organizations, intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations, as well as by specialized agencies, funds and programmes of the United Nations system,

Noting the offer made by the Secretary-General to provide administrative and support arrangements in the framework of an institutional linkage of the Convention secretariat to the United Nations,

Taking note of the decision of the Conference of the Parties, on the basis of the offer made by the Secretary-General, that the Convention secretariat should be institutionally linked to the United Nations, while not being fully integrated into the work programme and management structure of any particular department or programme,

Taking note also of the financial rules of the Conference of the Parties, its subsidiary bodies and the secretariat of the Convention, adopted by the Conference at its first session, whereby, inter alia, the Secretary-General, at 1 January 1999, is requested to establish trust funds (general, supplementary and special funds) for the purposes of the Convention, to be managed by the head of the Convention secretariat in accordance with the relevant financial rules and within the duly delegated authority,

Taking note further of the decision of the Conference of the Parties at its first session that the General Assembly be requested to decide, bearing in mind the institutional linkage of the Convention secretariat to the United Nations and the large number of States that are parties to the Convention, to finance from the regular programme budget of the United Nations the conference-servicing costs arising from sessions of the Conference of the Parties and its subsidiary bodies for the duration of the institutional linkage,

Taking note of the reports of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee for the Elaboration of an International Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa on its tenth session, held in New York from 6 to 17 January 1997, and its resumed tenth session, held at Geneva from 18 to 22 August 1997, and the report of the Conference of the Parties on its first session,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of General Assembly resolution 51/180, in particular paragraph 15,

1. Approves the institutional linkage between the secretariat of the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa, and the United Nations, in accordance with the offer made by the Secretary-General and as accepted by the Conference of the Parties to the Convention at its first session;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to review the functioning of the institutional linkage, including the financing arrangements, not later than 31 December 2000, in consultation with the Conference of the Parties, with a view to making such modifications as may be considered desirable by the General Assembly and the Conference, and to report thereon to the Assembly;

3. Notes that the Conference of the Parties has decided to accept the offer of the Government of Germany to host the Convention secretariat at Bonn, and expresses its appreciation for the support offered by the future host Government with respect to the relocation and effective functioning of the Convention secretariat;

4. Expresses its appreciation to the Government of Switzerland, which hosted the interim secretariat, and to the Government of Canada and the Government of Spain, which offered to host the Convention secretariat, and invites them to continue to support the permanent secretariat and to contribute to the implementation of the Convention;

5. Welcomes the selection by the Conference of the Parties at its first session of the International Fund for Agricultural Development to house the Global Mechanism and, in accordance with the decision of the Conference, invites the Fund, as the lead organization, to cooperate fully with the United Nations Development Programme and the World Bank;

6. Takes note of the statement of the President of the Conference of the Parties at the closing of the first session, and, in this context, invites the Conference to facilitate the elaboration of an additional regional implementation annex to the Convention for the countries of the eastern and central European region to be launched at the second session of the Conference in 1998, in accordance with the goals and objectives of the Convention, and with a view to finalizing it as soon as possible;

7. Urges Governments and all interested organizations, including non-governmental organizations and the private sector, to make promptly the voluntary contributions necessary to ensure that the Global Mechanism can begin operating on 1 January 1998;

8. Requests the Secretary-General, bearing in mind the decision taken by the Conference of the Parties at its first session:

(a) To authorize the interim secretariat established pursuant to resolution 47/188 to act as the secretariat for the transition period following the first session of the Conference of the Parties until the permanent secretariat designated by the Conference begins operating by 1 January 1999;

(b) To maintain the arrangements within the current programme budget for the interim secretariat to support the Convention until the permanent secretariat begins operating by 1 January 1999 and to maintain the arrangements relating to extrabudgetary funds;

9. Notes with appreciation the contributions made to the Trust Fund established pursuant to resolution 47/188, and invites Governments, regional economic integration organizations and other interested organizations to continue to make voluntary contributions to the Trust Fund to support the interim secretariat and the work of the Conference of the Parties and its subsidiary bodies for the transition period following the first session of the Conference;

10. Also notes with appreciation the contributions made to the Special Voluntary Fund established pursuant to resolution 47/188 to assist developing countries affected by desertification and drought, in particular the least developed countries, as well as representatives of non-governmental organizations of developing countries, to participate fully and effectively in the sessions of the Conference of the Parties and its subsidiary bodies, and invites Governments, regional economic integration organizations and other organizations to continue to contribute generously to the Fund also for the transition period following the first session of the Conference;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to close, on 31 December 1998, the Trust Fund and the Special Voluntary Fund established under the provisions of resolution 47/188 and to transfer any amounts remaining in the Trust Fund and in the Special Voluntary Fund as of 31 December 1998, respectively, to the supplementary fund to be established pursuant to paragraph 9 of the financial rules and to the special fund to be established in accordance with paragraph 10 of the financial rules;

12. Renews its appeal to Governments, regional economic integration organizations and other interested organizations, as well as to non-governmental organizations and the private sector, to continue to contribute generously to the two extrabudgetary funds mentioned above for the transition period following the first session of the Conference of the Parties;

13. Calls upon all countries that are not parties to the Convention to take appropriate action for the ratification, acceptance, approval or accession to the Convention;

14. Stresses the necessity to advance, as soon as possible, the full implementation of the Convention, and, in this context, calls upon Governments of affected countries, as a matter of priority, to accelerate the processes of elaboration of national, subregional and regional action programmes, and calls upon the international community, in particular the developed countries, and the United Nations system, and invites the multilateral financial institutions and all other interested actors, to support the efforts of affected developing countries in these processes by providing financial resources and other forms of assistance, in accordance with the relevant articles of the Convention and the decisions of the Conference of the Parties;

15. Urges all States that are parties to the Convention to pay promptly and in full on the first month of each year, starting on 1 January 1999, the contributions required for the core budget of the Convention envisaged in the financial rules, so as to ensure continuity in the cash flow required to finance the ongoing work of the Conference of the Parties, the subsidiary bodies, the permanent secretariat and the Global Mechanism;

16. Calls upon all countries, in particular developed countries, non-governmental organizations and the private sector to contribute generously to the trust funds (general, supplementary and special funds) to be established by the Secretary-General on 1 January 1999, in conformity with the financial rules of the Conference of the Parties, in order to facilitate activities under the Convention and to support the participation of representatives of developing and, in particular, least developed country parties affected by desertification and/or drought, particularly those in Africa, as well as the participation of some representatives of non-governmental organizations of those countries in the sessions of the Conference and its subsidiary bodies;

17. Decides to include in the calendar of conferences and meetings for the biennium 1998-1999 the sessions of the Conference of the Parties and its subsidiary bodies envisaged for that biennium, taking into account the request of the Conference;

18. Takes note of the transitional arrangement for administrative support to the Convention secretariat, outlined in the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of General Assembly resolution 51/180, with particular reference to the implications arising from the report of the Conference of the Parties on its first session, which should facilitate the establishment and relocation of the Convention secretariat and assist it in addressing any initial financial and personnel problems that may be encountered in that context;

19. Welcomes with appreciation the generous offer of the Government of Senegal to host the second session of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention at Dakar from 30 November to 11 December 1998;

20. Requests the Secretary-General to bring the present resolution to the attention of all Governments, the relevant specialized agencies, funds and programmes of the United Nations system, multilateral and bilateral financial institutions and other inter-governmental organizations, as well as to non-governmental organizations and the private sector;

21. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to it, at its fifty-third session, on the implementation of the present resolution;

22. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session the sub-item entitled "Implementation of the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa".

The atmosphere

Atmosphere and climate protection

A January report to the Commission on Sustainable Development [E/CN.17/1997/27Add.8], prepared by the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) as task manager for chapter 9 of Agenda 21 (protection of the atmosphere), reviewed the impact of energy production and consumption and of transportation on the atmosphere, particularly global climate change. It briefly mentioned the issues of the stratospheric ozone layer, transboundary atmospheric pollution and land-use.

Success since the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) [YUN 1992, p. 672] had been limited in controlling carbon dioxide emissions produced by burning fossil fuels, the report stated, and world total energy production and consumption and resulting carbon dioxide emissions continued to rise. However, a positive trend was seen as energy intensity was improving and the carbon intensity of energy was declining. In addition, the political will to address the problem of greenhouse gas emissions was increasing in many countries. There was a noticeable shift in government research and development budgets globally from the fossil energy sector to energy conservation and renewable energy. Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change had agreed to negotiate an agreement to limit greenhouse gas emissions in industrialized countries after the year 2000 (see above, under "International conventions and mechanisms").

Several government initiatives were being taken or considered to curb the environmental impact of transportation on the atmosphere, including promoting the use of cleaner transport fuels, encouraging the use of public transport and combating traffic congestion. Research on future engines, including electric and hybrid vehicles, and alternative fuels was under way.

As to other concerns, global production and consumption of major ozone-depleting substances had decreased markedly. Actions to address national issues in developed countries and agreements among industrialized countries had led to a reduction in transboundary air pollution and its impacts. Projects to conserve and sequester carbon varied from carbon conservation by protecting forests or developing sustainable forest management practices to increasing carbon pools through afforestation and agroforestry.

Efforts undertaken so far had been modest, however, as had the successes. Enormous efforts had to be made by Governments to reform their energy and transport-related policies and provide the needed market signals to ensure that moderate successes were strengthened in the long term. Obstacles to progress included limited policy changes in energy system planning and technology research; the inability of Governments and markets to incorporate environmental concerns in the energy and transport sectors; low fossil fuel prices; the development of an illegal trade in chlorofluorocarbons; and the difficulty for many developing countries to give priority to transboundary atmospheric pollution.

Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change

The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC), established by UNEP and the World Meteorological Organization (WMO) to assess scientific information about climate change for international and national policy formulation, held its thirteenth session (9-11 July). IPCC approved the creation of the Data Distribution Centre (DDC) to facilitate the timely distribution of a consistent set of up-to-date scenarios of changes in climate and related environmental and socio-economic factors for use in climate impact assessments. It was determined at the thirteenth IPCC plenary meeting (Maldives, 22-28 September) that DDC would be a shared operation between the Climatic Research Unit in the United Kingdom and the Deutsches Klimarechenzentrum in Germany. Technical inputs from other centres or organizations with experience in preparing and distributing climate scenarios would also be solicited.

Terrestrial ecosystems

Biosafety and biodiversity

On 7 February [A/52/25 (dec. 19/16)], the UNEP Governing Council urged Governments and sub-regional and regional organizations to promote the implementation of the UNEP International Technical Guidelines for Safety in Biotechnology, adopted in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1078], by designating national focal points to apply the Guidelines. The Executive Director was asked to continue to promote the implementation of the Guidelines, particularly in developing countries, and to explore with other UN and international bodies the mutual sharing of information about organisms with novel traits contained on international databases and the rationalization of the databases, in order to avoid duplication of sources of information and the need for the multiple entry of data. She was also asked to organize within two years a second international workshop on the implementation of the Guidelines and periodically to review progress made in implementing them. The Council asked her to report in 1999 on progress made.

Desertification and drought control

In a January report [E/CN.17/1997/2/Add.11] to the Commission on Sustainable Development, prepared by UNEP as task manager for chapter 12 of Agenda 21 (combating desertification and drought), the Secretary-General stated that since the adoption of the Convention to combat desertification in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 944] there had been significant efforts in Africa to place land degradation and desertification issues at the centre of the political agenda for Africa's socio-economic recovery. Greater recognition of the issue outside Africa was evident, and renewed efforts were being made by several organizations, particularly UNEP, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) and the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD) to seek, evaluate and publicize success stories in sustainable dryland management. Although political commitment had increased in the affected countries, the issue was not always high on ministers' lists of priorities for action, and resources were frequently not available. Despite the major role that NGOs played in supporting improved environmental management of the drylands and the strong support of smaller NGOs at the negotiations for the Convention, it was disappointing that the larger international NGOs had not played a more prominent role in the follow-up process.

Emerging priorities regarding desertification and drought involved implementation of the Convention; capacity-building for implementation in affected countries; awareness-raising in affected and non-affected countries of the importance of dryland environments and the significance of the desertification issue; and development of drought-preparedness plans.

Deforestation and forest degradation

Commission action. The Secretary-General submitted to the Commission on Sustainable Development a January report [E/CN.17/1997/2/Add.10], prepared by FAO as task manager for chapter 11 of Agenda 21 (combating deforestation), on combating deforestation and the Non-Legally Binding Authoritative Statement of Principles for a Global Consensus on the Management, Conservation and Sustainable Development of All Types of Forests (the Forest Principles). The Forest Principles constituted a non-legally binding instrument, agreed upon at UNCED [YUN 1992, p. 674], that provided a framework for the sustainable development of all types of forests, while recognizing the sovereign right of countries over their forest resources.

Significant progress had been made at the planning and policy levels. In most countries, forestry and forest-related activities were undergoing radical and complex changes. Fifty developing countries had completed a strategic planning exercise and another 20 were in the process of doing so. In several industrialized countries, national strategies for sustainable forest management had been formulated and adopted by parliaments. Some progress was made on financing sustainable forest management. Technology transfer and capacity-building had advanced in the areas of disseminating information on how to improve land-use planning and forest yields; developing and implementing national forest strategies; technology and methods to reduce environmental damage due to forestry practices; species research for tree improvement for rehabilitation; reforestation and nursery development; new and renewable sources of energy; and environmentally sound logging technologies. However, areas such as trade in lesser-used species, valuation of forests and forest resources and traditional forest-related knowledge had received inadequate attention.

In the area of forest assessment, a framework for the global Forest Resources Assessment 2000 and the core set of definitions were agreed upon in an expert consultation organized by FAO in 1996. A basis of tested methods and data organization mechanisms was in place. Efforts had been made to increase national capacities in forest assessment by FAO, the European Community and the International Union of Forest Research Organizations. Over 50 countries had established mechanisms and institutions for continuous national resources assessment.

Concerning trade in forest products, the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations (see PART THREE, Chapter IV) had made significant progress in improving market access for forest products, especially in terms of reducing tariffs for all types of forest products. However, forest products market transparency and forest management cost internalization were still unsolved issues. The setting up of the Ad Hoc Intergovernmental Panel on Forests (IPF) under the auspices of the Commission had allowed for substantial progress towards a more coordinated collaboration between international instruments and organizations.

Despite progress made, there were policy constraints, a lack of country capacity in many developing countries and inadequate funding. Key issues related to international cooperation had to be addressed at the national, subregional, regional and global levels.

Priorities and recommendations were emerging from IPF discussions and would be considered at its February session (see below).

Ad Hoc Intergovernmental Panel. IPF, mandated to pursue a consensus and draw up options for further actions to combat deforestation and forest degradation and to promote the management, conservation and sustainable development of all types of forests, held its fourth session (New York, 11-21 February) [E/CN.17/1997/12]. The Panel presented proposals for action on its five main programme elements as follows: the implementation of UNCED decisions related to forests at the national and international levels, including an examination of sectoral and cross-sectoral links (national forest and land-use programmes, causes of deforestation and forest degradation, traditional forest-related knowledge, fragile ecosystems affected by desertification and drought, the impact of airborne pollution on forests, needs and requirements of countries with low forest cover); international cooperation in financial assistance and technology transfer (strengthening financial assistance, increasing private-sector investment, enhancing national capacity and national coordination, enhancing international cooperation, enhancing technology transfer and capacity-building, improving information systems); scientific research, forest assessment and development of criteria and indicators for sustainable forest management (assessment of the multiple benefits of all types of forests, forest research, proper valuation of the multiple benefits of forests, criteria and indicators for sustainable forest management); trade and environment in relation to forest products and services (market access, the relative competitiveness of forest products, lesser-used species, certification and labelling, full-cost internalization, market transparency); and international organizations and multilateral institutions and instruments, including legal mechanisms.

On 25 April [E/1997/29 (dec. 5/102)], the Commission took note of the Panel's report.

Intergovernmental Forum on Forests

In July, the Economic and Social Council established the Intergovernmental Forum on Forests (IFF), under the aegis of the Commission on Sustainable Development, to work towards a legaily binding instrument on the management, conservation and sustainable development of all types of forests. The Forum was also charged with promoting the implementation of the IPF proposals for action.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 25 July [meeting 42], the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1997/65 [draft: E/1997/L.49] without vote [agenda item 7 (b)].

Establishment of an ad hoc open-ended Intergovernmental Forum on Forests of the Commission on Sustainable Development

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its decision 1995/226 of 1 June 1995, approving the establishment of an ad hoc open-ended intergovernmental panel on forests of the Commission on Sustainable Development to pursue consensus and formulate coordinated proposals for action towards the management, conservation and sustainable development of all types of forests,

Recognizing that the management, conservation and sustainable development of all types of forests is a crucial factor in economic and social development, environmental protection and the Earth's life-support system,

Taking into account the decision taken by the General Assembly at its nineteenth special session to continue the intergovernmental policy dialogue on forests through the establishment of an ad hoc open-ended Intergovernmental Forum on Forests under the aegis of the Commission on Sustainable Development to work in an open, transparent and participatory manner, with a focused and time-limited mandate, charged with, inter alia, (a) promoting and facilitating the implementation of the proposals for action of the Intergovernmental Panel on Forests; (b) reviewing, monitoring and reporting on progress in the management, conservation and sustainable development of all types of forests; and (c) considering matters left pending as regards the programme elements of the Intergovernmental Panel, in particular trade and environment in relation to forest products and services, transfer of technology and the need for financial resources,

Taking into account also the decision of the General Assembly at its nineteenth special session that the Forum should identify the possible elements of and work towards consensus on international arrangements and mechanisms, for example, a legally binding instrument, and should report on its work to the Commission on Sustainable Development in 1999; based on that report, and depending on the decision of the Commission at its eighth session, the Forum should engage in further action on establishing an intergovernmental negotiation process on new arrangements and mechanisms or a legally binding instrument on all types of forests; the Forum should convene as soon as possible to elaborate further its terms of reference and decide on organizational matters; and the Forum should be serviced by a small secretariat within the Department of Economic and Social Affairs of the Secretariat, supported by voluntary extrabudgetary contributions from Governments and international organizations,

1. Decides to establish, under the aegis of the Commission on Sustainable Development, an ad hoc, open-ended Intergovernmental Forum on Forests as envisaged above, which will report to the Commission at its eighth session in 2000;

2. Also decides that the Forum should hold its first (organizational) session in New York from 1 to 3 October 1997 so that the preparations for its substantive sessions can start without delay;

3. Further decides that, at its first session, the Forum shall schedule its programme of work, decide on the modalities of its work, including the election and designation of officers, and recommend to the Council the number, venue and duration of its substantive sessions, which could be of up to two weeks each, and, recognizing the wide range of issues to be addressed, decides that the Forum may consider dividing its work between in-session working groups, on the understanding that no more than two working groups would meet simultaneously;

4. Decides that the Forum should be serviced by a small secretariat within the secretariat of the Commission on Sustainable Development, supported by voluntary extrabudgetary contributions from Governments and international organizations, that the operation of the Forum will require funding to support activities as well as meetings and participation by representatives of developing countries and major groups from developing countries, that the participation of major groups should be in accordance with the rules of procedure of the Commission and that, in this regard, the following sources of funding should be considered: voluntary extrabudgetary contributions from Governments and international organizations to support the work of the Forum, secondments from international organizations and in-kind contributions from countries and international organizations, including the hosting of meetings;

5. Encourages interested Governments and organizations to make early voluntary contributions to ensure that the work of the Forum starts quickly;

6. Recommends that support from the United Nations system should, as far as possible, be derived from the reallocation of resources within the existing budgets of United Nations bodies in order to respond to high-priority activities.

At its first session (New York, 1-3 October) [E/CN.17/IFF/1997/4], IFF elected its officers, adopted its agenda, established its work programme, proposed to the Economic and Social Council dates and venues of its future sessions and considered the question of the participation of intergovernmental organizations in its work.

Concerning its work programme, IFF decided that it should consider the following categories of activities: category I, promoting the implementation of IPF proposals for action and reviewing and reporting on progress in the management, conservation and sustainable development of all types of forests; category II, considering issues arising from IPF programme elements, including matters left pending on the need for financial resources, on trade and environment, and on the transfer of environmentally sound technologies to support sustainable forest management, other issues needing further clarification (transboundary economic forces of deforestation, traditional forest-related knowledge, valuation of forest goods and services, forest cover in environmentally critical areas, forest conservation, research priorities, future supply and demand of wood and non-wood forest products and services); and category III, international arrangements and mechanisms to promote the management, conservation and sustainable development of all types of forests.

The Economic and Social Council, by decision 1997/317 of 16 December, approved the IFF recommendations that it carry out its work in three substantive sessions of up to two weeks each (second session, 24 August–September 1998, Geneva; third session, February/March 1999, Geneva; fourth session, February/March 2000, venue to be determined) and that it establish in-session working groups, no more than two to be scheduled to meet simultaneously. On the same date, the Council, by decision 1997/318, took note of the IFF decision to invite the Centre for International Forestry Research to attend its sessions as an intergovernmental organization with the status of observer.

Sustainable mountain development

The Commission on Sustainable Development considered a January report [E/CN.17/1997/2/Add.12] prepared by FAO as task manager for chapter 13 of Agenda 21 (managing fragile ecosystems: sustainable mountain development).

According to the report, progress had been made in creating greater awareness of the mountain agenda and improving the coordination of efforts to protect fragile mountain ecosystems and promote sustainable mountain development. New institutional arrangements had contributed to improving communications networking and in providing an information clearing-house function. Land-use planning and management tools were being developed for mountain watershed areas through the preparation of principles and best practices for sustainable mountain development programmes. In the area of biodiversity conservation in mountain areas, countries had established new protected areas and undertaken trans-frontier collaboration in protected area management. Another positive development was the formulation of criteria and indicators for sustainable mountain development, which focused on the condition of natural resources, human welfare and population dynamics.

Improvements to the ecological knowledge base for technologies and agricultural and conservation practices in mountain regions had been slow but were increasing. Transnational cooperation also had been improving. Work had progressed on the better understanding and dissemination of information regarding environmental risks and natural disasters in mountain ecosystems.

Several objectives of Agenda 21 relating to sustainable mountain development remained unfulfilled or had seen little or no progress towards implementation, such as survey work of natural resources and their use in mountain ecosystems, development of national-level institutional arrangements, and attention to the special needs of mountainous island and landlocked countries.

The report mentioned areas where obstacles to achievement could be overcome, including: greater action at the national level; new or reinforced legal mechanisms, such as charters, conventions and national legislation to protect mountain ecosystems; greater mobilization of financial resources for mountain development; more mountain-specific investment programmes and financial resources; the preservation of cultural integrity and conservation of biological diversity; monitoring progress; exchanging experience and information; and enhancing food security in a sustainable manner.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July [meeting 37], the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1997/45 [draft: E/1997/L.31] without vote [agenda item 6 (i)].

Proclamation of an international year of mountains

The Economic and Social Council,

Mindful that mountains represent an essential component of the global life-support system and a positive asset offering opportunities for sustainable development, if adequately managed on the basis of the best available scientific knowledge and with due regard to the protection of nature and the interests of humankind,

Recognizing that, as a major ecosystem representing the complex and interrelated ecology of this planet, mountains are essential to the survival of the global ecosystem and play an important role in shaping life on Earth,

Noting that mountains are an important source of water, energy, minerals, forest and agricultural products and biological diversity, which are all of vital importance to both individual States and the international community,

Bearing in mind that mountains cover at least one fifth of the Earth's landscape and are home to at least 10 per cent of the world's population, predominantly economically poor people,

Recognizing that it is economically and socially more costly to sustain life in mountain areas than in lowland areas, and concerned about the widespread poverty, unemployment and poor health among mountain inhabitants and the loss of indigenous knowledge,

Confirming that, at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, held at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, in 1992, the international community recognized that there was a lack of knowledge about mountain ecosystems and called for renewed international and regional cooperation to develop an integrated approach for conserving, upgrading and using the land, water, plant, animal and human resources and promoting alternative livelihood opportunities for mountain inhabitants with a view to improving their living standards,

Welcoming the various regional and subregional initiatives and international instruments, such as the Alpine Convention, which provide frameworks for international cooperation for the protection of mountain environments,

Recalling its decision 1995/235 of 17 July 1995 on the report of the Commission on Sustainable Development, and taking note of the decisions of the General Assembly at its nineteenth special session on the overall review and appraisal of the implementation of Agenda 21,

Bearing in mind that an international conference entitled "Mountain research: challenges and prospects in the twenty-first century" was held at Bishkek, Kyrgyzstan, from 14 to 18 October 1996 and adopted a decision to draw the attention of the international community to the exceptional importance of mountain ranges for mankind and to propose that the General Assembly declare an international year of mountains,

Recalling its resolution 1980/67 of 25 July 1980, in which it recognized that the celebration of international years can promote international cooperation and understanding in accordance with the guidelines contained therein,

1. Invites Governments, in cooperation with relevant regional and international organizations, to undertake awareness-raising activities concerning the problems and challenges faced by mountainous countries and communities;

2. Encourages Governments and intergovernmental organizations to coordinate regional and international cooperation and facilitate the exchange of information and experience among the specialized agencies and relevant regional and international organizations, research institutions and non-governmental organizations on issues related to mountain regions, including the manageability and interaction of mountains and the economy, the impact of mountains on the socio-economic development of countries and sustainable human development, and the like;

3. Welcomes and supports the ongoing efforts to prepare and negotiate subregional and interregional agreements on mountains, thus reinforcing legal mechanisms to protect fragile mountain ecosystems and promote sustainable and equitable development in mountain regions;

4. Encourages national, regional and international networking of people's initiatives and the activities of local, regional and international non-governmental organizations working on mountain development, and supports those organizations in their efforts to exchange information and experience;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with Governments and relevant regional, international and non-governmental organizations, to submit to the Council at its substantive session of 1998 a report on the desirability of proclaiming an international year of mountains and on other ways and means of ensuring the sustainable development of mountain countries.

Land resources

The Commission on Sustainable Development considered a January report [E/CN.17/1997/2/Add.9] prepared by FAO as task manager for chapter 10 of Agenda 21 (integrated approach to the planning and management of land resources).

Among successes in that area, many countries had developed or were developing environmental policies and, despite some difficulties, a number of land resources information systems had been established. In addition, a useful body of experience was being built up by Governments, NGOs and development agencies in developing countries, which was beginning to be analysed.

More progress was needed in the area of institutional arrangements, particularly government institutions, and coordinating mechanisms. There was a need to develop land-related information systems in developing countries, which had been limited by the non-availability of basic natural resource data and information, by undeveloped market infrastructure and by a lack of institutional capability.

The need to devise and apply more efficient systems of resource management was emerging as a priority as the result of increased population levels and unsustainable resource use. Continuing rapid urbanization in developing countries was resulting in land-use changes, which were manifested in the development of squatter settlements and slums and attendant problems of pollution, water supply, waste disposal and a host of social and economic concerns. Another priority was the need to prepare and continuously update plans to address the effects of natural disasters.

Marine ecosystems

Protection of the marine and coastal environment

Commission action. The Commission on Sustainable Development reviewed a January report [E/CN.17/1997/2/Add.16] prepared by the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) Subcommittee on Oceans and Coastal Areas, as task manager for chapter 17 of Agenda 21 (protection of the oceans, all kinds of seas, including enclosed and semi-enclosed seas, and coastal areas and the protection, rational use and development of their living resources).

Areas of progress to promote the sustainable utilization and conservation of the marine environment included acceptance of the concept of integrated management of watersheds, river basins, estuaries and marine and coastal areas; adoption by the International Maritime Organization (IMO) of new protocols or amendments to existing conventions to reduce sea-based pollutants (see PART SIX, Chapter XIV); improvement in the legal framework for the sustainable use and conservation of living aquatic resources in the oceans; agreement on a development approach, strategy and time-frame for the Global Ocean Observing System (GOOS) and initiation of regional GOOS programmes; the adoption in 1995 of the Global Programme of Action for the Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities [YUN 1995, p. 1081]; and international cooperation and coordination for the sustainable use of the oceans by international, regional and national initiatives.

The report mentioned areas where expectations had not been met, including the need to improve intersectoral coordination at the national level and to better harmonize national policies; the degree of implementation of chapter 17 of Agenda 21; inadequate financing; and the quality and quantity of data and information being gathered and exchanged was decreasing owing to economic constraints. In addition, there was a pressing need to upgrade information and ocean observational systems; improve mechanisms, including institutions, to manage ocean resources; improve the availability of technical assistance and finance; and increase the effectiveness of international cooperation.

ACC Subcommittee. The ACC Subcommittee on Oceans and Coastal Areas, at its fifth session (Washington, D.C., 7-10 January) [ACC/1997/3], discussed matters relating to the inter-agency review of implementation planning for the 1995 Global Programme of Action, its activities with respect to the overall review and appraisal of the implementation of Agenda 21 and the International Year of the Ocean, 1998, proclaimed by the General Assembly in resolution 49/131 [YUN 1994, p. 951]. Considerable discussion was generated by an FAO proposal to develop a UN ocean atlas in a digitized format, which would be made available in CD-ROM format as well as on the Internet. The Subcommittee decided to include the development of the atlas as one of its cooperative programme frameworks. FAO was designated as the lead agency.

UNEP action. On 7 February [A/52/25 (dec. 19/14 C)], the UNEP Governing Council asked the Executive Director to support the Commission on Sustainable Development in carrying out the periodic review of the world's marine environment as called for by the Commission in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 966]. It also asked her to consider how the Joint Group of Experts on the Scientific Aspects of Marine Environmental Protection might contribute to the review.

On the same date [dec. 19/14 D], the Council asked the Executive Director to place a higher priority on fresh water in the next biennium and to make more effective use of the inter-agency Global Environment Monitoring System/Water programme, which was coordinated by UNEP.

Global Programme of Action

The UNEP Governing Council considered several reports relating to the 1995 Global Programme of Action for the Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities [YUN 1995, p. 1081]. A report of the Executive Director [UNEP/GC.19/25] summarized UNEP's role as secretariat of the Global Programme, which was to promote and facilitate implementation of the Programme at the national level, and at the regional level through a revitalization of the UNEP Regional Seas Programme, as well as to play a catalytic role in implementation at the international level with other organizations and institutions. The Executive Director presented the subsequent stages of preparation of the implementation plan. Regional and international cooperation in implementing the Programme, including the clearing-house mechanisms and activities relating to the assessment of the state of oceans and coastal waters, as well as to persistent organic pollutants and sewage, was also discussed.

In an addendum [UNEP/GC.19/25/Add.1], the Executive Director proposed that future intergovernmental reviews of progress in implementing the Programme would have to be done biennially for Member States to have the opportunity to appraise progress achieved on a more regular basis. She also suggested that the Council establish at its regular sessions a standing item entitled "Implementation of the Global Programme of Action for the Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities".

In another report [UNEP/GC.19/INF.4], the Executive Director described institutional arrangements for implementing the Global Programme, including UNEP's role as its secretariat. The Council also examined an ACC report [UNEP/GC.19/12] on the involvement of the UN system in the Programme, particularly inter-agency coordination in implementing it.

On 7 February [A/52/25 (dec. 19/14 A)], the Council endorsed the proposed role of UNEP as secretariat and accorded priority to implementation of the Programme in the UNEP work programme. It asked the Executive Director to: expand the activities of the Programme to all regional seas programmes and establish links with other regional programmes or conventions for the protection of marine and freshwater environments; strengthen the integrated management of UNEP activities related to freshwater and marine environments; recommend that each international organization formally endorse the parts of the Programme that were relevant to its mandate; convey to the General Assembly and the Council of the Global Environment Facility the Council's invitation for adequate consideration of the financing of the projects that supported the Programme's objectives; and report in 1999 on progress made in implementing the Programme. ACC was asked to continue to report to the Council. The ACC Subcommittee on Oceans and Coastal Areas, in collaboration with the Subcommittee on Water, was asked to perform the functions of a steering committee on technical cooperation and assistance for the Programme.

Regional Seas Programme

The UNEP Regional Seas Programme, which in 1997 included 13 regions and had over 140 participating coastal States and Territories, encompassed a comprehensive approach to combating environmental degradation through the management of marine and coastal areas.

On 7 February [A/52/25 (dec. 19/14 B)], the Governing Council asked the Executive Director to pay attention to strengthening regional action plans for the protection of marine and coastal areas, such as those for the south-east Pacific and the wider Caribbean region, by allocating appropriate funds for the 1996-1997 biennium and taking appropriate measures for 1998-1999. It urged her to support a cooperation programme between Argentina, Brazil and Uruguay for the upper south-west Atlantic, and to direct that support during 1997-1998 to projects and activities directly related to the Global Programme of Action.

The Council, also on 7 February [dec. 19/14 E], asked the Executive Director to assist the Governments of the east central Pacific in negotiating an agreement to develop and implement a plan of action for the protection and management of the marine and coastal environment in the region. It asked her to report on progress in 1999.

Living marine resources

Drift-net fishing, unauthorized fishing and fisheries by-catch and discards

The Secretary-General submitted an October report [A/52/557] containing information received from States and international organizations on efforts made to implement General Assembly resolution 51/36 [YUN 1996, p. 968] regarding the impact on the living marine resources of the world's oceans and seas of large-scale pelagic drift-net fishing and unauthorized fishing in zones of national jurisdiction, and the impact on the sustainable use of the world's living marine resources of fisheries by-catch and discards.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 26 November [meeting 57], the General Assembly adopted resolution 52/29 [draft: A/52/L.30 & Add.1] without vote [agenda item 39].

Large-scale pelagic drift-net fishing; unauthorized fishing in zones of national jurisdiction and on the high seas; fisheries by-catch and discards; and other developments

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolutions 46/215 of 20 December 1991, 49/116 and 49/118 of 19 December 1994 as well as other relevant resolutions,

Reaffirming also its resolution 51/36 of 9 December 1996 on large-scale pelagic drift-net fishing and its impact on the living marine resources of the world's oceans and seas, unauthorized fishing in zones of national jurisdiction and its impact on the living marine resources of the world's oceans and seas, and fisheries by-catch and discards and their impact on the sustainable use of the world's living marine resources,

Conscious of the need to promote and facilitate international cooperation, especially at the regional and subregional levels, in order to ensure the sustainable development and use of the living marine resources of the world's oceans and seas, consistent with the present resolution,

Mindful that the Agreement for the Implementation of the Provisions of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea of 10 December 1982 relating to the Conservation and Management of Straddling Fish Stocks and Highly Migratory Fish Stocks provides in its general principles that States shall minimize pollution, waste, discards, catch by lost or abandoned gear, catch of non-target species, both fish and non-fish species, and impacts on associated or dependent species, in particular endangered species, through measures including, to the extent practicable, the development and use of selective, environmentally safe and cost-effective fishing gear and techniques, and further provides that States shall take measures, including the establishment of regulations, to ensure that vessels flying their flags do not conduct unauthorized fishing within areas under the national jurisdiction of other States,

Recalling the provisions of article 5 of the Agreement, which sets out the general principles to which

States are committed in order to conserve and manage such stocks,

Noting that the Code of Conduct for Responsible Fisheries, adopted by the Conference of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations on 31 October 1995, sets out principles and global standards of behaviour for responsible practices to conserve, manage and develop fisheries, including guidelines for fishing on the high seas and in areas under the national jurisdiction of other States, and on fishing gear selectivity and practices, with the aim of reducing by-catch and discards,

Expressing deep concern at the detrimental impact of unauthorized fishing in areas under national jurisdiction, where the overwhelming proportion of the global fish catch is harvested, on the sustainable development of the world's fishery resources and on the food security and economies of many States, particularly developing States,

Reaffirming once again the rights and duties of coastal States to ensure proper conservation and management measures with respect to the living resources in areas under their national jurisdiction, in accordance with international law as reflected in the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea,

Recalling that Agenda 21, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, calls upon States to take effective action, consistent with international law, to deter reflagging of vessels by their nationals as a means of avoiding compliance with applicable conservation and management rules for fishing vessels on the high seas,

Recognizing the importance of the Agreement to Promote Compliance with International Conservation and Management Measures by Fishing Vessels on the High Seas, adopted by the Conference of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations in November 1993, to the conservation and management of fisheries resources on the high seas,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on large-scale pelagic drift-net fishing and its impact on the living marine resources of the world's oceans and seas, unauthorized fishing in zones of national jurisdiction and its impact on the living marine resources of the world's oceans and seas, and fisheries by-catch and discards and their impact on the sustainable use of the world's living marine resources,

Taking note also of the initiatives undertaken in the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations relating to the incidental catch of seabirds, the conservation and management of sharks and the management of fishing capacity,

Acknowledging with appreciation the measures taken and the progress made by members of the international community, international organizations and regional economic integration organizations to implement and support the objectives of resolution 46/215,

Recognizing the efforts that international organizations and members of the international community have made to reduce by-catch and discards in fishing operations,

Once again expressing deep concern that there are continuing reports of activities inconsistent with the terms of resolution 46/215 and unauthorized fishing inconsistent with the terms of resolution 49/116,

1. Reaffirms the importance it attaches to compliance with its resolution 46/215, in particular to those provisions of the resolution calling for full implementation of a global moratorium on all large-scale pelagic drift-net fishing on the high seas of the world's oceans and seas, including enclosed seas and semi-enclosed seas;

2. Notes that a growing number of States and other entities as well as relevant regional and subregional fisheries management organizations and arrangements have adopted legislation, established regulations or applied other measures to ensure compliance with resolutions 46/215, 49/116 and 51/36, and urges them to enforce fully such measures;

3. Urges all authorities of members of the international community that have not done so to take greater enforcement responsibility to ensure full compliance with resolution 46/215 and to impose appropriate sanctions, consistent with their obligations under international law, against acts contrary to the terms of that resolution;

4. Calls upon States to take the responsibility, consistent with their obligations under international law as reflected in the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea and resolution 49/116, to take measures to ensure that no fishing vessels entitled to fly their national flags fish in areas under the national jurisdiction of other States unless duly authorized by the competent authorities of the coastal State or States concerned, and that such authorized fishing operations should be carried out in accordance with the conditions set out in the authorization;

5. Notes the obligations of States outlined in Parts IV and V of the Agreement for the Implementation of the Provisions of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea of 10 December 1982 relating to the Conservation and Management of Straddling Fish Stocks and Highly Migratory Fish Stocks regarding non-members and non-participants and duties of flag States respectively;

6. Calls upon States and other entities referred to in article 10, paragraph 1, of the Agreement to Promote Compliance with International Conservation and Management Measures by Fishing Vessels on the High Seas that have not done so to accept the Agreement;

7. Notes that no party to the Agreement to Promote Compliance with International Conservation and Management Measures by Fishing Vessels on the High Seas shall allow any fishing vessel entitled to fly its flag to be used for fishing on the high seas unless it has been authorized to do so by the appropriate authority or authorities of that party, and that a fishing vessel so authorized shall fish in accordance with the conditions set out in the authorization;

8. Welcomes initiatives undertaken in the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations to organize an expert consultation to develop and propose guidelines leading to a plan of action aiming at a reduction in the incidental catch of seabirds, to organize an expert consultation to develop and propose guidelines leading to a plan of action for the conservation and effective management of shark populations and to hold a technical consultation on the management of fishing capacity to draft guidelines for the control and management of fishing capacities;

9. Urges States, relevant international organizations and regional and subregional fisheries management organizations and arrangements to take action to adopt policies, apply measures, including through assistance to developing countries, collect and exchange data and develop techniques to reduce by-catches, fish discards and post-harvest losses consistent with international law and relevant international instruments, including the Code of Conduct for Responsible Fisheries;

10. Reiterates its call on development assistance organizations to make it a high priority to support, including through financial and/or technical assistance, efforts of developing coastal States, in particular the least developed countries and the small island developing States, to improve the monitoring and control of fishing activities and the enforcement of fishing regulations, including through financial and technical support for regional and subregional meetings for this purpose;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to bring the present resolution to the attention of all members of the international community, relevant intergovernmental organizations, the organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, regional and subregional fisheries management organizations and relevant non-governmental organizations, and invites them to provide the Secretary-General with information relevant to the implementation of the present resolution;

12. Also requests the Secretary-General to ensure that reporting on all major fisheries-related activities and instruments is effectively coordinated and duplication of activities and reporting minimized and that relevant scientific and technical studies are disseminated to the international community, and invites the relevant specialized agencies, including the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, as well as regional and subregional fisheries organizations and arrangements, to cooperate with the Secretary-General to that end;

13. Further requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session and biennially thereafter a report on further developments relating to the implementation of resolutions 46/215, 49/116 and 49/118, the status and implementation of the Agreement to Promote Compliance with International Conservation and Management Measures by Fishing Vessels on the High Seas and efforts undertaken in the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations referred to in paragraph 8 of the present resolution, taking into account the information provided by States, relevant specialized agencies, in particular the Food and Agriculture Organization, and other appropriate organs, organizations and programmes of the United Nations system, regional and subregional organizations and arrangements and other relevant intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations;

14. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session, under the item entitled "Oceans and law of the sea", a sub-item entitled "Large-scale pelagic drift-net fishing; unauthorized fishing in zones of national jurisdiction and on the high seas; fisheries by-catch and discards; and other developments".

The International Coral Reef Initiative (ICRI), launched in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1084], was a partnership of Governments, international organizations, NGOs, multilateral development banks and private-sector groups, which aimed to increase the capacity of countries and local groups to conserve and sustainably use coral reefs and related ecosystems.

The International Year of the Reef, 1997, began a major effort of assessment, education and collaboration.

On 7 February [A/52/25 (dec. 19/15)], the UNEP Governing Council encouraged the Executive Director to continue to play a leading role in developing, implementing and coordinating regional activities under ICRI; to continue to sponsor the ICRI Global Coral Reef Monitoring Network; to build global awareness of the urgent need to conserve coral reef resources; and to promote the establishment of regional programmes in the six ICRI regions (Tropical Americas-Caribbean Region, East Asian Seas Region, Middle East-Gulfs Region, Pacific Region, South Asia Region, Western Indian Ocean-Eastern African States Region) and one or more demonstration projects in each region.

Conservation of wildlife

As at 31 December 1997, the 1994 Lusaka Agreement on Cooperative Enforcement Operations Directed at Illegal Trade in Wild Fauna and Flora [YUN 1994, p. 951], which entered into force in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 970], had been ratified or acceded to by six States (Congo, Kenya, Lesotho, Uganda, United Republic of Tanzania, Zambia). The Agreement aimed to reduce, and ultimately eliminate, illegal trafficking in African wildlife.

Protection against harmful products and wastes

Chemical safety

Prior informed consent procedure

Governing Council action. The UNEP Governing Council considered a progress report [UNEP/GC.19/24] by the Executive Director on the development of an international legally binding instrument for the application of the prior informed consent (PIC) procedure for certain hazardous chemicals in international trade, and the consideration of further measures to reduce risks from hazardous chemicals. The Executive Director outlined progress made in 1996 by the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee in the development of such an instrument [YUN 1996, p. 970] and the implementation of the voluntary PIC procedure through the UNEP/FAO Joint Programme.

On 7 February [A/52/25 (dec. 19/13 A)], the Council asked the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee to continue its work on the instrument, with the aim of concluding negotiations during the year. The Executive Director was asked to convene, together with the FAO Director-General, a conference to adopt and sign the instrument.

Intergovernmental committee. The Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee for an International Legally Binding Instrument for the Application of the Prior Informed Consent Procedure for Certain Hazardous Chemicals and Pesticides in International Trade, at its third session (Geneva, 26-30 May) [UNEP/FAO/PIC/INC.3/2], examined articles of the draft convention relating to the scope of the convention, hazardous pesticide formulations, obligations of parties that imported chemicals, obligations of parties that exported chemicals, and financial resources and mechanisms. Other matters dealt with the Committee's future sessions and provisions concerning a secretariat for the convention. Annexed to the Committee's report was the text of the draft articles as revised at its second [YUN 1996, p. 971] and third sessions.

At the Committee's fourth session (Rome, 20-24 October) [UNEP/FAO/PIC/INC.4/2], it discussed articles related to designated national authorities, informing parties of regulatory measures, banned or severely restricted chemicals, hazardous pesticide formulations, the inclusion of a chemical list in an annex, chemicals in the voluntary PIC procedure, removal of chemicals from an annex, classification, packaging and labelling, information exchange, control of trade with non-parties, implementation of the convention, technical assistance, the conference of the parties, the secretariat, amendments to the convention, the adoption and amendment of annexes, protocols, the right to vote, signature, ratification, acceptance, approval or accession, entry into force, reservations, withdrawal, interim arrangements, the depositary and authentic texts. Annexed to the report were draft articles as revised by the Committee at its second, third and fourth sessions.

The Committee decided to hold its next session in Brussels, Belgium, in early 1998.

Reduction of risks

The UNEP Governing Council considered a report of the Executive Director on hazardous chemicals, which included measures to reduce the risks from those substances [UNEP/GC.19/24].

She highlighted the 1996 recommendations of the Government-designated Group of Experts on Further Measures to Reduce the Risks from a Limited Number of Chemicals [YUN 1996, p. 970], which dealt with unwanted stocks of pesticides and other chemicals; capacity-building; inadequate information; and issues related to risk reduction from a limited number of hazardous chemicals, including possible bans or phase-outs.

On 7 February [A/52/25 (dec. 19/13 B)], the Council endorsed the recommendations of the Group regarding unwanted stocks, capacity-building and inadequate information, and noted the recommendations concerning issues related to risk reduction. It invited Governments, intergovernmental organizations and the Intergovernmental Forum on Chemical Safety (IFCS) to review the Group's report, to consider taking action to implement its recommendations and to report thereon in 1999.

Canada, on behalf of IFCS, transmitted to the Commission on Sustainable Development an IFCS progress report covering the years 1994 to 1997 [E/CN.17/1997/20]. IFCS held its second session in Ottawa from 10 to 14 February.

Persistent organic pollutants

The Executive Director transmitted to the Governing Council the 1996 report of the Ad Hoc Working Group on Persistent Organic Pollutants (POPs) of IFCS [YUN 1996, p. 971]. The Council also had before it a report of the Executive Director [UNEP/GC.19/23] presenting the outcome of the assessment of the 12 POPs (polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs), dioxins, furans, aldrin, dieldrin, DDT, endrin, chlordane, hexachlorobenzene, mirex, toxaphene, heptachlor), as well as the recommendations of the Ad Hoc Working Group.

On 7 February [A/52/25 (dec. 19/13 O)], the Council, taking note of the Executive Director's report, decided that immediate international action should be initiated to protect human health and the environment through measures that would reduce and/or eliminate the emissions and discharges of the 12 POPs and, where appropriate, eliminate production and subsequently the remaining use of those POPs that were intentionally produced. It also decided that socio-economic factors should be addressed in developing and implementing international action. The Executive Director was asked to prepare for and convene, together with the World Health Organization (WHO) and other international organizations, an intergovernmental negotiating committee to prepare an international legally binding instrument for implementing international action initially beginning with the 12 POPs and to take into account the conclusions and recommendations of the Ad Hoc Working Group on POPs. The Council recommended that, during the development of a legally binding instrument, consideration be given to work under way within the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe to develop a regional protocol on POPs under the 1979 Convention on Long-range Transboundary Air Pollution [YUN 1979, p. 710]. The Executive Director was asked to convene a diplomatic conference to adopt and sign an international legally binding instrument for international action to reduce/eliminate the release of POPs, to be concluded preferably by 2000. She was also asked, in collaboration with other international and regional organizations, to initiate immediate action on the recommendations of the Ad Hoc Working Group on POPs.

Sound management of toxic chemicals

Commission action. The Commission on Sustainable Development reviewed a January report [E/CN.17/1997/27Add.18] on chapter 19 of Agenda 21 (the environmentally sound management of toxic chemicals, including prevention of illegal international traffic in toxic and dangerous products), prepared by UNEP as task manager for the item.

The report noted progress in creating several mechanisms, such as IFCS, a non-institutional mechanism for cooperation among Governments, intergovernmental organizations and NGOs for the promotion of chemical risk-assessment and environmentally sound management of chemicals; and the Inter-Organization Programme for the Sound Management of Chemicals (IOMC), which coordinated efforts of international and intergovernmental organizations on the assessment and management of chemicals. Work was well under way to develop a process for the international assessment of existing chemicals and pesticides, and the target of 200 chemical evaluations by 1997 was expected to be met. A coordination group on information exchange was formed under IOMC. UNEP and FAO were jointly implementing the PIC procedure. There were 148 countries participating in the voluntary procedure, with 17 chemicals subject to it. Several intergovernmental bodies and UN agencies were engaged in activities on lead contamination.

The United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) Regional Network on Pesticides in Asia and the Pacific had been expanded to 15 countries. FAO was assisting countries in Asia to establish integrated pest management, a strategy for reducing reliance on pesticides. Sources of information useful when responding to chemical emergencies had been established in many countries and regions, and access to their sources had been improved.

While noting several promising changes in the management of toxic chemicals, the report said that progress on the proposed strengthening of international institutions and networks for information exchange on toxic chemicals had been less than what was needed, and consequently the improvements hoped for in the global sharing of data had not been realized.

A series of emerging priorities was evident in recent initiatives on priority chemical issues. Progress was being made in the development of international legally binding instruments for implementing international actions to reduce and manage risks and they should be pursued. In addition, Governments had identified the management and disposal of obsolete stocks of pesticides and possibly other chemicals as a high priority, and concern had emerged about certain toxic chemicals that might produce adverse effects at low environmental levels.

Council action. On 7 February [A/52/25 (dec. 19/13 D)], the UNEP Governing Council asked the Executive Director, in collaboration with IOMC, to develop a report outlining options for enhanced coherence and efficiency among international activities related to chemicals, including the instrument on PIC procedure and a likely future agreement on POPs. It asked her to submit the report in 1999 and to forward it to IFCS.

Hazardous wastes

The Commission on Sustainable Development considered two reports on hazardous wastes. The first [E/CN.17/1997/2/Add.20] discussed the environmentally sound management of solid wastes and sewage-related issues and was prepared by the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (UNCHS) as task manager for chapter 21 of Agenda 21 (solid wastes and sewage). According to the report, the development and implementation of waste minimizing strategies had improved since UNCED, but mainly in developed countries. In developing countries, attempts to promote waste minimization had been hampered by the lack of data on waste production at sources and waste collection and disposal. UNCHS was assisting developing countries with data collection and policy options for waste minimization. Significant developments were reported in waste recycling and reuse, in both developed and developing countries. Where the private sector had undertaken some of the traditional public waste management services, improvements were seen in high-income residential areas and in some cases in commercial and industrial areas, while low- and middle-income areas still suffered from extremely poor service coverage.

Possibly the most promising change in solid-waste management worldwide was the increasing recognition of waste as a resource that could not only contribute to the local and national economies but also provide employment and income to a large section of the population. Another promising change was found in the attitude of municipalities and other levels of government towards waste minimization as an integral part of the strategy for waste management. Little progress had been made in the area of environmentally sound waste disposal in developing countries. Also, countries were producing increasing quantities of wastewater, often contaminated with heavy metals and water-soluble organic compounds. Many national and local governments had insufficient capacity to apply strategic planning to solid-waste management. Little effort had been made to improve the education of the general public and city officials regarding the health risks of poor waste-management practices.

Emerging priorities centred on the development of waste minimization policies and strategies for decision-making. Continued and strengthened integration between waste management and other economic sectors was another emerging priority, as was support of the informal sector so that it could actively contribute to waste-management activities. Efforts were needed to promote integrated waste-management schemes that utilized solid and liquid waste for agricultural reuse projects. Within the UN system, there was a need for a more concerted approach to solid-waste management and for strengthening coordination of programmes under the aegis of the Inter-agency Committee on Sustainable Development.

The second report on hazardous wastes [E/CN.17/1997/27Add.21] discussed the safe and environmentally sound management of radioactive wastes and was prepared by IAEA as task manager for chapter 22 (radioactive wastes) of Agenda 21. It noted progress in management-related activities, capacity-building and legal instruments. The relaxation of tensions since the end of the cold war had made available previously classified information on radioactive releases and their environmental impacts, which in turn had stimulated research on radionuclides in the environment. France had requested IAEA to assess the full radiological situation

Fangataufa atolls, taking into account all past events of radiological significance (see PART ONE, Chapter VII). IAEA was initiating a survey of its members that were, or would be, engaged in the remediation of radioactively contaminated environments in order to collect data about sites that would require environmental restoration. Technical assistance was being offered to developing countries for enclosing and sealing radium sources for safe storage.

Despite an awareness of the importance of radiation and waste safety, there was a lack of adequate national radiation and waste safety infrastructure. The nuclear industry lacked funds, and the problems created by the accumulation of radioactive wastes were given low priority, which led to increased accidents involving uncontrolled radiation sources. International guidance on clean-up criteria was lacking. Regional training centres needed to be strengthened to demonstrate techniques to process and store radioactive waste from the application of nuclear techniques in medicine, research and industry. In some countries, nuclear waste legislation had been delayed because of public opposition to waste repository sites. Renewed efforts were needed to complete the drafting of the convention on the safety of radioactive waste management.

Transboundary movement of wastes

The fourth meeting of the Conference of the Parties to the 1989 Basel Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes and Their Disposal [YUN 1989, p. 420], scheduled to take place in October 1997, was postponed until February 1998.

The Ad Hoc Working Group of Legal and Technical Experts, a subsidiary body of the Conference of the Parties, at its fifth session (Geneva, 20-23 May) [UNEP/CHW.1/WG.1/5/5], made substantive progress on developing a draft protocol on liability and compensation for damage resulting from transboundary movements of hazardous wastes and their disposal. It considered articles relating to definitions, the scope of application, liability, forms of compensation, the possible establishment of a fund, State responsibility, and the relationship with other bilateral, multilateral and regional agreements.

Other matters

Environmental law

The UNEP Governing Council reviewed a report of the Executive Director [UNEP/GC.19/32] summarizing action taken by UNEP to implement the Council's 1993 decision concerning the Programme for the Development and Periodic Review of Environmental Law for the 1990s (Montevideo II) [YUN 1993, p. 820] and its 1995 decision concerning the further development of international environmental law aiming at sustainable development [YUN 1995, p. 1088]. Montevideo I was adopted in 1981 [YUN 1981, p. 839].

UNEP had strengthened its activities for the further development of environmental law and had initiated work on identifying the general direction for the future development of international environmental law aiming at sustainable development. Progress had been made in developing international environmental law. At the national level, UNEP continued to provide legal advisory services in response to requests from developing countries for assistance in drawing up and strengthening environmental legislation and institutions. With a view to promoting wider appreciation of environmental law, UNEP continued to disseminate information to Governments and other parties active in environmental law. A series of expert group workshops and meetings was held on international environmental law aiming at sustainable development.

The Council also had before it a position paper [UNEP/GC.19/INF.12], which reviewed the current status of international environmental law as it related to achieving sustainable development. Priority areas for action included: implementation of and compliance with international environmental agreements; dispute avoidance and settlement procedures; liability and compensation; clarifying and further refining concepts and principles of international environmental law; analysing the relationship of international environmental law with other areas of law; increasing UNEP's cooperation with the World Trade Organization; creating and strengthening mechanisms for making information relating to international environmental obligations available to non-State actors; analysing the legal requirements and consequences of the integration of the secretariats of different environmental conventions resulting eventually in their amalgamation; and exploring the means to enhance cooperation at the local level on transboundary environmental matters.

On 7 February [A/52/25 (dec. 19/20)], the Council commended UNEP for its action to implement the Montevideo Programme II. It took note of the position paper and of a preliminary study on the need for and feasibility of new international environmental instruments aiming at sustainable development [UNEP/GC.19/INF.18], and endorsed the observations and recommendations made by the Meeting of Senior Government Officials Expert in Environmental Law for the Mid-term Review of the Programme [UNEP/GC.19/INF.14] on specific programme areas of the Montevideo Programme II. The Council asked the Executive Director to use them as guidance in further implementing the Programme. It asked her to submit to the special session of the General Assembly, on its behalf, the observations and recommendations made by the Meeting of Senior Government Officials, indicating that they reflected the views of the Council on steps that should be taken to apply further the principles contained in the Rio Declaration [YUN 1992, p. 670], and to forward the Executive Director's mid-term report on implementation of the Programme [UNEP/GC.19/INF.13].

Occupied Palestinian and other Arab territories

The Executive Director submitted to the Governing Council a report on the state of the environment in the occupied Palestinian and other Arab territories [UNEP/GC.19/13]. Environmental assessment activities undertaken under the auspices of bilateral projects included the completion of the Gaza Environmental Profile by the Palestinian National Authority; the publication by Israel of a report on regional environmental cooperation and development options, which contained information on many environmental problems facing the Middle East, such as rapid development, population and urban growth, water shortages, desertification, pollution and the conservation of biological diversity; and the establishment of an environmental database for the West Bank at the Applied Research Institute (Jerusalem), supported by Austria.

Because of financial and other constraints, the role of UNEP in the Middle East multilateral peace process had been restricted to providing technical and other advisory services in those programmes of the multilateral working groups where it had been invited to participate as a partner. UNEP participated in the activities of the Multilateral Working Groups on Water Resources and on the Environment. It held a training course on project design and appraisal tools for integrated environmental and economic assessment, and provided technical support for Norway's activities in facilitating consensus-building on principles for cooperation among the core parties on water-related matters and new and additional water resources.

The Council, on 7 February [A/52/25 (dec. 19/8)], noted with concern that the Executive Director was unable to update the report on the environmental situation in the occupied Palestinian and other Arab territories, and asked her to complete the update as soon as possible. It also asked her to implement a 1993 Council decision [YUN 1993, p. 820], requesting her to provide technical assistance in Palestinian institutional and self-capacity-building in the environment. The Executive Director was asked to report in 1999.

Chapter VIII

Population and human settlements

In mid-1997, the estimated world population stood at 5.85 billion, an increase of 1.4 per cent over the previous year. According to United Nations projections, the world population into the early decades of the twenty-first century would continue to show a marked slowing of growth, which was mainly attributed to declining fertility rates in a number of developing countries.

In 1997, UN work in population and human settlements was guided by strategies adopted at recent international conferences, notably the 1994 International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD) and the 1996 United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II). During the year, the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA), the main UN body concerned with population activities, developed a set of indicators of performance in population programmes in order to measure progress in achieving ICPD goals, at both national and global levels. The main purpose was to establish a practical set of qualitative and quantitative markers to measure the impact of population programmes. The three core UNFPA programme areas were reproductive health, population and development strategies, and advocacy. It continued to collaborate with partners within and outside the UN system. In 1997, provisional UNFPA project expenditures totalled $214.4 million.

The Commission on Population and Development, at its February session, adopted a number of decisions on population strategy. It considered the issue of international migration, which over the previous decade had been the population component most affected by the momentous changes in the world geopolitical order, resulting in significant population movements. Most of that movement had occurred in developed countries, where international migrants accounted for 4.1 per cent of the general population. Both the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly took action on international migration and development, and called for UN bodies and Governments to examine the issue further.

UN activities in the area of human settlements were guided by follow-up action to Habitat II. The underlying principle of the concluding documents of Habitat II—the Istanbul Declaration on Human Settlements and the Habitat Agenda—was ensuring adequate shelter for all.

The Commission on Human Settlements, at its April/May session, addressed many of the recommendations and commitments made by Governments in the Habitat Agenda and, in December, the Assembly adopted a resolution on the future role of the Commission, particularly in monitoring the implementation of the Habitat Agenda within the UN system.

The Commission reviewed the Global Strategy for Shelter to the Year 2000, adopted by the Assembly in 1988 to promote adequate shelter for all by 2000, with an operational focus on Governments. In 1997, the main operational activity of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements in relation to the Strategy was in the application of urban and housing indicators. In December, the Assembly adopted a plan of action for implementing the Strategy and urged Governments to implement their national plans of action on human settlements and to apply the indicators for monitoring progress.

Population

Follow-up to the 1994 Conference on Population and Development

Implementation of the Programme of Action

The United Nations continued to implement the Programme of Action adopted by the International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD) in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 956] and endorsed that year by the General Assembly in resolution 49/128 [ibid., p. 963].

Report of Secretary-General. The Secretary-General, in response to General Assembly resolution 51/176 [YUN 1996, p. 978], in a June report [A/52/208], reviewed implementation of the ICPD Programme of Action. The report covered the work of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) Task Force on Basic Social Services for All, which had reported to the Commission on Population and Development at its February session [E/CN.9/1997/4]. The Task Force enabled the UN system to assist countries to deliver more basic social services for their poverty eradication efforts, by producing a wall chart on basic social services, guidelines on key areas of the Programme of Action, a report on lessons learned/best practices in donor collaboration in assistance to the social sector, an information card on advocacy for basic social services, and a compendium of international commitments relevant to poverty and social integration. The Task Force also worked on developing indicators for monitoring progress in implementing the Programme of Action. Country data were collected on population, primary health care, nutrition, basic education, drinking water and sanitation, and shelter. In April, the World Health Organization, the lead agency of the Task Force's Working Group on Reproductive Health, organized a technical meeting to draw up a list of reproductive health indicators. In addition, the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) had developed a list of indicators that addressed the principal dimensions of reproductive health.

The Secretary-General highlighted action taken by the UN system and progress made at the country level to implement the Programme of Action. Many countries were updating their population and development policies in line with the goals of the 1994 Conference, strengthening health services to reduce maternal mortality and integrate family planning with other reproductive health concerns, instituting legal reforms to protect women's rights and promote gender equality, and taking steps to address migration concerns of sending and receiving countries. A number of Governments that had no formal population policy had formulated, or were in the process of formulating, policies reflecting the Programme of Action. Despite encouraging signs, many countries faced a shortage of funds and trained personnel that impeded efforts to achieve the ICPD goals.

As for South-South cooperation, the intergovernmental initiative, Partners in Population and Development, launched at ICPD by 10 developing countries (Bangladesh, Colombia, Egypt, Indonesia, Kenya, Mexico, Morocco, Thailand, Tunisia, Zimbabwe), began field operations in 1996. The Partners' work plan included strengthening the capacity of developing countries for South-South cooperation, the promotion of twinning modalities and the development of regional training institutions. UNFPA was developing a new guidance note for South-South cooperation. It funded projects in the Centres of Excellence, an intercountry initiative, and provided support for courses and study tours on such topics as adolescents and mass media in Mexico, community participation and programme management in Indonesia, and population and development policies in Thailand.

With regard to financial resources to implement ICPD, the report noted that ICPD was the first UN conference to spell out a schedule of resource mobilization to achieve a specific set of development objectives. The estimated cost of those measures was $ 17 billion a year by 2000, increasing to $21.7 billion in 2015 (in constant 1994 dollars). The Programme of Action recommended that some two thirds of the needed resources of developing countries would come from domestic sources, and the remaining one third of projected requirements would have to come from external sources—$5.7 billion in the year 2000, increasing to $7.2 billion by 2015. Grants from donor countries made up the largest part of total international population assistance. In 1990, $669 million of such aid was given for population, increasing to $977 million in 1994 and $1.3 billion in 1995.

Over the 1990-1995 period, the annual income of UNFPA increased from $212 million to $313 million but decreased in 1996 to $308.8 million, due chiefly to a decreased contribution from one major donor country and to lower rates of exchange. In 1990, the UN system—excluding UNFPA—provided $86 million, or 9 per cent of the total amount of assistance for population. In 1994, such assistance totalled $107 million, less than 7 per cent of total external population resources.

The Secretary-General, noting that overall official development assistance had declined in recent years, said that additional resources were required to better meet population needs. Without required resources, the population was expected to rise significantly, including a projected total of 57 million to 104 million extra unintended births between 1995 and 2000. To realize the ICPD goals, resources needed to be increased to $ 17 billion by the year 2000, of which $5.7 billion should be donor assistance, as called for in the Programme of Action.

The Secretary-General's report described the work of the Commission in implementing ICPD and summarized implementation of ICPD by the Executive Board of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP)/UNFPA (see below).

International migration

The Commission on Population and Development, the principal body responsible for reviewing the follow-up to and implementation of the ICPD Programme of Action, considered, as the central theme for its thirtieth session (New York, 24-28 February) [E/1997/25], international migration, with special emphasis on the links between migration and development, including gender issues and the family. The theme was one of the 16 chapters of the 1994 Programme of Action.

Under the item on follow-up to the 1994 Conference, the Commission had before it five reports; it adopted one resolution on the subject.

In a report on world population monitoring: international migration and development [E/CN.9/1997/2], the Secretary-General discussed the relationship between international migration and population dynamics and examined Governments' views on international migration and how those views had changed over time, as well as implementation and management of migration policies. Specific issues were reviewed, including documented and undocumented migrants, refugees and asylum-seekers. He also addressed international labour migration, international migration and gender issues, and the interrelationships between international migration and development. The report noted that running through all discussions of migration were the common threads of the lack of migration data, the absence of a coherent theory to explain international migration and the weak understanding of the complex interrelationships between migration and development.

A second report, on monitoring population programmes [E/CN.9/1997/3 & Corr.1], reviewed progress regarding policies, programmes and other activities in international migration that Governments had undertaken at the national level since 1994. It focused on efforts to promote cooperation and dialogue between sending and receiving countries and on policies and programmes to facilitate family reunification, promote social and economic integration, facilitate short-term and project-related labour migration, assist refugees, protect migrants against discrimination, prevent international trafficking in migrants and monitor migration flows. The report highlighted concerns raised by Governments with regard to policy formulation and programme implementation in international migration.

A January report of the ACC Task Force on Basic Social Services for All [E/CN.9/1997/4], prepared pursuant to Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/55 [YUN 1995, p. 1093], summarized the replies from its 12 member organizations. The report gave an overview of the Task Force's activities, particularly those of its Working Group on International Migration. The Task Force stressed the need for the UN system to collaborate in addressing the root causes of migration, increase partnerships with non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and civil society, advance the human rights of migrants, enhance resource mobilization and strengthen international cooperation in that area. The Working Group was planning an international technical symposium in 1998 to examine the scope and impact of international migration flows and refugee movements and appropriate policy responses. Accordingly, the Commission adopted a February resolution [E/1997/25 des. 1997/1] by which it took note of the ACC Task Force report and of the technical symposium of experts on international migration scheduled for 1998. The Working Group was invited to continue collaboration in planning and convening the symposium and to develop an agenda for it that built on existing definitions of international migration, focused on the identification of measurable indicators, and analysed the interrelationships between international migration and development. The Commission asked the Chairperson of the ACC Task Force to make efforts to raise the necessary extrabudgetary resources for the symposium, to report to the Commission in 1998 on progress in organizing the symposium, to disseminate its results to Member States and other relevant parties, and to report in 1999.

The Commission considered a January report of the Secretary-General on international migration [E/CN.9/1997/5], summarizing information received from organizations on their progress towards achieving the objectives of the ICPD Programme of Action. It also provided a summary of activities carried out by the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), in collaboration with NGOs, in the search for solutions to the problems of refugees. The report concluded that NGOs were experienced and committed partners of governmental and intergovernmental organizations in implementing the objectives of the Programme of Action concerning international migration. They were well positioned to assess the needs in those communities for services and education. In addition, their standing as service providers and advocates gave them credibility, and their knowledge of recipients of services made them valuable advisers to Governments and intergovernmental organizations for programmes concerning documented and undocumented migrants and refugees.

The Commission also examined a January report of the Secretary-General describing flows of financial resources in international assistance for population activities for 1994 and provisionally for 1995 [E/CN.9/1997/6]. The Secretary-General concluded that, in those two years, international assistance for population grew substantially, recording around a 20 per cent growth rate. Additional resources were urgently needed to identify and satisfy unmet needs in areas related to population and development. Sub-Saharan Africa, parts of Asia and the least developed countries would need a much larger share of international resources.

The Commission adopted a resolution [E/1997/25 (res. 1997/3)] requesting the Population Division of the Department of Economic and Social Affairs, in collaboration with relevant actors, to build an improved assessment and analysis of international migration and an improved understanding of international migration and development. (For information on demographic trends of international migration, see below, under "Demographic trends".) The Commission also recommended for adoption by the Economic and Social Council a draft resolution on international migration and development.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 18 July [meeting 34], the Economic and Social Council, on the recommendation of the Commission on Population and Development [E/1997/25], adopted resolution 1997/2 without vote [agenda items 7 (a) & (b)].

International migration and development

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 49/127 of 19 December 1994, 50/123 of 20 December 1995 and 51/176 of 16 December 1996,

Recalling also the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development, in particular chapter X on international migration,

Recalling further the relevant provisions contained in the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development and the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development and in the Platform for Action adopted by the Fourth World Conference on Women,

Having considered the concise report of the Secretary-General on world population monitoring, 1997: international migration and development,

Taking note of the activities of the Working Group on International Migration of the Administrative Committee on Coordination Task Force on Basic Social Services for All, as presented in the report of the Task Force,

1. Urges both the Statistics Division and the Population Division of the Secretariat, along with the regional commissions, other relevant United Nations and intergovernmental organizations and Governments providing technical assistance in statistics, to collaborate in the dissemination of the new set of recommendations on statistics of international migration and to provide, at the request of Governments, technical assistance in implementing these recommendations;

2. Calls upon the Working Group on International Migration of the Administrative Committee on Coordination Task Force on Basic Social Services for All to ensure that international migration remains a topic of concentration in its follow-up to the International Conference on Population and Development, inter alia, by compiling a comprehensive list of issues related to international migration and development and identifying the intergovernmental mechanisms available to address them, to be submitted to the Commission on Population and Development at its thirty-first session;

3. Calls upon all relevant organs, organizations and programmes of the United Nations system and other intergovernmental, regional and subregional organizations to collaborate and coordinate their efforts, making full use of the expertise of existing organizations, in examining international migration and development;

4. Calls upon Governments and intergovernmental, regional and subregional organizations to promote and expand the exchange of information and experiences regarding international migration and development in appropriate bilateral, multilateral, regional and interregional forums.

Report of Secretary-General. In response to General Assembly resolution 50/123 [YUN 1995, p. 1097], the Secretary-General, in an August report [A/52/314], presented the views of 65 Governments on convening a UN conference on international migration and development. Of the total responses, 36 were generally in favour, 25 had strong reservations and a further 4 considered that other options should first be pursued to address international migration issues. The Secretary-General observed that, although a majority of the Governments that responded favoured the convening of a conference, the number that responded was small compared to the full membership of the United Nations. Even among those favouring a conference there was lack of agreement regarding its goals and objectives. Given the various views on possible sources of funding and the fact that most of the likely donor Governments had serious reservations about convening such a conference, prospects for a conference were uncertain.

The Secretary-General concluded that the disparate experiences of countries or subregions with regard to international migration suggested that, if practical solutions were to be found, they were likely to arise from consideration of the particular situation of groups of countries sharing similar concerns. It might, therefore, be expedient to pursue regional or subregional approaches whenever possible.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee [A/52/628/Add.4], adopted resolution 52/189 without vote [agenda item 97 (d)].

International migration and development

The General Assembly,

Recalling the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development adopted at Cairo, in particular chapter X on international migration, and the relevant provisions contained in the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development and the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development and in the Platform for Action adopted by the Fourth World Conference on Women,

Reaffirming the continuing validity of the principles set forth in the instruments regarding the international protection of human rights, in particular the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women and the Convention on the Rights of the Child,

Aware that, in spite of the existence of an already established body of principles, there is a need to make further efforts to ensure the human rights and dignity of all migrants and their families and that it is desirable to improve the situation of all documented migrants and their families,

Recalling its resolutions 49/127 of 19 December 1994 and 50/123 of 20 December 1995 on international migration and development, as well as Economic and Social Council decision 1995/313 of 27 July 1995,

Recalling also that the Economic and Social Council, in the context of its role under the Charter of the United Nations vis-a-vis the General Assembly and in accordance with Assembly resolutions 45/264 of 13 May 1991, 46/235 of 13 April 1992, 48/162 of 20 December 1994 and 50/227 of 24 May 1996, should assist the Assembly in promoting an integrated approach to the implementation of the Programme of Action in providing system-wide coordination and guidance in monitoring the implementation,

Recalling further that the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council should carry out their respective responsibilities, as entrusted to them in the Charter, in the formulation of policies and the provision of guidance to and coordination of United Nations activities in the field of population and development,

Recognizing the importance from an analytical and operational point of view of identifying the existing linkages among the social, economic, political and cultural factors related to international migration and development and of taking appropriate steps to intensify the analysis of issues involved,

Noting in particular the need for more migration data, a coherent theory to explain international migration and a better understanding of the complex inter-relationships between migration and development,

Noting the role of relevant United Nations organizations in delivering adequate support to developing countries to ensure that migration contributes to development,

Noting also the critical role of the existing forums within the United Nations system in addressing the issues of international migration and development, including through the Commission on Population and Development, the Commission on Human Rights, the Committee for Development Planning, the International Labour Organization, and other relevant key organizations,

Taking note of the recent regional and subregional conferences on international migration as an example of a Government-driven process of consultation and cooperation to address particular problems associated with international migration,

Noting that a technical symposium on international migration and development will be convened in 1998 by the Administrative Committee on Coordination at the request of the Commission on Population and Development, pursuant to resolution 50/123,

Recalling its resolution 51/148 of 13 December 1996 on cooperation between the United Nations and the International Organization for Migration, in particular its request therein to the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Director-General of the International Organization for Migration, to foster systematic consultations on matters of common interest,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Urges Member States and the United Nations system to strengthen international cooperation in the area of international migration and development in order to address the root causes of migration, especially those related to poverty, and to maximize the benefits of international migration to those concerned;

3. Encourages, where relevant, interregional, regional and subregional mechanisms to continue to address the question of migration and development;

4. Calls upon the international community to seek to make the option of remaining in one's country viable for all people; to that end, efforts to achieve sustainable economic and social development, ensuring a better economic balance between developed and developing countries, should be strengthened;

5. Calls upon all relevant organs, organizations and programmes of the United Nations system and other intergovernmental, regional and subregional organizations, within their continuing mandated activities, to address the issue of international migration and development and to provide appropriate support for interregional, regional and subregional processes and activities on international migration and development;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-fourth session a report on international migration and development, taking into account:

(a) The views of Member States, the International Organization for Migration, the International Labour Organization and other relevant organizations, both within and outside the United Nations system, bearing in mind various regional processes, and recommending ways and means to address the problems related to migration and development, including the possibility of convening an international conference on international migration and development;

(b) The report of the technical symposium on international migration and development which will be convened in 1998;

(c) The report of the Committee for Development Planning on its examination of the issue of migration and development;

(d) The work of the Administrative Committee on Coordination which addresses the issue of international migration and development from cross-sectoral, interregional, regional and subregional points of view;

7. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-fourth session a sub-item entitled "International migration and development, including the question of the convening of a United Nations conference on international migration and development to address migration issues".

Review and appraisal

UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board action. The UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board, in May [E/1997/33], discussed the UNFPA initiative to carry out in 1999 a programme to review the implementation of ICPD on the occasion of its fifth anniversary, to be known as ICPD+5. By a 16 May decision [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/14)], the Executive Board noted the proposal for ICPD + 5 and requested the UNFPA Executive Director to carry out preparatory activities for that purpose. The Board's President was asked to submit to the General Assembly later in the year, through the Economic and Social Council, the proposal for an overall review and appraisal.

In a 6 June letter to the Council President [E/1997/83], the President of the Executive Board asked if the Council could consider the question and recommended that it be taken up by the Assembly at its current session. The Council considered the Executive Director's letter in July.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July [meeting 37], the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1997/42 [draft: E/1997/L.42] without vote [agenda item 5).

Follow-up to the International Conference on Population and Development

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 49/128 of 19 December 1994 and 50/124 of 20 December 1995 on the follow-up to the International Conference on Population and Development and 51/176 of 16 December 1996, in which the Assembly reiterated that the Commission on Population and Development had the primary responsibility for monitoring, reviewing and assessing the implementation of the Programme of Action of the Conference,

1. Takes note of decision 97/14 adopted by the Executive Board of the United Nations Development Programme/United Nations Population Fund on 16 May 1997;

2. Recommends that the General Assembly, at its fifty-second session, decide on the process and modalities, including the possibility of convening a special session of the Assembly in 1999, for reviewing and appraising the implementation of the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development, under agenda item 97 (c), entitled "Population and development";

3. Recommends that the report of the Secretary-General to be submitted to the General Assembly under that agenda item contain consolidated recommendations from the Department of Economic and Social Affairs of the Secretariat, the United Nations Population Fund, the regional commissions and other relevant United Nations entities on activities to be undertaken in preparation for the review.

Report of Secretary-General. In response to the Council's request in resolution 1997/42, the Secretary-General, in September [A/52/208/Add.1], presented to the General Assembly recommendations on activities to be undertaken for the review received from the Department of Economic and Social Affairs, UNFPA, the regional commissions and other UN bodies.

The report stated that the Assembly might wish to focus on assessing national progress in implementation of the Programme of Action, given the fact that Governments were playing the lead role in the implementing, monitoring and evaluation of activities in follow-up to ICPD.

The review process was expected to include operational aspects and experience at the country level. It could focus, among other things, on how to respond to the needs of countries, constraints that countries were facing in achieving ICPD goals, and needed changes in the implementation strategy in order to achieve ICPD objectives. Another aspect of the review would involve responses by the UN system and the international community, and assessment of the impact of a shortage of resources on the prospects for achieving ICPD goals.

The proposed review process would be conducted under ongoing mechanisms and was expected to encompass special events and opportunities. It would be carried out in consultation with all concerned partners: Governments, the private sector, NGOs and other groups of civil society, and the UN system. An international forum, to be convened by UNFPA in March 1999, would bring together all partners in the process to identify ways of responding more effectively to the needs of countries. The outcome of the forum would serve as an input to the review and appraisal to be carried out in 1999 by the Commission on Population and Development, the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly. The overall review and appraisal was expected to include an examination of progress made in achieving the major measurable goals of the Programme of Action, and to highlight areas in which information remained inadequate for the assessment of progress. The process was expected to identify high-priority issues.

The report outlined possible action by the Assembly, the Council, the Commission and other UN bodies and organizations. The role of NGOs and other organizations of civil society, including community groups, the media, academic groups, parliamentarians and women's groups, was central to implementing the Programme of Action, the report stated. Methods for review and appraisal by the Assembly included the holding of a two-day plenary meeting in 1999. The Assembly had the role of identifying priorities for the future follow-up to ICPD within the UN system. The Assembly might recommend themes for future consideration by the Council or its subsidiary bodies, with a view to ensuring a harmonized approach to the issues involved.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee [A/52/628/Add.3], adopted resolution 52/188 without vote [agenda item 97 (c)].

Population and development

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 49/128 of 19 December 1994, 50/124 of 20 December 1995 and 51/176 of 16 December 1996 on the implementation of the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development,

Taking note of Economic and Social Council resolution 1997/42 of 22 July 1997, in which the Council recommended that the General Assembly, at its fifty-second session, decide on the process and modalities, including the possibility of convening a special session of the Assembly in 1999, for reviewing and appraising the implementation of the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development,

Stressing the need to pursue further the implementation of the Programme of Action and for Governments to recommit themselves at the highest political level to achieving its goals and objectives,

Recognizing the important contributions made by actors of civil society, particularly non-governmental organizations, to the Conference, its follow-up and the implementation of its Programme of Action,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General concerning the process and modalities for the review and appraisal of the implementation of the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development;

2. Decides to convene a special session for a duration of three days from 30 June to 2 July 1999, at the highest possible level of participation, in order to review and appraise the implementation of the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development;

3. Reaffirms that the special session for the overall review and appraisal of the implementation of the Programme of Action will be undertaken on the basis of and with full respect for the Programme of Action, and that there will be no renegotiation of the existing agreements contained therein;

4. Welcomes the operational review of the implementation of the Programme of Action to be undertaken under the auspices of the United Nations Population Fund, in cooperation with all relevant organizations of the United Nations system and other relevant international organizations, and notes that the report and outcome of the international forum in 1999 will be submitted to the Commission on Population and Development at its thirty-second session and to the Executive Board of the United Nations Development Programme/United Nations Population Fund;

5. Decides that the Commission on Population and Development, which is currently scheduled to consider at its thirty-second session a comprehensive report of the Secretary-General on the outcome of the quinquennial review and appraisal of the implementation of the Programme of Action, should serve as the preparatory body for the final preparations for the special session for the overall review and appraisal of the implementation of the Programme of Action, reporting through the Economic and Social Council, and in that regard notes that the comprehensive report of the Secretary-General should also contain an overall assessment of the progress achieved and constraints faced in the implementation of the Programme of Action, as well as recommendations for future action;

6. Encourages Governments to undertake reviews of the progress achieved and the constraints faced therein in the implementation of the Programme of Action at all levels, particularly at the national level and at the level of international cooperation, with a view to contributing to the preparations for the special session;

7. Invites Governments of developed and developing countries to provide information in order to establish a useful factual basis for the review of the mobilization of resources made available-bilateral, multilateral and domestic-for population and development activities with a view to strengthening the implementation of the Programme of Action;

8. Decides that the thirty-second session of the Commission on Population and Development shall be open-ended to allow the full participation of all States;

9. Invites all other relevant organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to contribute as appropriate to the special session as well as to its preparation;

10. Decides to invite States members of the specialized agencies that are not members of the United Nations to participate in the work of the special session in the capacity of observers;

11. Stresses the need for the effective participation of actors of civil society, particularly non-governmental organizations, in preparation for the special session, as well as the need to ensure appropriate arrangements, taking into account the practice and experience gained at the International Conference on Population and Development, for their substantive contributions to and active involvement in the preparatory meetings and the special session, and in that context invites the President of the General Assembly, in consultation with Member States, to propose to Member States appropriate modalities for their effective involvement in the special session;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session a progress report on the preparations for the special session;

13. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session a sub-item entitled "Implementation of the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development".

Resource shortfalls

In response to the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board's May request [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/20)] to revise a conference room paper on the consequences of resource shortfalls in meeting ICPD goals, the UNFPA Executive Director submitted a July report [DP/FPA/1997/12]. The report was accompanied by an annex [DP/FPA/1997/12 (Annex)], which described the methodology used to calculate the consequences of resource shortfalls, including references to data sources used. The report noted that the ICPD Programme of Action constituted a 20-year plan and specified the financial resources (both domestic and donor funds) needed to implement the population reproductive health package over that time span, which amounted to $17 billion per annum in 2000 and up to $21.7 billion in 2015. In 1994 and 1995, substantial resource increases were recorded, but that momentum had not been maintained. The likely consequences of not meeting the ICPD Programme of Action goals due to resource shortfalls included an additional 44 million to 80 million individuals using no contraceptive method in 2000 and, for the period 1995-2000, an additional 130 million to 230 million unintended or unwanted pregnancies, an additional 50 million to 90 million induced abortions, an extra 59 million to 110 million unintended births, an additional 300,000 to 540,000 maternal deaths and an additional 4.9 million to 8.9 million infant and child deaths.

The report cautioned that the quantitative estimates should be read as order of magnitude, not mathematical certainties. The exact estimates might change as more data became available, but the order of magnitude of the grave consequences would not.

UN Population Fund

1997 activities

In her report for 1997 [DP/FPA/1998/3 (Part I)] to the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board, the UNFPA Executive Director described the Fund's activities in programme priority areas. She noted that, since ICPD, emphasis had been placed on the need to measure progress in achieving goals through indicators of performance in population programmes, at both the national and global levels. UNFPA had developed such a set of indicators, whose purpose was to establish qualitative and quantitative markers to measure the progress, performance and impact of population programmes, including the three core programme areas of UNFPA—reproductive health, including family planning and sexual health; population and development strategies; and advocacy.

Reproductive health remained the primary focus of UNFPA's programme during 1997, accounting for over 60 per cent of total programme allocations. Activities included further operationalizing sexual and reproductive health; refining approaches to adolescent reproductive health; reducing maternal mortality; assessing contraceptive requirements and logistics management needs in recipient countries; providing emergency assistance in refugee situations; and addressing HIV/AIDS. The Fund provided policy guidance and technical support in those and related areas.

UNFPA country programmes reflected a strong reproductive health orientation. A series of regional consultations (Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, 25-30 January; New Delhi, India, 22-26 September; Lima, Peru, 3-7 November; Rabat, Morocco, 24-28 November) was a further step in the process to move beyond promoting the concept of reproductive health to developing programmes to meet the reproductive health needs of individuals and couples.

Adolescent reproductive health remained an area of concern, with females ages 15 to 19 accounting for more than 10 per cent of all babies born worldwide. Only 17 per cent of those young women used contraception. Young mothers had an increased likelihood of serious health risks, and the incidence of sexually transmitted diseases (STDs) was disproportionately high among young people: one in 20 adolescents contracted an STD yearly, and half of all cases of HIV infection affected people under age 25. Adding to those problems was the fact that more than half the population in developing countries was under 25. Adolescent reproductive health was increasingly becoming a governmental priority. At the country level, UNFPA provided support to numerous national or subregional projects. A subregional programme in the Caribbean emphasized adolescent reproductive health and rights. A national programme in Nicaragua, supported by UNFPA, provided health care to pregnant adolescents primarily from poor urban areas, as well as information materials and training to NGOs. UNFPA and the International Planned Parenthood Federation jointly published Generation 97: What Young People Say about Sexual and Reproductive Health, which presented the results of a survey of over 600 young people in 54 countries on relationships, sexuality, contraception, pregnancy and parenthood. Another publication, UNFPA and Adolescents, described such issues as programming for adolescent reproductive health and the use of strategic alliances. UNFPA convened a regional meeting (San Jose, Costa Rica, 1-3 December) to examine progress at the country level and to articulate a regional commitment towards improving the reproductive and sexual health of young people in Latin America. The concerns of youth and reproductive health in countries in transition were the subject of a European regional meeting (Copenhagen, Denmark, 23-25 June), organized by UNFPA, the Government of Denmark and the World Health Organization (WHO) Regional Office.

A key objective of UNFPA assistance was to reduce maternal mortality, which involved collaboration with many development partners, particularly WHO and the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), as well as national and international NGOs. UNFPA worked closely with WHO and UNICEF in defining guidelines for monitoring maternal health programmes and with WHO in conducting epidemiological research on the causes of maternal mortality. Technical specialists from WHO, UNICEF and the World Bank, among others, participated in regional consultations organized by the Fund on operationalizing reproductive health. UNFPA participated in the Safe Motherhood Technical Consultation (Colombo, Sri Lanka, 18-23 October), an inter-agency meeting that identified lessons learned in implementing safe motherhood activities that could be used to guide future programming in that area. It provided assistance to a project to help mobilize obstetric and gynaecological services, which was under way in seven countries with high maternal mortality rates. A programme in Iran emphasized quality of care. In Bolivia, a programme supported a national strategy to provide care of obstetric emergencies through training staff, providing medical equipment and developing appropriate management and organization systems. An activity in Morocco aimed to strengthen national capacities to implement the national safe motherhood strategy and to improve reproductive health services by upgrading health centres and rural hospitals to deliver better reproductive health services. Similar integrated approaches were promoted in Cote d'Ivoire, Gabon, the Niger, Nigeria and Uganda.

UNFPA provided reproductive health emergency assistance in refugee situations through close operational links with the main agencies providing humanitarian assistance, particularly UNHCR and the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies. It responded to appeals for assistance in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Great Lakes region of Africa, Liberia, Sierra Leone, the Sudan and Tajikistan. The Fund also responded to local natural disaster emergencies in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Ecuador, Madagascar, Papua New Guinea and Viet Nam (see also PART THREE, Chapter III). In 1997, 30 UNFPA projects addressing reproductive health in refugee situations were operational in 21 countries: 7 in Africa, 5 in the Arab States, 5 in Asia and the Pacific, and 4 in Europe. An important feature of the Fund's work during the year was the distribution of reproductive health kits to help ensure that women and men in all situations, including emergencies and crises, could have access to reproductive information and services.

During 1997, UNFPA supported HIV/AIDS-prevention activities in 132 countries, compared to 124 countries in 1996. The Fund's support continued to be provided in line with national HIV/AIDS policies and programmes and within the global strategy of the Joint and Co-sponsored United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS). The Fund participated in UNAIDS theme groups in 119 countries and chaired such groups in 8 countries during 1997 (see PART THREE, Chapter XIII). Fund support included the supply and distribution of condoms and of appropriate supplies and equipment at the primary health care level; in-school and out-of-school education activities; training of reproductive health information and service providers; information on HIV/AIDS; and research on integrating HIV/AIDS-prevention activities into reproductive health programmes at the primary health care level, as well as research on the socio-demographic consequences of the epidemic.

In the area of population and development strategies, UNFPA aimed to ensure a balance between socio-economic development and population dynamics by providing appropriate information and analysis; influencing policy, planning and programmes; and building national capacity in population programming. The Fund began a programme in collaboration with the Netherlands Interdisciplinary Demographic Institute to collect and analyse data on the flows of financial resources for population programmes, both international and domestic. UNFPA continued to operationalize population and development strategies by implementing country programmes. In Botswana, UNFPA, in partnership with the Government, facilitated the formulation of a comprehensive draft national population policy. In Cameroon, UNFPA provided technical and financial support to the Government in preparing a draft national population programme. The programme in Ecuador emphasized disadvantaged women and adolescents in rural areas, and aimed at training local staff in implementing information systems needed for programming population and development activities for vulnerable groups. At the global level, UNFPA continued to operationalize population and development strategies through involvement in UN and other international conferences. UNFPA convened an Expert Group Meeting of the Global Programme of Training in Population and Sustainable Development in February to establish a framework that would facilitate putting ICPD recommendations into the global training initiative. The meeting underscored the importance of focusing on the linkages between population, sustained economic growth and sustainable development, with emphasis on poverty eradication, gender equality, the situation of vulnerable and under-served groups, reproductive health, concerns of adolescents, population mobility and environmental degradation. In the area of population information technology, UNFPA continued to fund the United Nations Population Information Network (POPIN) and the Computer Software and Support for Population Activities (POPMAP). POPIN, available on the Internet, continued to strengthen and coordinate population information activities at the international, regional and national levels. It provided technical assistance to the UN regional commissions which, in turn, transferred skills to national institutions. Local consultants were identified to establish Internet sites in national population institutions in order to expand access to local information sources. The POPMAP project released new software, conducted training workshops and provided technical backstopping support for developing POPMAP applications. It also compiled a repository of country geographic data sets for distribution to POPMAP users.

Regarding advocacy at the country level, in addition to funding advocacy activities in the context of national programme priorities, UNFPA supported activities to enhance visibility and improve public perceptions of ICPD priorities. In Viet Nam, the Government organized a national advocacy seminar aimed at publicizing the empowerment of women and encouraging men to participate in reproductive health programmes, and another to raise awareness of the reproductive health situation and needs of adolescents. In Albania, a weekly radio show provided young people with information on reproductive health issues. A twice-weekly radio programme in Papua New Guinea addressed gender, adolescent sexuality and related development issues, focusing on community involvement. Gabon had a weekly radio programme that discussed topics such as prenatal care, safe delivery, breastfeeding and infertility. Two seminars were held in South Africa to brief media representatives on the rationale and approaches of the country's proposed population policy. Most advocacy activities at the country level supported various components of country programmes, often in the form of information and education activities. In India, the Government was reorienting the national population programme in the light of ICPD, placing more emphasis on gender equity and equality and on adolescent sexuality.

At the global level, UNFPA held the first Expert Consultation on Operationalizing Advocacy in Support of Population and Development Programmes at the Country Level: Lessons Learned (New York, 3-5 November), aimed at providing practical guidance for country programme activities. The publication of the State of World Population 1997 was a highlight of the year. World Population Day (11 July) activities in over 100 countries were supported by a brochure, poster and video news release. In addition, UNFPA produced a number of publications, posters, exhibits and electronic materials in support of advocacy activities at all levels.

Gender concerns were a cross-cutting dimension of all UNFPA-supported programming. During 1997, UNFPA continued to emphasize women's issues in all its work, promoting reproductive and sexual health and rights within a human rights context, adolescent reproductive health, and women's empowerment and gender equity and equality, as well as strengthening the gender perspective in UNFPA policies and programmes. It worked with legal and policy NGOs in 51 countries to strengthen their capacity to conduct research and to promote policies and codified legislation to enhance reproductive rights and women's empowerment. It conducted a survey on female genital mutilation at the country level as part of its efforts to eradicate the practice. In collaboration with an institute and local NGOs in three pilot countries, UNFPA was developing a prototype gender, population and development training manual that could be adapted to train policy makers, planners and community leaders. The manual was tested in Egypt, Indonesia and Zimbabwe and would be finalized in 1998.

Country and intercountry programmes

UNFPA's provisional project expenditures for country and intercountry (regional and interregional) programmes in 1997 totalled $214.4 million, compared to $216.5 million in 1996, according to the Executive Director's statistical overview report covering 1997 [DP/FPA/1998/3 (Part I/Add.1)]. The number of country projects directly executed by Governments in 1997 numbered 774 compared to 940 in 1996, and totalled $87.1 million or 27 per cent of 1997 programme allocations, compared to $65.4 million or 30.2 per cent in 1996. In accordance with criteria defined by the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board in 1996 [YUN 1996, p.979], total allocations in 1997 to those countries most in need amounted to $164.4 million or 62.2 per cent, compared with $109.1 million in 1996.

Sub-Saharan Africa. Allocations to programmes for sub-Saharan Africa totalled $119.3 million. Most resources were allocated to reproductive health and family planning (59.4 per cent) and population and development strategies (35.8 per cent), while advocacy programmes received the least (4.8 per cent). The implementation of population programmes in sub-Saharan Africa continued to progress in 1997 [DP/FPA/1998/3 (Part II)] as a result of increased awareness and commitment among policy makers and traditional and religious leaders. By year's end, 23 African countries had adopted population policies and 11 others were in the process of doing so. Several countries were revising their population policies to include ICPD. UNFPA country support teams (CSTs) continued to help build national capacity for population and development programme implementation. Despite those advances, however, political and social instabilities in the region contributed to a slowing down in the momentum of programme implementation and expenditure levels.

Further advances were made in adapting the maternal and child health and family planning approach to a reproductive health approach. UNFPA supported government efforts to provide more comprehensive reproductive health services and programming. However, two key constraints remained—limited coverage in terms of access to and availability of services, and an insufficient number of trained personnel to deliver such services. UNFPA assisted Governments in mobilizing community groups, NGOs and local leaders to promote the use of reproductive health services, focusing on such issues as maternal mortality, adolescent health needs, and male responsibility and involvement. Religious leaders were becoming allies in promoting reproductive health activities in Ghana, Namibia, the Niger, Senegal and Uganda. The Fund provided assistance for family life education, HIV/AIDS prevention and reproductive health and counselling services focusing on meeting the needs of youth. In the area of population and development strategies, Botswana, Cote d'Ivoire and Namibia approved comprehensive national population policies in 1997 and installed established structures to incorporate ICPD recommendations in their population policies. Mozambique, South Africa, Togo and Zimbabwe were in the process of finalizing population policies. UNFPA supported the first ministerial conference on population policies in the Sahelian countries, which adopted an action plan emphasizing basic health and education services for children, with special attention to the girl child. UNFPA assisted NGOs, parliamentarians and women's groups in the region in a number of advocacy activities in 1997, aiming at, among other things, eradicating harmful practices such as female genital mutilation; promoting reproductive health and reproductive rights; removing discriminatory laws and practices against women; and promoting adolescent reproductive health.

By a January decision [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/6)], the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board approved UNFPA assistance to Cote d'Ivoire, Djibouti, Kenya, Malawi, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zambia. In March [dec. 97/10], it approved assistance to Angola, Burkina Faso, the Central African Republic, the Comoros, Eritrea, the Gambia, Guinea, Namibia, Nigeria, Senegal, Togo and Uganda.

Arab States and Europe. UNFPA allocations for the Arab States and Europe amounted to $38 million in 1997, compared to $26 million in 1996. Of that sum, 69.4 per cent was allocated for reproductive health/family planning, while 26.9 per cent was used for population and development strategies and 3.7 per cent for advocacy. In the Arab States, Governments demonstrated commitment to addressing population issues and implementing the ICPD Programme of Action. Increased attention was being paid to promoting reproductive health and women's empowerment. UNFPA supported a range of reproductive health activities, including increasing access to reproductive health information and services; providing training to service providers; standardizing guidelines and protocols; and providing contraceptives and basic medical equipment. Building national capacity for the delivery and management of sustainable reproductive health services was emphasized. Management training supported by the Fund enabled health administrators in several Arab countries to improve service delivery efficiency and strengthen personnel management and management information systems. Activities to prevent STDs, including HIV/AIDS, were an important part of UNFPA-supported reproductive health programming in the region. The promotion of women's reproductive rights was part of a number of UNFPA-supported programmes. With UNFPA assistance, national capacity for policy formulation, research and analysis was institutionalized through support to national population councils, their technical secretariats, and national population research and data analysis centres. Support was also provided for training in demographic data collection and analysis. Demographic databases had been established in most countries. UNFPA assisted national bodies to improve legislation and economic and educational opportunities for women. Advocacy activities supported strategies to address the issue of violence against women. Counselling and legal services to women were integrated in reproductive health services. With UNFPA support, two regional projects promoted accurate interpretations of Islamic teachings and a better understanding of the position of Islam on women's rights as human rights.

The UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board, by a January decision [dec. 97/6], approved assistance to Morocco. In March [dec. 97/10], it approved assistance to Lebanon and the Sudan.

The reproductive health situation in Central and Eastern Europe in 1997 was diverse. In most countries, maternal mortality rates and the incidence of abortion were declining, due to increased use of modern contraceptives and growing awareness of family planning. However, in a number of countries, growing opposition to reproductive rights was hampering people's access to information and services, and unsafe abortions remained a leading cause of maternal mortality. There was an alarming increase in the prevalence of STDs, including HIV/AIDS, particularly among young people, in many countries in the region. Teenage fertility rates were also climbing and were approximately three times as high as the average in Western Europe. Consequently, attention was increasingly being focused on adolescents and efforts were made to involve NGOs as partners to complement government efforts to improve reproductive health. UNFPA also supported training in the provision of reproductive health services. A number of STD/AIDS-prevention activities supported by the Fund were undertaken in the region, including the provision of condoms and other contraceptive commodities; training of service providers; and the incorporation of HIV/AIDS education in sex education programmes. UNFPA provided emergency contraceptive supplies, including condoms, to several countries. Building and strengthening national capacity in data collection and analysis remained an important aspect of UNFPA support in the region. In order to facilitate the 2000 round of population and housing censuses, UNFPA joined the Economic Commission for Europe (ECE) in convening a donors' meeting (Geneva, 26 September). UNFPA agreed to coordinate follow-up to the meeting, including facilitating the exchange of information among donors and recipient countries on requirements for training, equipment and supplies, and technical and financial assistance. UNFPA also funded a regional census training project, executed by ECE, to train staff of national statistical offices. As part of its advocacy programme, UNFPA promoted partnerships among Governments, NGOs and groups in civil society.

The UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board, by a March decision [dec. 97/10], approved UNFPA assistance to Albania.

Asia and the Pacific. UNFPA assistance to Asia and the Pacific amounted to $92.1 million in 1997, compared to $74.5 million in 1996. By programme area, 69.1 per cent was spent on reproductive health/family planning, 25.1 per cent on population and development strategies, and 5.8 per cent on advocacy. While most Asian countries had experience in population planning and programming, and national execution was the principal mode of executing UNFPA assistance, efforts to implement ICPD goals required an upgrading, especially in the reproductive health approach. Thus, UNFPA continued to support training for service providers, policy makers, programme managers and other government officials. The operationalization of the reproductive health approach constituted the majority of activities supported by UNFPA. UNFPA's initial programme of emergency assistance to the Central Asian Republics (Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan) evolved into a comprehensive programme of national capacity-building for reproductive health services. With the assistance of UNFPA and others, 20 reproductive health training centres were established and some 2,600 staff received training in the area of quality of care. The provision of medical equipment, contraceptives and essential drugs contributed to the upgrading of services and the broadening of contraceptive choice. Regarding population and development strategies, UNFPA supported technical training in the collection, analysis and use of population data. In many countries, UNFPA supported numerous study tours and fellowships. Advocacy activities included the sensitization of religious leaders to reproductive health and family planning issues.

By a January decision [dec. 97/6], the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board approved UNFPA assistance to Mongolia and Nepal, as well as the requests for extension of, and additional resources for, the UNFPA country programmes for Bangladesh and the South Pacific. In March [dec. 97/10], the Board approved UNFPA assistance to India and the Lao People's Democratic Republic.

Latin America and the Caribbean. In 1997, UNFPA allocations for Latin America and the Caribbean totalled $36.2 million, compared to $26.1 million in 1996. Of the total, 65.9 per cent was spent on reproductive health/family planning, 25.4 per cent on population and development, and 8.7 per cent on advocacy. Efforts to operationalize reproductive health programmes were pursued through country programmes, as well as through regional activities. In October, a meeting was held in Peru to build consensus on regional activities. To improve the quality of reproductive health services and expand available options, the Fund supported a research project to learn about reasons for the extensive use of surgical sterilization of women in the region. The regional strategy favoured NGOs and grass-roots groups. Most country and regional projects supported by the Fund had NGOs as partners in design and implementation. Training of personnel in the use of data and in management systems was part of capacity-building under decentralization processes that were taking place throughout the region. UNFPA organized or participated in several events that advocated ICPD issues, especially the reproductive health and rights of women and young people. The Fund emphasized links with NGOs, parliamentarians, journalists, policy makers and political leaders.

The UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board, by a January decision [dec. 97/6], approved the request for extension of, and additional resources for, the UNFPA country programme for Nicaragua and, by a March decision [dec. 97/10], approved UNFPA assistance to Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Haiti, Peru and English-speaking Caribbean countries.

Interregional programmes. Allocations for interregional programmes totalled $36.3 million in 1997, up from $24.2 million in 1996. The largest portion, 45.9 per cent, was spent on population and development strategies, followed by 45.3 per cent for reproductive health/family planning and 8.8 per cent for advocacy. UNFPA continued to support a variety of research, advocacy and training by NGOs and other UN organizations that had ramifications at a global level. In the area of reproductive health, UNFPA-supported activities were aimed at researching new methods of safe and effective contraception, developing tools to diagnose STDs, expanding the availability of contraceptives, and providing information to technical and managerial personnel involved in reproductive health services. The Fund also supported research in adolescent reproductive health. Research continued on contraception methods, including contraceptive rings, subdermal implants for women, the transdermal system for women, spermicides and microbicides; on fertility-regulating uses of antiprogestogens; on male contraception, including hormonal methods of inhibiting sperm production, subdermal implants, the transdermal system and an immunocontraceptive; and on emergency contraception. Regarding STD prevention and diagnosis, research continued on new barrier methods, vaginal microbicides, a vaccine against chlamydial genital tract infection, and quick diagnosis of syphilis and gonorrhoea. UNFPA continued its support of activities for South-South cooperation in reproductive health. As for population and development strategies, UNFPA supported the development of new methods in data collection, processing and dissemination. Activities continued for promoting the use of POPMAP and POPIN. UNFPA and Harvard University, United States, published volume 20 of the Annual Review of Population Law and Johns Hopkins University, United States, disseminated a database of 250,000 bibliographic abstracts to developing countries on CD-ROM. NGOs received support for information dissemination.

Global Initiative on Contraceptive Requirements

As part of its ongoing efforts to strengthen national capacity to forecast contraceptive needs and manage distribution, UNFPA, under its Global Initiative on Contraceptive Requirements and Logistics Management Needs in Developing Countries in the 1990s, carried out in 1997 in-depth studies on contraceptive requirements and logistics management needs in Burkina Faso and Ethiopia. Follow-up studies were carried out in Bangladesh and Nepal, and technical support was provided to studies undertaken in the Sudan and Tunisia [DP/FPA/1998/3 (Part II)]. Four logistics management training strategy workshops were held in Senegal, the Sudan, Thailand and Zimbabwe, in collaboration with the Fund's CSTs, to help build national capacity in logistics management. A key aspect of the workshops was the development and drafting of a strategy to build logistics-management capacity for finalization and eventual implementation.

The Global Initiative organized a meeting of oral contraceptive manufacturers, government representatives and members of the development community to explore the role of the private sector in providing affordable contraceptives and reproductive health commodities in developing countries (New York, July). It concluded that the private sector should play an expanded role and recommended that the Fund organize market-segmentation studies in selected countries.

In response to a 1996 Executive Board decision [YUN 1996, p. 982] to establish the Global Contraceptive Commodity Programme (GCCP), UNFPA reviewed the financial requirements and reported in January 1997 [DP/FPA/1997/6] on a proposed revision of the UNFPA financial regulations in order to make GCCP operational. Under the Programme, a buffer stock would be set up to meet urgent requests for contraceptives, including condoms for HIV/AIDS prevention, from developing countries. A trust fund would be used to purchase a buffer stock of commonly requested contraceptives, to be stored at a UN facility or held at the manufacturer's headquarters.

GCCP became operational in 1997 and responded to emergency or urgent requests from a number of countries. The contraceptive commodities provided by GCCP included condoms, oral contraceptives, intra-uterine devices, vaginal foaming tablets and injectables.

A review of the financial regulations revealed that UNFPA did not have the authority to conclude agreements with suppliers to maintain stockholdings of contraceptive products. The Executive Director proposed that a new regulation be made allowing UNFPA to purchase and hold such stocks.

By a decision of 14 March [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/7)], the Executive Board approved the inclusion of a new regulation in the UNFPA Financial Regulations and Rules whereby UNFPA could procure and hold stocks of essential contraceptive products in order to respond promptly to emergency requests for assistance.

UNFPA information and communication strategy

The Executive Director submitted a March report to the Executive Board describing UNFPA's information and communication strategy [DP/FPA/1997/8], as requested in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 987].

The overall goal of the strategy was to promote the principles, goals and objectives of ICPD and to help turn them into reality at national, regional and international levels. The specific goals of the Fund's information and communication activities were to increase awareness and understanding of the role of population in the development process and build support for UNFPA activities; build support for ICPD goals; mobilize resources based on the consensus reached at ICPD; and build national capacity in population information and communication for reproductive health and population and development strategies. The strategy included enhancement of UNFPA's capability to present its message effectively, both at the country and at the international level, requiring trained staff.

At international and regional levels, UNFPA's strategy was to remind Governments and partner organizations of their role in shaping ICPD objectives to their specific situations, including gender and social- and health-sector goals. Of particular importance was the mobilization of resources by building up constituencies among Governments, parliamentarians and the general public, and the exploration of avenues of support from the private sector. At the country level, UNFPA's strategy was to advocate for the ICPD population and development agenda; assist countries to operationalize the programme components based on ICPD goals; secure commitment of national resources for that purpose; and promote coordination among the various sectors of government, and between government and civil society. In addition, UNFPA would support national information, education and communication with a view to building national capacity. All forms of communication would be used to implement the strategy, and efforts would be made to select the most appropriate media.

Activities at the international and regional levels were developed and carried out by UNFPA headquarters. The audiences for those activities were policy makers; parliamentarians; opinion leaders, including political and religious leaders; NGOs, especially those for young people and women; communicators and educators in formal and non-formal settings; the media; the general public; and ultimately couples and individuals. Information materials would be distributed through government, parliamentary and NGO channels, press conferences, video presentations and video news releases. More innovative approaches would include joint activities with development partners, including joint publications, special campaigns, opinion polls and related activities. UNFPA also planned to make greater use of special goodwill ambassadors, well-known people who publicized population issues.

At the national level, UNFPA-supported information and communication activities were developed by national authorities as part of overall national population and development programmes. They were designed in the context of each country's circumstances and with respect for cultural values and sensitivities, and were produced in languages appropriate for local use. Those activities were carried out by a variety of executing agencies, including government organizations, UN agencies, NGOs and intergovernmental bodies. UNFPA representatives worked closely with national authorities in adapting material provided by UNFPA headquarters.

Tools for monitoring the impact of UNFPA's international advocacy in specific media were becoming more sophisticated and increasingly effective in establishing who was reached and with what message, though they were less certain in establishing the effect produced, particularly in the area of attitudinal or behavioural change. The report concluded that it would be part of UNFPA's information and communication strategy to take advantage of technical advances as part of its monitoring and evaluation, develop improved techniques to monitor attitudinal and behavioural change in UNFPA's target audiences and, to the extent possible, assess the effectiveness of UNFPA advocacy in that regard.

The Executive Board, by a May decision [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/13)], endorsed the overall goal of the UNFPA information and communication strategy and the specific goals and corresponding strategies, including monitoring and evaluation of change in UNFPA's target audiences. The Board stressed the importance of maintaining linguistic balance in the electronic dissemination of information. It also stressed that monitoring and evaluation were integral parts of information and communication activities and there was a need to strengthen those functions. The Board requested the Executive Director to report orally each year on progress in implementing its decision and to report on the Fund's information and communication strategy in 2001.

Financial and administrative questions

UNFPA's total income from regular resources in 1997 was $289.7 million, a decrease of 6.2 per cent from the 1996 level of $308.8 million [DP/FPA/1998/9]. Expenditures totalled $303.6 million, resulting in an excess of expenditure over income of $14 million. However, surplus general resources brought forward from 1996 amounted to $27.2 million. Thus, after adjusting for excess expenditure in 1997 and the transfer of $1.7 million to GCCP, unspent general resources to be carried forward to 1998 totalled $11.5 million. Total contributions pledged by 88 Governments in 1997 were $287.1 million, a decrease of $15.5 million from the previous year. The cumulative outstanding balance of unpaid pledges for 1997 and prior years was $21.1 million.

By a September decision [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/29)], the Executive Board took note of the UNFPA financial review for 1996 [DP/FPA/1997/13].

The Executive Director, in a July report on the status of financial implementation of country programmes and projects [DP/FPA/1997/18], said that the Executive Board had approved in 1997 34 country programmes (17 in sub-Saharan Africa, 5 in the Arab States and Europe, 4 in Asia and the Pacific and 8 in Latin America and the Caribbean) for a total cost of $485 million. The programmes approved for sub-Saharan Africa amounted to $222.6 million; for the Arab States and Europe, $46.5 million; for Asia and the Pacific, $150.3 million; and for Latin America and the Caribbean, $65.6 million. An additional $10.1 million was approved for ongoing country programmes (two in Asia and the Pacific and one in Latin America and the Caribbean).

1998-1999 budget

The UNFPA Executive Director submitted to the Executive Board a July report on estimates for the 1998-1999 biennial support budget [DP/FPA/1997/14], previously referred to as the administrative and programme support services budget. She requested net appropriations of $131.4 million ($143.3 million gross) for the biennium to cover staff and support costs. The proposed budget represented an increase of 3.6 per cent, or $4.6 million, over 1996-1997, and was based on assumed total resources of $770 million for 1998-1999, as reflected in the Fund's 1998-2001 work plan (see below). That amount, which included $50 million in multi-bilateral resources, was based on an estimated regular resource income for 1997 of $325 million, with a projected annual increase of 7 per cent for the regular resource income in 1998 and 1999.

The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) issued an August report containing its comments on the budget estimates [DP/FPA/1997/15]. It noted that the proposed budget had been prepared in accordance with the common format for presentation, terms and definitions, and methodology [DP/1997/2 & Add.1], as agreed by the secretariats of UNDP, UNFPA and UNICEF, and approved by the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/6)] (see PART THREE, Chapter II). However, the Committee believed that the UNFPA budget presentation could be improved so that the Executive Director's proposals were more comprehensive and transparent in order to facilitate decisions by the Executive Board.

The Executive Board, by a September decision [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/26)], took note of the UNFPA 1998-1999 biennial support budget estimates and of the ACABQ report. It urged the Executive Director to contain both the administrative and the programme support costs at headquarters and in the field. She was also urged to keep under review the prevailing climate of uncertainty regarding future income, particularly by delaying filling of the proposed new positions of UNFPA Representatives when implementing the 1998-1999 budget. The Board approved gross appropriations of $143.3 million for programme support and the management and administration of UNFPA, and resolved that the income estimates of $15.7 million should be used to offset the gross appropriations, resulting in estimated net appropriations of $127.5 million. The Executive Director was requested to report to the Board in 1998 on progress made in implementing the 1998-

1999 budget. She was also asked to report orally to the Board in 1998 on the criteria and mechanisms to be used for any readjustment to the 1998-1999 budget in the event of any significant shortfall in income. The Board recommended that the Executive Director undertake a study on multi-bilateral and trust fund arrangements and report to the Board in 1998.

Audit reports

The Executive Board had before it a UNFPA report [DP/FPA/1997/4] describing action taken in response to the recommendations made on UNFPA in the report of the United Nations Board of Auditors for the 1994-1995 biennium [A/51/5/Add.7]. Steps to be taken by UNFPA included: adhering to the requirement that trust fund activities only be initiated on a fully funded basis; making a more systematic assessment of country needs and setting strategic targets for national execution; determining the responsibilities of field staff and planning the training and resources necessary for field offices to fulfil their tasks; drafting guidelines on selection of institutions for project execution; evaluating progress on national execution; developing indicators of capacity-building; reviewing the extension of the use, selection and assessment of consultants; adjusting CST resources; reviewing costs of CST offices; taking a more proactive role in formulating projects; and using baseline studies to identify the needs and recipients of a project.

The Executive Board, in January [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/2)], took note of the UNFPA report, and asked the secretariat to provide in 1998 an updated overview of the implementation of the Board of Auditors' recommendations. The Board also requested the secretariat to provide annually an update on the progress achieved in implementing the Auditors' recommendations.

In March [DP/FPA/1997/10 (Part IV)], the Executive Director submitted to the Board a report on UNFPA internal audit and oversight activities in 1996. The principal activities consisted of eight management audits in six country offices and two CST offices; 45 compliance audits in country offices, undertaken by two international public accounting firms; a comprehensive review of audit clause requirements for government- and NGO-executed projects; a review of government in-kind contributions; and six audit communications addressing weaknesses in the UNFPA Financial Regulations and Rules.

The level of internal controls in the vast majority of UNFPA offices was considered satisfactory. However, there was a need to clarify procedures, which, the Executive Director stated, would be achieved through a consolidated set of policies and procedures. Another issue was the need to secure the legal basis of project activities through properly signed legal instruments. In addition, the management of project audits was being reviewed and UNFPA had drafted revised financial rules. Due to concerns that management audits of headquarters required more attention, two organizational units at headquarters had been selected for internal audits in place of two country offices in 1997. Another concern of UNFPA was that the performance of the public accounting firms in two locations was uneven and UNFPA lacked auditors to provide supervision of the work of the contractors.

The Executive Board, in a May decision [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/16)], took note of the internal audit report and the observations made by delegations during the Board's discussion. It supported the Executive Director's proposals to strengthen the UNFPA internal audit function.

1998-2001 work plan

In a February report [DP/FPA/1997/7], the Executive Director outlined the 1998-2001 UNFPA work plan, including information on project resources and proposed utilization of programmable resources covering country and intercountry activities as well as geographical regions. The report also presented the Executive Director's proposed programme expenditure authority for 1998 from regular resources, the estimates of new programmable resources for the period 1999-2001 and the estimates of new programmable resources from multi-bilateral funding. The utilization of resources in 1996 was examined.

The UNFPA work plan, which was a rolling four-year plan, was a projected programme of assistance based on income projections, prior commitments and foreseeable needs. The 1997 income of $325 million was used as the base and for the following four years a constant annual rate of increase of 7 per cent (the average rate over the previous eight years) was projected. The new programmable resources from regular resources totalled $1,235 million for the four years, compared to $1,175 million for 1997-2000. The income assumption from multi-bilateral resources was $25 million per year. Thus, the income assumption from regular and multi-bilateral resources combined was $1,644 million. The amount of resources required for the administrative and programme support services was assumed to be 175 per cent of the combined resources each year, or $288 million for the four years. Over that period, UNFPA planned to add $21 million to the operational reserve.

The proportion of total programmable resources intended for country activities for 1998-

2001 was the same as for 1997-2000. In absolute terms, the $876 million intended for country activities was 5 per cent higher than that foreseen for 1997-2000. In addition, $118 million was projected for technical support services for country programmes. Administrative and operational services costs from regular resources for 1998-2001 were estimated at $48 million.

The new work plan reflected the 1996 Board decision to use a new system of allocation of UNFPA resources [YUN 1996, p. 988] by categorizing developing countries into three groups. The share for Group A countries (those with a low level of development and the farthest from achieving ICPD goals), estimated at 60 per cent for 1996, would be increased to 65 per cent a year on average; for Group B (those that had made considerable progress in achieving ICPD goals), it would decrease from 29 to 25 per cent; for Group C (those that had met the thresholds of the seven ICPD goals), it would increase from 4 to 5-7 per cent. By region, the average for 1998-2001 would be: sub-Saharan Africa, 39 per cent; Arab States and Europe, 13 per cent; Asia and the Pacific, 38 per cent; and Latin America and the Caribbean, 10 per cent.

The recommended programme expenditure authority for 1998 amounted to $278 million, and the new programmable resources for 1999, 2000 and 2001 were estimated at $298 million, $318 million and $341 million, respectively.

The Executive Board, by a May decision [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/11)], endorsed the Executive Director's programme resource planning proposals. It approved the request for the 1998 programme expenditure authority at a level equal to expected new programmable resources for 1998, estimated at $278 million. The Board endorsed the use of the estimates given in the report for new programmable resources from regular resources for programme planning for 1999-2001 and the estimates of new programmable resources from multi-bilateral funding.

Technical support services system

In July [DP/FPA/1997/16], the Executive Director reported on UNFPA's technical support services (TSS) system, as requested by the Executive Board in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1103]. She concluded, among other things, that CSTs continued to contribute effectively to the implementation of population country programmes by applying an integrated and multidisciplinary approach to population issues. Based on the findings of an independent assessment of the TSS specialist arrangement, UNFPA proposed to retain the TSS functions, but to make a number of improvements to strengthen the role of TSS specialists.

To improve the TSS system, UNFPA proposed certain modifications in the composition of CSTs to address emerging population issues and to meet increasing requests for technical assistance in Africa and the Arab States and Europe. UNFPA suggested increasing the number of CST adviser posts from 128 to 130. The functions of the TSS specialists would be streamlined to focus on multi-disciplinary backstopping to CSTs and to improve the advocacy work of the TSS specialists within their respective agencies and organizations.

Addressing the concerns raised regarding the distribution of TSS specialist and CST adviser posts between regional and agency headquarters, as well as available resources, UNFPA proposed a reconfiguration, under which the 171 posts approved by the Board in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1102] would be reduced to 157. The percentage of posts in reproductive health and gender, population and development would increase. The number of CST adviser posts in Africa would increase from 56 to 60; in the Arab States and Europe, they would rise from 18 to 19; in Asia and the Pacific, they would decrease from 37 to 34; and in Latin America and the Caribbean, the posts would be maintained at 17. The remaining 27 posts would be distributed to agencies and regional offices.

UNFPA stated that the revised functions of the TSS specialists emphasized that all their activities were aimed at contributing to national capacity-building and self-reliance by furnishing support to CSTs. The TSS specialists were urged to be more proactive in advocating for population issues within their respective UN agencies and organizations at the country, regional and headquarters levels.

In September [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/27)], the Executive Board endorsed the proposals for reconfiguring the CST adviser posts. It agreed, on a temporary basis for 1998, to the proposals for modifications of the TSS specialist posts in UN agencies and organizations. The Executive Director was asked to reassess the TSS system, including financial aspects, in 1999.

Programming process

In response to a 1996 Executive Board request [YUN 1996, p. 982], the Executive Director, in March 1997 [DP/FPA/1997/9], made recommendations on the UNFPA country programming process. The report recalled that in 1996 UNFPA had introduced a new format for country programme proposals. The new presentations were on average 40 per cent shorter than in the past, included data on the new approach for the allocation of UNFPA resources adopted in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 989], and focused on subjects of greatest interest to the Board, including lessons learned from past UNFPA programmes, the Fund's comparative advantage in relation to other donors, the planned strategy for the proposed programme, its implementation plan and the expected results. The Executive Director proposed to maintain the current format for the Fund's country programming process and to work to improve it.

In order to achieve a more inclusive programming process, the Fund would promote input from all interested Board members, respect the principles of multilateralism, and limit the UNFPA administrative burden so that as much of the Fund's resources as possible could be spent on programmes. The Fund believed that inputs from member Governments would be most useful at the time of the programme review and strategy development (PRSD) exercise, the earliest stage of programme formulation. In order to open up its PRSD process to wider participation by member Governments, UNFPA proposed notifying all Board member countries in advance of planned PRSD exercises, and their active participation would be solicited. Input received from Governments would be considered an integral part of the PRSD exercise. Once a programme had been drafted, the Government and the Fund would work together to reach a final version for submission to the Executive Board.

The Executive Board, in a May decision [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/12)], requested that in its programming process UNFPA take into account that: during the PRSD process, UNFPA would offer briefings at the field level on the emerging findings; UNFPA would make available the summary of the PRSD process (the country recommendation), which would show proposed strategic actions and their rationale, the comparative advantage of UNFPA and its complementarity vis-à-vis other actors, and possible thematic areas, drawing on lessons learned from other programmes; and the country recommendation would be made available to all UNFPA members who might offer views on the recommendation within six weeks, which the secretariat would take into account in further developing the programme.

The Board requested that proposed country programmes contain statements of purpose, deliverables (for each subprogramme area), financial parameters and indicators by which UNFPA would measure programme performance, effectiveness and impact. Furthermore, the Board decided that country programmes would be considered for approval without discussion unless one was requested by more than one member State, in writing, two weeks before the session. It recommended that the efforts towards harmonized arrangements for country programming processes in the UN system should, when possible, be coordinated and harmonized with other that the operation of those arrangements be reviewed by the Executive Director, who would present a report in 2000.

Staff training

In July [DP/FPA/1997/11], the Executive Director provided the Executive Board with an evaluation of UNFPA staff training activities, which summarized the results of an external evaluation, described the implementation of training activities since 1992 and outlined new directions for training, as provided for in a directive issued by the Executive Director in 1996.

The evaluators recommended, as a first step, that there should be a comprehensive assessment of learning and training needs. Further recommendations included developing a training-of-trainers strategy and the creation of learning resource teams, linked with UNFPA CSTs and TSS. The evaluators recommended developing learning resource network links, including through distance-learning modes, to provide sustained professional support for trainers and resource persons; increased coordination with other UN agencies, especially at local levels; and strengthened authority for line managers, with a corresponding increased decentralization of training budgets to allow for more local training and opportunities for field staff to undertake more visits to headquarters and to other field offices.

Additional funding was proposed for developing supplementary learning resource centres and equipment and materials, more interactive computer packages, distance-learning methods and establishing networks linking trainers. Specific recommendations were made for strengthening evaluation mechanisms in UNFPA training and staff development so that greater emphasis was placed on tracking how training was reflected in work performance. Managers and supervisors were called on to take greater responsibility for training and to create a learning environment through on-the-job training, through coaching and by following up changed behaviour after training.

The Executive Board, in September [E/1997/33 (dec. 97/29)], requested the Executive Director to make an oral presentation on the implementation of the recommendations of the evaluation in 1998.

The Executive Director, in her report on UNFPA activities in 1997 [DP/FPA/1998/3 (Part II)], described the staff training programme, which took into consideration the recommendations of the evaluation. The Fund had developed a new training programme for newly recruited Representatives and a curriculum to build staff skills. It organized a series of regional workshops and provided training at the regional level on financial monitoring and management of country programmes. The Fund conducted training workshops to introduce new programme guidelines and revised financial procedures, and began to develop computer-based training on finance management. UNFPA reinforced the role of managers and supervisors in providing training and coaching, making them increasingly responsible for fostering a learning environment, providing mentoring and assessing the impact of training on job performance.

UN Population Award

The 1997 United Nations Population Award was presented to Elizabeth Aguirre de Calderon Sol, Director, National Family Secretariat (El Salvador); Dr. Toshio Kuroda, Director Emeritus, Nihon University Population Research Institute, Tokyo (Japan); and Senator Mechai Viravaidya, Director, Population and Community Development Association (Thailand). Ms. Aguirre de Calderon Sol was chosen for her work in promoting social development when she was President of the Brigade for Social Development in 1989 and for her later work directing the National Family Secretariat. Dr. Kuroda was selected for his contribution of more than 50 years of scientific studies, writing, teaching, technical assistance and leadership in population issues in Japan, Asia and throughout the world. Senator Viravaidya was chosen for his innovative work in promoting population policy in Thailand and throughout Asia, and for his promotion of family planning services.

The Award was established by General Assembly resolution 36/201 [YUN 1981, p. 792] to be presented annually to individuals or institutions for outstanding contributions to increased awareness of population problems and to their solutions.

In June [A/52/212], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Assembly the report of the UNFPA Executive Director on the Population Award. The Assembly took note of it by decision 52/451 of 18 December.

Other population activities

Commission on Population and Development

The Commission on Population and Development, at its thirtieth session (New York, 24-28 February) [E/1997/25], considered as its central theme international migration (see above), with special emphasis on the links between migration and development, including gender issues and the family. It recommended a draft resolution on the subject for adoption by the Economic and Social Council (resolution 1997/2).

The Commission adopted three resolutions. One dealt with the holding of a technical symposium on international migration in 1998 [E/1997/25 (res. 1997/1)]. The Commission, in a resolution on reporting requirements [res. 1997/2], requested the Secretariat to report to it in 1998 on a new document structure and periodicity and revised reporting methods. It asked the Secretariat to make proposals on how to handle documentation in 1999 in view of ICPD + 5. The Commission requested that the material normally included in the report of the Secretary-General on intergovernmental organizations and NGOs, for submission in 1998, be integrated into the reports on world population monitoring and the monitoring of population programmes. It also asked for a revised report of the Secretary-General on the activities of intergovernmental organizations and NGOs in reproductive health for submission in 1998. The report on the monitoring of population programmes, the Commission decided, should be more analytic in focus, relate progress more specifically to ICPD goals and cover all countries. The Commission welcomed the initiative to improve the reporting on financial flows through collaboration with the Netherlands Interdisciplinary Demographic Institute, and encouraged exploration of opportunities to improve other reports through similar collaborative ventures. The Commission requested that the report of the ACC Task Force on Basic Social Services for All give greater emphasis to outcomes, system-wide achievements and progress.

By the third resolution [res. 1997/3], the Commission took note of the proposed work programme for 1998-1999. For its consideration of the item, the Commission had before it the Secretary-General's report on the progress of work in population in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 990], a note by the Secretary-General on the proposed 1998-1999 programme of work [E/CN.9/1997/8], and the Secretary-General's report on world demographic trends [E/CN.9/1997/9] (see below).

The Economic and Social Council, by decision 1997/220 of 18 July, took note of the Commission's report on its thirtieth session and approved the provisional agenda and documentation for the thirty-first (1998) session. In decision 1997/298 of 23 July, the Council invited NGOs that were accredited to ICPD to attend the Commission's thirty-first session, provided that they had applied for consultative status.

1997 UN activities

The Secretary-General, in a December report, reviewed the work of the Population Division of the Department of Economic and Social Affairs in 1997 [E/CN.9/1998/7]. The report covered the activities of the Division in the subprogrammes dealing with the global analysis of demographic variables, such as fertility and family planning, mortality, international migration and internal migration; world population projections; population policy and socio-economic development; the monitoring, review and appraisal, coordination and dissemination of population information; and technical cooperation in population.

During 1997, work was completed on a study dealing with evolving patterns of fertility behaviour in developing countries, which examined levels and trends in fertility as indicated by data from censuses and surveys. The findings showed that, during the period 1970-1990, almost all developing countries experienced an overall decline in fertility. A wall chart depicting fertility patterns in 1997 was issued, covering 167 countries and 90 per cent of the world's population. A study on family planning analysed fertility behaviour and the impact of family planning programmes on fertility in 15 selected countries. Results showed that, as of the late 1980s, contraceptive use reduced total fertility rates in those countries by between 0.8 and 4.8 children. The Population Division organized an expert group meeting (New York, 4-6 November) to examine how fertility levels might evolve in countries whose fertility rates were below replacement level.

The Division also studied mortality issues. It collaborated in a symposium on health and mortality (Brussels, Belgium, 19-22 November) with the Government, the municipal government of Flanders and the Population and Family Study Centre. The symposium addressed a variety of issues related to the health status and mortality risks of the adult population in developed and developing countries, as well as in countries with economies in transition. The Division was undertaking a review of current methods to estimate adult mortality in countries with incomplete data. Preliminary indications showed that it was essential to improve the availability and quality of basic data for most developing countries. Databases had been compiled for estimating childhood mortality for Africa, Asia and Latin America.

Two reports analysing specific aspects of international migration levels and trends were nearing completion. An in-depth analysis of country-level estimates of rural-urban migration and estimates of the components of urban growth derived from intercensal comparisons was being completed.

With respect to population estimates and projections, the completion of the 1996 revision of world population estimates and projections was announced to the Commission at its 1997 session. At that time, the annex tables, the wall chart World Population 1996 and a computer database on diskettes had been published. Afterwards, the report The Sex and Age Distribution of the World Population: The 1996 Revision was published. The final report, World Population Prospects: The 1996 Revision, was in the editing stage. The 1996 Revision contained an extensive analysis of recent demographic trends, with specific chapters dealing with population size and growth, fertility, mortality, international migration, the demographic impact of AIDS in 28 countries, a detailed comparison between the results of the 1994 revision and the results of the 1996 Revision, methodology, sources of data and demographic methods. The Population Division completed the updating of its long-range population projections. A report presented population projections for the world until 2150, based on the 1996 Revision. There were seven projection scenarios in those long-range projections: the medium, high, low and constant fertility variants extended until 2150 the corresponding assumptions of the 1996 Revision, while the high-medium, low-medium and instant replacement fertility scenarios were additional projections prepared to give a more detailed range of possible future courses of population growth. Projections were prepared for eight geographical groupings: Africa, Europe, Latin America and the Caribbean, North America, Oceania, China, India, and Asia excluding China and India. Work was proceeding on the 1998 revision of the world population estimates and projections. The 1996 Revision included urban, rural and city population estimates and projections, which were published as annex tables and also issued as databases in May. The wall charts Urban Agglomerates, 1996 and Urban and Rural Areas, 1996 were published. The report World Urbanization Prospects: The 1996 Revision analysed prospects for urbanization; it noted that, at mid-1996, 46 per cent of the world population consisted of urban dwellers, and half of the world population would be living in urban areas by 2006.

In the area of population policies, the Division continued its work on the questionnaire for the United Nations Eighth Population Inquiry among Governments. With input from the regional commissions and UN specialized agencies, a new questionnaire was drafted, which would be used in the review and appraisal process in 1999. A study on international migration policies, which was revised and submitted for publication, offered a comparative overview of policies regarding migration for permanent settlement, labour migration, refugees and asylum seekers, and undocumented migration. It examined family reunification, nationality and citizenship, and policies relating to the economic, social, political and cultural integration of immigrants. World Population Policies, an overview of trends in population policies for 190 countries, was completed. The sixth edition of the population policy database, Global Population Policy Database, 1997, was due to be completed in early 1998. In addition, a database on population policies was being developed. Based on material contained in the population policy data bank, briefing notes for the Secretary-General were prepared on population issues in 31 countries.

As to population and development, the Division issued two reports on old-age mortality—"Projecting old-age mortality and its consequences" and "Future directions in research on the demography of ageing". It also began work on an updated demographic overview of population age-structures and population ageing. Two outputs connected with the data bank on population, resources, environment and development (PRED Bank) were issued in 1997: "User's Guide to the Population, Resources, Environment and Development Database (PRED Bank, Version 2.1)" and "National trends in population, resources, environment and development: country profiles". The report "Government views on population and the environment" was issued. It reviewed official government statements, national reports and the draft and final documents adopted at major intergovernmental conferences dealing with population, environment and development issues from 1970 to 1994. The review found that, by the time of the 1994 ICPD, a majority of both developed and developing countries had expressed concern about population and environment imbalances.

During 1997, the Population Division's POPIN project promoted the use of new information and communication technologies to extend access to and use of population information worldwide. Emphasis was placed on building capacities within developing country institutions and within the UN regional commissions. Among those efforts were the creation of Internet World Wide Web sites and training in the use of the Internet as a medium for the dissemination of locally produced population information and data. In 1997, POPIN assisted in creating Web sites in a number of countries. It also produced the Internet-accessible Worldwide Directory of Population Institutions. In cooperation with UNDP, a CD-ROM version of the POPIN Web site was issued. The 1993-1997 work programme of the global POPIN Coordinating Unit was evaluated in 1997 by an independent consultant who stated that POPIN was breaking new ground in international information systems territory.

The Division provided technical assistance services to 12 projects during 1997 in the areas of population and development training; institutionalizing analysis and research on socioeconomic and demographic data obtained from population censuses, surveys and vital registration systems; population policy; and population and development. The projects were implemented in 10 developing countries in Africa, Western Asia and countries with economies in transition. TSS specialists in the areas of population and development provided support to the eight CSTs and to national projects. The specialists published six papers in the areas of population and development training, links between population and education, and recent findings in population analysis and research. The TSS specialists carried out various missions during the year.

By a 2 January note on the 1998-1999 programme of work in population [E/CN.9/1997/8], the Secretary-General stated that the proposed programme was prepared under the medium-term plan for 1998-2001, which was adopted by the General Assembly in resolution 51/219 [YUN 1996, p. 1306]. It was designed to carry out follow-up activities relating to ICPD; conduct research of the highest priority at the global level; disseminate research findings; and provide substantive support for technical cooperation projects in population.

The Commission on Population and Development, by a February resolution [E/1997/25 (res. 1997/3)], stressed, in the context of the UN system reform process, the importance of continuing the basic work of the Population Division on the crucial underpinnings of population estimates and projections; basic population trends and issues, including fertility, mortality, migration and patterns of rural and urban population change; the evolution of population policies; and understanding of the links between population and development. The Commission emphasized that the Division's role as the Commission's secretariat constituted an essential part of the Division's work programme and requested the Division to continue to give such servicing high priority. Noting the proposed 1998-1999 work programme in population, the Commission requested the Division to build an improved analysis of international migration as well as an improved understanding of international migration and development. The Commission emphasized the value of the POPIN system to the international community and encouraged its further development. It also emphasized the importance of preparations by the Division, in collaboration with other bodies, for the review and appraisal of ICPD implementation, to be conducted in 1999.

Demographic trends

The Secretary-General submitted a report to the Commission on Population and Development on world demographic trends [E/CN.9/1997/9], in accordance with Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/2 [YUN1996, p.977]. The report provided an overview of population size and growth, fertility, mortality and international migration, as assessed by the 1996 revision of global population and demographic estimates and projections. The 1996 revision noted slower population growth, lower levels of fertility, more diverse trends in mortality and increased migration flows during the early 1990s than in prior decades.

The world population at mid-1996 was 5,770 million, an increase of 81 million over the previous year, and annual growth was expected to remain at that level until 2000. Some 80 per cent of the world's population lived in the less developed regions. Between 1990 and 1995, world population grew at nearly 1.5 per cent per annum, significantly below the over 1.72 per cent per annum rate of the previous two decades. UN fertility projections indicated that the population growth rate would continue declining, to nearly 1.4 per cent per annum in 1995-2000 and to 0.45 per cent in 2045-2050, reaching a world population of 6,090 million in 2000 and 9,370 million in 2050. The annual increment to the world population would remain steady at around 80 million per annum through 2025, and would gradually decline thereafter to 41 million between 2045 and 2050. Between 1950 and 1996, the population of the less developed regions increased by 168 per cent, compared to an increase of 45 per cent for the more developed regions. Between 1990 and 1995, the population of the less developed regions grew at nearly 1.8 per cent per annum, while the population of the more developed regions grew at 0.4 per cent per annum. According to projections, the population of the less developed regions would increase by 79 per cent between 1996 and 2050. In contrast, the population of the more developed regions would increase to 1,220 million by 2025 and decline thereafter. Africa continued to exhibit the most rapid population growth rate in 1990-1995 (2.7 per cent per annum), followed by Latin American and the Caribbean (1.7 per cent), Asia (1.5 per cent), Oceania (1.4 per cent), North America (1 per cent) and Europe (0.2 per cent).

The average fertility rate in the world continued to decline. During 1990-1995, the rate fell by 17 per cent, from 3.6 to 3 births per woman. The world average, however, concealed large differences in the fertility patterns in different regions. The average fertility rate during 1990-1995 for the more developed regions was 1.7 births per woman, as compared to 5.5 births for the least developed countries. Fertility continued to be highest in Africa, at 5.7 births per woman in 1990-1995, compared to 2.9 in Latin America, 2.8 in Asia, 2.5 in Oceania, 2 in North America and 1.6 in Europe.

Mortality continued to decline in most countries. At the global level, life expectancy at birth reached 64.3 years in 1990-1995, an increase of 6.4 years since 1970-1975. Life expectancy at birth in the more developed regions was 74.2 years; in the less developed regions, 62.1 years; and in the least developed countries, 49.7 years. By region, North America had the highest life expectancy (76.2 years), followed by Oceania (72.9), Europe (72.7), Latin America (68.5), Asia (64.5) and Africa (51.8). The infant mortality rate for the world as a whole was estimated to be 62 deaths per 1,000 live births in 1990-1995. The rate was 11 per 1,000 births in the more developed regions, while the corresponding rate was 68 per 1,000 births in the less developed regions.

As to the demographic trends of international migration, the data available on recent developments were still incomplete, as were estimates for earlier periods. Estimates had only recently been derived for 1965, 1975, 1985 and 1990, indicating that the number of international migrants increased from 75 million in 1965 to 120 million by 1990. Thus, over the 1965-1990 period, the annual rate of growth of the migrant stock was 1.9 per cent. However, estimates of the rate of growth for intermediate periods indicated that the pace of increase had accelerated, from 1.2 per cent per year during 1965-1975 to 2.6 per cent during 1985-1990. The experience of developed and developing countries contrasted markedly. Whereas the annual growth rate of the international migrant stock in developed countries increased only moderately, from 2.3 per cent per annum during 1965-1975 to 2.4 per cent during 1985-1990, that of the number of migrants in the developing countries increased ninefold, from 0.3 per cent during 1965-1975 to 2.7 per cent during 1985-1990. There was considerable variation in the growth and distribution of international migrants among regions. By 1990, Europe and North America were host to 25 million and 24 million international migrants, respectively. The United States alone hosted 20 million international migrants, including the majority of the nearly 3 million undocumented migrants whose status was regularized by legal action in 1986. In the developing world, Asia hosted the largest number of migrants (43 million in 1990). The largest concentration of international migrants in Asia was found in South-Central Asia, particularly in India and Pakistan, where the survivors of the 1948 partition of those countries and the remaining refugees from Afghanistan largely accounted for the 16 million migrants. The increase in the number of international migrants in Central America was the result of civil strife in the 1980s, which had largely abated. In South America, migration did not result in rising migrant stock, and in the Caribbean, the number of international migrants showed a slight increase in the late 1980s. In Europe, increases in 1985-1990 were associated with the changes brought about at the end of the cold war, such as relaxation of exit controls in Eastern and Central European countries and the former USSR. Since 1990, the major source of migrants in Europe had been the territory of the former Yugoslavia. In Africa, increases in the migrant stock during 1985-1990 were mainly attributable to conflicts.

Environmental impact

Commission on Sustainable Development. In January [E/CN.17/1997/2/Add.4], the Secretary-General submitted a report on demographic dynamics and sustainability to the fifth session (New York, 7-25 April) of the Commission on Sustainable Development (see PART THREE, Chapter I). It reviewed progress in implementing the objectives set out in chapter 5 (demographic dynamics and sustainability) of Agenda 21, adopted by the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) [YUN 1992, p. 672].

The report stated that the latest UN projections of world population into the early decades of the twenty-first century showed a marked slowing of population growth, as compared with similar projections for the same time periods made in 1992. The world population was currently projected to become 6.1 billion in 2000 and grow to 7.7 billion in 2020, figures that were, respectively, 137 million and 378 million lower than had been projected in 1992, owing to an assumed faster decline of fertility rates in a number of developing countries, notably in South-Central Asia and sub-Saharan Africa. Fertility was estimated to have declined significantly in Bangladesh, Cote d'Ivoire, India, Kenya, Myanmar, Pakistan, the Syrian Arab Republic and Turkey. Another factor was the higher mortality in countries affected by wars (Burundi, Iraq, Liberia, Rwanda) or by the spread of AIDS. In terms of sustainability of the world's environmental resource base, the annual increase in absolute numbers was significant. For instance, in spite of signs that the fertility transition had started in sub-Saharan Africa, current levels of fertility in most countries of the region remained high and in 17 countries were equal to or exceeded six births per woman. Hence, since the annual increments to the population of the developing world would continue to be significant (77 million per annum through 2020), the environmental implications remained far-reaching for low-income countries, particularly those in South Asia and sub-Saharan Africa, where land degradation and deforestation were most severe.

Both UNCED and ICPD had given greater attention and visibility to the links between population growth and the environment. The two Conferences had reached the consensus that population growth was a significant factor that undermined the environmental resource base. In general, most countries recognized that the links between population and environment were often intricate and complex, which made it difficult to put into operation and translate the concepts into concrete plans. The United Nations had targeted training programmes to upgrade national skills in sustainable development planning. In addition, UNFPA CSTs were providing support to national Governments in collecting data on population and environment. Databases and software were being developed. The report noted areas that needed work to integrate population and environment issues, such as identifying ecologically endangered areas where over-exploitation of natural resources and rapid population growth could create serious problems. Priority research was needed on: coastal areas where populations were growing rapidly and resources were being depleted; soil erosion and desertification, linked with inappropriate land-use practices; water scarcity, and misuse and pollution of water resources; and deforestation resulting from inappropriate shifting cultivation patterns, fuel wood demands, and conversion of forests in upland areas to other uses. The need to address the interrelationships between changes in the environment and migration had emerged as a concern. According to the International Organization for Migration, it was estimated that in 1996 some 25 million persons were environmentally displaced worldwide. Such migrations were caused by natural disasters, by nuclear and hazardous waste contamination, by agricultural and rural decline, resource pollution or chronic water shortages, or by development projects. There was a need to respond to the twin challenge of preventing population movements triggered by environmental damage and mitigating the damage caused by mass migration.

Human settlements

Follow-up to the 1996 UN Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II)

Report of Secretary-General. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 51/177 [YUN 1996, p. 1002], the Secretary-General submitted a July report [A/52/181] on implementation of the outcome of the 1996 United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) [YUN 1996, p. 9921].

Action was taken by the Commission on Human Settlements in 1997 in resolutions relating to a review of its working methods [A/52/8 des. 16/12]; follow-up to Habitat II and the Commission's future role [res. 16/2]; cooperation between the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (UNCHS), also known as Habitat, and the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) [res. 16/20]; and the revitalization of the Centre [res. 16/8]. Those and other decisions adopted by the Commission are discussed below.

The Economic and Social Council, by decision 1997/308 of 25 July, took note of the Secretary-General's report.

Commission action. In other follow-up action to Habitat II, the Commission on Human Settlements, on 6 May [res. 16/9], welcomed the second global report on human settlements conditions, entitled An Urbanizing World: Global Report on Human Settlements 1996, which was launched at Habitat II, and asked the Executive Director of UNCHS to disseminate it. The Executive Director was also asked to prepare the third edition of the Global Report on Human Settlements, as part of the 1998-1999 work programme of the Centre. On the same date [res. 16/23], noting that the Global Parliamentarians on Habitat had organized a successful Parliamentarians Forum as a parallel activity to Habitat II, the Commission encouraged them to continue their efforts towards implementation of the Habitat Agenda and the Istanbul Declaration on Human Settlements, adopted at Habitat II. The Commission [res. 16/10] commended the Centre for its contribution to the preparations for Habitat II and applauded the host country, Turkey, for its contribution to the success of the Conference. Recalling that youth had addressed human settlements issues during Habitat II, the Commission called on the Centre to strengthen its focus on and capacity to mobilize the potential of youth in implementing the Habitat Agenda [res. 16/11].

ACC action. At its first regular session of 1997 (Geneva, 30 June-25 July) [E/1997/73], the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) decided that the arrangements with regard to the follow-up to Habitat II should focus on supporting country-level action and coordination and should involve the development of guidelines to orient the resident coordinator system in establishing country-level thematic groups and strengthening implementation and monitoring at the national and local levels

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee [A/52/628/Add.5], adopted resolution 52/190 without vote [agenda item 93 (e)].

Implementation of the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II)

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 51/177 of 16 December 1996, in which it endorsed the Istanbul Declaration on Human Settlements and the Habitat Agenda, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) at Istanbul, on 14 June 1996,

Cognizant of the importance of maintaining the momentum already generated at the national, regional and international levels for the implementation of measures designed to address the economic, social and environmental consequences of rapid urbanization,

Stressing the need to improve conditions of shelter, access to safe drinking water, adequate sanitation and basic social services in both rural and urban areas,

Recalling paragraph 218 of the Habitat Agenda, in which the Conference requested the General Assembly to consider holding a special session in the year 2001 for an overall review and appraisal of the implementation of the outcome of Habitat II, and paragraph 15 of resolution 51/177, in which the Assembly reaffirmed that a decision on the matter should be taken at its fifty-second session,

Noting the delay in the submission of the report of the Secretary-General on the final comprehensive and in-depth assessment of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) with a view to its revitalization, as called for in paragraph 19 of resolution 51/177, and stressing that that has constrained consideration by the Assembly of those issues,

Recalling its resolution 51/225 of 3 April 1997, and noting with concern the report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services, in which serious concern is expressed about the financial irregularities in the Centre, and recognizing that the serious management and financial situation at the Centre should be addressed as a matter of urgency,

1. Takes note of the reports of the Commission on Human Settlements on its sixteenth session and on the implementation of the Global Strategy for Shelter to the Year 2000, and the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II);

2. Requests the Secretary-General to address urgently the serious management and financial situation at the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) to meet its responsibilities in the implementation of the Habitat Agenda, in accordance with Commission on Human Settlements resolution 16/8;

3. Urges the Executive Director of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) to take further action towards the reform of the administrative and financial management of the Centre pursuant to the recommendations of the Office of Internal Oversight Services, as well as the relevant reports of the United Nations Board of Auditors and Commission on Human Settlements resolutions 16/8 and 16/19, and decisions 16/28 and 16/29;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to it at its fifty-third session the comprehensive and in-depth assessment of the Centre with a view to its revitalization called for in paragraph 19 of resolution 51/177, taking into account Commission resolution 16/8 and other relevant resolutions adopted by the Commission at its sixteenth session;

5. Urges all Governments and other actors concerned with human settlements and urban management issues, such as local authorities, relevant intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations, parliamentarians, the private sector, trade unions, academicians and other community groups, to implement fully and effectively the Habitat Agenda;

6. Invites Governments to consider, where appropriate, including in their delegations to future sessions of the Commission, in accordance with the specific conditions of each country, representatives of local authorities and the relevant actors of civil society, particularly the private sector, non-governmental organizations and research organizations, in the field of adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development;

7. Affirms that, in a rapidly urbanizing world, the pivotal role of local authorities in the implementation of the Habitat Agenda should be recognized and enhanced;

8. Requests all relevant organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, including the regional commissions, and invites the Bretton Woods institutions, to support fully the effective implementation of the Habitat Agenda, at all levels, and to enhance their cooperation for that purpose, with a view to promoting an integrated, interrelated and coherent implementation of, and coordinated follow-up to, the outcomes of United Nations conferences;

9. Stresses that the full and effective implementation of the Habitat Agenda, in particular in all developing countries, especially those in Africa and the least developed countries, will require the mobilization of additional financial resources from various sources at the national and international levels and more effective development cooperation in support of national efforts in order to promote assistance for shelter and human settlements activities;

10. Invites all Governments and the international community to consider providing further support to the United Nations Habitat and Human Settlements Foundation in its activities, taking into account the need to continue to improve its effectiveness;

11. Invites the Commission on Human Settlements to promote the use of a set of key indicators to be developed further by the Centre and used by Governments, as appropriate, for national and local monitoring and evaluation of the implementation of the Habitat Agenda;

12. Decides to hold a special session of the General Assembly in the year 2001 for an overall review and appraisal of the implementation of the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II), the modalities of which will be decided on at its fifty-third session;

13. Invites the Economic and Social Council to consider devoting one high-level segment before the year 2001 to human settlements and the implementation of the Habitat Agenda;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session a report on the implementation of the present resolution;

15. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session the sub-item entitled "Implementation of the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II)".

Commission on Human Settlements

The Commission on Human Settlements, at its sixteenth session (Nairobi, 28 April-7 May) [A/52/8], adopted 25 resolutions and 6 decisions. By one resolution [res. 16/2], the Commission proposed a draft resolution to be adopted by the General Assembly on follow-up to Habitat II and the future role of the Commission, which was adopted by the Assembly as resolution 52/192. Another resolution and a decision dealt with the Global Strategy for Shelter to the Year 2000 (see below). In several resolutions, the Commission made recommendations to implement Habitat II (see above); in others, it took action on the work and administration of UNCHS (see below). Other resolutions dealt with political, economic and social issues related to human settlements (see below). The Commission adopted its own medium-term plan for 1998-2001 [dec. 16/27]; decided to consider two themes at its next (seventeenth) session—local implementation of the Habitat Agenda, and international cooperation for implementation of the Agenda [dec. 16/31]; requested the secretariat to implement those matters arising from the resolutions of UN legislative organs and other intergovernmental bodies, taking into account the Centre's mandate and work programme [dec. 16/30]; and approved the budget of the United Nations Habitat and Human Settlements Foundation for 1998-1999 (see below) [dec. 16/29]. Another decision related to the Centre's 1998-1999 work programme [dec. 16/28].

The Economic and Social Council, in decision 1997/308 of 25 July, took note of an extract [E/1997/L.26] from the Commission's report on its sixteenth session which was finalized [A/52/8] at a later date.

Working methods

On 7 May [res. 16/12], the Commission invited Governments to consider including in their delegations to its future sessions representatives of local authorities and the relevant actors of civil society, particularly the private sector, NGOs and research organizations involved in the provision of adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development. It decided to provide at future sessions opportunities for partners to engage in a dialogue among themselves and with Governments. Representatives of local authorities and the relevant actors of civil society were invited to propose to UNCHS activities for the inter-sessional periods, for the approval of the Commission, in order to accelerate the implementation of the Habitat Agenda [YUN 1996, p. 994].

The Executive Director of the Centre was asked to ensure, subject to approval of the Commission and without prejudice to the provisions of Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/31 [YUN 1996, p. 1360], that partners were actively involved with the Centre's work so as to contribute to the effective implementation of the Habitat Agenda.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 18 December [meeting 77], the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Second Committee [A/52/628/Add.5], adopted resolution 52/192 without vote [agenda item 93 (e)].

Follow-up to the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) and the future role of the Commission on Human Settlements

The General Assembly,

Welcoming the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II), held at Istanbul from 3 to 14 June 1996,

Bearing in mind its resolutions 2718(XXV) of 15 December 1970, 3001(XXVII) of 15 December 1972 and 3327(XXIX) of 16 December 1974, and in particular its resolution 32/162 of 19 December 1977, by which it decided that the Economic and Social Council should transform the Committee on Housing, Building and Planning into the Commission on Human Settlements,

Taking into account its resolutions 51/177 of 16 December 1996 on the implementation of the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) and 50/227 of 24 May 1996 on further measures for the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields,

Recalling that, in its resolution 51/177, the General Assembly reaffirmed that the Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations and relevant resolutions, including Assembly resolutions 48/162 of 20 December 1993 and 50/227, and together with the Commission on Human Settlements, should constitute a three-tiered intergovernmental mechanism to oversee the coordination of activities for the implementation of the Habitat Agenda,

Convinced that the follow-up to the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) will be undertaken on the basis of an integrated approach to human settlements development and within the framework of coordinated follow-up to and implementation of the results of the major international conferences in the economic, social and related fields,

I

Framework for the functioning of the Commission

1. Reaffirms that the Commission on Human Settlements, as a standing committee of the Economic and Social Council, should have a central role in monitoring, within the United Nations system, the implementation of the Habitat Agenda and advising the Council thereon;

2. Calls upon all the relevant United Nations organizations and specialized agencies to identify specific actions that they will undertake, within their mandates, towards the implementation of the Habitat Agenda, and invites them to inform the Administrative Committee on Coordination of their actions;

3. Calls upon the funds and programmes of the United Nations system and the regional commissions, consistent with their respective mandates, to support fully the effective implementation of the Habitat Agenda, particularly at the field level, as appropriate;

4. Invites the Bretton Woods institutions to consider how they might be actively involved in the implementation of and follow-up to the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II), and to enhance their cooperation with the United Nations system for that purpose;

5. Decides, in view of the importance of non-governmental organizations, local authorities, the private sector and research organizations in the promotion of human settlements development, that such organizations should be encouraged to participate in the work of the Commission, in accordance with the relevant provisions of Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/31 of 25 July 1996 on the consultative relationship between the United Nations and non-governmental organizations;

II

Terms of reference

6. Reaffirms the existing mandate of the Commission on Human Settlements as set out in resolution 32/162, while stressing the normative and catalytic character of the mandate;

7. Reaffirms in particular the responsibility of the Commission to give overall policy guidance to and to supervise the operations of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat), including the United Nations Habitat and Human Settlements Foundation;

8. Takes into account that the Commission should fulfil its mandate in line with paragraphs 222 to 227 of the Habitat Agenda and in harmony with recommendations made by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, particularly chapter 7 of Agenda 21;

9. Decides that the Commission, in fulfilling its mandate, shall assist the Economic and Social Council in monitoring, reviewing and assessing the progress made in the implementation of the Habitat Agenda, inter alia, through the analysis of relevant inputs from Governments, local authorities and their associations, relevant non-governmental organizations and the private sector;

10. Also decides that the Commission shall identify issues on which system-wide coordination needs to be improved and modalities for promoting such coordination, in order to assist the Council in its coordination function;

III

Structure of the agenda and work programme of the Commission

11. Urges the Commission to adopt a multi-year work programme for a focused and thematic approach that would, inter alia, provide a framework to assess the progress achieved in the implementation of the Habitat Agenda and that would be in line with the coordinated follow-up to conferences, culminating in an overall review and appraisal of the Habitat Agenda in the year 2001;

12. Decides that the work of the Commission, in relation to its programme of work, shall be primarily focused on the relevant provisions of the Habitat Agenda, with a view to ensuring the effective implementation of the Habitat Agenda;

13. Also decides that the agenda of the Commission on Human Settlements at its future sessions shall include the following substantive items derived from the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat n):

(a) Issues identified in the multi-year programme of work;

(b) Relevant United Nations plans and programmes of action pertaining to the themes "Sustainable human settlements development" and "Adequate shelter for all";

(c) Emerging issues, trends and new approaches to issues affecting human settlements development;

14. Further decides that, at its seventeenth and eighteenth sessions, the Commission will focus on monitoring the implementation of the Habitat Agenda and assessing its impact, structuring those sessions around the following four substantive areas of the Habitat Agenda:

(a) Adequate shelter for all, also incorporating the monitoring of the Global Strategy for Shelter to the Year 2000;

(b) Sustainable human settlements in an urbanizing world, also incorporating the monitoring of chapter 7 of Agenda 21;

(c) Capacity-building and institutional development;

(d) International cooperation and coordination;

15. Decides that:

(a) At its seventeenth session, in 1999, the Commission will address the above-mentioned substantive areas;

(b) At its eighteenth session, in 2001, the Commission will focus on preparations for the special session of the General Assembly, if appropriate;

(c) In 1998 and 2000, the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) will analyse the progress made on national implementation status, organized around the four above-mentioned substantive areas, and will prepare synthesized reports to be submitted for consideration by the Commission at its seventeenth and eighteenth sessions;

IV

Documentation

16. Requests that all United Nations documentation be kept concise, clear, analytical and timely, with a focus on relevant issues, that to the greatest extent possible use be made of integrated reporting, that reports contain recommendations for action and indicate the actors involved, that reports be made available in all official languages in accordance with the rules of the United Nations, and that the use of other methods of reporting, such as oral reports, also be explored;

V

Methods of work of the Commission

17. Recognizes that the methods of work of the Commission should be revitalized in order to improve the profile of the Commission and attract high-level political participation;

18. Decides that preparation of thematic discussions in the Commission should be broadened by:

(a) Inviting countries to contribute to the preparation of the sessions by, for example, organizing seminars or expert panels on issues directly related to the themes that will be discussed at a particular session, and to report thereon;

(b) Involving local authorities, non-governmental organizations, the private sector and other partners in the preparatory phases of Commission sessions;

VI

Secretariat

21. Urges the Secretary-General to ensure the effective functioning of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) in line with paragraph 232 of the Habitat Agenda so as to enable it to discharge its mandate fully and to serve as an efficient secretariat to the Commission, and also to ensure that clear lines of responsibility are drawn so as to facilitate the implementation of the follow-up to Habitat II and secure close cooperation at the secretariat level among all United Nations entities involved in the follow-up;

22. Requests the Executive Director of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat) to submit to the Commission on Human Settlements at future sessions a detailed report on the activities of regional offices, paying special attention to the status of implementation of the work programmes elaborated for the implementation of the Habitat Agenda in each region.

Global Strategy for Shelter to the Year 2000

The Commission on Human Settlements issued an October report [A/52/8/Add.1] on the implementation of the Global Strategy for Shelter to the Year 2000, adopted by the General Assembly in resolution 43/181 [YUN 1988, p. 478]. The Global Strategy aimed at facilitating adequate shelter for all by the year 2000 with an operational focus on national action. The Habitat Agenda, adopted in 1996 [YUN 1996, p. 994], incorporated the principles of enablement and participation contained in the Global Strategy.

The report presented an overview of action taken by 135 Governments to put into effect enabling shelter strategies. Regarding action taken by UNCHS, the report stated that, in implementing the Global Strategy, it provided assistance to countries for applying urban and housing indicators, preparing national plans of action, and mobilizing actors in civil society to address adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements in an urbanizing world. In the area of technical cooperation, the Centre supported strengthening the capacity of Governments to act as facilitators in the shelter delivery system. Under its Research and Development Programme, the Centre produced a number of technical publications relating to shelter, which addressed issues of employment generated by shelter programmes, mobilization of finance at the community level, improving security of tenure, settlement upgrading and waste management. A programme dedicated to outreach to women continued to support women's networks, conducted training workshops on gender awareness for governmental officials and community leaders, and promoted women's access to land and property. The Capacity-building Programme assisted national and local training institutions in sub-Saharan Africa and a leadership-training programme in Eastern Europe, and began a programme of action to plan for sustainable urban development. Information dissemination activities were advanced through the use of new information technology. The quarterly publication Habitat News was transformed into Habitat Debate, which contained discussions on issues relating to shelter and settlements.

In 1997, the main operational activity of the Centre in relation to the Global Strategy was the application of the urban and housing indicators. By September 1996, 113 countries had participated in the programme. The global urban indicators database, which was in the process of refinement, was a resource for examining problems and conditions of human settlements, and would provide baseline data for monitoring the implementation of national plans of action. The programme included the training of officials in national and local government. In a number of countries, indicators from the programme, often with some local adaptation, would be used to monitor national programmes and would be collected in most urban areas.
